But the English government will not be easily persuaded that if it abandon so vast a source of revenue on the one hand, the saving of expenditure by the diminution of crime will be a commensurate indemnification on the other. The rulers of nearly all nations adhere to habitual principles with a tenacity which manifests their dread of all practical change; and it is only when they are forced to concessions, that any really salutary reforms are established. The Teetotalers must therefore agitate—unwearingly, unceasingly agitate in favour of their great principle; for arduous and difficult will be their task, so long as they have to contend against the immoral and disgraceful opposition which the government directly throws in their way by encouraging the manufacture, import, or sale of intoxicating liquors. The Teetotalers, by being linked in one band by one common interest, and by speaking with one voice, can make their demand upon the government in such a tone, that its very echoes shall resound throughout the lordly mansions of the senators, and the regal halls of the sovereign; and no power would be rash enough to resist this effort in favour of the morality, the health, and the happiness of the nation.

Let it be remembered that The Teetotaler journal is the friend to the working-classes: it is the staunch advocate of the new doctrine which will regenerate the mechanic, the artisan, and the labourer; it will feel proud to assert their privileges and defend their interests; and it will not hesitate to express with boldness those opinions which tend to establish the prosperity of that grade in society which has so long been degraded by evil habits, and trampled upon by the rich. The cause of the working-classes must not be espoused in a luke-warm manner, nor must idle courtesies or presumed conventions with respect to sovereigns, or peers, or nobles, prevent the truth from being openly published. The government is no friend to the working-classes, whom it seeks to degrade and debase by placing within their reach the diabolical poisons which ruin them bodily and mentally; and, therefore, no considerations of idle ceremony should induce those journals, which defend the interests of the poor, to conceal the truth from the ears of the rich. And, oh! those ears shall yet tingle at the tales which shall be told to them by a suffering and impoverished population; and those who have been the oppressors, shall learn to dread the oppressed. The words of the Bible, against the authority of which either in morals or in political systems none should set his face, will be found to be correct, when they declare that the only system of conduct which nations are to expect at the hand of Kings, is bondage; and, if the Bible be true, and if its dictates should serve as guides for our conduct, we shall learn to respect that divine authority which, when the Israelites thirsted after the pomp of regal rulers, so plainly manifested its abhorrence of such institutions.

If the vices of men rendered harsh rulers and severe laws necessary evils, the more rapidly Teetotalism extirpates the source of those vices, the better. The great majority of the nation is thus clearly interested in the rapid extension of Teetotal doctrines; and, on this account, as well as on the score of domestic peace, health, and example, do we earnestly call upon our fellow-countrymen to come forward to enlist themselves beneath the banners of Teetotalism! Fathers, this new doctrine will make your families happy! Mothers, your daughters will avoid the grand chance of female degradation, by taking due example from your sobriety! Sons, you should learn to avoid the rock on which your sires have split! Daughters, the vices of those who gave you birth should prove as warnings to guide you into the right path! And, friends, endeavour to propagate the sound and wholesome doctrines of Teetotalism amongst each other!

AMERICA AND THE AMERICANS.

No. VI.

IN conformity with the provisions, the company, having selected six persons to compose the council, sealed up their names, together with various regulations and orders, in a box, which was delivered to Newport, with orders to open it in twenty-four hours after his arrival in Virginia. It was hoped in this way to avoid the jealousies likely to arise during a long voyage between persons clothed with only a prospective authority and those who were to be submitted to their controul. But a detention of six weeks on the coast of England by adverse winds was enough to sour far sweeter spirits than were crowded into the little fleet; a malicious spirit of dissension was the result, which, as it did not spare the chaplain of the expedition, whose sacred office worthily discharged was calculated to command respect, would hardly have been rebuked by empty titles unsupported by actual power. But the violence of its rancour was directed against Captain John Smith who with a reputation for adventurous enterprise bordering in some instances on romance, a vigorous understanding, great resolution, and stern integrity, soon became an object of alarm to his companions, who dreaded not more the ascendancy of his talents than of his worth. At the suggestion of Wingfield, he was arrested on a trumped-up charge of intending to murder the council, usurp the government, and make himself king of Virginia; a ridiculous accusation which evinces their deep sense and apprehension of his imposing qualities. According to his orders, Newport had, on the first night of his arrival, opened the mysterious box, and published the list of six persons nominated to the council. Five of them immediately met, were sworn, elected Wingfield president, and formally excluded the sixth, who was their prisoner, Captain Smith. Within two months from this time, the bay had been explored, the Patowmac discovered, the foundations of Jamestown laid, the ships laden with timber and ready to sail. As the period had arrived, when Newport was obliged by his instructions to return, Smith's enemies, under a hypocritical pretence of giving him a fairer trial than he could get in the colony, proposed sending him to meet their accusation before the council in England. Conscious of his innocence and perceiving in this mock humanity a mere trick to remove him, he boldly insisted on his immediate trial, disproved the charge, and turned the tide of resentment against his accusers. Not only was he admitted to the council, but he had the satisfaction of placing at the disposal of the colony two hundred pounds, the amount of a penalty levied on the president for his illegal and unjust proceedings. This calm and noble reparation for a wrong, shows that these men, however rough and boisterous, had in them that firm sense of justice, which springs from an early and habitual reverence for order and law.

With the departure of Newport, the hardships of the colonists began. The ship's stores, more abundant than the colony's, had hitherto afforded, by barter with the sailors, an important resource: but from that time each man was restricted to half a pint of wheat and as much barley, which, "having fried some six and twenty weeks in the ship's hold, contained as many worms as grains." Meanwhile, Wingfield, the president, having no desire to be an anchorite, shamelessly embezzled the common stores, "engrossing to his private use, oatmeal, sack, aqua-vitæ, beef, eggs, or what not," every thing in short but "the common petal," which he most religiously eschewed. Bad diet, exposure to the night air, incessant toil under a burning sun, speedily generated malignant diseases which between May and December carried off more than fifty of the colonists; amongst others, the enterprising Gurnold, the original projector of the expedition. To increase the general gloom, the contemptible president was detected in attempting to seize the pinnace and escape. He was in consequence deposed, and Ratcliffe chosen in his place. Hitherto a supply of sturgeon and sea-crab had kept off famine, but as this began sensibly to diminish, and no other prospect of relief appeared, the most dreadful extremities seemed inevitable; when by a sudden and most unaccountable impulse, the natives generously assisted them with an ample contribution of provisions and fruits. This seasonable aid was the more unexpected, in as much as, after a short period of friendly intercourse, they had committed a treacherous aggression, and were supposed to be still harbouring schemes of mischief.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE TEETOTALER."

Glasgow, 27th October.

SIR,—Having deeply felt the importance of the principles which "The Teetotaler" advocates, and being no less deeply sensible of the terrible devastation wrought by intemperance not only as respects the means to procure the necessities of life, but health and morals, I offer you the enclosed story, in the hope that it may be thought not altogether unworthy of your Journal, which is conducted with an ability and earnestness that may well recommend it extensively in Scotland. Perhaps I may communicate a little variety to your paper, should I be capable of picturing with some degree of accuracy and distinctness the forms which drunkenness takes in my native country, and its characteristic consequences. You will judge of my capacity from the accompanying sample, which I declare to you is essentially according to facts, although fictitious names and slighter dressings have been introduced.

Your's Obediently
DUNCAN MACFARVISH.

WALTER TORRANCE.

OF Walter Torrance's birth and early life I never had any accurate information; but about his twentieth year he distinguished himself in the west of Scotland, among tradesmen and the like, as one of the friends of the people, at the memorable era of the French Revolution. At that time he followed the calling of a pedlar; but his fluent and arousing style of declamation on the common topics of the discontents of the day, gained him more notoriety; for he was chosen as a delegate, and found his profit as well as his reputation, in belagging hither and thither as other popular demagogues were. The strong arm of the government at length, however, scattered the faction; and then he withdrew for a season from the field of his fame, to avoid apprehension and punishment.

The spirit of a young man is not easily quenched, especially after having once tasted the luxury of its own extravagant ardour. Torrance accordingly, about his twenty-third year, entered himself at Glasgow College, and, no longer afraid of a state prosecution, devoted himself to a learned profession. In the earlier stages of his academical career, in cultivating an acquaintance with the classics of Greece and Rome, he excited no particular notice. Yet, had it been known through what disadvantages he then made his way—being a respectable scholar—his course would have been marked in a very distinguished manner. But, when he advanced to the philosophical classes, he had no equal among all his fellows. They were, in truth, but children compared with manhood, when brought to compete with him, as regarded original talent, as well as acquired knowledge. He had read much, and digested with wonderful success the materials spread before him.

On one occasion he was required, in the ordinary course of the duties of the ethical class, to read his essay, the theme being, "the Liberty of the Human Will;" and no doubt the professor was eager to hear this metaphysical giant on the knotty point. Torrance, however, was unprovided with a written essay, but entertained that for once he might be permitted to give his views in an extempore and oral discourse. This being granted, he, in a strain of cogent, philosophic, and eloquent reasoning, that neither halted nor failed, made what the professor declared to be one of the most brilliant efforts he had ever known in support of the Necessarian's creed; adding, that for the future, it was clearly of little moment whether he was called on to lecture or to listen.

But however much Torrance might be admired for his talents, few respected or loved him. In the first place, his outward man was forbidding: his dress being slovenly, and his person disgusting. As to his face, while he remained mute, it was a mass of heavy folds of flesh; his eyes were small and rheumy, and his lips large and discoloured. Then the trunk of his frame was most uncouth; his arms, legs, hands, and fingers unshapely. But no sooner did he essay to speak, than the same lineaments and frame were brought into striking contrast with their former state; and the stranger that before might have been shrinking from him with loathing, would stand as if fixed by sudden power. The deep intonations of his voice, the flow of his manly speech, were capable of entrancing the listener; whilst the majesty of his mind, which cared not to persuade, but to carry captive, set all external things aside as perfect trifles; or rather, made them convenient foils to the might of his genius.

But while a student, his morals were also exceptionable. It was known that he was a hard drinker, and other charges of an impure nature were also preferred against him. One thing at least was notorious: his favourite associates were the low, the worthless, the broken-down men of the city. Some of those who witnessed the efforts of his genius, ventured at times to counsel him kindly regarding his life. But he would answer them with a scorn, that proved his principles to be as bad as his practices. "Strong drink," he would say, "befriends men of mind: and as to associates, I despise him that looks to the shell, and considers not the kernel; for I find persons as good and as talented in the lowest grades, as among the high-headed. After all it is to me matter of indifference where I am, if so be that my entire nature have its sway; for whatever I do, I would do it with all my might."

The profession which Torrance chose was that of the holy ministry. And now he made a great parade of religious austerities. When he afterwards became a preacher, he attached himself to a party that dissented from the national church; not from convictions of its greater purity, it may be presumed, but because he was impatient, and doubtful of preferment or employment in any other way. At this period, patronage put forward Mr. Foster in the parish of —, to be the minister of the establishment, in opposition to the general will of the inhabitants; and though he was a pious and learned man, he was neither showy nor well known; while he was still the nominee of an unpopular power. Therefore the outcry against him was great: a class fell off from the flock, and built a chapel, giving Torrance a call to be their pastor. He was accordingly, without delay, there settled; which happened to be in the very same district of the country where some twelve years before he had been a leading democrat.

Behold Walter Torrance's great parts now strained for renown as a preacher, and on the acquisition of a large congregation. Nor did he fail of draining the parish church dry after day, not merely of pining old maids and wives, but of persons of staid years and tried prudence. And surely, if there be any homage due by man to man, it must be to him who triumphs over the minds of his fellows; who sets hearts on fire, and carries them whither he lists, to regions far above this earthly world; giving, as it seems, a foretaste of heaven's enlargement and ecstasies. No wonder, then, that Torrance, who enraptured people's souls as none ever had done in that quarter, should become the most celebrated man of his order. His church was uniformly crowded to overflowing. Tardy goers, who could not gain access by the doors, would eagerly climb to the windows, to gather but the fragments of sentences; believing themselves really bettered by the mere dying sound of his voice, as they escaped through the various outlets of the building.

Some idea of the popularity, and of the thronging of the people after him, may be gained from a letter written by himself, which also gives a powerful picture of a dreadful scene. The letter—addressed to a neighbouring minister—runs thus:—

"My people, as usual, were assembled; the church was in every part crowded before I ascended the pulpit. But ere a half hour had elapsed I helped to stretch eighteen dead bodies, of those who had peaceably met, and composedly sat to worship within, on the green graves without. It was as I announced the psalm to be sung, on beginning the afternoon service, that something like the splitting and the crashing of wood startled us. A simultaneous yell arose, and a furious rush was made towards passages, stairs, and doors, by many hundreds. It was soon plain to me, however, that, but for the frenzy of the people, there was no danger. Yet, no wonder, that they did madly, after they had once taken alarm. The scene was itself maddening. There was the mortal violence of people labouring for escape from death, and fighting for life; there was a large assembly rushing, and fluctuating, and wailing, like a raging sea. Nay, there was something still more terrific to the mind than all this. It was when during a short pause and silence, as if made by concert, I contemplated the most fearful scene. Not only was the pause a recruiting for a more deadly struggle, a more desperate tug, but the moanings that were stifled, the breathings that were inaudible, like the murmur of a thousand new filled graves, which the imagination may dream of, wrought a more direful sublimity than all the cries of agony, and all the riot of desperation had yet done. It was at this moment that my heart seemed to burst—that I was about to leap among the throng—that methought I saw the roof above me open and close repeatedly, through which the expanse of the blue and lovely sky seemed at one time plain, then again murky, and tumbling, and shooting terrible lightnings.

"But the pause and the silence were to be broken by a more determined struggle; by the choking and yelling of many whose lives were soon to be trodden out. The smooth tide of the inundation was disturbed by staircases giving way, when volumes of human beings burst forth in horrible disorder, rolling in heaps upon heaps. Infuriated and agile men ran on the tops of the compact masses, and leaped in their delirium as if with barbarous intent. I saw one jump from the gallery upon a throng below, and another into an empty area; but after standing for a second stone-still, this last dropped down dead. Many strove and flung themselves from the highest windows, to their own destruction, or great damage. But I am afraid to think more at present of that woful day's history; 'twas a terrible day of the Lord. I shall merely add, that though the dead consisted chiefly of aged or tender persons, I yet remarked one robust body which was apparently unhurt. He was a young and healthy looking man; his hands were still warm—the sweat was upon his forehead undried since his last terrible toil—his muscles were as if ready to start into motion—but his blood had ceased to flow; he was quite dead."

Walter Torrance, who thus described the dreadful catastrophe, occasioned by a false apprehension on the part of the multitude who thronged after him, rose afterwards into still higher popularity. It served to lend him a more than earthly attraction, and an almost miraculous authority as an ambassador from heaven to men. There came to be none but Mr. Torrance; he did as it seemed to him good; nor dared any one whisper an impeachment against him, without encountering, from a host of tongues, the charge of being a heretic. But things began to be said to his prejudice in a corner. The whisper gathered strength. It hardly could be denied that he was a glutton. The defence however set up, was at first more than a match for the charge; viz. that the great man was not to be tried by rules that measured ordinary beings. But he had been seen drunk; and that not once or twice; nay, on Sabbath nights he had been known to indulge to excess. Next, he was savage to his amiable wife; nor could this be unlikely, for it came out, that when a young man he had beaten severely his aged and frail-minded father. Last of all, the cloud gathered greater density that was to burst upon his devoted head, for it was openly and strongly asserted that he had reduced Flora, his servant, a young and beautiful woman.

One evening at a late hour, when my mother (who had, in spite of the great powers of Mr. Torrance, all along pretty justly estimated his character), was reading to me a lesson from his case—for we belonged to the parish in which he figured—the screams at it of some distracted person suddenly alarmed us, and next moment the wife of the man we had been speaking of stood before us in a desperate plight,—her mouth filled with such horrid accusations against him, as smote all who heard her with great consternation. Her first words were—"Let me in; death and destruction are nigh us; lamentation and woe is in our land, even in our houses!" "What ails you, my dear Mrs. Torrance?" my mother asked. The answer was—"Flora is dead, killed by drugs, given to her by Torrance. At one time I could not bide to hear her name, nor to behold her face, but now it is the name and the face of the monster that misled and murdered her, that are hateful to me." "Who misled and murdered Flora?" was the next inquiry; and the reply was—"Walter Torrance! Walter Torrance! he did all! all!—he who has been holding up his face to preach the gospel of peace and purity. O! I loathe myself for the favour he once had with me."

With a forced and alarming composure, she ran over these further particulars: "When we got Highland Flora for our servant, she was the bonniest quean I had ever set my eyes on; and she was as sweet as she was bonny, and wonderfully simple and confiding. By and by she began to gather finer dresses than suited her station; but just like herself, she confessed that she wished to be drawn, and to buy new claes; so guileless was the creature. O! but she was ignorant though: she neither could write nor read, and had nothing to guide her but a sort of simple modesty of disposition and sweetness of temper; and her last master was at no pains to make up for this; even forbidding me to do it, saying, he would look to that matter himself. But the lesson he gave her was to work on her ignorance and superstitious fears, for his own diabolical purposes."

After many pausings and wallings, Mrs. Torrance again proceeded. "Two hours have not yet elapsed since I heard Flora speak; in her great sorrow and agony I heard her say to him, when I was in an adjoining apartment (for I durst not go to her), 'It was cruel, sir, to mislead me, and break your wife's heart. What for did ye gie me you drug that is killing me? And what am I to do for anither world? Ye should ken and should tell me now. Have you no pity for Flora? If ye have, why do ye keep your wife from me? I wish to tell her something—I wish to have her pardon afore I lose my reason! Ah! man, ye are a cruel man, though a minister. But ye'll never be happy after this: I leave my death on you. Ye'll never sleep soun' any more—ye'll dream of your killing me. Your folks will hate you—ye'll grow mad and die mad, and gang to be judged.'"

Mrs. Torrance had again to pause, after repenting these disjointed sayings of the poor dying Flora. When a little recruited, she continued—"I did my best to force my way to the murdered lass, in spite of the monstrous man that watched her; but he flung me back violently, and Flora soon after ceased to speak and to breathe. Alas! she is dead—her work is over. She has gone to her account, and so must her destroyer—and so must we all." But again the distracted woman had to yield to tumultuous emotions, and her further disclosures at that time were unintelligible. She found shelter, with us however, from a husband loaded with hideous guilt, and from the fearful neighbourhood of unnatural death.

It was a distressing thlog to witness poor Flora's funeral. None of her kindred could in due time be apprized of it, and her late guilt-struck master was unable to take any charge of the business. Her body indeed might have lain in neglect, or been cast out as carrion for him. But Mr. Foster, and some other worthy persons, undertook the necessary steps to have her decently interred. Long before the corpse was removed, however, from where she breathed her last, there were crowds of persons surrounding the house, who were neither slack nor silent in bewailing the untimely fate of her whose once comely person was now disfigured, cold, and decaying, and whose soul had been hurried away unprepared before a dread tribunal. These wild mourners blended their wallings, with unmeasured curses, execrating the man who wrought the havoc made on fair and young life.

In the meantime Torrance, deserted, and stupified by strong drink, was staggering from one part of his house to another, under a sort of obtuse agony. But if ever a contrast was strongly drawn between two men, it was between him and the amiable Mr. Foster on that day; especially at the funeral service, when the latter, in praying for a blessing on the refreshments before them, poured out his soul in behalf of one he called his bereft brother. He spoke, if not with Torrance's powers, yet with a still small voice, of the richest mind being poor and debased when without heaven's grace. And when he referred, with his wonted piety and tenderness, to the lessons taught by the decease of her whose dust was about to mingle with dust—of the frailty of beauty, health, and youthful vivacity—those who listened to his ardent breathings and entreaties, said that they thought them so moving as not to doubt their efficacy.

But Flora's body rests far from her kindred, abused by so gaudy monument, so tawdry device, no lying inscription. The clay and the green turf are her sepulchre; and the passer-by pointeth with his finger and saith, "Yonder is Highland Flora's grave!"

Ere Flora's body was laid into that grave, however, the infatuated Torrance was in the hands of justice, on a charge of murder; but after a short time, he was again set at liberty, there being a great deficiency of proof against him; his wife, who might have disclosed much perhaps, declining after the first burst of her distraction to utter a word on the subject. With equal prudence, she also took measures that he should never look upon her more. His flock nearly as speedily drove him from them for ever. He was therefore set adrift, poor and unfriended, under an unalleviated load of guilt, and with ever-increasing evil habits. He now repaired to the neighbouring burgh, and commenced bookseller, or rather, a vender of tracts and pamphlets, chiefly of those written by himself at starts; at moments, as it seemed, of great mental suffering, and when he was filled with a sense of guilt.

Sometimes Torrance lavished his vast powers in these effusions with a fearful and minute description of the stings which disturb the drunkard's awakenings from insensibility, or of the phantoms that rise before the murderer's conscience. In one passage are these words:—"I know a man that was bound down with worse than chains of stubborn iron to the service of Satan; one that was brimful of guilt and of woe; that had not a solace in possession or in prospect; not even the transient delusions of infidelity, or the full delirium of madness, to deaden his conscience. O! the way of transgressors is hard. His natural and acquired parts were great; but he was just so much the more mercilessly lashed. At length he came to be bereft of all on earth—of friends, of kinsfolk, and of wealth—of conscious enjoyment from ardent labours, of buoyant hopes, of self-esteem. Nor did he ever awake, or look abroad, but to a clear view of irretrievable ruin in time and eternity. Was he not in torment before the time? Did the worm that never dieth not writhe within him already? Yes! and his pains and his remorse passed into fiendish despair; his unceasing wish is now, that there was no God."

But with all his mastery of self-delineation, he could not master himself; for immediately after expatiating thus, he would hurry to the bottle, and he again steeped in insensibility, to the exclusion of every gleam of reason. He came to be therefore in general little better than a dull brute. It is not then to be wondered at, that the smallest portion of worldly means failed him, as well as his mental vigour. And now the dreadful forebodings, uttered by Flora at her death, that he should die mad, haunted his disjointed mind. Here was a new horror. He had so long enjoyed the splendours of a first-rate genius, that anything like a final obscuration of its light was, to his apprehension, more woful than present excruciating pain.

"And is my soul indeed to be imprisoned ere I die, and shorn of its power? Shall I wander about a spectacle of insanity and idiocy? O! if I may choose of the diseases of the mind, let mine be the lunatic's hallucinations, or the gorgeous dreamings of a raving brain." Such were his ejaculations.

The most woful symptom of that disorder which he dreaded, was the fancy of carrying the Bible in his bosom, as a charm against past guilt and coming judgment. But horrible to conceive, he would swallow largely the poison of the cup that was unbinging so effectually his energies, at the very moment that he hugged the sacred volume. He would now, many times a day, imagine that fiends were after him; and then he fought against them with a terrible frenzy; using at the time the most solemn declarations of the Bible, as the weapon of defence.

But by this period his career was near a close. Extreme poverty plucked him. For an entire week he was without shelter from the inclemency of the weather, day and night. He was, during the whole of this period, as unsettled as a prowling wolf. At last, as if under a sort of retributive infatuation, he made his way one evening to the neighbourhood of his former dwelling, when he was in the height of his popularity, near to which, never since his expulsion, had he been known to approach. This last visit was on a Saturday in the month of November, just before it was quite dark. In spite, however, of the disheartening season and hour, he was seen for a time running through hedges and over the roughest ground; and was heard, to the great consternation and terror of some cottagers, as he, after a while, turned his course to make for the summit of the neighbouring high hills, exclaiming, "I bid thy spirit stay, Flora! I shall not die mad, Flora! I will overtake thee, Flora, at the Giant-Leap!" Alas! no one pursued, to save him.

Next day, foot-prints were traced in the snow that sprinkled the high grounds to which he had been seen to hurry, of one, as if in full chase, to the very brink of the promontory, that is ominously designated the Giant-Leap, and which overhangs the ocean's surge when the tide is full. But Walter Torrance was never more seen; for doubtless he had gone over the dizzying steep, and been pitched on the jagged sea-lashed rocks below, where the angry rolling waters would, in their reflux, sweep him down to their abysses.

LETTERS TO THE WORKING CLASSES. No. 3.

FELLOW-COUNTRYMEN,—You must not suffer yourselves to be deceived by the optimist journals relative to the real position of the country. Never, since England was a nation, has the aspect of its affairs been so gloomy. The Bank is tottering, and is only supported by the forbearance of the fund-holders; but this forbearance will not last for ever. A sudden panic would destroy the "Old lady of Threadneedle-street," as Cobbett denominated the monopolizing establishment, and the most fearful consequences would ensue. The working classes generally are in great distress; and the poorer orders are in the most appalling state of destitution. People are literally dying of starvation; and fathers of families are committing suicide in order to avoid the dread contemplation of their children's misery. The prices of food are increasing in amount, and the wages for labour are proportionately diminishing. War appears to be imminent; and there seems no chance of the hardships of the approaching winter being relieved or softened down by a reduction in the price of bread. Poverty will assume all its most hideous shapes during the following six months; and, so far from there being the slightest hope of any alteration in the accursed poor-law bill, when Parliament meets, several changes for the worse may be anticipated.

This, fellow-countrymen, is a pleasing prospect; but the picture is by no means exaggerated. While the Queen, her consort, and all the stipendary dependants of the court or cabinet, are receiving enormous incomes, the poor are left to die of the lingering horrors of starvation, or to submit to the infernal regulations of a Union Workhouse. How disproportionate is the lot of individuals in this vitiated condition of society! But will the working-classes calmly and tamely submit to a duration of such abuses? Will not a sense of their country's wrongs excite them to adopt all proper and eligible methods to obtain a radical reform from the throne to the workhouse?

Yes—fellow-countrymen, you must now determine upon agitating in favour of your rights and privileges. But you must not assemble in public-houses, where drunken revelries supersede the calm deliberation which the urgency of your condition requires; nor must you allow your intellectual capacities to be undermined by the insinuating influence of strong drinks. You have long been enslaved by the evil custom of intemperance; and that moral condition of vassalage has enabled you to contemplate your political vassalage with a calmness approaching to the most culpable indifference. All your debates, your meetings, and your agitation, in favour of political reformation, have been rendered abortive by the habit of drinking with which they were associated. When the Reform-Bill passed, you celebrated the event with public dinners all over the kingdom; and the deep libations that were poured forth to toast the extension of your liberties, testified at the same time how little able you were to appreciate them. Not only upon that occasion, but on all others, where political matters have been the subject of meeting and debate, has it been thought necessary to associate an important business with a degrading custom. Thus have you invariably failed to act with due decision, and to deliberate with proper calmness; and the government laughs at your political meetings, because those in power know full well that the assembly will disperse, and its members will proceed to the public-houses where they will bury in the oblivion of their cups all their patriotic determinations to obtain justice, liberty, and reform.

There is another reason wherefore the drinking customs of the country are calculated, in their associations, to unfit you for devoting impartial and deliberate attention to your true condition. I allude to the habit of singing bacchanalian songs at the places where your orgies are carried on. Those bacchanalian songs invariably teem with expressions of a most ridiculous loyalty towards the sovereign; they inculcate a blind obedience to Bacchus and to your rulers; and their authors, by cleverly intermingling ideas of worshipping the "jolly god," with those of fighting all the enemies of the King, &c., fill you with a false heroism in favour of the very tyrants who trample upon you. Nearly all drinking-songs contain a great deal of nonsense about "good old times," "a health to the King," and "the pillars of the throne;" and, thus, while you imbibe the delusive liquor which impairs your intellect, that attenuated imagination is prepared to receive the equally delusive sentiments of loyalty conveyed in the songs alluded to. Under the influence of the liquor and the song, the poor working-man issues from the public-house, "pot-valiant" in every sense of the word, and ready to die for the monarch whom he supposes to have provided him with "such excellent liquor!"

You have long been taught to look upon the denizens of other nations as barbarians in comparison with yourselves. Believe me, you are wrong. In your notions of political liberty you are a hundred years behind those whom you consider barbarians. The Portuguese are thirsting for republican government, and will very soon compel their queen to abdicate. The Spaniards have already laid the foundation for republican institutions, and have got rid of royalty. The French only wait for a favourable opportunity to overturn the throne of the Citizen King, and establish a purely republican system of government in the place of monarchy. In Belgium, notwithstanding the tranquil and pacific dispositions of the inhabitants; there is a strong ferment and a decided tendency towards republican institutions. Italy is panting for the arrival of the moment when she shall be enabled to throw off the yoke of a number of petty tyrants, and establish one general parent republican government. The ab-dication of the King of Holland has struck a fatal blow to monarchy in that kingdom; and the Dutch would not hesitate to imitate the general example. In Hanover, and many other parts of Germany, the people are wearied of their crowned despots, and would instantly follow any popular movement, the impulse of which might originate from France. Sweden and Norway will become a republic at the death of the present King; for the democratic spirit is strong in those countries, although its voice be not now loud, nor its manifestations violent. Greece seems to have caught a spark of that noble patriotism which formerly characterized it, and to be meditating an immediate escape from the tyranny of Otho. The spirit of liberty has even transferred itself amongst the Ottoman States: Moldavia, Wallachia, and Bosnia would all become independent republics, were not the vicinity of Russia, and the example of Poland, constantly before them; their inhabitants however partake of the generally pervasive feeling in favour of democracy. Then, when the knell of Ottoman grandeur shall have rung, all those mighty pachalicks of Anatolia, Diarbekir, Karamania, and Irak Arabi, will be transformed into separate states (as they were after the ruin of the Seljuk empire, and before they were collected under the government of the Sultans of the Turks) on principles which will savour more or less of liberty.

Fellow-countrymen, these are powerful facts; and no one can controvert them. They prove that the majority of Europe is in favour of republican institutions; and surely we must abide by the decision of a majority? You therefore see that the very nations, whom you are taught to consider barbarians, or something like barbarians, are possessed of more enlightened ideas of liberty than yourselves. And why? Because intemperance has not been so generally and decidedly the bane of those nations, as it has of yours. We know that all the nations of the civilized world consume large quantities of intoxicating liquor; but no nation consumes near so much, in proportion, as England. There is not so much habitual and inveterate intemperance in any country in Europe as there is in England: Hence are the intellects of foreigners far less impaired, and their morals far less debased by the evil habit of drinking, than those of the English. Look at the French, for example. They are a temperate nation, and they stand at the head of all others in respect to their ideas of political freedom. Twice, within half a century, have they risen in a mass against their tyrants; and they are now nearly prepared to rise again,—and this time, their exertions will be definitive! The French, I repeat, are a temperate nation: and, therefore, a reading and a thinking nation. The lowest and meanest artisan in France reads the daily papers, and converses upon the politics of the age with precision and judgment. The provincial press of France is immense; and the circulation of upwards of five-and-twenty daily political papers, published in Paris, is almost incredible. The daily sale of the Siccle is thirty thousand; the average circulation of the best papers varies from six to fifteen thousand a day; and the circulation of the English daily papers (the Times excepted) would not be deemed a large one in France.

Thus you see that foreigners are far before you in their appreciation of political rights and privileges, and that they pass their leisure time in reading and self-instruction, in preference to wasting it in the public-houses. Throw aside the influence of the evil habit of intemperance, my friends, and you will soon understand the way in which your condition is to be ameliorated. You will learn to act according to your own judgment, and not invariably follow the opinions of your rulers. Your very elections of representatives (who do not, with few exceptions, represent you when elected) prove the extent to which you are the slaves of liquor. Do you not, on those occasions, sell your suffrage for strong drink? Oh! my fellow-countrymen, turn away from these evil habits, and you will bless the day that you signed the pledge of Teetotalism. Do not, in your pride, scorn to imitate other nations in the great example which they set you in agitating in favour of their true rights; but place yourselves even in advance of them, by at once resigning entirely the pernicious use of intoxicating liquors.

GRACCHUS.

VARIETIES.

FRUITS, FLOWERS, &c.—Italy was supplied with the fig from Syria, the citron from Medea, the peach and nectarine from Persia, the pomegranate from Epirus, the apple, pear, and plum from America, and the cherry from Pontus. Roses came to us from Persia, and were transported into Persia from India; they abound in the countries round the Caspian. The potato was indigenous to Chili. The Saracens introduced the sugar-cane into the islands of the Mediterranean.

VISION.—Neither our eye-balls nor their optic nerves look out of themselves, nor does the mind see abroad. The eyes are but telescopic instruments which cause the sense-exciting pressure on the retina to promote in the mind the idea of form according to the shape of the body to which the eyes are presented. By means of the eyes our mind knows nothing but colour, which, from being a sensation, informs us that bodies are not coloured; and as we do not see uncoloured bodies, it is manifest externals are not objects of vision, sight, or perception, but are wholly invisible. Vision is not promoted by rays of lights, although the refraction of such by and within the eyes is said to make the eyes see outward things. Refraction by the eyes would make nothing on the retina but a circular solar spectrum; and an image of an external body on the retina, for information to the mind, would still be perceiving the image only leaving the external body invisible. Vision promoted by a quiescent medium, which of necessity must connect the retina with the remotest star of which we have sense-excited knowledge, for the retina to be affected immediately by the star; hence the visually sense-existing cause can be no other than the medium of space, the changes of pressure by which on the retina promote the different sensations, named colours, each of which we erroneously imagine is the colour of this or that outward body looked at and seen by our eyes. The visual medium or medium of space is the sense-exciting cause generally: it is continuous from without through the nerves of each of the senses to the brain, and constitutes what has hitherto been termed the nervous fluid: the senses being different in themselves, there is no reason for that which puts them into action being other than of the same kind. Light is but a sensation, there is no material light in nature.

AUTHORS AND BREWERS.—In answer to the question why brewers succeed so much better than authors, it was answered that brewers cater for the stomach and authors for the head; and that stomachs are to heads in the proportion of twenty to one!

AMERICAN SIMILES.—The Rev. Henry Colman, in a late sermon, in America, said, "the best bank ever yet known, is a bank of earth; it never refuses discount to honest labour, and the best share is the plough-share, on which dividends are always liberal!"

THE THREE PLANTS.—Three plants at this moment connect three different quarters of the world, which for ages would have known but little of each other without them. China is connected with England by scarcely any other link than her tea; for three hundred years tobacco was the sole link between England and the western world; and Arabia is, to this hour, scarcely bound to us but by her coffee. Such are the slender, but powerful sources of national connexion! The discovery of coffee was not made until the latter part of the thirteenth century; and, like many another great discovery, it was the result of chance, adopted by necessity. An Arab, the Sheikh Omar, fell under a persecution, in his own country; he and his disciples fled to a mountain in the province of Yemen, where, in the desert, all the usual food failed him. A coffee-berry there grew wild; and the distressed refugee, as it was too hard for him to masticate, tried its effect in boiling. He drank the liquor, found himself revived, and made it immortal.

REVIEWS.

Robert Macaire. A Novel in Three Volumes. By GEORGE W. M. REYNOLDS. Author of "Pickwick Abroad," &c. Illustrated with Eighteen Steel-Engravings by PHIZ. London: Thomas Tegg. Who has not heard of the redoubtable Robert Macaire—the hero of a hundred and one French caricatures? and who has not seen him and his friend Bertrand figuring upon the boards of the theatre? Robert Macaire is an imaginary character, invented by the French as the representative of every species of swindler, rogue, and villain, who plunder the credulous public under the guise of speculators, concoctors of bubble-companies, &c. &c. And upon this basis has Mr. Reynolds founded a novel, which is entirely original save in respect to the conception of the characters of Macaire and Bertrand. These individuals arrive in London, and obtain admission, under false names and appearances, into the house of a merchant of Old Broad Street. Macaire seduces this gentleman's niece, and plunders the unsuspecting uncle. The bye-plot, which involves the destinies of a young man of the name of Charles Stanmore, and a beautiful French girl called Blanche de Longueville, becomes intimately blended with the fortunes of Macaire, in the progressive development of the tale. In Paris, Macaire visits a club of thieves and swindlers, who are regularly organised into a well-appointed fraternity; and there the reader is introduced to Fieschi, Nion Lassave his mistress, and Alibaud. The moving panorama of this novel displays marvellous escapes from prison, midnight assassination, and scenes of deep interest. The trial of Macaire in Paris would seem to have been founded upon that of Madame Laffarge at Tulle, had not these volumes been printed long previous to this late event. The cause of the delay in their appearance has been brought about by the circumstance of the work being illustrated with eighteen spirited steel-engravings by Phiz.

We shall select a few extracts to serve as specimens of the style of the work. Our first shall be a description of London, seen at night, from Waterloo Bridge:—

"Bertrand stepped upon the bench, and leant over the parapet to gaze upon the vast city, which spread its almost endless wings on either side of the river, like an eagle crouching on the ground, and the mighty dome of St. Paul's might almost seem the erected head of the noble bird, proudly lifting itself towards the sky. The ceaseless hum of the large city, which has known no moment of rest for a thousand years, fell upon the ear of him who stood in the centre of the mighty arm which man has cast across the placid stream to connect the portions of the great metropolis of England. That busy hum reminded Bertrand of the unceasing activity which fills every corner of this mighty city, and which is not altogether suspended during the hours of night. As the gushing currents of human blood flow through every vein and pore of the compact frame, so does the stream of multitudes circulate amidst the vast avenues and channels afforded by the streets and thoroughfares of London; and even there the similitude does not end; for as the human frame becomes disorganized, and the passage of the vital fluid is suddenly chilled in the veins, so will the day come when this mighty assemblage of edifices shall be destroyed, and the progress of its living ocean of people be arrested for ever. The din of the multitudes that move through the streets of London, mingles its morals with the low murmurs of the river; and the ever-flowing springs of human existence are checked, though never for a moment overcome, by the scarcely more mysterious and irresistible action of the natural and far more ancient tide."

By way of contrast, we will now lay before the reader a sketch of one of the worst districts of Paris, seen at the same time of night as the above:—

"In a short time he struck into that assemblage of narrow and dark streets which form the interval between the vicinity of the Pantheon and the river. Few people are in those streets at night: they are chiefly occupied by the poor, who are glad to retire early to their beds, in order that they may rise early in the morning. But every now and then a light was seen dancing about in the middle of the streets, generally moving, like a Will-o'-the-wisp, near the ground, occasionally remaining stationary for some moments—then proceeding onwards—taking an uneven and zigzag motion about—and then stopping for a short interval again. Those lights were shed by the flickering lamps of the chiffonniers, or rag-pickers, who pursue their avocations chiefly at those hours when their fellow-men are wrapt up in slumber. As a passenger in the street proceeds along, these wretches crouch into corners, or hide themselves in gate-ways; and then they resume their employment of raking amidst the filth and ordures of the neighbourhood when they fancy themselves unobserved once more. From time to time the individual, who traverses the streets of Paris by night, will also meet—besides the chiffonnier—a person dressed in dark clothes, who seems to walk about without an object, who addresses himself to none, is spoken to by none, and yet who is dreaded by those who are acquainted with his avocation. This individual is a woucheur, or spy belonging to the police: and he and the chiffonnier are the only faithful observers of their nocturnal rounds throughout a certain number of the streets of Paris. For the rest, that part of the city which we left Macaire in the act of traversing, is silent and tranquil—badly lighted—and dirty, and; like the Marais, which we have before described, and which occupies the corresponding part of Paris on the northern side of the water, quite at variance with those gay quarters which make the metropolis of France the sumptuous and pleasurable city all who have visited it must acknowledge it to be."

"What a busy scene is the Haymarket at ten o'clock at night! Young fashionables, who have just finished their dinners at the Café de l'Europe, at the Colonnade Hotel, or at Dubourg's—and others, who have had no dinners either to begin or to finish—lounge up or down the street, some smoking cigars, and others their companions. Numbers of unfortunate women, plying their miserable trade, obstruct the thoroughfares, and accost those of the male sex who appear likely to attend to their lures or intercessions. Every now and then a cab or a hackney-coach moves out of the long line which stands in the middle of the street; and 'Please remember the waterman,' echoes more and more frequently as each quarter of an hour glides away at this portion of the evening. A bright gas-light illuminates the shell-fish at the shop on the right-hand side of the street, turning from Piccadilly; and the green and red waters in the chemist's pharmacy on the opposite side of the way, give a hideous aspect to the countenances of those who pass by. Young gentlemen in rough coats, and with large sticks in their hands, lounge along the Haymarket latest upon what they are pleased to term 'a lark;' and the parlour of the Waterford Arms is crowded with individuals of a similar stamp, who either amuse themselves by giving poor starving wretches a quantity of gin to kill them, or by getting up a fight between any two persons who up to that moment have probably been the best friends in the world. The amusements of English young gentlemen of fashion are as varied as they are peculiar. Breaking lamps, wrenching off knockers, fighting with the police, and making the tour of the gambling houses, are the principal elements of those diversions; and if any individual of the fashionable party refuse to mingle in such sport, he is immediately (to use the language of the aspicnt Dogberry) 'written down an ass.'

Woman's love forms the subject of much panegyric in every novel. We quote a paragraph upon that subject, and with it we close our review:—

"The love of woman is eternal: it cannot be destroyed like fragile glass; its image may not be effaced from the memory like a passing dream. Her love is the soul itself; it enjoys an invisible existence; it cures itself with its own calm; it fortifies itself by its own energies; it does not recommence—for it never ceases. At one period it is ardent and passionate—at another, languishing and docile; now heated and feverish—then calm and reflective; now jealous and unjust—then forgiving and blind to a fault; now like the bursting volcano—then smooth as the placid lake; at one moment selfish and cruel—at another, generous and kind. The principles of true love belong not to time, but to eternity: they possess a faculty of regeneration, and an impossibility of total decay—youthfulness of passion blooming simultaneously with all the most beautiful flowers, like the rose-trees of Pæstum which blossom twice in one year.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

CORNWALL.

WE gladly avail ourselves of the Cornwall Teetotal Journal, to lay the following information before our readers:—

"ST. MINVER.—We are happy to say that the sun of Temperance has arisen in glorious splendour upon this place. The prospect of a good teetotal harvest is before us, and our members are unanimously agreed to use every endeavour to banish the demon intemperance from the land.

"PADSTOW.—Teetotalism works well here; amidst the opposition of the professor of Christianity, the moralist, and the profligate, we are making unusual strides. We at present number above 700 staunch Teetotalers, near one half of the town. A great change is seen here, many of our once strongest opponents are not only led to admire our system but to practice it.

"REBAUTH.—Though we have not been able to vie with our neighbours in the cause of Teetotalism, we are happy to be enabled to state that we are making progress, and that we have a cheering prospect of a brighter day being about to dawn upon us. The chief cause that has hitherto kept us comparatively in the back ground, is a want of public speakers.

"ST. COLUMB.—The cause of Teetotalism is going on conquering and to conquer in this town and neighbourhood. We have lately had a considerable increase to our numbers, amongst whom are two itinerant ministers belonging to this circuit.

"PENANCE.—The cause of Teetotalism still wears a good aspect here, and those who once esteemed the principles of the society merely as ideal, are looking at the matter in a very changed light, and consider it as one entitled to their sanction and support."

DOWNPATRICK.

IN spite of the opposition of some of the Conservative journals of Ireland, the cause of Teetotalism is making rapid progress, under the auspices of FATHER MATHEW and the other noble supporters of the new doctrine. From the Downpatrick Recorder, of Oct. 24th, we gladly extract the following paragraph:—

"On Monday evening the Downpatrick Teetotalers held a Solree at their rooms, in Bridge-street, for the purpose of promoting the Temperance cause. Upwards of two hundred sat down to tea. Of the clergy, there were present, the REV. JAMES FORDE and the REV. FREDERICK MCCULLAGH; and apologies were received from REV. WM. WHITE, REV. JOHN REID, REV. ROBERT GAULT, (Killyleagh) REV. MR. MORROW, and REV. MR. FOOT, all of whom would have attended, to give the cause their countenance and support, but for other previous engagements. As is usual in social meetings, thus rationally conducted, harmony, cheerfulness, pleasure and enthusiasm universally prevailed, in the absence of any intoxicating beverage. A number of teetotalers from Crossgar and Ardglass—the latter of whom were provided with their band—were in attendance. After tea was over, and a good many strangers were admitted, considerable difficulty presented itself, in making arrangements for the convenience of the assembly during the delivery of the speeches. Frequent bursts of applause interrupted and followed the addresses. At the conclusion of the proceedings, MR. PILSON having vacated the chair, and DR. KILLIN having been called thereto, the thanks of the meeting were returned to the Chairman, for his very proper conduct in the chair, and also for his warm encouragement and patronage of the good cause of teetotalism. The assembly broke up about one o'clock, and even at that late hour were slow to depart, so delighted and captivated were they with the whole animated proceedings."

LAUNCESTON.

AN anti-teetotal lecture was delivered a short time since, at the Launceston Temperance Institution, by the REV. G. B. GIBBONS. The lecturer descended upon the success which had attended the operations of the Society, and complained that such an immense fraternity of persons might assume a political aspect which would be dangerous to the state. He then attempted to prove that the wines of the ancients, and that transmuted by the SAVIOUR at Cana, were all alcoholic; but, in respect to the latter, he manifested an ignorance which would have been dissipated by a previous perusal of GRINDROD'S "Bacchus," PARSON'S "Anti-Bacchus," or BEARDSALL'S "Wine Question." The lecturer then observed that he had heard that many Teetotalers had become Socialists; but the worthy and reverend gentleman argued worse than an idiot, to maintain that a doctrine of total abstinence could convert a man to Socialism. Such a system of reasoning is both wicked and absurd. He was however refuted by the chairman, MR. W. PEARSE, and by MESSRS C. PEARSE, LOCK, and GILL; and the reverend gentleman looked particularly crest-fallen at the facile defeat which he experienced.

TOWN NEWS.

THE PHILOSOPHICAL INSTITUTION.

MR. BEAUMONT, the well known philanthropist, has lately erected a spacious hall, bearing the above denomination, in Beaumont-square, Mile-end Road. The edifice is a magnificent one; and the enormous sum of twelve thousand pounds was laid out in building and endowing the Institution. The endowment fund produces four hundred per annum; and thus is a private gentleman setting one of the noblest examples of philanthropy to the wealthy portion of society. The hall of this new edifice is to be opened as a literary institution for those who may wish to avail themselves of the advantages its ample supply of periodicals and books will offer; and the moderate sum of six shillings quarterly, or a guinea per annum, will ensure admission to respectable persons. No individual of intemperate habits will be allowed to subscribe to this Institution, the founder's motive being to encourage sobriety, and its consequent intellectual pursuits, amongst the working classes. We hear that on Tuesday evenings the Institution will be opened for concerts. On Thursday evening, the 29th instant, the Hall was opened by a Teetotal meeting, EARL STANHOPE presiding on the occasion. This nobleman, and several advocates of the doctrine of total abstinence, delivered highly edifying discourses to a crowded audience.

The Hall is beautifully fitted up; and the arrangements have been evidently conducted on a plan of extreme liberality. The organ is a fine one; and its gallery forms a convenient place from which to address a meeting. On the whole, the greatest credit and praise are due to MR. BEAUMONT for his generous conduct in thus catering for the happiness and welfare of the inhabitants of the district of Beaumont-square. Nor must the laudable interest experienced by his sons in this good work, pass without notice.

THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Head Quarters.

THE usual meeting on Wednesday evening, Oct. 28th, at the Aldersgate-street Chapel, was well attended, in spite of the rainy weather. MR. H. W. WESTON took the chair; and the audience was addressed by this gentleman, and by MESSRS. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, BENSTEAD, BAYLIS, CRUMP, and CUDNERY.

Chelsea Auxiliary.

ON Tuesday evening, Oct. 27th, a grand tea-meeting of this powerful and thriving Auxiliary, took place at the new Assembly-room, opened by the members for the first time on this occasion. The tea-meeting was well and most respectfully attended; and, after the repast, the public were admitted for the purpose of listening to the doctrines of Teetotalism from the mouths of some of the most talented advocates of the parent association and this auxiliary.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

LORD CARDIGAN.—The dispute between this illiberal and unprincipled aristocrat and his fellow-officers, originated at the mess-table, relative to a black bottle. The evils of the drinking customs of the country are thus manifested in remote and indirect ways, as well as in immediate and direct ones. This LORD CARDIGAN is a disgrace to the army and to civilised life. He seduced and ran away with the wife of MAJOR JOHNSON of the 67th regiment, and upon that occasion displayed the white feather. We are however pleased to observe that he has been reprovved most severely by the Adjutant-General; and so cutting was this authority's observation, that the unprincipled Earl burst into tears amidst the officers who were assembled to witness his disgrace. This statement, which has not appeared in any journal, we have received from a source, the authenticity of which we cannot doubt. The conduct of LORD HILL, throughout the whole business, has been of the most infamous description; and the sentence upon CAPTAIN REYNOLDS, who is cashiered, reflects an indelible stigma upon every member of the court-martial. And now, by virtue of the unjust laws of the realm—those laws which provide one system for the rich and another for the poor—this same nobleman is not to be tried, for a felonious offence, at the central criminal court, where the humble artisan, or gentleman would be arraigned, but is to be judged by his peers, a body of men who are all interested in maintaining the monstrous privileges of their order. How long will the people of England submit to these despotic enactments? A poor man who owes a few shillings, may linger for a year in a debtor's gaol; but any one who happens to be born a peer, may owe thousands with perfect safety in reference to his person. The line of demarcation between the plebeian and patrician classes should be immediately removed; and something like equality in the laws might then be anticipated.

CURIOUS CASE OF SUDDEN DEATH.—A very protracted enquiry took place on Thursday night, October 22nd, at the Exeter Arms, Burleigh Street, Strand, concerning the death of a young woman, named Fanny Ederson, aged 16. Having felt ill on the Tuesday morning, it appears, her master caused a glass of hot gin and water to be administered to her. She shortly after complained of severe thirst, and soon expired. Doubtless the gin and water was the direct cause of this poor girl's death. The gin was most probably very bad, and shamefully adulterated by the murderous publican who had sold it; and a fatal effect was produced upon a stomach already out of order. Numbers of sudden deaths, which are constantly happening, and for which the sapient juries find a cause in the "visitation of God," may be traced to the unprincipled adulteration of spirits, malt liquors, &c. Sometimes the effect of such adulteration may, with certain individuals, be immediate; at all events, it is perpetually operating slowly, and imperceptibly, but very surely.

AVERAGE LIFE OF MAN.—If we allow seventy years for the usual age of man, and sixty pulsations in a minute for the common measure of pulses of a temperate person, the number of pulsations in his whole life, would amount to 2,207,520,000. If, by intemperance, he force his blood into a more rapid motion, so as to give seventy-five pulses in a minute, the same number of pulses would be complete in fifty-six years. His life would by this means be reduced fourteen years!—Grindrod's "Bacchus."

MURDER OF A WOMAN IN SAINT GILES'S.—Mary Nichols, a woman aged 26, of No. 2, Hampshire-hogyard, Saint Giles's, was murdered on Sunday, Oct. 18th, by James Littleton, alias Shamus. The prisoner had been drinking freely, before he went home; and, under the influence of the liquor, he perpetrated the terrible deed for which his life will be probably forfeited.

A CLERGYMAN OF THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.—A clerical man of the name of Urquhart, who is the incumbent of Chapel town church-yard, lately ordered a grave to be opened, and a stone to be taken up from over the coffin, on which it had been placed, because the relatives of the deceased had not paid him his fee of one guinea! This man belongs to the fraternity, who (with a few honourable exceptions) are so decidedly hostile to the great doctrines of total abstinence.

A TALE.—BY THE EDITOR.

PERIOD II.—CHAPTER IX.

THE EXCURSION.

IN hours of prosperity and happiness, the mind of woman is strangely versatile; and her disposition is frequently characterised by the most unaccountable caprices. All her actions appear to be rather the effects of sudden impulses or whims, for the origin of which she herself cannot account; and, by a peculiar species of idiosyncrasy, she not unfrequently imagines sources of annoyance and vexation. In such moments as those, she inflicts upon him she loves all those little nameless torments—those indescribable instances of a difficulty in being pleased, which, petty though they be, manifest the incessant activity, restlessness, and jealousy of the female bosom. But, in the hour of misfortune—when the gloomy frowns of an unsympathizing world look darkly upon man,—and when his once sedulous and faithful friends have departed from his vicinity, as the fickle butterflies flock from flower to flower, courting the fresh blooming rose, and leaving the faded one in its chilling solitude,—oh! in such hours as those, does the mind of woman expand, from the circumscribed range of frivolity and fickleness, into the elaborate scope of noble sentiments, generous feelings, and magnanimous views!

Animated by the courage which was imparted to her soul by the conviction that many important duties now devolved upon herself, Louise returned from the lock-up house to the cottage, as before mentioned, and prepared to dispose of all the little property which remained to herself and husband. She agreed with a broker for the price of the goods, and slept, with her innocent boy, in the bed which she was to sell on the morrow. She quenched the tears that a sense of her afflictions wrung from her eyes,—she pressed her child in her arms,—and she felt that she had that dear boy and his father still to bind her to life. Though wealth and prosperity had fled, the ties of love still remained to attach her to existence; and although the heart of that poor young woman had been deeply seared by the hot iron of misfortune, the attachment she felt for her husband and child was a balm to that wound. There was however one idea on which she could never dwell, save in the utmost bitterness of her spirit,—and that was the dread death of her only daughter in the burning ruin of the mansion which had witnessed the several phases of their prosperity, their decline, and their fall!

She rose early on the following morning, and packed up the few things which she intended to reserve from the almost general sale of her effects, and amongst the articles thus retained were the jewels which had belonged to her mother. The unfortunate wife had maintained an unnatural composure until the moment when these things met her eyes; and then nature asserted her empire over the magnanimity of resolution, and she burst into an agonising excess of grief,—the torrents of her tears however relieved her; and she even welcomed the arrival of the broker with a smile.

The goods were conveyed to the cart which the broker had procured to carry them away, and he had just counted the purchase-money into the hands of Louise, when a post-chaise drove up to the door, and Mr. Tibbatts alighted from the vehicle. Louise almost hailed this man's visit as a good omen—for she thought that he had probably sought her for the purpose of proposing some terms in reference to her husband—and she accordingly hastened to receive him with more courtesy than he had ever experienced at her hands.

"Well, my dear Madam," said he, with an air of jaunty impudence, as he seated himself upon one of the trunks in the front parlour which was denuded of all other furniture,— "so your husband is in the Fleet after all!"

"Alas!" ejaculated Louise mournfully, "he had no other resource!"

"But he had a friend, Madam!" cried Tibbatts,— "he had a friend, who would have stuck to him like Damon to Pythias,—or, in other words, like bricks and mortar!"

"A friend!" said Louise enquiringly.

"Yes—a friend in me, Titus Tibbatts, Esquire," was the answer.

"Oh! sir—again I conjure you, release my husband from his horrible prison, and I will owe you a debt of eternal gratitude!" said Louise, appealing in the most heart-rending manner to the cause of all Melville's miseries.

"That's exactly what I wish to do," uttered Tibbatts, playing with his watch-chain, and surveying his well-clad exterior with an air of peculiar satisfaction; "but, as the mountain wouldn't go to Mahomet, Mahomet was compelled to go to the mountain."

Louise made no reply, and Tibbatts saw that she had not comprehended his meaning.

"Well," in other words," he continued, "the creditor won't come to you—that is very certain; and so you must go to the creditor."

"But I thought that you were the arbiter of my husband's captivity or freedom?" said Louise, timidly.

"No, lovely lady," answered Tibbatts, eyeing Louise with a libertine glance which caused her to hang down her head and blush deeply; "I passed away the bill to a third party, and this third party is your husband's detaining creditor. He is not a very hard man to deal with; and when he sees that you take some trouble in the business—"

"Oh! now you have encouraged a hope in my mind, which it will be cruel to disappoint!" exclaimed Louise, a ray of joy animating her countenance and enhancing the natural effect of her dazzling beauty. "Tell me where I can find the individual who has the power of restoring my husband to liberty, and I will hasten to him without a moment's delay!"

"Why—as for the delay," said Tibbatts, "it certainly would be as well to lose no time;—but, the man lives some way off;—and—"

"Were he hundreds of miles distant," interrupted Louise, "I would seek him, even if I were compelled to walk bare-foot upon a road of sharp flints!"

"All that is certainly very beautiful—and highly pathetic, sentimental, and so forth," cried Mr. Tibbatts; "but I think that a devilish good post-chaise, and two slap-up horses would be much better than the mode of travelling that you allude to."

"Every guinea is an object at such a period," said Louise, rising to commence her journey.

"Well—I shan't ask you for your share of the chaise-hire," returned Tibbatts, affecting an air of indifference; "and—as the creditor can't assent to an arrangement without me—I think it would be as well if I went with you."

"Oh! that indeed would confer an additional favour upon me!" ejaculated Louise, animated only by the all-absorbing idea of obtaining the speedy release of her husband.

"Let us set off, then—without loss of time," said Tibbatts, now manifesting an impatience to be gone. "You can leave these traps here behind you—and the child will sit very quietly upon that trunk till we come back, if we only give him a cake."

"Oh! no," cried Louise, "I shall take little Victor with me. He could not bear to be separated from me."

"Well—well, just as you like!" said Tibbatts pettishly; and he led the way to the post-chaise.

Louise locked the front door of the house, and hastened, with her little boy in her arms, into the vehicle, which immediately drove off at a rapid rate.

For some time both Louise and her companion maintained a profound silence; but, at length, the young lady awoke from a deep reverie, and enquired whether they were near the place of their destination, as they were proceeding with speed farther into the country, and leaving the metropolis far away behind them.

"Oh! we shall soon be there now," said Tibbatts, with a species of triumph in his tone, as he cast a peculiar glance upon Louise, who again quailed beneath it. She did not, however, anticipate any treachery on the part of her companion; and her whole thoughts were engrossed by the hope of returning to London with an order for Victor's discharge in her possession.

While she was pondering upon the joy with which he would hail the glad tidings, the vehicle, which had some time previously turned into a bye-path, suddenly stopped at the door of an old house, which stood in a most solitary and lonely part. No other human habitation was near; and the miserable appearance of the dwelling created some surprise in the mind of the young lady, that a creditor for a large sum of money should reside in such a hovel. For a moment, a strange misgiving seized upon her mind; and she turned to cast an imploring and enquiring look upon her companion. The expression of his countenance was, however, calm and unruffled; and, blushing for the suspicion which she had permitted herself to entertain, she once more resigned her soul to all the joyousness of the most sanguine hope.

Mr. Tibbatts hastened to alight from the vehicle, as soon as an old woman, with a most forbidding aspect and cross look, made her appearance at the door of the miserable dwelling. He then assisted Louise to descend the steps of the chaise, and the old woman conducted her into a wretched room on the ground floor, while Tibbatts remained behind to give some directions to the postilion. In a few moments, the chaise drove off; and Tibbatts entered the room where Louise was seated.

The little boy surveyed the strange apartment for some time with a look of fear and alarm; and then suddenly burst into tears. This conduct on his part instantly raised the suspicions of his mother; and she now for the first time perceived the imprudence of the step she had taken. The old woman had retired from the room, and she was alone with Tibbatts, who had seated himself upon the window-sill, and was surveying her with an expression of countenance which only augmented her fears. Yielding to the sudden impulse of her alarm, she started from the chair on which she had been sitting, and exclaimed in a tremulous voice, "For heaven's sake, Mr. Tibbatts, where are we?"

"Where are we?" repeated that individual, somewhat at a loss for a reply;—"why—at a very pleasant retired spot, about eight miles from town—and where I hope to pass a few happy days."

"And Melville's creditor?" demanded Louise.

"Creditor, indeed!" cried Tibbatts, bursting out into a loud laugh: "I hope you don't think that, after I have given myself all this trouble to get your husband safely locked up in prison, I am now going to be the means of his release! Your husband is a wretch who is unworthy of your love,—a drunkard—a spendthrift—a man without principle——"

"Silence, sir!" cried Louise, with a dignity and emphasis, which for a moment astounded the villain; "dare not use this language in connexion with the name of my husband."

"My dear girl," began Tibbatts—

"Oh! now I comprehend all your villany—all your baseness!" cried Louise, a deadly pallor overspreading her countenance. "But your baseness shall not go unpunished. I demand my immediate release from this place!"

And she took her child in her arms, and was proceeding towards the door, when Mr. Tibbatts placed his back against it, saying, "Gently—gently, fair lady! Faint heart never won such a stubborn beauty as you; and Titus Tibbatts, Esquire, is not the man to take all this trouble for nothing!"

"Villain! you dare not detain me!" ejaculated Louise.

"No harsh words," cried Tibbatts; "you will cool in time!"

"I will scream—I will call for assistance—I will not suffer this outrage with impunity," persisted Louise, her heart almost sinking within her.

"You may scream—but I doubt whether even an echo will answer you," was the cool reply.

"Release me, villain!" cried Louise, struggling to obtain egress from the room.

"Nay—no nonsense," said Tibbatts; and, with the ease of a giant controlling the movements of a child, did he lead the unhappy young woman back to the chair, on which she sank almost insensibly.

"Do not cry, Mamma," said the little boy, looking anxiously up into his mother's face.

Louise pressed him in her arms, and gave vent to her grief in a flood of tears, while the violence of the sobs which agitated her bosom, bore sad testimony to the acuteness of her grief.

INTEMPERANCE AND ITS REMEDY.

UNREMITTED labour and unceasing vigilance, are the lowest price at which man, in this world, can obtain happiness and safety. The primeval curse, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread," includes within its scope not only the bodily, but the mental and moral powers of man. And reason and philosophy, not less than revelation, clearly demonstrate, that all nature, both within us and without us, is so formed and constituted as to enforce this destiny.

Not only does the uncultivated earth bring forth thorns and thistles rather than fruit, but its tempting fruits, unless discriminated, may poison us. And the air we breathe, the fire that warms us, and the innumerable other objects which are essential to our existence or enjoyment, must be, for the most part, laboriously sought, and must all be cautiously distinguished, appropriated, and used, if we would secure the benefits and escape the mischiefs, which in some form each has the power to occasion.

And if we seek for happiness in the exercise of the mental and moral powers, the same toil and dangers await us. The temple of science stands at the summit of an almost inaccessible mountain. "Truth lies at the bottom of a well." Moral rectitude is a critical medium, the two extremes from which are vices. And even the path to heaven, as we are instructed from the sacred desk, is narrow and difficult, with a broad road leading from it to perdition; so that earth and heaven are legibly inscribed by the finger of the Creator with the sublimary doom of man—toil and watchfulness.

And yet, such is the intrinsic constitution of human nature, that this apparently severe destiny is the efficient cause of its highest dignity and happiness. Perils and impediments in our path, prompt us to vigilant and energetic action. Our chief happiness consists in successful effort—in acquiring the desirable objects around us, not in their supine enjoyment—in eluding, or grappling with and overcoming danger, not in a quiet, lifeless exemption from it. And every human faculty put forth and exerted for these purposes, is expanded, invigorated, and improved by the exercise.

The inebriating fluid, destructive as it has proved, differs in only one or two particulars from a thousand other dangers which beset humanity, and which are easily and usually avoided or overcome. One particular is, that its first entrance into the human system communicates a plausible falsehood; for by its temporary stimulation it would persuade us, that our physical and mental strength and the flow of our social feelings are each improved by the draught; when in truth they are only anticipated, squandered, and finally depressed farther below, than they were at first elevated above, a healthy standard. This is one peculiarity, and that which opens and smooths the broad way to temperate drinking. Another is, that as the victim arrives at and passes the verge of intoxication, and reason and conscience are required to utter their monitory voice, both reason and conscience are deranged and prostrated by its influence; and the subject of intoxication alone, among all around him, is utterly ignorant of his condition and his danger. Thus the inebriating cup first seduces his reason, then steals away his heart and his brains, and finally destroys all that remains of him at its leisure. Were its inevitable effects but reversed in their order, the danger would be obviated. For if woe, and sorrow, and contentions, and babbling, and wounds without a cause, and redness of the eyes, and disgrace, and loathsomeness, and delirium tremens, were the immediate, as some or all of them are certain to be the ultimate, consequences of the habitual drinking of ardent spirit, man would sooner herd with tigers, or couch with the rattlesnake, or season his food with arsenic, than swallow this concentration of curses.

It is chiefly for the reasons which have been alluded to, that the vice of intemperance is no respecter of persons; and that throughout all past time the pious and the profane, the wise and the foolish, the valiant and the weak, individuals and nations, have alike been drawn into the vortex of this indiscriminating destruction.

The records of history afford proofs that the mixed wine and strong drink of the ancients, were quite sufficiently destructive. But in an evil hour in the dark ages, an Arabian alchemist, by the discovery of the art of distillation, fearfully aggravated the mischief. It was the art of rejecting everything useful, by separating everything pernicious, from the fermented juice of the grape and other vegetable substances, and presenting the result in the form of an unqualified poison. He was seeking for the philosopher's stone—the art of transmuting the baser metals into gold and discovered the more wonderful art of transmuting millions of men yet to be born, into brutes and wretches, with their own voluntary consent!

It would be interesting, and not unimportant, did space allow us, to trace the successful warfare which alcohol, aided by diseased appetite and misguided public opinion, has, since that period, waged against law, religion, and human happiness. But it is sufficient for our present purpose to review, for a moment, the fearful condition in which it has, through a long period of increasing intemperance, involved our country.

The evil has become one of appalling magnitude. Everything honourable, and lovely, and pure, and of good report, is threatened by the giant vice of national intemperance. The fire-tortured products of the vineyards and cane plantations of other lands, are sending their deadly exhalations condensed, into our devoted country, in a broad, swift, and increasing current. Here are ten thousand still-worms, condensing the pestilent vapours of the still-house, and oozing them out in ten thousand streams, to augment the tide of ruin which is fast deluging our land. Intemperance, not that merely which paralyzes the limbs and the utterance, but that earlier stage which subverts the heart and the conscience, has become, like gout or rheumatism, the chronic disorder of the body politic; in which there is scarcely a member or limb which does not suffer, either by direct disease or inevitable sympathy. The loathsome symptoms of the malady, are among the first objects that meet the eye of the passing stranger in the cities and villages of our country.

How often may be seen the young man of respectable connexions, outrage the solemn decency of the funeral ceremony, and insult the departed spirit of a pious parent, by staggering, and breathing the pestiferous breath of a drunkard around her.

The drunkard, in his most sober moments, will remorselessly convert his last day's earnings in the means of intoxication, with the full consciousness upon him, that he has, at his poverty-stricken home, a meek and suffering wife, who—

To friendless babes, and wept to give no more.'

We have seen a lovely young female, who had been reared in the arms of parental tenderness, her heart swelling with the delusive hopes of inexperience, led forward into connubial life, with prospects as bright and promising as the unclouded morning sun. Again we have marked the fitful melancholy, the fading cheek, and the anxious look, which told that agonizing suspicions as to him in whom centered all her hopes and affections, were busy at her heart; until the fatal truth burst upon her, as she found herself fettered to pollution, and clasped in the arms of living death, embodied in a drunken husband. And she struggled against cruel disappointment, and degradation, and anguish, until a kindly consumption gently led her from earthly suffering into a premature grave. And her encircling kindred and friends poured forth the copious tears of mitigated grief, as they beheld this innocent victim of another's guilt, released at length from the pangs of tortured affection, and consigned to that narrow resting-place, "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest."

We have seen the young man, born under the smiles of fortune and patronage, endowed with genius, and education, and moral sensibility, and lively self-respect, with the crowning virtue of piety superadded, rise up by our side, and brace himself for the career of emulation, with prospects the most enviable; and parted with him as he went away to lead to the altar a lovely bride; and heard that that union had been blessed with interesting children. Again we saw him, when he had been cast out of his domestic paradise, for partaking of the forbidden cup—fallen, sunk, degraded to the low level of the drunkard's abasement! And there he lay upon the earth, a blasted thing—the living sepulchre of a thousand hopes!

And shall we be required to keep terms with, and to speak in measured epithets and courteous phrases of this great parent cause, which has engendered all this desolation? All this, did we say! that wide-spread, incalculable ruin, of which these, and a thousand fold more, are but isolated specimens!

Such is the character and such the alarming prevalence of this vice, anterior to the temperance reformation. The law denounces penalties against drunkenness, but unsupported by public opinion it is a dead letter. The sacred desk raises its warning voice, but it is unheeded: for although the clergy preach much upon this subject, do they not also sometimes drink? The judge on the bench, as he is called to pronounce sentence on some wretched criminal, who, under the moral blindness or phrensy of intemperance, had imbrued his hands in the blood of his own wife, or his child, or his father, or his mother! seized the impressive occasion to warn the horror-struck audience of the danger and guilt of intoxication. And that audience, and even that judge, saw nothing in all this which should prevent them, as they returned home and rehearsed the dreadful story, from circulating the social glass, as formerly! The temperate drinker, perhaps with the odour of brandy upon his lips, went to expostulate with his next door neighbour, the intemperate man; and wondered that his admonitions against drinking, contradicted as it was by his own example, proved unavailing.

Patriotism and philanthropy long cried out, "Can nothing be done to arrest this tremendous evil?" and a thousand honest voices answered, "Nothing! The government licences the vending of the poison. Intemperance is a vice which has cleaved to humanity throughout all time. And what can you do against the innumerable array of importers, manufacturers, and traffickers, in ardent spirit, who are leagued together by interest to perpetuate the evil?"

But a remedy now is discovered, by the wisdom and benevolence of individuals, so simple that a child may comprehend, teach, and practise its principles; and yet so efficient and wonderful in its results. It was directed to the prevention of the great first cause of drunkenness, temperate drinking. It was founded upon the manifest fact, that if none drank temperately, none would become drunkards. It was comprised in the simple, social resolution, "I will wholly avoid strong drink, and exert my influence to induce all others to do so too." And the written pledge to total abstinence, and the voluntary associations to concentrate and give effect to public opinion, and the whole mass of means, which, for the last few years, have wrought such miracles for the cause of temperance throughout the world, have been merely adapted to carry out this simple principle. Such is the Teetotal reformation; unpretending in its inception; now expanding into universal action, and bursting the rivets of venerable vice, to deliver mankind from this fatal bondage.

And where, among the multiplied discoveries of this or of any age, is there one which has wrought and which promises such benefits to the human family? Where has the church-militant discovered an instrumentality capable of removing such judicial blindness as that of the drunkard? Where, in the administration of the criminal law, has there been found a corrective for so much crime and misery? Where, in the science of medicine, has there been discovered so perfect a remedy for a disease so extensive, loathsome, and deadly? And where has the political economist devised a means of preserving so much of the wealth of nations from an appropriation so much worse than utter waste?

THE FATHER.

AN EPISODE IN THE LIFE OF A NOBLEMAN.

It was about twenty years ago, ere I succeeded to my present title, that I was returning one evening to my father's house from that of a friend with whom I had been dining. Oh! the fatal evening! I remember it but too well! 'twas in the winter time—thick clouds enveloped the planets of the night, while their sombre hue threatened the earth with deluging rain. A low wind scarcely disturbed them in the boundless regions of space; but fruitlessly the moon essayed to pierce their density and cast her rays upon the world. Yet the lamps were bright in Bond-street, and I hardly regretted not having ordered a carriage to call for me; but I walked hastily onward, till something glittering on the pavement attracted my attention. I stooped and picked it up; 'twas a beautiful ring, with a black stone, and on that stone was a name. Five yards before me two individuals were anxiously looking about for an object they had apparently lost. I accosted them; and by the glare of the lamp, discovered the features of the most lovely girl in the world. She was leaning on the arm of an old gentleman, sixty years of age at least, who afterwards proved to be her father. The ring I had found was the cause of their search; and as I tendered it to the young lady, she smiled on me with so much sweetness, that she ravished my soul—although at the same moment a large tear stole down her cheek; for the lamp cast its rays direct on her bewitching countenance.

"A thousand thanks, Sir," she said, in a melting tone of voice. "That ring was my poor mother's: she is no more,—but her memory is dearly cherished by me. In pulling off my glove, I inadvertently dropped that precious relic. We thought we might have lost it at the theatre whence we are come."

The father cut short his daughter's explanation by thanking me again, with uncommon civility, and having wished me "a good night," he moved rapidly on. I, however, heard him chide his daughter for having kept "the stranger in the cold." Those were his words.

That night no sleep visited my pillow: the transitory view I had had of so lovely a creature's face chased away slumber, and dwelt perpetually in my mind. I then discovered that, if there be not love at first sight, there is frequently a deep impression made on the heart, which may often essentially controul our actions in after years.

A fortnight elapsed, and I still dreamt of nought save her with whom I had only exchanged two words: but at length I met her again. It was at a theatre—no matter which—and she was again accompanied by her father. I was welcomed with a smile when I addressed her, and with an excess of politeness by the old man, who was rather profuse and cringing in his civilities, as if he did not feel precisely on the same level as myself. The reason of this, however, soon developed itself: for, during a brief conversation, I ascertained that he was a tradesman, and that pecuniary misfortunes had frequently embarrassed him in the prosecution of his business. I also learnt the place of his residence; it was Oxford-street.

"Tradesman—shop!" were the words that rang in my ears all night long. "Tradesman—shop!" was all I uttered, when my father, next morning at breakfast, put some common-place questions to me.

"You were at the theatre last evening, William, were you not?" said he. "Why—you tell us nothing about the performance, the play, or the spectators. Who was there?"

"The tradesman."

"Indeed! and what piece was performed?"

"The shop," was my reply: and I left the room to retire to my own chamber, where I sat down for the purpose of pondering more at liberty on the lovely Miss Benson. A strange sentiment of curiosity filled my mind. I was desirous of ascertaining whether so innocent a girl served in the shop herself, and whether she was exposed to the rude gaze of her customers. To Oxford-street I accordingly hurried. "BENSON, HAERDASHER," in large letters over a door met my eyes: with fear and trembling I entered, and discovered Mr. Benson, assisted by two or three boys, very busily engaged in attending to the wants of those who went thither to make purchases. I inquired for his daughter, and was shown to a neat little parlour at the back of the shop, where she was sitting; for she did not serve in the shop.

"You are kind, very kind," said she, "thus to remember individuals who are under obligations to you."

"Obligations, Miss Benson!" I exclaimed: "for finding and returning a valuable jewel to its owner."

"Oh! Sir, that ring was my mother's, and you know not how I value it! But by the bye," she added in a lively tone of voice, "this is the third time I have had the pleasure of seeing you, and not yet do I know the name of him to whom I am deeply indebted."

Now for my first weakness. Should I confess my real rank, and never visit Miss Benson again? or should I conceal my position in the world; and associate with her as an equal? I had already discovered, that, were she acquainted with my high expectations, her lofty and independent spirit would cause her manners to become distant, reserved, and embarrassed. And another thing—I did not wish Mr. Benson to be able to tell his friends—this cobbler, or that tailor—how the only son and heir apparent of Lord — visited him constantly, and courted his daughter. Nor less was I influenced by a dread of my intimacy with the Bensons becoming known to my father, who would have adopted most summary measures to put an end to it for ever. I therefore yielded to the weight of these reflections, and invented a name to conceal my own. This was my first deceit!

Daily did I visit the lovely Miss Benson; and daily did I become more enamoured of her. The father deemed me to be a young gentleman of small independent fortune; and as he himself was not only poor, but was also considerably advanced in years, he was naturally glad to have before him a prospect of seeing his daughter established in a respectable manner. And she returned my love—and we were happy; and we appeared to live as it were only for each other; and we cared not for the world without.

Eliza Benson was about nineteen years of age. She was stout—even inclined to enbonpoint: but the delicacy of her hand and her foot was such, that they seemed to partake of infantine proportions. Her bust was voluptuous and well-formed, and was that of a woman of mature years rather than of a female of her tender age. Her complexion was of the purest white and red—her mouth red and pouting—her teeth even and white—her eyes dark blue and languishing—her hair of chestnut hue—and her forehead high and pale, though slightly freckled. On the whole she was as lovely and faultless a creature as woman can be in this world of ours.

But to continue my narrative. One afternoon I entered the shop and found all in confusion. Ill-looking men were standing about—the desk was unoccupied by the clerk, the boys were whispering in a corner—and Mr. Benson was not there. Determined to ascertain the meaning of such disorder from the fountain-head, I pushed my way to the parlour, and found Miss Benson lying on the sofa, just recovering from a swoon into which she had ere now fallen: the only servant left in the house was attending her.

"Good God, Miss Benson!" I cried: "what is the cause of this unaccountable posture of your affairs?"

"O heavens!" she exclaimed, a deep sense of her misery rushing to her soul; "they have taken away my father—he is gone, gone to a prison! My father—my poor old father! They heard me not—or if they did, they would not heed me. And I am alone—alone in the world;—my mother is dead—and they have taken away my father, I repeat—they have taken away my father! But I will follow him whithersoever he shall go —"

And she rose from the sofa, but only to fall into my arms, for she was weak and feeble. I reassured her—implored her to remain where she was till my return—and I then proceeded to the shop to learn the particulars of the case. It appeared that a harsh creditor had arrested Mr. Benson for four hundred and odd pounds, and that the poor old man had been taken to a lock-up house. I found out which it was, and hurried thither. Mr. Benson was in tears, raving after his daughter; it went to my heart to witness the distress of venerable old age. When I entered the room of that preparatory gaol, he cried like a child.

"Be tranquil, my dear Sir," I exclaimed: "to-morrow morning you shall be free. I have the money at your service—that is I can get it—but not before to-morrow morning"—for I did not dare ask my father for so considerable a sum towards the end of the quarter:—and I knew that my friend Mr. H—, would not be at home till late that night. I, however, succeeded in relieving Mr. Benson's mind, and he sent me away with these words:—"Go—my dear boy—and console my daughter. She loves you—you love and respect her—and I can trust you."

I bade him adieu, promised that by eight o'clock next morning he should be free, and then returned to comfort the afflicted girl.

And I succeeded in comforting her; for I repeated over and over again, not only my ability to release her father, but also my determination so to do; and thus I made her happy. The servant retired—the shop was soon cleared—and we sat down in the little parlour, alone together on the sofa. It was nine in the evening, and a lamp burned near us. Eliza called me the preserver of her father—her poor father: she invoked blessings upon my head—and I then laid open to her the sentiments of my secret soul. I declared my love: she made a reciprocal confession—I caught her in my arms—and we lingered in a long—a lasting—a fervent embrace. I placed my arm around her, and she suffered me to inhale the fragrance of her breath: but she was pondering on my affection, on my promises, on my conduct towards her aged father;—in fine, she threw herself upon my bosom—she relied on my justice—she yielded herself to me, to do with her as I chose, to dispose of her as I desired—she trusted to me as much as a confiding girl, who sees all, all in her lover, can trust to him. And I clasped her closer to my arms; and I whispered tender things in her ear; and I talked of future happiness. She listened—

"my dishonoured daughter!" cried the old man, frantic with rage. "Return her to me, my Lord," he continued more coolly; "return me my daughter. Give me back my daughter—give me back my daughter, I say—and, O God! I will forgive you! Yes, my Lord —, for so you are now—you wear a mourning dress—that mourning is for your parent! You know how to weep for a parent! believe then that a parent can weep for a child—and give me back my dishonoured daughter!"

"By the high heavens above us, I know not where she is!"

"Some time ago, she was at the gay lodgings your generosity provided for her," pursued Benson, with a bitter smile and a sarcastic accent. "I traced her out there—I wrote a note to her—I said I would see her that day—and she was gone. You have hidden my daughter from my sight. I am a poor old man—I am stricken in years—cares are multiplying thickly upon my head. Oh! my Lord, can you see these hoary locks—these hoary, grey locks—can you contemplate them, my lord—these almost whitened locks—and then refuse to give me back my daughter?"

Vainly did I declare my ignorance of the route she had taken, so precipitate had been her flight: but bitterly did I reproach myself in secret for the harshness of my conduct towards her. The unfortunate father continued his lamentable appeal.

"My lord, the vengeance of an offended Heaven will fall upon your head. You have robbed me—an old man—of the support of my years; you have ruined the little happiness that awaited the miserable remnant of wearied existence that was mine; you have destroyed the prop that held up a tottering fabric; you have filled the dregs of my life's cup with poignant gall; and you now refuse me the only amends you can possibly make. You came, my lord, to a humble dwelling—I did not seek you—and you were regardless of my grey hairs, and you thought not of my infirmities; but selfish lusts were to be gratified, and the price was ruin! I was poor—I was embarrassed—I was in difficulties: but my daughter loved—my daughter consoled me—my daughter shared all my misery. You envied me that solitary bliss. Oh! yes—you were jealous of my felicity—and you robbed me of my dear, dear daughter!—You robbed me of my daughter!"

Great God! how galling were these words. I would not have encountered them for worlds, had I dared eject the author of them from my dwelling: but his hair was whitened with age and with affliction; and I could not have harshly used him. Indeed, there was a moment amongst the many that were dissipated during this scene, when I was ready to fall at his feet, and confess how deeply I had wronged him, and supplicate his pardon: pride alone checked me. At length he departed, and he left his curse behind him, and well did I merit that malediction; for —

In Bethlehem Hospital there is a mad old man, who decks his white locks with straw, and who frantically cries after his dishonoured daughter! Alas! he little knows who sobs and moans for her heart-broken father in the adjacent cell!

THE BRITISH EMPIRE IN THE EAST.

NO. I.—THE EAST INDIA COMPANY'S ORIGIN,

AND PRESENT SITUATION.

THE East India Company was founded in the year 1599 by Queen Elizabeth. The charter, however, granted by that queen, had no other result, than that a few vessels were sent to the East Indies, where the Portuguese then exercised great influence. This charter expired in 1635, but was renewed in the same year by Charles I. Cromwell dissolved the East India Company in 1653, and declared the trade free. This, however, did not last more than four years, after which he restored the privileges of the company. Its capital then amounted to £740,000. In the year 1661 the company obtained a new charter, with greater privileges, from Charles II. The company began then the establishment of their factories on the Indian peninsula, and extended (1665) their trade even to China. In 1698 a new company arose in opposition to the old one. They injured each other much, and were therefore united in 1702 during the ministry of Lord Godolphin. The company's factories now began to increase considerably in importance.

so that they even required separate courts of justice, which were established there in 1726. The company commenced its political career in India in 1756, in which year it gained its first territorial possession in Bengal. The profits of the trade with India were reckoned (by D'Avenant), even then, to amount to £2,000,000 a year. The trading capital of the company at that time consisted of £6,000,000 in 6,000 shares, each of £1,000. Since 1760 this capital has produced an interest of from twelve to fifteen per cent., which raised its current value to £12,000,000. In consequence of this, and as the parliament foresaw the possibility of a still greater dividend, an Act was passed (1769), that the company should not hereafter be allowed to make a greater dividend in one year than ten per cent. on the capital of £6,000,000, and that the profits which might exceed that sum should be employed partly in the formation of a reserve fund, and partly in local improvements in India.

Through this Act of Parliament the company's capital of £6,000,000 was certainly prevented from rising any more in value, but it gained steadiness for that already possessed, reckoned as equivalent to £12,000,000. Each share of £1,000 was in consequence worth £2,000, a value which they have with little variation maintained till now. It is remarkable that this comparatively small sum of £12,000,000 forms the capital of a possession, the revenues of which amount to more than £19,000,000 a year.

In the year 1773 the parliament granted a new charter; the principal bases of which were: that the company should exercise the powers of government within its dominions on the continent of Asia, and have, besides, the monopoly of all trade as well with the East Indies as with China. It was probably from the trade with China that the company derived its profits (on an average £1,000,000 a year), while that with India was often even attended with loss. The trade with China was principally for tea, which the company alone had a right to sell in England. Soon after 1770 the company's stock of tea had increased so considerably in Europe, that they asked permission of parliament to send part of it to North America, which was then still an English colony. The ships, loaded with this tea, arrived at Boston and Charlestown, where disturbances had before broken out on account of the Stamp Act; they were here attacked and plundered by the people, who would not pay a tax of four pence per pound while the English themselves paid a shilling a pound.

This was the beginning of that revolution which cost England the greater part of her North American possessions, contributed considerably to the breaking out of the French revolution, and finally kindled a general war throughout Europe, which cost millions of lives, and endangered the very existence of all social order.

In the year 1784 the parliament established a new ministerial department for East Indian affairs, under the name of the Board of Control. Its business is the superintendence and control of the resolutions made by the Court of Directors of the East India Company.

The company's charter was then still the same as in 1773, which, although several times renewed, was always founded on the same principles as at first. The trade and navigation between England and the East Indies had in the mean time considerably increased, and the gain amounted (according to a calculation made by parliament in 1814) to £185,000,000 from the year 1795 to 1812 which gives an average of about £10,000,000 a year.

The principles of trade had in the mean time been considerably changed in Europe, and especially in England; freer ideas upon the subject prevailed; the time was now considered to have arrived when the company's monopoly of the trade, as well with India as with China, ought to be discontinued; and as their charter would expire in 1835, the parliament employed a part of the session of 1833 in determining the principles of a new one. These were as follows:—

1. The company should retain its political rights, namely, of directing the affairs of the East Indian Empire, under the superintendence of a Board of Control.
2. It should cease to be a commercial company, and in consequence thereof give up its monopoly as well of the trade with India as with China.
3. The trade with these countries should be free for every British subject.
4. British subjects should, with certain restrictions, be allowed to settle in British India, which was before strictly forbidden.
5. The shareholders were assured of a revenue of ten and a half per cent. on their capital of £6,000,000, that is a sum of £631,000 a year, which should be paid out of the income arising from the trade with the East, but should be sent to England in the form of tea, indigo, sugar, &c. (Of these articles, the first mentioned is the most considerable; it is obtained from China in exchange for opium, which is one of the company's monopolies in India.)
6. A sinking fund was laid aside, by means of which the shareholders' capital (reckoned according to its value in trade) of £12,000,000 will in the course of forty years be redeemed; and as the company's present charter also expires at that time, the parliament will have an opportunity of deciding whether it shall be renewed or discontinued; in the latter case, the immense possessions of the company would come directly under the government of the British crown, a state of things which has hitherto been avoided, because it would leave too much power in the hands of the government, which might possibly use it for parliamentary views, and thus endanger the freedom and rights of the English people.

7. The company's warehoused goods (tea, indigo, sugar, &c.) amounting (1835) to the value of £21,000,000, were disposed of in the following manner:—£2,000,000 were taken for the above named sinking fund for the redeeming of the shareholders' capital; £9,000,000 were employed for the payment of the company's debts; and the remaining £10,000,000 were appointed for the effecting of improvements within the East Indian territory—an uncommon act of generosity towards a distant colony—of which however, a still greater proof has since been given by the payment of £20,000,000 for the emancipation of the negroes in the West Indies.

These great changes from the company's former character to the present, which concern the right of possession of an empire as large as Europe—a committee which embraces the whole world—a government of 100,000,000 of people—profits which are equal to the whole wealth of other kingdoms; were decided by parliament in the course of a few evenings!

ORIGINAL POETRY.

SWEET SOUNDS.

BY W. T. MONCRIEFF.

Author of "Don Quixote," "Tom and Jerry," &c.

Oh! had I some old magician's power,
All the sweet sounds of earth and air
I'd call together in one calm hour,
And bid them commingle in concert rare.
The soft—the soothing—the calm—the glad—
Oh! they shall all entrancing play,
With echoes from far of the love and sad,
To form for nature a roundelay!

Then I'd bid each harp's voice be still,
And change, in evening harmony,
The sweetest purplings of the fall,
And the bird's sweet pipe from the hidden tree.
The moon tide breezes that lulling come,
The echoes that bid the heart rejoice,
The watch-dog's bark, with its thoughts of home,
And, sweeter than all, dear woman's voice.

The humming waves on the lone sea shore,
The gentle rattle of forest leaves,
The parting dews when the storm is o'er,
And childhood's laugh in its moon carouse;
The woodman's halloo, as he cuts the vale,
The billow murmurs of beauty's kiss,
The warbling of the nightingale,
And, sound of sounds, love's sigh of bliss!

The grass-hopper's chirrup, so shrill and clear,
The bee's little hum, the cat's purr,
The dove's soft coo, with a low voice to hear,
The village bell, to heaven's voice near,
Every sweet sound, beneath the moon,
Would I communally in one strain,
With them to form a curious tune,
Well suited for nature's roundelay!

THE ASHES OF NAPOLEON.

Translated from the French of Victor Hugo.

O giant of our land, but our ruler no more,
We will not bear the bones from that desolate shore,
Our eye-lids are moist with the tears we have shed—
But the unconquered banner waves o'er our head,
And with that for a symbol, as erst with thine own,
We will fight till the banner be slaughtered and strown,
And then may the rites of thy funeral be crowned
By the garlands that we in our wars shall have found;
With them we will croud the coffin, and call
The people of earth to lament for thy fall;
And the hymn of the muse shall be soft and free,
To welcome the presence of young Liberty!

Reposing in clay, with us shalt thou rest,
Forsath thine own custom thy bones shall be Nest;
The sky for thy curtain of blue shall be spread;
And the feet of our arms pass o'er thine head;
And the crowd shall collect, like the waves of the sea,
And as they roll onwards do homage to thee
If they keep for their tyrants a dungeon and chain,
Still their voices shall echo thy praises again,
And the sound of their wail shall resemble the din
Of the sea-beaten rock when the tide rushes in,
And the spirit shall hover in air evermore
Round thy relics brought back from a desolate shore!

THE WONDERFUL ADVANTAGES OF DRUNKENNESS.

If you wish to be always thirsty, be a drunkard; for the oftener and more you drink, the oftener and more thirsty you will be.

If you wish to prevent your friends from raising you in the world, be a drunkard; and that will defeat all their efforts.

If you would effectually counteract your own attempts to do well, be a drunkard; and you will not be disappointed.

If you wish to repel the endeavours of the whole human race, to raise you to character, credit, and prosperity, be a drunkard; and you will most assuredly triumph.

If you are determined to be poor, be a drunkard; and you will be ragged and penniless to your heart's content.

If you wish to starve your family, be a drunkard; and then you will consume the means of their support.

If you would be imposed upon by knaves, be a drunkard; for that will make their task easy.

If you would wish to be robbed, be a drunkard; and the thief will do it with greater safety.

If you wish to deaden your senses, be a drunkard; and you will soon be more stupid than an ass.

If you are resolved to kill yourself, be a drunkard; and you will hit upon a sure mode of self-destruction.

If you would expose both your folly and your secrets, be a drunkard; and they will soon run out as the liquor runs in.

If you think you are too strong, be a drunkard; and you will soon find yourself subdued by so powerful an enemy.

If you would get rid of your money without knowing how, be a drunkard; and it will vanish insensibly.

If you would have no resource, when unable to labour, save a workhouse, be a drunkard; and you will be incompetent to provide any.

If you are determined to expel all comfort from your house, be a drunkard; and you will do it effectually.

If you would be hated by your family and friends, be a drunkard; and you will soon be more than disagreeable.

If you would be a pest to society, be a drunkard; and you will be avoided as an infection.

If you would smash windows, break the peace, get your bones broken, tumble under horses and carts, and be locked up in a watch-house, be a drunkard; and it will be strange if you do not succeed.

If you wish all your prospects in life to be clouded, be a drunkard; and they will soon be dark enough.

If you would destroy your body, be a drunkard; as drunkenness is the mother of disease.

If you wish to ruin your soul, be a drunkard; that you may be excluded from heaven.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We shall always be glad to give insertion to the Reports sent from Bradford, or from any other place where there is a Teetotal Association.

"A Shaker's Sermon" is informed that multi-liquor is excessively injurious to women suckling their children, in consequence of the acidity it contains. It tends to impoverish the milk, as well as to turn it sour. The quality, and not the quantity of the milk should be considered. Good broths or soups are far preferable in such cases to multi-liquor.

If T. V. N. had read the last number but one of The Teetotaler, he would have seen that "The Sailor's Reading Room" had been noticed. We thank him for his communication of the varieties.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1840.

A FAVOURITE objection raised against the doctrines of Teetotalism, is that a total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors will essentially injure the agricultural interests of the country; that the primal effects will be experienced by the farmer, and, by a well understood gradation, by the landed proprietor next; and that thousands of individuals would be thrown out of employment by the ruin of the markets for barley and oats for purposes of malting and distillation, and the closing of breweries, distilleries, and public houses. But it would be found that the demand for wholesome provisions, articles of apparel, furniture, and a variety of things of which the intemperate are compelled to deprive themselves, would increase in an immense degree; and the lands, which have been hitherto devoted to the growth of grain for malting and distilling, would be used for the cultivation of corn to make bread. Those individuals, who are now dependent upon the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors, would be enabled to find employment in the various establishments which would be erected in consequence of the increased demand for the necessities and comforts of life; and, as far the publicans—they would still be enabled to convert their poison-vending dens into respectable coffee-houses.

The same observations apply to those ship-owners, who at present employ their vessels in the export or import of wines. All commerce is based upon an international supply of necessities or luxuries, one country providing another with a produce in which the former abounds and the latter is deficient,—and rice &c. Commerce is a general system of barter, the representative of which is money. Were the doctrines of Teetotalism extended to all lands, the demand of all nations for the necessities of life would increase, and the ships, which now transport wines from one port to another, would be freighted with cottons, silks, timber, corn, and the various products of industry and art.

At a late Teetotal meeting at Downpatrick, the chairman, MR. ALEXANDER PILSON, illustrated a portion of the above observations by detailing the outlay, under the Teetotal system, of the price of twenty glasses of spirits. The cost of this quantity of liquor is three shillings and fourpence; and, with this sum, the wife of the Teetotaler proceeds to the butcher's-shop where she purchases—

5lbs. of good meat, at 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per lb.	£0 1 10 $\frac{1}{2}$
Returning, she calls at the baker's shop and buys a loaf at	0 0 6
And in the same place 1lb. of flour	0 0 3
Meeting a farmer's wife or servant with butcher, buys 1lb.	0 0 5 $\frac{1}{2}$
	£0 3 4
Take profit to the butcher	£0 0 4
Profit to the baker	0 0 2

Net sum which goes into the farmer's pocket £0 2 10

Now, two hundred weight of grain will produce about six gallons of spirits; one quart being the twenty-fourth part of six gallons, and 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ lbs. being the twenty-fourth part of 234 subtle pounds of grain, which, at 7s. per cwt. would make for 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ lbs.

Leaving for Queen's duties, labour, fuel, license, profits to distiller and retailer,

Thus, under the Teetotal system, the farmer receives out of the 3s. 4d.

And under the drunken system, out of the same 3s. 4d. just

Making a balance in favour of the farmer under the Total Abstinence system of

Even in a selfish point of view—independently of a moral and a physical one—does the Teetotaler reap a material and substantial benefit from the new principle. It is certainly better to have good clothes and food, and abstain from drink, than to be hungry and ragged, even though this squalor and want enable their votary to have his fill of intoxicating liquor. The excitement of strong drink does not blind the eyes, on the morning after a carouse, to the denuded shelves of the cupboard, and the tattered condition of the garment; and the pains of a head-ache are not soothed by any moral consolation. The money disbursed in strong drink, is worse than wasted, because it purchases that which injures the intellect, the morals, the health, and the prosperity of individuals; but even if it were expended upon something which is only unnecessary and not hurtful, that waste is associated with no pleasing reflection. In any case, the coin so expended is disbursed upon a luxury, while a family at home is probably wanting a necessity of life.

The moderate drinker says that "he takes enough to do him good;" and yet he admits that "too much does him harm." Now, if intoxicating liquor be productive of evil consequences when taken to excess, it must necessarily exert a proportionate evil influence when used even moderately. If the amount of the evil consequences attendant upon excess be expressed in numbers,—such as considering it equivalent to one hundred parts, we may suppose, for argument's sake, that ten glasses of spirits and water will produce this amount of injury. If, then, ten glasses be equivalent to a hundred parts of evil, one glass must be deemed equal to ten parts; and thus is it demonstrated that moderate-drinking cannot be supposed to involve a principle of "taking enough to do one good." Every species of unnatural and artificial excitement should be avoided. If ten glasses of liquor will cause the blood to circulate in the ratio of five pulsations per minute more rapidly than nature intends, two glasses will produce one pulsation too many in the same time. To suppose that a small quantity of intoxicating liquor is good for man, while he admits that a large quantity is hurtful to him, is to argue upon the principle that a very little wound is a desirable occurrence, but that a very deep wound is to be dreaded. Truly, the victims of a disgusting and pernicious habit have solaced their consciences with strange delusions!

In its capacity of the leading journal in the sphere of the new doctrine of total abstinence,

The Teetotaler is from time to time assailed in a sneaking and cowardly manner by some of the "small fry" of the same species of periodical literature. None of these dare openly to attack it, for fear of absolute annihilation as the punishment of their lemerity; but a few sly hits and attempts at sarcasm are occasionally introduced into the "Notices to Correspondents" of these little papers, the meaning of which we of course comprehend and heartily laugh at. The Teetotaler is circulated amongst the higher classes of society, and is read by an audience to the ears of which the names of some other prints, professing the same doctrines, are absolutely unknown. It also enjoys the patronage of the working-classes, whose rights and interests it defends, while it inculcates the beneficent principles of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors. In its quality of "a journal of general literature," it invariably contains matter calculated to instruct as well as to amuse; and, as the name of its Editor is constantly before the public on the title-pages of popular works, The Teetotaler is calculated to obtain readers in those classes which are as yet unfortunately beyond the boundaries of Teetotalism. We are not proud,—we are not vain; but we choose to assert our own importance in a sphere where such importance is a high honour; and we are anxious to remind our readers that all the snarls and distant growlings of one or two of our contemporaries, are only so many indications, and indeed tacit acknowledgments of that importance to which we allude. We shall pursue the path which we have chalked out for ourselves, with boldness and energy;—we shall expose abuse, where abuse exists; we shall advocate the prosperity of the working-classes with unwearied zeal; and we shall assail, without compromise, those who wickedly oppose themselves to the progress or interests of Teetotalism. We cordially despise those grovelling minds which view with an envious eye the existence of crusaders in the same field; and, for our parts, we shall hail with delight the appearance of every new journal founded on the principles of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, as a token of a fresh triumph on the side of Teetotalism.

THE DRUNKEN MINISTERS.

To the Editor of "The Teetotaler."

SIR,—Having treated you to an outré true story about a Dissenting Scotch Minister, albeit the period may have been somewhat remote when his horrid and filthy career came to a close; it is but fair that I conduct you to the established Kirk itself, for other equally instructive specimens of gross intemperance. It will, as intimated in offering Walter Torrance to your acceptance, be my endeavour to fix my attention upon facts and actual characters, although the sketches may be filled up in such a manner, by the licence allowed to painters, as will send home to the hearts of the lovers of the real pointed practical lessons with double emphasis, as well as exalt the sentiments of the more imaginative by means of the ideal, which after all is but the essence of truth. It appears to me that while one tribe of contributors to the Teetotaler may powerfully and the cause it advocates by direct denunciations of the votaries and the abettors of intemperance, and by adducing arguments to prove its folly and mischief drawn from the armory of reason and religion, as well as from the sciences of chemistry and medicine; another tribe may effectually labour in another but kindred department, by representations drawn from observation and actual experience, and the natural helps of a penetrating speculative eye; leaving the reader, however, to apply the truths thereby taught in the best manner he may. In this latter sphere it will be my endeavour at present, as in my story about Walter Torrance, to labour.

Upon the sort of specialities which attach to drunkenness in Scotland, it will in some future occasion be proper to enter. In the meanwhile, however, there is one class of the transgressors, although numerically small, yet influentially great, that furnishes ample materials for denunciation, and indeed for more papers than I have either time to write, or you space to admit,—I mean the "Drunken Ministers" of the Kirk,—the phrase at the head of this paper being peculiarly significant on the north side of the Tweed. Oh, the weight attached to these two words! Sometimes it is that of deepest opprobrium, sometimes of most utter loathing; on other occasions it is that of a ridiculing levity, or, again, and worst of all, of an apt and self-excused imitation.

But let me guard myself before proceeding further against being deemed a libeller of the Kirk, or imputing to its ministers, as a body, the vice of drunkenness.—On the other hand, I am prepared to pronounce the clergy of Scotland to be the most exemplary of any in Europe,—of any that ever served at a national altar, whether as regards learning or piety, clerical labour or social and domestic virtues. Strange indeed would it be if a church that is without a parallel among modern ecclesiastical constitutions, as respects simplicity and effectiveness, suitableness and acceptance, were saddled with, and had endured a worthless and immoral set of pastors! Stranger perhaps still if a people, the best informed, the most energetic, devout, and also jealous over their ministers, of any that can be named, should yet tolerate sets and successions of spiritual teachers who were not correspondingly superior and pure! The supposition is absurd,—the annals of Scotland give it the flattest contradiction.

But in proportion as the standard of purity and excellence is strict and lofty, so as a matter of course any departure from it is not only the more remarkable and notorious, but the consciousness of the transgressor in regard to degradation and odium is the more devastating to himself; there being no permitted medium, no conventional relaxation; just as between woman's virtuousness and unchastity. So it is in the history of our Scottish clergy: there have been some egregious and flagrant defaulters. I might almost say picturesque criminals, for example in the category of drunkenness, and whose histories deserve to have a page in the "Teetotaler," while yet nineteen-twentieths of the sacred order sustain the demeanour becoming them, and offer a model for the priests of other nations and other creeds.

And here at the risk of being as repulsive as ecclesiastical discourse, let me mark how Scotland has been affected in certain directions by one of the great parties in the church. These parties for a long series of years have been known by the names of Moderate and Evangelical, or Orthodox—that is the orthodoxy of high Calvinism. Now the former of these parties, which, till within a late period, has been in the ascendant in all that relates to ecclesiastical power and political influence, may be considered to have been as filially the successors of Scottish episcopacy under the latter Stuarts, as the other has been of the Covenanters; the manners of each being about as characteristic as their doctrines, style of preaching, or performance of ministerial functions. The Moderates were learned, more polished, and every way morally speaking, more lax. They were the clerical gentlemen of the establishment, who sought the society of the higher classes, despising or laughing at the narrow-mindedness and old-fashioned notions of the common people. They accounted themselves philosophers, several of them having also achieved the highest triumphs of literature; or if no way distinguished in these respects, they had a good chance to become the visiting friends of the squirearchy, and even of the patron of the parish, if in rural parts, or of the genteeler part of an urban population; whereas the evangelicals were the puritans, the popular body, and those who had they been but for once known to have played at cards, or to have made themselves familiar with the profanities of the gentry would have lost caste for ever. In these circumstances it followed that the free livers were generally found amongst the Moderates. Not a few of them shone as convivialists as well as scholars; too many of them even as toppers, and some of them as sots, to the great scandal of the church and the demoralization of their flocks. To be sure these transgressors were despised by the pious, and also by the bulk of the people. Still they have had a most baneful influence on the nation. They legalized, so to speak, intemperate habits; the genteel portion of their flocks were under their immediate and frequent influence; while the more vulgar sort gradually became contaminated; and had it not been for the practical religion, the zeal and the labour of the evangelicals, there would have been a far darker picture to draw of the present state of Scotland as regards drunkenness than the facts authorize me to frame.

Behold in what has been said of several generations of the Moderates, one of the great sores which the higher orders have inflicted upon the community. It has not been enough that they have had no sympathy with those below them, and that they have kept superciliously aloof as if contagion was inseparable from a community of feeling with the poor. They have had it mainly in their power to dispense with class interests; whereas they have taught the multitude both to imitate and to hate them, till the day seems to have arrived in which they tremble as well as posit and exasperate. Yes, exasperate and pollute! for it has not been enough that they cherished no sympathy. They have done positive mischief; by direct example they have inflicted grievous social maladies; they have contaminated many of the sacerdotal order; and as a rank and fat soil have propagated, as if never to be exhausted, poisonous vapours and noxious weeds in every direction, on every subjacent field.

But the wickedness and infatuation of the higher orders has been yet more signally displayed than in their want of sympathy with the mass of the people, or even in their direct and positive contamination; for they have beheld, and with fear and trembling, the dislocations of society produced especially by themselves; the terrific inoculations of intemperance in Glasgow for instance, without taking the initiative in the business of healing, of prevention and cure,—without stretching out the arm to save, or the voice to warn, which could alone be understood to be sincerely meant, if backed by practice, if tested by example. Have the higher orders taken the initiative to stem the tide of intemperance? Have those who are full of bread, warm, and at ease, heartily seconded the self-reforming efforts of millions of the people? No; and herein lies the most signal evidence of their dereliction of duty, of their actual encouragement of a desolating vice, and of their judicial madness.

It may be thought that I have wandered from the "Drunken Ministers" of the Kirk. But when it is understood that according to the constitution of the Establishment, and the emoluments of its clergy, the pastor of each parish holds an intermediate position as a member of society between the "gentle and the simple," is neither too lowly in respect of worldly comforts for my Lord and my Lady to visit him, nor too elevated to refuse the invitation of his Lordship's tenant, to partake of the farmer's wholesome fare,—at the same time being the appointed dispenser of sacred things equally to all,—it will be seen that he has an indefinite opportunity of dispensing evil or good, and that if he incline to the former way, he has but to distil and detail the modes of the higher orders to the inferior ones; to show the people how the bottle circulated; or, if he be too wary for that, to let it be known that he drank moderately, although those around him proceeded to excess. There is nothing overdrawn in this picture; it receives constant and wide-spread verification, even in the most moral rural districts of Scotland; and therefore not only is intemperance not discouraged but nursed and propagated. But how much more virulent and devastating must the case be in a parish where the pastor is not only negligent of his sacred duties, and a preacher without unction, but, if not a convicted, at least a suspected drunkard! This brings me to notice some illustrative cases:—

Some twenty years ago I spent a few weeks with a wealthy baronet in the south of Scotland, who was a hearty patron of the bottle; who never for several years went sober to bed; and who never directly intimated that he deemed the habit disgraceful or pernicious. It was not very difficult, however, to perceive that he hedged himself in some measure behind clerical example, and considered certain limitations and restrictions necessary to respectability. He used to tell with great glee how Dr. M—— of a certain royal burgh, was never sober after mid-day, "whereas I," he would add, "only enjoy myself after dinner. But then another difference is that my reverend friend, although his face wears a deeper purple, carries his cheeks far better and shiner than I do mine; or if mastered, he has the cunning to retire, and refuse to be seen by any one but his managing spouse."

It was in this way that Dr. M—— contrived to elude or defeat the scrutiny of the public and of the presbytery, although the poison of his example, and perhaps exaggerated reports of his transgressions told more fatally upon the morals of his parishioners, as the notorious character of the burgh to this day testifies, than if he had been allowed to roll about the streets with impunity, and to wallow in his vice, unwatched and unreported.

And yet Dr. M—— did not look upon himself as a drunkard, "for I never," he one day boasted to the baronet, who chanced to call upon him a few minutes before the stroke of twelve, "take a cheerer before that hour—never!" But, added the visitor when relating the matter to me, "I perceived that the bottle, water, and tumbler were set out; that his reverence was pacing the room impatiently, every now and then casting his eye to the church clock hard by, and that before the twelfth stroke had sounded the tumbler had been filled and clean emptied. I could not have done that," added Sir—— "Nor could I have that," no doubt Dr. M. would have self-complacently asserted; that, I mean which I shall after a little have to detail of the Rev. Mr.—— (call him Macvicar.)

James Macvicar was a younger son of a clothier and burgess in the town of Dunse in Berwickshire, and gave such early indications of talent and quickness to learn, as determined his coming father to give him an university education, during which the youth amply fulfilled the expectations formed of him.

James had no particular choice relative to a profession; but as his father was an elder in the church, although by no means a religious man, it was natural enough that he should wish to have a descendant who should hold a higher station in the Establishment; in short, who should "wag his head in the pulpit." Now, to this proposal the young man had no objection; nor indeed would he have opposed any strongly expressed desire of the clothier, whatever it might have been,—so remarkably was his pliability, sweetness and easiness of temper. The milk of human kindness never flowed more copiously in the breast of any man. There was a generosity of feeling about him which made him the beloved of every one; it was hardly in his nature to say no to any person; docility, acquiescence, and forbearance being with him a portion, an element of constitution, animal as well as mental. His countenance itself was an unmistakable index of such a character; the tablet of his brow was as expressive of an open, unsuspecting disposition, as his bland eye was engaging and full of intelligence. His father was wont to say of him, that he was the "blithest creature he ever knew."

What a rare combination of natural elements to mould into moral and intellectual beauty, dignity, and power! And these elements profusely bestowed, and harmoniously associated, were so directed and cultivated during his academical progress by teachers who estimated duly the value of the being confided to them, that he not merely bid adieu to the precincts of the university loaded with the highest honours it could bestow upon a student, but drew renown to the institution. Professor J——, one of his most admiring and celebrated teachers, burst into tears when James had passed the Divinity Hall, having quite finished his college career, and said "the delight I have experienced in watching how that white soul grew and expanded, surely must continue and never cease in heaven!" Another declared that were the patronage and appointment his, he would name Mr. Macvicar to be his successor, knowing that the character of Scotland's rising generation would be most salutarily affected by the young men which such an excellent preceptor and model would send forth.

The Clothier's burgh interest joined with his son's reputation, was not likely to go unrewarded. In fact he had acted as private tutor during several vacations before leaving the university to the eldest son of the Earl of H——, and was subsequently promoted to a more responsible and eminent situation by the same patron; for soon after becoming a licentiate, then being about twenty-five years of age, he was appointed travelling-companion and guardian to the young lord, who was some six summers his junior.

It is unnecessary to accompany the travellers in their grand tour, further than to say that the heir to an Earldom was as good and virtuous as perhaps any one of nine-tenths of his equals placed in similar circumstances. He was generous, capable of forming strong attachments, but much more eager after strong excitements and diversity of pleasure. He wished to try his hand to the achievement of every triumph, and to be a witness, or actor rather, in every scene. Consequently his travelling companion according to the sketch already given of him, was too often a participator in his pranks and his waywardness. Nay, James from his higher qualities, and when his spirit was awakened suitably to the occasion, would go considerably in advance; and be even greatly, the most brilliant and glorious of a light-hearted and joyous group. Not that during the two years' tour he ever allowed himself grossly to pass the boundaries of decency or even of decorum. Nay, all the earnestness and touching eloquence, as if coming from an elder brother's heart, for which he was so much distinguished, he would remonstrate with his noble charge, and warn him of the consequences here and hereafter of unrestrained indulgences, and the breaches of the moral law; to which, however, the young sprig would reply, "all very well James for one of your cloth, but I am not so tightly tied; be you good and pleasant, and you shall have a Kirk as soon as I have one in my power to bestow." "A Kirk, my Lord," the tutor would answer, "has no more charms for me than a cottage, but I am solicitous about your approval in after years, and what you will allow is still more to be desired, the approval of my own conscience." "All true, James," would be the reply, "I'll be better for the future;" or, "it is your place to tell me when I am wrong, and it is my fancy sometimes to give you something to do;" and thus would end the colloquy.

A few months after the return of the travellers to their native land the old Earl died; and in the course of about a similar period of time a Kirk in the gift of the family became vacant, when the young lord was as good as his word, appointing his esteemed tutor and companion to the living, which happened to be within the jurisdiction of the Presbytery of Dunse, the town in which this provincial ecclesiastical court holds its regular meetings.

DUNCAN MACVICH.

CAUSES OF INTEMPERANCE.

ONE of the principal causes of intemperance in England, is the paucity of public amusements for the poorer classes of society. The great cities and towns of this vast empire have few "sights," such as monuments of art or science, or emporiums of curiosity, to adorn them; and even these few are only allowed to be visited upon the payment of exorbitant fees. Every thing in England is arranged or done with a consideration for the wealthy part of the community only; and measures, comprising pecuniary considerations, are invariably adopted to exclude the working classes from all share in public amusement. The theatres are also enormously dear; and thus, the only means of recreation for the poor man who will not divert himself with intellectual pursuits, are the public-houses.

It has moreover been the fashion for the over-religious to condemn the theatres as places of immoral amusement. Plato, Xenophon, Cicero, Livy, Seneca, and Tacitus—and all the fathers of the Christian church besides, denounced the stage as the miniature world of corruption and crime. But these were the enemies of the ancient stage; the modern one is widely different. A moral is invariably to be deduced from every piece that was ever yet performed; because virtue is always rewarded, and crime punished upon the stage; and retributive justice works out the denouement of the play.

How cordially should we agree with the enemies of theatres, did they say that the applauses, which are showered upon the most profligate females in the world—the abandoned actresses who glory in their infamy—only tend to encourage crime and demoralise an audience. It is notorious that many of the unhappy girls, who are nightly condemned to prostitute their charms to supply the necessities of life, are not so thoroughly wicked and morally depraved as some of the leading actresses of the present day. And yet how widely different are the fortunes of these two classes of females! The unhappy girl dies neglected and alone in a work-house, while the depraved actress lives in gorgeous style at the expense of some silly nobleman, and eventually marries an earl or a viscount more silly still. Were the public to be more guarded in the out-pourings of their applause in favour of the actresses of the present day, a revolution might take place upon the stage, and its results would be highly beneficial to all concerned in theatrical matters. Were a shop-keeper's wife or mistress to be notoriously a profligate or degraded character, no respectable person would think of purchasing a single article in a house where contamination was to be feared; but, when a loose and infamous woman, whose venal embraces can be bought by the highest bidder, appears upon the stage, she is received with thunders of applause. Truly, this is a strange contradiction!

But the presence of immoral women upon the stage, does not impart an immoral tendency to the mere fact of visiting a theatre; and, if a larger number of theatres were established throughout the country, and the prices of admittance reduced to a tariff within the scope of the working man's means, this recreation would be found a great corrective of the evil habit of intemperance. France is notoriously a sober country; but France is well stocked with theatres, and a thousand places of innocent resort and amusement unknown in England;—and we do not hesitate to say that we prefer the contemplation of a French sabbath evening—where the theatres are all open, and the working men, with their wives and children, may congregate at rural balls,—to that passed, in England, in the pestiferous tap-rooms of public-houses.

In France, moreover, no fees are demanded to visit the public-buildings; and these edifices are abundant throughout the country. Every town of any importance has its museum, its library, its public gardens, and its theatres; and thus, the French artisan or mechanic is not driven to the public-house to seek amusement with his companions over the bottle. When the mind has been wearied by its sympathy with the toil of the body during the day, it requires some other change than that provided by books and newspapers; and the theatre, the rural ball, or the spacious public garden, can afford that variation. The French drink but little at these places, and never disgrace them by intemperance. The amusement they afford would enable the visitors to dispense with drink of an intoxicating quality altogether; but so long as the English government closes the doors of public institutions against the working man by the moral barrier of an exorbitant fee,—and so long as the number of theatres remains limited, and the price of admittance high, large temptations to seek the public-house exist in the path of the labouring classes. We may here observe that in those towns in France where the theatres are not adequately supported, in a pecuniary point of view, by the inhabitants, the government allows the managers a certain yearly income to enable them to keep their houses open. This plan is adopted for the benefit of the working-classes, and might be imitated in this country, did not the government tremble at every measure which tends to diminish the amount of revenue so infamously derived from the sale of alcoholic poisons of all denominations.

WINTER.

[We extract the following charming paper from a beautiful little periodical, entitled the "THE LADIES' CARNIVAL," and which is devoted to music, fashion, and romance. This work appears monthly, and affords the reader, for the small disbursement of sixpence, a well-conducted miscellany of literature, and several embellishments executed in the first style of the art of steel-engraving, besides plates of fashions after the most approved French patterns.—ED. "TEETOTALER."]

HARK to the low muttering—the solemn sobbing of the coming tempest! Ay, the grim old tyrant, Winter, is with us again; not as we saw him last—weak, shrivelled, attenuated and retreating—but strong, fierce, resistless, and advancing with giant strides and strength. Armed with the terrors of the elements—the howling wind, the piercing sleet, the blinding snow and rattling hail—he rushes onward, scattering desolation and dismay in his terrific progress. Old Ocean hears him afar off, and the dull, black surge already begins to chafe and mutiny, and leap instinctively toward the deck of the labouring vessel. The old weather-beaten sailor, with pipe in cheek and one eye closed, cocks the other over the weather-bow, and oracularly announces that there is much "dirt" in the sky. Down comes every inch of superfluous canvas; sails are stowed—reefs taken in—the ship made "snug" (snug!) and then, imperturbable as the anchor, he awaits the coming shock. He is no hero; he dislikes death as much as a divine (r a philosopher: grog is still grateful to his palate, and the odoriferousness of tobacco has not yet departed: but custom has enabled him to meet calmly and coolly that which would turn the heart (and stomach) of a hero inland bred to look upon. May he escape the fishes' though in truth they would have no great catch. He is altogether too-tough and weather-beaten for pleasant mastication; and even the least particular of sharks would prefer an old tarpaulin. Meanwhile, onward sweeps the savage winds over the icy seas of the North, the boiling Atlantic and limitless Pacific, seeking in every quarter their trembling prey, the frail and flying vessel. Ay—many a gallant spirit will be "quenched in waters cold," before their fury is again laid to rest, and they learn once more to murmur mildly o'er the summer sea.

But let us leave the grand and dreary—the dull and dreadful deep—and look landward. Can this mass of mud and clay, and thorns and brambles, and barren hills and miry valleys, be our sweet earth that we have taken such delight in for the last nine months? Verily, as it is written in Irish, "she hath clothed herself in nakedness." The poor, forlorn groves, divested of all their gorgeous drapery, have not wherewithal left to make a decent appearance, and stand, like "unhoused" beggars, sighing and shaking in the nipping wind, while their pretty tenantry sit uneasily about from bough to bough in search of their scanty fare. The melancholy cattle stand ruefully contemplating the foodless fields, doubtless for scanty are the materials for furnishing other cud to chew; and the mournful cry of the plover from the barren moors strikes desolately on the ear, mixed with the sullen sound of the swollen stream, and the fitful gusts of the damp, raw wind. Starvation and desolation are all around. We sympathize with the forlorn condition of inanimate nature in every shape, but more particularly the poor trees. Can there be a more distressed, poverty-stricken object than a stripped tree, especially when one calls to mind "its high and palmy state" in times that are past? Look at that solitary one, for instance, in the middle of the opposite field. A few short months ago, and it waved its verdant branches most musically in the summer wind, and threw them protectingly over the recumbent cattle, which tired of cropping their flowery food, and plagued by the noon-tide heats, sought shelter beneath its grateful shade. Look at it now, without a rag to its back, as desolate-looking as a hungry man with his hands in his breeches pockets, instinctively feeling for the sixpence which is not.

Without wishing to appear singular, I must own that I am one of those persons who have a strange antipathy to death. The nearer he approaches, the more odious he appears; and that shape is ever the most unamiable in which he advances slowest. True, in a misty afternoon, after a heavy dinner and a pot of porter, when one feels stupid and pathetic, I have caught myself repeating, with the poet—

"There is a calm for those that weep,
A rest for weary pilgrims found,
They softly lie and sweetly sleep
Low in the ground."

And have even proceeded (Heaven forgive me!) so far as to add,

"I long to lay this aching head
And throbbing heart beneath the soil—
To slumber in that dreamless bed
From all my toil."

But only let me perceive the remotest chance of such a consummation, and what a revolution of feeling immediately takes place! How soon a doctor becomes ennobled in my eyes, and even a quack is invested with a tinge of respectability. What a trifle is bleeding, blistering, or swallowing of the most nauseous substances in such a case! No more idle, heady bravado, about throwing "physic to the dogs." All sorts would be swallowed cheerfully, ay, even ipecacuanha, rather than quit this "vale of tears." This is not heroic, but it is true; and when I hear the sage, the philosopher, and the moralist, discoursing about death as calmly as about their dinner—when I hear the preacher eloquently laying down the law touching the nothingness of life, and the grave being without any terrors for the virtuous, (amongst whom I presume myself included)—when I hear patriots—mushroom ones—mob-orators, fellows in the street mananously roar out that it is a mere trifle, when encountered for the public good, I really begin to think at times that mankind must have grown all valiant, and that this distaste of mine for "shuffling off my mortal coil," arises simply from some idiosyncrasy—some constitutional peculiarity which I am unable to account for. Be that as it may; at all times and in all seasons—the blithesome Spring, the blooming Summer or temperate Autumn, I have always some reason or other for not wishing to die just then; but in Winter, the gloomy tyrant is my peculiar aversion. Oh, who can look at the dirty, dull, dreary, dismal churchyard, with its melancholy ranks of monumental stones, and fancy, as Sir Lucius O'Trigger says, that there will be "long lying" in its precincts! I imagine a hole dug by the side of the dull, blank wall, through that dank, cold soil, saturated four feet down by the dissolving snow. Really, Mr. Thomson it is asking too much to require any person to think of approaching such a receptacle,

"Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch Around him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

Such a thing is not to be thought of. Then imagine yourself left sticking in the mud, the gloomy night gathering in, and the driving sleet pattering on your "winter-quarters;" while all your friends, who stood shivering and crying (with cold) round your grave, are off to their warm, cheerful hearths, in order to enjoy a few additional comforts to compensate for their past sufferings. "Poor fellow!" exclaims your chief mourner, as he lights his cigar, places his feet upon the fender, and lolls back in his easy chair—"poor fellow! (puff) I wonder if he was much in debt?" Can there be any question which of the two has the best of it? True, your dealer in truisms gravely asserts that it makes no sort of difference: that you will sleep just as soundly and comfortably there as if imbedded among rose-leaves or eider down. Most true, says reason; but I trust my imaginative faculties are of too respectable an order to give credence to such a story. I cannot divest myself of the idea of sensation. No, give me Summer, when earth is warm, and the kindly sun sheds a chastened cheerfulness on your last abiding-place.

But to leave these doleful themes. Winter has its comforts. It is the most sociable of seasons. Man is more gregarious at this period than any other. Cut off from nearly all communion with nature, even the most unsociable of the species combine to eat and drink more in bodies. Now is the time for fun and frolic, and song and sentiment, and hot punch and foolish speeches, and "proudest moments of your life." Now is the time for the small quiet room, brisk fire, and favourite author. Now does the keen bracing north wind blow, and the glowing skater skips gracefully over the smooth black ice. Now shines the clear cold moon, as lads drive lasses in the unceremonious country, or beaux drive belles in the outskirts of the polished city—or otherwise, just as it may happen. And now, O Winter, comes the especial season of feasting, of harmless relaxation, and jovous revelry—now comes merry Christmas and jolly New Year. These, Winter, are thine own. Oh! there is much to be thankful for on this slandered earth of ours—at all times and at all seasons—Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter—by the possessors of warm hearts, good tempers, sociable dispositions, clear consciences, and undebauched animal functions. Health and happiness to all such! May they see many a bright revolving year, and even let the gloomy grumble and the ascetic sneer, to the end of the chapter, as best pleaseth them.

REVIEWS.

Portraits of Public Characters. By the Author of "Random Recollections of the Lords and Commons," "The Great Metropolis," &c. 2 vols. 8vo. London: Saunders and Otley.

MR. GRANT is one of the most popular of English authors now living. Whence he obtained such a vast fund of information as we find in all his works, it is difficult to say: one thing is however certain—that he is one of the most persevering and fertile writers of the age. His works are as original in their nature as they are amusing and instructive; we say instructive, because the biographies of eminent men are replete with matter and incident which it is necessary to know and to study. Mr. Grant is a very pleasing writer, and this circumstance is one of the principles of his popularity—he is graphic and minute in his descriptions, without being wearisome; and his mind seems totally divested of all improper prejudice or partiality. That he is a man of ability and sound judgment, is evident from the great success which he is admitted to have experienced in handling the subjects of his various publications; and that he has struck out a new feature in literature, peculiarly adapted to the tastes of the age, is shown by the extensive circulation of his works.

The "Portraits of Public Characters" is one of the most interesting of all this gentleman's writings. We strongly recommend our readers to apply at the various circulating libraries for the means of affording themselves a few hours' of certain amusement by the perusal of these volumes. The sketches are numerous and diversified,—being devoted to eminent men in the several branches of the law, the bookelling and publishing departments, the world of literature, &c., &c. In his sketch of Mr. Robert Owen (the founder of the Socialists), Mr. Grant has taken the opportunity of refuting the practical doctrines of the new sect instituted by that gentleman; and this he has done in a very able manner. Mr. Grant thus speaks of Socialism:—

"Happily the degrading and destructive system of Socialism is already tottering to its base. The accidental promiscuity with which it was lately, through Parliamentary proceedings and otherwise brought into notice, threw a momentary cold around it; but that has now passed away, and those who were, for the moment seduced from a higher, and happier, and better faith, are abjuring the Socialist creed, and deserting the Socialist temples. In so far as London is concerned, we look on Socialism as virtually entombed, never, we trust, to be exhumed. We have ourselves lately seen Mrs. Martin, the most popular of its metropolitan missionaries, wasting her eloquence on audiences not exceeding two dozen in number. In fact, she has been obliged to give up her series of Sunday afternoon lectures at Theobald's-road, because she could get nobody to listen to them."

The first sketch in the work under notice is that of Prince Albert, of whom Mr. Grant thus speaks:—

"Prince Albert is a man of great and varied accomplishments. He is intimately acquainted with several sciences. To natural history he is particularly partial. He formally studied it, if my information be correct, under some of the most distinguished philosophers in Germany. His taste in the fine arts is admitted on all hands to be refined in no ordinary degree."

We here take leave of Mr. Grant's very entertaining volumes, and repeat our recommendation to all our readers to make themselves acquainted with the "Sketches of Public Characters."

Chronicles of Life. By Mrs. C. B. Wilson. 3 vols. post 8vo. London: T. and W. Boone.

THREE very entertaining volumes introduce the reader to another lady-aspirant to the honours of a novelist. Mrs. Wilson, from whose pen have emanated some of the most charming lyrics that have appeared in print for many years, has now given evidence of great capacities as a prose writer. Her delineations of character are touched with a delicate pencil, but the outlines are true to nature. Her ideas are original, and often beautiful, breathing, in her prose, the spirit of her poetry, and vested with a charm which fixes them in the memory. It does not always follow that a poet will write pleasing prose; but in Mrs. Wilson's case the general rule is not deviated from. This lady evidently writes fluently—currente calame; and thus there is nothing awkward nor forced in her style. Neither is her prose too much crowded by the imagery of poetry. On the whole Mrs. Wilson has been eminently successful in this work; and we doubt not that this opinion will be shared by contemporary reviewers. As the biographer of the Duchess of St. Albans and "Mont" Lewis—as the authoress of a "Volume of Lyrics"—and as the editress of "The Belle Assemblée," Mrs. Wilson was already known to fame. "The Chronicles of Life" will however enable her to take a higher stand in the world of literature.

The Northern Temperance and Reckabite Almanack for 1841. 12mo. pp. 24. Newcastle-upon-Tyne: J. Newcastle; London: J. Pasco.

THIS is a very useful and well-arranged publication, and will doubtless be found in the possession of every Teetotaler. It contains the usual calendar for the year and all the miscellaneous information given in Almanacs. In addition to these characteristic features, it is enriched with much valuable information and moral doctrine connected with the great cause of Teetotalism.

The Lion's Den. By JOHN E. DARWIN. No. 1. 8vo. pp. 8. London: B. Steil.

THIS periodical work is written by an author whose unhappy case at the Mansion-House some weeks ago excited universal sympathy. On that occasion Alderman Gibbs behaved with the utmost kindness and humanity, and deserves the gratitude of all literary men for his benevolence to one of their brethren. The "Lion's Den" is very well written, and only requires to be known to become a favourite. We sincerely hope that it will be patronised for the sake of the struggling author, who is endeavouring to obtain an honest livelihood by means of his pen. We could quote several really clever passages; but our limits unfortunately preclude the possibility of extract for the present.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BRADFORD.

MR. LEIGHS has lately been giving some lectures in this town, at the place where the votaries of the new doctrine of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors are in the habit of assembling; and these lectures have produced a very beneficial effect. On one occasion Mr. Leighs was opposed by a heavy-headed old man (we had nearly written the word "sinner"), who pretended that a drop of home-brewed beer was good for the working-man's breakfast. This old gentleman expatiated upon the "waste of time" occasioned by the process of preparing tea or coffee for a meal, and declared that our ancestors a couple of hundred years ago were much happier than we, because they drank beer instead of Boker or Mocha. Mr. Leighs observed that "this gentleman put a halter round his own neck and then drew the noose tight," inasmuch as he had furnished the grounds of argument against himself. Much valuable time is lost in manufacturing alcoholic liquors,—then, in meeting together to partake of them at public-houses,—and, lastly, on account of the lassitude produced by excess. Mr. Leighs also observed that a vast amount of land was used to grow barley for the malster, whereas it would be much better disposed of in growing corn to make bread for the poor.

The gentlemen who presided at the teetotal meetings, on the five nights of Mr. Leighs' lectures, were the Rev. T. OSGOOD, and MASSIELAS KENTON, BAINS, GRAINGS, and BEALMONT.

TOWN NEWS.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Head Quarters.

The meeting on Wednesday evening, Nov. 4th, at the chapel in Aldersgate street was admirably attended, and the addresses of the several advocates, who appealed to the audience in favour of the doctrine of teetotalism, were productive of the most beneficial effects.

On Friday evening, Nov. 6th, a member's meeting of the United Temperance Association was held at the chapel, for the renewal of cards and the dispatch of business. We take advantage of this opportunity to publish a few extracts from the address of the committee of the United Temperance Association to the public:—

"The principles which we profess, and are solicitous to promulgate to the fullest extent, are dawning not only upon our beloved country—the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland—but on distant lands; producing a change in the condition of mankind, both mental and corporeal, of such beneficial tendency as no pen can portray, and as the warmest imagination alone can depict.

"Impressed as we are with the imperious necessity of extending those principles by every legitimate means, it is with much pleasure and confidence that we now appeal to a benevolent public, to aid and assist us by their subscriptions. The opening of places for public meetings necessarily entails on the Society much expense, more than can be borne by the members of the respective districts, they being principally composed of individuals from the working classes. The gratuitous distribution of tracts is also attended with great outlay,—inasmuch as they are not circulated, as in other Societies, on the loan principle.

"It has long been a subject of deep concern with the Committee, that there should be a class of individuals who are outcasts from society, and beyond the pale of every benevolent institution, namely, the Drunkard and his family, whose poverty and distress have generally been thought the just retribution of Providence; but however correct this may be as it respects the parents, it cannot apply to the innocent children, who, of all persons, suffer most unjustly, being deprived of their inheritance,—the benefits of education, the means of obtaining a livelihood, and, in too many instances, the necessities of life. It is, therefore, with feelings of pleasure they inform the public, a system of visitation to the abodes of the intemperate is being organized; which promises to remedy this injustice, and alleviate a vast amount of human suffering. The means adopted are, Weekly Visits to the abodes of misery, Tract Distribution, supplying Tickets for Bread, Meat, and Clothing, and the procuring of situations for such as are, by the Visitors, deemed worthy.

"It is our duty to give some faint outline of what we have undertaken, and of the extent of the work in hand still to be done. For still there are 600,000 drunkards in the United Kingdom;—still there are nearly 60,000 persons annually cut off by the habitual use of intoxicating Liquors;—still there are £50,000,000 squandered every year on these drinks;—still there are countless thousands of unfortunate females in the British dominions, the majority of whom are the victims of inebriety and its attendants—filth, disease, and crime;—still are the deadly effects of intemperance seen in our Prisons, Hulks, Mad-houses, Poor-houses, and Hospitals; and in the dwelling of the wife and children of the Mechanic.

"The only effectual plan for checking the torrent of intemperance,—for other plans have been adopted and tried, but have invariably failed,—is that of Total Abstinence from the use of intoxicating drinks; and, for the further inculcation of these principles, this Association has been formed, and a Committee appointed of nearly 100 Advocates of the system.

"To the philanthropist and moralist, we appeal for aid and support, assuring them that the progress of the cause will materially lessen their contributions for Police, Poor Rates, Hospitals, Lunatic Asylums, and Charitable Institutions. We state this very confidently as a fact which cannot be refuted."

Chelsea Auxiliary.

The members of this powerful society hold their weekly meetings, every Thursday evening, at the New Hall, 56, George-street, Chelsea. The Committee has spared no expense in rendering this assembly-room one of the most attractive and convenient in London.

Marylebone Branch.

The cause of Teetotalism is thriving well with the members of the Marylebone district, and many gentlemen and ladies of wealth and rank have lately been induced to join this society, which is one of the most important and respectable in the metropolis.

Kensington and Bayswater Branch.

If the most strenuous exertions on the part of the votaries of Teetotalism will be productive of beneficial effects, then we may predict a rapid and important change in the morals of the district within the range of which this Branch is propagating the doctrine.

Spitalfields and Bethnal-Green Branch.

The publicans in this neighbourhood are looking amazingly unhappy in consequence of the rapid spread of the principles of Teetotalism amongst those who have so long supported their miserable dens. A certain large white public-house in the Bethnal-Green-road has experienced a diminution of thirty per cent. in its receipts since the establishment of the Branch of the United Temperance Association in that neighbourhood.

Mr. HUDSON, THE TRAVELLING AGENT.

This able advocate of the grand doctrine of total abstinence, lectured, on the 28th of October, to a numerous audience at Oxford; and, at the conclusion of his address, one of the committee moved that the society of that city be "henceforth called the Oxford Auxiliary to the United Temperance Association." This motion was carried unanimously. Mr. HUDSON begs to acknowledge the receipt of the following donations to the parent society:—

Some gentlemen at Southampton	1	15	0
Mr. Smith, Witney	0	10	0
Mr. B. Blackwell, Oxford	0	10	0

QUEEN'S-BENCH PRISON.

An upper room in this prison has been prepared and fitted-up for a place of Teetotal Assembly, under the auspices of Mr. G. C. SMITH, and Mr. JOSEPH WEST (the Secretary to the "Teetotaler's Prison Missionary Society"). The room was opened a few nights ago, and a numerous audience was addressed by Messrs. SMITH, JAMES, DAWSON, and PARRY (the zealous advocate from the principality of Wales.) We know of no place where the doctrines of Teetotalism are calculated to work more beneficial effects than in the Queen's-Bench Prison.

THEOBALD'S-ROAD.

Our readers will recollect that we lately alluded to the discussion between Mr. WARDEN and Mr. MACCONNELL, and that we expressed a hope that the former gentleman would favour us with a version of the particulars of that discussion, in order to ascertain how far the complaint of ill-treatment at the hands of the Teetotalers was well-founded on the part of the latter. We have received a letter from Mr. Warden; and hasten to lay the following extracts before the public:—

"Several articles in the newspapers having represented the Teetotalers to have been defeated by Mr. Macconnell, I at once sent that gentleman an invitation to meet me openly on the question of total abstinence from all stimulating and intoxicating drinks. It was accepted and equal terms were agreed upon.

"On Wednesday, October 21st, I met Mr. Macconnell at the Assembly Rooms, Theobald's-road. Mr. DOWD, a Teetotaler, was called to the chair, and the discussion commenced with very little interruption, not more so on one side than on the other. I opened the subject, and as Mr. Macconnell was about to close his reply, he stated, "that it was nonsense to talk of total abstinence; as well might persons talk of the superstition of Popery." The moment the last sentence was out of his mouth, a general expression of disapprobation ensued, and three persons in the garb of Irish labourers were highly excited. CAPT. AIRCHERL attempted to appease the audience; I and the chairman did the same without success; and the meeting broke up in disorder. Now I submit that every allowance ought to be made for the excitability of Irishmen. Mr. Macconnell apologised, but all to no purpose; his excuse was satisfactory to those persons who were on the platform, but did not appease the sensitive Irish. To condemn Teetotalers as a body for the conduct of a mixed assembly, is certainly a very convenient mode of getting rid of the question of debate. The men had no medal,—no external proofs that they were members of any Temperance Society; it is assumed they were Teetotalers, because they did not agree with my opponent. On the whole I should say that if blame rested anywhere, it is with Mr. Macconnell, who used the unfortunate expression. On the second evening my opponent interrupted me several times, so much so that Mr. HATHERINGTON, (a water-drinker of fourteen years or more) who was in the chair, requested him to forbear. Now I was not angry, neither did I use an unkind expression: our cause is too well founded upon sense and rectitude to need such an auxiliary; and I will challenge all London to shew that I used any harsh or ungentlemanly word throughout the two nights' debate.

"Thanking you, Sir, for your kind notice of my humble efforts in the great cause of national regeneration, (as "THE TEETOTALER" is the only publication that has deigned to record those exertions,) I remain yours, &c.

"B. WARDEN."

EAST LONDON CHARTIST TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

On Wednesday evening, Nov. 4th, this association held its weekly meeting at the Temperance Assembly-room, Church Row, Bethnal Green. The audience was addressed by Messieurs Booth, Ardrey, and Neesom, (the Secretary), on the necessity of the working classes abstaining from all intoxicating drinks, in order to assist themselves in obtaining their political rights.

The following resolutions were then proposed and carried:—

1. That this meeting do urgently recommend the perusal of The Teetotaler to all sects and parties.

2. That this meeting do congratulate the Teetotalers of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, for having pledged themselves to abstain from tobacco, snuff, and cigars, this meeting knowing that in many cases drunkenness is only one of the effects arising from the consumption of the above-named weed, and the filthy practice of using it is peculiarly calculated to threaten the adherence of many to the Teetotal pledge.

3. That these resolutions be forwarded to The Teetotaler, by the Secretary, for insertion.

VARIETIES.

RECONCILIATION.—King James VI. in order to reconcile two Highland chiefs, whose contests destroyed the peace of the country, got them both to Edinburgh, where he shut them up in the castle and left them to settle their disputes by themselves; companionship in affliction soothed their minds, and being tired of confinement they brought matters to a speedy issue; they promised good behaviour in future, and left their sons as hostages for their conduct.

And forbeir us nor skaths as we forbeir tham quha us. 7. And leed us na until timentation. 8. Butam fre us fra evil. Amen.

VANITY REPROVED.—After one of Dr. Johnson's publications, James Boswell, his biographer, on the first of the month, repaired, according to custom, to the lodgings of his idol, with the several magazines of the day, in order to read the strictures which were given on his performance. Having perused two or three criticisms, which were not of the most civil kind, the petulance of the Doctor got the better of his good sense, and he exclaimed peevishly, "Enough, enough, Sir, now you have taken infinite pains to bring an account of what is thought of me individually; give me leave to ask what you imagine the world says of you and me conjointly?"—"Upon my word, Doctor, I cannot pretend to say," answered Jimmy.—"Why then I'll tell you," continued the Doctor, "they say I am a mad dog, Sir, and that you are the canister tied to my tail."

REMARKABLE ESCAPE.—The celebrated political writer Thomas Paine was member for Calais in the National Assembly, after the French Revolution. When Robespierre came into power, he was arrested and carried to prison, no reason of any consequence being assigned for this harsh treatment. The event is thus recorded in his own words:—"One hundred and sixty-eight persons were taken out of the Luxembourg in one night, and a hundred and sixty of them executed the next day. Amongst this number my name was included; and the manner I escaped the guillotine is curious, having all the appearance of accident. The room in which I was lodged was on the ground floor, and one of a long range of chambers under a gallery, with the door opening outwards flat against the wall; so that, when it was open, the inside of the door appeared outward, and the contrary when it was shut. When persons by scores and hundreds were to be taken out of the prison for the guillotine, it was always done in the night; and those who performed that office had a private mark, by which they knew what rooms to visit and what number to take. The door of my room was marked one morning, unobserved by me, when it was open, and flat against the wall: being closed in the evening, the fatal line of chalk came inside, and thus the destroying angel passed by. A few days after this, Robespierre fell, and Mr. Monroe arrived to reclaim me, and to invite me to his house."—Extracted from Letter III. to the Citizens of the United States.

COLLIER, in his treatise on church music, says:—"Religious harmony should be grave, solemn, and seraphic; fit for a martyr to play, and an angel to hear." This opinion of Collier's being quoted in a party, where some ladies had been playing sacred music, a gentleman put the following question, and gave the solution:—

Are Collier's ideas of harmony clear,

Fit for martyrs to play, and angels to hear?

This night the reverse by each heart was averred:

They were angels that played, and martyrs that heard!

A New York paper has the following advertisement:—"PERPETUAL MOTION. The owner of the perpetual motion lately exhibiting at Boston, has absconded without paying the man who turned the crank in the cellar."

The Vermont Mercury has the following excellent defence lately made to an action by a down-east lawyer:—"There are three points in this case," says the defendant's counsel. "In the first place we contend that the kettle was cracked when we borrowed it; secondly, that it was whole when we returned it; and thirdly, that we never had it at all."

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE.—BY THE EDITOR.

PERIOD II.—CHAPTER XI.

A YEAR'S IMPRISONMENT.

WE left Melville in the midst of a gloomy reverie in consequence of the debauch which he had committed on the first night of his sojourn in the Fleet-prison, and the loss he had experienced at cards. The morning passed away; and, to his astonishment, Louise did not make her appearance. At first he thought that the process of disposing of the furniture probably delayed her; but as hour after hour slipped away, he gradually became uneasy, and feared that some accident had befallen her. It never struck him that she had been entrapped into the power of the ruffian whom he himself had introduced to her; and the agony of suspense soon became too acute for a mind, that was enervated by habits of intoxication, to bear. He partook of no breakfast; but towards the middle of the day he joined the three individuals, who had plundered him on the preceding evening; and with them he began to drink again, to drown his cares!

The evening came, and still Louise did not return to him. He was however so happy with his three boon companions, that he no longer suffered himself to be annoyed by her absence; but he sat smoking a pipe of tobacco, and drinking beer out of a pewter pot with those "friends," who did not choose to disburse the coin of which they had plundered him on the preceding evening, in the purchase of wine. Melville was completely denuded of all pecuniary resources; and, had not the gentleman without a coat regaled the whole party upon beef-steaks and fried onions in his own room, our hero would have lacked a supper. As it was, this was the only meal of which he partook during that day. Again did he retire to his couch in a state of complete inebriation; and again did he awake with an insupportable headache, a dreadful depression of spirits, and a flushed countenance.

He was now nearly alarmed at the protracted absence of Louise, and resolved to despatch a messenger to the cottage in the country to ascertain the cause of the delay in her appearance at the prison. He was compelled to apply to one of his three acquaintances for the loan of a few shillings to pay the messenger, who, in pursuance of a prevalent custom in the Fleet, insisted upon being remunerated in advance: and the stout gentleman, under the hope of reaping enormous interest for the loan, did not hesitate to accommodate our hero with it. The messenger accordingly departed upon the commission entrusted to him; and Victor resumed the pipe and the pot in the society of the three gentlemen whose delectable acquaintance he had formed. Gone was all his enthusiasm in the cause of literature,—quenched was the aspiring sentiment of emulation which had formerly taught him to soar upon the pinions of a meritorious ambition,—departed was all the elevated tone of a mind which nature had endowed with her choicest gifts!

The messenger returned in the afternoon, with the tidings that the cottage was closed, and that none of the neighbours could say what had become of Mrs. Melville. Our hero had drunk too deeply to pay very particular attention to this report; but it was not lost upon his companions. They immediately assumed a cold and distant manner towards Melville, and soon found an excuse to leave him entirely to his own society. The truth is, that these gentlemen, with the worldly-mindedness which is to be found in prisons as well as elsewhere, immediately entertained the notion that Melville's wife had deserted her dissipated husband—never to return; and, as they supposed that he was entirely dependent upon her for pecuniary resources, they now conceived that there was no further chance of his purse being replenished. Melville soon perceived their coolness towards him, and, in his sober moments, was not backward in divining the motive.

His condition was now desperate in the extreme. Poverty stared him in the face; and the dread idea, that he was deserted by the only being who loved him, haunted his imagination. He wrote to several of those friends at the West End, who had partaken of his luxurious repasts in the days of his prosperity, to request the loan of a few guineas or the return of monies which he himself had advanced them; but his letters either experienced a contemptuous silence or a formal refusal. Even those, on whose friendship he had chiefly relied, now forgot him in the hour of his adversity; and the grim—gaunt—suicidal form of Want stared him in the face, haunted his footsteps by day and night in the long dark galleries of the Fleet, and reduced him to the most dire necessities. He however continued to obtain his fill of liquor;—the little money he raised by pledging his wearing apparel, or by the thousand and one means by which men in such circumstances do obtain a few shillings from time to time—how, they themselves scarcely know;—this little money, we say, was all expended upon beer and tobacco. For whole days did he live upon a crust—in order that he might steep his senses in the narcotic influence of malt-poisons! And still Louise did not make her appearance, to recal him back from this career of misery and degradation!

And now, behold our hero reduced to the lowest condition to which the drunkard can be abased. Ragged in his attire—with slouched hat, broken shoes, a waistcoat buttoned up to the chin to conceal the filthy linen beneath—blear-eyed, bloated in countenance, nervous and shuffling in his walk,—with shaking hand, unshaven beard, uncombed hair, and dirty face,—skulking about as if he were ashamed to meet those strangers whom curiosity frequently induces to visit the debtors' gaols,—and seeking companionship only in the pipe and the pewter-pot, Victor Melville was one of those specimens of humanity to which the misanthrope would point, in his cynical irony, as an example of the depth of degradation to which it is possible for once proud man to fall!

But if you wish to impregnate the foundations of a mighty empire, or the elevated mind of man, with the principles of ruin, implant in them the habit of intemperance, and the wished-for ruin will not be long ere it reaches its consummation!

Melville seemed to take no date of time. His mornings were marked by the headache and the miserable reflections which invariably succeeded the nights of debauch; and those nights were periods when an almost total oblivion of all cares, past or present, seemed to take possession of his mind. He ceased to become excited with liquor;—the effect it now produced upon him was a brutal stupefaction. In that lethargy were absorbed all good feelings—all hopes of release or reform—all love for the absent wife and child—all self-respect—all reference to the past—all thought for the present—all plan for the future—all joy, all grief, all sentiment! He became an automaton, that rose at the same hour—proceeded to the same tap-room at the same period—sat in the same dingy nook for the same number of hours as before—and returned to a dirty chamber, to stretch himself upon a bed which was not made, at the same hour in the evening! He seldom spoke to a soul, and never addressed any one first: his glance was vacant and stupid—his habits became distressing through their very monotony—and he was soon pointed out to all strangers as one of the curiosities of the prison!

But a grand physical change was taking place in that young man. The robust health of youth was gradually yielding to the fatal habits of dissipation which he had so early imbibed, so strenuously persisted in, and so fearfully amplified; and it was easy to perceive in the sunken eyes, the nervous movements, the shuffling step, and the trembling hand, of the once attractive and fascinating Victor Melville, that Intemperance was preparing to offer up another holocaust to the accursed shrine of the Genius of Human Misery.

He had been a year in the Fleet-prison,—and for days and weeks together had he ceased to remember that the absence of his wife was as yet unaccounted for. He was now so degraded in his habits and appearance, and so reduced in circumstances by dissipation, that he was compelled to perform the most menial offices for the more wealthy portion of the prisoners, to obtain the few pence which supplied him with the means of subsistence. At length he became so weak and enfeebled, that it was with the utmost difficulty his trembling limbs conducted him from his own miserable chamber to the place where the beer was sold. One morning he found himself so much worse that he was unable to rise from his couch; and now, for the first time for a long—long while, he felt anxious on account of his forlorn condition. He had no friend to place the cup of water to his parched lips; and this painful idea brought to his mind the image of his Louise. He wondered how he could have so long supported her unaccountable absence; and, in a moment of indescribable agony—a moment in which all the smothered reminiscences of many months were evoked to life and energy again,—he called for the being whom he knew should be there to tend him in his misery and sickness.

"O Louise—Louise!" he exclaimed aloud,—"where are you? Why have you deserted me? Where is my boy? Oh! you do not answer!"

Scarcely had the words escaped his lips, when, by one of those strange coincidences which frequently occur in human life as well as in the pages of the novelist, the door of his wretched apartment was thrown open, and Louise—followed by a venerable old gentleman, and leading her little boy in her hand—hastened into the presence of her husband.

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE ADVANTAGES OF TEETOTALISM.

Or the immense direct benefits resulting from the Teetotal reformation, none who have perused the statistics of intemperance and of temperance can be ignorant; and thanks to the almost super-human efforts of some of the advocates of Teetotalism, none can now be destitute of the means of this information. Its incidental advantages have been less considered. Peruse the tracts, circulars, and periodicals of temperance, and observe what an amount of intellect and talent has been called into action, and in some degree into existence, by these great efforts.

The benevolent affections, to even a greater degree than the powers of the body or the intellect, are strengthened by exercise and debilitated by inaction. Every generous feeling cherished in the heart, leaves its visible foot-prints upon the character. And therefore each one of the disciples of temperance in this nation, if he have but done his duty, will have found himself the better man, in other respects, for the exercise.

It promises immense benefits to the manufacturing interests of our country. It has been a thousand times remarked, and as often deplored, that mechanics everywhere were peculiarly liable to the besetments of intemperance. Let all our manufacturers become sober men, and give us only the benefit of the duty which intemperance levies upon the manufacturers of other nations, and no greater protection for English industry need be asked for.

Teetotalism tends to wear off the asperities of national prejudice, and promotes national sympathy, by the intercourse of great and good men of different countries, engaged in the same benevolent enterprise. If diversity of political character and institutions, and a supposed conflict of interests, have, in times past, estranged the nations of the civilized world; who does not perceive, and rejoice in the consideration, that all such feelings of unkindness are hastening to oblivion? And is it not manifest that efforts for the advancement of temperance, have contributed largely to this benign result? It was the fortune of America to become the pioneer in this great movement; and the temperance reformation in herself, like a noble and virtuous deed by an individual, has aided to extend her acquaintance and exalt her character among the nations. And when the friends of Teetotalism in England look abroad, they are cheered by the indications of that cordial co-operation in a benevolent cause, which, among nations as well as individuals, always eventuates in reciprocal friendship.

And all these advantages, and many others, are and will be secured by the temperance reform, without any countervailing loss. Will it be replied, that to abolish the drinking of ardent spirit, does involve a loss, by subverting at least one subject of profitable industry? It were as rational to talk of profitable industry in heaping up vegetable putrefaction and collecting its pestilent miasm to regale the sense of smelling, provided mankind were mad enough to purchase and use it—of profitable industry, in grafting the shoots of the Bohon Upas upon the branches of the Tree of Life! However guiltless, example, habit, and the absence of information and reflection may once have rendered this species of industry, it is one which, in this day of light and knowledge, is utterly indefensible, and devolves upon all who are concerned in it fearful responsibilities. The manufacturer of ardent spirit, not unfrequently becomes one of its most signal victims. He is engaged in a branch of productive labour, which exposes consumers and producers to the perils both of the first and second death! Charity herself cannot for a moment defend or palliate such an employment. No eventual profit can result from such pernicious industry. Our merchants are rapidly becoming convinced, that even their gains are not increased, by dealing out the great source of poverty and insolvency to their customers. They perceive more clearly that the various interests of a community are like the limbs of the natural body—that one cannot be wounded by another without morbid reaction and sympathetic disease. Alcohol may indeed be useful to man, as a menstruum for varnish, to fill a lamp, or to construct a thermometer; but it has been proved by experiments the most satisfactory, that its effect as a drink upon the human body is unmixed evil. Our moral, intellectual, and corporeal powers are composed of a multitude of separate but co-operating functions, depending for their proper action in the human system, upon being nicely and accurately balanced. What then but disease and derangement can result, from habitually pouring in amongst them this essence of distraction? And what are the well-known practical effects of this habit? First, and perhaps prior to a single instance of actual intoxication, the temper becomes irritable and unequal; the mind, subject alternately to feverish excitement and deadly expression, is wholly incapable of systematic or useful application. Then supervene the inflamed eyes, the blistered lips, and the cutaneous eruptions—external signals that the bodily functions are desperately warring against a foreign invader. Finally, the elements of the whole man, body and spirit, are involved in conflict and commotion; some weak point in the constitution yields; and, sooner or later, the self-destroyer passes off, through some one of the many appropriate avenues, from a wretched sublimity existence into a hopeless hereafter! Many, it is true, have been blessed with constitutions which have endured to an advanced age, not in consequence, but in spite of tipping; but how many more, of those even, who have resorted to the stimulating bowl, as a fancied means of improving their physical health, have found themselves suddenly grasped by an irresistible appetite, and hurried through the long catalogue of a drunkard's diseases, and through a drunkard's infamy, into an early grave! Vitality—wonderful vitality may be impaired, but cannot be patched out and enlarged with such miserable materials. In a temperate and healthful individual, ardent spirit excites a delusive stimulation, ever followed by a sensible decay of vital energy: and as for the drunkard, to call its maddening effects on him life—animation—were to slander one of the most mysterious works of Heaven. The term would be as applicable to the spasms of a dead body under the action of the galvanic battery; leaving the subject, when its influence subsides, more dead, if possible, than before.

There are, it is true, those amongst us who still urge objections to the temperance reformation, which have been a hundred times refuted, with undiminished zeal. And where such objections are sincere, they are entitled to all kindness and consideration. But we shall not stop here, again to reply to them. Some there are, who eloquently insist upon the propriety of total abstinence from ardent spirit, but who merely object, strenuously, to the only possibly means by which it can be promoted. And shall we incur much hazard of uncharitableness by asserting, that when you hear such an objector talk of "not parting with the right to do what he pleases with his own," you will arrive at his difficulty on this subject, not by citing facts or applying a syllogism, but by drawing a cork.

Leave that individual to himself; for he understands the controversy, has deliberately enlisted to the enemy, and is in the temperate fruition of the bonny: leave him to his wages—his breath to be perfumed by those delicious exhalations which arise from a brandy-tortured digestion; his visage, in due time, to be ornamented with carbuncles; and his fancy to be occupied with the bright visions of delirium tremens!

Although even now, in the very infancy of the temperance reformation, the signs of the times clearly indicate that it must and will ultimately prevail. Look throughout the world at the millions of individuals enrolled and pledged to total abstinence. This is the GRAND ARMY OF TEMPERANCE. Example, alarming truth, and powerful persuasion are its weapons. Millions of tracts and periodicals, flying to every nation, and kindred, and family, are its expresses. Countless treasures, wrested from the pernicious purposes of the enemy, multitudes of his captives re-captured, and greater multitudes preserved from worse than Egyptian bondage, are its trophies of victory. "DELIVERANCE TO MANKIND," is inscribed upon its banner. Its commission is in the great name of Public Opinion, the absolute, executive sovereign of the moral empire of the universe. The most powerful, but now cowering Auxiliary of the Spirit of Evil, is its enemy. And the whole world is its field of action—and who can doubt that it will finally and universally triumph!

How impressive is the moral sublimity of the great combined movement of nations in the cause of temperance, which we now behold! And where, in the history of man, is there a parallel for such a scene? Multitudes, ere now, have conspired to do evil. Nations have leagued together for the purposes of violence and oppression, and, in solemn mockery, have termed that league a "Holy Alliance." But when before has there been such a concert of action to accomplish a great moral purpose, by the exclusive agency of moral influence. This is indeed a Holy Alliance, which belies not its appellation. It is hallowed of Heaven, which has enjoined and blesses the virtue it seeks to promote;—hallowed by the prayers and aspirations of the good on earth; hallowed by the tears of affliction, which it has caused to be wiped away; and by the tears of joy and the smiles of hope and comfort, which its visitations of mercy have excited. May this Alliance be perpetual, and extend to and embrace the uttermost parts of the earth!

A SCENE IN A GIN-PALACE.

[THE ensuing scene in one of the metropolitan dens of iniquity called "gin palaces," is extracted from the new novel of "ROBERT MACAIRE."]

It was in the Haymarket Street that Bertrand found himself, after having made a precipitate retreat from the theatre, at about the hour of half-past nine. He knew not exactly what was the cause of his alarm; but he felt afraid to return to the scene where so much confusion had been created by Macaire. Indeed, his singularly constituted mind entertained a vague suspicion that Macaire must have been endeavouring to pick the pocket of Miss Leslie, when that young lady gave vent to so terrible a scream as that which drove him from the theatre. He accordingly deemed it prudent to refresh himself with a short stroll up the street, and suffer his friend to extricate himself from his supposed dilemma in the best way that he could.

Bertrand strolled into an adjacent public-house, or gin-shop, in the first place, to avoid any danger of pursuit, in case Macaire's behaviour should have involved him in any difficulty; and, in the second place, to recruit his courage by means of a quiet drop of brandy. He entered the place where this article was to be obtained, and a most singular scene broke upon his view. On a bench placed against the wall that faced the bar where liquor was drawn, sat a gentleman of about forty, elegantly dressed, and wearing a profusion of rings upon his fingers. By his side was another gentleman, somewhat younger, but equally well-attired, although not bearing so large a fraction of a jeweller's shop about his person. These two individuals were drinking porter from a pewter pot, which they familiarly passed every now and then to the females, cads, and blacklegs, by whom they were surrounded.

"A pot of your best ale, Bill," cried one of these gentlemen, addressing himself to the man at the bar; and when it was poured out, he said to a dirty, ragged-looking fellow, who stood grinning by his side, "Now, my boy—drink that off at a draught, and I'll give you a five-pound note; if I don't damme."

"Go it, my pippin," exclaimed the younger gentleman of the two: "but recollect, you must not stay to draw breath."

"Of course not," said he who had first spoken, laying a bank-note upon one end of the bench. "Now, then, my tulip."

The man who was thus metaphorically adjured, raised the pot to his lip;—the ale had a most delicious smell, and he was thirsty. He glanced towards the gentlemen; he then looked towards the bank-note; the latter had a most inviting appearance, and he was very poor. Hesitation was impossible: he began the draught, he drank every drop of the excellent ale—and the promised reward was immediately handed over to him. Lord Brandyford and Mr. Augustus Mirliflor (such were the names of the two gentlemen who got up this elegant little piece of amusement by way of opposition, we must suppose, to the diversions of the theatre over the way) did not fail to applaud the feat; the former declaring that the man was "a regular trump;" and the latter ratifying with a terrible oath his conviction that "the fellow was as down as a hammer."

"Now, I tell you what, old chap," cried his lordship after a pause (noblemen can be very condescending and polite when they choose), "I'll give you a five-pound note for every pot of porter that you'll drink at a draught in the same way as you did the ale;" and, as he spoke, Lord Brandyford took from his pocket a number of notes and play-bills all jumbled together. The man accepted the offer: another pot of beer was handed to him; and a second bank-note soon found its way to his pocket.

"Well," said the man, "this here is a verry easy an' pleasant vey of earnin' money: I'm ready to repeat the dose as soon as ye like."

"Cut along," cried his lordship.

"Never say die," ejaculated Mr. Mirliflor.

Another pot of beer was supplied; a crowd of ragged rascals, amongst whom coal-heavers might have styled themselves gentlemen without much fear of contradiction, gathered round the party; the man became the hero of the group; and he did not hesitate to tackle another pot. But no sooner had he poured it all down his throat, and had conveyed the conditional reward to his pocket, when he fell senseless upon the floor. Lord Brandyford rushed forward and hastened to raise him; but the man was a corpse!

THE WINES OF THE MODERNS.

THE poets of the thirteenth century never speak of spiced wines without rapture. They considered it the master-piece of art to be able to combine in one liquor the strength and flavour of the wine, with the sweetness of honey and the perfumes of the most costly aromatics. A banquet at which no piment was served would have been thought wanting in the most essential article. It was even allowed to the monks in the monasteries on particular days in the year. But it was so voluptuous a beverage, and was deemed so unsuitable to a profession which had forsworn all the pleasures of life, that the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle (A. D. 817) forbade the use of it to the regular clergy, except on days of solemn festivals.

The varieties of piment in use were the Hippocras and Clarry: the former was either red or white, and the latter was a claret or mixed wine with honey, both seasoned with aromatics.

In the reign of Edward the Third a fleet of above two hundred merchantmen came for wines from England to Bordeaux, then the seat of the Black Prince's government. In the same age, the wines of the Rhine and of the Moselle appear to have been largely imported. Malmesyn was much employed at this period; it was named from Malvagia in the Morea, whence our Malmsey grape originally came. But in the succeeding reign the strong wines of Spain had certainly also found their way largely into English use, notwithstanding the knightly abhorrence of the country and its potatoes. In the sixteenth century the milder growths of France totally superseded the wines of Spain. In the time of Louis the Fourteenth, all commercial intercourse with France was suspended; and the red wines of Portugal flowed into the empty conduits of the Bordeaux trade. Then came the reign of Port, and the "Methuen treaty."

The introduction of the wines of Madeira into this country is of more modern date than the Oporto trade. With regard to the wine called Claret in this country, it is nearly all fabricated for the English market, and is a vile adulteration of the genuine product of the Medoc district, mingled with the rougher growth of the Palus. The Rhenish wines are chiefly produced in the countries on the course of the Rhine, between Mentz and Coblenz. The best vintages of those species are however confined to a small district called Rhinegao, and to the vineyards of Hockheim. Hence the Generality of Rhenish wines are denominated in England by the name of Hock.

As the production of Alcohol is the result of the spirituous fermentation, that wine is generally considered the best which contains most alcohol. Of all substances susceptible of the spirituous fermentation, none is so capable of being converted into a wine, which is for the most part admired, as the juice of the grapes of France. The Malaga and other Spanish wines destined for England, are more spirituous than those sent to Paris, because the exporters, knowing the taste of the English, take care to add brandy. For the same reason they never put Port wines into casks without a twelfth part of brandy, the principal consumption of them being in England.

Wines are cleared by processes carried on by means of isinglass made from fish or from bones, whites of eggs, powdered gum, sugar-candy, lambs-blood, and many other articles, which cause the wine to perform a chemical operation, that however varies in its effects with different wines.

The vitiated taste of modern wine-bibbers has induced vintners to devise a thousand schemes for varying the peculiar flavours of wine; and these schemes have necessarily led to the most nefarious systems of adulteration, which, although they may be legitimately denominated "cases of slow poisoning," still do not constitute a criminal offence. Sugar-of-lead and even arsenic are used by wine-merchants in their transmutation or adulteration of white wines; and every species of foreign produce, in the shape of the insidious liquor, is imitated by them in their diabolical establishments. We envy not the reflections of the wine-merchant, when he recalls to his memory the base artifices and death-dealing stratagems to which he has recourse in order to accomplish his schemes of adulteration or transmutation.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE PLEDGE-RING.

By Mrs. C. B. Wilson, Author of "Chronicles of Life," &c. &c.

Give but a ring—a simple ring—
'Tis all the pledge I ask;
And as time creeps on weary wing,
'Twill cheer life's gloomy task!
When thou art absent, 'twill recall
Thine image to my view,
In lonely scene, or crowded hall,
And bid me think thee true!
Then, give a ring—a simple ring,
Whose magic power shall last
Like Eastern talisman, and bring To Memory's eyes the past!
Give but a ring—a simple ring;
The gift I will retain;
Till Death's chill mist around me cling,
Through scenes of bliss, or pain;—
In sorrow it will yield relief
To think thy heart is mine;
And make the hour of joy, tho' brief,
With brighter radiance shine!
Then give a ring—a simple ring,—
No costly gem I ask;
Affection's talisman, 'twill bring
New strength for every task.

LINES.

By Sir John de Beauvoir, Bart.

[Written on receiving a seal which exhibited Cupid in a boat on the ocean, steering towards a star; underneath the motto, "If I lose you, I am lost."]

Hear'st thou guide thy bark, and gales propitious speed,
If I should lose thee, I am lost indeed:—
Strange paradox—but no less strange than true,
I'm lost to lose thee, lost unless I do!
Why born to feel—why with conceptions glow,
To fancy more than nature can bestow;
In traces to rove—to view the clouds up-fur'd,
And enter heav'n's bright visionary world;
From the unearthly dream, ah! then to wake
And feel the chill of life my senses shake—
To know my star is gone—Love's pilot fled—
Cold Reason left to guide me in his stead!
Away, love's barque, and put me out of pain,
For should I see thy sails, I'm mad again.
Must I then follow Reason—sober friend—
And try to banish thought, to hard fate bend,
To life's dear treasure must I bid adieu?
Alas! "If I lose thee, I am lost too!"

NOTES UPON INTEMPERANCE. No. VIII.

The tithes of each parish in Wales are divided into small parcels, and let once a year by auction. In the morning part of the auction day, the owner of the tithe, or his agent, whether bishop, rector, perpetual curate, or vicar, gives a dinner or treat to the persons who are paying for the last year's tithe. After the money has been received, and while they are at dinner, or else engaged with pipes, punch, and ale, the persons in another room, where the auction is to take place, are plied with ale, tobacco, and punch, until sufficient excitement is produced. The auctioneer is brought forth—different parcels are set up, lot by lot; every person bidding for a lot is provided with liquor to drink, and many a one is surprised, on the following morning, on being congratulated as the purchaser of one, two, or three parcels of tithes.

Distillation is a sinful waste of grain. It is perverting into a poison that production of nature which is intended to be used as a wholesome food.

A government cannot long hope to derive a revenue at all from a worthless, wretched, and drunken population, made so by its own enactments; for, not to mention the adverse influence of intemperance on the industry, economy, and wealth of a people, it invariably lays waste those moral principles which are the stability and form the perennial source of wealth to any people.

An operative who spends 8*l.* sterling a year in ardent spirits, consumes grain to the amount of 2*l.*; hence, in this expenditure 2*l.* are all that pass to the farmer, a proportion of which is given to the landlord for rent; but were this same operative to purchase an adequate supply of proper food for his family with this 8*l.*, the increased consumption, not only of the commoner articles, such as meal and potatoes, but of cheese, butter, butcher's meat, &c., would put 6*l.* out of the 8*l.* into the farmer's pocket instead of 2*l.*

From the experience government has had, it cannot now plead ignorance of the evil character and effect of alcoholic liquors. There is no sounder maxim, either in theological, moral, or physical science, than that the invariable tendency of anything must be held decisive of its real character; and when all observation and experience yield one unvarying testimony to the fact that the use of spirits destroys social order, domestic happiness, intellectual energy, and moral improvement, and that it never fails to spread temporal and eternal ruin among the people, it is the duty of the government to prohibit, and not to sanction,—to abolish instead of allowing—the manufacture, import, or sale of intoxicating liquors.

THE BRITISH EMPIRE IN THE EAST.

NO. II.—FORM OF GOVERNMENT, REVENUE, AND POPULATION.

The government of the Anglo-Indian Empire is vested:—1. In the parliament of Great Britain; 2. In the Court of Directors, chosen by the proprietors holding a certain amount of stock in the East India Company; 3. In the Board of Control, a ministerial authority; 4. In the Governor-General in India, who resides at Calcutta; and 5. In three other governors, one for each of the three remaining presidencies, Madras, Bombay, and Agra.

The governors are under the Governor-General in common, political, and military affairs; but are independent of him in administrative and local business.

The Court of Directors of the East India Company consists of twenty-four members, chosen by the proprietors. In order to be eligible, they must have at least two shares (at £1,000 each), and live in London. Of these twenty-four directors six retire every year by rotation, whose places are filled by new members. The Court of Directors choose within themselves a president and vice-president. The Court of Directors decide all questions by ballot and by a majority of votes. They have the initiative in all questions respecting India, as also the right of passing resolutions on every subject. These resolutions, however, before they can be put into execution, must be submitted to the approval of the Board of Control. The Court of Directors have also the right, when a vacancy occurs in the office of Governor-General, Governor, General of the Army of India, and of Councillor of State there, of proposing three names as candidates for the situation. This list is submitted to the Board of Control, and, if agreed to, goes to the Minister, who, in the Queen's name, appoints one of the three persons to fill the office. The Court of Directors themselves appoint all officers of the lower ranks for the management of the different branches of business within the East Indian Empire—as the administrative, judicial, and military; they consequently appoint all sub-lieutenants in the army, all clerks, and all inferior law officers. Advancements from these to higher degrees are all made, in India, by the Governor-General or the governors. These advancements are made partly according to seniority and partly according to ability, which is more attended to there than in this country.

The greatest power belongs to the Governor-General, who resides in India; which power, so long as it exists, is colossal, and cannot be compared with any other than of the Emperor of Russia, or with that of the Roman Proconsuls in Asia. The Governor-General has the right of declaring war, concluding peace, and of making treaties of commerce and alliance with all the neighbouring states of Asia and Africa. He has the right of pardoning, and the chief command over the land and naval forces. He may promote, as well as suspend, every civil officer throughout the East Indian Empire, the governors in Madras, Bombay, and Agra included. For the use of the government he may draw bills on the East India Company to any amount, which are always accepted.

The Governor-General appoints the residents placed at the durbars of the native Indian kings and princes, as well as all diplomatic agents to the different courts of the East: Ava, Siam, Cochin China, Tibet, Bockara, Herat, Cabul, Ethiopia, Muscat, &c. The budget for this diplomatic corps amounted in 1834 to 1,038,000 silver rupees. Among the residents four have a salary of 66,000 silver rupees yearly; those who have the least receive 36,000 silver rupees per annum. By the silver rupee is meant the Sicca rupee, worth about two shillings and a penny.

The Governor-General's salary is £36,000 a year; that of the Governors £12,000. The pension of the former depends on the Court of Directors, but has usually been, after seven years' service, £6,000 a year; that of the latter, on the same principle, £2,000.

To be appointed to a civil office, with a salary of £500, it is necessary to have resided at least three years in India; to be appointed to one of £1,500, six years' residence; for £3,000, nine years' residence; and for a place with £1,000 salary, twelve years' previous residence are necessary.

From the above brief statement, it may be concluded:—1. That those government affairs respecting India, which are decided in England, are conducted in a collegial form by the Court of Directors and the Board of Control, and that such as are decided in India are treated more in an absolute and executive form by the Governor-General. 2. That the proprietors are far from possessing an exclusive power over the East India possessions, and that this company cannot now be esteemed as anything more than a link, which is considered necessary between the British Crown and its subjects on the continent of Asia. 3. That these possessions consequently belong properly to the English Crown, and not to the East India Company.

As the maximum of the yearly revenue which the Company, according to the Act of Parliament, can raise from its possessions in India, is fixed at 5*l.* per cent. on the real value of the capital, £12,000,000, and an equally high interest can be obtained by other means, it cannot be said that the desire of gain, or wish to employ their capital to advantage, is the principal object of the proprietors. This is now rather in the patronage enjoyed by the Company, through the directors; that is to say, the right of appointing the lower officers as well in the army as in the civil and judicial departments, which gives the directors, and other great proprietors, an opportunity of putting out their younger relations and friends; and that in a way which may give them a reasonable income, a respectable rank in society, nay, even honour and riches. For the individual who enters the Company's service, these advantages are often dearly bought; after a long course of preparatory studies, among which is the learning of three Oriental languages (the Sanscrit, Hindoostanee, and Arabic), he is obliged, while still young, to leave his native country and his relatives, not to see them again for a considerable time; and when he does return to them, it is often with a broken constitution, worn out by the effects of the burning climate. He is obliged, if in the army, to submit to the severest discipline, and a constant residence in the camp or in the field; if in the civil department, to attain a high degree of knowledge and ability, without which no advancement can be obtained in the East India Company's service, which requires, in this respect, more than any other service in the world.

According to official statements laid before parliament, the gross revenue of the four presidencies in India, together with what are called the subordinate settlements (that is, the sums paid by the tributary states), during the fifteen years, ending 1828, 1829, was £311,083,400, making on an average £20,738,893 annually, of which the clear revenue (after deductions for costs of collection, &c.), amounted to about £19,000,000 annually.

In the latest year (1831-1832), of which there are specific accounts, they give the clear revenue as follows, namely:—

The land-tax	10,750,218

The charges for the same year, 1831-1832, were the following:—

The collection of the land-tax	1,544,154
Ditto customs	180,794
Management of the sale of tobacco	23,093

Revenue, as above	18,677,942
Charges, ditto	17,583,120
Surplus	£1,094,822

With this balance, £1,094,822, many of the expenses in England itself are paid. From what has been stated, it follows that the revenue may be reckoned at a medium of £20,000,000 sterling, which is two-fifths more than that of the whole Russian empire.

During the ten years between 1819 and 1829 the Company had suffered loss by their trade with Europe (England included), and this loss had risen to £200,000 a year; by their trade with China, on the contrary, they had gained nearly £1,000,000 a year; whence it follows that the clear gain of the Company, in trade, can be reckoned at £800,000 a year, which should be added to the above stated surplus of £1,094,822.

The population of the Anglo-Indian Empire is not known with certainty in all the provinces; it is, however, in most of them, and in all the principal ones, and may be estimated very nearly in the others.

The presidency of Bengal is one of those provinces the population of which is exactly known; it amounted in 1831, the last account, to 39,957,561, which may be expressed in round numbers at 40,000,000. The older provinces of the presidency of

Agra—Benares, Bareilly, and Delhi 50,000,000
The presidency of Madras 15,000,000
The presidency of Bombay 7,000,000

Total 112,000,000

The population of the states of the subsidiary and protectorate princes was estimated as follows for the year 1828:—

	Subjects.
The Nizam of Hyderabad has	10,000,000
The King of Oude	6,000,000
The Rajah of Nagpur	3,000,000
The Sultan of Mysore	3,500,000
The Rajah of Sattara	1,500,000
The Gulicwar in Baroda	2,000,000
The independent Seiks on the left bank of the Sutledge, under the protection of the Company	3,000,000
Travancore and Cochin	1,000,000
The numerous princes of the Rajpoots, together	16,000,000
The Jagardars in Bundelcund	1,500,000
Sciudia	4,000,000
Total	51,500,000

The population of the states still independent, within the Indian peninsula, is reckoned by Montgomery Martin at 5,500,000.

According to these separate calculations, of which the most important are founded on official statistical accounts, the population of India may be stated in round numbers at 200,000,000; from 100,000,000 to 112,000,000 of these are the Company's direct subjects; from 50,000,000 to 60,000,000 those of subsidiary or protectorate princes; and from 40,000,000 to 50,000,000 under the independent princes of India. In such an immense population, a few millions more or less are of little consequence, for millions in India answer to no more than thousands in Europe.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1840.

THE true philanthropist must hail, with feelings of the most unfeigned delight, the rapid increase of Youth's Teetotal Associations. Bright destinies and a glorious future await the new doctrine of total abstinence; and society will present a remarkable aspect of moral purity and intellectual cultivation, when it shall have entered upon that phase which will be characteristic of a generation of Teetotalers who imbibed the principle in their infancy. There are occasional relapses and backslidings at present, because every existing Teetotaler has become so from either a moderate drinker or a decided drunkard; and thus the palate, which has once tasted the insidious liquor, is not always proof against the vicinity of the temptation. But youths, who have had little or no acquaintance with the indulgence in strong liquors, are now forming themselves into Teetotal Associations; and, as they grow up, their children will be taught to be Teetotalers from their cradle. It is impossible for the mental vision of man, circumscribed as it is, to embrace with one glance all the grand effects which will attend upon so great a moral change in the habits of many millions of human beings. A race of men will spring up, who will have been educated by their parents in the principles of Teetotalism; and, as we are all more or less the creatures of circumstances—habits—education—and traditionary opinions, that race will acquire a decided antipathy to the use of intoxicating liquors. The palate will moreover assist this moral change, inasmuch as the habitual use of harmless potations would render alcoholic liquors nauseous to the taste, were they even taken medicinally or by way of experiment as to their attractive qualities. It is only by habit that we induce ourselves to relish strong drinks;—the child scarcely ever experiences a taste for wine or spirits; and many a youth forces himself to imbibe liquors, which are really revolting to his palate, in order that he may appear to imitate his companions. This fatal practice soon changes his distaste into a decided relish, and the relish into a craving for inebriating liquids.

Those parents, who may not choose themselves to relinquish the dangerous habit of partaking of strong drinks, should suffer their own infatuated predilection to be an energetic motive to induce them to rear their children in the doctrine of total abstinence. If they persist in an evil habit themselves, let them not entail upon their innocent offspring, by the mere effect of education and traditionary custom, that predilection which proves a more fatal legacy to its inheritor, than the garment of Dejanira. Let those parents, who have the interest of their children at heart, encourage them to join the Teetotal societies, and, instead of assailing them with rebuke or ridicule, encourage them to persevere in so salutary a principle. The streets will thus be relieved of many a frail daughter of crime; and the felon's gaol will not so frequently open its gates to receive the youth whose naturally noble energies have all been deadened by intemperance. Then shall the workhouse, the hospital, and the pawnbroker's establishment, no longer stand in invariable perspective in the pictures of humble life; and, when the cell shall no longer echo to the ravings of the maniac,—when the air of charitable institutions shall no longer be rendered pestilential by the breath of the dying drunkard,—when the artizan and the mechanic will be enabled to keep their clothes and their furniture in their own neat dwellings, instead of pledging them for the purchase-money of strong drinks,—and when the dens of the publican shall be closed, those parents, who induced their children to aid in effecting this grand work of moral reformation, will reap the reward of conscious rectitude, and experience the satisfaction attendant upon a virtuous system of conduct. But terrible shall be the death-bed reflections of that father, and that mother, who have encouraged, fed, and fostered—both by example and indulgence—the evil habit of intemperance in their children; for it is they who prepared those children to enter upon a wrong path,—it is they, who in the infancy of their offspring, might have bent the twig in an upright position, instead of permitting it, willow-like, to droop downwards,—and it is they who perpetuate a demoralizing, a degrading, and a ruinous predilection. Most assuredly is the parent responsible for the deeds of his children: the mind of a child is a blank sheet of paper upon which the father and the mother may either trace moral lessons or evil precepts; and no one, on any possible pretence, can divest himself of the responsibilities attached to the mere fact of paternity.

PERIODICAL LITERATURE.

BY "CRAVEN,"

Editor of the "Sporting Review."

In works professedly imaginative there is much less actual fiction than the general reader is likely to suppose. A world of books may be perused, and years of study expended, without the secret of composition revealing itself, which a brief noviciate of ink discloses. Fact has served for the foundation of the wildest tales of the novelist—the most extravagant fables of the writers of romance. Like Vulcan's handicraft on the gates of the palace of the sun, the workmanship exceeds the materials in most cases; nevertheless, however scanty the matter wrought from, it negatives the claim to pure originality. Creative genius is very rare; but there seems little reason why we should regret the scarcity of the talent. It is true we have few Frankenstein's of letters in these our days—none capable of giving existence to the wondrous imaginings with which the first quaffers of the Hippocrene were gifted; but therefore is there no cause to fear a literary famine. There are few who can banquet the fancy upon new and unknown rates of Parnassus; but there are scores who can cook up the old dishes with a flavour which, in the savoury Gallicism, "would make us relish our grandauns." Foremost amongst the compounders of such palatable condiments stands the phalanx of periodical writers;—not your reviewers who drench with verjuice or molasses—but the jovial crew of débonnaires, essayists who coruscate, in Magazine, Miscellany, or Weekly Journal. These worthies, like the good fairy in Cinderella, produce great effects from small causes. You shall read of hair-breadth 'scapes in vast caves and wild deserts, which haply are indebted for their origin to a benighted passage on Hampstead Heath—or a startling paper upon the North-West Passage, arising from the crowded state of the Pool on a return from a white-bait dinner at Black-wall;—and shall we on that account esteem their labours the less? Perish the thought! It was one of the lowest order of mollusca that furnished the model for the stately bark; and do we find in that any argument for despising the art which has brought together the uttermost parts of the earth?

It is questionable whether it would be possible to construct a narrative wholly ideal, with the necessary proportion of interest, within the limits to which the common run of periodical composition is restrained. The fashion now adopted in most works of that character goes far to support this position. Novels, in three stout volumes, "live, and move, and have their being," often in the pages of a magazine, their interest duly honoured by orders at thirty-one days' date. But contracts of that nature are only entered on with the Rothschilds of literature; it is their paper only that is thus accepted prospectively and in the gross; they alone are the privileged to fly their kites in Paternoster-row. Like all retail dealers, the small capitalists of letters are sadly curtailed in their operations: even their fraction of an ounce of history or fable must have its flavour, or they may at once shut up shop. Their lunar half-sheet must have its due proportion of parts, crowned with its climax, or pointed with its epigram.

The labours of the literary man are like those of the watchmaker—their difficulty is increased in proportion as the space allotted to their agency is limited. Yet this fact is little known, or at least little regarded, in quarters where you would expect to find it differently treated. In our great public schools, for instance, the length of the various compositions is regulated by the advanced grade of the classes, the lowest having their themes in verse confined to two lines;—imagine a subject propounded, marked out, and applied in a couplet! After this system (but of necessity, from the nature of their construction and limits) the economy of our periodicals is regulated. What then remains for the "small deer" that browse at the foot of the Muses' hill? Your guest at the table of the Nine will not content himself with something light and witty: he must have his portion of fact—a mouthful of substance, skilfully flavoured and tastefully garnished—"a pennyworth of bread to all his sack."

This, I say, is the principle upon which the mass of matter conventionally called imaginative, is constructed by these "minions of the moon" who occupy their business in periodical literature. How well such labour is accomplished is best learned from the universal popularity that attaches to the periodical productions of the present day. Many a sorry joke and scurvy pun, passed through the alembics of their brain, is re-issued, better than new! "What a figure would the moiety of 'eminent articles' cut, should any chance enable them to give to the world their own histories and origin!" said a commentator to me, as we were recently dealing with the talents of our modern essayists. "Much the same," was my rejoinder, "as the Madonnas of Rubens, were they to favour us with the memoirs of their origins." The reply, however, belonged rather to the manner of the observation than to its matter. Few illustrations of the monstrously absurd could be imagined such as similar revelation would supply; we have now before us the pages of one of the most refined and exquisitely pure creations which for years has graced the belles lettres of this country; if ever moral sentiment spake with an angel's voice, it is breathed in every thought of those elegant volumes; if ever woman were portrayed "with less of earth in her than heaven," that woman is the heroine. And under what circumstances were those sentiments generated? from what mould was that being of light and loveliness drawn? The former was giv-begotten in the garret of a pothouse in Kensington, the latter the doubly-polluted, Janus-defiled mistress and garret-sharer of the spiritual moralist!

THE DRUNKEN MINISTERS.

(Concluded.)

THE presentation of Mr. Macvicar to the parish of—, was not a decidedly unpopular appointment; it was at least tolerated even by the strict and pious of the people, who fondly hoped that although he did not entertain clear views of evangelical truth, yet that being naturally amiable, and his morals unimpeached, he might ere long, like many other eminent instances, which were quoted, be fully enlightened. Then as a man and a citizen of the world he was the favourite of all who had an opportunity to know anything of him. He was ever ready to lend his counsel, and grudged no personal services in behalf of the poorest or most despised. Nay, he was charitable to an improvident degree; nor, according to his constitutional nature and habits could he well be otherwise. All this was extensively known before he got a parochial living, and therefore no very stringent scrutiny was instituted concerning his piety, religious attainments, or general fitness for the holy ministry. Indeed whatever faults might attach to the case, lay principally at the door of the Presentee's father, of the patron, but especially of Mr. Macvicar himself. Neither of them, whether it concerned the choice of a profession, the qualifications necessary to a spiritual teacher—a parochial pastor, or the responsibilities incurred in promoting or making the appointment, ever seriously questioned themselves. Was it more than ought to have been anticipated then, that blessings did not appear to accompany or to follow the transaction?—that the presentee should be little else than a popular gentleman, but a most inefficient minister of the gospel?—that he should spend more time with his patron and in visitings and in being visited, than in his close? that, as he was learned, polished, witty, possessed of mainly fascinations, not only in respect of personal appearance and manners, but of elegant accomplishments, he should be courted by families and individuals in superior stations, to an intoxicating degree, or that he should become like unto those who so much delighted in his society, but who cared not a straw for the everlasting interests either of the pastor himself or of his flock? I must not forget to add that among his gifts was that of a fine and powerful voice, and also that of poetry; so that he not only sung with admirable effect, out was the songster of his own lyrics, which were of a superior order, taking either his plaintive and mellow pieces, or such as belonged to the sparkling school. He could fall into the manner of Burns or of Moore with amazing facility; but never with success so remarkable as in convivial compositions. Was it other than was to be expected that he should be wooed to grace and exultate the festive board, until it became in a measure his world; or that he should in the course of a few years become a jolly companion to country gentlemen, or the noblest in the district, and an expert toper like the best convivialists amongst them all?

For a time Mr. Macvicar made only a moderate use of the bottle, and passed it to his neighbour after the most gentle application to his glass. In due time he fell into the snare of emptying bumpers to toasts, or what is not less dangerous, of drinking freely with all that asked him during dinner; for he was oft the victim of his admirers, who of course knew that he never was so brilliant and glorious as when excited with wine. Still, there was a period at which he resisted further temptation in that way; and this was when the grosser profligacy of speech and song began to circulate,—a period when intoxication has reached that particular pitch that staid men (when sober), begin to mouth oaths, and those of younger years, perhaps the grey-headed also, introduce double meanings and obscene allusions. At this stage of a debauch Mr. Macvicar would retire to the drawing-room, there perhaps to listen to frivolities and to inhale influences not less unsuitable to his clerical character.

Mr. Macvicar was the very man, who at a certain period of his career, say when he was presented to a living, would have been saved, had he married a person of corresponding rank and attainments, but having a firmer mind, and more exalted principles. Nor, had he employed due discretion, was there a person in the kingdom who could have been surer of obtaining such an invaluable treasure. But the longer that he remained single, and the farther he advanced as a favourite among the gentry of the district to which he belonged, the more unfixed and callous he grew concerning domestic comforts and social virtues, the deeper wedded to generalities, and, alas! to the pleasures of the table; so that he himself would confess that no woman could be happy with him. By this time the mind must have been dissipated, and therefore the descent afterwards was rapid even in the dissipation that is synonymous with drunken habits. He rose not from the board when obscenity was brought in; it was rumoured that he joined in chorusses that were grossly indecent, nay, that he extemporized in an Anacreontic style, even most lewdly, just in proportion as the poison which he swallowed gained empire; and certain it was, he was, as a finale, carried sometimes in an insensible condition to bed. One further stage in his declension was natural. When he awoke and had to return to his Manse conscience would upbraid him. Coldness and solitude also were there. Public disgrace was near at hand. Then what solace was there but the bottle? Temporary, to be sure was the oblivion it produced; but the medicine was abundant, and to it recourse again was had; ay, again, and again, and again. He was now a solitary drunkard!—pitted or scorned by the people, laughed at and shunned by the gentry. What a ruin!

Popular affection, and deep compassion had for a season screened the Minister. At length, however, ecclesiastical visitings could no longer be avoided. Private friendly remonstrances had failed. Forbearance must have a limit, and citation before the Presbytery is carried into effect. The court has assembled, the transgressor is there, and the principal business of the day has commenced. (The court is held in the church or vestry-room of the Presbyterian town, and the members usually dine together in some adjacent inn.)

As soon as the court was constituted, Mr. Macvicar was ordered, as gently and kindly as the circumstances would permit, to withdraw, after which the deliberations of his brethren were solemnly proceeded with, occupying the better part of the day. Three propositions were urged. First, an exceedingly strict Evangelical argued that Mr. Macvicar's transgressions had been so gross and notorious, and his dereliction of duties so prolonged, that he was altogether and positively unfit for the ministerial office, and ought at once to be deposed. Three members took a milder view, and proposed suspension, for the purpose of affording an opportunity to the delinquent to testify his repentance, and competency to resume his office; while six of the reverend judges, decided Moderates, thought that a severe reprimand for the past, and a distinct notice for the future, would be most consonant with the spirit of Christian charity towards their erring brother. This motion being carried. The Evangelical insisted that there should be coupled with such a "lax" specimen of discipline a call upon the transgressor "to confess a fault;" and that if the confession were given, it should be solemnly entered upon the record; if not given, that his first proposition should be adopted. It was not easy to oppose these suggestions; therefore they were unanimously acquiesced in.

But what had Mr. Macvicar been doing and thinking all the while of these grave deliberations? He had on his withdrawal stepped into the inn where the members were to dine, and in fact into the dining-room itself, pacing the apartment up and down, crossways and sideways, wearily and most anxiously. It is impossible however to describe his various feelings and reflections; but I can tell what were some of his actions.

In the course of the afternoon preparations were made in the room for the entertainment of the Ministers. The table-cloth was laid, and the sideboard furnished with sundry kinds of liquors. Ah, sad temptation! dangerous vicinity! Here was the allayer of all temporary tribulation. A cork is drawn, a sip is taken, a gulp, a hearty "wulliwrought." The spell is potent. The pacings are now less wearisome; or when they grow fatiguing, why, the renovator is near and resistless. In short, before the reverend gentleman is called back into the presence of his brethren, he is staggering yet audacious. Every one is struck with astonishment, sorrow, and indignation; shame crowning their confusion. Expression is given to their emotions. One exclaims "Oh, Mr. Macvicar! Mr. Macvicar!" Another, "Who could have believed it!" Another, "He is totally, irretrievably lost." Another, "The monstrous disgrace!"—and so on till the Evangelical sternly shouted, "What need of vain exclamations, of womanly wailings, of reproofs cast to the deaf adder! But let the Moderator put it plump and promptly to the man if man and not beast he be, whether he will confess that he is now drunk?"

It required not the presiding member to repeat the question, for with the abruptness of irreverent drink, the staggerer hawled out, "I'll be d—d if I do," and instantly rid the court of his presence, making the best way he could to the stable where his roadster was housed.

How the drunkard got mounted, how he sped out of town, or how he was gazed at and made a theme of by those whose eyes his woful condition encountered, needeth not to be told. Homewards, however, his faithful and sagacious steed carried him; every one who had knowledge of the predicament he was in, predicting him some sad catastrophe, some signal judgment to be on the eve of occurrence to the infatuated man. Presentiments sad and direful were rife. And then, what if he should live to see the light of another day! He must be smitten with the conviction that his doom, as a pastor is sealed, that his existence as a man is that of remorse unalleviated, and perhaps of suicidal despair. The women, ever ready to turn the tide of their sympathies into the balance, to speculate and to invoke humanely in behalf of the wretched, though wretched through folly or vice, thought of the poor man's reception at his Manse; of the assiduities which he required; of his morrow's breakfast, and so forth. The idea of no one to smooth his pillow and to cherish "the kind-hearted Mr. Macvicar," was equivalent to the most perfect picture of desolation and wretchedness. But the first bed and pillow that received him none accurately contemplated.

The rider's residence lay several miles distant from the town of Dunse, the road winding around the base of a spur of the Lammer-moor Hills here, or climbing in zigzag style the ascents there; sometimes abiding by the course of the White Adder, and to avoid circuitousness, twice or thrice crossing the stream, at well-known fords,—paths which at the particular time alluded to were by no means dangerous, the season being dry and the streams more than usually shallow.

But drought and shallowness avail not, when a madman follows his own headstrong counsels and tampers with deep waters. Mr. Macvicar, it would appear, either determined on self-destruction, or the performance more probably in his excited state of something which must have been associated in his muddled and bewildered brain into the idea of triumph, had forced his horse, as its footsteps proved, into the river where its depths were considerable. No one witnessed the strange proceeding; but soon after its occurrence the riderless animal is descried, the horseman is dragged, apparently lifeless, from a sand-bank where the water hardly covers him, but to which he must have been rapidly swept by the force of the mountain stream, as much in danger of having his brains knocked out, as of being drowned.

He was not lifeless; and after a few days he was nearly as well as to bodily health and strength as ever he had been. But how stood it with his office? Above all, how fared it with his soul, his sense of shame? The former of these questions may be speedily answered; for before a fortnight from his narrow escape from a watery grave had elapsed, the greater part of which interval he was inaccessible to all, he renounced his living, retiring to a cottage among the hills which overlooked the very segment of the White Adder, where he had madly courted death, and been almost miraculously saved. Yes, he quitted his neat Manse, with its well-stocked garden, his smiling glebe, and the vicinity of the house where the pious had for generations worshipped, to inhabit a mean hut, on the hill's bleak and barren side; companionless, and with the Bible alone for a library. His wants were now few. The rock yielded him a beverage, the plainest vegetables and the homeliest food sufficed his table. He was a sort of hermit, a real penitent, an exemplary Teetotaler of bygone times, and literally a new man.

Who can guess what was the sum of his self-communings? Many, however, were witnesses of his altered demeanour, and of his changed appearance. The tokens of his repentance were unequivocal and numerous. Some of his former gay associates and admirers would come to mock him; but they generally left the Teetotaler's cabin humbled or trembling; for he spoke to them with the authority of experience, with the confessing unction of one whose heart was touched with the genuine fire of heaven. Others whose faith was truer sought his counsel; but he confined it to secular affairs; or if severely pressed on higher topics, persisted in declaring his own necessity to be taught,—his sincerity being demonstrated by his regular attendance upon the ministrations of his pious successor, like the humblest in the parish. In short so remarkable was the change, and so blessed his renunciation of a most disastrous vice, that after living the life of a sort of anchorite for several years, his co-presbyters urged him to resume the preacher's office, from which he had never been judicially deposed; and when he yielded, it was at the unanimous request of his former flock that he once more mounted the pulpit most familiar to him.

Extraordinary occasion! and well did the preacher improve it. Hundreds crowded to listen to him with the best and most trustful motives; others from pure curiosity. The Earl was in the church, not it was believed with any ungenerous or light-hearted intent, but to be satisfied.

Behold the man of resolute temperance, of total abstinance, and hear him making himself and his former associates, if not the text, the themes of his encompassing address; the address of one too, not merely adorned with the spoils of human learning and the tastes of polite life, but accoutred with the armoury of unflinching truth, and the weighty sense which vicissitude confers: and marvel not that many of the congregation are bathed in tears,—that the souls of the majority are awakened, and exult in the consciousness of having apprehended a new sentiment; that the noble patton himself is won over; or that that one day's testimony to, and advocacy of, the principles of total abstinence, had its glorious triumphs, not in the shouts of a multitude, but the lives of those whose consciences had been smitten. Marvel not that Mr. Macvicar was again the chosen pastor of the parish, after arrangements satisfactory to the incumbent had been completed; or that he continued till death the best of friends, counsellors, and spiritual teachers to his flock.

DI NEAN MACVIVAR.

NATIONAL PRIDE.

THIS is so very virgin a subject that no man can fail to write something new on it. Marvellous new indeed. We cannot even whip up the cream that Zimmerman and others have skimmed off, into a new-fashioned syllabub: it is spent, exhausted, worn thread-bare. What does it consist in and of?—pride. What does the pride consist in?—ignorance. What else does it consist in?—jealousy, rivalry, hatred. The corollary is, that the most ignorant and barbarous people are the most national, or the most attached to themselves, and the most contemptuous of others. The corollary also is, that the worst-tempered people are the most national. Ignorance and ill-temper produce nationality—they are the national pride. The equation is concluded. If this is not very new, it is at least brief, which is some merit.

Any one that chooses may try to apply this calculus to nations—to John Bull if they like, or to Sawney, to a Hottentot, or an Esquimaux. We shall be twitted with vanity, and it will be applied to France; but vanity and pride are birds of the same nest.

We have never read Zimmerman, because, by some means or other, we have thought him a dull visionary, and a dealer in words; and therefore we know not what value he gives to ill-temper in this matter: we consider it fundamental. France is not ill-tempered—quite the reverse; and hence its nationality is a gay and transitory flashing of the spirit of happy self-contemplation. Spain is not good-tempered; its nationality is solid, sulky, and deep. Ireland has no temper at all; it blusters now and then about Erin's green isle, and cares nothing about it. Bull land is surly and bad-tempered; its temper combines with its egregious self-conceit to make it among the most national of lands: it is not ignorant—as a man might say—ignorant; but it is perfectly, utterly, and entirely ignorant of all other lands, things, people, institutions; and that is ignorance enough for our theory. Caledonia is the worst-tempered country on the face of the earth; and its nationality is accourent: multiply the ignorance by the ill-temper, and the product is before us. It is not, however, the worst-tempered people—that is one comfort. There are bad-tempered nations as well as individuals, born, bred, generated, continued from the first egg downwards, and ramifying from all primegeniture to all postgeniture, for ever and ever—so there are good-tempered ones. Let Montesquieu find out the reasons, if he can; in climate, if he likes.

The Jews are the patterns of ill-temper, as they have been from the time of Jacob. They began with Sarah, and they maintain their character admirably, from the beginning to the end, from Sarah to Titus, and to Judas Maccabeus, and as far further forward as any one pleases.

And the Jews are more national than even Bull and Sawney. They had once good reasons, it cannot be denied; but they have marvellous little cause at present. They confirm our theory; and let those who like to be at the trouble, hunt further a-field.

We must contract. There is an involution of nationality which demands a better pen than Zimmerman's or ours—a little set of circles within the great one. The character of all is the same, and the theory too. We want a word, and know not how to coin one. County is the Radical; who will compound, or spin it out into a substantive of quality? Provinciality must do.

Provinciality has all the characters of nationality—comparatis comparandis. It has the same phases, the same causes; it presents the same varieties: it is attended by equal hates, and jealousies, and rivalries; it similarly accompanies ignorance, ill-temper, barbarism: it is modified by good-humour, by the qualities of the vanity and the pride, by other matters of a collateral nature. It is therefore strongly marked in some provinces, feebly in others; sulky in one place, confident and cheerful in another; jealous and pugnacious here, passive there.

In short, an empire is here a world. It is divided against itself. Bull hates all nations; Sawney hates all nations. All modes of Bull, all bull-calves hate each other, all unite when needful against all that are foris, as the quarrelling wife and husband combine against their neighbours; but, withdraw the compressing force, and they all split asunder like crackers from a squib.

The study of provincialities is amusing, but it might be lengthy. We must contract; we shall only open the furrow, others may plough the field. We are also bound down to our own island.

To commence with the north. As far as we know Scotland, its leading provincialities are simple enough, and they really seem very reasonable ones. There is a trifidity, to begin, in them, which is as justifiable as the mutual jealousy of the Italian states. A Highlander hates a Lowlander, and the borderer of the Dales imagines himself also privileged to hate both. Thus far is proper. The first, at least, are distinct people from the second, or rather, from both the others. They despise most and hate most, because they are the most ignorant and the most barbarous. But they are better tempered than the Lowlanders, which makes a counterpoise; and being less selfish, their provincial pride does not put on such offensive forms. There is something grand in the self-partiality of their provincialism. We cannot subdivide them. We know not very well what a Ross man feels to an Invernessian; we must leave this to greater adepts than ourselves; but we understand that Argyleshire prides itself on comparative civilization. Clannishness is another matter, with which we have nothing to do.

The provinciality of the Dales diminishes every day; but they still imagine themselves pastoral, poetical, and free, par excellence. It is proper that they should hate their English neighbours, and not unreasonable that they should hate Lowlanders. After all, their provinciality somewhat resembles that of the Highlanders, and is not uncommendable; there is an antique and a warlike cast about it, as there is a wildly pastoral one. It might once have savoured of that which marks the sons of Ishmael; perhaps it partakes, even now, in more of that than we know.

We made a triple division, and forgot Galloway; which was wrong. This was an independent kingdom: it was as independent as the Highlands; and it was united, not split into fragments. It retains some of its pride still: it fought hard for its altars and its gods, and it was well mauled. All this is matter of boast and of character. A kind of soubriquet, distinguishing one of its divisions, aids this feeling of separation. "The Stewartry" is a name not without power over provincial minds.

To possess but one mountain is to possess a beacon and a rallying point. Criffel is the tower of Babel that rallies a province round its standard.

There is some power in rivers as well as mountains, in this matter; which is an episode in the theory, appertaining to canoes. "All friends round the Wrekin" is the watch-word of Shropshire. The Tweed is the sufficient reason for another separation; as much as is that cause of segregation, never to be forgotten while Cherry Chase survives. "All men of pleasant Tiviotdale." The Tay, the Dee, all the Dees, have their little circles of union and separation. So, elsewhere, have the Tiber, and the Arno, and the Rhine, and the Nile: they are the sources of pride, and of union; of union around each, of rivalry with all others. Lakes?—not in Scotland, as far as we know: in Cumberland, slenderly; in Switzerland, as decidedly as is Mount Blanc, and as is Vesuvius to Naples.

Islands, unquestionably, are justifiable causes of mutual hatred as much as provinces, or more. They are more perfectly segregated. Skye is as great as Cyprus or Rhodes, in its little way: so is the Isle of Wight. Guernsey and Jersey hate each other like mutual poisons. The nearer, the more hatred—as is proper all through life: and hence the warfares of proximate counties also.

But to return to Caledonia. There are some minor divisions within its Lowlands. Fife possesses a nickname—that is enough. Aberdeen has a dialect—and that is good ground of separation. Perthshire is proud of its extent, wealth, and beauty. We know not that the subordinate hatreds are further divisible; but we do not pretend to profound learning in Caledonian divisions.

Wales possesses all the reasons of antiquity, language, and race, to justify its separation; and of injury, to justify its hatred of England. This is almost a section in national, rather than provincial pride. But North Wales hates South Wales; and the aboriginal Austrogaul hates his Flemish neighbours. The men of Harlech are privileged by song to despise the men of Carnarvon: the men of Merionidd have their rallying poetry also; and the Taafé and the Fower, and the Esk and the Dee, have equally good grounds for mutual jealousy.

Of the English counties, we presume that Yorkshire possesses a pride, which, from its magnitude, (the magnitude of the county rather than of the pride,) is nearly national. It is proud of its horse-dealing, and its cheating in horse-flesh; of its cunning and its knavery; and of its concealment of all this under the aspect of openness and simplicity.

Northumberland and Cumberland pride themselves as borderers, justifiably, as they do in bagpipes and oat-cakes, and in other matters less deserving of boast. They pride themselves in their burr and their brogue; since faults are good grounds of provincial pride. To live underground is a good reason for hating all those who live above it: to be able to riot and combine occasionally, as keelmen, is a better reason still; and thus Newcastle possesses a sort of imperium within the imperium of Northumberland.

Any mark serves for a Shibboleth; any usage for a ground of distinction—of mutual and internal union—of external animosity. But all have not as good reasons for being separatists as Lancashire, in the beauty of its witches, and the goodness of its potatoes. The very term, Lancashire witches, is abundant reason for drawing a cordon round the county, and excluding the rest of the baser world. To be a Palatinate is somewhat more: this is better than cheating your neighbours in the sale of a horse. Whether Durham has any better reasons for pride than its oat-cakes and its hisbops, we cannot tell. Cheshire vaunts its cheese, as of right.

Lincolnshire ought to have prided itself on its eels, and its ducks, and its marshes, and its bogs, and on the dexterity with which it fattens living geese, and on the ague. The men of the waters ought to despise the terrestrials. How that matter may be, we cannot tell; dreading Spalding as much as Deeping, and having an innate affection for terra firma whenever we can find a piece. It might have been proud of its churches, and its early wealth; but provincial pride seldom bottoms itself on such good reasons.

Salopia has contrived to make itself a pride out of its cakes as well as its Wrekin: the Simnell is at least as rallying a point as the mountain; Shrewsbury cakes are matters of distinction, at least as valid as squabbles. If Norfolk and Suffolk did not rest their fame on barley, and sand, and ploughs, and Mr. Coke, and pheasants, and game-laws, and preserves, and steel-traps, they would be much to blame. The Norfolkian has his character and his self-estimation; but though the world considers Norfolk and Suffolk "a pair," we have no doubt that they hold each other in cordial aversion, as is most just and proper.

Of Rutland, and Bedford, and Buckingham, if any body knows—we do not—let them step forward with a critical review of us, and defend their own causes. Let them prove that they are as great fools as their neighbours, and we will give them places in our next number.

Kar' e'aygw, Leicestershire is the county! Who can be a gentleman and follow a fox in "the Shires?" Let us admit that Leicestershire merits well of its country, since it occupies and abstracts that race of dunder dandies whose brains are in no danger from fractures of their investing cases. Its merit lies in foxes, as that of Essex does in calves. He who prides himself on a fox, has clearly more merit than he who would derive honour from a fraternity with calves. But merit is merit, and distinction is distinction, be it what it may.

The pride of Middlesex, as well as its name and distinction, nearly merge in that of London; and such is the influence of the metropolis, that it suffocates the provincialities that might otherwise make fools of Surrey, and Berkshire, and Sussex, and so on. But Kent has inherited a pride from Julius Caesar, or from Shakespeare, which does as well, which it is little inclined to forget; while the fortunate distinction of Kentish men, and Men of Kent, gives it a perpetual claim on self-consequence, and on a petty intestine division of its own, added to its division from all the remainder of England.

As Essex derives its consequence from its calves, so does Hampshire from its hogs; which of the two animals, a calf or a hog, an Essex or a Hampshire man, is the supreme, we do not pretend to settle. As to Wiltshire and Dorsetshire, they seem to go for little or nothing in the public eye; but doubtless, they, like others of as little real character, possess also their mutual jealousies, their own pride, and all else that is requisite to the production of national harmony. If no other causes can be found in all such cases, it is sufficient for any two counties to be pitted at a cricket-match; or the militias answer the purpose, or even the sheriffs' ball and the gallows. We must be in the secret councils to understand all these things; and we ourselves cannot afford to live ten years in each of the counties of England. Some future Sir John Sinclair, drawing up fifty-two quarto volumes of English statistics, will do what we have left undone.

Zumersetshire possesses those indisputable claims to self-excellence which arise from a coarse dialect, coarseness of all kinds, rough bullism, and Tom Jones. We presume that Gloucester and Hereford bottom their virtues on their cheeses and their cider; and that the latter hates all mankind, because its roads are the worst in England, and it is the only maker of perry. Worcester may go along with them.

Devonshire and Cornwall are one and two: they are one to the civilized part of England, from the extremity of their common barbarism, from their clotted cream, and their squab pies, and their arrant vulgarity. But then it is a beautiful refinement, that, as from the moment you enter the Danmonian confines you are immediately sensible of the presence and land of barbarians, it is disputed which of the two divisions of the Western Barbary is the worst. The observant philosopher will nevertheless find the task easy; as, being far removed from all influence of civilization, but such as are imported in the Plymouth mail and the Cornish mail, their peculiarities have full room to display themselves, and their mutual recriminations acquire ample scope.

If Devonshire is noted for especial vulgarity, Cornwall claims the palm for rudeness, and roughness, and brutality, and the New Light; and the vulgarity of Devonshire, as is proper, is the bottom of its pride: it is the only land of the world that can make cider or pickle pork; and then it possesses Devonport and Dartmoor; while, as a set off, Cornwall glorifies itself in its Land's End, and its tin mines, and its pickhards.

We must give Cornwall the palm, after all: it is Celtic, which goes for a good deal. Dolly Pentreath spoke Cornish to Mr. Daines Barrington; it wrecks vessels and murders the mariners, smuggles brandy, runs after Wesley very particularly, deals largely in ghosts, and plays at wrestling and hurling. It is a land of a character, and has the right to look down with contempt on Devonshire, and on all the rest of the world. It is a land of character too, because it possesses a perpetual reason for mutiny and rebellion in its exquisite motto, "One and all."

We have arrived at the very Land's End itself, and at the end of our geography and knowledge. Had we possessed the talents of Zimmerman, we should have produced a decent octavo, instead of three columns. Had we taken a fourth column, we should have investigated the advantages and the effects, as we have the reasons and causes. The effects are good, though we have not now room to dilate on them. A man must hate somebody; it is better to hate somewhat far off than absolutely at home. A Frenchman is rather too distant: hate does not radiate strong enough across the channel. It is inconvenient to hate our wives and children. For townsmen to hate townsmen, is occasionally incommensurable. The county forms a happy medium; not too near for serious grievance, not so far as to be an insufficient occupation for the delight of hating. Let us all cultivate pride and conceit, that we may hate as we ought. Let the counties give premiums. Thus will even the insipids learn to rival each other in horse-stealing, and horse-dealing, and wrestling, and coal-heaving, and squabbling, and hogs, and calves, and cricket, and cudgelling; and thus a government will learn, by dividing, to govern. We have kept our main secret to the last.

REVIEWS.

The Test of Christian Conduct applied to the use of Intoxicating Liquors. Second Edition. 16mo. pp. 16. London: Houlston and Steteman.

THIS excellent little pamphlet, by MR. JOHN LISEN PENNY, will be read by all Teetotalers with the utmost attention. It is published in the form of a letter to Christians, and, without meddling with the character of the wines of the Hebrews, endeavours to meet the religious opponents of the doctrine of total abstinence upon their own ground. Mr. Penny therefore attempts to combat them by means of the principles they themselves constantly apply to other subjects; and in this aim he is eminently successful. His style is fluent and easy, and the character of his language gives a charm to the arguments which he adduces to support his views. He sets out by assuming that abstinence is lawful (a proposition which is self-evident), and thence proceeds to demonstrate its excellence and its necessity. Relative to the reasonableness of abstinence from strong drink, we quote the following extract:—

"Let us imagine for one moment intoxicating liquors to be unknown in our country, and that we were consequently free from all the evils they produce; what we ask would be thought of the man who having acquired a knowledge of their properties, their exciting tendency and their insidious nature, to whom also it was well-known that their introduction into the country would be followed by all the evils we see they occasion; that they would produce misery, disease, and death, to a most fearful extent, that they would become a powerful auxiliary to infidelity, a stumbling-block to many professing Christians, and spread far and wide irreligion and eternal ruin.—what, we ask, would you think of the man, who knowing all this, should persist in introducing them, saying, 'God has not forbidden them, and I can use them without abusing them, let these abstain who have not sufficient self-command,' and urging this as a sort of justification of his conduct, or as a salvo to quiet his conscience, should resolve, whatever the consequence might be, not only to use them himself, but to give to his children and friends, and thus as far as his influence and example extended doing all in his power to make the use of them general? Would you not denounce such an one as a misanthrope and a curse, and cast out his name as evil? Would any language be too strong? any epithet too opprobrious to characterize such a man and mark your abhorrence of his conduct? Well, remember that so long as we use these things (except as medicine) we are continuing that which we should denounce another for beginning; and can it be right in us to continue that which it would be wrong in another to commence. We know the evils and miseries strong drinks produce, and can their use, under these circumstances, be justifiable? Oh, brethren, let high-minded consistency mark our conduct, and let us at least use the influence of our example to banish from common use that we should dread to introduce."

This little pamphlet is a valuable advocate in the cause of Teetotalism.

The Hand-Book of Stenography. By WILLIAM CAMPBELL. pp. 24. London: W. Strange.

THE author of this valuable little publication has fully succeeded in his aim of presenting the student with a stenographic guide, the principal characteristics of which are simplicity and perspicuity. The name of the well-known author of the "Peetage for the People" is a sufficient guarantee for the excellence and utility of this or any other work which may emanate from his pen; and in strongly recommending the "Hand-Book of Stenography" to every individual who may be anxious to learn short-hand writing, we only fulfil a duty which strict impartiality imposes upon us.

Ten Minutes' Advice on Corns, Chilblains, and other diseases of the Feet. pp. 46. London: W. Strange.

THE author of this work very properly observes that "there are but few persons of either sex who escape the pain and annoyance arising from corns on the feet; and it is a demonstrable fact that the almost constant feverish excitement they produce, tends materially to shorten the duration of human life." And in another part of the work, the author remarks that "whenever the feet are out of good condition the whole body is more or less affected by fever, languor, and enervation; whereas a sound foot, well used and protected, by due care, against the attacks of disease, will carry its possessor through an amount of labour he would otherwise be incapable of enduring." With these convictions in mind, the author details a number of curious hints and rules for the management of the feet, and lays down the proper preventives and remedies connected with the subject. Such a work merely requires publicity in order to obtain extensive patronage.

Ireland; its Scenery, Character, &c. By MR. and MRS. S. C. HALL. Part I. 8vo. London: How & Parsons.

MRS. HALL is one of the most charming and delightful novelists of the day; and her talented husband is well known as the Editor of those beautiful annual volumes, the "Book of Gems." These writers have now presented the public with the first livraison of a work which will indubitably become one of the most popular publications of the day. The pictorial embellishments, consisting of wood-engravings executed in a masterly style, are alone worth the price of the work; but when these are associated with the most graphic, interesting, and instructive letter-press, the tout ensemble becomes an irresistible attraction to the purchaser of good and useful books. We sincerely congratulate the authors and publishers of this work on the talent and liberality bestowed respectively upon its literary and pictorial departments; and venture to predict that the publication will become a standard national monument. We shall lay before our readers an extract which is especially calculated to interest them:—

"In reference to the extent to which sobriety has spread, it will be almost sufficient to state that during our recent stay in Ireland, from the 10th of June to the 6th of September, 1840, we saw but six persons intoxicated; and that for the first thirty days we had not encountered one. In the course of that month we had travelled from Cork to Killarney—round the coast; returning by the inland route; not along mail-coach roads, but on a jaunting car, through byways as well as highways; visiting small villages and populous towns; driving through fairs; attending wakes and funerals (returning from one of which, between Glengarriff and Kenmare, at nightfall, we met at least a hundred substantial farmers, mounted); in short, wherever crowds were assembled and we considered it likely we might gather information as to the state of the country and the character of the people. We repeat, we did not meet a single individual who appeared to have tasted spirits; and we do not hesitate to express our conviction, that two years ago, in the same places and during the same time, we should have encountered many thousand drunken men. From first to last, we employed, perhaps, fifty car-drivers; we never found one to accept a drink; the boatmen at Killarney, proverbial for drunkenness, insubordination, and recklessness of life, declined the whiskey we had taken with us for the bugle-player, who was not 'pledged,' and after hours of hard labour, dipped a can into the lake and refreshed themselves from its waters; it was amusing as well as gratifying to hear their new reading of the address to the famous echo; 'Paddy Blake, please yer honour, the gentleman promises ye some coffee when ye get home;' and on the Blackwater, a muddy river, as its name denotes, our boat's crew put into shore, midway between Youghal and Lismore, to visit a clear spring, with the whereabouts of which they were familiar. The whiskey-shops are closed or converted into coffee-houses; the distilleries have, for the most part, ceased to work; and the breweries are barely able to maintain a trade sufficient to prevent entire stoppage. Of the extent of the change, therefore, we have had ample experience; and it is borne out by the assurances of so many who live in towns as well as in the country, that we can have no hesitation in describing sobriety to be almost universal throughout Ireland."

We shall notice this work, monthly, according to the periodical appearance of the parts, until its completion. Messrs. How & Parsons have commenced their publishing career with considerable spirit.

TRUTH.—Truth will ever be unpalatable to those who are determined not to relinquish error, but can never give offence to the honest and well-meaning; for the plain-dealing remonstrances of a friend differ as widely from the rancour of an enemy, as the friendly probe of a surgeon from the dagger of an assassin.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

CARLISLE.

WE extract the following information from The Border Herald of Temperance, an excellent monthly journal, published by Mr. Hudson Scott, of Carlisle:—"A few of the friends of Teetotalism in Carlisle, in connection with a portion of the newly-formed Reehabite Band have commenced giving a series of Concerts on Saturday evenings in the Athenæum Lecture Room. The prices of admission are:—Front Seats, 6d. Back Seats, 3d. Children, half-price. An address is delivered each evening between the parts of the Concerts. The first Concert took place on Saturday evening, 17th of Oct. when, we are happy to say, a numerous and respectable audience assembled and seemed highly gratified with the evening's entertainments. The glees, songs, &c. were got up in a very creditable manner and elicited great applause from the audience. Mr. McMillan, in a brief address, explained the motives of the projectors, and called upon all the friends of the working classes to come forward and support the undertaking."

Carlisle was visited on the 29th ult. by the Rev. Mr. KELLY, Catholic Clergyman of Wigan. In the evening and the two succeeding evenings he delivered convincing lectures on the benefits arising from the total abstaining from intoxicating drinks, to large and attentive audiences. During the three night's lectures, 140 persons signed the total abstinence pledge, and have formed themselves into a Catholic congregational society; and we understand that at the recommendation of the Rev. gentleman, they intend to act in union with the General Society in this town. 26 have joined the latter society during the past month."

COCKERMOUTH.

On Wednesday, the 24th ult. the Rev. Mr. KELLY visited Cocker-mouth, and in the evening addressed a numerous and respectable audience in the Friends' Meeting House, at the conclusion of which he administered the pledge to upwards of 40, who were immediately enrolled as members of the temperance society.

ARMATHWAITE.

WE are happy to state that a Teetotal society was established in the village of Armathwaite on the 12th of October, and has met with complete success.

GLASGOW.

On the 21st of October, a splendid lecture was given in Mr. King's chapel, by that eminent philanthropist, Mr. GEORGE THOMPSON. With his usual eloquence, he traced alcohol from its Arabian cradle, in the 9th century, to its manhood of mischief in our own day. He showed the folly and the fruitlessness of restricting its ravages under one form, and leaving them unrestrained under another,—inasmuch as it is the alcohol that does the evil, and not the other ingredients with which it is found in combination.

WREXHAM.

WREXHAM, in Wales, affords many proofs of the benefits of Teetotalism. Mr. TYLER, of that place, thus writes to The Border Herald of Temperance:—"The good cause is getting on well both in town and country. The experience of the last four years is most satisfactory. Ministers are more faithful in warning the drunkard. Several gentlemen are coming forward to assist us in this mighty reformation. With the blessing of God upon our labours we yet hope to see the strongholds of intemperance thrown down. If He be for us, who can be against us?"

LINCOLNSHIRE.

THERE is not another county where narcotics are so much used as in that of Lincoln. It has been calculated by one who has turned his attention to the magnitude of this growing evil for many years, that in the south of Lincolnshire, in the fenny parts, every second customer who enters the shop of a druggist is a purchaser of opium, laudanum, Godfrey's mixture, or other; and every other customer who enters that of a grocer fetches away tobacco. The use of opium and laudanum is much on the increase, but not as stated in the newspaper reports, in proportion to the spread of Teetotalism. On the contrary it will be invariably found that all opium and laudanum takers are beer and gin drinkers, while Teetotalers are bound by the principles of abstinence societies, to abstain from every intoxicating agent. It will be found too that there is a greater consumption of green tea in Lincolnshire than in any other part. The practice of opium-taking is not confined to the aged and infirm.

OXFORD TEMPERANCE INSTITUTE, AND AUXILIARY TO THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

On Wednesday, the 28th of Oct. a meeting was held in the Primitive Methodist Chapel, at eight o'clock. An address was delivered by that well-known and able advocate, Mr. HUDSON, who, by his argumentative appeals, elicited bursts of applause from the audience. After an interesting speech of nearly two hours, the following resolution was moved:—"It is resolved that the Oxford Temperance Institute be henceforth made an Auxiliary to the United Temperance Association, and that the Secretary of this Society take the necessary preliminary steps to accomplish the projected Union, by an immediate communication with the Secretary of that Society." This resolution was seconded and carried unanimously.

Mr. BLACKWELL, the Secretary to the Oxford Temperance Institute, writes to us in the following terms:—"We have a Reading Room and Circulating Library, at Lambert's Hotel, Ebbw-street; and these are well supplied with all the leading periodicals on Teetotalism, including that interesting and truly valuable journal The Teetotaler, a publication which we most strongly recommend to all those who wish the glorious principles of Teetotalism fairly and fearlessly promulgated. In conclusion, allow me to observe that it is the opinion of our Committee that, by unity and perseverance the grand objects of that Association to which we claim to be an Auxiliary, will ere long be accomplished."

CAHIR.

THE Temperance dinner given by LORD GLENGAL to the Teetotalers of Cahir, county Tipperary, took place on November 11th, at the Market-house in that town. Upwards of a hundred and eighty sat down to the repast. Amongst those present were LORD and LADY GLENGAL, FATHER MATHEW, and the Rev. Mr. RIDGE, the Protestant rector of the parish. CAPTAIN BUTLER was in the chair. His lordship said, in speaking of Father Mathew, that he was more deserving of gratitude than any man living. Father Mathew said in his speech that the rules of the society did not prevent the members from taking a part in political matters, but that they should not do so in their capacity of Teetotalers. He proposed the health of the Protestant rector, whose adhesion to their cause he looked upon as the harbinger of better days. Several very excellent speeches were delivered. His lordship, Lady Glengal, and Father Mathew retired at eight o'clock; but the festivities were kept up till a late hour.

TOWN NEWS.

MECHANIC'S INSTITUTE, CIRCUS STREET.

The Mechanic's Institute, Circus Street, New Road, was the scene of the signal discomfiture of a man of the name of THOMAS MACCONNELL, on Friday evening, Nov. 6th instant. Mr. Macconnell had advertised his intention of discussing the merits of Teetotalism, and recommending a new scheme to replace this new doctrine, and still produce the same salutary effects in respect to the reformation of the working classes. Mr. Macconnell proposed the total abolition of the national debt as his remedy. He might as well have asserted that the pulling down of Saint Paul's cathedral would have reformed the intemperate habits of the nation. Mr. NICHOLSON, an eminent advocate of the cause of Teetotalism, was so disgusted with this declamatory rubbish, that he hastened to the front of the platform, and proposed that all Teetotalers present should express a similar feeling by quitting the room. The motion was immediately carried, and Mr. P. DOON (the Chairman), Mr. NICHOLSON, and the friends of the principle of total abstinence instantly withdrew, leaving the sapient Mr. Macconnell "alone in his glory."

VIRGINIA-STREET TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

We announced some time since that the Glass House, opposite to the entrance of the London Docks, East Smithfield, had been opened by the Virginia-st. Total Abstinence Society as an East London Temperance Hall. This room having for some time been found too small, the Committee have succeeded in engaging a larger and more comfortable one, in the same building, capable of holding 2,000 persons. The first meeting was held in it on Sunday evening, Nov. 1st, when not less than twelve hundred persons were present. Mr. J. KELLY was in the Chair. The meeting was addressed by Mrs. SMITH and Mrs. TARNOR, and by Messrs. SULLIVAN, WHILLIAR, CRAY, CARLOW, DAWSON, and the Rev. Mr. HUTCHINSON. Several members of the Metropolitan Roman Catholic Total Abstinence Association were present, and expressed a wish that in future a better understanding might exist between the two societies. The Chairman remarked that he would use all his influence to bring about so desirable an end. Meetings are held every Sunday, Monday, and Thursday evenings, at this new place of assembly.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Head-Quarters.

Notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the weather, the meetings on Wednesday and Saturday evenings at the Aldersgate Street Chapel, have been well attended, and the advocates of the good cause of total abstinence have not exerted themselves in vain. Upwards of two hundred signatures are obtained weekly to the Pledge-Book of the United Temperance Association; and the worthy Registrar, Mr. CALME, finds the duties of his department of the administration of this society rapidly increasing. On Sunday, the chapel is opened for divine service; the Rev. J. S. CRUICKER is the officiating minister.

VARIETIES.

NEW CLOTHES.—Grievous and "considerably unpleasant, if not more," to bear, is the burden of a new coat. A hat is bad enough—but a new coat, with "a tight fit!" What an amount of care and of personal solicitude it brings with it—to say nothing of that indescribable feeling, which makes an unoccupied arm a decided superfluity—a mere hanger-on; a sensation, faintly shadowed forth, when the wearer's "measure" was taken, and he was told to hold up his head, like a man and, drop his hands, which dangled so strangely far below the termination of sleeves that had always seemed long enough until then. See yonder victim, dodging fellow pedestrians, as if he feared that contact would collapse him, like a soap-bubble. Hear him think aloud, in the language of "one who knows," as he threads his devious way: "Oh to be the martyr of a few yards of cloth; to be the Helot of a tight fit; to be shackled by the ninth part of a man; to be made submissive to the sun, the dust, the rain, and the snow; to be panic-stricken by the chimney-sweep, scared by the dustman; to shudder at the advent of the baker; to give precedence to the scavenger; to concede the wall to a peripatetic conveyancer of nuts; to palpitate at the irregular sallies of a mercurial cart-horse; to look with awe at the apparition of a giggling servant girl, with a sloop-pail reversed; to coast a gutter, with horrible anticipations of the consequences!" There is however one consolation. The evil will soon wear off, and the draper shall benevolently rejoice that it has been removed.

FREEDOM OF OPINION AND ACTION.—We have somewhere heard of a connoisseur in the arts saying to a friend, "I wish you would come down and see a picture I have just purchased. I would like you to give me your candid opinion of it. A friend of mine had the impudence to say, this morning, that it was not an original! If there's another man says it is not an original, by Jove! I'll knock him down!" But come and see it, and tell me honestly what you think of it." Here was freedom of opinion; and something akin to the liberty of action said to have been granted by an American Col. to the troops under his command, before going into winter-quarters. They were suffering for provisions and clothing, and the Congress had been repeatedly petitioned for that relief which it was not in their power to bestow. Under these circumstances the Col. paraded his band of suffering soldiers, and harangued them as follows: "Fellow-Soldiers! You've served your country faithfully and truly. We've fought hard fights together, against the enemy. You're in a bad way for comfortable clothes, that's a fact; and it makes me cry, almost, to see your feet bleeding on the frozen ground. But Congress can't help it, nor I neither. Now if any of you want to return home, you may go. Let them that would like to go, step out—two paces in front. But the first man that steps out, darn my skin! if I don't shoot him as quick as I would a red coat!" It is needless to add, that not a solitary "volunteer" was to be found.

FOPPERY.—Foppery is never cured; it is a bad stamina of the mind, which, like those of the body, are never rectified: once a coxcomb and always a coxcomb.

MENAGERIES.—A rare place is a menagerie, both for exhibition of the animals observed, and the humans observing. Various are the droilleries in each, which pass before the keeper. "Have you such an animal as a Prock, in your menagerie?" said a wag to the president of an itinerant "institute" of wild animals. No, never heard of him; what sort of a creature is he? "He is a Wisconsin varmint, which it is difficult sufficiently adequately for to describe. He is exceedingly fleet—in fact, very much so. He has four legs—two short ones on one side, and two long ones on the other. He always grazes on an inclined plane; and the way they catch him, is curious. They head him, make him turn round, and this brings his long legs on the up-hill-side; consequence of which, his short legs a'n't no account. He falls down, rolls over and over, and is mighty soon caught." The apparently credulous president offered a handsome sum for a live specimen; and proceeded to hoax the naturalist in return, while he was deeply interested in a cage of playful foxes. "Them animals," said he, "comes from Iceland, a cold country, north of Canada. They are very fond of crows' eggs, which they steal from the precipices, on the sea-side. They are cunning creatures, very. When they come to a spot where they expect to find a batch of nests, they make a ring, and begin to wrestle, to see which is the strongest. When they find out, the stoutest goes to the edge of the precipice, takes his next neighbour's tail in his teeth, and he takes another, and so on, till the string is long enough to hang over and reach the eggs, which are then handed up from one to another, (our greedy listener forgot to ask how,) until they arrive in safety at the top!" The "prock" fabulist retired, filled with amazement at the marvellous vulpine string.

SICKNESS.—"There is something in sickness that breaks down the pride of manhood." The haughtiest and the richest will answer for this. "Sickness," says the good Sir THOMAS BAWNE, "is the mother of Modesty, and putteth us in mind of our mortality; and when we are in the full career of worldly pomp and jollity, she pulleth us by the ears, and makes us know ourselves." But if they are "broken down" in sickness, who have riches, and need of nothing, what is his condition, who—in a mart crowded with men thankful for leave to toil, though but for a pittance—relies upon the labour of his hands for his daily bread, and that of an innocent family? Let this picture, reader, painted by an "old master" (how time-honoured is Want!) make answer: Laid on the bed of languishing, perhaps on the bed of death, he beholds his wife and children disconsolate around him. They can present to him none of the cordials and supports of sickness, for his interrupted labour deprives them of the staff of life. His distress and theirs are unknown to the ear of opulence. Those who employ him, recognise him only by the price of his labour. When fastened to a sick bed, which serves rather to augment than to alleviate his malady, he ceases to attend his work, he ceases also to be present to their minds. Another comes, occupies his place, receives the wages he used to earn, and the sick man is forgotten. Disease continues to prey upon his frame, until he expires! He is consigned to the grave, of difficult purchase, and to oblivion, or his remembered only by the beggary of his family, accounted importunate and troublesome. The midnight bell, that is booming over this great metropolis as these thoughts are recorded, sounds in the wakeful ear of many a family, made desolate like this!

STRANGE DATA.—There are a great many stories told of the prolific soil of the Western States of America; how that bread, ready buttered, grows upon high trees; that pigs' tails, planted in the rich alluvial bottom lands, in the fall, fructify in such wise, that on some fine evening in early spring, a crop of juvenile porkers may be seen marching into the sower's farm-yard, from the "spot where they grew," with short squeak, and in military order; and that jack-knives are "raised" by a kindred agricultural process. However this may be, we are credibly informed that the truth of a statement equally surprising, can be easily established. In Illinois, it is quite a common thing for deer, being previously accommodated with a "bucket full of salt" on their tails, to walk up to a squatter's tent in their forest, turn his fat haunches to the fire, and keep them there, until properly cooked, and then permit a delicious steak to be cut therefrom. They then go about their business with equanimity. In some instances, it is further stated, they return at night-fall, to furnish forth a "cold cut." We have this statement in the hard-writing of Mr. JOHN SMITH, of Illinois, who refers, confidently, to Mr. JOHN THOMPSON, of Ohio.

GUESSING.—"Teddy, me boy, jist guess how many cheesesthere is in this ere bag, an' faith I'll give ye the whole five." "Five," said Teddy. "Arr'ah, by my sowl, bad luck to the man who tould ye!"

LIFE.—How small a portion of our lives is that we truly enjoy! In youth we are looking forward to things that are to come: in old age we look backward to things that are past.

SENSATION.—I o u are the vowels which create more disagreeable sensations in the minds of honest men than all the rest of the alphabet put together.

A WALLERISM.—"I'm losing flesh," as the butcher said ven he saw a man robbing his cart.

TOO FAT.—"Give me the men that are fat!" said honest Jack Falstaff. Not such are the predilections of an agreeable correspondent, who has sent us the "Confessions of an Obese." We are reluctant to publish them. They certainly can be of no service as a warning or beacon; for who, by taking thought, can cease to grow fat, any more than he can add a cubit to his stature? Still less will they be likely to amuse. Those who are troubled with the ills that flesh is heir to—in whom every thing that is eaten turns to fat, which they consider "an oily dropsy"—surely such will make no jest of it; and the lean seldom laugh. Our correspondent says he is a firm believer in the Cartesian philosophy, and means to write a volume to prove that happiness consists in motion. He argues that a fat man presents an inversion of the order of nature—his only chance of tolerable existence consisting in that which nature abhors as much as a vacuum—rest. He was a member of a musical party—a "society for the promotion of the blowing and scraping pleasures"—but was compelled to resign. He couldn't raise the wind, and was too much of an obese to draw a long bow, with any degree of comfort. He looks back longingly upon the enjoyment of dancing, and especially the luxury of the German waltz, his favorite in leaner days. His arm is around the slender waist of some sweet girl of seventeen gentle summers; he whirls through the maze of motion, thrilling intensely at the touch of her hand, the surruration from her balm-breathing lips, and the glance of her passionate eye. But he breaks the charm, by the exercise of walking across the room, and grows melancholy at the thought, that into that deep well of rapture he has been contemplating, his bucket will go down no more. Nor can he hymenise. His form is not "the genteel thing." Once, in despondency, he advertised for a "sleeping partner" for life. His card was answered by a venerable spinster, who, to adopt his language, had "lost her left orb of vision." She assured him, that should they succeed in coming to terms, he might rely upon her having a single eye to his happiness, and rest certain that her views of things in general would be always right. At the interview which succeeded, even this antiquated piece of feminine mortality declined the proffered honour. "He was so fat—she had no idea! Good morning, Sir!"

PROFIT AND LOSS.—Learning hath gained most by those books by which the printers are lost.

A PAIDICAL.—"What makes you spend your time so freely, Jack? "Because it's the only thing I have to spend."

THE DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS.

A TALE.—BY THE EDITOR.

PERIOD II.—CHAPTER XII.

CONCLUSION.

So attenuated was the mind of Victor Melville in consequence of the habits of dissipation in which he had so lately indulged to excess, that when his affectionate wife was once more embraced in his arms, he cried like a child. The fountains of his grief were opened,—and those eyes, which had not shed tears for many a long, long day, now wept bitterly. By turns he clasped his wife to his breast, and then his boy,—and the sluggishness and recklessness of a soul, which had been subdued by the degrading character of a miserable existence, gave way to the energetic feelings of warmth and passion. He pressed his hand upon his forehead to dissipate the mists which seemed to hang around his brain; and a new light beamed in upon the secret recesses of his bosom!

"Oh! my dear, dear Louise," he exclaimed, holding one of her hands fast locked in his, under the apprehension that she would leave him,—“how long have you left me in the hideous solitude of this prison? I know not how the time has passed; but I feel that we have been separated for many—many months!”

"Alas!" exclaimed Louise, the tears falling profusely from her own eyes, as she surveyed the altered countenance of her husband, upon whose cheek the finger of death had already seemed to have planted an indelible mark,—“you know not all that has occurred! I have suffered much—very much; but I was not conscious, during this long interval, of my real situation,—or else I should have felt how much you must have yourself suffered in consequence of my absence.”

"Your absence?" cried Melville, again pressing his hand to his forehead, for his brain had once more become confused;—"then it is true—it is not a dream—and you have really been absent all this while—and you left me to languish and to die in a gaol! Oh! Louise—I could not have believed this of you! But I know that I have been very criminal towards you—I know that I have dissipated your fortune, and treated you with unmerited severity;—I remember now, in this dread moment of hurried reminiscences, all the acts of unkindness with which I repaid your devoted love;—I feel that I have wrung many, many bitter tears from your eyes, and many sighs from your bosom;—I know that I have been a bad husband, and a bad father,—a spendthrift—a drunkard—a debauchee;—but I have been cruelly, oh! far too cruelly punished!"

The unfortunate young man fell back in his bed as he uttered these words, and gave vent to the agony of grief which this sad retrospect over the past had awakened in his bosom. Louise had not interrupted him during his painful detail of all his crimes and sorrows, because the sight of her husband's misery filled her own breast with emotions that stifled her voice.

"But I will not reproach you, dearest Louise," continued Victor, after a pause, during which the little boy and the old gentleman mingled their grief with that of the afflicted husband and wife,—“I will not reproach you, Louise! You sacrificed much—all for me: you expected to find happiness in joining your fortunes with mine; and I have compelled you, as it were, to walk barefoot by my side over the rough places of this world. But—oh! when the cold hand of death shall have released my troubled spirit from its mortal tenement of clay,—and when the husband, for whom you have done all, sacrificed all, and suffered all, shall lie in the silent tomb,—do not then look back to the years we have passed together as an epoch of your life at which you shudder when you retrospect; but rather let the natural charity of your disposition—that sweetness of temper which never complained when I was cruel,—oh! suffer all those good qualities to teach you to forget the faults of one whose brightest years were sacrificed to the accursed demon of intemperance!”

"Melville—you will drive me mad—mad once more!" ejaculated Louise, her heart almost breaking as her husband uttered these words—not in the impassioned tone of one who makes an effort for display,—but in the sad, melancholy, and plaintive accents of dark despair, which is still closely allied with calm resignation.

"Mad once more!" cried Victor, who seemed to think that there was a deep mystery concealed in that short phrase; "mad once more! What mean you, Louise?"

"I mean," returned the afflicted wife, "that on the day when I saw you last, I intended—oh! heaven knows I intended to return, for I could not have deserted you, even were all true of which you accuse yourself;—but a villain deluded me away to a lonely spot, where he unveiled his infamous designs, which I indignantly resisted! The wretch—the less than man, and more than monster became infuriate at that which he termed my stubborn conduct; and—"

"And," interrupted the venerable stranger, stepping forward, and taking up the thread of Louise's narrative,—“and I was passing by that secluded spot at the time—and I heard the screams of distress—and I forced open the door of the cottage. I rescued your wife from the power of a villain, who left the house, menacing dark threats of vengeance, to which I paid but little attention; for Louise had fainted, and demanded all my care.”

"And that villain was he who has ever been my tempter and my enemy?" ejaculated Melville, no longer able to restrain his impatience and his indignation.

"The same," answered Louise,—“the wretch who has thrown his insidious snares around you with too fatal an effect!”

"But that is not all," continued the stranger, wiping away his tears, which fell fast and copiously. "I obtained assistance and conveyed Louise and her boy to my residence, which is in the neighbourhood of the house selected by the villain for his intended infamy. She recovered from the state of insensibility into which she had fallen; but when she awoke—she was delirious! Her mind was affected with the sorrows and the dangers through which she had passed! But there was a ring upon her finger which caught my eye, and which awoke extraordinary sensations in my bosom,—a ring which recalled to my mind the deeds of past years, and excited the strangest curiosity in my breast. And then I contemplated the beautiful features of the fair stranger,—and they recalled to my memory the countenance of one whom I had once loved with all a father's fond affection for his child! How can I tell you in what manner the last twelve months of my existence have past away? An unsated curiosity was consuming me;—a hope, a dread, and a wish which I dared not express even to myself for fear of its being doomed to experience disappointment, filled my imagination night and day; and, on the other hand, the only person who seemed competent to relieve me of suspense and solve the mystery, was a prey to all the ravings of a disordered intellect!”

"Heavens! and I have been the cause of all your sufferings, my poor Louise!" cried Melville, weeping like a child.

"For a year has your wife been unable to collect her scattered ideas into one focus," proceeded the old gentleman, who spoke in a foreign accent; "but a few days ago the dawn of reason appeared again, and asserted its empire over that mind which had long been enveloped in the mists of a confused night. You may believe that no care was omitted that medical skill could afford, or money could provide, to tend the patient in my abode; and at length my attentions—my vigils—my watchings—my anxieties, were rewarded! She recovered from a year's aberration of intellect; and my curiosity was soon gratified. I found that she was indeed the daughter of my daughter—the beautiful counterpart of a child whose disgrace I had deplored, and whose fault I would have forgiven; and the long mystery in which that dear child's fate has been involved, is now cleared up. Victor—heaven threw me in the way of your wife, that she might find a grandfather in the hour of her affliction to aid her, and that I might find a grandchild whom I love for her own, as well as for her mother's sake. An emigrant from the land of my birth in the troubled times of its dark political destiny, I sought the English shore, and have continued to dwell, alone and solitary, in a retired spot, until heaven sent me this dear girl to recompense me for many long years of suffering. And, now, you for the first time will learn that your wife is the grand-daughter of the Marquis de Saint Aubré.”

Melville had once more fallen back in his bed, as the old nobleman concluded this singular narrative; and the exertions which he had made to speak ere now—and the excitement produced upon his enervated frame and mind by the return of his wife and child, and the development of these mysteries, appeared to have given place to a condition of weakness necessarily attendant upon a great re-action. His cheek became even paler than it was when Louise first broke upon his solitude in that dreary chamber; his eyes were suddenly divested of the evanescent brightness which had lighted them up; and his countenance lost the expression of pleasure which had animated it as he gazed upon his wife. He motioned her to place his little boy upon the bed near him; and the child wept—he scarcely knew why. Victor caught him to his arms, and covered him with kisses. He then turned a glance full of gratitude towards the Marquis, and endeavoured to address a few words to Louise. But his voice failed him; and he shook his head despondingly. Louise stooped to imprint a kiss upon his lips—and he returned not that token of affection. His spirit had passed away without a struggle, in that moment when a tender wife testified her forgiveness of the past with all the fervour of the most heart-felt affection.

He died in a debtor's gaol—in a wretched room—and after having suffered all the privations which the saddest destiny can know. But he died with kind relatives around his bed, and with the assurance that those who loved him were provided for, in spite of the wreck of his own fortunes.

He died; and the disconsolate wife, and the venerable old man, and the almost unconscious child, knelt down upon the cold floor of that chamber of death, and prayed for the soul of him who had afforded so dread an example of the horrors attached to the DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS!

THE END.

PRISONS.

THE policy of confining persons accused of civil or criminal offences is demonstrated by the necessity of applying corrections and punishments to the delinquencies or crimes of which the human race is capable. But the greatest attention should be paid to the architectural plan of prisons, in order that a perfect system of control may be maintained in respect to those who are incarcerated. The architectural plan of Millbank Penitentiary has failed principally through the insuburbiety of its site. The plan of the Maison de Force in Paris is perfect. It combines the most complete system of surveillance, and at the same time admits of the prisoners having healthful exercise, without at all interfering with the system of classification. There may be seen an entire separation of men from women, the sickly from the healthy, the untried from the convicted, and the misdemeanants from the felons. A very important feature of the system of classification is the separation of children from men and women; and in general it may be observed that the division into classes should have reference to moral as well as technical distinction. The utmost order and regularity prevail in La Force. While at work, no prisoner is allowed to speak; no noise is heard but the noise of the shuttle. Corporal punishment is altogether dispensed with. The penalty for delinquency within the precincts of the gaol is (strange as it may appear) privation of work. The behaviour of the prisoners is subdued, civil, submissive, and decent throughout; their persons are cleanly, and their looks cheerful; and all the rooms are clean and sweet. By this excellent system, the prisoner gains habits of order, self-restraint, and subjection of mind. The most boisterous tempest is not more distinct from the serenity of a summer's evening—the wildest beast of prey is not more different from our domesticated animals, than are the noise, contention, licentiousness, and tumult of Newgate, from the quietness, industry, and regularity of the Maison de Force.

In the prison of Philadelphia, in the United States, where the great features of prison discipline are distribution, employment, and religious instruction, the effects are still more impressive. Every kind of trade is carried on in this prison; and there is such a spirit of industry on every side, and such contentment on the countenances of all, that it is with difficulty an observer can divest himself of the idea that the inmates are not convicts, but people accustomed to labour from their infancy. An account is opened with every prisoner; he is debited with the amount or value of the article stolen, with the expenses of his prosecution, with the fine imposed by the tribunal, and with the cost of his board and clothes; and he is credited with the produce of his labour. The silence which prevails in this prison is the first and most striking circumstance which arrests the attention of the stranger. No keeper is allowed to carry a stick, or any offensive weapon; nor are fetters or irons seen in the prison. The punishment is solitary confinement; and no instance has occurred of its being necessary to inflict it twice upon the same person. In the four years preceding the commencement of the new system, a hundred and four prisoners escaped: in the four succeeding years, not one escaped.

The tread-wheel is the most important mechanical instrument which has as yet been employed for the improvement of prison discipline. The labour of the wheel is by ascending steps fixed to the wheel; and thus the amount of ascent must depend on the number of hours employed, the velocity of the wheel, the distance from step to step, and the proportion of those out of each gang who are on the wheel, at one time, to those who are off. If this punishment be used with discretion and humanity, it must be more or less salutary, inasmuch as it subdues the most turbulent disposition. It is a labour which is dreaded in the prospect, irksome in endurance, and remembered with disgust; and the occupation is so unceasing that conversation amongst the prisoners is much restrained.

A STRANGE AND PERILOUS ADVENTURE.

[FROM COL. MACKRONI'S LIFE.]

At the time when the Neapolitan court and its partisans were hastening to quit Naples, a friend of mine, a Corsican officer in the service of England, named La Flèche, was very desirous of joining his regiment in Sicily. This La Flèche was a man of good education, most agreeable manners, and inexhaustible wit and humour. He was a great favourite and constant guest of the English residents, especially at the hospitable house of Frederick Degen, in which he lived. Having such an opportunity of extending his knowledge of men and of localities, he contemplated performing his journey to Sicily by land to the extremity of Calabria, instead of embarking at Naples. His friends, and I amongst the rest, did all in our power to dissuade him from so dangerous an experiment, especially at a juncture of trouble and revolution. The Calabrians are a very strong and athletic race of men; and although their dress is not generally so much ornamented with gold and silver as those of the Abruzzi and the mountainous districts of the Roman states, it is nevertheless very picturesque. A sugar-loafed hat, with generally a cock's feather stuck in it; brown jacket without collar, the shirt collar turned down, displays a fine neck, covered by long black curly hair and beard; sandals made of a single piece of hide, attached at the four corners to bands of red worsted, bound round the legs, enable them to run on rocks, where no man with stiff solid shoes could walk without falling. A gun, a pistol, and a knife, with cartridge pouch in the manner of a belt, completes the equipment, which is common to every male above twelve years old. The Calabrians, no more than the other peasants of Italy, are really of predatory habits; but their personal appearance, and the stories, part true, part exaggerated, of robberies at Fondi, Itri, and other places not in Calabria, gave currency to the belief, amongst those who know no better, of every Calabrian being inclined to use his arms against the first man whom he thinks worth plundering. This is an egregious error; but be it as it may, my poor friend La Flèche would have done better had he been influenced by the prejudice, and by our extortations.

Off he went, and quite alone; and further to increase his danger took with him a handsome English portmanteau, and sent, as he ought to have done by this time, the rest of his baggage by sea. On the evening of the third day of his dangerous journey, La Flèche arrived with his gun, his mule, and sumpter donkey, at a place called Lago Negro, or the Black Lake. He had been particularly cautioned against sleeping of even stopping at this spot, which had no inn, save a dismal looking abode apart from the other habitations, under the walls of which a rocky torrent, in a deep rocky bed, rushed into the lake below. It was after dark when La Flèche arrived at this romantically evil-looking place, and well had it been for him had he heeded the first spontaneous impressions on his mind which the dreary scene gave rise to. His tired guide confirmed him in his own desire for food and rest; so casting aside all fear and prudence, he alighted from his mule and entered the abode. The guide was foremost in this operation, and seemed to be intent on giving to the host an idea of the importance of his employer. The host, or whatever we may call him, was a man of about five-and-forty years of age, six feet high, and of strong proportions. His long black ringlets hung over his face, and through them shone a pair of large expressive eyes. From a side pocket of his breeches projected the handle of a huge stilet. However, all this description is superfluous; I must come to the catastrophe, first stating that my friend partook of an excellent supper of macaroni and ham and eggs before he went to bed. The room to which he was shewn was only a kind of loft above the general room below; access to it was had by means of a rickety wooden stair, or rather ladder. A fact which first began to excite suspicion in our traveller was, that to the door of the apartment there was no lock or other fastening whatever. The host politely saw him to his bed, and consigned to him a lamp, such as are much used in Italy ever since the Cyclopean age. A vessel something like a butter-boat, having the wick at the spout-like extremity, is attached by three chains to a bracket at one end pointed, the other terminating in a hook; so that by one or by the other the lamp is easily attached to a wall, or hung up, as most convenient, but La Flèche extinguished it on going to bed.

Those who have travelled many a long day on horseback, or on muleback, will easily conceive how La Flèche, mangled some misgivings, soon fell fast asleep. He had, however, taken the precaution first to place his loaded pistols under his pillow, and his sword beside him. He had not slept long before he was awakened by heavy, though cautious footsteps, the creaking stair. I must not forget to state, that there being no lock or fastening to the chamber door, La Flèche, for want of better means, had placed two chairs, surmounted by the common brass washing basin, against his door, in expectation that if anybody should attempt to open it from without, the falling chairs and sounding basin would give him timely warning. Vain, delusive expectation! The heavy, cautious footsteps one by one approached the summit of the stair. La Flèche's heart beat violently responsive to the sounds, which he then began to think would be the last to strike upon his ear. The sound was now at his door; the glimmer of a light cast flickering shadows over his bed on the opposite walls—the fissures in the door, and under it, the hole which should have been furnished with a lock and key, admitted just light enough to render "darkness visible" around him. Alone in such a place, surrounded by several other men similar in appearance and probably in character to his host, a stout heart might have fluttered. A stouter heart than had La Flèche seldom ever beat. He calmly took his pistols, cocked them, and waited the event.

Anyhow, he thought, that upon attempting to open his door the alarm occasioned by the falling chairs and brazen basin would deter the assassin from further operations; but in this he was miserably deceived: for upon gently pushing at his door, and finding out the nature of the impediment which, probably, he had been prepared to expect, mine host continued to push below, gently, with his foot, so as to cause the chairs to move bodily along, until the door was opened sufficiently for the act intended. At this juncture poor La Flèche beheld a lengthy, muscular, naked arm protruded within the aperture of the door! the huge hand of which grasping the chairs in clever equisopie, uplifted them, and moved them some three feet inwards from the door, which then could open for the admittance of the operator. In stalked, or rather crept, the Calabrian, stripped to his shirt and drawers. In one hand he bore a lamp, such as I have just described; in the other, a large and shining stilet. His glaring eyes were fixed upon La Flèche, who, feigning sleep, imprudently awaited the explanation of the visit. Step by step, the man advanced towards the bed. La Flèche was ten times on the point of firing at him, but doubt and uncertainty withheld his hand; so he waited and waited at each soft advancing step of the shoeless robber, trusting to strike him lifeless in a second before he could possibly be struck by the weapon, then gleaming in the hand of the assassin.

Alas! our poor La Flèche kept pending and pending far too long. But to proceed,—the man at last stood close against the bed; and La Flèche was on the very point of springing up and sending a couple of balls through his body, when the assailant quietly hung his lamp against the wall, just beside the head of the still expectant and imprudent Corsican. Shall I fire now? said he to himself. Another moment will show what he means to do. "Fire away!" would I and all my readers certainly have cried. But no! still he waited, until the man, approaching the chair on which La Flèche had deposited his clothes, gave a fresh turn to the attention and curiosity of his victim. He does not intend to kill me, thought the benevolent La Flèche; he only thinks to pick my pockets; but I have been too deep for him; I carry all my gold in the good old way, contained in a belt now safe around my body.

Surely, enough, the man of blood did take the clothes from off the chair; but then, instead of looking into the pockets, he placed the entire collection gently on the floor. Here, then, came another reason for La Flèche delaying the use of his pistols in self-defence. Alas! how could he be so infatuated. Still more so was he when he saw the murderer slowly lift up his bulky frame, and with eyes intensely fixed upon his victim, as in fact they had been from the first moment of his approach, stand up erect upon the chair. Now, thought La Flèche, it is his plan to throw his weight upon me, prostrate as I am, and so prevent my slightest motion. Now is the time for putting an end to this horrible suspense—fire I will! La went his finger into the trigger guard—up was he about to start,—when again was he interrupted in his good resolve by seeing the knife-bearer stretch himself up to his utmost height, and lifting up his left hand, as also his deadly weapon,—gently cut off some slices of a ham hanging from the rafters near the head of the bed. His perilous achievement being accomplished, mine host crept quietly out of the room with as much precaution as he had entered it; and congratulating himself upon not having disturbed his guest, returned down stairs to broil the ham for some other traveller, who had arrived after my friend La Flèche had retired to bed.

I will leave my readers to conceive the self-congratulations of the cool-headed La Flèche, upon finding how nearly he had been brought to the sacrifice of an innocent life. A novelist would be able to write a chapter on this head alone; but as I can only write on facts, I will content myself by stating, that the next day our boat was thunderstruck on being acquainted by his guest how near he had been to falling a victim to his fear of waking "the gentleman in the best room," and vowed, that if ever he should require ham or bacon when such were gone to bed, to go about the business in a more open and less courteous manner. So "all's well that ends well." La Flèche lived many years to tell his story; and I dare say the Calabrian has since fried many a slice of ham without any risk of pistol bullets, or being taken for a murderer.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

EARLY HOME.

By Miss Atwell.

I'm weary of the city's roar and racket;
I pine to look on nature's quiet face;
And my sick spirit yearneth to go back.
Back to its early place.
O mine own country—my remembered home,
Shall I not yet be with thee—once again,
Laugh to the flowers, and wave, and dancing foam,
Greeting the birds and breezes as they roam?
Mid the quick shine and rain?
O mine own country! strange—aye, passing strange
Is the ineffably rich love that dwells,
Pure, bright, unutter'd or by chance or change
In my soul's home-cells!
And, oh! at memory's magic touch it flows
Like hidden sunshine from the dark cloud forth,
Dewy the petals of the faded rose,
Tinting with former light the later snows,
And shedding joy on earth!

TIME

By Mrs. Reynolds.

Time, the magician! teach whose hand
The strongest better as they stand.
Ere as they stand, a heap of clay,
Nile with an automating ray,
Time beckons, and they fall away!
Under the influence of his smile,
Youth flourishes serene awhile,
As the red roses in the sun
Are lovely ere the cold's begun—
Then as the circling years roll by,
The bloom of youth begins to fly,
As the rose shrivels to the black,
When summer's genial warmth has past.
Time then, impatient of our stay,
Time marks the period for decay,
And bears us to the tomb away.
Ere as the winter's ruthless snows
Crop the frail blossoms of the rose!
The man enthron'd in regal state,
Whose word the nations reverence;
Whose hand is mighty to destroy,
Whose glance is fraught with woe or joy;
Who sends his armies proudly forth,
To wreck a realm, or save the earth—
Must leave his kingdom for his doom,
And fall from empire to the tomb!

SONG.

Wind spirit! come—
Come, come unto me;
Bring me my lover
Across the blue sea.
Wait on my whistling his murmuring night,
Swift as the lightning that dash through the skies,
Hark! spirit, hark!
Young love condes your stay;
Spread your bright wings,
No longer delay.
Wind spirit! come—
Come, come unto me;
Bring me my lover
Across the blue sea.
Fear him in safety—no waves of the deep
Roll on your bright path; no storm spirits, sleep!
Roll, quickly roll,
On the crystal way;
Fancy will bear
The dash of the spray.

NOTES UPON INTEMPERANCE.

No. IX.

Or the American ships entering the port of Liverpool, nine out of every ten are navigated upon Temperance principles, the captain, officers, and crew, agreeing to abstain from the use of ardent spirits, except as medicine, and no supply beyond the very limited quantity used as such being taken for the voyage. Such ships obtain freight in preference to English vessels not navigated on those principles, in consequence of the public conviction of their greater safety, from the sobriety of those on board.

By the distillation of grain all those deleterious particles are collected, which, in baking, are thrown off in the form of steam.

Amongst the poor of London, milk has almost gone out of use; and the children of the poor are in general deprived of it;—the reason is that their parents' money is spent in drink and other extravagances to which intemperance leads.

Some time ago it was estimated that there were 100,000 drunkards in the United States of America; that of these one-third, that is to say, between 30,000 and 40,000 annually perished; and this occurred in a population of little more than 12,000,000. The population of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland is 24,000,000; and though we may admit that drinking is not here carried to the same extent as in America, we may nevertheless be enabled to form a conception of the mortality occasioned by intemperance in this country.

In the year 1758 distillation was stopped in Ireland; in this year the excess of baptisms over burials was twenty-five; whereas in 1757—59—60—61—and 62, the excess of burials over baptisms varied from twenty-five to ninety every year.

In Glasgow there was a very great increase in the mortality immediately after the year 1827 when the duty on distilled spirit was reduced.

At a meeting, in a country district of County Down, a young man presented a list of twenty-two persons of his own acquaintance, all of whom had lived within five miles of his own residence, and all of whom had perished miserably from drinking. Another young man of County Antrim furnished a list of twenty-seven persons whom he had known, and who came to untimely ends through drinking.

THE BRITISH EMPIRE IN THE EAST.

NO. III.—THE ARMY OF INDIA.

THIS army is as great a phenomenon in the annals of war as the Anglo-Indian empire in those of the world.

Who could have believed the possibility of forming an army in all respects excellent, where the soldier belongs to a religion different to that of his officers; where the soldier is the superstitious child of one hemisphere, the officer the enlightened native of another; where the soldier speaks one language, the officer another; where the soldier belongs to castes, that consider themselves contaminated by the slightest contact with other people, and rather die of hunger than eat anything in common with them, and yet blindly obey these officers!!! Who could believe that such an army could withstand the temptations of the spirit of revolt, the influence of national hate, the blind zeal of religious fanaticism? And yet this has happened in India, which has an army composed of more than 200,000 men, whose unshaken fidelity, amazing bravery, and great military proficiency, are proved by fifty campaigns, and by the experience of nearly a century.

The soldiers of the Anglo-Indian army (called Sepoys, i. e., esquires) are all natives of the country, belonging to different tribes, different castes, and different creeds; the infantry consists principally of men professing the Brahminical creed, the cavalry of Mohametzans. The army is divided into three corps, namely, one for each presidency, after which they take their names. The soldiers of the army of Bengal are mostly men of high caste; the Brahmin caste reckons more than 20,000 of its followers in its ranks. The soldiers of the Madras army are principally Raypoos; they are considered to be the most persevering, hardy warriors, but observe their religious customs so strictly, that the least deviation from them might have a dangerous effect on their discipline. The soldiers of the Bombay army belong more generally to the lower castes, are the more easily kept under discipline, but, perhaps, less brave than the others. No forced levy or conscription is to be found in India, all military service is voluntary (which is a great security for the preservation of subordination), and meets with so little difficulty, that each regiment possesses a number of supernumerary soldiers, who offer themselves as successors to such as may leave. The soldier is well paid, well clothed, well treated; not the slightest corporal punishment is allowed (which is the more astonishing, as the corporal punishments in the native English army, serving often together with the Hindoos, are very severe); blows inflicted on a Hindoo soldier, especially one of high caste, would as certainly cause a mutiny in a Hindoo regiment as in a French one. The laws of discipline are therefore nearly the same in the Anglo-Indian as in the French army—imprisonment; in the former army, however, there is a powerful hold which does not exist in the latter, that of dismissing the soldier who has committed a fault, which in India is a severe punishment, while in Europe it would often be a reward.

The Hindoo soldier resembles the French also in his placing an infinite value on marks of honour: a medal for bravery does wonders in India. Never has an English officer been deserted in the fire by his soldiers; where he leads they follow. Each company has an English captain, lieutenant, and ensign, and also a Hindoo captain, lieutenant, and ensign. The latter three are however, under the command of the British officers, so that, with the title and uniform of officers, they are, properly speaking, only subalterns, or non-commissioned officers. These are well paid, well used, and form an excellent link between the British officer and the Hindoo soldier. That which alone has rendered it possible, with such heterogeneous materials, to bring the Anglo-Indian army to that degree of perfection it now possesses, is, that it is constantly (the whole year through) in camp, when not in the field. The camps (which consist of a kind of huts, called Bungalows), are like those of the Romans, often surrounded with ramparts and ditches, and consist generally of a number of troops, from 3,000 to 15,000 men. The selection of these camps depends partly on military, partly on political grounds. They are either in some good military position, some central situation, or are chosen according to the more or less friendly political sentiments of the neighbouring states. Although, for instance, the government of Calcutta has not the least reason to doubt the friendly political sentiments of the King of Lahore, there are, nevertheless, generally in the neighbourhood of his states some camps, containing together a force of 20,000 or 30,000 men, which would be more than sufficient to oppose any attempt he might possibly make to disturb the peaceful state of things. The camps consist properly of infantry and artillery; the cavalry is in cantonments. In order to obtain the rank of an officer in the Company's service, the candidate must submit, not only to an examination in subjects of general and military knowledge, but also to one in three oriental languages: he must understand Sanscrit, and speak either Hindoostanee, the Bengali, or the Tamul languages, according to the army in which he wishes to be engaged.

The army consisted, in 1826, of 274,000 men, and amounted, in 1827, to 291,000, but, in 1837, did not exceed 190,000 men (exclusive, however, of contingent or subsidiary troops).

In the last mentioned year, this force was divided in the following manner:

Royal British Troops, commanded from Europe, to do service in India,—

	Men.
Staff	705
Horse Artillery	1897
Foot ditto	4,354
Engineers	77
Cavalry	2,585
Infantry	13,679
Officers	785
	23,783
European Troops in the direct service of the Company	2,600
Total of European troops	26,383

These troops are all in the Company's pay from the day they embark from England for India, to the day they return and disembark in England; the expenses for these troops amount to something more than a million sterling annually.

The native army consisted in 1837 of the following officers and soldiers:

	Men.
Staff (British)	318
Company's officers of British birth	3,416
Officers of Hindoo birth	3,416
Engineer Corps	3,498
Horse Artillery	1,022
Foot ditto	8,592
Artillery train	1,392
Cavalry	14,329
Infantry	124,281
	157,758
European troops	26,383
	184,141

The number of the contingent troops furnished by protected princes cannot be stated exactly, because, by several treaties, it depends on the pleasure of the Governor-General to decide according to circumstances; the probable amount is as follows:—

	Men.
Scindia's army	15,000
The King of Oude's, at least	10,000
The Nizam of Hyderabad	22,000
The Gaicwar of Baroda	7,000
Nagpoor, no fixed number, at least	2,000
Holkar, not fixed, at least	5,000
Travancore, 3 battalions of infantry	3,000
Cochin, 1 ditto	1,000
Mysore, not fixed, at least	4,000
Cutch, not fixed, can furnish	5,000
Joudpoor	1,500
The Raypoor Princes, together	34,000
Sattara	5,000
	114,000

The contingent or subsidiary troops amount, therefore, to 114,000 men, which, added to the 185,000 partly European, partly native troops, in the direct pay of the Company, comprise a force at the disposal of the Governor-General of no less than 300,000 men.

The expense of the Anglo-Indian army, according to the accounts laid before Parliament in 1830, was as follows:—

The Engineer Corps	83,974
The Artillery	606,463
The Cavalry	1,070,834
The Infantry	4,124,079
Staffs	458,490
The Medical Staff	132,490
Pioneers	74,571
The Commissariat	614,327
Sundries	2,178,857
	£ 9,373,955

The cavalry is excellently mounted, the greater part on horses bred in the studs of the Company, of Arabian and Turkoman blood. The Company has also similar establishments for elephants and for camels. The number of these is not less than 3,000 of the former, and 40,000 of the latter.

A very remarkable circumstance in the Anglo-Indian army is, that though it has a well-organized commissariat since the enlightened government of the Marquis of Hastings, the great spirit of speculation among the Hindoos, which induces them to accompany a British army on its taking the field, and to supply it not only with necessities, but with luxuries, could possibly make this army independent of the supplies procured by its commissariat. A quarter of an hour after the army has halted, there is behind it a whole fair of eating-houses, taverns, merchants, &c., where, for ready money, both the officers and soldiers can be supplied with all that they want. This spirit of speculation goes so far that the English officers have often an opportunity to purchase of these sutlers, in the midst of the sandy deserts of India, every thing that can be obtained in the shops of London or Paris. The baggage arising from this is certainly considerable, and the more so, as the Hindoo merchants take their families with them: it causes, however, less embarrassment in the movements of the army than might be imagined: as it is principally conveyed by oxen and camels and it is under the command of an officer who, riding on an elephant supplied with a flag, directs the march, in such a manner that it does not hinder the movements of the army. This officer also gives the signals for breaking-up or halting, and appoints the place where the booths shall be put up.

In order to give an idea of the state of the commanding officers and generals in India, we quote the late Dr. Heber:—"Sir David Ochterlony, the Government's agent to the petty princes in Western Central-India, and arbitrator between them, holds a royal state. His income amounts to 15,000 silver rupees a month, and is entirely expended. The number of his British and Hindoo adjutants, secretaries, and servants; the multitude of elephants, camels, and horses, following him on his journeys, the strength of his guard of honour, the number and magnificence of those tents which form his camp—among which, those inhabited by himself and his daughter are surrounded by a court, lined with scarlet cloth—all this surpasses every idea a European can form of it, and reminds one of the former grandeur and riches of the Indian courts."

Jacquemont relates that Governor-General Lord William Bentinck, who, nevertheless, is a man without pretension, had a suite of 4,000 persons, mounted on 30 elephants, 700 camels, and more than 1,000 horses, on his journey in the northern provinces of Hindoostan, in the year 1831.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1840.

Of all the evils which emanated from the box of Pandora, and settled upon the devoted heads of suffering humanity, none has so successfully fulfilled its terrible destiny as that of Intemperance. Intemperance has deteriorated public health, augmented pauperism, ruined domestic morals, and menaced the human race with a degeneration towards the level of the brute creation. Intemperance has spread its baleful influence over every phase and gradation of society,—paralysed the arm of the strong, and rendered impotent the already feeble capacities of the weak,—undermined the principles of religion and virtue, and accelerated the downfall of those whose powers of self-control were always feeble,—robbed woman of that sense of decency and delicacy which ought so eminently to characterise her,—extinguished the honest glow of independent feelings in the breast of man,—placed an almost insuperable barrier in the way of education and progressive civilisation,—and traced out so extensive a chart of degradation, misery, disease, and crime, for the guidance of the frail bark of the human race, that naught but the strong hand of the pilot of Teetotalism can render the delusions of that chart vain and abortive. Intemperance, like the typhoon of the desert, has blighted the finest buds of human promise and hope; like the Goodwin quick-sands, it has swallowed up the choicest treasures of the human intellect; with the virulence of a pestilence, has it affixed its plague-spot upon the cheek of youth and beauty; delusive as the fascinating sounds of the Syrens' voices, has it allured thousands to the regions of destruction; fatal as the slow but certain poison known by the name of the Aqua Tophana, it sows in the breast of man the seeds of decline and pining decay; and, overwhelming as a mighty torrent that breaks the embankments formed by nature to controul its course, it has spread its devastating waves over the face of a lovely land, leaving not a single spot un-inundated by its impetuous billows.

The unfortunate girl who earns a precarious and loathsome livelihood by the sale of her personal charms, was once fair, chaste, and pure as the maiden of spotless reputation;—the youth, whose dreary existence is lingering away in all the horrors of the penal colonies, was at first artless, unsophisticated, and confiding as boys are wont to be previous to their acquaintance with the crimes of society;—the degraded husband and wife, whose home is characterised by hideous poverty and want, commenced their matrimonial career with bright prospects before them;—and that unfortunate girl, that youthful convict, and this wretched couple, have most probably been reduced to their respective states of degradation by the vice of intemperance. For, even if the resolution of an individual be proof (as it seldom is) against the insidious wiles of strong liquor,—even if he can so far controul his desires as to be contented with a small quantity of the still pernicious draught, he will yet incur the perils connected with the evil society into which the mere fact of frequenting the public-house must inevitably throw him. And, though a moderate-drinker himself, he will be compelled to listen to the ribald song, the obscene jest, and the filthy discourse of those who drink deeply; and, while he flatters himself that he is safe so long as he does not suffer himself to be beguiled into excess, his ruin is prepared by the sapping of his moral principles.

There is no possibility of dealing in hyperbole, while we depict the frightful consequences of intemperance. Let not the advocate of the moderation-doctrine urge his reasoning, when he remembers that all drunkards were moderate-drinkers at the commencement: let not medical opinion be adduced against us, when we point on all sides to the sickly looks—the sunken eyes—the trembling limbs—the livid lips—and the diseased frames, of our fellow-countrymen; and, lastly, let not the moralist be unmindful of the ruined characters, the dissipated fortunes, the decayed intellects, the lost chastity, the family neglect, the crowded gaols, the swarming hulks, the well-populated colonies, the numerous madhouses, the myriads of hospitals, and the often-erected scaffold—besides the conflagrations, the shipwrecks, the accidents, and the strife,—all of which are based upon Intemperance!

LA CONTESSA VERTOVA,

A HISTORICAL FACT.

IN Grumello, a village of the Bergamasco, stands the Vertova palace, where was enacted in the year 1703, a foul tragedy that has since exercised more than one Italian pen. We shall recount the story without ornament, in the shape in which tradition has preserved it.

The Count Vertova's youthful wife, a daughter of the noble Venetian family of Zigno, was a model of beauty, as her portrait testifies, which exists to this day in Bergamo; nor were the graces and virtues of her mind inferior to her personal charms. In those days it was a custom, sanctioned by the Venetian government, for the nobles to keep in their pay a number of satellites, or uomini d'arme, as they were called, miscreants whose hands were ever ready to execute the savage vengeance of their lords. At the head of the Count Vertova's uomini d'arme was a Captain Ferrabo, a man of good family, but of abandoned character, and guilty of such flagitious conduct as had occasioned his expulsion from the military service of the Republic. This man conceived a passion for the beautiful Countess, and, unused to put the least restraint on his desires, he did not hesitate to urge upon her his libertine proposals. His dishonourable suit was rejected at once with all the decisive force of indignant virtue; but the generous Countess concealed from her husband the audacity and perfidy of his dependent. Had there been one uncorrupted spot in the wretch's heart such unmerited kindness must have found it out, and made it thrill with repentance. But the same elements that feed the fragrance of the rose are converted into deadly poison in the veins of the nightshade, and Ferrabo saw in the Countess's refusal only the mortification of his wishes and of his self-love, and in her silence only the means of effecting his revenge.

The opportunity soon presented itself. Amongst the most frequent visitors at the Casa Vertova, was General Bosello, a member of a family that had given illustrious warriors to the Venetian republic. The general was no longer young, yet still might cherish the hope of finding favour in ladies' eyes. But the Countess he regarded only as the wife of a friend, and if he admired her rare beauty, he was not less insensible to her ingenuous purity of soul. He entertained the warmest friendship for her but never breathed a word that could give pain to the object of his esteem. Nevertheless he was the man whom Ferrabo resolved to make use of for the execution of his design. The Count Vertova ardently loved his young wife, but he was unhappily extremely prone to jealousy. Ferrabo, like another Iago, found it an easy task to persuade him that the General entertained a warm passion for the Countess, and that it was as warmly returned. The Count's jealousy, though uncorroborated by any proof, soon manifested itself in the harsh treatment he bestowed on his innocent lady; and to such a pitch was this carried that the General, who resided at Bergamo, heard of it, and learned with the utmost surprise and regret that he himself was the occasion of it. It is supposed that Ferrabo, who had always been particularly obsequious to the General, had himself conveyed this news to his ears, with the hope of inciting him to some step that would further his own scheme. Be this as it may, the event did turn out as Ferrabo would have had it. The General could not endure the thought that a lady he so highly esteemed should, without the shadow of a fault, be on his account so vilely suspected and ill-treated: accordingly he wrote to the Countess a letter, in which he proposed, if she pleased, to go to Grumello and personally to vouch for her innocence in the Count's presence, adding that there was no effort he would not eagerly make to restore her domestic peace. The General, believing Ferrabo to be in his interest, enclosed this letter to him and acquainted him with its contents, requesting him to convey it secretly to the Countess, and to contribute his exertions towards undeceiving the jealous Count. This was a fatal step: even of this innocent letter did the villain make a weapon for the destruction of his victim. He gave it to one of her women, desiring her to deliver it to her mistress, and immediately informed the Count that his wife carried on a secret correspondence with the General.

His jealousy inflamed to the utmost by this intelligence, the furious husband rushed to the Countess's chamber. Ferrabo, whose views it did not suit that the Count should become acquainted with the true contents of the letter, in vain attempted to restrain him, being satisfied for the present with having infused the poison into his soul, for the full effects of which he looked to another day. But accident favoured the traitor's design even more than his own perfidy. The Countess seated by the fire had just finished reading Bosello's letter, when she heard the door abruptly opened, and guessing it was her husband, either that she might not afford him an additional motive for anger, or from an involuntary impulse in which reflection had no part, she cast the letter into the fire. It was quickly consumed, but not so quickly but that the Count, who had witnessed the movement that gave it to the flames, could see enough of it to convince him it was a letter. This was enough for him,

"Trifles light as air
Are to the jealous confirmation strong
As proofs of holy writ."

He rushed from the room without uttering a word, leaving the Countess overwhelmed with dismay by the ferocity of his parting glance. The unhappy lady had no opportunity of justifying her innocence, for the Count, remaining no longer than to give Ferrabo orders to rid him of the adulteress, immediately set off with the utmost speed from the palace.

It was near midnight, and the Countess, having dismissed her women, was kneeling in the solitude of her chamber before the crucifix and invoking heaven in testimony of her innocence and of the purity of her heart, when the door which she had not yet locked was opened, and Ferrabo stood before her. He announced to her the fatal mandate issued by her husband, and offered to spare her life on condition she would submit to his embraces. A shock like this might well break down the spirit of a young and tenderly nurtured female, but the horror inspired by the ruffian's infamous proposal aroused her energies, and gave her courage to encounter death. "Execute," she said, "my husband's orders: he could not have imposed them on a fitter minister." "Commend your soul then to God," exclaimed the executioner, and going to the door he called in one of his cut-throats. The Countess, who had risen on Ferrabo's entrance, now sank again on her knees, and appealed from human cruelty to the infinite mercy of heaven. While she still prayed the assassin struck his keen stiletto into her neck below the ear, and instantly despatched her. The murderers threw the palpitating corpse through the window into the garden.

The news of this dreadful deed excited universal horror and compassion. The Count himself, though persuaded of his lady's guilt, was yet touched with contrition at having despoiled the earth of that flower of loveliness. But what was the agony of remorse, when from the assertions of Bosello, from the testimony of the Countess's friend, and above all from Ferrabo's own words, escaped him in his intoxication, the conviction smote him that not the slightest stain rested on the memory of his murdered wife. Instantly after the bloody deed Ferrabo, aided and munificently rewarded by him, had made his escape, and taken refuge in the Valtellina. But the asylum which sheltered him from the rigour of the laws protected him not from the vengeance of the Count: the latter sent one of his satellites into La Valtellina to kill him, and the assassin of the Countess was himself slain in a garden by another assassin. It is worthy of remark that from the progeny of this Ferrabo sprang another wretch, who in our day deprived his own wife of existence upon unjust suspicion, and afterwards died himself a miserable death.

Proceedings were instituted against the Count, and his estate confiscated. He repaired to Rome, where he married again, and finally his property was restored: for in those days the balance of Italian justice was awayed with a partial hand in favour of the powerful. But never more was the villa of Gramello inhabited by the Counts of Vertova, and it remained in all things as it was on the day of the murdered Countess's death. The lapse of a century or more makes no striking change in the appearance of Italian mansions, for many of them, continually inhabited, retain in modern days their antique style and furniture—but here, in these voiceless rooms, in the furniture never moved from where they had been placed by hands on which the turf had rested more than a century and a quarter, in the thickly accumulated dust, in the air of desolation contrasted with the faded tokens of former life and luxury, there was something of a silent horror that well accorded with their dismal history. The spectator's breath froze within him, and the warm currents of life grew chill in presence of these mute remembrancers of a deed of blood: if he cast his eyes to the ground a slight stain, but oh! how full of meaning, showed him the spot where the suffering heart of a gentle and lovely woman was stilled for ever.

ALCOHOL.

ALCOHOL is considerably lighter than water; viz. in the proportion of 800 or 820 to 1000. The lightest that can be obtained, by simple distillation from spirits of wine, has the specific gravity of 825. By the intervention of substances which strongly attract water, Chausier brought it to the specific gravity of 798, and Lovitz and Saussure, jun., to 791 or 792. Alcohol of the specific gravity 820 still contains about one-tenth its weight of water. When of the specific gravity 920, it has been called proof spirits; the term above proof is used to denote a spirit lighter than this, and under proof signifies one which contains a larger portion of water. Rectified spirit is directed by the London Pharmacopæia to have the specific gravity of 835; but it seldom exceeds 840.

Alcohol unites chemically with water; and caloric is evolved during this union. Equal measures of alcohol and water, each at 50° Fahrenheit, give by sudden admixture an elevation of nearly 20° of temperature; and equal measures of proof-spirit and water an increase of 9½°. The bulk of the resulting liquid is less also than that of the two previous to admixture. Thus a pint of alcohol and a pint of water, when the mixture has cooled to the temperature of the atmosphere, falls considerably short of two pints.

Alcohol is highly inflammable. During its combustion, carbonic acid is generated: no charcoal appears; and a quantity of water is produced, which exceeds in weight the alcohol employed. The flame of alcohol acquires a red colour from muriate of lime, a deep blood-red from the muriate of strontites, and a green tinge from boracic acid.

Alcohol is a fluid which is remarkably expansible by heat. It boils at 176°. If water be added, its boiling point is proportionably raised, so that the temperature at which it boils is not a bad test for its strength. At this degree of heat, it is converted into a vapour, which may be exploded by passing an electric spark through a mixture of it with oxygen gas.

Alcohol has never yet been congealed by any known method of producing artificial cold. Even when distilled with an equal weight of water, it requires a cold of 6° below 0 to congeal it.

Alcohol is a powerful solvent. It dissolves soap—vegetable extract—sugar—oxalic, camphoric, tartaric, gallic, and benzoic acids—volatile oils—resins—and balsams.

By distillation with the more powerful acids, alcohol undergoes an important change. It is converted into a liquid considerably lighter than alcohol, and much more volatile and inflammable, and miscible only in small proportions with water. This fluid has received the generic name of ether. It has long been shewn that alcohol must of necessity be liberated during the fermentation of bread; and the terrible tastes of humanity have perverted this scientific fact to a dread account. Large bakeries have lately been erected for the purpose of manufacturing bread and collecting the spirit which is thus produced; and this is effected by the use of a close oven, and refrigerator, somewhat similar to the ordinary process of distillation.

The following is a table of the quantity of alcohol, of specific gravity .825 at 60° Fahrenheit, in various liquors, taking a hundred measures of each kind:—

Port	23.48	British Wine	22.50
Madeira	24.42	Cider	9.87
Sherry	19.19	Ale	8.88
Marsala	25.87	Stout	6.80
Claret	14.13	Brandy	53.39
Champagne	12.10	Rum	52.68
Burgundy	14.53	Hollands	51.60

The intoxicating qualities of brandy, rum, and gin, are certainly more than double those of Port, Sherry, or Madeira; but the various ingredients, with which the alcohol is combined in wines diminish its activity upon the animal system. But those ingredients are for the most part so many virulent poisons introduced into the human frame.

THE BETHUNES.

THERE is before us an account of one young man, or rather of two young men of genius, a sketch of whose lives is more pregnant with excellent example than perhaps any that has been published for a long time. Rustics, in the humblest walks, and obliged to earn a livelihood by incessant and heavy labour, they yet maintained a rare independence of spirit; their sobriety, industry, thrift, charitableness, and achievements, even in the walks of literature, being full of instruction and encouragement. One of the young men, however, (they were brothers) is more particularly the subject of the details that are now to follow, although the other, in the capacity of biographer, comes out with features, unpretendingly indicated, not less invitingly.

The book referred to is "Poems, by the late John Bethune; with a sketch of the author's life, by his brother." A work called "Tales and Sketches of the Scottish Peasantry," which appeared about two years ago, the joint production of the brothers, has by the circumstances of the writers, and the truthful power, as well as beautiful tone of the pictures it presented, made the name of Bethune known beyond the corner in which they were born and bred.

Fifehire was the birth-place of John Bethune, his father's rank being that of a farm-servant, or forester at best. Hear what were his efforts to support his parents and earn the proud satisfaction of being independent, while but a boy of tender years! Says the biographer,—"During the winter of 1823-4, to assist in supporting himself, he broke stones on the road between Lindore and Newburgh, along with me. He was then under thirteen years of age; and when from the intense cold which occasionally prevailed, and the lack of motion to which his employment subjected him, his legs and feet were almost frozen, instead of complaining, and making this an excuse for running home, as a number of boys would have done, I was frequently amused in no ordinary degree by the droll observations which he made, and the wild gambols to which he sometimes had recourse to restore the natural warmth to his benumbed extremities. From his father having been subject to disease of the bowels for a number of years previous, and the numerous expedients, all attended with expense, which had been resorted to for the purpose of restoring him, the family were at this time considerably in debt. Young as he was, he had already caught that spirit of independence which characterized him through life; and his enthusiasm now pointed forward to the time when he should be able to redeem these debts. To accomplish this object, there was no personal suffering, and no sacrifice of boyish pleasure, which he would not willingly have encountered; and thus he persevered at an occupation from which, in winter, even full-grown men might be excused from shrinking."

And here the reader will not fail, amid the admiration which had begun to stir his feelings relative to the resolute boy who made the "droll observations" to keep his courage up, and the "wild gambols" to warm his limbs, to note how modestly and becomingly the surviving brother tells his story. He keeps himself as much in the background as possible, although it must already be manifest to the most superficial reader that his mind and feelings are worthy of a man of education and refined sympathies. And yet he is constantly upon those who take up the sketch. For instance, he says in the preface,—"For no inconsiderable share of what has been noticed, I can only expect to be pardoned, and when it is known that our feelings and pursuits were almost the same, that we never knew what it was to have separate interests for a single moment, that we had buffeted, or rather been buffeted by fortune together from boyhood—that we had supped from the same table, sat by the same fire, and slept in the same bed, with very few interruptions, from the period of infancy—and that we were nearly the last of the name and race to which we belonged,—the reader may perhaps be inclined to extend that pardon to one who has now so much of deep and melancholy interest connected with the past, to ponder over."

Before John Bethune had betaken himself to stone-breaking he had been a herder of cows; he had also been for some time to school, where he proved dull to learn. The interest, however, which he began to take in the annals of the Covenanted Martyrs, in the story of "Wallace Wight," the Poetry of Burns, and other household and traditional literature so dear and stirring to the peasantry of Scotland, awoke his ambition not only to learn to read these national works, but to try his hand in composition. Not long after the breaking of stubborn granite on the road-side had been relinquished, both brothers were benefitted and inspired by a student from St. Andrews, who kept a school in their vicinity, struggling hard in vacation time, like hundreds of other poor Scotch scholars, many of whom shine in the learned professions afterwards, to earn a small sum to carry him through an university education. This student "was an excellent reciter of poetry, and had stored his memory with a number of the best pieces of Scott, Byron, Moore, and others. With these he frequently amused and delighted his acquaintance, during his leisure hours, a considerable part of which were spent with us."

Still John's literary attainments could not at this period have been considerable; for it is stated by the writer of the Sketch that although his poetical efforts had begun to be frequent, yet that when he was eighteen, he had to surmount the difficulties of orthography. For this purpose he carried a little work called "The Christian Remembrancer," of which he was then remarkably fond, always in his pocket. From the short poems, of which nearly one half of the book is composed, he selected one, and when going to and returning from his work, as well as in his journeys at dinner time, he was in the habit of conning it over till he had fixed the spelling of every word in his memory; after which he took another, and thus proceeded to the end of the work.

Many of the early efforts alluded to are now scarcely legible, owing to circumstances remarkable in themselves. Necessity is the mother of invention; John Bethune's poverty, yet ardour, set him upon sundry curious contrivances and ingenious shifts. The paper which he generally wrote upon consisted of such scraps as came to the family with little grocery goods, &c. and which were exposed to all the casualties, such as smoke, dust, and even occasional drenchings with rain water; incidental to a humble and poor dwelling.

Small beginnings these! the reader will exclaim; but when it is noted how John perseveringly struggled with the buffetings of fortune, or rather acquiesced in the ways of Providence, without fainting, not even appearing to have murmured, but tried again and again, it will be seen that gifted and inspired in a literary sense as he was, yet that perhaps a brighter and certainly rarer attribute of his character was moral courage, stern resolution, and a high-souled independence. Therein lay the most instructive features of his history and of his genius.

Returning to some passages in the fortunes of the two brothers which have been passed over in the hasty glance at John's literary progress, it deserves first to be mentioned that after looking out for a less laborious occupation than that of breaking stones, the boy got for a short time apprenticed to a weaver. Says the brother,—"To the adoption of this measure there were at the time many inducements. By exerting himself he said he was certain he could earn 2s. 6d. a day; my earnings then amounted to very little more than half that sum, and for this reason he wished to teach me his own trade, in which he believed my labours would be better rewarded than in that I had formerly followed. From the estate having exchanged masters, his father, too, had lost his situation as forester; and being now, from the infirmities of approaching age, unable to endure the privations and hardships incident to the life of a common labourer to provide for his comfort in the evening of his days, was another motive for making the most of everything. With these objects in view, a house adjoining the one in which his father lived, which chanced to be then empty, was taken as a workshop; by the most desperate economy, about 10% had been previously saved to purchase looms, and other articles appropriate to weaving; and at Martinmas, 1825, he commenced that business on his own account, with the writer of this sketch as an apprentice. The 10% was fairly expended in procuring a proper supply of utensils."

Winter is always a pinching portion of the year to the poor; and any one who peruses the Sketch from beginning to end will observe, that in the month of November John's vicissitudes generally occurred;

In the winter of 1823-4, he was thirteen years of age. In 1825 he commenced business as a master-weaver. But alas! the panic and the distress which smote the country about the latter period rendered the weaving enterprise abortive; so that he was again obliged to betake himself to out-house toil. He got in November employ in a water-course, which was followed by a severe illness, and in all probability it laid the foundation of a fatal disease. On his recovery, however, occupation in certain plantations and gardens was obtained, which uplifted his heart; for he began to look forward with the cheering prospect of rising above poverty. But again alas! on the 11th of November, 1829, "when the writer of this sketch was employed in blasting a rock, a quantity of gunpowder exploded, and throwing him into the air, left him nearly lifeless." What could John do?—

"To his untiring benevolence and warm affection, upon this occasion, I can bear ample testimony. Patiently did he watch by my bed-side till it was supposed I was out of danger; and then to provide for the exigencies of the family, which now depended upon him alone to support, he wrought at his former occupation by day, and took his turn to watch by night, till I could be left with safety. The result of this accident was a heavy expenditure, occasioned by distress, and four months inability to labour; at the end of which period, from his exertions in behalf of his unfortunate brother, he again found himself in debt."

By the time at which the severe accident overtook the writer of the Sketch, John had betaken himself, stealthily to be sure, as will be more particularly explained below, but eagerly to composing verses, which, it may be supposed, would in some degree interfere with his regular occupations, and his duties in the family, as well as a member of society. But not even while an enthusiast for an engaging, and oft an all-absorbing pursuit, "he was never absent a day, or even an hour, when the weather admitted of going abroad; and if at any time he was inclined to fret, it was when kept at home by rain or deep snow. I think I may also affirm, without fear of contradiction, that there scarcely ever was a man who gave his time or his assistance to his poorer fellow creatures more willingly than he did. Whatever he may have accomplished, in another way, it was done solely by keeping one object steadily in view, and devoting to it the whole of those hours which others devote to amusement, idle conversation, and visiting acquaintances."

He was the widow's zealous and conscientious friend, and lent, says the brother, "a large share of assistance for several years, in cultivating the gardens of three widows. From the month of March, till the gardening season was over, it was his custom to work from five in the morning till it was time to go abroad, putting such crops as we required ourselves into the ground. When he returned from the labours of the day at six in the evening, he despatched a hasty supper, went to the place where his assistance was expected, and wrought while daylight lasted, or, when the season was more advanced, till ten at night. Widow with him was a sacred name; he had read in his Bible the denunciations of wrath against those who oppressed or troubled them, and the constant injunctions to treat them with kindness and sympathy; and in whatever light others might regard them, he never could think of allowing any personal consideration to stand between him and those services, upon which he considered them as having claim from the Word of God. So severe, however, were the labours which he imposed upon himself in this way, that as the Spring advanced, I have frequently heard him say, 'I am almost scared, man, to think that the yard-season is coming on again.'"

Disease was by this time sending him intimations which were significant of early decay and death. Still he toiled, and saved sums of money, small in amount in one sense to be sure, but extraordinarily large in another, again to be spent virtuously and endearingly. "As an evidence of his industry," says his brother, "and a proof that the 'miserable earnings,' as he termed them, were not squandered upon idle indulgences, it may be also mentioned, that from them, previous to November 1832, about 14l. had been again saved. In the spring of 1833, the reader will recollect that he was rather in debt; little more than two years had passed since then; and when it is known that his earnings seldom exceeded 19l. in any year—that, besides himself, he had at least one of his parents to support—that he was in the habit of giving considerable sums in charity, and, perhaps, still more for books—some idea may be formed of his personal expenditure. This could not possibly exceed 7l. per annum, food, clothing, and everything.—Having thus mentioned his little savings, I hope the reader will pardon me for stating the manner in which they were expended. On the 8th of November, 1832, the writer of this sketch was once more subjected to the effects of gunpowder, by an accident in a quarry; and before he was able to resume his work, the last farthing of the 14l. was gone, and the author of the following poems, and the narrator of his story, were left to begin the world again, with only the clothes on their backs; and these, having already seen severe service, promised soon to leave them."

There was no need for apologizing; for the particulars so unostentatiously here communicated are valuable and worthy of being widely known. The "short and simple annals of the poor," their vicissitudes, their aspirations and their destinies, are as dear to them, yes, and as deserving of being recorded, as are the histories and the fates of warriors and statesmen.

Up to the latter part of 1833 John had prosecuted his literary labours as secretly as if he had been committing a crime cognizable by the law of the land. The family's residence had but one apartment, so that to avoid detection he wrote upon his knee, having within reach an old newspaper constantly lying, under which to thrust his manuscript when any one might happen to call, generally taking up a book also to help the disguise. The inconveniences attendant on such a method drove him to plan and execute a way of escape, to accommodate himself in the winter evenings; for in summer, after his ordinary toil, at a small vacant space at the farthest end of the dwelling, which was long and narrow, and where there was a single pane of glass to light it, the youthful poet was in the habit of enclosing himself. It may be as well before proceeding to any later period in his life to let the reader hear what might be the outpourings of his muse in such an unpretending corner.

Says his brother, "on one of these evenings I had taken sanctuary in this quarter before he came home. The sun shone cheerfully in at the little window, giving an air of warmth to the place, and making visible a long level streak of its dim smoky atmosphere. When he arrived, with his writing materials in his hand, he leaned upon the chest where my papers were lying, and said, 'if you would stop for a few minutes, man, I would let you hear my last production.' He then read, with a low musical voice, the following lines:—

HYMNS OF THE CHURCH-YARD.

Ah, me! this is a sad and silent city:
Let me walk softly o'er it, and survey
Its grassy streets, with melancholy pity!
Where are its children? Where their gleesome play?
Alas! their cradled rest is cold and deep,
And slimy worms watch o'er them as they sleep.
This is pale beauty's bourn; but where the beautiful
Whom I have seen come forth at evening hours,
Leading their aged friends, with feelings dutiful,
Amid the wreaths of spring to gather flowers?
Alas! no flowers are here, but flowers of death;
And those who once were sweetest sleep beneath.
This is a populous place; but where the bustling—
The crowded buyers of the noisy mart—
The lookers-on—the showy garments rustling—
The money-changers—and the men of art?
Business, alas! hath stopp'd in mid career,
And none are anxious to resume it here.
This is the home of grandeur: where are they—
The rich, the great, the glorious, and the wise?
Where are the trappings of the proud, the gay—
The gaudy guise of human butterflies?
Alas! all lowly lies each lofty brow,
And the green sod disdains the beauty now.
This is a place of refuge and repose:
Where are the poor—the old—the weary wight—
The scorn'd—the humble—and the man of woes—
Who wept for morn' and sigh'd again for night?
Their sighs at last have ceased, and here they sleep,
Beside their scorners, and forget they weep.
This is a place of gloom: where are the gloomy?
The gloomy are not citizens of death;
Approach and look: where the long grass is plummy,
See them above! they are not found beneath—
For these low denizens with artful wiles,
Nature, in flowers, contrives her mimic smiles.
This is a place of sorrow: friends have met,
And mingled tears o'er those who answer'd not:
And where are those whose eyelids then were wet?
Alas! their griefs, their tears are all forgot;
They, too, are lank'd in this silent city,
Where there is neither love, nor tears, nor pity.
This is a place of fear: the firmest eye
Hath quail'd to see its shadowy dreariness;
But Christian hope, and heaven's prospects high,
And earthly cares, and nature's weariness,
Have made the timid pilgrim cease to fear,
And long to end his painful journey here.
"Of these, the first verse rose spontaneously while walking in the church-yard during the interval of public worship, and the others had been added on the Monday morning."

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE DRUNKEN MINISTERS.

How different from Mr. Macvicar, was the character and history of the reverend Mr. Potter, a man as coarse and vulgar in every way as the other was refined and polished. His very exterior indicated all this; and when he spoke or preached the impression was confirmed; for it was as if a blunderbuss had been shooting mud.

Mr. Potter's social habits were in perfect keeping with his exterior indications; and as to his passions they were of an equally low cast. His belly was his god both as to meats and drinks. He was an enormous swallower of whatever came to hand; but the "chief-tan of the pudding race," the Scotch Haggis, was his pet dish, the fatter the better; and then it required almost gallons of liquid to float and neutralise the gross strength of the mass.

One other feature in his character must be mentioned, and then I shall conclude with an anecdote of him. Next to intemperate eating and drinking, the most disgusting of his vices was,—(I was going to say avarice, but that term conveys to my mind an idea far too dignified for the case) greed, gross greed; which showed itself most offensively when he carried too large a quantity of stimulants. There was nothing which he saw, and which could be used by him that he did not desire to possess. He would have recourse not only to round-about ways to signify his wish, but if these failed, he would beg in downright terms, always endeavouring however to let it be felt how much honour the giver to the "Minister" would do to himself by the presentation of an offering. He once published a stupid sermon, and had the face to ask the printer to execute his part of the business gratuitously, because forsooth "it would be promoting the kingdom of God!"

Most of Mr. Potter's parishioners were fully as shrewd as he was, and learned to invite him to an abundant feed and copious libations of rum, only when they were in want of amusement, or had a wish to see him make a fool of himself; and as to gifts, they generally took care to tempt him with what was of little value to themselves, or would be only lumber to him.

It was on a hot summer's day that Mr. Potter was to dine with the Laird of Mucklewame, a Scotch Haggis and Leeward Island as well as Jamaica Rum being emphatically mentioned in the invitation. Ample justice was done to the same by the parson, who, however, was such a soaking sandbank, that he was always able to appear sober; the more he gulped down his huge throat only appearing to render him more heavy and stolid,—more pertinacious in uttering common place sentiments, and in moralizing over even the most trifling thing. On the day in question, for example, the Laird of Mucklewame's stable dung-hill was sending forth a cloud of smoke like a lime-kiln, and this the Minister chose to compare to the temporary prosperity, pride, and riches of the wicked. "Yonder bay tree, Mr. Potter," observed the Laird, "would afford a more elegant and scriptural similitude." "Not so rich, not so rich," replied the man of blubber. But I must proceed.

As Mr. Greediness was returning home in the evening with a gravity not of a sacred sentimental kind, but imposed partly by corporeal necessity, and partly as a professional index, he took his way along the banks of the Clyde for some distance, and by a foot-road, in order to "meditate" as he termed it, "amid the beauties of nature." Incongruous combination! The soil and some of the loveliest scenery of Scotland together! Why, he should have kept by the reeking dung-hill!

Well, a farm house was in the way, and of course he must needs "call in," and have a word of "advice" to bestow. He found the family preparing supper, which consisted of rumblety-thump, that is, beat potatoes, milk and seasonings being freely mingled, presenting a dish which Sir Henry Stuart has said is "fit for a prince."

Now the family was small, and therefore the pot in which the rumblety-thump was preparing was not very large; yet it seemed just of a size that would suit the Minister's kitchen. The anecdote however will be best given in the way of dialogue, according as it took place on the occasion. Says Mrs. Wilson, "will you try our champt potatoes Mr. Potter?" "Why, I'll ask a blessing and just taste." "Your're welcome I'm sure." "Of course, of course, but really I must cool myself for a moment; the evening is warm, very warm indeed. Let me have a little water." "Oh, no water by itself, that's dangerous, bring the bottle gudeman." "That's good whisky of yours, Mrs. Wilson, and now—the supper."

I shall not say how much of the rumblety-thump, or champt potatoes passed down the throat of the Minister. Suffice it to mention that the whole was finished, even although the farmer and his wife ate sparingly, in observance of "gude manners." I must however give some idea of the conversation which took place during the process of supping.

Quoth the Minister, "that's a very neat pot of your's Mrs. Wilson, I have not seen a more convenient thing of the sort. Mrs. Potter has long been thinking of buying one of that shape and bigness, for one of her's is too small, and another too large, and that is just the size between them that would suit us. It is really a very nice pot; I think I must have its measure taken. I observe its mouth is narrow in comparison with the rest of the vessel, which shows taste in the founder. I dare to say the Carron people made it; now ours are by a very inferior maker." "Waheed, Mr. Potter, I canna tell without lunking wha made the pat; but for any thing I perceive it is nae way extraordinary. Its belly is nae doot wider than its mouth, but I imagine that it is a usual thing. Yet be this as it may, it serves our purpose vera weel. Howsomever, if ye think Mrs. Potter wad have any particular use for the pat, she or you, Sir, is extremely welcome to it; we can get another at a sma price." "Of course, of course; but I always find that my people have more satisfaction in seeing their Minister comfortable.—I mean, in knowing that his mind is kept quiet and tranquil for the due performance of his numerous and solemn duties, than in caring about small things for themselves. And small things have a wonderful effect on my tranquility. A studious learned man will be disturbed at the sight, for instance, of the slightest confusion of the furniture of his room, and more so when his wife may interrupt him by saying such and such a thing is wanting. Mrs. Potter has come to understand all this, and now makes it her business to let my parishioners know what are the little things that will contribute to my comfort, or rather that will save her from being obliged to break in upon my meditations and studies. She does so, and my people always meet her wishes and views. It is right that they should do so; and they are always the better off for it. A blessing attends every act that contributes, were it but to the extent and value of that trifling vessel, to the forwarding of the grand cause. Common people cannot understand how much depends on the repose of mind, and the minutiae that may create that condition, in the case of the Ministers of the Gospel; but what I have stated is quite according to the philosophy of our mental constitution."

After this long-winded exposition, Mrs. Wilson, who, like her husband, could hardly refrain from laughing at the greedy fool, and certainly would have striven to do so in vain, had their disgust not neutralized the emotion, said, "I dinna ken ony thing about the philosophy of the mental constitution, but this ken that Mrs. Potter, or Mr. Potter either, is welcome to the pot: here Jamie gie it a gude wash outside and inside, and tak it to the Manse." "No occasion, no occasion," the Minister replied; "I am going straight home, by the foot-road that leads through the fields, and that takes me to the back door of my garden; so that if the lad will just do the work of cleaning, I shall not consider it much inconvenience to carry the vessel in my own hand." This was far better in the way of fun than Mrs. Wilson could have expected, or by any means brought about; so that she backed the Minister by observing to the effect that really great people were the most humble.

Away goes the solemn-faced Mr. Potter with the pot, to the most extravagant merriment of the Wilsons. He soon found, however, that although at first it was but light as regarded weight, yet that it seemed to grow rapidly heavier and heavier. At the same time it was an inconvenient article to carry, since he felt himself obliged to keep it, as it were at arm's length, in order to save "the cloth." What was to be done? A bright thought occurred to the man. "My hat," thought he, "is lighter than the pot, while my neck and shoulders are strong." So, taking off his tile from a profusely powdered skull, he put on the pot which he had previously ascertained, sat with the nicest precision upon his upper-story; and thus in the twilight he paced along the little-frequented foot-path.

It so happened that the man had a considerable gap in the path to stride over, and which, in fact, in the case of a pedestrian, so far from agile as was the Minister, required, if not a jump, which he could ill afford, yet a sort of bounding exertion which somewhat shook the frame. And what was the consequence! Why, the utensil proved treacherous, for instead of abiding where it should have done, it slid down suddenly, and quite over the fleshy proboscis, in a moment enclosing the head-of-beef—entire in its so much admired belly. Here was a predicament for a Minister to be in; yea, and for any man who was bending his way alone, and unguided by wall or fence of any kind. He bawled, but the voice escaped not the belly of the pot to any distance; and even had one stood by his side, the noise was only that of Mr. Potter's mud blunderbus voice with a coarser and more smothered effect than ordinary. He durst not move, lest he should fall into a ditch, or over some precipice, and break his neck. He found too that the more he roared, and the longer the cast-iron instead of the felt encased his head, the hotter he grew; so that the perspiration and the wetted hair-powder streamed down his cheeks, streaking in diverse fantastic ways his black coat.

He at length got so tired, and so worn out with sheer anxiety and dread, (where was now his mental philosophy?) that he sat him down, convinced that alive or dead, he would have to remain there, so strangely hooded, all night. On sitting down, however, and his hands feeling the beaten track, and her bright thought occurred to him. "Should I proceed on all-fours," said he to himself, "I shall, however slowly, be at length able to reach home." Accordingly he betook himself to this method of travel, and was also delighted to experience that his breathing was wonderfully relieved by the manner in which his iron hood now dropped and hung down. Indeed it was amazing how the paunchy and usually inert lump continued to move on; although it was still more comical to behold something like a huge black ram, with an anomalous head however, butting his way along a peaceful path in Clydesdale, in the fashion described; for fortunately he was beheld in the posture and in the sort of progress mentioned, by a wag of a fellow, a blacksmith, whose house was hard by.

I shall not stop to relate what first passed between the smith and the parson, nor how the one gazed and grinned, or the other groaned; but conclude the story by stating that as the Minister's face and nose had become considerably enlarged by the violent efforts which he had used to rid himself of a disagreeable hood, not to speak of the difference there often is between putting a thing on and taking it off, it was suggested by the mechanic that his reverence should accompany him to the smithy and have the pot split or broken to pieces. It was obvious that nothing else could be done to liberate the man, than have the vessel demolished.

Having arrived at the smithy, the blind-folded and bushelled Minister made sundry inquiries as to the precise method of procedure to be adopted; to all which the wag either gave some alarming answer, or caused the question to be so often repeated, pretending not distinctly to take up the meaning of the smothered words, that the imprisoned head was almost as much perplexed as it had been just before its owner betook himself to all-fours.

At length the smith declared that by far the speediest and most effectual method would be for Mr. Potter to allow his head and its encasement to be laid on the anvil, and there smashed, "for," said he, "one good stroke will splinter the metal and set at least the better part of you free;" and "Jist down went the rotundity, the man of the hammer thinking it fine sport thus to frighten the Minister. When down, the breath and voice obtained once more, considerable freedom; and then it was Mr. Potter's request that the operation should be stayed until it was tried whether a file would not do the job. "Out of the question," quoth he of the anvil, "I might file away till the morning, and then be obliged after all to take to the hammer." "Well then the blow must be gentle, I'm afraid of my head." "Then the more blows will be necessary," was the rejoinder. "Try one, but be careful," was the command. The smith acted accordingly, determined not at that time to break the pot. "Is it cracked?" inquired Mr. Potter. "Cracked? no, but either your head or the cast-metal rang like the kirk bell, or something very empty; I must try again." "You'll knock out my brains, John!" exclaimed the priest. "That's impossible,—I mean, deil o' fears," returned the tantaliser, adding, "here's for you." With that up went the strong arm; down went the unfeeling weapon; and asunder sped the iron, without the slightest injury being thereby done to the sorely beset Mr. Potter.

His face was frightful with swelling, clotted sweat, and an apoplectic fullness of blood. It was a deep purple mass which no one could have viewed without alarm and pity. Even the smith was conscience stricken on account of the manner in which he had trifled with his minister's extreme distress, and made the best amends he could by after assiduities. But unlike Mr. Mactavish as in every other way, also Mr. Potter's lesson was lost upon him. To be sure, he never again took familiarities with any one's potato boiler; but he eat, drank, and begged as greedily as before, earning a deeper and still deeper degree of disgust, and also giving many renewed occasions for the scorner as well as the intemperate man to strengthen his cause.

REVIEWS.

A Defence of Total Abstinence Societies. By JOHN CHARLES FITZGERALD, B. A. Trin. Col., Dublin. pp. 32. Manchester: W. Willis.

This little work is the report of a speech delivered in London by Mr. Fitzgerald, who is well-known as the translator of Sallust, and as the former editor of the True Sun and Weekly True Sun. The pamphlet contains an introductory notice of the origin and progress of Roman Catholic Total Abstinence Societies in the English metropolis, and specimens of speeches delivered by members of the working classes, including Mr. Whitaker's (the well-known Teetotal Advocate) admirable picture of a drunkard's various stages. The work is altogether highly creditable to the literary acquirements and moral character of Mr. Fitzgerald; and we do not hesitate to recommend it as a necessary meat to all the Teetotal advocates. We shall extract a few passages to lay before our readers, as samples of this very excellent little publication. Our first shall be in reference to the Roman Catholic Teetotal Societies:—

"The Roman Catholic Metropolitan Societies promise favourably, and owe much to the untiring advocacy of the Rev. Dr. Magee, Rev. Messrs. Doyle, Foley, Reardon, White, and other members of the priesthood. A Mr. McCarthy, who seems to know the secret springs of the Irish heart, proves a most valuable auxiliary to the cause. Mr. Haynes, a gentleman connected with the press, of rare oratorical powers, is, as far as we know, the most able lay advocate amongst the Roman Catholics. We, however, attach great importance to the advocacy of working men, who have not the polish or graces of the school. Their minds are more assimilated to those of their own class, and their mode of speech, and manner of putting a case, more likely to strike persons of their own station."

Speaking of Ireland, the author records the following admirable observations:—

"The Catholics with their characteristic love of unity, recognize one great leader, the Very Rev. Mr. Mathew, whose disinterestedness is evidenced in the large and frequent donations which he bestows, and also in the circumstance that his brothers and nearest relatives are extensive distillers."

"We augur glorious results from the moral reform now in progress amongst the Irish people. We are not, however, so unreasonably sanguine as to expect that all the votaries of sobriety, will, under every circumstance, and for ever, abstain in toto from the use of spirits or beer. We are, however, convinced that total abstinence, after having been sometime in operation, must have the effect of emancipating millions from a degrading habit, and attaching them to sobriety, the guardian of moral observances and moral order. Though we are not advocates for rules of indiscriminate and stoic-like severity, we nevertheless subscribe to the sound doctrine that 'desperate diseases require desperate remedies.' A bad habit cannot be overcome by compromise or half-and-half measures."

"Horace remarks: Culam non animum mutant, qui trans mare currunt." In our opinion, however, the Irish degenerate sadly after they have crossed the channel, and become improvident and careless of their religious duties. It is to be hoped that the fine examples every day furnished by the total abstinence schools will effect a miraculous change. The mercurial temperament of the Irish needs no artificial excitement. When seen in their true and natural character, they need not fear inspection. Let them not be their own caricatures by worshipping Bacchus."

We cannot take leave of this pamphlet, without again strongly recommending it to all our readers.

Report of the Public Discussion at Rotherham between the Rev. James Bromley and Frederic R. Lees. Second Edition. pp. 48. Leeds: S. Jowett.

Supplement to the Discussion. pp. 12. Leeds: J. —.

ALL the Teetotal world has heard of the celebrated discussion, which took place in August last, between Mr. Bromley, a Wesleyan Minister, and Mr. Lees, the talented Editor of the Temperance Advocate. We before noticed a vulgar and disgusting pamphlet published, to defend Mr. Bromley, in the form of "The Shevild chap's opinion" of the discussion. We have now an impartial and correct account of the debate, written by a person who was evidently unbiased in respect to his own sentiments, and whose statement is evidently worthy of belief. We have also a Supplement, commenting upon the "libels and falsehoods contained in the Observations on Teetotalism by James Bromley;" and from all that we can gather from these two publications, we feel convinced that the reverend gentleman has played a most silly and ridiculous part, converting himself into a mountebank for the behoof of a few degraded drunkards, and subjecting himself to the disgrace of a complete defeat in order to curry favour with those whose drinking customs he would fain defend. Without going deeply into the matter at present, it is sufficient to observe that no real or sincere Christian can attempt to defend or uphold those drinking usages; and no true disciple of Jesus will for one instant oppose himself to the only doctrine which is calculated to extirpate the terrible evil of intemperance. It is nothing short of sheer wickedness and blasphemy to seek for texts in the Bible, which are perverted into reasons for moderate drinking. Drinking is the source of crime and misery, and the word of God could not sanction so fertile a cause of human suffering. Had the vice of intemperance raged to a fearful extent in the time of Moses, or that of our Saviour, enactments and moral aphorisms against the use of intoxicating liquors would have doubtless been propagated by those who taught all that was good and beneficial for man: but the generations of the present day, must legislate for the crimes of the present day; and those laws or customs which suited our ancestors, must be modified or altered to a consistency with our interests. Mr. Bromley must be therefore a strange specimen of insanity, a miserable instance of ignorance, or a compound of many kinds of wickedness, to quote the Bible in defence of that moderate-drinking which is the half-way house on the road to intemperance. Mr. Lees made use of very sensible and manly arguments; and the Teetotal world is deeply indebted to him for having so ably exposed the bombastic ignorance or wanton wickedness of this precious minister of the gospel.

PYTHAGOREAN OBJECTIONS AGAINST ANIMAL FOOD.

It happened one day, (says Vacari, in his Charities of Nature.) that standing at my window, which looks forth upon the high road, I beheld a sight that filled me with pity, as it should do, to see a mother grieving for her babe, that is condemned to some heathenish sacrifice, moaning and wringing her hands, and following her child that is bound hand and foot to its bloody immolation. But this mother that I speak of was no human one—but a cow, in this manner following her offspring—a creature brutal indeed, and incapable of speech; and yet with her moanings and contortions of her body, making up as it were such a chorus of dumb eloquence, as needed not the help of words, but seemed rather incapable of translating by any power of language—sometimes running on one side of the cart, which contained her darling, and sometimes on the other—and often kissing, in her fashion, the black and white face that hung over the back of the machine in a painful manner: she uttered the most lamentable moans, whilst the writhing of even the tufted end of her tail, exhibited how anguish pervaded her whole body. It was piteous, besides, to see her rolling her large eyeballs here and there, with all the bewilderment of a grief which knows not where to seek its remedy—anon, fixing her gaze fiercely upon some dog or man, that she fancied intended some injury to her calf, she made a run at the enemy with her horns,—at sight of which many maidens and mothers, who were walking with divers children on the footways, took refuge in the nearest shops. Nevertheless, when this seeming danger was over, they came forth again, gazing with admiration at that poor animal's courage and tender spirit in defence of her young, and still more sympathizing with her melancholy voice, which seemed to call upon them as mothers for compassion. Upon which (he continues) I could not help thinking how strange it was, that who to-day ran from the poor beast with fear and trembling, might, in a few morrows, be feasting on her flesh; and still more, how soon, with their mouths full, they would forget the pity they had entertained for her condition. And, in truth, to see a dainty and delicate young Madam, as frail as a flower, going lightly and mincingly on her toes, as if she could not harm a fly for very gentleness, who could think that that is her dinner which goes before her—a huge ox, that needs an axe to kill him, and the arm of a Hercules! She, who ought rather from her appearance to feed upon exquisite fruits—or flowers almost—and to drink the pure dew, as were, no doubt, women's ailments in Paradise—when as yet even the evil one had not thought of tempting her to eat flesh; and that she does feed now so grossly may be doubtless one of the debasements of her former ethereal and angelical nature,—her sinful appetite undergoing a fall from the vegetable apple, to the animal sweetbread in the throat of a beast. And here I must observe, that nature of herself gives sensible hints of the original inhibition of a carnivorous diet to human kind—seeing that on emerging from infancy, our second Eden, or state of innocence, we no sooner forsake our milky and vegetable nutriment, than we are horribly afflicted with dreams of mad oxen, and our sleeps are encompassed with all the wild bulls of Bashan—a fact many much note in their experience. No man says, of an ox at pasture, lo! how he latheth his beefsteaks with his tail,—or he hath a fly upon his brisket,—excepting the butcher, who learns this cruelty of thought by education, and calculates, with a degenerate and unpastoral eye, of how much he will weigh when he is cut up into joints and quarters. And when he hath murdered him, (the ox,) hangs him up limb by limb in his shambles, which he regards with satisfaction—and, with a transposition of vanity, gazes upon the legs, and the ribs, and the briquets, with a peculiar complacency, as if indeed they were his own personals. Surely it will go hard with such men in the world of Brahma!—the great ox-god, Apis, will trample them terribly under his feet! Alas! of pigs, calves, and gentle lambs,—what weekly hetacombs are offered up to the belly-gods of our fallen nature!—what rivers of blood, with an issue of vital breath, that must mount up to the lower Indian Heavens, of the brutal generation, in very whirlwinds! I do well remember the squeamish turn which it wrought on my stomach, to behold a wide kennel running with scarlet, which, though it proved afterwards to have flowed innocently from a dyer's, did yet remind me of that Tartarian flood, which, if the doctrines of Brahma are true, may one day become the red lake of our punishment. For this reason, I have since no appetite for flesh: nor is this my case only, but many excellent and pious men, it is recorded, have turned hermits, and fed only on herbs and roots, because they revolted, like myself, at the world's butchering houses, and shambles.

But if it be painful to a natural-minded man to look upon such savage dens, inhabited by human tigers, (which are butchers,) how much worse is it to behold the poulterer's eyrie, where hundreds of birds lie immolated—and men go openly and palpably to deal with death, bargaining for such a fowl's corpse—or, may-be, the anatomies of a score of larks, to be spitted upon needles? And in the eating of poultry, and game, and small creatures of any kind, there is this feature especially shocking—that whereas, in devouring a steak or chop, which is only a small fraction of a sheep or ox, and like a pound of bread or cheese, you may reasonably indulge an oblivion of its being once endowed with life and motion;—but, on the contrary, in a bird, (excepting, perhaps, a roc or an ostrich, which are never brought whole to table) you have the perfect frame before you that once contained a breathing life,—the wings with which it used to fly, the legs, for hopping or perching on a tree, and the parts for eating and ainging with—the head and bill. Therefore, in eating a bird, you have the image before you of a once-living creature, and know that you are destroying it, with its functions—hopping, flying, music, and all—a reflection which should deter any sensible mind from the consumption of poultry. It was a charitable creed which taught that the soul of our grandam might inhabit a bird:—and the fiction of the Phoenix (some think that there are no real Phoenixes) must have preserved many of the race from cookery, by the belief that they would rise again from the ashes.

Lastly, to speak of fish, it seems that these having little or no blood, which is called the life of a creature in the Bible, may be more innocently eaten, especially as they multiply so prodigiously, as to be allowed by nature to prey upon each other, and which may be construed into a precedent for their consumption by humankind. The same argument would authorize us, with regard to lions and tigers, and other beasts of prey, if indeed they would not be too tough for food, and subject us besides to an unseemly danger of cannibalism at second hand. For the same reason one would not choose, willingly, to partake of sharks, of which one was taken in Pliny's time, with an armed man in its belly,—and I have been informed of codfishes, and crabs even, being over busy about sea-wrecks. The venom of the sea-serpents will secure them from being eaten, and so will the monstrous dimensions of the kraken, whose flesh cannot fail to be coarse and rank flavoured; and its oiliness will be an objection with most people against whale; the mermen and mermaids likewise will be protected by their human resemblance,—as in the case of monkeys and baboons, which are not eaten to my knowledge by any civilized nation,—nor the parrot because of its speech. But which of these arguments is to plead for the poor shrimps and periwinkles, and all the smaller fry of the sea, which might be eaten commonly for want of such objections,—if we did not advance for them the giant-like corporeal sufferings of their destruction, and which have been allowed, in behalf of one insect, so universally, that nobody will eat beetles? A great German naturalist has counted a thousand of vital creatures in a pint of shrimps, and still more of periwinkles in the same measure; so that to make a meal of such minute insects, (however justifiable with regard to locusts, which would eat all up if they were not eaten,) we must sacrifice a thousand of living particles. It is enough to make a glutton pause, to reflect on such a massacre—but, alas! the time is not ripe, or rather, I dread, is gone and past, for such Pythagorean consideration. The refined gluttony of the age, indeed, hath arrived at such a pitch, and has forced men upon such unnatural dishes, that I shall not be amazed to find them feeding upon tigers and sharks, in spite of their being anthropophagous—on swallows and storks however sacred—and on mermen and mermaids, though they are so like their own fathers and mothers. REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

PAISLEY, (SCOTLAND).

THE cause of Teetotalism seems to progress steadily in this town. A grand soiree was held there some few days since in honour of Mr. THOMPSON, the anti-slavery champion, and Mr. L. RAMOND, a gentleman of colour from America. The Rev. PATRICK BREWSTER, minister of the Abbey Church, was in the chair. The room was filled with a most numerous and respectable audience. The speeches on negro slavery and white slavery in Britain under the dread chief Alcohol, were highly impressive.

SHAWSAURY.

ONE of the most numerous and respectably-attended meetings of the Teetotal society that has ever been held perhaps in this ancient town, took place in the lecture-room of the Mechanic's Institute, over the Corn Exchange, on the 16th instant. Mr. WM. BROWN, who has been a staunch advocate of this good cause for five years, was called to the chair. Mr. PLATWOOD, a reformed drunkard, then addressed the company in an eloquent, affecting, and very interesting speech, to which the audience listened with the most breathless attention. Really if Temperance societies do nothing more than develop the eloquent powers and reasoning faculties of the working man, they at all events effect some good; and it is in the power of their members to do much more. Mr. CORFIELD, steward to the Honourable FREDERICK POWIS, of Berwick, who is now an advocate of the cause, said that he owed his conversion to Mr. Brown, who supplied him with Temperance tracts.

MANCHESTER.

A DISCUSSION took place in the Carpenter's Hall, Garratt Road, Manchester, on Monday evening, the 16th of Nov. The disputants were Mr. GEORGE LOMAS, on the part of the total abstinents, and Mr. SAMUEL KENYON on the part of the advocates of the moderation principle. Mr. Lomas undertook to prove that Total Abstinence was rational, scriptural, and of utility to the Gospel dispensation. Mr. Kenyon undertook to disprove those statements. At the appointed time the Hall, which is capable of holding three thousand people, was filled to an overflow. On the chair being taken, Mr. Lomas was called upon to argue his side of the question, which he did in a clear and decided manner. Mr. Kenyon then stood forward to disprove Mr. Lomas's arguments. He commenced by displaying a small paper coffin to the audience, stating that he had brought it thither to bury Total Abstinence. He then produced a small black bag containing some sand, which he represented to be the most appropriate symbol of the foundation on which Total Abstinence is based. The whole of his arguments were trivial and futile. When the question was put to the meeting whether Mr. Lomas had maintained his ground, an affirmative was intimated (notwithstanding a number of spirit-merchants, brewers, &c. were present) without a single hand being lifted up in opposition. Indeed so enraged were the Anti-Teetotalers with their champion, that Mr. Lomas and other friends of the society were compelled to protect him from their fury.

RECHABITES.

Southern Counties Brotherhood.

A vast section of the great fraternity of Teetotalers, exists under the above denomination. The qualification of candidates consists of good moral character, a freedom from known bodily disease, and an age between eighteen and sixty. No candidate can be admitted, unless he shall have signed the pledge of Total Abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, and been a consistent member of a Teetotal society for upwards of three months. The places of meeting of the Rechabites, are denominated Tents. When a Brother proposes a new candidate, any Brother may call for a ballot, on assigning a reason. A Brother breaking the pledge of Total Abstinence, ceases to be a member; there are however conditions upon which he may be readmitted. Each Brother pays the sum of one shilling on each quarterly night towards the establishment of a Funeral Fund. The following paragraph occurs in a prospectus lately issued by this admirable association:—

"There is one peculiarity in this Honourable Order which adds largely to its utility,—the capability it possesses of being so spread, as to include a great extent of Country, and a large amount of Brethren acting in unison and unanimity in one common cause: for although experience has shewn the impracticability of organizing the whole United Kingdom in one Brotherhood, yet that good feeling which will of necessity exist between Societies, formed on a similar plan, aiming at the same result, and animated by the same moral motives of beneficence, will so far approximate them in their mutual intercourse, that their competition will be in the rivalry as to which shall do most good, and their emulation will be that of out-doing their sister Societies in the exhibition of every humane feeling, and the reciprocal practice of every Christian virtue."

So vast a freemasonry of Teetotalism, and one calculated to produce such sterling beneficial effects is a formidable power against the army of distillers, brewers, vintners, and retainers of the accursed drinking usages of the times. So impressed are we with the immense advantages which must accrue to the good cause of Teetotalism, from the real efforts and moral example of such a brotherhood, that we shall always be happy to lend the columns of The Teetotaler journal to the Honourable and Independent Order of Rechabites, at any time, to promote the interests or publish the proceedings of the fraternity.

DUBLIN.

ON November 17th, the REVEREND THEODORAL MATHREW administered the pledge to many thousands of persons, in the vicinity of the Custom-House, in spite of the deluging torrents of rain which were falling at the time. The most malicious reports have lately been circulated both orally and through the medium of some of the Anti-Teetotal press, that the backslidings from the pledge have been very numerous in Ireland. We are requested to contradict, on the authority of the Rev. Mr. MATHREW himself, this infamous libel upon the sincerity and powers of self-control of the Irish. The doctrines of Teetotalism have absolutely changed the face of Ireland, as they have the morals of Irish social life; and the Irish character is now one of the most amiable and refined upon the face of the earth.

It is with the greatest delight that we make the following announcement to our readers, as one of the positive evidences of the progress of Teetotalism in Ireland:—When the official revenues are declared—as they will be in a few days—they will exhibit these results, that the manufacture of spirits in Ireland was less, by three millions five hundred thousand gallons in the year ending 9th of October last, than in the preceding year, ending on the same date. The consequent loss of revenue to the government is close upon five hundred thousand pounds sterling, or more closely, £466,666 16s. 6d.

ODD CHANGE.—There is great difficulty experienced in these days of "shin-plasters," in making change; but we have heard of two recent instances, where ingenuity was put in successful requisition to obviate the necessity of change. A rude fellow, while before the police magistrate for some nocturnal misdemeanor, was fined nine dollars, for eighteen oaths, uttered in defiance of official warning that each one would cost him fifty cents. He handed a ten dollar note to the Justice, who was about returning the remaining one to the delinquent, when he broke forth: "No, no!—keep the whole! I'll swear it out!" And he proceeded to expend the "balance" in as round and condensed a volley of personal denunciation, as had ever saluted the ears of the legal functionary. He then retired content. Something similar was the "change" given to one of the hack-drivers, by a jolly tar, who was enjoying "a sail" in a carriage up Broadway. A mad bull "with his sparker boom rigged straight out abaft," or some other animal, going at the rate of fourteen knots an hour in the street, attracted Jack's attention, as he rode along; and unable to let the large plate-glass window down, he broke it to atoms, that he might thrust forth his head. "A dollar and a half for that!" says Jehu. "Vot of it?—here's the blunt!" replied the sailor, handing the driver a three dollar note. "I can't change it," said the latter. "Well, never mind," rejoined the tar; "this'll make it right." The sudden crash of the other window, told the driver in what manner the "change" had been made.—(American Paper.)

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

NATIONAL education, based on reasonable principles and regulated by the state, is a great and urgent necessity, that becomes every day more and more obvious to the thinking men of all parties. The people cry out for self-government, for the exercise of that power which their recognition as a free people has led them to consider as their right; but whether it be a just claim or not, it is so strongly enforced that we dare not refuse to entertain the question of right that they urge upon us. Meanwhile we must provide, if merely out of regard for the safety of ourselves and our property, that these powers, whenever granted, and to what degree, shall be properly exercised,—in short that they shall not be like edge-tools placed in the hands of children—like dangerous to themselves and all around them; and the only means by which the interests of society can be so secured, is by giving to the masses of our population an education—religious, moral, and intellectual,—religious, that they may know their duty to God and the ultimate principles of moral obligation,—moral, that they may be able to trace in detail the various ramifications of the social duties,—and intellectual, that they may be able to exercise a mature judgment on the various matters, domestic, social, and political, that may come under their consideration. It must be acknowledged that this compulsory view of education is a very low one to take of so important a subject; but it is to be feared that many, who admit its necessity, defend it on no higher ground. That many persons, greatly to their credit, have taken up the subject from the higher motives of religion and morality, and that their philanthropic activity has undoubtedly been productive of great national good, cannot be denied; but however much higher the ground which they take than that assumed by the first who look on the education of the masses as a species of necessary evil, it does not seem to us that in carrying out their plans they proceeded on right principles. If the distinctive character of man be the possession of a faculty or faculties, whereby he forms ideas, compares them with each other, and accumulates them, as it were, for future use,—if man, according to the schoolmen, be animal sentiens,—he should be treated as such; and every method of training man must be radically defective, that does not educate his mind. Education, in short, must be intellectual, or it is unworthy of the name;—it is a shadow without a substance,—a dead, unmeaning form. Intellectual education, till within a very few years, was unknown except to the Edgeworths, the Aikins, and the Pestalozzis, who, conscious of the correctness of their own views, were willing to endure the scoffs and sneers of those who called them dreamy and impractical speculators. The clergy patronised, as indeed they still patronise, a system whereby children were treated as the mere lifeless components of a machine—lifeless itself:—the chartered schools were confined to the teaching of the dead forms of grammar and a few words of ancient vocabularies:—and, in the private schools, high or low, for poor or rich, left to the care of men responsible only to parents quite incompetent to give an opinion for or against—men, whose interest was to pay the smallest possible salaries to their ushers and to send in the largest possible bills to the parents—men, who were as ignorant as idiots of the first principles of knowledge, little or nothing was done to prepare children for the business of mature years. Education, indeed, began where it should have ended,—when the children left school and not when they entered it. Let any sensible person of any class—whether from national school, public school, or private school—answer this question—whether he was ever asked or led to think of his lessons, to exercise his judgment on their meaning,—in short, actively to employ his mind. Ninety-nine out of every hundred will answer in the negative; and if any one should affirm, that under the formal, mechanical system, whose defects are now in course of development, he did progress, did receive instruction mainly instrumental in making him an useful and distinguished member of his class, we answer that he became such, not through the means, but in spite of the hindrance of the system. However unfavourably such defects in the plans and conduct of education may have acted on society at large, it is on the poor, chiefly, that its most baneful influence is discernible, and especially amongst those who dwell in the rural districts. The boy belonging to the higher or the middling classes, when he returns from school, beholds around him those whose experience or reading enables them to give him in a familiar way, the instruction which his school furnishes not; and thus he is stimulated to think for himself, and to begin the work of self-education. The child of the tradesman or the intelligent artizan, though not so favourably situated as the former, still has many opportunities placed in his way, which his young and active mind seizes, of getting instruction:—his book-lessons are formal and dull,—his lessons of life are vital and interesting, and they often decide his future pursuits. But when the child belongs to ignorant parents, who are able to impart nothing to their offspring except their own evil habits (of which intemperance will probably be the most conspicuous) and narrow prejudices, and especially, when—as in the rural districts—his opportunities of observing character are confined within a scanty village, then his case is truly pitiable and requires that some means should be adopted to enable him to rise to his proper dignity as a human being. If education be good for one, it is good for another; and, in this case, surely it is our duty to procure the best for those who most need its blessings; and we feel most strongly impressed with the conviction that these blessings cannot be made either effectual or universal, until we rise, as a great nation, provide the means, and order the machinery that shall work this mighty reformation. The dame and the parish school-master have been tried and found wanting; and the clergy have too generally confined their instruction to sectarian dogmas for the most part unintelligible to children:—the field is open still, and it remains for the legislature to send labourers for its culture.

Education, in all its branches, and at all its periods—from the earliest years of the infant to the time when the full-grown man enters on his profession—is a subject which this journal is determined to advocate; and from time to time we shall publish essays on the best means of conducting the different branches of instruction, and replete with as much useful information as we can collect relative to the state and progress of education in this and other countries. The advocates of the doctrine of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors ought to agitate in favour of national education; and it is to be hoped that all opposition will soon yield to the calm but firm endeavours made for its establishment by the most enlightened men of the present day, both in and out of Parliament. After a comprehensive glance at the history and present state of education in the three kingdoms, we must conclude that, though there be evils, great in magnitude as in number, we ought not to sink in apathy or despondence. Improvements, however slight, have lately been real: there is ground for encouragement even in our past progress; and the future offers much more.

In the course of our investigation into the subject of national education, we shall be naturally led to consider the Education of the Senses, as exhibited in the instruction of blind, deaf, and dumb persons.

It is in Prussia that the great influence of Pestalozzi has been principally felt. In 1770, Frederick the Great took the first steps towards improving the then wretched state of the schools throughout his territories. The improvements in the higher classes of schools were effected at an earlier period than the rest; and then came the benefits derived from the benevolent and scientific exertions of Pestalozzi, who may truly be called the founder of the new system of education,—inasmuch as he was the first to raise teaching to an art based on the knowledge of human nature. This excellent man, whose principles admitted of universal application, nevertheless adapted them only to the training of the lower classes; but, fortunately, enough of good was seen to flow out of his imperfectly developed plans to induce the Prussian government and several Germanic princes to transplant them into their own elementary schools, and to carry out the system to a much greater extent than was practised by Pestalozzi. Since the period, at which these plans were introduced into Germany, a progressive improvement has taken place; and, although the schools are neither so numerous nor so well supplied with efficient teachers as might be wished, yet the continual exertions of the Prussian government furnish ground for the hope that every defect will in time be supplied, and the system be brought to perfection.

The subjects we should recommend to be taught in elementary schools, are—1. The native language, not merely mechanical reading and writing, but the common-sense of grammar and instruction in the expression of ideas;—2. Mathematics, that is, arithmetic and geometry, based on the knowledge of number and size furnished by surrounding objects, and conducted throughout by constant appeals to the senses and understanding;—3. Knowledge of the external world, which comprehends all objective teaching, such as geography from that of the play-ground and village to that of the maps on the school-walls, botany, mineralogy, history of animals, &c., all based on actual observation either of specimens or representations;—4. Drawing, with the view of training the eye to correctness, and giving facility to the hand;—5. Religion;—and, 6. Singing.

Schools, which confine their efforts to mere literary instruction, are full of imperfections; but the establishment of industrial schools would tend to produce results as perfect as the exigencies of the age, the present condition of civilization, and the capacities of the generation would require. That there are scattered through the length and breadth of our island persons fully able and well-inclined to adopt every measure that may ensure for those around them the greatest possible measure of happiness, we cannot doubt; and surely nothing can promote it more than the formation of virtuous and industrious habits. But in order that other institutions may keep pace in improvement with the system of national education, the judicial legislation should devote peculiar attention to the management of our prisons. Indeed, it is a shame and a reproach to this country, that our misnamed penitentiaries and houses of correction are nurseries of crime and sinks of impurity and immorality, where the old and hardened criminal has every opportunity allowed him to corrupt and pollute even the youngest and most trifling offender. It is an imperative duty upon the legislature to stay this moral plague; and nothing can effect this object, unless it be a complete separation (as in French gaols) of juvenile offenders in a prison expressly adapted for their reformation and education.

It is our bounden duty, in essays upon so important a subject, to enquire "what is and what ought to be the education of both sexes and of all classes;" and we shall do so the more readily, inasmuch as the great system of national education is now advocated, as an imperative necessity, by many bright names, whose owners—illustrious not merely by their own high endowments, but by their zeal for the moral and intellectual advancement of the species—will not allow themselves to be inactive spectators of the labours of benevolence going on around them, but will cordially give their powerful assistance to forward the education of all classes of a great and civilised people.

A CITY SKETCH.

BY C. WHITEHEAD.

THE superscription I have assumed, and which I am fully entitled to adopt, must at once convince the gentle but sometimes incredulous reader that I am cognisant of many matters which do not often transpire west of Temple Bar.

The things of the world are in their nature transitory, and are, or ought to be, well-known to be so. Yet I confess my commercial memory does not at present furnish me with so striking an instance of the instability of human affairs as was exemplified in the firm (if firm it could be called which was most infirm) of Messrs. Storks, Hookem and Co.

It may not be amiss if I supply such particulars as I happen to know of the early history of the two individuals composing this firm, the "Co." being, as in many similar cases, merely gentlemen of the fancy—Messieurs de l'imagination—airy notions.

Mr. Storks, or rather Mr. Snooks, for that was his true patronymic, was a native of Manchester, and during his early years had gone through a course of blue worsted hose, yellow leather breeches, pepper and salt coats, muffin caps, and study at a parish school. His education completed, a liberal patron of the industrious classes placed at his disposal the sum of one shilling and sixpence per week, for polishing the boots and shoes, cleaning the knives and forks, running on errands, waiting at table, looking after the house-dog, and quarrelling with the cook. It were tedious, perhaps, to trace the gradations by which Mr. Snooks ascended from errand-boy to light porter, from light porter to junior clerk, and thence to book-keeper, in one of the first manufacturing houses of his native place. It may be permitted, however, to remark that these successive elevations supply the best evidence of his talent and acquirement.

Mr. Snooks had occupied his responsible situation for some years when a conspiracy was, it seems, set on foot against him by the partners. Who can successfully resist oppression when it is backed by wealth and power? The sensitive soul of Snooks did not feel itself equal to a moral set-to against such powerful odds: he abruptly left the place of his nativity. He departed from Manchester for ever, regretted by many of the inhabitants, whose pecuniary demands upon him in the perturbation of his soul and in the hurry of his departure, he had omitted to satisfy; and arriving in London he changed his name to that of Storks, that he might baffle the pursuit of his unrelenting foes. And in this metropolis lived Mr. Storks in comparative peace for some years, until—but why anticipate?

"Twin we therefore to Mr. Hookem. Mr. Hookem was the only son of a most worthy character, who had for half a century satisfactorily fulfilled the onerous duties of a messenger to the Navy-Pay-Office. The old gentleman lived just long enough to know that he had bestowed a good plain education upon his son, and to feel that he was comfortably settled at Salamanca House—the large linen-draper's, in Oxford-street; and here, indeed, the sole surviving Hookem vegetated for a considerable period. His imposing head of hair—that unexceptionable abundance of whisker—the lightness of his finger—the rapidity of his movements, and the urbanity of his deportment, won and secured for him the esteem, admiration, and confidence of both sides of the counter.

Let us not call it an evil hour when Mr. Hookem first fixed his eyes and rivetted his affections upon Miss Sarah Sparks, a young lady who had at one time carried on business in the corset line, but who, in a fit of tender passion cut her stay-laces, and flung herself into the arms—or, to speak without excitement, accepted the hand—of the devoted linen-draper's factotum. There can be no doubt that Mrs. Hookem had been presented with many opportunities, in the course of her profession, of mixing with the best society; nor is it surprising that her naturally gentle soul should have imbibed the refined tastes and polite predilections of her truly respectable customers; so that, when Mr. Hookem obtained permission from his employers to live out of the house, and to occupy one portion of his own domestic hearth, a scale of expenses was offered to his inspection, which, making a rough estimate, seemed to be more than commensurate with his income. Mrs. H., too, had a passion for dressing, as she said, "like other people," and her perhaps too-indulgent consort wished to place her upon a level with society in general. And then she was so often "not fit to be seen," that Hookem was compelled to do things that were seen not to be fit. Besides, these weekly relaxations at the "White Conduit" were, to say the least of them, expensive;—that day at Epsom, Hookem himself declared to be a regular snuff, and the week at Gravesend was ruinous.

I could wish, at this point in the life of Mr. Hookem, that I might introduce something, if only for the sake of variety and contrast, that might be considered a new feature. But truth compels me to state that, by a strange coincidence, the very calamity that had befallen Storks lighted on the head of Hookem. A conspiracy was got up against him also. It is to be feared that some skulking scoundrel, reputed honest, abstracted those various odd sums of money which Hookem, with unfeeling abruptness, was charged with purloining. No evidence of guilt betrayed itself upon the face of that much injured man, as he manfully denied the charge and offered to swear to the truth of his allegation. His sceptical employers, however, not for a moment reflecting how extremely improbable it was that any gentleman could voluntarily perjure himself in a case of mere paltry money, dismissed him from their business and sent him about his own. Thenceforward Mr. Hookem conceived a rooted hatred of the retail business, abandoned all thought of returning to it, and was never known to reter any individual to his late employers for a character; which, had he done so, they might, he thought, be base enough to withhold.

It, under these untoward circumstances, Mr. Hookem did consent to undertake the office of decoy to a gaming house in the Quadrant, let us charitably suppose that he was instigated thereto by a benevolent desire to exhibit to inexperienced youth the follies, the vices, and dangers that beset them, to the end that in their maturer years they might eschew such foibles.

It was by the merest chance that Mr. Hookem, while engaged in this employment, became possessed of a small capital. A troublesome police will sometimes make themselves impudently curious respecting the domestic avocations of free-born Englishmen. These functionaries committed a burglary in the gaming-house one night, and suddenly burst into a spacious room where several gentlemen were invoking the aid, curing the blindness, or deploring the instability, of Fortune. It may appear unaccountable that the parties in the concern, and the parties concerned, should have made so precipitate a retreat as they undoubtedly felt themselves under the necessity of doing. Mr. Hookem, however, with a presence of mind that cannot be sufficiently commended, succeeded in securing the bank and effecting his escape; and it is somewhat remarkable that he was never afterwards so fortunate as to be able to meet the owners, that he might have the pleasure of restoring the property.

It was in a Hansgate steamer on her voyage to London, that Mr. Storks, for the first time in his life, directed his visual rays towards the open countenance and imposing person of Mr. Hookem, and that Mr. Hookem precipitated his glance upon the minute features and slender outline of Mr. Storks. If it be really true (as I believe it is) that a certain sympathy attracts congenial spirits, no wonder that these two gentlemen felt magnetically drawn towards each other by a power as sudden as it was mysterious. Perhaps the interesting indisposition of Mrs. Hookem (for Storks was a man of true feeling and unquestioned gallantry) facilitated an introduction which otherwise might never have been effected. They slid into conversation insensibly—a conversation in the first instance devoted to topics of no exciting interest; until having retired to the first cabin, a colloquy of a more solid and instructive character succeeded.

"Well, Sir," said Mr. Storks, addressing his companion, "we shall soon find ourselves once more in the great city,—that vast mart of merchandise,—that emporium of the world."

"Yes, we shall soon be there," returned Hookem.

"Industry never flags there," pursued Storks, "never lies dormant—never sleeps."

"No, all wide-awake there," returned the other with a wink.

"And yet, a good living may be picked up in London, even now," suggested Storks.

"If you did but know where to look for it," said his new companion.

"Excuse me, that isn't it," returned the other; "many people know where to look for it, who can't get it, you know."

"The gentleman speaks true, H.," remarked the wife of H's best and purest affections.

"Now, I know many ways," continued Storks, "by which a fortune might even be made in this very town,—inevitably—certainly—"

"And no mistake? as my friend Downey says," enquired Hookem.

"Strange!" exclaimed Storks with animation; "did you say Downey? I know a gentleman of that name."

"You do? what! a stout man, with a very red face?"

"Yes."

"And a mouth all on one side—so?" And Hookem, with exquisite mimicry, indicated the identity.

"The very man," cried Storks.

"My dear Sir," said Hookem, "I'm very glad to make your acquaintance. I say, Sir, is your name Wilkins?"

"No, Sir, my name is Storks—Mr. Ambrose Storks."

"My dear," said Hookem, addressing his wife in a tone of bland appeal, "how often have we heard Downey mention his friend Mr. Storks."

"How often, indeed!" said the lady.

"And may I make so free," said Storks, "as to request the favour of your name?"

"My name, Sir, is James Hookem—Jemmy Hookem, as Downey calls me."

"My good Sir," cried Storks with enthusiasm, "my friend Downey has spoken of you to me a thousand times."

"Has he, though?—rum—!" said Hookem.

"How very funny!" simpered his wife.

"Extraordinary circumstance!" cried Storks.

"My dear Sir," said Hookem, when the excitement consequent upon the recent disclosure had in some measure abated, "you were saying that something might be done—that a fortune—"

"Great things might be done, Sir," interrupted Storks, "great things might be done—with a small capital."

"A hundred or two of much use, d'ye think—eh?" enquired Hookem.

"Why, the sum is small certainly," replied Storks, who during this brief interchange had been looking with one eye at the steward, and with the other at his companion, "the sum is small certainly; but much might be done even with that. A sharp fellow with a clever partner—appearance is every thing."

"Good," said Hookem.

"Make a show, you know."

"True."

"The rest follows—don't you see?"

"I do," said Hookem,—"wide-awake—uncommon."

"At this moment an intimation was made to the passengers below that the vessel had reached its destination, and the passengers prepared with all expedition to depart.

"Well, bye, bye, old fellow," cried Hookem, with that familiar cordiality which some few generous natures have always at command: "sorry we didn't become acquainted earlier in the voyage, but never mind."

"But we shall see Mr. Storks again, my dear, surely," suggested Mrs. Hookem.

"Aye, by the bye, why not?" cried Hookem, and, as he lowered himself to a level with Storks, he took that individual with friendly zeal by the collar—"now, say the word: why can't you come and take a snap with us, at eight o'clock to-morrow evening, 54, Beech-Walworth? That's where we hang out,—and bring Downey with you?"

"I will come," said Storks, and he repeated the address,—and I will bring Downey with me;" and after many fervent graspings of the hand on all sides, the two friends separated, each bent upon bringing to bear the project which had been so suddenly and faintly shadowed forth—but which, as each walked homeward, as suddenly assumed (if I may be permitted the phrase) a mentally tangible shape.

Mr. Storks being strictly a man of his word, and at the same time wanting a word with his man, made it his business, on the morrow, to seek after his friend Mr. Downey, whom, after much fruitless and previous search, he found in one of the many houses of call frequented by that gentleman.

Mr. Downey was one of those persons who contrive to exhibit a respectable appearance, without any apparent means of so doing, and who managed to get a good living without any ostensible avocation in life. In truth, the means of substance acquired by Mr. Downey were as mysteriously procured, as the substance which is always supposed to attend Knight's-errant in the old romances, there being, as we have said, no conceivable source from whence they could be imagined to flow.

Mr. Downey, was of course, infinitely pleased, nay, delighted, when he was made acquainted with the extraordinary interference of chance which had brought into contact two such intimate and estimable friends as Mr. Storks and Mr. Hookem. The two gentlemen accordingly mounted a Walworth stage, and in due time were set down at No. 54, Beech-row, where they were received with all that unostentatious hospitality which, perhaps, peculiarly distinguishes the English character.

It was not long after their arrival, that tea was served up, and that Downey's cigar-case made its appearance from his side pocket.

"Never trust me," said Downey, biting off the end of his cigar, "if that wasn't a queer start, for you two fellows meeting in the strange way you did."

"It was indeed," replied Hookem, "fortunate I think."

"Decidedly so," said Storks with an experimental glance towards the lady.

"Fortuit," cried Mrs. Hookem.

"Well, then," said Downey, "why can't you two knock up a partnership between you? You're the likeliest chaps I know to make a good thing of it."

"Well, hang it," cried Hookem, after a pause, "what's the use of my talking? What do you say, Mr. Storks?"

"Why, the fact is," said Storks with a commercial air, "I am rather strangely circumstanced. I have excellent opportunities—excellent—but no capital."

"Capital opportunities—but no capital," elucidated Mr. Hookem.

"Just so," continued Storks; "now if I could get a start—something to begin with—to make a show—"

"I've a hundred or two, you know," remarked Hookem.

"My dear Sir, that would just do—merely to be sunk for a fortnight—to be repaid out of the concern."

Men of business habits very soon understand one another, and a very short conversation sufficed to improve the project, which, on the previous night, had assumed a definite shape, into perfect symmetry.

"Now," said Downey, helping himself to another cigar, "you understand each other, don't you? Well, mark me: you two gents just toddle into Wood-street one of these mornings, and there you'll see one of the sweetest places you ever looked at: my wigs, such a front—premises running back into the next street."

"Just the thing for a Manchester Warehouse," said Storks, addressing his partner in esse.

"The ticket," said Hookem.

"There's a private gateway at the back, mind you," resumed Downey—"a private gateway."

"Nothing can be better," said Storks decisively.

"Why so?" enquired the unsophisticated Mrs. Hookem.

"My dear lady," said Storks, "can't you perceive? The goods come in at the front door, and go away at the back—private—secret, you know; who knows where they're taken, you know?"

"Don't you see?" vociferated Downey.

"Oh! you clever creatures you," cried the delighted Mrs. Hookem, shaking her remarkably pretty small head, with a wicked pleasantness, at the men of business.

Mr. Storks acknowledged his moiety of the compliment by a self-complacent but deprecating bow.

"Well, but now," said Downey, when silence was once again restored, "I can let you into a good thing;—won't promise, though; but I know a young fellow that'll just suit you for a partner. I've met him several times at a house in the city. He's got two or three thousand pounds which he doesn't know what to do with, and I'm sure he wants to join some respectable house of business as a sleeping partner."

Here a burst of exhilarating merriment proceeded from the company.

"He's the nephew," continued Downey, "of an old fellow late of Well-street, who hopped the twig about a year back; and his name's Green. But, you understand, I shan't come it strong to my gentleman till you're regularly established."

"About a week afterwards, say?" enquired Hookem.

"Aye, that's the time o'day."

"Quite," said Hookem.

"Of course," added Storks. "But," he continued with an air of interest which, during Downey's statement, had been gradually enlarging till it almost arrived at the dignity of excitement—"but are you sure this young man has money?—two or three thousand, you said:—is it ready—tangible—down?"

"Down," cried Downey, striking the table with his hand; "what do you think of that now, eh, Master Innocence? won't that do for you?" and here our commercial agent contrived an irresistible variation of visage that completely relaxed the muscles of his auditors. But the entrance of supper, which consisted of beef-steaks and onions and boiled potatoes, prevented for a while this agreeable species of relaxation.

It may safely be affirmed that no four estimable individuals ever sat down to this most pleasant of all meals with more true and unfeigned relish than did the four persons of whom we have been treating. After supper, the enlivening song went round, or, rather, went three quarters round,—wit flew about which was not always caught, good humour prevailed which was not always prevalent, and, in a word, unbounded hilarity was the order, or perhaps the disorder of the night.

It was about a month after the meeting here described, that the "sweet place," in Wood-street, was entered upon; that "STORKS, HOOKEM, AND CO., MANCHESTER WAREHOUSEMEN," surmounted the warehouse-widows, and adorned the door-posts of the concern; and that young Mr. Richard Mizzle, the nephew of their friend Mr. Downey, for the first time occupied a stool in the counting-house. It were extravagant scepticism to doubt that to a respectable firm like the above, credit would for a moment be denied. When it is stated that the "small capital" of Mr. Hookem filled the warehouse to overflowing with bales whose contents it were impertinent too minutely to examine, and that Mr. Storks regularly paid for the goods ordered, by bills at two months, accepted by that extensive Manchester branch of the London trade, carrying on business under the firm of "Catchflat, Rumrigg, and Co.," when these facts, we say, are stated, it cannot surely be wondered at that our new partners found that they had obtained as pretty a connexion in so short a space of time as could be desired by moderate and sensible people like Hookem and Storks. Such was the briskness of trade, or such the assiduity and attention to business of the partners, that the goods which were purchased, were sold the instant they entered the warehouse; and, although they were delivered at the front-door, they invariably made their exit from the private gate-way at the back of the premises, with all the despatch consistent with caution.—Mr. Storks being perfectly well aware that so active was competition in the London market, that were any of his neighbours in the same line to observe the address of his purchasers on the bales of goods, his connexion would have been soon undermined, and perhaps destroyed.

About a fortnight after Messieurs Storks and Hookem had entered into partnership, Mr. Downey, accompanied by his friend Mr. Green, called upon those gentlemen, and under the plea of particular business was admitted to a private interview. This interview was most satisfactory to all parties concerned. Nothing could be more fair and honourable, or more liberal than the conduct of Messrs. Storks and Hookem upon this occasion. They actually agreed, for the consideration of three thousand pounds, to be brought into the concern by Mr. Verrey Green, to allow him a third share in the profits of that flourishing concern! In less than a month Mr. Green produced his capital; and his name was added to the firm. Things then went on for a few weeks in the most prosperous manner.

One evening upon entering the premises, a rather unusual scene presented itself to the eyes of Mr. Green. Mr. Hookem was engaged in high words with a stranger; and, in another part of the warehouse, a carman was struggling to obtain possession of two bales from their confidential porter, who made but a feeble resistance.

"I tell you, Sir," said the stranger, "these goods were sold for cash."

"For cash, certainly," replied Hookem. "Won't you walk into the counting-house, Mr. Green?" But Mr. Green did not stir.

"Cash on delivery," cried the stranger.

"Well, leave the goods," said Mr. Hookem, "and when Mr. Storks comes in, he will send you round a cheque, if it's all right."

"Nonsense!" ejaculated the stranger; then addressing himself to the carman, he said, "John, put the goods back again into the cart, and let's be off. We shall do no good here, I see that."

"Very extraordinary this," observed Mr. Green, when the strangers had departed.

"Oh! my dear Sir, not at all," answered Hookem carelessly: "these little things happen every day in business," and he led the way into the counting-house, where, to Mr. Green's still greater astonishment, sat Mr. Storks, who had just been declared to be out. After some desultory conversation, Mr. Green withdrew.

Mr. Verrey Green was a gentleman who was a slow hand at suspicion, but a sure one when he once laid hold upon it. Some of my readers may be inclined to think that he had but slight reasons for his doubts; but he was not of that opinion. He returned therefore to Wood-street in about three hours. Where were Messrs. Storks and Hookem?

"They will be back in half an hour," said the porter.

"Dick," said Mr. Green, in a voice of strong emotion, "take these two sovereigns. You must conceal me in the warehouse somewhere: I think that on the return of my partners, I shall do well to watch their proceedings."

Mr. Green was immediately mounted upon one of the inexplicable bales, with which Messrs. Storks and Hookem had filled their warehouse at the commencement of their partnership; and from that eminence he could command a view of the interior of the counting-house, through a ventilator. At length his respectable partners, accompanied by Mr. Downey, made their appearance, and immediately dismissed the porter for the night.

It was not long before the three gentlemen were seated at the small round table in the middle of the counting-house, looking over some papers, and dividing a considerable sum of money amongst themselves.

"Well, these bills all fall due the day after to-morrow," remarked Storks.

"For Green to take up," cried Downey.

"Where shall we be this time tomorrow night?" said Mr. Hookem, after a pause.

"Why, I rather think, at Liverpool," observed Mr. Downey. "The vessel sails at 4 P. M."

Mr. Green has since stated that he never could precisely recollect how he left the warehouse on that evening;—and whether he took the shortest cut to the Mansion-house, or not. He however distinctly remembers his interview with the Lord Mayor, who, giving instructions and a slip of paper to three respectable looking individuals, requested them to accompany him to Wool-street, Cheapside. Messieurs Storks, Hookem, and Downey were taken into custody; and either being unable to explain the nature of their complicated mercantile transactions, or the Lord Mayor being too obtuse to comprehend such involved details of business, they were sent to prison, and in due time brought before a self-willed judge and a pig-headed jury. It is extremely distressing to be compelled to state, in conclusion, that these highly respectable men were desired to embark immediately for the particularly fine and salubrious climate of New South Wales.

PUBLIC STOCK.

Public stocks now exist in almost all Christian states, and are so various that it is a particular study to learn their nature, their different value, the degree of their credit, the mode of buying and selling them, of raising the interest on them, &c. The shares in these stocks in modern times are generally made transferable, so that they have become an important article of commerce. Various methods have been adopted to induce capitalists to lend their money to the state. The attraction consists in affording a prospect of receiving a greater income from their money in this way than could be procured by any other safe mode of investing it, and in facilitating the transfer of the claims, and exempting from taxes the income arising from the property. The first was by means of annuities, so called;—that is, compacts in which the state pledges itself to pay the lender a fixed sum for his capital annually, which he could obtain in no other way with equal ease and convenience.

Life annuities and Tontines were another invention to bring capital into the public treasury. The former secure to lenders a certain income during their lives; and this income is regulated by the age of the persons thus advancing their money, being greatest for the most aged. Tontines are stipulations by which a company of shareholders are to receive a certain interest from the state (somewhat higher than can be otherwise obtained on good security) for the whole capital which the members of the company contribute in equal shares; so that while they all live, they enjoy this interest; and when any die, the whole interest goes to the survivors; so that the longest liver finally receives the whole interest during the remnant of his life.

Perpetual Rents (as they are called on the Continent) are stocks which the government is under no obligation to redeem. They have become the means to which states most resort, and which have found the most favour both from states and people, and by their increase and the facilities which are afforded for their transfer, have acquired great importance. All national debts are more or less dependent upon the wealth and income of the people.

Reduced Funds is the name given to those stocks on which the interest has been reduced, in consequence of the option which the government has offered to the public creditors to receive back their capital or to take a lower rate of interest.

Consolidated Annuities is a name derived from an operation of the government commenced in 1741, when an act of parliament was passed by which the various loans for the repayment of which particular funds had been assigned, were united, and all the funds, including the sinking fund, consolidated into one. Although a large amount of the English stocks always remains stationary, in the hands of companies, public institutions, and many private persons who retain them as the safest source of income, still a large proportion is bought and sold every day, and constitutes a very important article of traffic in the London market. All the three per cent. stock is most in the market, the price in these public papers relates to this, if the kind of stock be not particularly designated. It moreover regulates the prices of the three and a half, and other funds and shares, which vary with it. The best standard of the credit of the public stocks is the rent of land.

The value of the stock is perpetually fluctuating, the variations being occasioned by unfounded as well as real causes. Any occurrence by which the security of the state is either hazarded or strengthened, though once may be as imaginary as the other, has an immediate effect upon the price, which will advance or fall as the news may be considered good or otherwise. The gaining of a victory, the signing of an armistice, and the conclusion of a peace, have each a direct influence upon the rise of the stock; whilst, on the other hand, the loss of a battle, the death of a sovereign, the commencement and protraction of war, are equally certain to lower the funds.

The manner of buying stock is to give a specific number of pounds for a nominal £100. Thus, if the purchase be made in the three per cents, and the current price be eighty pounds, that sum is paid for £100 of stock, which yields a dividend of three pounds per annum. The practice of speculating in the funds is carried on amongst persons who possess but little or no property in any of the national securities, yet whose contract for the sale or transfer of stock at some future period, the latter part of the day or the next settling day, at a price agreed on at the time. Such bargains are called time bargains, and are contrary to law; and this practice is gambling in every sense of the word. This sort of gambling is carried on to an amazing extent, and is of this character:—A agrees to sell B £10,000 of Bank stock, to be transferred in twenty days, for £12,000. A, in fact, does not possess any such property; yet, if the price of Bank stock on the day appointed for the transfer should be only £118 per cent., he may then purchase as much as will enable him to fulfil his bargain for £11,800; and thus he would gain £200 by the transaction. Should the price of Bank stock advance to £125 per cent., he will then lose £500 by completing his agreement. As neither A, nor B, may have the means of purchasing stock to the amount agreed upon, the business is commonly arranged by the payment of the difference, the profit or the loss, between the current price of the stock on the day appointed and the price bargained for. The buyer in these contracts is denominated a bull, and the seller a bear. When a person refuses or has not the ability to pay his loss, he is termed a lame duck. A penalty of £500 has been instituted by law upon every person who makes one of these time bargains.

TEMPERANCE HOTELS & COFFEE-HOUSES.

To the Editor of "THE TEETOTALER."

SIR,—You would be conferring an essential service upon Teetotal travellers, were you to notice in your valuable and widely-circulated journal, the disgraceful condition in which the accommodations at various Temperance hotels and coffee-houses are suffered to remain. There are some admirable exceptions to the rule; but I regret to say, that the generality of such establishments are characterized by filth and discomfort in respect to the places themselves, and by insolence and inattention on the part of the proprietors.

The injury and injustice inflicted upon a good cause by these circumstances, are incalculable; and I hope that you will take this matter up with spirit. For the present, Mr. Editor, allow me to lay before your readers a few extracts from my private journal, hoping that this publication of the proofs of my former assertion may induce a change in those establishments which admit of ground of complaint. But to my notes: the extracts are as follows:—

"Arrived at —; proceeded to the Temperance Hotel, and entered a Coffee and Reading Room. The landlady was at the fire with one of her children,—not teaching the young idea how to shoot; but blowing the fire with a pair of bellows which she ever and anon laid upon the tea-tray on the table near her."

"Arrival at —; here the Temperance Hotel professed to provide excellent accommodation for man and horse. I was cold, wet, and hungry. 'What can I have?' said I.—'Anything, Sir,' replied an ill-favoured dame of the old school.—'Well, then,' I exclaimed, overjoyed at this announcement, 'a nice steak, potatoes, and coffee directly.'—'Very sorry, Sir,' was the reply; 'but it hain't our market day, an' so there ain't never a steak in the house. Lots o' taters though, an' very excellent coffee.'—Never mind about the particular species of meat," I observed, "so long as it's good and plentiful. Give me either veal, pork, mutton, or beef."—'Ain't got a bit o' nothing o' them things,' was the rejoinder.—'Well, anything, then, that you have got,' said I.—'Yes, Sir,' and this estimable landlady departed, apparently to execute my commission; but an hour elapsed, and no dinner made its appearance. At length, after all the fine flourishes of 'anything you please,' and 'excellent accommodation,' &c., a dirty maid entered the coffee-room (so called), bearing a tray on which stood a plate of fat beef (the fat preponderating over the lean), and a whole array of cups and saucers doing the duty of mustard-pot, pepper-box, salt-sellar, and pickle-dish. As for the servant, I thought, with Shakspeare that 'I ne'er should look upon her like again.' Those succulent morsels of beef were accompanied by whitey-brown bread, and a cup of dingy-looking stuff, which the servant, with excessive facetiousness, was pleased to denominate coffee.

"The day was particularly wet and unpleasant, and I could not walk abroad. Rang the bell—no, shouted for the waiter. The girl made her appearance, with a dirty apron and corresponding face. 'Have you a newspaper?' said I.—'No, Sir, we haven't.'—'A book?'—'No, Sir.'—'Perhaps you have The Teetotaler journal?' said I.—'We always sell it the second day, and it vent away this mornin', Sir. Missis is agoin' to file it in future cos o' the picklers.'—'Have you the Temperance Intelligencer?'—'No, Sir.'—'Or the Journal of the New British and Foreign Temperance Society?' I continued.—'Never heard on it, Sir,' was the answer.—'What have you got?'—The girl declared that she would see; and, in process of time, she brought me the Temperance Advocate and Livesey's Moral Reformer, with which I managed to pass the day.

"When night came, I once more summoned the girl to my presence. 'Slippers, if you please,' said I.—'Eh! Sir!' she exclaimed, as if she had never heard of such things in her life.—'A pair of slippers,' I repeated.—'Ain't got none, Sir.'—'Perhaps you have got a bed, then,' I exclaimed, a suspicion entering my mind that the establishment, which professed to provide such extensive accommodation, might lack that little trifling article of domestic comfort also. But there was a bed to spare; so, after ascending two flights of stairs and a ladder, I reached a nook where I understood I was to sleep. I did contrive to pass the night in slumber; and on the following morning, after a breakfast of bread and milk, took my departure, thinking of the saying of John Hockings, 'Forgive me this time, and I'll never come again.'"

Comment, Mr. Editor, from me upon the above incidents is unnecessary. It is for you to do your duty as an influential journalist in the Teetotal world, and you will assuredly receive the best thanks of the best friends to the cause of total abstinence.

Your obedient servant,
MINGAYE SYDER.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

CONSCIENCE.

By Mrs. Reynolds.

There be not deeds alone to cause us care—
A word may also fill us with despair:
The crimes of man against us never bring
Such pangs, as Conscience' inward whispering,
That, faithful as the planets to the sun,
Praises or blames us when a deed is done!
Mankind may hate—revile—abuse—despise—
We scarce deplore such loss of sympathies;
We scarcely lavish on their ways a thought,
And if we do, 'tis but with pity fraught;
Half pity—half contempt we give again.
Nor feel their scorn to cause the slightest pain.
But when our secret monitor within
Warns us of guilt, and tortures for our sin,
How do we mark our conscious bosom thrill
With care and sorrow for the latest ill!
How do we curse the hour in which we roved
Amid the paths th' Almighty ne'er approved!
Oh! let us love each virtue that can raise Mankind to emulate those early days,
When first, in paradise, the primal pair
Were pure as angels, faultless and as fair,
Till, by the evil one beguiled to sin,
Their forms were alter'd as their minds within!

STANZAS FOR MUSIC.

By the Author of "The Cry of the Poor."

Tell me not a witch's dwell
In cheeks with rose-buds beaming;
Tell me not of magic-spells
In eyes like bright stars gleaming.
Talk not of auburn tresses,
Bosoms fair as mountain snow,
Or lips whose smile expresses
More than tongue e'er avow;
For 'tis not the rose-lit cheek,
Nor eyes, whose star-like glancing
Through the ringlets seem to speak,
That o'er their orbs are dancing;
Nor e'en the bosoms white as
Which the spirit can enchain:
No, 'tis the mind whose brightness
Love can win and e'er retain!
Give me, then, the kindred heart
With mine responsive beating,
Which would share my bosom's smart,
Share too its raptures fleeting.
The soul with mine so blended
In the linkless chain of love,
When one to heav'n hath wooed,
Both shall have their home above!

SONG.

By Andrew Parr.

Lead me thine azure eye,
Beauty's fond dwelling;
And thy soul's melody,
Silver'd and swelling;
Then may I win thy heart,
Gentle and guileless!
Till then I want the art—
Till then I'm smileless!
Hope's brilliant flash is gone,
Soothe of sorrow!
Sadness lies where it shone,
Fearing tomorrow!
Speechless and vain were tears,
Since thus we never:
Farewell! this heart still wears
Thine image ever!

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We shall be glad to see the sketches alluded to by J. T. B., and thank him for the communication forwarded to us last week. S. W. L. is informed that no political disquisition of any kind, will henceforth appear, as the professed opinions of the journal, in the columns of The Teetotaler. A Partisan Glance at the London Temperance Coffee-houses and hotels has been received and will be shortly inserted.

2, Old Bailey, Ludgate Hill.

We regret that an unavoidable delay, with our artist, has precluded the possibility of this week giving an illustration with "The Teetotaler." We can however assure our readers that we have adopted measures to prevent future disappointments. A lithographic drawing will therefore be given, as usual, with the next number. As soon as the promised Series of Twelve is complete, it is our intention to present the reader, weekly, with beautiful steel-engravings, gratis as at present.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5th, 1840.

WE call the attention of our readers to a letter, in another column, from Mr. MINGAYE SYDER, the eminent surgeon of Fleet-street. This gentleman writes to us from Nottingham, where we presume he is about to give one of his instructive and entertaining lectures; but it appears that he has tarried at various places upon the road, and that he has not always found the best accommodations at the Temperance hotels or coffee-houses where he has stopped. We should imagine that the fraternity of Teetotalers in the United Kingdom is now sufficiently extensive and respectable, to ensure an adequate patronage for places of entertainment well-kept and with suitable accommodations; but it would seem from the authority above-named (an authority which no one will pretend for one moment to doubt) that the Temperance inns in the country are too frequently defective in those attractions which will induce guests to return a second time. We regret this circumstance; and we agree with Mr. SYDER that it is calculated to injure the cause of Teetotalism. In the first place, travellers will be compelled to seek lodgings at the old established inns and taverns of country-towns, and will thus more or less be thrown in the way of company whose habits have not yet been changed by the doctrine of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors; and, in the second place, the evil complained of will encourage a very prevalent idea amongst the aristocracy of the land, that Teetotalism is confined to the lowest grades of society. In London we have certainly some excellent Temperance establishments, amongst which RUSSELL'S HOTEL, Westminster, HOCKINGS' HOTEL, in the Borough, HART'S HOTEL, Aldersgate-street, &c., are the best specimens. We are also aware that in many of the large towns of England there are commodious hotels upon Teetotal principles, such as HORWOOD'S at Pocklington, MARSDEN'S at Manchester, GRAUD'S at Bristol, &c., &c.; and we cannot conceive wherefore smaller places should bear so extraordinary a disproportion in respect to their means of public accommodation. The coffee-house, that is conducted upon the most humble plan, and in reference to a limited scale of expenditure and charges, may still possess those comforts and that cleanliness which will induce even the most fastidious to visit it a second time. The Teetotalers are the very persons who will attach importance to those characteristics of houses of public entertainment, and who can afford to pay for their accommodation. The mere fact of putting away from one's self the filthy custom of drinking strong liquors, leads to habits of nicety and cleanliness unknown in the times of dissipation and degrading ebriety; and of all establishments in the world, those which are instituted for the reception of Teetotalers, are the less liable to internal damage or riot. A neglect of comfort in a Temperance Coffee-house or Hotel is therefore a grievous fault.

MR. MINGAYE SYDER has conferred an immense obligation upon the Teetotal portion of society by his manly interference in this matter; and we sincerely hope that these few observations will be taken in a kind manner—in the way, indeed, in which they are meant. In a private note to the Editor of The Teetotaler, Mr. SYDER has promised to return to the subject again; and we hope that his next letter to us will be to assure us that these hints and suggestions have not been unproductive of good results. We shall be as delighted to record an improvement in provincial Temperance Coffee-houses, as we have been grieved to pen this article to vituperate them.

At a Court of Common Council, held, on the 30th of October, for general business, the Coal and Corn Finance Committee presented a report of their proceedings on the petition of the Coal-Whippers, and on having conferred with the Board of Trade upon the subject of the said petition. It is really time that something should be done to emancipate the unfortunate Coal-Whippers of Wapping from the degraded state of thralldom in which they languish,—a thralldom which is controlled by the vilest species of extortioners, the publicans of the district. In vain may the advocates of Teetotalism seek to obtain any great number of converts amongst the Coal-Whippers,—in vain may the philanthropic supporters of the great doctrine of total abstinence endeavour to rescue those ill-fated men from the grasp of the fiend Intemperance, as long as the devices of that fiend are so well and successfully seconded by the subordinate but accessory demons who preside in the public-houses of Wapping. Is it possible that human nature can be so degraded as to permit man to build the trophies of his own fortunes upon the mental and bodily ruin of his fellow-creatures? It is possible,—and that measure of iniquity is filled daily, and hourly, by wretches who gloat over the evils which they produce by their infernal conduct. The poor Coal-Whipper is compelled to apply to the landlords of public-houses for work; and the reply is, "We will find you in labour, if you will consent to expend one-third of your wages with us."

Such is the conduct of professed Christians, in a land of Christianity—a land which boasts of its freedom and its philanthropy—a land which is celebrated throughout the world for the hospitality it affords to foreigners—a land which associates religious sentiments and motives with the greater portion of the actions of life. Thousands of our fellow-creatures are made drunkards, and kept drunkards, against their inclination or will; and, as the holy Scriptures declare that the gates of paradise shall be closed against the drunkard, how can the wretches, who reduce their fellow-men to that degraded condition, stifle the galling remonstrances of their conscience? The dying wails of the Coal-Whippers' daughters who have been reduced to guilt,—the anathemas of the Coal-Whippers' sons who are condemned to chains and prisons for their crimes,—the starving families in Wapping,—the miserable beggars upon Ratcliff Highway,—are so many well-attested accusations against the cold-blooded and heartless conduct of the landlords of the public-houses, where the fathers of those criminal or distressed beings first imbibed the fatal habit of intemperance.

ERRORS AND INIQUITIES OF THE VENDORS OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

It is a singular error that many have fallen into, to conceive that the lasting interests of one class of our mercantile community can be promoted, by abridging the industry, and thus contracting the means for acquiring property amongst every other class, whose constant and continued trade must be so necessary to them. To render a good customer houseless and penniless, by filching from him a paltry sum for a daily allowance of spirits, and thereby jeopardize a more profitable trade in useful commodities, would seem to be anything but good calculation. With what truth it might be said, such a traffic "n'er enriches you, but makes him poor indeed." The spirit of our free institutions encourages industry, by conferring equality of rights and privileges; and every branch of business is, or ought to be, supported by a reciprocity of interest founded upon those great and leading principles. Any trade or business, therefore, so conducted as to derange this harmony of mutual interest and safety, becomes directly or indirectly a despoiler of public peace, and will sooner or later react with fatal effect upon the cause producing it. Hence it is most clearly a mistake, that the interest of trade is promoted by the sale of an article which paralyzes every industrious effort, weakens moral obligation, and tends to the dissolution of every social ligament which unites men together in the bonds of peace; cherishing in its stead the vilest passions, with the loss of everything which to rational beings could render life desirable or society a blessing. In such a state of society brought about by such means, what has the spirit merchant left more than others for his consolation? He might count upon the nominal value of his mortgages, but who has he left for tenants? A class of men, whom he can no longer trust or regard, though by his own policy they have been divested both of property and character. It may be said by the objector, that this presents an extreme case. Granted; but still it must be acknowledged in return, that every additional instance of pauperism, from such causes, becomes another step towards it, and the more multiplied the cases, the greater the approximation to that condition of society already described.

These are the classes of men whose baneful influence and vile attacks upon society are more to be dreaded than those of the highway robber. They strip their fellow citizens of their property; they destroy industry and morality, and even Christian virtue; and promote idleness, poverty, and disease. They are the root, the chief source of more than half the crimes committed in the land. They destroy the comforts and hopes of their victims, and send them to an untimely grave. They promote the commission of every kind of crime, robbery, and murder not excepted. The separation of husbands and wives, the abandoning of parents and children, and their mutual hatred and discord, can generally be traced to the same origin.

But how can that man who conspires at this baneful manufacture and traffic, pretend to call himself a minister of that gospel which teaches love and good will to men? or how can he, who vends poison and liquid fire, say that he believes in a future retribution, or that he has faith in Him who has said, "All things which he would that men should do unto you, do ye the same to them?" Could any one in his right mind wish his neighbour to give or sell him a poisonous draught which would deprive him of his reason, and cause him to commit crimes that would subject him to the loss of life or liberty, and entail everlasting disgrace upon himself and his posterity? No person who has for any length of time manufactured or vended ardent spirit, can speak the truth and say that his occupation has not been attended with pernicious consequences to his fellow creatures. And no doubt many a one is now living, who recollects with horror the vending of that draught which caused either the premature death, or murder, of one or more of his fellow creatures.

Manufacturers and vendors of ardent spirit are almost the only accessories to crime that the ingenuity of man has not invented laws to punish. He who only advises or assists in the destruction of his neighbour's property, or in the elopement of his child or ward, subjects himself to the penalties of the law; and he is adjudged a murderer, who only advises or assists in the destruction of a human being. And yet he whose daily employment is dealing out poisonous draughts to the destruction of mankind, and the promotion of every kind of vice, is called a Christian, and often hailed as one of the pillars of the church. But the members of that church, who boast of such pillars for its support, may blush to think of the price of blood, that could not gain admission into the Jewish treasury.

It is in vain that manufacturers and vendors of ardent spirit deny the charge of being accessory to the crimes attending the use of this poisonous liquid. As well may the poisonous adder declare that he has no agency in communicating the poison that destroys the life of his victim. Drunkenness, with all its attendant evils, is daily increasing, and will continue to increase, so long as the employment of making and selling ardent spirit is considered honourable. It is indeed surprising that any Christian society should admit into, or retain within its body, any person whose occupation proves so destructive to mankind.

No person can be admitted into, or remain a member of the Society of Friends, who is known to be engaged in the manufacture or sale of ardent spirit. Much good might be done by forming Societies, whose members should engage to trade with no person interested in the manufacture or sale of spirituous liquors. It is the duty of every individual to look upon that person as a bad member of the community, who gains a livelihood at the expense of the characters and lives, the present, and the future well-being of his fellow creatures. Whatever some may think, still the assertion is true, that no person can be engaged in the manufacture or sale of ardent spirit, to be used as a beverage, and be a virtuous Christian, or an honest man. For that person cannot be virtuous, who will follow an occupation that promotes vice; neither can he be honest, who will rob his friends and neighbours, by selling for a price that which is worse than nought. And that person or Society, that lets any tenement or privilege to any person or persons, to establish any trade or occupation that promotes vice, and he that encourages any such trade or occupation, by any trade or traffic with him or them who are engaged in it, become accessories to all the crimes and miseries attendant on such trade or occupation, as much as he who secretes stolen goods becomes accessory to theft. And no person needs pretend to the appellation of Philanthropist or Christian, who in any shape or manner willingly gives aid and comfort to one portion of the community, to rob, poison, and destroy the other.

Appetite and fashion unite with interest in upholding the baneful practice of drinking spirit; but let us hope that fashion—which leads half mankind—will lead her aid to the promotion of temperance.

THE CASTLE OF HOHENSTEIN.

A GERMAN LEGEND.

THE time at which this tale commences was towards the latter end of the fourteenth century, when each baron ruled in his own strong hold with absolute sway, not only over his immediate vassals, but also over the peaceful traveller whom he stopped, robbed or murdered, without being in dread of any other punishment than that inflicted by his own conscience, and which in general was easily appeased by a small present to his confessor, or the offering of a wax candle or a petticoat to the Virgin, who generally occupied a snug corner of his castle chapel. At this time, then, those old and scarcely perceptible ruins that you may perceive about half-way up a mountain, formed the magnificent castle of the proud baron of Hohenstein, who acknowledged no laws but the dictate of his own inclination: and those, if his vassals spoke true, were not always confined to the strict rule of right. He exacted strict obedience from every one around him, and those who had the hardihood to disobey him once seldom did so a second time.

The Baron had an only son, in every respect the opposite of his father. Ulric possessed a heart feelingly alive to all the gentle influences of humanity; he was one of those who would turn aside to avoid injuring the worm that crawled in his path; yet differing as he did in almost everything from his "inexorable sire," the stern baron loved him more than everything else; but his love did not show itself in the usual way.

The great hall of the castle was illuminated by a hundred lamps, hung around the walls in every variety of shape; and the shields of all the illustrious race of Hohenstein were each surrounded by a laurel wreath, in which the party coloured lamps were placed; and there all the magnates of the land were gathered to behold the wedding of Ulric with the haughty daughter of the yet haughtier Baron Eichenherz. The goblet passes round, and all cares seem to be forgotten, and if the heart be sad the face does not betray it.

"There the gay dance of bounding beauty's train, Links grace and harmony in happiest chain."

Old Time, even, seemed to grow young again, as he fled with unnoticed wing. Yet amidst all this joy, if the vassals spoke true, there was at least one heart that did not beat in time to that gay measure; and that was Ulric's, on whom his father's eye often turned with an inexplicable meaning.

Ulric left the hall with an expression of anguish on his pale handsome face,—he stood at the private postern gate, arrayed in his costly wedding dress, and gazed out into the night. The dark clouds were scudding along before the gale, which was whistling dismally through the battlements, forming a striking contrast to the scene within. "Yes, yes," he muttered, "it must be done now or never;" and he then sprang hastily down the cliff and soon reached the bottom, where now you may perceive the ruins of rather a large village. The inhabitants were all at that late hour asleep, and Ulric passed on unseen till he came to a small but neat cottage, which belonged to the widow of a distant relation of the Baron's, whose husband had been executed for treason, and all his estates confiscated. This small cottage had been given to her and her only daughter by the Baron, and here Ulric, during his father's absence at the chase or in the carousals at the neighbouring castle, spent the greater portion of his idle time. He knocked at a small latticed window—the noise was probably drowned in the storm, for he received no answer; so putting his face to the casement, he said, "Leiba, dearest Leiba, it is I." The casement was opened, and Ulric sprang into the room. "Are you ready, dearest?" he said; Leiba threw herself into his arms, and, hiding her weeping face on his shoulder, said, "Oh, Ulric, you must not indeed do this! I know your father will never forgive you, and how can you, Ulric, bear poverty who have so long been accustomed to live in princely splendour, and to the gratification of every wish? you will repent your hasty act, and—"

"Never, dearest, never," interrupted Ulric. "You know that not many hours hence I must wed the haughty maiden of Eichenherz whom I can never love. No, Leiba, I would rather share poverty, sickness, death itself with you than a throne with the proud Christine. I will never return to my father's hall, even should you not fly with me. I have bribed the boatman, and horses wait us at the other side of the river. Now, Leiba, will you come?"

She raised her head from his shoulder and looked out. "It is, in truth, a fearful night, and it seems as if heaven frowned on us:—yet I will go."

They left the cottage, and a few moments brought them to the river, where was the boat; and in it sat the old boatman muffled in his large cloak.

"Now row us quickly across, good Fritz," said Ulric as he placed himself in the boat.

Scarcely had the frail bark left the shore, when a flash of lightning, so vivid as to light up the whole scene with a blinding refulgence, burst from the cloud immediately over their heads, followed by a clap of thunder so loud and long that it seemed as if the demons of the storm were engaged in the din of war, and in all the confusion of a first onset. This was followed by so quick a succession of flashes as to be nearly continuous. The troubled waters were fearfully distinct and the whole river appeared one mass of white and sparkling foam. The strong oars bent like reeds from the vigorous strokes of the boatman, as, wrapping himself closer in his mantle, he pulled silently into the stream. When he had reached the middle he laid on his oars, and throwing open his rough cloak, the lightning flashed upon his jewelled vest,—it was the Baron.

Leiba uttered a piercing shriek, and then threw herself upon Ulric's bosom, who, spell bound, sat gazing at his father.

"Ah, ah, boy," shouted the Baron, "did you think to deceive me. Now, now say, will you give her up?"

"Never father, never," answered Ulric resolutely.

"Then she shall die!" said the Baron sternly; and holding back his son with one herculean arm, he with the other plunged the ill-fated girl into the whirling waters. She gave but one long piercing shriek as she was borne down by the eddying current.

"Father," said Ulric in a low deep tone, and the lightning fell upon his face, disclosing an unearthly fixedness of purpose,—"Father, you have destroyed your only son;"—and breaking with the strength of despair from the Baron's grasp, he plunged himself into the stream and instantly disappeared.

Long and wildly did the proud Baron watch for him to rise, in vain; he then threw himself into the bottom of the boat, and wept with agony:—and they were the first tears he had shed since childhood. At length he rose, and called wildly on his son; and then with a loud demoniacal laugh, he shouted, "I have no son:—I had one once, but I murdered him. Ah, ah, ah!" and the rocks rang with that unearthly laugh, and he sank insensible into the boat. Next morning he was found many miles down the stream, and was brought home; but his mind was gone, and some months after he died a madman. Even to this day the fishermen tell, that on the anniversary night of this wild deed, when the spirit of the storm is abroad, the scene is acted over again;—the maiden is dashed into the stream,—again her shriek is heard,—and again the Baron is seen whirling down the stream calling on his son,—and again once more the rocks reverberate with his wild unearthly laughter.

SPECULATIONS ON ASTRONOMY.

"ASTRONOMY, geography, and the use of the globes." Every card or circular of every schoolmaster or schoolmistress, advertiseth the willingness and capability of the said master and mistress, for a reasonable reward, to infuse the aforesaid particles of knowledge, with innumerable other particles, together with all sorts of classical information, to say nothing of morals, manners, and accomplishments, into the head of every juvenile of whatever capabilities, that may be consigned to their charge. This is undoubtedly desirable, and the only drawback is its utter impossibility. Indeed the professions of this species of the human race have always appeared to me as wildly extravagant as those of a romantic lover partially intoxicated, and their undertakings about as feasible as those of the worthy knight of La Mancha. Did they propose to give the mere sketch or outline—the technicalities of those sciences, one or two of which it takes the life of man to master—it would make the thing appear more probable, more decent, more conscientious; but perhaps their familiarity with the arithmetic may have the effect of expanding the imaginative faculty in an outrageous degree, and hence the riotous and unchecked flights of fancy in which they indulge in their advertisements and other lucubrations for the cajolement of soft-hearted mothers and softer-headed fathers. Ay, cajolement! I fearlessly repeat the word. What care I for them? I am "grown up" now—free, emancipated—"they shall never whip me more!"

I cannot say that I ever liked or felt attracted toward the, par excellence, sublime study of astronomy; at least not further than was barely necessary for the comprehension of its more attractive neighbour, geography. It is too vast, too stupendous a study for a mind of moderate caliber, requiring one of a somewhat Miltonic cast and dimensions to thoroughly comprehend its grandeur and its glories. I get (like Robert Montgomery) out of my latitude amid infinite space, and experience a puzzling and uncomfortable feeling of vast vagueness which I cannot possibly mistake for the essence of the "true sublime." I can admire and feel the beauty of the quiet night with her multitudes of stars or worlds, and our world's lamp—the moon, hanging in the midst. I can invest them with kindly influences and attributes, imagining how they are gladdening the route of the way-worn wanderer over the solitary waste, or glittering on the path of the home-bound mariner. I can imagine the thousand lovely dells, and silent streams, and peaceful cottages "embowered in trees," that they are complacently looking down upon, making beauty still more beautiful; I can imagine the manifold tribes of lovers they are surveying walking in quiet happiness, or tremulous joy, or pouting coyness, or sheepish bashfulness, beneath their beams, engaged in all sorts of speculations, from plans for the realization of the most extravagant bliss down to the most feasible and economical means of purchasing household furniture. I can imagine the multitudinous race of youthful poets who are standing on innumerable balconies, with folded arms and upturned eyes and upturned hair, with a mixture of hazy inspiration inflating and leaden dulness pressing upon their pericraniums, jumbled up with confused notions of power and Byron, and might and majesty, until the chilling night-dews check the formation of incipient sonnets to Venus, Jupiter, or "fiery Mars," by hinting that they may catch a cold; and they walk into their chambers, and stalk from the contemplation of immensity unto their pier-glass, to contemplate how they may have looked should any young ladies from adjacent windows have made them the object of their terrestrial speculations while they were picturesquely gazing on things celestial. I can imagine all this and much more, while lolling lazily out of the window, on a moonlight night, in a speculative mood; but when I come to view those heavenly bodies scientifically—astronomically—arithmetically—touching their size, distance, density, specific gravity, &c., together with considerations respecting the centripetal and centrifugal forces by which their motions are regulated, my imagination, as the sailors say, is "taken all aback!" It is making mere matter-of-fact work of it, subjecting the objects of one's love, wonder and unbounded admiration at once to "cold, material laws," to weight and measurement, and divesting them of all their beautiful and poetical properties.

Mythologically considered, I love the planetary bodies well. Literature cannot do without the gods and demigods, and full and half-bred divinities of former times. Beautifully has Schiller said, in his Wallenstein—

"The intelligible forms of ancient poets,
The fair humanities of old religion;
The Power, the Beauty, and the Majesty,
That had their haunts in dale or play mountain,
Or forests by slow stream, or pebbly spring,
Or chasms, or wat'ry depths: all these have vanish'd,
They live no longer in the faith of reason!
But still the heart doth need a language, still Doth the old instinct bring back the old names,
And to yon starry world they now are gone,
Spirits, or gods, that used to share this earth
With man as with their friend; and to the lover
Yonder they move—from yonder visible sky
Shoot influence down, and even at this day
'Tis Jupiter who brings what'er is great,
And Venus who brings everything that's fair."

No more need be added on this point. "The words of Mercury are harsh, after the songs of Apollo."

I entertain another quirk or notion against astronomy, except when studied for practical purposes. Though humility be a good thing, a sense of extreme littleness is not; and when we turn from the tremendous—the astounding study of astronomy, to consider what we are in connexion with what is, we become ludicrously small, even when viewed through that powerful magnifier—our own estimation. In the study of natural history, when we read of thousands of insects inhabiting a drop of water, or colonizing a green leaf, we are Brobdignagians, the least of us. But when we come to consider that this "great globe" itself, with all its storms and tempests, its thunder and fierce lightning, is, as regards size, a mere trifle to that of surrounding bodies, and, compared to them in quantity, as a grain of sand to its brethren of the sea-shore, the consideration has adrepressing and not an elevating effect. In such a case, what are we who strut and fret about, and take upon us "pride, pomp, and circumstance?" What is our glory or grandeur—our wit, or wisdom—or civic, literary, or military fame? Why, we are comparatively smaller than we can possibly comprehend. Shakspeare is a midge, and Napoleon a thing too diminutive to be thought of. Our virtues and our vices sink into insignificance, as, who should trouble themselves about the virtues of a grasshopper, or the vicious propensities of a caterpillar, or enter with interest into the humours, whims, foibles, and eccentricities of a mite? We lose our distinctive qualities as men and women, and become a mass of animalcules. It is discouraging to think of it.

Again, to a certain class of minds, such as have never thoroughly been able to master the perplexities of the multiplication table, the billions, trillions, quintillions, and so on, with which astronomy abounds, is perfectly incomprehensible. They read of a billion or so of miles, but have about as clear an idea of the distance implied, as they have of the occult mysteries of duodecimals. They have a vague idea, perchance, that it may be as far as China and back again, but nothing more. For my own part, I had always looked upon the enumeration of the sum total of the national debt of England as the most august and imposing mass of figures that could be brought together for any conceivable purpose. Why, look now, it becomes comparatively an unostentatious unit, as it were, a mere fraction. "The distance of the star Draconis appears to be at least four hundred thousand times that of the sun, and the distance of the nearest fixed star not less than forty thousand diameters of the earth's annual orbit; that is, the distance of the earth from the former is at least 38,000,000,000,000 miles, and the latter not less than 7,000,000,000,000 miles. A cannon-ball, supposing it could preserve the same velocity, would not reach the nearest of the fixed stars in six hundred thousand years!" There is goodly work enough to upset any moderate man's notions of time and space. Had this cannon-ball taken its departure in the time of Cheops, or even Cheop's grandfather, (if the imagination can roam so far back into the dense blackness of the past), it would even now be merely at the outset of its journey. Cheop's grandfather dandles young Cheops on his knee: he is tarna grows up, waxes in years; builds the everlasting (in our frail acceptance of the word) pyramids, lives to an antediluvian age, dies, is buried and forgotten; successive generations spring up and pass away: states rise and fall; empires expand and decay, and expand again, up to this present 1840, and yet this cannon-ball that has been travelling all this time with inconceivable rapidity, is, as it were, but a hop, step and jump on its way towards the nearest fixed star! This way of thinking will never do. It diminishes our ideas of the sombre stateliness of the past, and makes "hoar antiquity" a thing of yesterday. The by-gone glories of departed empires, looming with added grandeur through the indistinct and spectral past, must seem to a mind familiarized with such unconscionable notions of time and space, but as things that had existence an inconsiderable time ago, last week, or the week before. Let us leave this speculative star-gazing, and turn our attention to our own sung little portion of the solar system, with all its infinite varieties of men, manners, customs and countries. Abandon astronomy to Dr. Herschel and other lineal descendants of the Chaldees who had devoted themselves to it, and it alone; and therefore may deduce from it some great and useful results. It is not necessary that our artisans, lawyers, poets, clergymen and agriculturists, should have the motions of even the primary planets revolving in and adding their head-pieces. And as for the sweeteners of our life and tea: the makers of our pies and the mothers of our children; it is not fitting that they trouble themselves about the relative distances of the fixed stars. Let them rather go on as they have done; inventing fashions, quoting Byron, working lace, multiplying albums, and fulfilling their destinies. D.

THE BETHUNES.

(Concluded.)

THE reader has had a specimen of John's verses—verses written in summer, and recited to his brother in the quiet neuk already described. But how did he contrive to secure to himself privacy for winter, now that it was so much required, seeing that he had become, whenever a moment of leisure occurred, an assiduous student and writer. The cold season had hitherto required an old newspaper for a cover, and a book for a pretence, the family fireside being then necessarily the young enthusiast's sanctum sanctorum. He therefore bethought him of some architectural arrangements in order to secure himself a separate corner to which he could retire at any time.

"This had been a long cherished idea, and with a view to its accomplishment, a larger window than that formerly noticed had been fitted into the wall at the farther end of the house. A fireplace was now wanted; and to supply this deficiency, we commenced operations about the 1st of November. After nearly a week of hard labour in the evenings, the work was finished. Though it was then almost midnight, a fire was then put into the grate to try how it would vent; but from the circumstance of the chimney top being considerably lower than the ridge, to his utter disappointment, the smoke and flame instead of going upward, issued from between the bars! On the following evening the whole was demolished; and with no better materials than three old paling stakes for jambs and lintel, two round poles, which were to serve as supports between these and the roof, some ropes made of straw, and a quantity of mud scraped from the highway, we commenced our operations in a quarter where they were more likely to be successful. When the whole was finished, it looked neat when contrasted with the rest of the house; and this he considered a greater triumph of genius than anything in the performance of which he had hitherto been engaged. For one evening he was allowed to enjoy himself over a fire, the smoke of which was fairly carried off by a vent which he had assisted to construct; there was still much to do in the way of covering the apartment, so as to conceal the smoky rafters overhead; but he already looked forward to long evenings of uninterrupted literary enjoyment, and a winter of unprecedented comfort, when, on the following day, he was engaged to go to Luchrye as overseer, and thus the whole of the labour which he had previously bestowed on the old house at Lochend was in vain."

Such were some of the eventful occurrences in John's life; how important to him,—how small in the eyes of coarser spirits and more fortunate lads! But to the young and sorely straitened poet these occurrences chequered his existence with joys and griefs, with hopes and disappointments as thoroughly and touchingly as ever the blending of light and shadow variegated the history of the noisiest sons of men.

As overseer his income was 26*l.* annually, with fodder for a cow; and his brother, the writer of the sketch, accompanied him as an assistant, the two taking their bed clothes and other articles with them on a "wheelbarrow."

In his new situation the poet devoted himself entirely to his duties, which were numerous, and as he took them up, arduous. Grass-fields had to be enclosed, the hot-houses required almost constant attention, so that body and mind were thus exclusively engaged, his hopes being sanguine that he should be able to benefit his employers by his industry, and also to improve his own condition at the same time. But behold another change!

The estate is sold, John's services are not required beyond the year for which he had been engaged, and on the evening of the 10th November the brother returned to their father's cot once more, removing their bed-clothes, &c., again on a "wheelbarrow."

"When he had got some way on the road, he said, that 'whatever we might have left behind us, he did not think any one could accuse us of having brought more from Luchrye than we had taken thither;' and it was with feelings of satisfaction to which for months he had been a stranger, that he once more took his accustomed seat by the fire in his former home. It was not in his manner to stand upon punctilios: whatever was useful, and could be honestly come by, was, in his estimation, honourable; and, instead of vainly striving to maintain a fictitious rank in society, he at once commenced work as a common labourer on the public roads. The preparations which had been broken off on the previous year were resumed, and in a few evenings more he had the satisfaction of taking his seat by a cheerful fire in the long-contemplated little sanctuary at the farther end of the house."

John entertained, as might be expected of a person with such a fervid imagination, and possessed of such self-reliance, oft put to the test, a variety of day-dreams, some of them coming to his aid when other people, had they been so often baffled, would have utterly despaired. One of these visions was, that the brothers might promulgate something new and practically wholesome, at the same time mending their condition, by delivering lectures in the adjacent villages and towns, not on "Political Economy," nor "Rural Economy," but on "Practical Economy." The particular novelty of the plan need not be more precisely described than that from their own experience, the advantages and blessings which accompany industry, thrift, and moral rectitude carried into every part of life, private and domestic as well as social and public should be pressed home upon the minds and susceptibilities of their auditors. The benefit to themselves, however, which resulted from this enterprise do not appear to have been very encouraging; but as a literary curiosity we shall state that the lectures "were at first written upon brown paper bags ripped open, shreds of paper which had come to the house with tea, sugar, &c.; in short, everything which would carry ink, while the writers had no better writing-desk than their knees."

Schemes to insure worldly independence and comfort for those near and dear to him, literary enthusiasm, and strenuous efforts in both ways, distinguished John's life to a period not remote from that of his departure to another and a better sphere. In proof of his solitude and exertions in the former way, take one illustration more:—

"He saw that his parents, from age and infirmity, would be ill able to endure the bustle and fatigue of removing at every term, as is frequently the case with poor people in the country, who have nothing but the caprice of landlords to trust to; and for this reason he, as well as the narrator of his story, was anxious to have some asylum for them, to which these vicissitudes would not reach. We had again saved a small sum of money, and after many deliberations it was at last resolved to venture upon the building of a house.—Having fixed upon the site, and settled as to the fee-duty to be paid for the ground, our next business was to provide as many stones as we thought would be required. This being accomplished, on the 26th of July, 1837, with the aid of one mason whom he had engaged to work along with us, we laid the foundation of our future dwelling;—and had it been known to the world that we proposed to finish a house thirty six feet in length, and twenty in breadth, without asking or taking any assistance except such as we could pay for at the ordinary rate, and with no more wealth than two bolls of oatmeal, to serve as summer provision, the thews and sinews of two human beings, and about 3*l.* in money, reflecting individuals would have probably pronounced us fit for Bedlam: yet such was the case. In less than a week, the mason was called away to another job, but we still persevered. The drudgery which the poor author now underwent was such, that few, perhaps, would have cared for encountering it. He left home every morning before five o'clock, travelled three miles, commenced work immediately, and wrought till nearly half-past seven in the evening, with no more rest than was absolutely necessary to swallow his breakfast and dinner. The last of these, indeed, which consisted exclusively of bread, he frequently ate from his pocket, working the whole of the time. He had then to travel three miles back to his home; and, after having been thus engaged in hard labour and travelling for nearly fifteen hours, it may be believed that he was sufficiently tired before he reached it—yet day after day the same process was repeated, except during those short intervals when the mason wrought along with him, and then he dropped work at the usual time. Had it not been for a vision of the future which was now before him, it is probable that even he might have shrunk from this dreary task. But, in imagination, he already saw the house finished, the garden enclosed, with the crops put into the ground; and his father, now venerable from age, walking through it on a fine summer day, or, if he wished for exercise, employed with a hoe in the little enclosure which he would then be able to call his own. With such illusions—for, as Providence had decreed, they deserved no other name—we used to cheer our journey homeward; and to his warm heart they would have been a sufficient inducement to encounter still greater difficulties than those with which he had to contend. More stones having been provided than were necessary, the house was raised to two stories. On the 9th of September, the walls were finished; and before the 30th of the same month, the roof was on—an earthen floor laid—the lower flat plastered—part of the partitions built—and doors and windows provided, with very little assistance from tradesmen. With the exception of the carriage of three cart-loads of lime, everything had been paid ready money. But by this time the last farthing of the 30*l.* was expended—the stock of provisions was completely exhausted—and the author of the following pages was glad to engage in such work as he could find, to procure the necessities of life for himself and friends, and provide a little money to defray the expense of removing, which had now become inevitable.—On the 19th of November 1837, he came to that habitation at the building of which he had toiled so arduously; and when he heard his father say, 'Dear me, John, man, I am perfectly surprised to see that great house you have reared up for us,' it is probable that he considered himself overpaid for all his labours."

It is not thought necessary to cite any more of his verses, although many of them are worthy of all that has been said and shown of him; only mentioning further that the small volume to which reference has already been made, containing the joint labours of the brothers, was so received by the public as to afford them encouragement in their favourite pursuit, and that other openings began to be promising. One of the pair, however, was not to accomplish much more; he had done his duty, and his name deserves lasting commemoration. It will be with deep reluctance that any one can be brought to believe that the survivor is not destined to the fruits of the seeds sown, and so laboriously amid the bleakness and blasts of the world cultivated.

What man is there in the humbler walks of life, so often thorny as were of those these two Scottish rustics, who would not prefer them to an easy, torpid, and vegetating existence, provided, with the ease there was to be denied the aspirations, so often grievously baffled, which must have intensely gladdened on thousands of occasions the hearts of the Bethunes? They must all along have been conscious of high resolves, and of extraordinary intellectual achievements; and what greater reward could man on earth receive? But we must have done, and shall remain in the hope that multitudes will long to know all the incidents and particulars so meekly and modestly detailed in the sketch, as well as to enjoy the poetry of the gifted young man who has gone to his rest.

REVIEWS.

A Winter in the West Indies. Described in Familiar Letters to Henry Clay, of Kentucky. BY JOSEPH JOHN GURNEY. London: Murray. 1840.

FRIEND Gurney's sojourn in the West Indies, like a former visit to the United States, was ostensibly to convert the people, shall we say, to Quakerism. He also took advantage, we presume, of the opportunity while in America to inquire into the slave system of that country, as he has earnestly done into the effects of Emancipation throughout some of the Islands he more lately examined; nor has he neglected, or shown any want of capacity and taste for dilating on the beauties of nature, and expatiating on the character and ways of men, wherever he has gone, often giving appropriate expression to his perceptions and feelings. He even courts the poetic muse to celebrate the splendours of sea and land, and the redundant teeming productions of the tropics. His sojourn in the West Indies was not indeed of long continuance; but he appears to have made the best use of his time both in journeyings and earnest inquiries, the results of which he details in an easy and plain, yet elegant and manly style; for his heart is in whatever he says, and its gushings are ready and natural.

Several of the islands which he visited were small and well prepared for the introduction of free labour, or where at least abolition was not likely seriously to affect production. No doubt Jamaica was an exception, and affords a grand field for illustration; but there has been a falling off both in respect of produce and returns. Still our author lays these diminutions at the door of the planters, charging them with putting into practice erroneous ideas, and a system of making rents stand for wages and the exaction of labour, at the same time predicting, if proper measures are adopted, and protections continued in the way of duties, that in the course of time greater prosperity will be realized by all classes in the island than even the most flourishing periods presented. Here is an attractive picture:—

"Do you see that excellent new stone wall round the field below us?" said the young physician to me, as we stood at A. B.'s front door surveying the delightful scenery: "that wall could scarcely have been built at all under slavery or the apprenticeship; the necessary labour could not then have been hired at less than five pounds currency, or fifteen dollars per chain. Under freedom it cost only from three dollars and a half to four dollars per chain, not one third of the amount. Still more remarkable is the fact, that the whole of it was built under the stimulus of job work, by an invalid Negro, who during slavery had been given up to total inaction. This was the substance of our conversation; the information was afterwards fully confirmed by the proprietor. Such was the fresh blood infused into the veins of this decrepid person by the genial hand of Freedom, that he had been redeemed from absolute uselessness, had executed a noble work, had greatly improved his master's property, and, finally, had realized for himself a handsome sum of money. This single fact is admirably and undeniably illustrative of the principles of the case; and for that purpose is as good as a thousand.

A few more particulars, however, which bear on the same point, may be interesting. They are contained in the letter already cited, from my friend Dr. Stewart, dated 'Mandeville, Jamaica, March 28th, 1840.' With regard to the comparative expense of free and slave labour, says he, 'I give you the result of my experience in this parish. Wherever rent and labour have not been mingled together, prices have been reduced in the picking and curing of coffee, from one-third, to one-half; from 10*l.* per tierce to from 5*l.* to 6*l.* 10*s.* Grass-land is cleaned at one-third of the former expense. A pen in this neighbourhood, when cleaned in slavery, cost simply for the contingencies of the Negroes, 80*l.*; the first cleaning by free labour, far better done, cost less than 24*l.* Stone walls the only fence used in this rocky district cost 5*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* per chain, the lowest 4*l.*, under slavery: the usual price now is 1*l.*, the highest 1*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* per chain. To prepare and plant an acre of woodland in coffee, cost twenty years ago, 20*l.*; up to the end of slavery, it never fell below 16*l.*; in apprenticeship it cost from 10*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* to 12*l.*; now it never exceeds 5*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*; I myself have done it this year for 5*l.*—that is the general price all through this district. In 1833, I hired servants at from 16*l.* to 25*l.* per annum; in 1838, 1839, and since, I have been able to obtain the same description of servants, vastly improved in all their qualifications, for from 8*l.* to 10*l.* per annum. These are pound, shilling, and pence calculations; but they develop mighty principles—they detect the springs of human action—they prove the superiority of moral inducement to physical force, in the production of the useful efforts of mankind. It is the perfect settlement of the old controversy between wages and the whip.

'I know the case of a property,' observes Dr. Stewart again, 'on which there were one hundred and twenty-five slaves, the expense amounting (at 5*l.* per annum for the maintenance of each slave) to 625*l.* The labour-account for the first year of freedom, deducting rents, was only about 220*l.*; leaving a balance in favour of freedom of 400*l.* More improvement had been made on the property than for many years past, with a prospect of an increasing extent of cultivation. On a second property, the slave and apprenticeship expenses averaged 2,400*l.*; the labour-account for the first year of freedom was less than 850*l.* On a third estate, the year's expense under slavery 1,480*l.*; under apprenticeship, 1,050*l.*; under freedom, 637*l.* On a fourth, the reduction is from 1,100*l.* to 770*l.*

Allowing a little time for the calming of apprehension and the development of truth, such results must infallibly find their way into the value of landed property. That they have already done so in Jamaica to a considerable extent, is undeniable. A person in the parish of Manchester who never held slaves, availing himself of the general alarm, bought a property, at the date of full freedom, for 1000*l.* currency. The free labourers work the better for him, because he never was a slave-owner. He cleared the whole purchase-money, besides his expenses, the first year. He would, of course, make a miserable bargain were he now to sell the property for five times the amount—i. e. for 5,000*l.*

We quote another cheering illustration:—

"As I was riding down the Mandeville hills on a hackney lent me by the Missionaries, enjoying the grandeur of nature and the beauties of cultivation, I overtook a good-looking young Negro, handsomely attired, and mounted on a pony of his own. He was a labourer, on Richmond Park, coffee-estate, in the parish of Clarendon; paid half a dollar per week for his rent; was able to earn four dollars per week by piece-work; had paid 10*l.* sterling for his pony; kept wine at times in his cottage; had gone to Mandeville to obtain his marriage-certificate from the Rector; and with his young bride, seemed to be in the way of as comfortable a measure of moderate prosperity as could easily fall to the lot of man. This is one specimen among thousands of the good working of freedom in Jamaica."

"How many dollars should I find in thy purse at home?" said a friend in our company to a young married negro, who was guiding us along one of the mountain passes. 'Should I find five?' 'Yes, sir,' replied he; 'and no great matter neither.' How very few of our labourers in England would be found with twenty shillings in their purse of spare money, was our reflection on the occasion. 'How much dost thou pay at one time for liquor?' 'A pound, sir,' said he, 'that is twelve shillings sterling; which lasts this labourer, for wine, porter, &c., only six weeks—a luxury which we hope will be soon exchanged for domestic comforts of a more desirable character. Their previous grounds are often extremely productive, sometimes yielding a clear income of 20*l.* or 25*l.* sterling. They are a decent, intelligent race, alive to their own interest, and increasingly cognizant of all that concerns it."

All this is said with reference particularly to the magnificent island of Jamaica. Not that our author did not discover evils in the new system exhibited in that island; for he says that the labourers are still exposed to much oppression and extortion, in the way hinted above. "Are the people working well," said I to George Wedderly, (that was his name,) "in the parish of Clarendon?" "Yes, generally; but on some properties they are uncomfortable." "Why so, George?" "When a man has finished his job, he goes for his money, and can't get it. Sometimes he hires helpers, but can't get his money, and therefore can't pay them. The rent is set off against him. Then come bad words. The rent is often increased, often doubled." Says our Friend: "I had every reason to give the young informant credit both for shrewdness and veracity."

Outward decency, education, morality, and attention to religious duties have made a marked advance. Marriages are more numerous, and commitments for offences far less. Nay, the Whites are reforming, for they are beginning to be shamed into compliance with the superior manners of the Blacks. We cite some illustrative specimens. Go to Antigua:—

"The Vicar of St. John's, during the last seven years of slavery, married only 110 pairs of negroes. In the single year of freedom, 1839, the number of pairs married by him was 185.

"With respect to crime, it has been rapidly diminishing during the last few years. The numbers committed to the house of correction in 1837, chiefly for petty offences, formerly punished on the estates, were 850; in 1838, only 244; 1839, 311. The number left in the prison at the close of 1837 was 147; at the close of 1839, only 35.

"Nor can it be doubted that the personal comforts of the labourers have been, in the meantime, vastly increased. The duties on imports in 1833 (the last year of slavery) were 13,576*l.*; in 1839 they were 24,650*l.* This augmentation has been occasioned by the importation of dry goods and other articles for which a demand, entirely new, has arisen among the labouring population. The quantity of bread and meat used as food by the labourers is surprisingly increased. The wedding-cakes and dinners are extravagant, even to the point, at times, of drinking champagne."

The negroes of Antigua show more reluctance than formerly to go out to their places of worship in rainy weather. Why? because they now wear "shoes and stockings which they are unwilling to expose to the mud." It is natural enough that childish niceties should be exhibited by such novices in the comforts and luxuries of civilized and independent life.

According to Friend Gurney's account, Teetotalism would be a most excellent reform were it generally introduced into the West Indies. At present a distillery is an almost unvarying appendage to the boiling-house, every two hogsheads of sugar being accompanied by at least one puncheon of rum. This new rum is not only a most tempting liquor, but it is most injurious to the health of the drinkers of it. But "our friend Stevenson drinks only water, and with an honest consistency, manufactures no rum. The scummings of the sugar liquor, from which (with a mixture of molasses) the rum is usually distilled, are on his estate pumped back into the clarifier, and converted into sugar as excellent as any that he makes. He is confident that the change of system is economical and profitable."

Friend Gurney has addressed his Letters by permission to Henry Clay, no doubt with the view of making an impression upon that eloquent and strenuous abettor of slavery in America.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

COVENTRY.

A SERIES of five spirited Meetings has lately been held in the City of Coventry, and which, it is hoped, has been productive of great good, and given an impetus to the Temperance cause which will not soon be expended. The Independent Order of Rechabites (City of Coventry tent) assembled at the Mechanics' Institution, Herford-street, on Monday, Nov. 9th, at one o'clock, from which place they walked in procession, with sashes and banners, to the Wesleyan Chapel, where an excellent and appropriate sermon was preached by the Rev. J. JENKINSON, of Kettering. In the evening the half-yearly Meeting of the Society was held in the Theatre of the Mechanics' Institution. After the reading of the report, a lecture was delivered by MR. JAMES TAYLOR, of Preston, which lasted about two hours and a half. This lecture exhibited a mass of statistical information of the most appalling kind, and was at the same time replete with sound argument, forcible illustration, and well-timed appeals to the sympathies of the audience. Strong in the consciousness of truth, confident in the position he has taken, and aware that he is pleading the destinies of immortal millions, the lecturer grappled at once with the consciences of his audience. Passing over the disputable ground of expediency, he denounced the making, vending, and using the drunkard's drink as immoral and positively sinful—as a violation of the laws of God, and an unjustifiable infringement of the rights of humanity. This high ground was taken by Mr.

Tears, and unflinchingly maintained by the succeeding speakers during the week. On Tuesday evening an argumentative and eloquent lecture was delivered by the Rev. J. JENKINSON on "The Principles and Objects of Temperance Associations." On Wednesday, there was a lecture by the Rev. J. T. BANNISTER, in which the following points were examined and discussed:—"1st, Is the state of society such as to justify and require the adoption of measures for the suppression of Intemperance different from those that were employed previously to the formation of Temperance Societies? 2nd,—Is the practice of Total Abstinence from inebriating beverages efficient as a remedy, and preventive of Intemperance? 3rd,—Is Total Abstinence physically injurious? 4th,—Is it in harmony with the testimony of Scripture, the requirements of the Gospel, and the principles of Christianity." On Thursday evening, a lecture was delivered by Mr. T. BARLOW, of Birmingham, on "The Importance and Advantages of Temperance Societies to the Labouring Classes." This lecture, which commenced soon after seven o'clock and lasted till half-past ten, excited an intense and powerful interest, and was listened to with breathless attention to the last minute. On Friday evening, addresses were given by a number of our reclaimed characters; and their plain matter-of-fact statements, some of which were very affecting, told more powerfully on the audience than the most elaborate arguments, and established beyond all doubt the efficiency of the Society as a measure of reformation. On Saturday evening, after an address by Mr. HYDON, a second lecture was given by the Rev. J. T. BANNISTER, on "Intemperance and its Remedy." The lecturer commenced by adverting to some of the interesting features of this vice, which he said was unnatural, artificial, progressive,—the consequence of moderate drinking,—a physical disease curable only by physical means. In speaking of Teetotalism as the remedy of Intemperance, he instituted the enquiry,—"Is Total Abstinence practicable and safe?" maintaining the affirmative by the following considerations:—"1st,—God never made intoxicating liquors; 2nd,—One fifth of the aggregate population of the globe, or 200,000,000 out of one thousand millions, do without them; 3rd,—The most eminent physiologists pronounce them unnecessary and injurious; 4th,—No operation in the healthful animal economy requires artificial stimuli to assist it; 5th,—Every animal in the creation does without them except man; 6th,—The combined testimony of at least five millions, who have made the experiment, favours the disuse of them."

At the close of the lecture on Tuesday evening, a most disgraceful disturbance was created by two or three disaffected individuals, who had left the society some time before. One of them, a fellow named Thos. Mc. Lean, got up a meeting in a distant part of the town, and made a gross attack on the Committee and on the Rev. J. T. Bannister, one of the staunchest friends of the Society from its commencement. In consequence of this, Mr. Bannister has commenced legal proceedings against this ruffian, Mc. Lean, and he will now be compelled either to retract the vile calumnies he has uttered or abide the result. It will scarcely be credited that this man was rescued from a state of the most degraded immorality and wretchedness by the very society he is now vainly attempting to destroy.

NEWCASTLE.

We are glad to perceive that another Teetotal publication is started in this town, under the title of The Northern Temperance Advocate. It seems to be conducted with both talent and spirit. We extract the following paragraph from its news-department:—

"The weekly meeting was as usual held on Thursday evening, the 12th inst. Attendance numerous. Our old friend Robert Tiffin, in the chair. Messrs. W. K. Robson, Forster, and others were speakers.—On Thursday evening last, Mr. G. Charlton presided in the meeting, and Messrs. Yates, Green, and G. McCree were the speakers. On Sunday last, out-door meetings were held in the following places:—Sandgate, Quay-side, Forth, Clayton-street, which were addressed by Messrs. Mowbray, Gilmory, Kelso, Charlton, Walton, and W. K. Robson. At the Sandgate meeting, Mr. Robson stated that it was the intention of some of the out-door labourers to commence a weekly meeting in that place, and requested them to say whether they would support it, when an unanimous assent was given to the proposal. The speaker then stated, that the name of the street should now be changed, and henceforth be called Teetotal-street, and that they would not cease labouring until every inhabitant had become an out-and-out Teetotaler."

We also have much pleasure in laying the following statement, taken from the same journal, before our readers:—

"We are happy in having the opportunity of directing the attention of our readers to an advertisement in this week's Advocate respecting Miss Laidler's intention of publishing a portrait of Father Mathew. This talented lady has been at the trouble and expense of visiting Ireland for the purpose of obtaining a correct portrait of the rev. gentleman, and he favoured her with three sittings on three successive mornings, at Naas, in the county of Kildare. The portrait we feel confident will be found to be a most correct one, and as a picture it is worthy of general attention; and we hope that the lady, whose talents are of the first order, will receive extensive patronage in her undertaking. The reverend individual is still going forward in his glorious career of usefulness; and during the three days that he remained at Naas he administered the pledge to thirty-nine thousand persons."

We extract the following paragraphs from an Address just published to the working men of England, by the Editor of the Northern Star and others. We do not publish the whole of this address, because its contents are of a strong political character; and we have determined henceforth neither to adopt, nor countenance any particular political bias. We therefore merely lay the ensuing passage before our readers, in consequence of its admirable arguments in favour of Teetotalism:—

"We have long deplored the fact, that in scarcely any other country are the people so infatuated by the love of intoxicating drinks as in Great Britain; and while we willingly bear testimony to the good already resulting from the exertions of various Teetotal societies, confirmed as this is by the health and happiness of thousands of reformed drunkards and their once neglected families, yet are we compelled to declare that drunkenness is still the prevailing vice of our people; and that from its source flow many of those alarming crimes which so fearfully deface our national character. And though we admit that class-legislation has inflicted upon us ills innumerable, and blighted the intellect and broken the hearts of whole generations of the sons of toil, we cannot shut our eyes to the truth THAT NO STATE OF FREEDOM CAN IMPROVE THE MAN WHO IS THE SLAVE OF HIS OWN VICES. Look at the unhappy drunkard reeling home to his ragged and starving wife and children. The money expended in the pot-house deprives his family of the commonest necessities of life. His own health undermined—his morals corrupted—his vicious example poisoning the minds and morals of his children—and he grovelling through a wretched existence a self-doomed outcast, alien from all the ennobling dignity of manhood. Can such a man be free? He may in his lucid intervals of reason attend public meetings, and applaud those who are calling a nation to a sense of its duty; he may boast of 'radicalism'; he may rail loudly against the abuses of government; but so long as he dooms the partner of his bosom and the offspring of his loins to rags and hunger by his own vicious extravagance, and drinks 'success' to freedom in that poison from which our rulers derive a considerable portion of their revenue, so long is he unfit for aught save the reprobation of the wise and the good."

"But you will say 'We admit all this. Cannot we drink moderately?' In answer, we tell you that this 'moderate drinking' is a pernicious habit. All drunkards were once 'moderate' drinkers. The desire for more drink increases with the habit; and that which suffices at the commencement of the moderate drinker's career is not sufficient when drinking becomes a confirmed habit. We are convinced that all intoxicating drinks are ruinous to the constitution. Our experience has taught us that those who totally abstain enjoy a far better state of health than those who call themselves 'moderate' drinkers; and we have invariably found their domestic comforts increased. If, then, the moderate use of intoxicating drinks be an evil—and we fearlessly assert it—why use them at all? Look closely into the question. The 'moderate' drinker must buy his drink. Suppose a man is earning one pound per week (and how many are there not averaging six shillings!), even though he drinks but one pint of beer daily, at three-pence per pint, his outlay, for himself, upon beer alone, will be one shilling and sixpence per week. Then comes the filthy pipe, which, allowing himself but one ounce of tobacco per week, costs fourpence more. And it is not improbable that the wife, following her husband's example, will also like a 'moderate' quantity of beer; and, supposing she takes but half a pint daily, here is an additional expense of tenpence halfpenny. Here, then, is a very 'moderate' pair spending two shillings and eleven pence halfpenny weekly upon that which, so far from doing them good, is absolutely injurious! Nearly three shillings out of twenty worse than thrown away. Then there is the time wasted over the pint and pipe—time which ought to be devoted to SELF-CULTURE or the EDUCATION OF CHILDREN. We submit that the money and time thus wasted ought to be put to better account. We say that this 'moderate' drinking will occasionally drive its devotees to THE PAWNBROKERS, for every shilling of a poor man's wages is needed in the little republic of home. And we need scarcely mention how the PUBLIC REVENUE is augmented even by the 'moderate use of intoxicating drinks."

"It has been our misfortune frequently to witness scenes of the most appalling misery produced by the vice of drunkenness. We have seen families of 'skilled workmen,' in London and other large towns, ragged, hungry, diseased, ignorant, and vicious, at the time these 'skilled workmen' were earning from thirty shillings to two pounds per week; and we have marked these men sulky and brutal in their homes—their knowledge confined to the tap-rub and the gin-cask—and we have invariably found them the most selfish of slaves. Our hearts have bled on witnessing this prostration of humanity. We have known hundreds of families reduced to want and rage by the insane habits of 'moderate' drinkers and smoking. We have known these 'moderate men' lounging away whole hours over the pot and pipe at the time their wives and children were craving with hunger at home. We have known these men get into debt for 'moderate quantities' of beer during working hours; and, on Saturday night, we have found one third, and, in many cases, half their wages go to pay the beer score. We have noted their mortifications as they have parted with so much money; we have watched them to their destitute homes, and have observed the wretchedness of the wife when the remaining pittance was thrown into her lap. 'Is this all?' Then comes the falsehood—the equivocation—a momentary sense that he has wronged her; and, after having thus deprived her of the means of providing for the household, he strives to smother her just indignation by excess of kindness and soft words! He takes his child in his arms—that living monitor of his baseness—and endeavours to make atonement for his crime by kissing its fleshless cheeks and calling it his 'darling babe!' Countrymen—these are no imaginary pictures. Oh! if we have the slightest love for our fellow-creatures, let us strive to remove these heart-rending scenes from our land! Have we not oppression enough, without adding to it by our own vices? Are not thousands of people starving for want of sufficient wages to purchase food? Have not the class-legislation, heavy taxes, monopolies, and national debts sunk us sufficiently low, without sinking ourselves still lower? Away, then, with our own infatuation! Let us rather stem the flood of national wrongs than increase its force by our own misdeeds."

TOWN NEWS.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

THE Aldersgate-street Chapel, on the 25th of November, witnessed a meeting superior in number and respectability to any we have before seen within those walls: it was presided over by Mr. LAWRENCE HEY-WORTH, a magistrate of Liverpool.

The Chairman opened the meeting with a brief but lucid and effective dissertation on the nature of Alcohol, showing its effects upon the physical constitution and the nervous system, and its influence on the temper.

MR. BENSTAD commenced by noticing the various opinions entertained by different portions of society as to the principles of total abstinence and the character of its disciples, and took occasion to repudiate with much indignation the motives frequently attributed to the leaders of the different societies. He then returned to his usual dispassionate and argumentative system of reasoning upon the necessity of total abstinence on the high ground of moral duty.

MR. CRUMP, the registrar, whose speeches are always practical and sensible, on this occasion excelled himself, and was really brilliant as well as impressive. He took an enlarged view of the many practical, social, and mental benefits arising from Teetotalism; and he insisted that all these were nothing as compared with its effects in disposing human beings to think of the day of death. On this ground he founded an earnest exhortation, which was listened to with an attention alike creditable to the audience and the speaker.

MASTER MULLEN, of the Clerkenwell Youths' Association followed, and spoke with considerable effect. His principal topic was the effect of total abstinence upon the wages of labour, a difficult subject to handle, especially for one so young. He was, however, well received and much applauded.

MR. FARMILAR, from Chelsea, brought up the rear by affectionately warning his fellow-workmen, and others, to keep outside the public house, that being the safest and best side. He feelingly regretted the influence of his former example in making drunkards, and promised to continue to exert himself to reform them.

WESTMINSTER AUXILIARY TO THE NEW BRITISH AND FOREIGN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

THIS Society continues to use its best energies in the cause of Teetotalism; and, with a laudable desire to carry out to the fullest extent, the object for which it was formed, the committee have lately engaged MR. DEALER, a working man, who has been reclaimed from habits of intemperance, to deliver a course of six lectures, on subjects connected with the principles of the Society. He has now delivered three of them in a style and manner highly creditable to himself, and very satisfactory, not only to the committee, but also to the audience.

As the only object which the committee have in view by this course of lectures is to endeavour to promulgate a principle capable of producing so much good to the human family, they are earnestly desirous of giving the matter as much publicity as possible. There is no charge for admission: the lectures are delivered on Monday evenings, at the Hall, Prince's-place, Prince's-street, Westminster.

QUEEN'S-BENCH PRISON.

We perceive that the friends of Mr. G. C. Smith intend to celebrate his release on Monday next, on which occasion they will proceed in procession from the Queen's Bench to Wellclose-square, and a tea-meeting will be held in the Mariners' Church, in the afternoon, to welcome him home. At 7 o'clock in the evening, Mr. G. C. Smith will preside at a Public Meeting to be held there.

ITALY.

ITALY, which the Mediterranean and Adriatic wash with their waves, and the lofty barriers of the Alps divide from the rest of Europe, is a naturally rich, beautiful, and powerful peninsula. Its geographical position, with numerous ports and bays, renders it a remarkably maritime and commercial country: its vast plains and auriant valleys, watered by many rivers and streams, either flowing from its lakes or descending from the Alps and Appennines, are extremely fertile and healthy; and its inhabitants, endowed generally with natural talents, and a lively disposition, are robust, active, and adapted both for the culture of science, literature, arts, and for the avocations of husbandry, commerce, and war.

During the unrivalled grandeur, both of the Roman Commonwealth and Empire, Italy produced the people that conquered the world; and its inhabitants were justly considered the most civilised of the whole globe, the most formidable enemies, and the most generous allies. The despotism, however, and the profligacy of the successors of Augustus, led the way to the degeneracy and demoralization of their subjects; and, little by little, that great empire became immoral, luxurious, and factious.

Constantine having afterwards transferred his court from the west to the east of Europe, the Italian peninsula was of course reduced to be a province of the empire; and, under the tyrannic misrule of the rapacious favourites of the eastern emperors, the Italians were truly in a miserable situation. Civil liberty was almost annihilated,—the national laws were disregarded,—the nobles were harassed and impoverished by the exactions of the imperial tax-gatherers,—and the people, exposed to all sorts of oppression and vexation, became indifferent into the hands of what masters they fell. This moral and civil corruption, growing daily more and more prevalent, at length enervated the physical strength of the Italians, and deprived their mind of its vigour and energy; so that they at last sank into a lethargy and a stupid oblivion of their ancient greatness.

The barbarous ancestors of the present semi-barbarous Russians, who had for centuries eagerly sought to possess themselves of the treasures of Italy, profiting now by its distracted state—Vandals, Huns, Goths, and Visigoths—having left their frosty sterile lands, like destructive locusts, rushed into its territory, easily defeated its degenerate and undisciplined military forces, and conquered and enslaved the whole peninsula. Thus the treasures collected during a thousand years, became the prey of barbarians; and the once proud mistress of the world now experienced a severe retribution for the sufferings which she had caused to many countries and nations in the days of her former splendour and power. The gradual annihilation of knowledge, civilization, industry, and commerce, was naturally followed by ignorance, superstition, slothfulness, and poverty.

The Lombards having at last been conquered by Charlemagne, the west and south of Europe were forced from their brutalizing despotism and tyranny; and the dreadful darkness of the middle ages having been succeeded by tranquillity, order, peace, and security, with the eighth century Italy became once more the cradle of European civilization, and the hallowed reviver of science, literature, and the arts. The other nations, in the meantime, following her example, undertook the noble task of their regeneration. Charlemagne, however, committed two great errors: in the first place, he sanctioned and even augmented the temporal power with which King Pepin had universally invested the Popes; and, in the second place, he omitted to unite the peninsula into one kingdom, under a national government, over which the spiritual sway of the successors of Peter should not be able to rule by fermenting dissensions and bloodshed amongst its inhabitants.

But, notwithstanding its political division and the ambitious encroachments of the Roman Pontiffs, Italy was greatly improving in civilization and commerce. The republics of Venice, Genoa, Florence, and Siena, became the chief marts of European commerce with the East Indies; and, their citizens being scattered all over Europe for purposes of trade, rendered their country wealthy, respectable, and respected.

Towards the beginning of the thirteenth century, Italy was unfortunately visited by two great scourges, which seemed to vie with each other in order to transform that paradise of Europe into a warlike and bloody hell, and, in fact, did all in their power to place an insurmountable barrier against the progress of civilization and learning in that country. These scourges were the devastating civil wars of the Guelphs and the Ghibelines, and the Holy Inquisition, which was founded at the instigation of a fanatic monk, Dominick de Gusman, who was well seconded and supported in his brutal views by an ignorant Italian Friar, named Francis d'Assisi.

The Roman Pontiffs, however, were the real and interested secret promoters of these evils, because they wished not only to retain, but also to increase their usurped temporal power, against which the enlightened Italians of all classes had begun to protest; and they had also dared to attack with their writings the unbecoming worldly grandeur and un-Christian pride of the Popes. In order to prevent the spreading of these just but unpleasant remonstrances, the army of the Holy Inquisitors was put into action, and those professed ministers of the God of mercy and justice were so zealous in behalf of the ecclesiastical supremacy and infallibility of the Romish church, that, in less than a century from their establishment, they actually destroyed by torture, poison, strangulation, and fire above two hundred thousand supposed Italian heretics.

But neither the civil butcheries of the Guelphs and Ghibelines, nor the terrific power of the Inquisition, could again subject, to the dominion of ignorance and superstition, the enlightened portion of Italy; and as the liberty of speech and conscience was totally extinct, the Italian mind directed all its faculties towards the noble pursuit of science, literature, and art, and greatly contributed to the propagation of classic knowledge throughout Europe. In the mean time, in all the great cities, where either an university or a learned body existed, secret societies were established in order to keep alive, and even to promote, the spirit of ecclesiastical reform, which had already manifested itself, and had been scarcely choked by the blood of so many martyrs. But, as it would have been almost impossible to carry on a written correspondence between the reformers scattered over Italy, without being discovered and denounced by the Argues of the Holy Inquisition, the renowned Scuola d'Amore was instituted, by means of which, under the apparent pretext of promoting the study and improvement both of the Italian language and poetry, great efforts were made towards the spreading of antipapal principles, in order to counteract and paralyze the baneful effects of the intrigues of the Roman See, and the brutality of its inhuman supporters and satellites. As at that epoch allegorical and mythological compositions and apoloques were eagerly sought after by all classes of readers, both poets and novelists made a good use of this opportunity in behalf of their projects. Therefore it is that we discover in the writings of those eventful times, that the most enlightened and learned Italians, of all classes and ages, appear to have been busily engaged in foolish and puerile war against love and its tyrannical sway—sometimes rapturously enamoured of their faithless Madonnas—and, at others, bewailing, in sorrowful rhymes, the loss of their prematurely dead mistresses. Consequently the works, both in prose and verse, of the Italian adepts of the Scuola d'Amore,—such as those of Guido Cavalcanti, Cino de Pistoja, Dante Alighieri, Cecco d'Ascoli, Dante da Majano, Barberini, Frezzi, Petrarca, Boccaccio, Sacchetti, &c. &c.,—are to be considered as the mystic correspondence of the different ecclesiastical reformers, who not only had their ramifications throughout Italy, but all over Europe. To those zealous writers we certainly owe the first seeds of ecclesiastical reformation which afterwards produced such wholesome fruits under the fostering hands of Luther and Calvin.

These internal heavy calamities of Italy were also greatly heightened by the repeated invasions of the German, French, and Spanish tyrants, who for centuries vied with each other in ravaging and oppressing that beautiful but unhappy country. Those foreign inroads were, however, almost always undertaken either in consequence of the overgrowing pride and ambition of the Roman Pontiffs, or at the instigation of their secret agents, in order to strengthen more and more their ecclesiastical despotism, because all those invaders generally ended their conquests and butcheries by kissing the foot of his Holiness in order to obtain the absolution of all their crimes and depredations.

To consolidate, as it were, the usurpation of the Holy See, and the absolutism of the petty Italian despots, a nation formed by nature to be united, speaking the same language and professing the same religious creed, was purposely divided into many small states, each governed by different laws and princes, who, with the Pope at their head, did all in their power to render their subjects indifferent to the general welfare of their country, and even jealous of the prosperity of their neighbours; and thus they succeeded in keeping in degrading bondage and ignorance the liveliest and most interesting nation of Europe.

During the eighteenth century, Italy began to arouse itself from its lethargy; and, as philosophy was making rapid progress all over Europe, we find that the Italians, both in the north and south, did not remain behind the spirit of the age. Notwithstanding the rigours of their temporal rulers and the brutal terrors of the holy inquisitors, Beccaria, with his work entitled Dei Delitti, e delle Pene, and Vico, with his Scienza Nuova, produced an extraordinary sensation throughout Italy. The despots trembled; the Popes thundered from the Vatican; the Holy Inquisitors put in readiness all their tortures and executioners; and the Italians began to think a little about their moral and political degradation. These works and their authors having been condemned and prohibited by the Inquisition, and promptly prosecuted by the temporal power, were eagerly sought after. The Roman Pontiffs having in the meantime ordered the works of Voltaire, Diderot, Rousseau, D'Alambert, Locke, and of the greater portion of the French, English, and German philosophers, to be destroyed by the hand of the common executioner,—this circumstance naturally excited, in the minds of the Italians, an insatiable curiosity to peruse those productions. Thus, the despotism of Rome, instead of preventing the circulation of those works by its prosecution, forwarded their propagation, and forced the Italians to seek after their unity in favour of the sacred cause of civilization and liberty. Secret societies began, therefore, to be established in all the great towns; and from the strait of Messina to the Alps, a secret philosophical association was formed, notwithstanding the obstacles placed in its way. Italy was on the eve of following the example of the French, in respect to the revolution of 1789, when the priests and monks, whose temporal interests and welfare were threatened with imminent danger, began to declaim, both from the pulpit and in the public streets, so much and so loudly against the events which had taken place in France, that the patriots were compelled to abandon the hope of enlisting all their fellow-countrymen under one banner of freedom.

In the meantime, the Pope, at the head of all the Italian despots, determined to purge the country of all those who were supposed to be infested with liberal political principles. Pius VI. excommunicated republican France, and all those who professed or embraced republicanism; and he established a new inquisitorial Camera for the detection and speedy condemnation of the republicans. Caroline of Austria, who was sister of Marie-Antoinette of France, established in Naples the famous junta of Vanni, Castelficala, and Guidobaldi; and thus was introduced into that oppressed kingdom the reign of terror and persecution. This politico-inquisitorial tribunal held its sittings day and night—always surrounded by gibbets and executioners; and each hour was marked by the legalised murder of the most enlightened Neapolitans, who had only been either denounced, or simply suspected of being tainted with liberal principles. For a period of four years, this ferocious junta of cannibals dispatched on the scaffold more than sixty thousand political victims, without granting them the least means either of proving their innocence or of defending themselves.

The same system was also adopted by Victor Amadeus, of Sardinia; and a political inquisition was founded by him at Turin, to act precisely in accordance with the Roman and Neapolitan Juntas. This cruel King, after having for years oppressed his subjects, abdicated the throne, turned and died a Jesuit at Rome, and is on the road to canonization as a saint by the court of the Vatican.

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE EASTERN OPIUM EATERS.

THE introduction of the use of coffee into the Ottoman empire was considered a blessing calculated to strengthen the followers of Mahomet in the principles of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors. "Drunkennes, the daughter of the vine," says the eastern historian Izi, "and which the Prophet called the mother of all vices, can no longer show itself without a veil; and the effeminate men of the age have exchanged the crystal glass filled with wine, for the porcelain cup, whence emanates the rich odour of coffee." Speaking of a fire, which broke out at Constantinople, in the year 1747, and which consumed a great number of places where intoxicating liquors were sold, the oriental poets, in their amphibological language, declared that "the conflagration was fed by the sighs of the lovers of wine, which sighs, emanating from throats burning with thirst, formed and added fuel to the devouring flames." In allusion to the innovating influence of coffee, other oriental bards exclaim,—"The bottles are broken, the glass is empty,—there is no more wine; and it is thou, O coffee! that now retainest us captive—thou, the new luxury of the epoch!"

The historian Wassif, speaking of a functionary about the court of the Ottoman Sultan, who was passionately addicted to the use of opium and henbane, describes him thus:—"This fatal predilection rendered him thinner than a line in Euclid: his voice resembled the croaking of a frog; his senses were not more energetic than those of a mummy; and his whole body was a transparent skeleton." One day, while he was riding in the Sultan's train, he fell from his horse, from the enervating effects of the opium he had taken. The Sultan took pity upon his situation, and promised to fulfil any wish he might form. He immediately chose an appointment which conferred upon him rank and wealth, and, being a sinecure, allowed him to indulge in his naturally indolent habits. This circumstance immediately gave a grand impulse to the passion for opium; the use of the drug became fashionable, as it were. From that time forth the open space, in the vicinity of the Mosque of Solymaniye, became thersort of the opium-eaters at Constantinople.

Every evening, at sunset, the Teryaki, or opium-eaters, and the lovers of henbane, flock to that spot in crowds; and there, on all sides, may be seen none but men pale as death, thin, with slow and uneven steps, stiff necks, sunken eyes, the fire of which is all extinguished, powerless limbs, and rather resembling spectres just issued from the tomb than human beings. They take their seats upon sofas placed along a wooden shed or colonnade, to swallow, with a glass of cold water, the number of pills that suits each individual. The strongest take four, of the size of a small nut-mug. In less than an hour, they all feel themselves under the influence of the opium, which produces a species of intoxication, or rather ecstasy; and, during that excited condition, each one believes that the most extravagant desires of his imagination will be realised. They traverse flames—walk upon the waves—and swim in a sea of pleasure. The heavens are opened to them,—and all the joys of paradise, promised by the Prophet, become their lot. On every side they see nothing but kiosks of pearls, and springs pure as crystals: their senses are inspired by the contemplation of the lovely hours of their paradise; and they dream of pleasures unknown to mortals. It was by distributing opium and henbane to his followers, that the Old Man of the Mountains, the chief of the order of Assassins, excites them to the most terrible deeds. It was not, however, from this circumstance that they obtained the name of Assassins; inasmuch as this denomination, so far from having been given to them as a characteristic denomination, was merely the corruption of their real appellation—Haschis-chin, or "Eaters of Henbane."

The visions of the opium-eaters of the east may be better understood, after a perusal of the following extracts from the Koran, or Bible of Mahomet,—descriptive of the paradise promised by that celebrated impostor. The Chapter of the Merciful says, "There be in these gardens women who have eyes exceedingly black, and bodies exceedingly white: they are covered with pavilions; and none, either men or angels, shall touch them before their husbands. They shall repose upon green carpets, near rivulets bordered with flowers."—The Chapter of Smoke contains the following passage;—"There be in Paradise rivers of waters that receive no alteration; there be rivers of milk that never corrupt,—rivers of sherbet savoury and delicious to the taste,—rivers of honey, pure and clean; and fruits of all sorts."—The Chapter of the Cave says, "I will not frustrate of reward them that have done well. They shall enjoy the delights of the garden of Eden, wherein flow many rivers; they shall have bracelets of fine gold; they shall be clothed with green, and with scarlet, and with shining colours; and shall sit on thrones with an eternal felicity."—"Such as shall obey God's commandments," observes the Chapter of Orders, "shall have a place of safety wherein to rest, with all sorts of fruits, in pleasant gardens, sitting orderly on delicious beds, with glasses full of drink, pleasing to the taste, which shall not make them drunk. Their wives, as white as fresh eggs, shall not cast an eye on any but them: thus are the righteous rewarded;—who are more happy?"

THE REFORMED TRADESMAN.

A TALE.

It was about eight o'clock in the evening of a miserably wet day that Mr. Walton, who during the preceding two hours had been fortifying himself for a disagreeable task with sundry glasses of brandy-and-water at the Baptist's Head, Cateaton-street, returned to his own dwelling, and proceeded up stairs. He took his accustomed seat by the fire, complained of the chilliness of the evening, and presently sank into a state of profound abstraction, in spite of the strong potations he had so liberally imbibed.

"Ellen," he at length said to a pretty delicate young woman who occupied the opposite side of the fire, and who was no other than Mrs. Walton, "I have very unpleasant news to communicate to you."

"What do you mean?" faltered Mrs. Walton, whom this very earnest exhortation to calmness and composure had, as is usually the case, contrived to agitate in no slight degree. "What unpleasant news can you have to tell me?"

"I shall be compelled, I fear," said Mr. Walton mournfully, "to call my creditors together tomorrow; and I find, after taking every thing into account,—the debts due to me, the stock in hand, and my assets,—that I can only offer them a composition of seven and sixpence in the pound."

Mrs. Walton, it may be supposed, was exceedingly shocked at this unexpected announcement.

"The creditor I have most reason to believe hostile to me," resumed Mr. Walton,—“excuse me for saying so, my dear Ellen,—is your father. You know the antipathy—I can call it nothing less—which he has for a long time conceived against me; and the £500 he lent me on your marriage, he has recently been very urgent to call back."

"I do not think you know him," said the wife, "if you suppose he would frustrate your efforts to settle your affairs. You are aware that ever since he joined the Teetotal Society, he has not visited us because he says you always have alcoholic poisons upon the table; and your refusal to sign the pledge yourself, was also another cause of irritation. But I will intercede with him; and I am sure, for the children's sake—"

Walton shook his head, saying, "It will be to no purpose, I feel that! My three principal creditors," he added, "will not stand in the way of an arrangement. They generally meet me every other evening, at the Baptist's Head, when I go there; and they have told me a thousand times over the bottle, that they will stick to me through thick and thin. So you see, I am by no means afraid of Eager, Grasp, and Sharp."

The worthy couple having talked and retalked, and canvassed and argued the various matters connected with this unpleasant business, and Mr. Walton having regaled himself (as he considered the pernicious indulgence) with some more spirits and water and a cigar, they betook themselves to bed.

Mr. Walton was a silkman, and resided in Aldermanbury. On the death of his father he succeeded to a good business, and a few thousand pounds; and, about three years after, contrived, but not without much difficulty, to acquire a wife,—Old Blunt, the father of the bride, having growled a very uncomplimentary consent to the match. The truth is, the old gentleman, amongst other partialities and prejudices which sometimes are discoverable in old gentlemen who can afford to do as they please, was extremely attached to his daughter, and by no means so to the man whom she had selected for a husband. He thought him too volatile, and too much addicted to frequenting taverns and public-dinners; he wondered what could possess the coxcombs of the day to boast of the quantity of wine they could drink; and then—worse and worse—he had himself seen Walton, on several occasions, in a state of anything but immaculate sobriety. These were serious charges; and Old Blunt unfortunately had grounds for making them. But at length Miss Ellen persuaded her father to consent to the match; and for a few weeks after his marriage, Walton pursued a domestic system of existence which quite won Old Blunt's heart. In the course of a short time, however, Walton returned to his old haunts; and four evenings out of the seven, every week, were passed with his three friends (tradesmen like himself,) in an adjacent public-house, where "the parlour was so snug, the company so select, and the liquor so good!" The evil example of his son-in-law had induced Old Blunt to join a Teetotal Society; and he used his utmost exertions to persuade Walton to adopt a similar precautionary measure. But Walton burst out laughing in his face, at the very idea; and the old gentleman retired in high dudgeon, with the stern resolve of seeing his "scape-grace son-in-law" no more.

It was with no slight degree of nervous trepidation that Walton wrote and despatched by the hand of his clerk, the several letters to his creditors, conveying to them the unpleasant fact that he was about to call them together. How Old Blunt would chuckle over his misfortunes! Scarcely more pleasant to him was the conviction of what would be the behaviour of his three intimate friends and boon companions, Eager, Grasp, and Sharp, upon this distressing occasion! He already beheld (in imagination) Eager pressing his hand with sympathizing cordiality: he saw the big tear steal down the long face—made longer than usual by this circumstance—of the worthy Grasp; he heard the tones of tender condolence which flowed, or would flow, from the tongue of the almost too sensitive and particularly amiable Sharp! Walton was a man of a rather excitable temperament; and his heart was opposed by a sense of "pleasing pain" when he recalled to mind the former conduct of his friends, which augured so nobly of their conduct to come.

The day at length arrived. A room had been engaged at the Baptist's Head, in Cateaton-street; and twelve o'clock was the hour appointed for the meeting. With a pallid countenance, and a dreadful sinking of the spirits, which even several drams had failed to elevate, he ordered his porter to precede him with the books. As he entered the room, and approached the table at which the gentlemen were seated, all eyes (and some spectacles, too) were fixed upon him, as though anxious to discover through a physiognomical medium, what composition the insolvent was likely to offer. The creditors at large received him with a variation of coldness or cordiality proportioned to their several claims upon him; but his friend Eager saluted him with, "Oh! here you are: you are rather behind time, sir;"—the worthy Grasp soothed him by "Come at last, eh?" whilst the too sensitive and amiable Sharp was seized with a sudden cough, not unlike the bellowing of an ox, and entailed a glance upon him worthy of a cockatrice.

Mr. Shark, being the largest creditor, was forthwith inducted into the chair, and began to enter upon the matter in hand with much expedition.

"Where are the books, Mr. Walton?" said he. "It is necessary we should see them, sir." The tone in which these words were uttered, rather startled the debtor;—it was so unlike the voice of Mr. Shark when he used to come and prevail upon him to take a parcel of goods.

"Have you prepared a balance-sheet, Mr. Walton—eh, sir?" enquired Shark.

"I have sir," was the modest reply.

"Hand it to me, then: come—quick—what's the man dreaming about? Throw it over—there! that will do!"

Mr. Shark examined the document with great care, and furnished the creditors, from time to time, with such satisfactory information as they could glean from certain dissatisfied grunts which escaped him at intervals.

"And, now, sir, what composition do you offer us?" he at length said to the pecuniary delinquent.

"Why, sir," said Walton humbly, "I cannot, as you will perceive, guarantee more than seven and sixpence in the pound."

"Seven and sixpence!" shouted Shark: "then you must go into the Gazette."

"I hope you will not ruin me and my family entirely," murmured Walton.

Mr. Shark deigned no reply, but threw the balance-sheet towards Messrs. Eager and Shark, who examined it, the former with disappointed disgust, and the latter with disgusted disappointment.

"By the way," said Mr. Shark, taking up the document once more, "be so good, Mr. Walton, as to explain this. I perceive you have set down Mr. Blunt as your creditor for £500. Mr. Blunt is your father-in-law, I believe?"

"You know he is, Mr. Shark," answered the insolvent; "and he lent me the money on my marriage."

"I don't believe it!" cried Shark.

"Quite improbable!" said Eager.

"Rather too good!" ejaculated Grasp.

"Why, you are every one aware of the fact as well as myself," said Walton, in dismayed astonishment.

"We are aware of nothing," retorted Shark. "But why is he not here? He is a large creditor,—and he is absent."

"I am afraid that it is with no friendly feeling that he stops away," said Walton.

"A clear case of collusion," observed Shark, placing his thumbs in the arm holes of his waistcoat, and tilting back in his chair.

"Decided collusion," said Grasp.

"Collusion, certainly," acquiesced Eager.

"Pray, how do you account for your insolvency, Mr. Walton?" demanded Mr. Shark, after a pause.

"I am sorry to be compelled to confess that my inattention to business has been the principal cause,—and bad debts have accelerated my ruin."

"And frequenting the public-houses, eh, Mr. Walton?" said Grasp, fiercely.

"Where I meet with you and——"

"No insolence, sir," said Shark. "And, as for the bad debts, that is all nonsense! I never make bad debts."

"You forget, Mr. Shark," said Walton, "that you are the largest creditor on this occasion."

"Well, gentlemen," continued Mr. Shark, affecting not to hear this retort, "suppose we adjourn this meeting until to-morrow, and in the mean time consider of the steps we shall adopt in this matter?"

The motion was carried without a dissenting voice.

"You may go sir," said Shark, turning to Walton with a peremptory air; "and mark you, be punctual to the moment. Twelve o'clock is our time."

Walton having made his bow, and followed by his porter with the books and balance sheet, departed to his own house in a state of utter confusion, mortification, and despair. For the first time in his life he experienced the base, the dirty, the safe insults which gentlemen in the commercial world, so very often east upon those who are not in a situation to pay them their due; or, in other words, he was made to feel how effectually a man contrives to get out of people's books by getting into them. He was most of all astonished at the conduct of Eager, Grasp, and Shark.

He had been sitting in his counting-house during a space of three hours, and had nearly emptied the second bottle of Guinness's stout, when the door opened, and in walked Mr. Eager.

"Keep your seat, Walton, my dear fellow," said Mr. Eager. "Have you got a clean glass? There—that's right. This stout is capital! I have just dropped in to talk over your affairs in a friendly way."

"Indeed!" said Walton, in surprise.

"Yes—indeed! I have been thinking over your affairs since the meeting of this morning; and it strikes me that something may yet be done. For instance, I will sign your composition upon one condition."

"Condition!" cried Walton. "I am in no condition to make any conditions."

"I thought you knew my friendship, and would act as a friend towards me, if I pursue the same line of conduct in respect to you," said Eager in a softly pleasing tone. "This is all I want you to do,—make over to me your connexion with Braybrook at Coventry, as it will be impossible for you—"

"They will still give me their business," interrupted Walton. "I know you are aware of their kind feeling with regard to me, since you have written to them many times endeavouring to supplant me."

"In the way of business I have sent them a circular or two, certainly," admitted Mr. Eager, who was never known to blush but once, and that was inadvertently. "But, my dear Walton, they will abandon you after this, I am sure of it. Now, if you will write to them—I know your influence with them—and persuade them to transfer their business to me—"

"The best customers I have!" cried Walton.

"Then," added Eager, "I will accept your composition!"

"I couldn't do it—I can't think of such a thing," said Walton positively.

"You mean to tell me," said Eager, "you will not do me a trifling service like this, which cannot do you any injury?"—and he arose, saying, "Good day, Mr. Walton."

Mr. Eager took his hat, and proceeded towards the door. "Eh!" said he turning suddenly round, affecting to hear something which the other had never uttered.

"I said nothing, sir," cried Walton. "I repeat, however, that I could never think of such a thing."

"Oh! very well, sir—very well;—you may repent of this;"—and Eager, with much apparent indignation and much real discomfiture retreated into the warehouse, casting a contemptuous look upon the unconscious porter, as he left the premises.

Walton was not suffered to remain for a very long space of time pondering over the modest and friendly proposition of Mr. Eager, before a second opening of the door disturbed him. It was Mr. Grasp.

"Well, Walton," said he, with as good-humoured an aspect as it was in his power to muster, "you've got over the first meeting. I hope we shall succeed better tomorrow. But we must be severe—we must appear to be very particular in these cases. You don't suppose I was in earnest, when I spoke to you as I did, do you?"

"Were you not?" cried Walton.

"Nothing further from my thoughts, I can assure you," returned Grasp. "But let us run down as far as the Baptist's Head, and you shall stand a bottle of wine while we talk over these matters."

Walton made no objection; and luckily the parlour at the Baptist's Head was empty when they arrived.

"Now, my dear fellow," said Grasp, as soon as the wine had made its appearance, and each gentleman had emptied his first glass, "I tell you what you must do for me, and then I will sign your composition without a murmur."

"What must I do?" demanded Walton.

"My debt is three hundred and odd pounds, you know," continued Grasp; "and you offer seven and sixpence in the pound. Well—give me bills for the balance, at six, nine, and twelve,—I won't be hard upon an old friend, you see."

"Impossible!" ejaculated Walton: "I should be cheating my other creditors, and embarrassing myself once more."

"Then, may I be hanged if I ever agree to your proposals," cried Grasp, rising from his seat in a dreadful rage.

"You cannot suppose that I will sacrifice myself for you," remonstrated Walton.

"Let me go—I'll not hear another word," cried Grasp. "Ungrateful wretch! But this comes of being a friend!"—and, so saying, he rushed towards the door; but, finding that no one rushed after him, he stopped suddenly. "Have you any thing farther to say to me, Mr. Walton?" he asked, more calmly.

"Nothing whatever."

"Oh! I thought you had; it is of no consequence;" and Mr. Grasp made his way into the street, in a state of mind only to be conceived by those who have experienced a similarly ungracious reception of their good offices.

Walton felt a stupefaction, a kind of stultification of the faculties creeping gradually over him, shortly after Grasp had made his exit. It was clear that his two friends would never accept his composition, and he must be made a bankrupt. What was he to do? He drank another glass of wine. What was to become of him? He drank a third glass. Which way was he to turn? He drank a fourth. How could he face his wife and children once more? He drank a fifth. Why had not his father-in-law been present at the meeting? He emptied the bottle.

On his return to his counting-house, he found Mr. Shark awaiting his arrival. Mr. Shark inclined his head with solemn condescension toward the insolvent, intending thereby to convey an assurance to the unhappy man that he might take a seat in his own private office.

"This is an awkward business, Mr. Walton," he began,—"a very awkward business: I think I have just reason to complain of you. Why did you not give me a hint as to the state of your affairs some time since? I might then have been induced—"

"To strike a dockett against me," thought Walton.

"Induced to lend you a helping hand to bring you through," added Shark.

"I did not know the condition of my circumstances until I resolved to examine my books, and take stock," observed the insolvent silkman.

"Well, well," said Shark, appeased, "what is done, cannot be undone. But this composition of seven and sixpence in the pound is very small, Mr. Walton—very small! I am a great sufferer—the largest creditor—a hard case."

"I am very sorry for it," said Walton.

Mr. Shark wooed silence for some time, indeed for so long a time that one might almost have thought that he had succeeded in making up the match between them. He at length delivered himself of these words,—"Come, look up your friends; they, I am sure, do not wish to see you reduced to commence the world again under such unfavourable circumstances. They will lend you money—I know they will."

"I hope to get a little money together, certainly," said Walton, "otherwise I shall be unable to resume business. I have given up every farthing to my creditors—every farthing."

"Nay, I didn't mean that," cried Shark abruptly. "I mean that unless you can offer more, I will never sign your composition."

Walton was now well nigh reduced to despair.

"Good heavens! Mr. Shark, you do not mean to say so?"

"Old Blunt will help you."

"It is quite hopeless to expect it."

"Of the other creditors, I say nothing," continued Mr. Shark: "every thing is fair there; but as for me, poor soft easy fool—"

"My dear Mr. Shark—"

"Pay me in full, and I'll sign the composition," added the creditor. "I know you can; and I'll persuade the other creditors to take six and sixpence. I can tell them you ought to have something to go on with."

"I cannot do it—I would die first!" ejaculated Walton passionately. "What right have you to think me so base a villain? and is this your conduct, after all your professions of friendship in the parlour of the public-house, eh—Sir?"

"Very well!" cried Shark. "I'll be the ruin of you, that's all! You don't know me yet!"

"Oh! yes—I do now," said Walton bitterly.

"No insolence, Sir,—you are a villain!" exclaimed Shark; and flinging himself out of the counting-house, he met Mr. Blunt hastening in.

"Well, where is this man?" demanded Old Blunt gruffly.

"Oh! you'll find him in there to-day," answered Shark; "and in Newgate soon, for a more precious rascal I never saw."

"I was unable to attend your meeting to-day, Mr. Walton," cried Blunt as he entered the counting-house. "How did it go off? But you need not tell me, Mr. Shark was there, I suppose?"

"He was, sir."

"Then what business has he here?"

Hereupon Walton, who felt at that moment that even Blunt, as a confidant, would be a relief to his feelings, detailed the visits of his three creditors, and the conditions they had severally proposed to him.

"Um—ah!" said Blunt. "Wise men, you perceive, Mr. Walton—men of the world—men who look after their families. But where are your books? I mean to look over them very strictly, I can promise you; so, if you have any where to go for a couple of hours, you may leave me here."

Walton, having laid before the old gentleman his books and balance sheet, left him to himself, and returned at the time specified. Old Blunt had just closed the books, and was wiping his spectacles.

"I hope," said Walton, "you have found every thing satisfactory?"

"Well, I don't know," returned Blunt with subdued gruffness. "I'll think about it. Where is your wife? Is she up stairs? I'll just go and see her and the children. There—now, you needn't move: I know the way."

In about an hour Old Blunt again entered the counting-house.

"Well," said he, "I shall be at the meeting to-morrow, without fail."

"I am glad of that," said Walton; and he mentioned the suspicion of collusion which had been thrown out.

"Collusion! Not a very likely thing, Walton—eh? But come—good bye—give me your hand—there! Your dinner's ready up stairs: go, and eat it—but mind and don't take anything stronger than water, for it is drinking that has already got you into these difficulties."

The old gentleman hobbled away, leaving Walton no less affected than surprised at the unwonted kindness of his father-in-law.

Punctual as Walton contrived to be on the following day, he found his creditors in the great room at the Baptist's Head before him. A solemn stillness reigned for some time—a silence which was only broken by the abrupt entrance of Old Blunt.

"Gentlemen," said he, "I perceive you have not as yet commenced proceedings. I wish to say a few words, which I may as well say at once. Mr. Walton tells me that a hint was thrown out yesterday, that there was a collusion between him and myself."

"Something of the kind was dropt inadvertently, certainly," said one of the creditors; "but we at this end of the room are quite satisfied that there is no foundation for it. We only hope that there may be as little foundation for the fear expressed by Mr. Walton that you were unfriendly to him."

"Um—he thought that, did he?" grunted Blunt; "then he was a fool for his pains. Now I'll convince you of the contrary. His debts, I perceive, are something less than £2,500; he owes me £500. There, then—take that amongst you, it will give you a composition of twelve and sixpence in the pound."

Here a drumming on the table, performed by the knuckles of the creditors at large, saluted Old Blunt; and they severally rose and shook hands with the insolvent. But Messrs. Eager, Grasp, and Shark, maintained a profound silence.

"What say you, gentlemen?" enquired Blunt.

"Messrs. Eager and Grasp now hastened to sound Walton once more relative to their respective propositions of the previous day; but a decisive negative was returned. Mr. Shark next pounced upon the insolvent and drew him towards the window.

"Now, Walton, my good fellow," said he, "only drop the word—eighteen shillings in the pound—and I will sign the composition."

"I cannot think of it; but, if you like, I will communicate your proposal to the creditors."

"Oh! not for the world!" answered Shark, slinking back to his seat.

"Gentlemen," cried Mr. Blunt, "I have great reason to be dissatisfied with Mr. Walton; but for nothing so much as for his pot-house acquaintance with these three individuals," pointing to Grasp, Eager, and Shark. "Would you believe it,—Mr. Eager required Walton, as a condition of his signing the composition, to relinquish to him his best customer, at Coventry,—that Mr. Grasp demanded bills for the balance of his debt,—and that Mr. Shark could be satisfied with nothing less than eighteen shillings in the pound, to be paid privately, and out of your pockets."

A great sensation pervaded the meeting at this announcement. Mr. Shark rushed from the room; Mr. Grasp, who seemed as if the floor were giving way from under him, melted from their presence; and Mr. Eager, starting like a postman who discovers a letter in his hand addressed to himself, suddenly bethought himself of something, and vanished.

"And now gentlemen," once more spoke Mr. Blunt, "I am a man of few words. Come to my house to-morrow at twelve, and you shall be paid in full; and so shall the rascals who have just gone, although it's more than they deserve;"—and he lugged the bewildered Walton into the street.

"And now," said he, addressing his son-in-law, as they walked home, "I have a few things to ask of you. Will you give up frequenting public-houses?"

"I will," replied Walton.

"And you will also renounce the disgusting habit of drinking?"

"To please you, I will."

"And you will sign the Teetotal pledge, by way of giving the principle a fair trial?"

"I can refuse you nothing, after your kind treatment towards me."

"Very well," continued Old Blunt, taking his son-in-law's arm for the first time since their acquaintance, "you shall not want money to go on with. I know you will do well, if you keep your intellects clear, and attend to your business."

And thus ended this eventful meeting of creditors.

It was about three years afterwards, that Mr. Eager was seated on the Highflyer fast coach to Manchester (whither he was going for the purpose of undermining another person's connexion) when, having partaken a little too freely of wine and bottled-stout at dinner on the road, he tumbled off the vehicle, and dislocated his neck.

Mr. Grasp, who has married a second wife, and was altogether furnished with eight of those domestic little animals called "children," finds such a family rather inconvenient to provide for; and, although he does manage to totter on, it is not without requesting occasional credit from Mr. Walton.

And Mr. Shark, the other day, had some difficulty in persuading a body of gentlemen, who met together at his calling, to accept the handsome and gratifying composition of five-pence half-penny in the pound.

As for Mr. Walton when I last saw him, he was doing very well: indeed, I suspect him to be rather rich than otherwise;—at all events, he does not hesitate to attribute his present flourishing condition to the change of habits brought about by signing the Teetotal pledge, to which he is a staunch and faithful adherent.

THE BRIGHT DESTINIES OF TEETOTALISM.

LET us hope that a brighter day is opening upon us. The extent and consequences of the evil are fully appreciated, and the conviction has spread far and wide, that the best interests of society require a vigorous and united effort for its suppression. A few years only have elapsed, since public attention was drawn to the subject. Some zealous individuals proposed the formation of societies for the prevention of intemperance, and laboured long and successfully for their establishment. They had prejudices to encounter, interests to contend with, and inveterate habits to subdue. But they have seen the triumph of their principles and plans. Associations have been formed both in Europe and America, for the accomplishment of this great object; and they are earnestly striving to arrest the march of those who are on the road to destruction, and to fortify those who are exposed to temptation. Destitute of all legal authority, their efforts are all limited to persuasion, to conviction, to example. The most beneficial results have already followed their labours. The manufacture and consumption of ardent spirit have been reduced. Many have been recalled to a better life and better prospects. And what is far more important, experience has set its seal upon the value and practicability of the plan. Ebriety, we hope, will soon cease to be the standard of hospitality, and fashion no longer require its votaries to convert scenes of rational conviviality into scenes of vice, and sometimes crime.

To all who object to Teetotal Societies we say, Go ask the father who has seen the son of his age and hopes, qualified by nature, habit, and education, to perform an honourable and useful part on the stage of life; who has seen him abandon all those prospects, and become the slave of this most disgusting propensity, and the companion of all that is vile in the community; ask the father the value of an association which will redeem the lost one from this thralldom, and restore him to society, to his friends, to himself. Ask the heart-broken wife, who has seen the partner of her cares, the father of her children, forget all, abandon all, and ruin all that should be nearest and dearest to him, and seek pleasure in the abodes of vice and intoxication; ask her whether these labours of love and charity, which pluck the brand from the burning, are useless and inoperative. Ask the children whose father is a stranger to their love and affection, and who harters their happiness and his own for scenes of dissipation and intoxication, and let them calculate the value of redemption, and their gratitude to those who break his bonds and set the captive free. Ask society, whether the restoration to an useful and honourable life, of some of its most promising but once lost and unhappy members, is not a source of satisfaction and congratulation—and all this has been done and is now doing.

Who ventures to say, there is no cure for this malady of mind and body—no signal of safety which can be lifted up, like the brazen serpent of old, and whereon the afflicted may look and be healed—no power of conscience—no regard for the present, no dread of the future, which can stay the progress of this desolating calamity? It is indeed a disorder, which falls not within the province of the physician. Empiricism has prescribed its remedies, and various nostrums have been administered, with temporary success, calculated to nauseate the patient, and thus by association, to create a revulsion of feeling. But little permanent advantage has attended this process. As the habit of intoxication, when once permanently engrafted on the constitution, affects the mind and body, both become equally debilitated. Can the pleasures of the bowl be weighed in the balance with the rational enjoyments within our reach? with the tender affections of those whose hearts are knit to ours? with the respect of society, with the consciousness of doing well and deserving well, and with all those moral accompaniments which, if not the reward, are yet the sure attendant upon virtuous resolutions and a well spent life? To youth, to manhood, and to age, these considerations appeal, with an energy proportioned to the circumstances of each. All hold their destinies, more or less, in their own hands, and whether these shall be for evil or for good, depends upon the course and conduct they may adopt.

Happy will it be for ourselves, still happier for those who are to succeed us, if we can banish intemperance from this highly favoured land! And if all who acknowledge the importance of the work will unite in its accomplishment, the object can be attained, certainly and effectually. It would be a monument far prouder than the genius of antiquity has bequeathed to us, and more useful than any which modern wealth and power have erected, for the generations that are to follow us upon the theatre of life. Mouldering and dilapidated are the temples of Athens and Rome. Lost are the sites of Nineveh and Babylon. Forgotten are the countless millions, who have filled their places upon the earth and disappeared. But this moral victory would live in the remembrance, until the advent of the promised era, now begun—foretold in prophecy and invoked in poetry—is completed.

Although much yet remains, enough has been done to inspire us with gratitude for the past, and joyous hopes for the future. And when we survey the dark cloud of intemperance, fraught with destruction, which so lately enveloped the earth, fast rolling away and dissipating before the beams of truth, and the bright Bow of Promised Reform already spanning half the world, have we not reason to exult at the rapid progress of a cause which promises, in its ultimate results, such immense advantages to civilized mankind?

ORIGINAL POETRY.

SHE LIVED IN BEAUTY.

By W. T. Moncrieff,

Author of "Don Giovanni in London," "Tom and Jerry," &c. &c.

She lived in beauty, like a flower
That blooms uncut in some lone bower,
Breathing around a fragrance rare,
To charm and sanctify the air.
She lived in beauty, like a gem
Set in a monarch's diadem,
Shedding around a radiance bright,
At once to dazzle and delight.
But, as the flower when pluck'd is gone,
And, as the gem struck, in its pride,
Is crush'd, tho' late so bright it shone—
So she, alas! in beauty died!

She lived in beauty, like some star
That shines in summer nights afar,
As if it lov'd those realms of peace
Which bid all earthly turmoils cease.
She breath'd in beauty, like some song
Of heard the greenwood shades among—
A gladness form'd to charm—to cheer—
To fancy and to memory dear!
But as the meteor falls to earth,
And as the soog, to heav'n allied,
Fleets in the moment of its birth—
So she, alas! in beauty died!

SONG.

By Andrew Park.

What ails your heart? what dims your eye?
What makes you seem so woe, Jamie?
Ye were an aye sae cauld to me—
Ye since were blythe and gay, Jamie.
I'm wae to see you like a flower,
Killed by the winter's snaw, Jamie.
Droop farther down frae hour to hour.
And waste sae fast awa', Jamie.
I'm sure your Jeanie's kind and true;
She lo'es you aye and but thee, Jamie;
She ne'er has gie'd the cause to rue,
If sae, ye still are free, Jamie!

I winna tak your hand—your heart—
If there is ane mair dear, Jamie;
I'd sooner far for ever part
Wi' thee—tho' in a tear, Jamie!
Then tell me a' your doubts an' fears;
Keep naething hid frae me, Jamie.
Are ye afraid o' coming years?
Or darker days to be, Jamie?
I'll share your grief—I'll share your joy—
They'll come alike to me, Jamie;
Misfortune's hand may a' destroy,
Except my love for thee, Jamie!

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We beg to decline the proposal made to us by An Amateur. A true and faithful Account of the Rise and Progress of the London Teetotal Societies has been received, and will shortly come under our consideration. The writer had better forward us the vouchers to which he alludes.

To C. L. Yes: the DRUNKARD'S PROGRESS will shortly be published, complete in one volume.

There is no foundation for the scandalous report to which A Subscriber alludes. We do not believe that Teetotalism "is at a discount," as he expresses himself, in any town in the United Kingdom.

Private answers have been returned to A Constant Reader (Louth) A Constant Reader (Birmingham), and P. S. V. The two poems by S. are pretty. Past, Present, and Future, shall be inserted.

Aquarius is thanked for his hint, which he will perceive has been anticipated.

We beg to call the attention of the Reader to the Seventh Number of a Series of Illustrations, which is given gratis with "THE TEETOTALER" of this day.

The Series will be complete in Twelve Illustrations, and will be continued for as many consecutive weeks.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12th, 1840.

If ever a foul slander were completely refuted, and its unprincipled authors convicted of a despicable falsehood to suit interested views, such has been the case with regard to the accusations lately brought against the sincerity of the Irish Teetotalers. Malignity had industriously circulated a report that the disciples of the REVEREND FATHER MATHEW were rapidly backsliding from the pledge of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors; and this assertion, founded upon no fact, was greedily seized upon, as a demonstrated point of argument, by those whose interest, whose ignorance, or whose wickedness has set them in array against the doctrines of Teetotalism. It however appears that during the last twelve months, the manufacture of spirits in Ireland has diminished by upwards of three millions and a half of gallons, when compared with the quantity submitted to the duty in the year previous—that is, from October, 1838, to October, 1839. We may also observe that the manufacture of spirits had also materially decreased in the year just described, and the one before it; and thus, for upwards of three years, has the falling off, in that portion of the revenue affected by such diminution, borne triumphant testimony to the beneficial effects of Teetotalism. In the year ending in October, 1840, the decrease in the Irish manufacture of spirits is shown to have been enormous; and the loss to the revenue is nearly half a million sterling. When we consider that the sale of wine and malt liquors has fallen off, in Ireland, in a proportionate degree, we require no other argument to adduce against those who tax the Irish with insincerity in respect to the Teetotal pledge.

Instead of deploring the rapid disappearance of a vile and demoralizing habit from a lovely land,—a land which nature has peculiarly blessed,—the true philanthropist will exert his utmost energies to aid, whether directly or indirectly—whether by precept or example, in the encouragement of Teetotalism in Ireland. What harm can result from a nation being made sober? and what evil does not arise from its inveterate habit of intemperance? Let the Englishman remember what Ireland has done to aid him in his foreign conquests, and supply his fleet with sailors and his armies with recruits! And whose arm is so strong, whose step so bold, whose courage so undaunted, as that of the Irishman, in the day of danger? Irish blood painted the crimson cross upon our naval flag; and an Irish harp rang the sounds of victory, during the last wars of Europe, upon the summit of the Pyrenees. The Irish are celebrated, in domestic life, for that noblest of domestic virtues—hospitality! But all the fine qualities of the Irish character have been hitherto darkened or impaired by the habit of intemperance. When the heart once admits an evil custom as its associate, every natural emotion speedily flies from it. Many a family has commenced the great journey of life under the most auspicious circumstances, and has seen all those hopes destroyed by the evil Genius of Intemperance. This evil Genius casts its eyes upon that family—beholds the frugality and abstinence from all exciting compounds which would have preserved peace and happiness within the sacred orb of that domestic circle, giving smiles their light and bliss its being—and vows to work the ruin of that beautiful scene. The evil Genius, we say, sees that family united, blessed with peace and purity—throbbing with sympathy, and ardent in love—depicting the innocence of infancy and the joys of manhood before the venerable eye of age; as if to soften the farewell of this world by the pure and pictured anticipation of a better. Yet, even there, hid in the very sunbeam of that happiness, the demon of its destined desolation lurks. Intemperance insinuates itself, at first, imperceptibly—then gradually with more boldness—into that domestic circle; and, at length, the members of that once peaceful family behold with pleasure the constant presence of that now welcome guest! And then the destroyer works the ruin which he had so craftily planned; for the Genius of Intemperance is not to be softened by innocence, propitiated by kindness, nor appeased by hospitality! Such has been the case with myriads of once happy families; and no nation has known more of such dread scenes of desolation and ruin than Ireland.

What good man, then—what true philanthropist—what sincere Christian will venture to oppose the progress of Teetotalism in Ireland? We again ask, Does Teetotalism do any harm? does it inculcate vicious habits, or possess an immoral tendency? Does it not encourage religious institutions and beneficial education—those all-protecting principles which at once guard, and consecrate, and sweeten the social intercourse; which give life happiness, and death hope; which constitute man's purity, his best protection; and which place the infant's cradle and the female's couch beneath the sacred shelter of national morality? Neither the arguments of lecturers employed by distillers and vintners, nor the examples of the great and wealthy, shall succeed in inducing us to abandon so salutary a principle as that of Teetotalism. In despite of their scoffs and their reasoning, we will pursue the course we have entered upon; and, should the ridicule of earth and the blasphemy of hell assail us, we will call to our aid fresh energies to assist us in our task of defeating the demon of intemperance. We shall moreover console ourselves with the contemplation of the millions of disinterested individuals who profess the same doctrines. If we err in adopting the principle which reforms society, then is it evident that we are wrong only in practising virtue: but, in that case, we shall be content to err with those whose intellects are unimpaired, whose vigour is unhurt, and whose morality is left intact by the vice of intemperance; and, rather than incur the dangers of the moderate-drinker, we shall be content to cheat ourselves with the idea that safety in total abstinence is more consistent with religion, reason, and social happiness. If this be delusion, at all events we err in following the paths of prudence, philanthropy, and domestic duty;—we err with the father who prefers expending his hard-earned wages upon his family, instead of wasting them in the public-house;—we err with the mother who confers an education upon her children, instead of affording them that example which will prepare the paths of prostitution for her daughters, and the road to the gibbet for her sons;—we err with the advocates of moral reformation, instead of social disorder, vice, and hideous poverty;—we err in following a system which will render the workhouses, the lunatic-asylums, the prisons, and the penal settlements, comparatively useless;—we err with Solomon, the wise King of Israel, who deprecated the use of wine;—we err with John the Baptist, the messenger of the Lord, whose drink was water;—we err with Mahomet, who laid the foundation of the greatest empires ever accomplished by mortal man;—we err with the Puritans, who released England from tyranny and ensured their privileges and rights to the sons of Albion;—we err with Franklin, the philosopher of liberty, the playmate of lightning, the patriot of the world, whose electric touch thrilled through the hemisphere;—we err with all the medical authorities of any value, whose opinions have been recorded upon the subject;—we err with those who follow the dictates of nature, the adaptation of whose choicest gift, water, to the necessities of the human frame is confirmed by experience, by science, and by instinct;—and we err with FATHER MATHEW, whose exertions have paved the way for the total regeneration of a mighty people! With individuals like these, and with the five millions of disciples of the same doctrine, we shall be content to remain in error, if an error that doctrine be; nor shall we desert that error even for the ribald revelry of the modern gin-palace, the degraded society of a tap-room, or the more refined but not less demoralized debauchery of the patrician's dining-table.

MARY MALONE;

A TALE OF OUR VILLAGE IN IRELAND.

BY MRS. SOMERS.

It is accompanied with an awfully chastened feeling, almost impossible to describe, that the mind looks back through the vista of departed years, and recalls those scenes where, united to the frail tenement of mortality, breath was first inhaled, and the Almighty Creator shed the first ray of conscious intellect on the germ of budding infancy. The pleasures of the world, its vicissitudes, and even its sorrows may in after years fade on the memory, and die away like a painful vision; but not so the recollections of childhood. The first impressions of surrounding objects become indelible, and cling through life around the heart in all their primeval brightness. To the green, the hallowest spot of our earliest existence, we often involuntarily turn, especially when under the influence of strong emotion. The oak of the forest may wither and decay, but the ivy "which grew with its growth, and strengthened with its strength," adheres to the last, verdant and unfading.

And our native village is still dear to us; and its peaceful inhabitants are still present to the eye of memory. Our village, not in the sunny Berkshire, gentle reader, but in Ireland, was gay, and romantically situated. A clear, meandering river divided its streets nearly in the centre, and the bridge was the resort of the news-seeker, the idler, and of the infant tribe, which, relieved from hours of constraint at school, amused themselves by making ducks and drakes in the water—a pastime, it must be confessed, in which they were often joined by our red coated protectors—the officers of the neighbouring garrison. These dread holders of her Majesty's commission disliked reading, and had nought to occupy their thoughts. They were for the most part men of lively temperaments, and inoffensive dispositions. They looked well in their shooting dresses, though they usually did more execution among the belles of the ball-room, than the feathered denizens of the field. They danced gaily at all the monthly assemblies, and many a village beauty became depressed when the order for departure arrived, and smiled not again until a new regiment came! The environs of the village boasted of rich scenery, the fields were fruitful, the hedges of sweet briar, wild roses and gay hawthorn. The rising hills and little plantations occasionally assumed a bolder appearance, as the neat lodge or rustic gate announced the habitations of the neighbouring gentry—for the most part landed proprietors of moderate income. The finest feature in the landscape was the ruined abbey about a mile distant from the village. This venerable wreck, which a Claude might have chosen for a subject, we should vainly attempt to describe, though it gave us in our early youth our first ideas of the sublime and beautiful. But a deeper interest still was attached to its half-decayed turrets, and mouldering walls, green with ivy, the growth of ages, by those who remembered the fate of Mary Malone! The remains of this poor girl, once the fairest flower of the valley, rested under the abbey's lofty arch, afar from the world's scorn and the perfidy of man. Her sad, but simple story may be soon told, and cannot be read without exciting sympathy in the most callous heart.

It was on a gay summer's evening, that Mary, young, light, and arrayed in all her rustic finery, first met James Farrilly and attracted his attention:—it was at the pattern, a name given by the poorer classes to the festival of their patron saint. The morning of this holiday of peculiar interest was always devoted to religious exercises in the parish chapel; the evening to a dance on the village green. The latter it is our intention to describe. In the centre of the scene of gaiety was seen a large cake neatly covered with a white apron, and tied on a churn dish. This cake was sometimes the present of the generous lady of the manor, sometimes a purchase made by the voluntary contributions of many a rustic hand. It was a delightful sight to see the lads and lasses in their holiday clothes approaching in groups. The piper was seated on an eminence in a central situation, presenting a striking contrast to all around him, and to his own mirth-inspiring profession. He was a melancholy man, one of those unlucky wights who some way or other are never worth a penny. This, he said, was his lot, as he was always "kept back by his long tail," by which he designated, not a string of members of parliament, but merely his wife and ten children. The neighbours told a different story, and said he was too fond of "raising his little finger." Be this as it may, he shewed a strong interest in the receipt of his remuneration, and regularly stopped his drone and chanter at the end of every dance to give an opportunity for the boy, or colleen, to return with the expected "copper." The money, however hardly earned, was cheerfully presented by the light footed, and still lighter hearted youths and maidens. They paid in turn, not from want of gallantry on the part of the men, but from a discreet wish of the fairer sex, not to be "beholden" to any one. Arrangements as to partners were as follows:

The "boy" approached the maiden whom he wished to select, touched his caubeen, and said, "Mary," or "Nelly," (as her cognomen might be,) "I dance to you." When the rest, jig, or planxty was finished, he made his rustic bow by drawing his right leg rapidly behind his left, and as he nodded his head at the same moment, his blooming partner blushed with downcast eyes, dropped her curtsy to another "boy," though not usually the one whom she most preferred, from an intuitive feeling of modesty natural to Irish women from the castle to the cot, "who would be wooed, and not unsought be won." The lad she thus favoured was on his legs in an instant, and the mirth-inspiring dance went on in regular order: sometimes four couples were up together, though dancing separate reels. A master of the ceremonies—some droll active fellow—was appointed to keep the ring; and his shillelagh was busy with the shins of any who attempted to step within the magic circle. The Irish love dancing, and excel in it. Their feet are as echoes to the music; and vainly would the high born belle, or a pathetic beau of modern times attempt to imitate these untaught children of nature. Wrestling and other athletic exercises are pursued during the pauses of the dance; and, towards the conclusion of the evening, the best wrestler jumps up, seizes the cake, and with rustic gallantry places it in the lap of the best dancer amongst the fair "Colleens."

But James was the most distinguished that evening in manly sport? And who danced so smoothly, that, as her delighted old father observed, "She would not break an egg under her feet,"—who but James Farrilly and Mary Malone, inspired, both by the same desire of being mutually pleasing to each other? James might be considered handsome by those who could not read his mind in his visage, or trace the sinister expression in his laughing blue eye, or the deceitful smile which played on his lips. Mary was young, and innocent, and saw neither. She was an only daughter, the idol of her parents, and of her honest brother Brian. "To her, Farrilly's language was new, was delightful: he told her of her charms, compared her blush to the rose, and her lips to two cherries, &c.

Mary was called upon to divide the cake;—the evening's amusement then concluded; and it was the last of Mary's tranquillity. She met James at markets—at dances,—everywhere. Her brother warned her "not to frequent his company, as he was not much known in the country;" and observed, "Mary, agraph, if his intention is honest, he knows when to spake, for tho' his mother is a widow woman, she is well to do in the world, and they say has taken a farm lately in father O'Shaughnessy's parish. So, Mary dear, be discreet, and keep quiet till we know him better." Mary promised she would take her brother's advice; and so she intended, but James told another story, and she believed him. "His mother was a hard woman, and all belonged to her, and she wanted him to look for fortune, but he would be thrue to Mary while grass grew, or water ran." To dwell upon the subject is painful,

Mary believed and was deceived. The lover took advantage of her confidence, and from that hour she observed with the quick eye of woman's affection, that James was every day becoming cooler. He seldom spoke as at first of getting his mother's consent to their marriage. By degrees he absented himself, and Mary learned in despair that he was gone miles off, in the service of a farmer, without even bidding her farewell. No more was her light step seen on the green—no more was her song heard when she went to milk her cow! It was soon whispered abroad that she was betrayed; but her poor parents and kind hearted brother, did not suspect the extent of her misfortune. They reared her honestly, and they confided because they loved and were unsuspicious. Mary was gentle and obliging as ever, and never complained.

In a month or two after James disappeared, Mary's comrade-girl called in one evening, (the evening preceding the great fair held at the neighbouring town,) and asked the forsaken one if she were alone. "Yes," was the reply, "my mother is gone to make her curly at a neighbour's house."—"Oh! murther, Mary did you hear the news! James Farrilly is a deceiver, for they say he is soon to marry Nancy Delany, a mighty purty girl entirely, and his master's daughter: the cunnin ould mother made up the match last market day." Mary became pale as death; but she was proud and high minded, and would not betray her feelings. She accordingly said with a painful effort, "No matter for him! shures there's as good fish in the say as ever was caught."—"Thru for you Mary; and its myself that's glad to hear you say so. But here's your mother."

Mary hurried to bed—but not to sleep. She arose in the morning with her mind made up how to act. She was busy, and her cheek glowed from powerful but hidden emotion. She dressed herself with unusual care in her only white gown, and her cap with pink ribbons. "Mary, my darlint," said her poor mother, "you look like yourself this morning, where are you going?"—"To the fair, mother, I promised Katty last night to meet her there."—"Will then, come home early, a cushla."

Poor Mary rushed out of the house, the confiding tenderness of her kind mother struck at her heart; she had a momentary idea of throwing herself into her arms and owning all;—but she hesitated, and she was lost!

It was a lovely September morning, all nature smiled around her; but Mary saw not that gleam of universal gladness. "It will be soon over," she whispered to herself, as she entered the town, and sought him only from whose lips, alas, she came to receive the sentence of life or death.

A fair in a country town (in Ireland, that which is in appearance a village, often bears the name, and has the privileges of a town) is at once a scene of business, of merriment, and of confusion. Here may you see horses, cows, droves of pigs going everywhere but where they should go, the drivers having the most obstinate tied by a string round one of the hind legs. Here, too, are gay standings in the middle of the street, with covered awnings hung round inside with gaudy stamped linens, cheque patterns of gowns, exhibiting all the colours of the rainbow in much deeper dyes, ribbons, Barcelona handkerchiefs, toys of various kinds, &c. And then was this chaos swelled by the tents on the green, the colours flying, the iron pots at the door boiling, and reeking with "spoolens" of bacon and pork. Under the most spacious canopies of the joyous encampment sate a piper and blind fiddler; and while the elders regaled themselves at the upper end, the younger persons of both sexes, in defiance of all the confusion without, danced, as they expressed it, "for the bare life." In another part rose the quack-doctor's stage bearing himself, and his man Jack, who is ever a wit by profession. The Doctor was a grave personage; rusty black formed the unique tinge of his garments, a bushy wig, curled and powdered, adorned his head; long white ruffles reached his fingers' ends; and his right hand grasped a tall cane with a bright brass top. In broad relief to this sober specimen of humanity was his mirth-loving and mirth-inspiring follower, Jack. Mouth wide, nose large, and cheeks broad, were the marks by which Jack might be known. These features, were temporarily and partially concealed by spacious spots of coarse red paint, mingled with shades of black and white: an old red coat, trimmed with tarnished tinsel, loose white trousers, red slippers ornamented with large yellow worsted roses, displayed to advantage his outward man; within all seemed merriment. The quack-doctor plyed a lucrative trade. He descanted in a loud monotonous tone, in high flown language, on the cures and wonders performed by bottles which he drew from his pockets. That pocket seemed to partake of the same nature as the purse of Fortunatus: though often resorted to, always to the gaping multitude, it appeared full. Jack the while performed his various antics, such as tumbling, dancing, grimacing, and the other distortions in which mountebanks of all ages and nations so much rejoice. The place rang with laughter; and when the audience were in perfect good humour, Jack presented his hat—the Doctor his medicines. Many a small leathern purse answered the call; and many a minor coin did these worthies receive, thus proving that with the peasant as with his superior, quackery is ever sure to go down. Roaming through the fair were heard rival ballad singers "rising it," as they called the divine art, at the pitch of their voice, from grave to gay, and from gay again to mournful. "Nancy Dawson," "Death and the Lady," "Did you see the Volunteers," &c. &c. (ballads popular in those days,) they carried in large parcels strung on twine, all printed at "Mistress Bridget Corcoran's in Dublin." This lady, peace to her harmonious soul, lived and died before the days of Grisi and Malibran, and of the triumph of Italian arias over stirring Irish song. She for many years enjoyed a comfortable livelihood by supplying all the markets and fairs in the kingdom with gems of poetry and pathos.

But where is poor Mary all this time? She is seeking with aching eyes for her betrayer, "the crown of whose hat" she once declared she would know "among the whole congregation going to prayers on a Sunday." At last she beholds him, gay and light hearted, looking as when he first won her affection; James started as at a spectre, at the sight of the poor girl's wasted, withered form, the glowing cheek—almost crimson with powerful emotion, the eye-ball glaring with unearthly brightness. Mary's quick glance caught the scornful expression of him whom she had loved "not wisely but too well."

"Do not look so much shocked," said the unhappy girl; "I have but one word to ask—James, are you going to be false hearted, and to marry?"—"And if I am, what is that to you, Mary? It is not you could hinder me; so be quite! I am obligated for all your civility, and would part friends, for my mother would give me her seven curses were I to marry the likes of you." Mary was an untutored, ignorant girl; but not the most refined amongst the daughters of fortune could feel more acutely or with a juster perception of its true meaning, the insult which his words conveyed. The pride, the shame, the withering sensation of injured affection rushed to her heart, and nearly suffocated her. There was a moment's pause; at length she found words; "I do not curse you, I will not," she said; "may God forgive you! You will be cursed enough if you have one feeling of man, when my young head lies low in the cold grave! Shame, shame, upon me, who, for such a false one, could scald the heart, and bring blushes to the cheek of my aged and thither parents—have me—I have done with you." Mary seemed raised above herself; he thought she was raving, and was glad to escape.

In pity let us hope she was touched with temporary derangement. She flew to the quack-doctor and demanded a quantity of poison for rats. He gave her arsenic, which, it is supposed she swallowed on her way home. Towards evening her mother became uneasy at her stay, and sat on the bench outside the door watching the return of her absent darling. Mary, on reaching her home, had strength enough to fall into her mother's arms, and exclaim, "Mother, I am dying!"

The sequel, though it admitted of some consolation, was an awful scene. After several hours of agony, she got an interval of ease; her mind even became calm, and collected. Her mother held her hand; the good clergyman sat on the other side. He exhorted her in the mild accents of religion to open her mind to him and her mother. Humbled, trembling, and fully awakened to a sense of her misery and guilt, she felt it a relief to pour out her whole soul before them. "Mother can you give me your pardon; if you cannot, I won't pray to God for his—it would be useless."—"May God bless, and forgive you, dear, unhappy child; how can your own mother reproach the darling of her old heart? Oh! try but to live Mary, and though the world, and every one in it is cold to you, my breath will be warm, and my love thinder, as if my heart was never scalded by this heavy, heavy sorrow."—"Father Murphy, will God forgive me?" cried the expiring victim. "Can he? for I am sorry, oh! how sorry! for I never knew a quite hour since I left him, as I may say: and for who or for what did I leave him?" A burst of agony relieved her. "My poor child," said the holy man, "he can, he will forgive the true penitent. If you be not sincerely, truly sorry, vain is all the comfort the minister of God can offer; but He who on the cross forgave his murderers can even forgive you, all unworthy as you are to expect it." Mary was comforted: she survived through the night.

We spare the reader her parting scene with her father, and poor Brian; the former never raised his head until he was laid beside her. Through the interest of the good clergyman, and the respectable neighbours it was arranged that Mary should be buried in consecrated ground within the precincts of the abbey. Her funeral took place on the third day after her death. On the loveliest evening that could be imagined the village train slowly and solemnly wound its way round the Abbey wall. As if in mockery, the last rays of the decending sun occasionally gilded the white garlands—the work of youthful hands—that ornamented poor Mary's coffin. The mortal remains were born to the grave by six village maidens dressed in white, their heads enveloped in hoods of the same colour. The ulcaun rose high on the gale, when its melancholy cadence was rudely and suddenly interrupted by the sound of laughter, and the trampling of horses. It was the "dragging home" of James Farilly, and his youthful bride—the latter dressed in all her wedding finery, and seated on a pillion behind her husband. By a strange coincidence James was married on the day of Mary's death. As the mournful procession passed by, the mind of Farilly misgave him. With a sudden thrill of horror he threw the bridle over the horse's head, and asked the name of the deceased. "It's the berrin of poor Mary Maloue," said one near, "who was decaved by a villain an' poisoned herself for love." The conscience-stricken man clapped his hands before his eyes and fled from the spot; he went, as it was afterwards discovered, to a town many miles distant, where he enlisted with a party of recruits who were to be shipped next day for America.

It was at the close of a summer's evening, seven years from the time of Mary's unhappy death, that a worn and haggard man, dressed in an old regimental coat, and supported by a crutch, was met in the Abbey church-yard by an old woman who was returning from the pious task of reciting her "padreens" over the grave of her deceased husband. "God save you mistress," said the stranger.—"God save you, kindly Sir: what's your will?" was the retort courteous of the dame.—"Shew me I pray you, where Mary Maloue was buried," said the stranger, in a faltering tone. She pointed to the ruined arch,—"There, Sir, at the right hand side, lies the poor cratur. They say she walks every night round the abbey bemoaning herself, becays she was crossed in love; God convart the villain who laid her low, and bruck the heart of her poor father and mother." James Farilly—for it was he—could not say "Amen;" but he staggered to the grave, and knelt over it for a long—long time! He did not long survive this night: fatigue, and disease, and, above all, the continued torture of a conscience on the rack had totally undermined his robust constitution. The inhabitants of the village, moved at his repentance, buried him by the side of his victim; and the remains of the seducer and the seduced now moulder in the same grave.

VERSIFICATION.

It by no means follows that a certain number of lines, written one under another, and consisting of a certain number of syllables, or feet, should constitute poetry. The mere fact of versifying is not synonymous with the expression of those sublime sentiments which alone constitute true poetry. Poetry may even exist in a prose state; and versification is often nothing better than measured or metrical prose. The use of rhymes is only another shackle which the versifier deems necessary to impose upon himself, and which the true poet frequently eschews. But, in the present article, our business is merely with the mechanical part of poetry, —or, in other words, the form and versification. Our object is to explain, in a familiar way, the common rules of versification, and illustrate those rules with quotations. So much rubbish is now-a-days perpetrated, under the denomination of Poetry, that a little more general knowledge of the mere regulations and methods of composition is greatly to be desired.

Having chosen a subject, the form of the projected poem is to be next considered. Verse is either regular, or irregular. Regular verse consists of lines of uniform length of syllables; and irregular verse is, of course, the opposite to this rule. For instance, Milton's Paradise Lost is regular measure,—that is, all the lines consist of ten syllables each, or of such a grouping of syllables, that the pronunciation of them only conveys an idea often in each line: ex. gra.

"No more of talk, where God or Angel guest
With man, as with his friend, familiar us'd," &c.

The word familiar in the second line is only pronounced as three syllables,—thus, fa-mil-yar. Irregular measure may be illustrated by the following lines from Walter Scott's Lay of the Last Minstrel:

"The feast was over in Branksome tow'r,
And the Ladye had gone to her secret bow'r,
The bow'r that was guarded by word and by spell,
Dreadly to hear, and dreadful to tell,
Jesu Maria! shield us well!"

Here the first line consists of nine syllables—the second of eleven—the third of eleven also—the fourth of nine again—and the fifth of eight. Be it remembered that in a poem, the plan of which is professedly regular, as in Milton's Paradise Lost, it would be improper to introduce passages of irregular metre; but in poems professedly irregular, such as The Lay of the Last Minstrel, regular passages may be safely introduced.

Regular metre is not confined only to couplets,—i. e. where every two lines rhyme with each other, as in Byron's Corsair or Lara,—or to blank verse, but also to alternate and other measures; but in these cases, the lines which rhyme must always be of the same length: ex. gra.

"Genius of Good! if still thy wing
O'er Albion's land auspicious soar,
Help to a falling nation bring,
And raise the drunkard up once more."

This is regular alternate-measure: the first and third lines, which rhyme together, are each of eight feet or syllables; and the second and fourth, which similarly correspond, are each of eight also. There are cases in which the second and fourth lines are each of six feet only in alternate verse.

Irregular metre does not admit of unbounded licence in respect to freedom from metrical shackle, but must be more or less uniform. It must appear to be purposely irregular, and not the result of the composer's sheer ignorance of metrical rules. For instance, in such a poem as Gray's Elegy, were the plan of it purposely irregular, it would not have been proper to make one stanza of four lines regular and another irregular. Even in irregular metre, there is more or less method and consistency. Some versifiers have an idea that the metrical measures of ancient chroniclers are well imitated by a long line next to a short one, and so on: this supposition is ridiculous.

That metre, which is irregular in the stanza, is frequently regular in respect to various stanzas compared with each other. Thus if the last line of every stanza in Gray's Elegy consisted of only eight syllables, instead of ten, the stanzas would consist of irregular metre, but the poem, as a whole, would be a regular one. This is the case with his Bard, which is divided into eight or ten sections: the first section corresponds in metrical method with the third, fifth, and seventh; and the second section corresponds with the fourth, sixth, and eighth. The Bard cannot be therefore called an irregular ode, because its plan is uniform. If, however, this plan were departed from in respect to only one section, the author would not satisfy the critic by terming his production an "Irregular Ode," because such a deviation from a plan, otherwise uniform and consistent, would constitute a fault.

The reader will now understand that inequality should not exist, and cannot be excused on the plea of intention, in a poem where such irregularity is either a solitary deviation from another plan, or where a regular form was really intended to be adopted, but where the attempt failed in consequence of the ignorance of the versifier; and this is the case with all those wretched scribbles who, without education or inspiration, sit down, scribble something which looks like verse, and call their abortions by the name of Poetry.

In running measure, the poetry is frequently regular, when it does not appear so to the eye or the ear of the novice; and vice-versa. The former case needs not illustration; but the latter may be explained by the following extract from one of Moore's Irish Melodies:

"There is not in this wide world a valley so sweet
As the vale in whose bosom the bright waters meet:
Oh! the last rays of feeling and life must depart
Ere the bloom of that valley shall fade from my heart!
'Tis not that Nature had shed o'er the scene
Her purest of gifts, her brightest of green;
'Twas not the magic of streamlet and rill;
Oh! no—'twas a something more exquisite still!"

These verses appear to be regular but they are not. All the four lines of the first stanza are regular; they consist each of twelve syllables, or feet. The first line of the second stanza consists of twelve feet also; but the other three are each composed of only eleven. These little discrepancies and irregularities in metre do not affect the ear of the individual who has no real taste for poetry, and who counts metres with his fingers; but they immediately strike the attention of the true poet. A defective line to the ear of a true poet is the same as a false note upon that of the real musician. The Latin poet was right, when he said, Poeta nascitur, non fit,—"The poet is born, not made." No study will inculcate a taste for poetry, nor a thorough knowledge of the rules which those, who are initiated into the mysteries of Parnassus by Nature, can alone know.

We shall conclude this article with a few hints upon rhymes. Similitude of pronunciation in words is the basis of rhyme; but there are several bye-laws in respect to this part of the art of composition, as well as with regard to metres. The rule establishes such rhymes as these,—full, call—man, plan—seem, dream—play, they—invincible, tell: the exception, as it may be called, allows such rhymes as wrong, tongue—heaven, given—sun, on—liberty, sea. The terminating letters of each word must be the same, or be pronounced the same, to rhyme. Thus seen, dream—mate, rare, are not rhymes; but seem, dream—and mate, rare, are rhymes. O'er and lover are rhymes; but not lover and other. There is more difficulty still in finding the double or rich rhymes. Thus crown'd me, found me, are rhymes; but crown'd me, found thee, are not rhymes. Languish and languish are not rhymes, because the former word is spelt with a g, and the latter with a q; but languish and anguish are rhymes. Crown me, found me, are not rhymes: the pronunciation of the d is required in the word crown to constitute the rhyme. Compound rhymes (such as many of those used in Don Juan) are also subject to rules which are evident after the above explanations. Thus handle us and scandalous may be used as a rhyme; but the rhyme would be defective were the word handled used: there would be the pronunciation of the final d too much. In order to be very correct in this species of rhyme, the rhymes in the first stanza of Don Juan should be read new'un, true'un, Juan—instead of new one, true one, Juan; and, in many of Walter Scott's poems, where he makes man and one rhyme, he intended that the former word should have the Scotch pronunciation man. Speaking of one of Gray's Odes, Dr. Johnson observed that a rhyme was frequently made where it was not found.

The Editor of this journal was once challenged to make two rhymes to Xerxes: he accordingly sat down and wrote the following lines, which he afterwards introduced into his Pickwick Abroad:

"If I were only half as great as Xerxes,
I'd rule the nations with a righteous hand;
But not on principles like those of Burke's. His Reflections upon France none understand.
He takes a proposition—then he shirks his Own chosen thesis which himself had plann'd:—
Through ev'ry page invariably there lurks his Venomous hatred of a mighty land;
And when he enters on the theme, he works his Arguments out on grounds where nought can stand.
His soul is far more grovelling than the Turk's; his Logic resembles houses built on sand;

Bot fifteen hundred pounds a-year are stronger
Reasoning than sense;—and so we'll chide no longer!"

Burke received £1500 for his Reflections upon the French Revolution.

It has been said that there is no rhyme for scavenger, nor pottinger. Will any of our readers endeavour to refute that assertion?

AN ESCAPE FROM THE PRISON AT CRONSTADT.

CAPTAIN H——, an English trader to Saint Petersburg, had been for several years carrying on a system of smuggling to a very considerable extent. This being known to several of his brother-captains, it was often viewed with serious apprehension by them. In the year 1823, the consequences they had foreseen, became verified. An information being laid against Captain H—— his house in Saint Petersburg was surrounded by Police-officers in the dead of night, the doors broken open, and his books and papers seized: he was dragged from his bed, to the alarm of his wife, a beautiful English lady to whom he had only been married a few months; and he was placed in close confinement as a prisoner.

The circumstances of impeachment were these:—Having engaged a Frenchman as his cook, it was agreed in England that if the vessel wintered at Cronstadt, this Frenchman was to be franked back by some other vessel, or to have employment, or receive some pecuniary compensation. The ship wintered—the Captain refused to perform his share of the contract—and the Frenchman immediately laid an information against the captain, at the office of Girioff, the minister of finance. This information was soon followed up by custom-house officers appearing from Saint Petersburg in the mole at Cronstadt. The vessel was seized with all its contents; and the mate, who had charge of her was taken prisoner.

The respectable British viewed the circumstance as a national disgrace, as their character for dealing had hitherto been held by the Russian government in the greatest respect; but still they felt a sympathy with those of the lower grade that might have been entrapped into the business. The most active and scrutinizing enquiry took place on behalf of the government, as the Minister was fully aware that his own officers must have been implicated, to have allowed such things within the Mole, and under their own eyes. How many Russians were concerned, it is difficult to say; but, independently of the English captain and the mate, a clerk belonging to the British Consul at Cronstadt, and a Commodore R——, who had been forty years in the Russian naval service, were all found guilty by the council. The commodore was subsequently pardoned; but the captain was condemned to pay the sum of two hundred thousand roubles as a punishment for his crime, or, in default thereof, be banished to Siberia, along with his mate and the Consul's clerk. It being impossible for Captain H—— to provide so prodigious a sum, it was concluded that, however long the execution of the sentence might be delayed, Siberia would be the prisoners' eventual doom.

After a respite of a few months, during which time the culprits lay in the gaol of Cronstadt where they were tried, the distressing period arrived, and a day was fixed for their removal to Saint Petersburg. The only chance of evading the dreadful sentence, lay in devising some practicable mode of escape. The following plan was at length determined upon, and, by the efficient aid of the captain's wife, carried into successful execution. The Russians pay the greatest respect to the return of their marriage and natal days; and it was to celebrate the return of the latter, that Captain H—— invited the officer on duty to a little banquet. Quantities of wine and provisions were conveyed into the prison by the exertions of the captain's wife, who was allowed free communication with her husband during his incarceration. But the morning of the intended feast was that fixed upon for this last interview. The scene of separation between the husband and wife was such as could not fail to awaken in the breast of the officer on duty, feelings of the deepest commiseration.

The gates of the prison being now closed against the agonizing wife, arrangements were made for the evening's repast. The table was laid out in a manner to render the banquet agreeable; and the prisoner and the officer sat down to the feast. Much conviviality and mirth were assumed. At length, so much wine had been drunk that the officer allowed his prisoner to call in the guard, and pour out bumpers round. The bait took—the lulling influence of the wine was soon perceived—the officer and men fell prostrate upon the floor—and the Captain immediately proceeded to the cells of his mate and the Consul's clerk, to release them. They easily escaped from the gaol, and entered the town of Cronstadt. Though light at that hour, a solemn silence pervaded the town; and the footsteps of the three Englishmen were only heard, and occasionally responded to, by the dogs that kept watch in the enclosed places. They reached the fortifications—the usual demands were put by the sentinel and answered—and the gate of the town was passed. The dread of pursuit now added double speed to their footsteps. After a long journey, they reached a fishing village at which the consul's clerk was well-known, as he had frequently employed boats to push out to ascertain what merchant ships were approaching Cronstadt. His acquaintance with the inhabitants was a most favourable circumstance, as he not only succeeded in obtaining a boat, but also in purchasing it for twenty-five roubles. Having provided themselves with the necessary oars and provisions, the three Englishmen pushed off into the trackless gulph, thanking providence for this extraordinary escape.

When the hour for relieving the guard arrived on the following morning; the escape of the prisoners was ascertained, and the soldiers were all found in a death-like trance. The greatest consternation immediately prevailed; and a report of the circumstance was sent to Saint Petersburg. Before the close of the day, orders were received to despatch the quickest sailing frigate down the gulph in search of the fugitives, whilst scouring parties of the police were sent in all directions to discover if they had taken refuge in any of the outlets of the river or the villages: in short, every possible means were employed to effect their re-capture.

Two days elapsed, and no tidings were heard of the run-aways. On the ramparts of Cronstadt groups of individuals were seen using their spy-glasses with the utmost intensity, as they were sure the frigate would soon return, bringing them back in triumph. Her flags were at length recognized in the horizon, and the frigate was soon seen pushing gallantly forward for the mole. The custom-house officers and all the spectators were on the tenter-hooks of expectation as she approached. Boat after boat put off to her; but it was soon announced that no prisoners were on board, and that the frigate had failed to overtake them.

The attention of the authorities was now directed towards poor Mrs. H——. Her residence being discovered, she was placed under arrest. Examination after examination took place; but nothing could be elicited from her; and, at the expiration of six weeks, she was set at liberty, to the joy of her friends.

But where was her husband during all this time? What was the fate of himself and companions? Of this, in fact, the poor creature knew nothing. To enquire of any of her friends was almost an act of treason: her very servant was even dreaded as a spy; and all her motions were watched with the most scrupulous attention. Time passed away, while she remained in this anxious state; and, although vessel after vessel had come up the Baltic, no tidings were heard, nor traces discovered, of the fugitives. At length, after a lapse of six months, news reached Saint Petersburg that the poor fellows had been picked up, after suffering the most horrible fatigues and privations, by a vessel bound for Elsinour, where they were lauded. From that place they took their passage in another merchant vessel, and once more reached their native land in safety. Mrs. H—— repaired to England, as soon as these happy tidings reached her; and her husband received her with the open arms of the most sincere gratitude and affection.

REVIEWS.

The Works of Flavius Josephus. Translated by W. Whiston. Published in Monthly Parts, with Illustrations. Super-Royal 8vo. London: G. Virtue.

At a period when the Jews appear to be themselves anticipating a general movement towards their native Palestine, and while the dreadful persecutions they have lately undergone at Damascus are still fresh in the memory, a new edition of the writings of their great philosopher is a most welcome publication to all classes of readers. The Jews have long been a people whom prejudice and habit have taught those of a different persuasion to abuse; but we must candidly admit that they possess many good qualities for which they have never received the credit. If they be fond of accumulating wealth, they are never deaf to the appeals made by suffering poverty upon their bounty;—if they be exclusive in their habits, have they not been rendered more so by the conduct of the world towards them than their creed has compelled them to be?—and if they have seldom produced any illustrious characters, who have signalized themselves in a literary point of view, let us remember that the prejudice of all ages has deadened the energies of those who, conscious of superior abilities, may have sought to distinguish themselves. The Jews were vilely calumniated when they were supposed to have assassinated Father Thomas at Damascus; and the whole Jewish nation will doubtless feel grateful to Sir Moses Montefiore and M. Cremieux (the celebrated French barrister) for their laudable exertions to ameliorate the condition of the persons of their own persuasion now residing in the East.

We cannot say much for the manner in which the present edition of the works of Flavius Josephus is translated. By endeavouring to preserve a scriptural quaintness of language, the translator has frequently disfigured entire sentences. The work, on the whole, is however a very valuable one:—the pictorial embellishments are of a superior kind; and the cheapness of the work (two shillings each monthly part) will enable it to obtain universal circulation. We extract from Part XI the following paragraph relative to the famine which prevailed in Jerusalem at the period of the siege by the Romans under Titus:—

"Then did the famine widen its progress, and devoured the people by whole houses and families; the upper rooms were full of women and children that were dying by famine, and the lanes of the city were full of the dead bodies of the aged; the children also and the young men wandered about the market-places like shadows, all swelled with the famine, and fell down dead, wheresoever their misery seized them. As for burying them, those that were sick themselves were not able to do it; and those that were hearty and well were deterred from doing it by the great multitude of those dead bodies, and by the uncertainty there was how soon they should die themselves; for many died as they were burying others, and many went to their coffins before that fatal hour was come. Nor were there any lamentations made under these calamities, nor were heard any mournful complaints; but the famine confounded all natural passions; for those who were just going to die looked upon those that were gone to rest before them with dry eyes and open mouths. A deep silence also, and a kind of deadly night, had seized upon the city; while yet the robbers were still more terrible than these miseries were themselves; for they brake open those houses which were no other than graves of dead bodies, and plundered them of what they had; and carrying off the coverings of their bodies, went out laughing, and tried the points of their swords in their dead bodies, and, in order to prove what metal they were made of, they thrust some of those through that still lay alive upon the ground; but for those that entreated them to lend them their right hand and their sword to dispatch them, they were too proud to grant their requests, and left them to be consumed by the famine. Now every one of these died with their eyes fixed upon the temple, and left the seditious alive behind them. Now the seditious at first gave orders that the dead should be buried out of the public treasury, as not enduring the stench of their dead bodies. But afterwards, when they could not do that, they had them cast down from the walls into the valleys beneath. However, when Titus, in going his rounds along those valleys, saw them full of dead bodies, and the thick putrefaction rising about them, he gave a groan; and, spreading out his hands to heaven, called God to witness that this was not his doing; and such was the sad case of the city itself. But the Romans were very joyful, since none of the seditious could now make sallies out of the city, because they were themselves disconsolate, and the famine already touched them also. These Romans besides had great plenty of corn and other necessaries out of Syria, and out of the neighbouring provinces; many of whom would stand near to the wall of the city, and show the people what great quantities of provisions they had, and so make the enemy more sensible of their famine, by the great plenty, even to satiety, which they had themselves. However, when the seditious still showed no inclinations of yielding, Titus, out of his commiseration of the people that remained, and out of his earnest desire of rescuing what was still left out of these miseries, began to raise his banks again, although materials for them were hard to be come at; for all the trees that were about the city had been already cut down for the making of the former banks. Yet did the soldiers bring with them other materials from the distance of ninety furlongs, and thereby raised banks in four parts, much greater than the former, though this was done only at the tower of Antonia. So Cæsar went his rounds through the legions, and hastened on the works, and showed the robbers that they were now in his hands. But these men, and these only, were incapable of repenting of the wickedness they had been guilty of; and separating their souls from their bodies, they used them both as if they belonged to other folks, and not to themselves."

Supplement to the Discussion between James Bromley and F. R. Lees. Leeds: S. Jowett.

SINCE we reviewed this pamphlet in The Teetotaler of the week before last, we have received so many letters relative to the famous discussion between the Rev. Mr. Bromley and Mr. F. R. Lees, the Editor of The British Advocate, that we find it necessary to recur to this subject once more. We have been blamed, by one correspondent who writes in favour of Mr. Bromley, for the severity of our observations respecting this gentleman; we shall therefore make no further comment of our own at this moment, but allow the writer of the pamphlet under notice to speak for himself:—

"In a note appended to page 10, we observe another instance of 'FRAUD,' and 'FALSHOOD.' Mr. Bromley states that in the resolutions passed at the late Bolton conference, 'the consumption of alcoholic liquors' is denounced as 'sinful.' In quoting from these resolutions Mr. Bromley has wilfully suppressed a qualifying sentence in order to pervert the meaning: in other words, he has propagated what he knew to be false. The resolutions commence by referring to the physical and moral evils of alcoholic beverages, stating that the knowledge of the evils brings along with it the duty of abstinence—(and sure it is a duty to act up to our knowledge;)—and thus concludes—'the continued consumption of alcoholic liquors is, therefore, IN THE FACE OF SUCH ADMITTED FACTS, sinful.' Mr. Bromley has suppressed the word 'therefore,' and the reasons to which it refers, as well as the qualifying and restrictive phrase in capitals! What can be said of such gross perversions of truth—such glaring immoralities—committed to, for the express purpose of casting odium upon the teetotalers? The malice is equal to the untruth. The scriptures declare that 'whatever is not of faith is sin.' The conference came to a resolution embodying the application of that maxim to the use of alcoholic poisons, affirming that it would be sinful in those who consumed them in the face of their own knowledge or convictions. Mr. Bromley leaves the latter clause out, and represents the conference as affirming, without qualification, that every use, by every body, whether they had knowledge or not, is sinful! Mr. Bromley rightly prophesied—"that the day of falsehood's arrest and exposure drew nigh!" It is even at his door."

On a re-perusal of this pamphlet, we cannot help thinking that Mr. Bromley is thoroughly exposed, as an ignorant, conceited, vain, and self-sufficient man, and one who is highly improper to preach the word of God—the real object and extensive interpretation of which he thoroughly misunderstands. We shall quote one more extract from this pamphlet, and then drop the subject altogether:—

"Two other specimens of Mr. Bromley's 'SOBRIETY' and 'VANITY,' and we have done with him. The Rotherham temperance society have just adopted the American form of pledge,—a form which, for its simplicity and comprehensiveness, we have ourselves advocated for years. The change was thought of before the 'speech' was made, and has been effected since. 'Come,' says this embodiment of EGOTISM, 'I have not laboured wholly in vain! Gentlemen teetotalers! I thank you for this concession!' The change which has been going on for years—the advocacy of the pledge in the temperance periodicals—all this is nothing—our consummate egotist 'lays the flattering unction to his soul'—that the change is the result of his speech! He will remind the reader of the fly which perched itself upon the axle of the chariot, exclaiming, 'What a dust I kick up!' Mr. Bromley knew, too, that there were a variety of pledges, and by consequence, that teetotalism was not to be tested by any in particular. He quarrels, in fact, with the reprobation placed upon his port and sherry, (which are about as like the Jewish wines as cheese to chalk.) this pledge is the mere excuse. The American pledge has no express exception in favour of the medical or sacramental use of wine; but merely expresses abstinence from intoxicating liquors as a beverage; thus allowing them (though not expressing the allowance) in disease or the sacrament."

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BURY (LANCASHIRE.)

THE Fifth Annual Report of the Bury Total Abstinence Society is now before us. It is a valuable and important document, inasmuch as it bears unequivocal testimony to the advantages and rapid progress of Teetotalism. We are happy at having this opportunity of laying an extract from the Report, before our readers:—

"Your Committee, in laying before their constituents and the public the Fifth Annual Report of the Bury Abstinence Society, feel that whilst there is much, the existence of which they have to lament, there is ground for encouragement, and cause for gratitude. They are aware of the unwillingness of the human mind to combat with opinions or prejudices which have obtained currency throughout all ranks, and have incorporated themselves with the actions and processes of thought of the community; and yet the legitimate object of Abstinence Societies is to combat, to oppose these, and the proceedings your Committee have to record exhibit a continued warfare with the opinions and practices of many. Your Committee are embarrassed at the very outset in contemplating the innumerable ramifications of the vice they have to expose, and the conviction that to enter into a discussion of these would lead them into a range far too wide for a report. The evils of Intemperance are too obvious, too manifest not to be known; and all are easily convinced that corrupted morals, depraved appetites, debilitated and shattered systems, neglected children and domestic misery, are among the direct effects of this prevailing vice. Sabbaths are broken, the house of God is neglected, and the benevolent objects of Sabbath-school teachers defeated, and their brightest hopes blasted; and these are seen to flow from the same prolific source of demoralization and misery. The object of Abstinence Societies is to abolish the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage; believing that by banishing these, the sources of many of the evils just enumerated are stopt. Stop the fountain, and it will no longer send forth its streams of misery and death. This remedy they believe to be most safe; experience has proved that the daily or frequent use of these liquors, even in small quantities, exposes to the hazard of increasing the quantity till the habit of Intemperance is formed. This remedy is most simple: it involves no complicated machinery of human legislation; it is intelligible to all. It is most Scriptural: it is just the carrying out of the principle of the enlightened and devoted Apostle, who would not drink wine, if by his doing so a weaker brother was made to stumble or fall. Nor is its success of doubtful efficacy: many have found that by the adoption of the principle of the Society, and by perseverance in its observance the appetite for strong drink has been weakened, if not positively destroyed."

MACCLESFIELD.

THE Catholic portion of the population of this town, are particularly favourable to the doctrine of Teetotalism. In one week alone, at the commencement of October, upwards of three hundred and fifty signed the pledge.

HALIFAX.

THE following paragraph occurs in the Teetotal news given in the last number of the British Temperance Advocate:—

"I am most happy to inform you that the cause of Teetotalism is going on gloriously in this town and neighbourhood. Many of our bitterest opponents are beginning to see that we are right. The publicans are also beginning to feel the effects of true temperance. At the present time I believe there are no less than a dozen of places licensed for the sale of intoxicating drinks to LET in this town, the present occupiers having struggled with the business until they have lost the little money they once possessed."

LEEK.

THE Teetotalers have been very active lately in this place, and have held several highly interesting meetings, the results of which have been most beneficial. They have also displayed their forces in several processions and tea-meetings. The REV. WRIGHT SHOVELTON, a Wesleyan minister, is an active advocate of the good cause at Leek. The Rechabites have also held several meetings, with considerable success, at this place.

BARNESLEY.

THE REV. J. BIGNY, a Catholic priest, has lately established a Roman Catholic Total Abstinence Society at Barnesley; and the germs of this society speedily shot up, to bear much fruit. This fraternity is organized upon the plan adopted by FATHER MATHEW with regard to his disciples in Ireland. The effects have already made themselves apparent amongst the Irish inhabitants; and the publicans are in despair.

WARRINGTON.

WE again refer to our excellent contemporary, the Temperance Advocate, for a piece of Teetotal information which will doubtless prove interesting and welcome to our readers:—

"A few years previous to the 15th December, 1834, a temperance society was instituted in Warrington, on the anti-spirit principle. The attempt did not succeed. A few individuals, convinced of the inefficiency of the moderation scheme, resolved to commence a society on the only safe principle of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks. Inauspicious as were our prospects, yet, nothing daunted, we perseveringly pursued our object, consoling ourselves with this reflection, that if we could only arrest one drunkard in his downward progress,—if we should succeed in rescuing only one family from want and wretchedness;—we should achieve an object worthy of our most strenuous exertions. Our object has been achieved, not in one solitary instance, but in many. The drunkard and his family have experienced the pleasing change from rags and wretchedness to decency and plenty; and from a life regardless of everything sacred, to a strict observance of moral and religious duties. With these fruits we are encouraged to persevere, and are now preparing to celebrate our sixth anniversary, proud of our position in the temperance world, if Mr. Beardsall, or some other gentleman, cannot furnish an earlier date than February 26th, 1835. We formed a committee on the 15th December, 1834, after Mr. Livesey's lecture on malt liquor, and four of the committee continue until this day. Hence we appear to have a claim to be recorded as the first regular tee-total society in the history of our cause."

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.

THE Baptist Total Abstinence Society, which was established at this town three years ago, held its annual meeting a few weeks since in Tuthill-Stairs Chapel. The president, the REV. MR. SAMPLE, MESSIERS BRIGGS, and PORTS (Secretaries), and Mr. J. BRADATON (Treasurer) made the usual reports to the meeting. The following resolution was then put to the vote and carried unanimously:—

"That the beneficial operations of the temperance reformation, the importance attached to it by men eminent for intellect and piety, and the facilities for acquiring a knowledge of its principles and measures, call loudly upon every humane and christian man to give the subject a calm, impartial, and prayerful investigation."

The cause is altogether progressing most favourably at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and the surrounding districts.

MANCHESTER.

THE Teetotalers of Manchester are now very numerous, and comprise amongst them many of the most opulent and eminent of the inhabitants. The REV. F. BEARDSALL has, after three years' experiment, succeeded in making a beautiful wine, which, being unfermented, contains no alcohol, and may be used with perfect safety. We believe that this wine is guaranteed to keep for upwards of fifty years, without being subject to change by means of fermentation. As such a discovery is not only eminently calculated to forward the interests of Teetotalism, by supplying a luxurious beverage for the use of those who only object to sign the pledge, because they are unwilling altogether to abandon the habit of drinking something under the denomination of wine,—and as the argument that the wines alluded to in Scripture might have been unfermented, is now strengthened by this triumph on the part of Mr. BEARDSALL, we do not hesitate to suggest, to the leading Teetotal Associations, the propriety of adopting measures to present Mr. BEARDSALL with a suitable token of gratitude and admiration for his exertions in this respect. We do this entirely of our own accord, and shall be glad to record in the columns of The Teetotaler any echo to this idea.

NOTTINGHAM.

FEW towns in England are so much in need of the reforming doctrines of Teetotalism as this, where there is a large proportion (or rather disproportion) of the poorer class! During the late races, a particularly interesting meeting was held at Nottingham, Mr. W. ROWORTH, the mayor, in the chair. Mr. JAMES TEARE, of Preston, has also been lecturing at Nottingham within the last few weeks. In a word, a new impulse has lately been given to Teetotalism in this town, and the prospects are most charming. Indeed, at Nottingham, as elsewhere, the doctrine only required sufficient publicity to be immediately popular.

GREAT MARLOW.

A Teetotal meeting was held at the Baptist Chapel, on Wednesday evening, the 2nd instant, when Mr. E. HUNSON addressed a numerous audience. The chapel was crowded to suffocation; and many were obliged to resign all hopes of obtaining admittance. A society was formed, on Tuesday last, at this place.

TOWN NEWS.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Saturday Evening, 28th November.

MR. BENSTEAD, upon being called to the chair, addressed the audience for about half an hour upon the subject of thinking, and proved that it was necessary to abstain from all intoxicating drinks to derive an adequate advantage from that important capacity of the mind.

MR. MURPHY, from Manchester, next addressed the meeting, and gave a very favourable account of the progress of Teetotalism in that place. He detailed in a very forcible manner the ravages of intemperance generally, and elucidated by his own experience the blessings attendant upon total abstinence. He then gave a statistical account of various poor houses and lunatic asylums which he had visited, to prove that intemperance was the most fertile cause of crime.

MR. PALMER from Hackney, and MR. FARMILAR from Chelsea, related the results of their experience; and the former, by his genuine wit, created much attention and risibility on the part of the meeting.

Wednesday, 2nd December.

MR. CRUMP, the registrar, upon taking the chair, enlarged upon the folly of the working classes expending so much money in drink, and thereby neglecting the education of their children and the improvement of their own minds. He proved that the adoption of the total abstinence principle would afford them the opportunity of attending to the welfare of their families.

MR. BETTS expatiated upon the different natures of water and beer, and the efficiency of the former for all the purposes of life, especially in respect to its invigorating properties, compared with the latter.

MR. BENSTEAD, with his usual ability, rivetted the attention of the audience for half an hour upon the subject of Teetotalism. He took a review of what it had done, declared that it had benefitted personal health, and the morals of the community, and proved that in an especial manner, it had produced social harmony, &c.

MR. BIDDLE spoke upon the importance of the doctrine to the welfare of the religious institutions and ordinances of the country.

WESTMINSTER AUXILIARY

To the British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance.

IN our journal of last week, we incorrectly represented this important auxiliary to be attached to the New British and Foreign Society. An error also occurred in respect to the name of the lecturer engaged by this auxiliary: his name should have been printed DEXTER instead of DEALER. The lectures have attracted crowded audiences to the Hall, Prince's-street, Westminster.

ITALY.

(Concluded from last week.)

THE states under the absolute dominion of the Austrian family, were of course visited by the same inquisitorial persecution; and, at Florence, Parma, Placentia, Modena, were established anti-liberal and anti-republican tribunals with unlimited powers. Thus, Italy was condemned to suffer unmerited hardships in consequence of the horrors and cruelties that were perpetrated on the other side of the Alps by the furious members of the Convention. The blood, however, of the Italian political martyrs, flowing in streams throughout the peninsula, greatly increased the discontent and hatred of the nation against their tyrannical oppressors; and when Bonaparte, having effected his wonderful descent from the Alps, defeated the Austrians and all the satellites of the petty Italian despots, the patriots hailed his arrival with joy, and received him as the saviour of their country. But they were afterwards greatly deceived in their expectations; because Napoleon, by his promise of liberty and independence, and by his prompt exertions and sanction of the Cis-Alpine republic, had only in view the enrichment of France at the expense of Italy and the Italians. It is a fact, that every treaty which Bonaparte granted to the conquered Italian rulers cost their subjects millions of money, and the loss of the finest objects of art and curiously which they possessed as national property. With his characteristic policy and skill, the general of the French republican army contrived, by means of his numerous private friends, to keep always alive in the minds of the patriots the joyful hope that they would shortly obtain their national independence, and, in this hope, he even personally encouraged them by his positive assurance that he had the interest of the Italians at heart.

But when the republican hero, forgetting the principles which he had openly professed during his glorious military and consular career, became the dictator of the continent of Europe, under the title of the Emperor of the French, the Italians discovered, when it was too late, that he had deceived them. At length, when Napoleon elected himself King of Italy, and was crowned as such at Milan, all those Italians, who were independent, patriotic, and reflecting, deplored the fate of their country, certain as they were that it had now become a French province. In fact, within a period of scarcely ten years, Bonaparte enthroned several of his relations in the peninsula, and, through them, ransacked its treasures. Italy obtained a kind of religious toleration in consequence of the diminution of monarchical influence and of the almost total extinction of the temporal power of its ecclesiastical harpies; at the same time, civil and political liberty was entirely extinct under the lieutenants of Napoleon, whose depredations were suffered to continue with perfect impunity, so long as the choicest works of Italian art were forwarded to France.

It must, however, be admitted that, during the French administration, some important ameliorations were introduced into Italy, with regard to the instruction of the people, and to the financial and judicial departments; and that military habits, discipline, and valour, were again revived amongst its inhabitants, by forcing the Italians to become partakers of the toils, dangers, and glory of all the wars of aggression and usurpation which Napoleon—who, notwithstanding those acts of injustice, was the greatest man that the world ever produced—undertook against the potentates of the continent of Europe. It is a fact, that the Italians were among the best troops that the French army possessed during the long and destructive war of Spain, and at the epoch of the Russian campaign—that gigantic and disastrous undertaking—where they distinguished themselves by their discipline, their intrepidity, and their patience.

With the fall of the French empire, Italy, according to the dictates, good-will, and pleasure of the diplomatic sages of the Congress of Vienna, was replaced under the yoke of its ancient absolute masters, who, having learnt nothing during their long and well-merited exile, again commenced the career of misrule. The Pope and clergy, whom Napoleon had humiliated, resumed their former ambitious pursuits and irresponsible sway. The monks, and especially the Jesuits, whose order had been suppressed, were reinstated in their temporal immunities and possessions, and again received the absolute monopoly of the instruction and education of the nation; and the Italians were moreover compelled to indemnify their returned princes for all the ravages which the French had committed in the royal domains and the national treasury.

Italy, being now freed from the iron but glorious sceptre of Napoleon, became the prey of despotic Austria and of intolerant Rome and of its royal Harpagoes. Austria possessed itself of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, which comprised a surface of 17,800 square miles, with 5,172,000 inhabitants. The ex-empress Maria-Louisa, an Austrian Arch-duchess, obtained the states of Parma, Placentia, and Guastalla, with 6,324 square miles of territory, and 424,000 inhabitants. Ferdinand of Este, another Austrian Arch-duke, took possession, with absolute power, of Modena and Massa, which consist of 1,571 square miles, and contain 385,000 inhabitants. Tuscany returned under its ancient Austrian despotic masters, with its 6,324 square miles of territory, and its million and a half of inhabitants. Piedmont and Sardinia, with 17,800 square miles of territory, and 4,271,000 inhabitants, were again submitted to the despotic sway of Victor Emanuel of Savoy. The papal see received its patrimony and the legations, with 13,000 square miles of territory, and 2,600,000 inhabitants. Lucca, with its 312 square miles of territory, and 182,000 inhabitants, was given to the absolute ex-queen of Etruria and her heirs. The kingdom of the Two Sicilies, consisting of 31,800 square miles, and eight millions of inhabitants, was again submitted to the absolute sway of the ignorant and superstitious Bourbons. The small republic of Saint Marino, with its seventeen square miles of territory, and 8,500 peaceful and industrious citizens, was alone allowed to continue in the enjoyment of its patriarchal constitution.

In this wretched and oppressed state, Italy groaned under its rulers from 1815 until 1820; but in the meantime, the Italians were endeavouring to find some opportunity of shaking off their degrading yoke; and a secret conspiracy was formed throughout the peninsula. At last, in 1820, both from the south and north, a general movement took place with a view to liberate the country from the ignominious yoke of ignorance, superstition, and slavery. The Neapolitans unexpectedly effected a glorious but bloodless revolution, by compelling Ferdinand to sanction a constitutional government, which was not only officially acknowledged, but also solemnly sworn to by the King, the royal family, and his ministers. The Piedmontese, in the meantime, raised also the standard of liberty and civilization; and the present King of Sardinia, then Prince of Carignano, joined and openly encouraged the patriotic efforts of his countrymen in behalf of the future welfare of Italy. But the Neapolitan and Sardinian monarchs, although apparently satisfied with the extraordinary changes that had taken place in their possessions, were secretly intriguing and conspiring with the despots of the Holy Alliance, in order to restore their absolutism; and, as the Roman Pontiff is always ready to grant his absolution to crowned heads, whenever they may choose to perjure themselves, Naples and Piedmont were replaced, in 1821, under the yoke of their perjured tyrants, through the instrumentality of the bayonets of Austria. Then the unfortunate patriots, who had spared the lives and trusted to the oaths of their kings, were sacrificed to their despotic vengeance. Many suffered an ignominious death; and numbers avoided the scaffold by flying from their country, after having lost all their possessions.

These unsuccessful patriotic movements increased the oppression of Italy. Austria, which before had great influence over its destinies, now occupied almost the whole of the Italian peninsula with its devastating armies. As the short-lived constitutional government of Naples had been obtained chiefly in consequence of the efforts of the Carbonari, that sect was of course cruelly persecuted throughout Italy; and all those who were supposed to belong or to have belonged to it, became the objects of the thunders of the Vatican, were excommunicated by a Pontifical Bull, and were declared outlaws by the civil and military authorities. Carbonarism is a new political institution, and was originally founded in Calabria, in 1808, at the instigation of Caroline of Austria, then reigning in Sicily. The avowed scheme of the Carbonari of that epoch, who, with few exceptions, were sbirri, brigands, monks, and Sicilian assassins, was to expel the French from Naples, and to restore the exiled Bourbons to their former throne. Murat, who was then King of Naples, was informed of this plan, and succeeded in frustrating all the projects of the Carbonari by keeping them well watched by the police, and continually surrounded by an imposing military force; and when, in 1819, during the Russian campaign, they were on the eve of attempting a counter-revolution in favour of the expelled dynasty, the greater part of their chiefs and agents were unexpectedly arrested, quickly tried, and condemned, some to death, and others to imprisonment for life; but as the execution of this sentence had not taken place when Murat, after the disastrous retreat of the imperial army from Russia, returned suddenly to Naples, those conspirators were declared by him to be insane. They were accordingly ordered to be kept in mad-houses until their return to reason; and, after a few months' incarceration, nearly the whole of them were restored to liberty by his command. In consequence of this political stratagem of that valorous but unfortunate king, the Carbonari changed their principles, expelled all the brigands, sbirri, monks, and assassins, and having admitted into their brotherhood many free-masons of all classes, re-organised their institution for the purpose of promoting national independence, and civil and religious liberty. When Murat, confiding in his personal courage and intrepidity, and relying upon the promises of his generals, marched an army against Austria in 1815, in the expectation that the Italians would espouse his party in favour of Napoleon, who had mysteriously returned to France, was conquered and expelled from Naples, Ferdinand I. and his satellites were restored to the throne. The reign of despotism and oppression then re-commenced with such stubbornness, that the nation soon became discontented, and Carbonarism was resorted to by all classes, as the only means of putting an end to the misrule of the tyrant: thus was it, as before stated, that in 1820 the object of the patriotic efforts of the Neapolitans was realized. Since 1821, notwithstanding the terror, vigilance, and persecution of the ecclesiastical and temporal rulers of Italy, Carbonarism has extended its ramifications all over the peninsula of Italy, and even into France; and, at present the number of the Italian Carbonari amounts to above four hundred thousand members. In 1831, the Carbonari of central Italy, instigated and encouraged by their brethren in France, followed the example of the Parisians, dethroned the petty tyrants of Modena, Massa, Parma, and Lucca, and put an end to the absolutism of the court of Rome. All the Italian despots would have soon experienced the same fate, had not Austria hastened to support them with her powerful armies.

During the last ten years, unhappy Italy has been in a state of unparalleled oppression. Upwards of a hundred and eighty thousand Austrians retain in a permanent state of siege all the great cities in their possession, and are always ready to assist their neighbours. Sardinia has eighty thousand men constantly under arms, and twelve thousand armed spies. Parma, Placentia, Modena, and Massa are watched not only by national troops, but by mercenary Swiss and German guards. Tuscany is well-stocked with national troops, and well supported by the Austrian camp at Verona. The Roman states are under the surveillance of Austria, and are watched by numerous papal soldiers and gendarmes. The kingdom of Naples is kept in obedience by seventy thousand national troops; and the king's person is thought to the fidelity of eight thousand Swiss mercenaries. The press is under the censorship both of the civil and ecclesiastical power. Only eight daily periodicals are published throughout the whole of Italy; and they are the organs of the government, for whose interest they are printed. The universities are almost deserted, the students existing in perpetual dread of being arrested upon suspicion. The monks and priests, who are excessively rich and wholly free from taxation, amount to nearly half a million of men, and, by living in idleness and ignorance, by their example, render the lower orders idle and superstitious. However, the middle and instructed classes of Italy, although apparently very quiet and passive, are all conspiring; and a constant correspondence is secretly kept up between the patriots of all the great towns. Italy will not therefore remain much longer in its present wretched, distracted and degraded state. It is now on the eve of momentous events; but its convulsions will be violent in consequence of the difficulties, to be encountered against. These difficulties consist of the deeply-rooted ecclesiastical and monarchical systems of government, the blind ignorance and superstition of a vast number of its inhabitants, and a powerful military corps. The modern Italians, however, are by no means deficient either in the love of liberty or the feelings of patriotism; they will exert their natural magnanimity; and, availing themselves of their natural advantages, as one people, they will frustrate the intrigues of foreign powers. The Italian patriots, imitating the ancients—their noble progenitors—and recollecting that they have still in their veins some of the blood of those who imposed laws upon the universe, will at last unite under the same standard, in order to regala their national independence, their liberty, and their former grandeur.

But what will the Italians do if they succeed in shaking off their present yoke? is a question which the reader may naturally ask. We know it for a fact that the present fraternity of Carbonari, doubting the possibility of finding amongst their great men one who possesses those qualities which could render him worthy and capable of becoming the constitutional monarch of a nation of twenty millions of souls, have determined upon following the example of North America, and upon forming a confederation, whose Congress shall unite for the despatch of business at Rome. Turin, Cagliari, Milan, Venice, Genoa, Florence, Rome, Naples, Monteleone, and Palermo, will be the chief towns of the Italian United States; and the fundamental principles, which have been tested in the United States of North America, will be strictly adopted by the Italian nation. Civil and religious liberty, general civilization and prosperity, will be forwarded, from the highest to the lowest of the inhabitants, by promoting instruction, industry, and commerce; and its geographical position and extraordinary internal resources will render Italy eminently useful to the commerce and welfare of surrounding nations.

ANGELA AND ANGELO;

OR THE ITALIAN SISTERS.

THE springs of mortal suffering and misery have been visited not alone by thee, Reginald Mazzoni! That which thine ears have heard, and thy heart felt,—of passion turned to madness, love to hatred, joy to anguish, and the young hope to desperate despair,—has mingled with thy melancholy spirit, as the stream runs downwards to the valley. Sorrow loves sorrow, as the poor hare returns to its native brake to die. The kindredship of care and tribulation, is as dear as the name of father, child, or wife; the wretched meet and are brothers. So is it, that to me have come spirits that swelled with sullen memories and struggled to find vent and freedom; to me have hastened the guilty and the wronged; to me have poured out the homicide his history, and the penitent his crimes; for in me have they seen a soul broken with self-tortures.

Oh! could I weep, I would shed one passing shower, one tributary drop of human sympathy, to the memory of her whose sighs and fearful vengeance form the subject of the ensuing narrative!

The bleak and barren Apennines were crusted with snow impenetrably frozen even to the kindling beams of the mid-day sun; the whistling malester went slowly on his way; the north-east wind blew keen and bitterly, when I bade farewell to my generous host and brothers of the ancient monastery of Benedictines, and bent my steps through Maschieri and the village of Pietra Mala to the fair and flourishing city of Florence. The gates of St. Gallo received me, and, turning my rosary as I passed the cathedral of St. Duomo, I breathed a gentle benediction upon the state and people of the far-famed city of the Lybian Hercules.

Angela Mionetti was a Florentine; her family was wealthy and of great consideration; and it was esteemed a distinction of marked honour when I, Reginald Mazzoni, was chosen to administer ghostly consolation to the Count, her father. He was a man of great learning and sagacity, and deeply experienced in all the subtleties of diplomacy. His only children were two daughters; Angela was the younger, the elder was married. Mercy! when I remember the soft and sunny day when first I saw the lovely Angela, my heart turns sick with horror, as I now reflect upon the dark and lamentable fate, which accounts for her early death, and wove a sable chaplet about her name.

How many would have been nobly virtuous but for the force of circumstances! Many would have been sainted, immortalized and blest, instead of singing the hymn of penitence and tears!

The streets of Florence were one day thronged with curious multitudes; some in surprise, some in terror, crowding in hundreds across the bridge of the Arno, in the direction of the city jail. I thought I heard a repetition of a name I knew. I threw up the window and listened. "Who—what is it?" shouted some. "Where is she?" cried others; while all mingled in the concourse and pushed onward, led by—they knew not what. A horseman rode up the street, I called to him to inform me of the nature and occasion of the excitement; but amid the clamour of the populace, I distinguished only the words "Angela Mionetti." It was enough; the next moment I found myself in the very midst of the crowd, and wildly asking, without waiting to hear, the reason of the universal stir and ferment. Darting down a narrow passage, I came into a large square, where at a distance I perceived a body of persons advancing, and a woman led by the gendarmes in the front. Was it Angela? no, it could not be. I looked again. A cloud appeared to come and go before my vision—alternate consciousness and incredulity! I stood as though struck into marble. The eyes of Angela were gazing in my face—her countenance was pale as the cheek of pestilence—and the full vials swelled on her forehead almost to bursting. I rushed from the portico where I had stationed myself, and in a moment was beside her.

"Holy Virgin!" I exclaimed, "what—what is this? Where are you taking her? and for what? Angela! speak!" but at that instant they turned into the huge gate of the prison.

Observing my sacred habit they at once admitted me. Bewildered, as one who is startled from a trance, I followed through a long court-yard to a dark apartment, where even in the day-time a lamp hung suspended from the roof; the jingling chains were drawn upon her wrists, and we were left together. But the door was scarcely closed, when, uttering a fearful cry, as though the last chord of her broken spirit had then cracked and given way, the poor girl threw herself heavily upon the floor of the cell, and lay as it were lifeless. I raised her in my arms; but all animation, warmth, and sensibility seemed to have fled for ever. A folded paper dropped from her bosom as I held her; and on it was written, "False, false, false, Angelo!" I tore it open, and found a quantity of dark hair curiously entwined, and fastened in the shape of a heart, the centre being inscribed with the words, "ANGELA—ANGELA." A faint sigh escaped her lips as I repeated the names aloud; and, gradually recovering, she gazed upon me with a mournful consciousness of her situation; until seeing the paper in my hand, she snatched it and pressed it passionately to her lips. From that moment she became calm and collected.

"Angela, my child," I said, addressing her, "it is I: rise up and be comforted."

"The Abbé!" she whispered, "then I am not quite without comfort."

"There is a hope even beyond despair, my child," I observed. "The golden edges of the horizon do not form the limits of all that the spirit may attain, and the soul aspire to. There is a clime beyond, a sweet and fertile land, to which the pilgrim of mortality, propped with the staff of faith, travels unfailingly through the great desert of the joyless world, a votary at the shrine of far eternity."

"Time and eternity alike to me are nothing," murmured Angela. "Give me your hand, father;" and she took my hand and placed it to her side, looking up with an expression I never shall forget, and saying, "It is there, mark you how it beats? It cannot endure long. Oh! for one little tear to ease my bursting brain;"—and she sunk her head upon my shoulder, and for a time was silent.

"Will they torture me for this, and expose me to the multitude?" she asked at length.

"For what?" I inquired.

"Have you not heard? O never hear! See you that hand, father? look—it is a cruel hand. Think you it was made for—ah! you start, and shrink from me. Great was the crime, but greater was the cause. Yet say, shall the stricken deer lie down and idly perish?—Shall hopes for ever banished, never be revenged?—Shall eyes see their fondest and all-moving sympathies scattered like weeds, and gaze upon them, and go hence and slumber? Can it be that the heart is quick with passion, violent as love, to be swayed by feelings indifferent as pardon? It cannot be."

"To revenge is mortal,—to forgive divine," I answered; and I then impressed upon her, with all the calmness I could command, the benefits of a strict and perfect disclosure of the causes and influences that led to her melancholy situation.

"Confess! yes, it is all that is left of duty to perform in this life," she replied; "for I feel that public justice will be too late to claim of me atonement for that deed which despair and hatred conceived, and madness realised; and heaven alone may demand and inflict that penalty, which wisdom, moved by the hand of mercy, may award me."

She then proceeded, as nearly as I can remember, in the following words:—

"Not all the masses that were ever said could lift the weight that lies here in this breast, good father; nor edga with light that darksome cloud which hovers over my soul's futurity. Sit ye beside me, and from the lips of penitence hear the story of a broken heart, of one whose nature was as the gentle stream that courses through the meadows; but, deluged with the torrent of fierce passions it burst beyond its banks, and in its fury did such a deed as will astound the world. Listen to me, and prepare to crush me with your hate, —to execrate and spurn me. But for myself, it is done beyond revocation, beyond remedy."

"My earlier life was blest with all that could make existence agreeable. Delight came with the morning, and with the evening peace. The world appeared a fair and happy garden; pleasure and beauty seemed to be its guardians, and all the creatures I saw about me the spirits of happiness and joy. So sprung I up to womanhood.

"It was on a Sabbath morning in June—Oh! the day, how fair, how fatal! the sunbeams fell alanting through the minster windows—the white-vested choir poured forth in solemn tones the sacred anthem—the rising incense, spreading in the air, scented the arched cathedral,—it is from that morning that I date my grief and misery! Leaning on his hand, his face turned in the direction of where I sat, stood Angelo Marotti. His name I knew not then; happy had I never known it! As I raised my eyes from my rosary, I perceived his were fixed earnestly upon me. His wild hair, hung negligently backward, exposed a face of enchanting beauty. I thought I had somewhere seen, at some time, a countenance resembling it: but it was only in my dreams. I need not describe to you the prepossessions of love; it may be sufficient to confess that little of the preacher's exhortations reached my senses; and when he had concluded, I would willingly be had prolonged his discourse to the fall of evening, so that the noble stranger might still have remained.

"With slow and solemn steps the congregation was leaving the cathedral, and, with my mother, I was passing by the chancel, when looking behind I perceived the stranger following us. Was I happy? Did my heart rejoice within me? Yes, with that indefinable joy that youth and love can only know. But when we gained the porch he was gone. What a vacancy fell then upon my spirit! A blessed flower seemed snatched from my bosom, and I felt a disappointment I had never before experienced. At what? What was he to me? I knew not, but I was sad; and when we arrived at home I flew to my chamber, and, concealing myself partially behind a curtain, looked from the window in hopes again of seeing him.

"He passed—yes—he passed, and turned back and back again. I was assured then he had noticed me. Smile not at the simplicity of love, you to whom the world hath left nothing but the liberty to rail, and laugh at what you never felt! I was happy, and the image of Angelo was printed in my heart.

"Call me not precipitate! I was led on by some power I could not control,—a power that held my spirit in a golden chain of blessed thoughts, ineffable, unseen. Oh! for one moment of that contentment which then possessed my soul,—one drop of that pure dew that fell from the fair heaven of my hopes on my ripening heart. Where is it now? Is there no peace, no consolation left to comfort me in my affliction?

"But I wander from my narrative. I longed to gaze upon his face once more, and for several evenings stole to the palace gardens in expectation of meeting him. The sun was sinking on the fourth day after that on which for the first time I had beheld him. I sat on a rustic seat—the fountain threw up its arching stream before me—my little spaniel pursued the insects over the grass—and the shining equipages went glittering through the distant trees. Suddenly a figure like the stranger's own, approached: it was he! The warm blood rushed into my cheeks; and I started. I held a nosegay in my hand, and in my agitation dropt it. He advanced, and taking it from the ground presented it to me. What could I say? I thanked him.

"If I might venture," said he, "I would claim one rose from this sweet assemblage of fair flowers, to keep and cherish in memory of the sweeter donor."

"You are welcome, sir," was my only reply, for I know not by what perversity of nature it was that I was unable to answer otherwise.

"Nay, then, I am content. Farewell sweet lady."

"He was retiring, and would have gone, but I drew him back with the sudden question: 'Have you been long in Florence?'"

"A fortnight, lady; but I have lived an age of joy since Sunday last;" and he explained in terms which I cannot repeat that he had watched me at the cathedral, and discovered my residence; that he had in vain attempted to meet me since till that moment, and declared himself eternally devoted to my service and happiness. I seemed offended at this declaration—but I was really happy.

"Forgive me, forgive me!" he added, "I shall not perhaps have another opportunity to—"

"Are you leaving Florence?" I exclaimed earnestly.

"I fear to-morrow," he replied.

"To-morrow! so soon!" escaped my lips, and my heart was rent with the intelligence. I could have spoken; but I dared not. I think he then saw that I loved him, but at that moment I perceived a servant coming in quest of me, for I had been long from home; and with a half promise (too gladly made on my part) that we should meet as the clock struck eight on the morrow evening at the same spot, he left me.

"About the time of which I speak, my sister Endocia returned to Florence. Her husband remained at Paris on a mission to the Court. You have seen her, and you know she was accounted surpassingly beautiful. Her buoyancy partook more of the artificial gaiety of fashion, and her cheerfulness of the unrestrained frivolity of a woman of the world. Yet in herself she knew her power well, for the same society which had taught her to conceal the knowledge of her own perfections, had taught her, likewise, the rule and sway her charms might hear, when and wherever she might please, and over what and whomever her fancy might suggest.

"Every day and hour produced some new scheme of excitement, and we soon became, poor vanity! the much talked of flowers of Florence. The gaiety, mirth, and graceful ease, I witnessed about me, attracted and delighted me, and I entered fully into the spirit and fascination of the scene. Young and inexperienced, how could it be otherwise? but my feelings, thoughts, and dreams,—my hopes, my sighs, my heart, remained with one, and with one only!

"And where was he? I never met him in the idle circles; but every evening as the day declined, I glided from the garden gate, and hastened to an appointed spot, saw him and listened to his words, and drew into my soul the inspiration of his looks. He wrote me verses of sweetest tenderness, and every day we exchanged some token to perpetuate the remembrance of our interview, when parted. Do you wonder that I dwell upon these things? Wonder rather that the pilgrim, a-thirst, and bowed down with toil, hovers in saddest memory, over the freshening stream, where he last drew the grateful draught. Wonder rather that the sick sigh for their days of health, or that the exile turns to his native land one long and melancholy look ere he leaves it perchance for ever!

"Farewell dear Angelo," I whispered, as I turned one day, to leave him:—"to-morrow! do not forget, to-morrow!"

"Can I forget?" he exclaimed, as I took leave of him.

"I now bent my steps towards home, turning ever and anon, as I went, to see the last I could of him, ere I lost him for so many hours. I had not proceeded far, and was just emerging from a plantation of thick-growing trees, when hearing a voice, I looked, and perceived Eudocia.

"Whether there is some undefinable principle within us, that causes us to start at the sight of that which may at some time be our ruin or our torture, I cannot tell; but as I met Eudocia's eyes, a shudder shot through my frame. What had I to fear? what had I done? Was there harm in meeting Angelo? No, and yet I would not have had Eudocia privy to my secret, for worlds. She had, however, discovered me, and evasion was impossible.

"Oh! I have caught you, have I?" she cried, and I felt the blood mount into my cheeks.

"Eudocia, I pray you," I at length articulated, "I pray you, hint nothing of this to any one."

"I!" she answered, "I am delighted to find that you can feel and think for yourself. But how has some he is!"

"You know, dear sister," I said, "what the world is too apt to say on occasions of this kind."

"To be sure," she replied, "but where did you meet him first?"

"I will tell you all by-and-bye, but not now," I answered.

"Not even his name?" said Eudocia. "If that name were expressive of his form, it should be Apollo. Let me guess;" and she ran over a list of names, till she reached Angelo.

"You have mentioned it," I said, but the tone of his name, in her mouth, was harsh, and discordant to me; and I felt uneasy, and anxious to be alone again.

"We soon reached the gates of the palace, and, flying to my room, I became absorbed in my own thoughts. My apprehensions were soon allayed, by the apparent ingenuousness of my sister's solicitude for my happiness, and her often repeated earnestness to facilitate the means of correspondence between me and my lover. A thousand schemes were meditated and adopted, suggested, and rejected, by which Angelo should be presented to the family.

"Married, and a mother, Eudocia's motive could but be pure. I yielded myself entirely to her guidance, and at the theatre, and other public places, we contrived to see and speak with Angelo: in a short time, by the cunning intriguing of Eudocia, he was sitting at the table of the Count my father, a received and honoured visitor.

"The Count was charmed with the quick and various talent Angelo displayed, in all the exercises of the mind, and the subtle studies of philosophy and human nature. To me, his gentle disposition, and his fervid and eloquent love, were the sun of my life.

"All was as fair as summer, till one day, when the duties of my father, as a minister in the government, called him away to a distant part; and in his solicitude he fixed upon me to accompany him on his mission. A fatal hour suggested the plan: a fatal day confirmed it, and in the fatal moment, that I set my foot upon the chariot steps, ruin sang a requiem over the ashes of my hopes. On the evening of the previous day, I met Angelo in the gardens, and if human honour, and the oaths of mortals before heaven, were not as idle as the passing winds, he dared not to have perjured his thrice-bound soul or torn the seal from that thrice-plighted bond, which then our hearts contracted in the presence of the Great Supreme. Well remember I his words, for they were the last I ever heard of kindness from him!

"I departed; and oh! how sad the hours crept on!

The affairs on which the Count was despatched permitted him but little time to spend with me, and all my thoughts when he was absent were engrossed by that dear distant one. I received letters from Eudocia, and in those she expressed everything that sisterly friendship could expect; a warmth of sentiment that pleased while it surprised me. She informed me with what earnestness Angelo spoke of me, and jested on the change in his appearance since my departure.

"The sudden arrival of a courier with despatches for my father was the precursor of instant orders that the most prompt preparations for travelling should be made, as the Count was appointed to execute a secret mission at Vienna: and on the following day I received the grateful intelligence that I was to set out on my return to Florence. My heart leapt at these tidings, and the idea of again seeing my beloved Angelo was the source of unmingled delight to me. I pictured to myself the surprise my unexpected presence would occasion, and the inexpressible joy he would experience when he found me so near him once again.

(To be concluded in our next.)

INTEMPERANCE IN WOMAN.

By Mrs. REYNOLDS.

THERE is something truly sublime in the manner in which Milton describes Eve, and in those passages of our only real English epic poem, where the purity and graces of her mind are delineated. Milton has not lingered upon her personal charms: he imagined that the more real, as they are the more permanent, qualifications of women are those mental embellishments which are the choicest jewels for her adornment. Of a very beautiful, though more personal and voluptuous character, are Moore's delineations of female loveliness and grace in his oriental poems: and did we call the magic-lantern of our memory to our aid, and marshal in array, before the eyes of our readers, all the beautiful conceptions of female character with which we have met in poem or novel, we should evoke an endless train of heroines. We must however allude to a few, in order to impress upon the mind the delicate graces and fascinating qualifications of some of those beautiful creations.

First, let us call to mind the mysterious Esmeralda, in Victor Hugo's celebrated Notre Dame de Paris, that interesting and friendless girl, for whom the eye can shed tears, as if her sad destinies were those of no fabulous being. We know of no heroine of humble life that ever created so deep an interest in our mind as Esmeralda. The narratives of queens, and the biographies of great ladies teem with incidents which excite our imaginations: but none produces that soft and calm melancholy which seizes upon the mind, during a perusal of Esmeralda's woes. Again, there is a charm in the character and sorrows of Lucy of Lammermoor, in Sir Walter Scott's beautiful romance,—a charm which enlists all the sympathies of the reader in the hapless loves and tragical fate of that truly poetic creation of genius. Elizabeth, in the Exiles of Siberia, is somewhat too masculine a character to produce the same effect upon the mind; and, in Paul and Virginia, the interest is no sooner created in favour of the heroine, than the denouement puts an end to all suspense, the tale being so short. A most interesting character is that of Adeline in Mrs. Radcliffe's Romance of the Forest—a book, however, belonging to a school which we do not regret to say, has long since exploded, with all its German mysticism, horror, and diablerie. A soft and melancholy halo hangs around Amy Robart in Kenilworth: the same may be said of Rebecca in Ivanhoe. Some of the heroines of Paul de Kock are beautifully depicted, especially the unhappy dumb girl who gives her name to the novel of Sœur Anne.

We have now quoted enough for our purpose. Our object is to collect in one focus, all that is bright and all that is beautiful in the galaxy of qualifications ascribed, by courteous writers, to the heroines of their tales or poems; so that we may induce our readers to reflect upon that softness, that delicacy of character, that retiring, inoffensive, and tender feeling, which those writers have represented to be centred in the mind of woman. Certainly, all the associations which exist in the imaginations of poets and novelists, with the idea of woman, are pleasing and fascinating ones; and the name of woman has been used to represent, by personification, all the milder virtues described by the ancients. With them even Wisdom was a Goddess; and the arts and sciences were all supposed to emanate from the Parnassian heights, on which were the charming grottoes of the Muses.

Having now endeavoured to create in the imaginations of our readers a certain train of thought with respect to Woman, let us seize the favourable opportunity, and ask them with what feelings they can view the being, in whom so many graces and delicate qualifications are concentrated, degraded to an ineffable degree by means of a poison as morally subversive as it is physically injurious? Can it be imagined for one moment that the creature, who is supposed to be all modesty, reserve, and bashfulness, can imbibe a liquid fire which renders her boisterous, quarrelsome, and clamorous, forgetful of all the delicate attributes with which ancient belief, the courtesy of the middle ages, and the assent of these civilised times, have vested her,—reckless of that opinion, the slightest word of which should be sufficient to call the red blush of shame to her lips,—and oblivious of the necessity of keeping a constant watch upon her words and actions. We might quote numberless instances of the brightest ornaments of the female world having been obscured by the dread habit of intemperance: but the misfortune of this style of compilation is, that all quotable authorities are of equal value; and that facts, the most apocryphal, stand forward in the same strong relief with those which rest on undisputed testimony, or the still better agreement with the undoubted principles of human nature.

The ideas of some persons relative to women are of so degenerate and gross a kind, that the sight of any particular evil habit amongst females does not disgust them more than it would do if seen amongst men. A writer in the time of Charles the First observed of a woman whom he especially wished to praise, "She knows how to make a pudding much better than a poem. I hate poetical and literary ladies at all times." This same writer would doubtless have been equally eccentric in his praises of a woman who knew how to make British wines and home-brewed beer. But the extent of female worth must not be only measured according to the standard of her domestic qualifications, but also by her domestic virtues. Abstinence in a woman, with respect to liquor, and abstemiousness with regard to rich food, are as necessary to maintain an elevated opinion of her taste, delicacy, and mental purity, in the mind of her husband, as her devotion to her children and attachment towards himself. If once the barrier, which separates the mind of woman from all notions of sensuality and grossness, in the estimation of her husband, be broken down, then adieu to real confidence—and real happiness. When the husband no longer feels a species of pride in his wife, but begins to regard her as "a common frail mortal like the rest," domestic peace has already received a severe blow. And the path to all this is prepared by intemperance on the part of the wife. If a woman can so far forget the elevated nature of her sentiments of modesty and reserve, as to incur the dangers of the inebriating glass, a severe blow is already levelled at her happiness. A man, be he never so degraded a drunkard himself, must feel a sentiment of deep disgust towards his inebriate wife. The helplessness of a woman, when inebriated, is more appalling than that of a man; and the association of the vice of intemperance with a being that belongs to the sex of those bright heroines of whom we were ere now writing, is an idea which is revolting to even the individual whose moral notions are not particularly nice on any subject.

The writer of this article has passed the greater portion of her life upon the continent. She left England early, and without having formed any impressions relative to the manners of the inhabitants. In France, Switzerland, and Belgium, where she has resided, there is scarcely such a thing heard of as an intemperate woman;—and even the few instances, which came beneath her notice, were those of females of a very advanced age. To say that no woman ever drinks on the continent, would be to utter an absurdity; but so little is the habit of intemperance there prevalent amongst the female sex, that when the writer arrived in England, she was astonished at the numbers of distressing instances of the evil habit in women which meet the eyes in the public streets, and of which we read in the newspapers. What is the result? The women of the poorer classes in England afford a sad and heart-rending contrast to the wives of the Flemish, the French, or the Swiss, in a parallel situation of life. The squalor, the filth, the misery, and the want, which are but too evident to the wanderer amidst many districts of London, are unknown on the continent, even in the suburbs of the most crowded cities. If ever the vice of intemperance be more loathsome and hideous to contemplate at one time than another, that period is when its victim is woman. Well might Burke exclaim that the "age of chivalry is gone!" when all inducements to true chivalry—the purity and stainlessness of woman's character—have been so materially subverted amongst so large a portion of the English female population! But, thanks to the good genius of Teetotalism, the establishment of Female Total Abstinence Societies will regenerate the mass now alluded to.

LIFE IN THE DECCAN JUNGLES.

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

AT the close of a long day's march, we camped on the banks of a river in one of the great forests of Canara. My principal object in this expedition was to shoot bison, which we found in great numbers along the whole range of the Western Ghats. This fine animal, the largest of the genus Bos, is still so little known that its existence has even been doubted by many modern naturalists; while its form and habits have been imperfectly and erroneously described by others. In India, its gigantic size and formidable appearance has invested it, in the superstitious minds of the natives, with fabulous attributes of supernatural strength and ferocity, which the credulity of travellers has published; and these vague accounts, with the slight notices extracted from a sportsman's Diary, were then, and, I believe, still are all that is known of the Indian bison. I had previously engaged the services of an old African Shikaree, who had spent his life in the forest. He met me on my arrival at our little encampment; and, after making arrangements for the next day's sport, I turned in to dream of to-morrow.

The moon was still shining on my solitary tent, when I awoke next morning, startled by the roar of a tiger returning to his lair at the approach of day. No other sound but the rushing fall of waters disturbed the stillness of the jungle. I looked out, and saw that the first streaks of light were dawning through the haze occasioned by a white cloud of vapour, which rose curling from the dark stream, and dispersed in a cold damp mist stretched like a veil of gauze across the endless maze of trees. As day began to break, the silent forest seemed suddenly aroused into life. The scream of the restless parakeet answered the carol of the brilliant mina; and the cry of the spotted deer was heard at intervals, mingled with the bellow of the great Rusa stag, which came faintly, like the sound of a distant trumpet, from the remote thickets. Far above all rose Mahommed's "Whooh!" intended to summon the hopeful scion of his house, who emerged from a ruined hut in the shape of a woolly-headed young monster, blowing a cloud of smoke from a pipe which had seen some service. Having transferred the luxury to his father, young Quashee crawled back to his den; and the old savage, throwing a greasy blanket over his shoulders, squatted before my tent while I dressed. This man was famous for his skill in tracking bison: he had scarcely an idea connected with any other subject. The chase of the bison was the business of his life: he talked of the peculiar habits of the Koolgher (the name by which the bison is known amongst the natives) with the familiar intimacy of long acquaintance, and mentioned, with contempt the pursuit of an inferior animal. Even the tiger was treated slightly, as unworthy of his notice. "My son," he used to say, "sometimes kills one; but he knows no better—he is but a boy." Mahommed was then nearly sixty years of age; but he still possessed the activity of a lad; and his hawk-like eye flashed with animation when the brown hides of the bison appeared through the green bamboos as he stole upon their trail. He rarely left the forest, being the village-chief of a small cluster of huts, inhabited by a few poor families, who, like himself, gained a precarious livelihood by the pursuit of wild animals. Here the half-naked savage reigned like a patriarch over his subjects. He was looked up to as the most skilful of his tribe in all that related to wood-craft, and had been constantly thrown into intercourse with the English sportsmen, who usually selected him as their guide; and from them he had acquired, in addition to his other accomplishments, the fatal taste for brandy, which must be indulged before he could show a head of game. His sole clothing was a piece of cotton round his loins, and a grey blanket, each corner of which contained some such dainty as a deer's kidney or a bison's heart. With his long black match-lock upon his shoulder, and his well-worn knife at his side, his grey hair streaming behind him while he silently followed the track of his game through the pathless forest, and his keen eye glancing with the bold confident look of one who knew his danger, but feared it not, old Mahommed was no mean object of admiration. Much that is unnoticed by the philosopher, speaks to the mind of the savage. Thus was it that the cries of birds, and the howl of the large grey monkey, often guided him to the spot where the bison haroured. The ruffled bark and nibbled shoots of the bamboo, told him where the deer had been feeding; he knew each spot where the Rusa loved to scrape its bed in the shady thickets, impervious to the sun; and where the boughs of the Pagnell tree were laden with the wild-honey, he was sure to find the awkward bear climbing for his food.

We crossed the river in a canoe, and proceeded in silence along its banks. The forest was in beautiful order for stalking—hardly a leaf upon the ground; and the long rank grass, which grows to the height of nine feet in the open glades where the timber had been cleared, was now burnt down. Showers of rain early in May had made the young verdure sprout in little green patches, which were quite cut up by the tracks of the axis deer. The bison were now leaving the strong covers for the grassy plains near the river, where they were less tormented by the swarms of insects which come forth at the commencement of the rainy season; and the shy solitary Rusa, which dreads the sun, now ventured to leave its usual gloomy thickets, as the rays shone dimly through the gathering cloud of the monsoon. We had not advanced a mile into the jungle before Mahommed hit upon a fresh trail. He pointed without uttering a word to a broad foot-print, like that of an ox; and then, rolling his blanket over his shoulder, he stooped to it, and followed it up at a trot. Deer frequently crossed our path, but he never noticed them even by a look; and the rustling of the leaves, as some heavy animal rushed past him, caused but this cool observation,—"It is only a tiger!" As the trail became warmer, the old man grew excited like a blood-hound, running into his game. He ran it up without a check for at least two miles, thrusting his toe occasionally into the droppings to judge by the temperature how far the bison might be a-head. At last he stopped; and laying his ear to the ground, listened with profound attention, and then, turning up his grim visage, whispered,—"They are drinking in that ravine beyond the teak tree; you will have a good shot; but, mind, the shoulder must be the mark." We crept softly up the bank,—and there they were, a noble herd, often stopping over the stream. Their size appeared enormous, as they stood without a branch to conceal their gigantic proportions. Head after head dipped into the water; and the small fierce blue eye, unconscious of danger, often met mine watching them from the high bank where we lay concealed. Alone, at the distance of a hundred yards, stood the old bull on a rising ground, snuffing the air, and looking unconsciously towards us. He smelt us, and stamped violently upon the ground, producing a hollow sound like that by which a rabbit spreads alarm in a warren. In an instant every head was raised with distended nostrils; the bull advanced close to the cows, and, while he stood hesitating, I fired at the point of his shoulder. The large beast sank on his knees, with his broad muzzle buried in the sand; and a crash like thunder followed the sharp crack of the rifle, as the terrified herd dashed through the jungle, everything yielding to their enormous strength. In this position, the disabled monster lay groaning, till I fired a ball into the back of his skull, when he fell on his side. I was running up to him; but Mahommed grasped my arm, and bade me listen before I moved. A low growling bellow was audible from a thicket at some distance; and an occasional snort, with a rustling of boughs, explained the cause of this caution. "Keep still," he whispered, "the herd is close by. They have not seen us yet, and if the bull have life enough to give one roar when he feels my knife, they will be back upon us like a troop of mad devils. But I shall start them." With these words he clapped his hand to his mouth, and raised a yell so wild, so unearthly, that when it was returned by a hundred echoes, the forest rang as if inhabited by demons. No Indian war-whoop could have raised more terror; the herd dashed through the cover at their utmost speed; and we could catch occasional glimpses of their dark bodies forcing themselves through the closely interwoven bamboos, and then trace their course by the crackling branches, till the sound died away in the distance. "The Koolghas know my voice," observed Mahommed. My first feeling in approaching the fallen bison was amazement at its size. It far exceeded what I had imagined: no animal, except an elephant, having ever given me the same idea of muscular power. My eye could not scan the whole of his great muscular dimensions at a glance. As he lay on one side, the hump of his shoulders and the dark ridge peculiar to the Indian bison being concealed, he looked not unlike an overgrown Highland bull. But a nearer investigation removed the resemblance, and the distinctive marks of the guare gave a character to the animal which marked him as one of a totally different genus.

Having satisfied my curiosity by a minute examination and accurate measurement of the bison, we left him to the vultures, intending to send next day for the head to preserve as a specimen. My principal object being attained, we turned towards a ravine on the side of a thickly wooded hill, where Mahommed promised to show me some Rusa deer, and he kept his word. We saw two herds in some close bamboo thickets, without being able to obtain a shot; and it was evident, from the tracks in every direction, that this was one of their favourite haunts; but the crackling of the dry branches under foot rendered it impossible to stalk them. After a long sag through this sort of jungle, the earnest crowing of some crows hovering over a shady spot attracted Mahommed's attention, and, after watching their motions for a few seconds, he turned round with that peculiar grin which always foretold that game was near, and said with an air of decision that there was either a tiger, a solitary bull, or a stag at the spot. Most probably one of the two latter, as the monkeys over head were not chattering with alarm, as they generally do when a tiger is near them. We crept to the edge of the ravine, and looked over. A fine stag with immense antlers was lying stretched on his side by a pool of water, lazily brushing off the flies with his sweeping horns, and flapping his long ears in a state of indolent security. He was within eighty yards, and his shoulder beautifully exposed; so I took him as he lay, and hit him in the fatal place. He rose slowly, looked wildly around him, and with the life-blood swelling from the wounds, staggered forward and dropped dead. The old savage proceeded to break the deer on the spot, and having deposited a few dainties for immediate consumption in the ample folds of his blanket, left the carcase to be brought in the next day. Heavy rains obliged us to return to the tent, and so ended my first day in the Casara forest.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

HUMAN DESTINY.

By Mrs. S. Miles.

"Thou'rt mine," said Grief, as on the wave-worn strand
A mortal stood; "thou'rt mine, and mine for ever."
"Not thine alone," return'd the whistling sand;
"That being first was formed beside a river:
There did affliction with her ebon wand
To trace his lineaments the bright grains sever;
And Jupiter the Good infus'd a ray
Of fire immortal through the lifeless clay."
Then Grief replied, "I will no more oppose
Your claims, poor humble daughter of the sea,
Nor ask what elements the God-head chose
To mould this creature of mortality;
But let me only of his hours dispose,
His earthly part will fall again to thee;
And when the soul has left its shatter'd frame
It may return to Jove from whence it came."

ALL MUST LOVE.

By W. T. Moncrieff.

The high-crown'd queen on her canopied throne
Of love must the anguish bear:—
She feels it a sadness to reign alone,
And her kingdom vain would share.
The lady in her warded tower,
Must passion's votary prove;
And the Jewell'd dame, in her courtly bower,
Resigns her gold for love.
Can, then, a simple heart go free?
No—'twas decreed by heaven above,
That high or low—of each degree—
All must love!
The gallant knight, from the serried throng,
Must to love a vassal bow:
The minstrel, most renowned in song,
Will to beauty pay his vow.
The solemn judge and the scholar grave
Can neither exist alone:
The pedant becomes fair woman's slave—
Love's power they all must own.
Can, then, a simple heart go free?
No—'twas decreed by heaven above,
That high or low—of each degree—
All must love!

TO THE WIND.

By M. A. M.

Sing on, thou dreary-moaning wind,
Resume that solemn strain;
It stirs up thoughts of by-gone days
That utter e'en come again:—
Of when all fiercely thou hast bowld'
The old oak trees around;
And I have shudder'd as I heard
Thy solemn—changeless song.
Yet have I listened unto thee,
Until thy tones grew dear;
And I have watch'd, and often wish'd
Thy marm'ring voice to hear;
And, as I sat upon the hearth,
With merry faces round,
Have more admir'd thy hollow moan,
Than all their laughter's sound.
To my lone heart thy murmurs seem'd
In sympathy to flow:
I thought that thou wast telling me
The sorrow I should know.
How often have thine echoes held
Dull intercourse with me,
And thou hast still a magic power
To make me welcome thee!

PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE.

The past is God's—and his alone;
'Tis, like the Present, seen
By him who views from Heav'n's high throne
What is, and what has been.
The Present is the Lord's—and we
A moment cannot claim;
For, if we did, Eternity
Would disappoint our aim.
The Future a sure title gives
To realms unseen—unknown:
Eternity, which both outlives,
Is and will be our own!

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We sincerely thank our correspondent at Shrewsbury (Once a Spirit-Dealer) for his communications. His good opinion of The Teetotaler is flattering to us. We shall always be glad to hear from him.

G. O. of Glasgow is thanked for his very welcome letter. We coort the correspondence of the secretaries of provincial societies, and always avail ourselves of such communications.

Mr. Mingay Syder's letters are received at 167 Fleet-street. We feel convinced that this talented gentleman will readily answer Mr. J. Anthony's question.

To Mr. John Kirton, of Newcastle, we reply as follows:—I. The literature of France is and long has been the first in the world; II. If moral pieces be produced upon the stage, we consider theatres to be worthy of encouragement; III. The writer of the opinion relative to Shakespeare and Byron, forgot that there were such men as Corneille and Racine.

We agree with J. J. that the want of Temperance Coffee-houses in the very heart of the city is greatly felt. Certainly, such an establishment, if well conducted, would succeed in the vicinity of the Bank of England.

To M. N. we reply that a report of a meeting, if received on Monday morning, is in time for insertion in the ensuing number of The Teetotaler.

We intend shortly to publish a list of the various TEETOTAL PERIODICALS in the United Kingdom: will the proprietors thereof have the kindness to send us the names of their journals?

We beg to request the secretaries of all PROVINCIAL SOCIETIES, to forward us their printed REPORTS as often as they are published, or favour us with a letter to intimate where these documents can be purchased.

The Secretaries of the AUXILIARIES and BRANCHES of the UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION are requested to forward us more frequent reports of the proceedings of their societies.

We beg to call the attention of the Reader to the Eighth Number of a Series of Illustrations, which is given gratis with "THE TEETOTALER" of this day. The Series will be complete in Twelve Illustrations, and will be continued for as many consecutive weeks.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1840.

We have before observed, that if all appeals to the sympathies in favour of the doctrines of Teetotalism, should fail to produce results proportionate with the magnitude of the question, an appeal to the reasoning faculties should be immediately resorted to. In the first instance, we require the world to sacrifice a fascinating indulgence to the welfare of society, by assisting in the work of moral reform and social regeneration, and strengthening the arguments of Teetotalism by the force of example; but, in the second place, we urge the necessity of embracing the principles of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, on the score that those liquors are of the most pernicious kind. The long-established error that they are nutritious, has been undermined by the lucid explanations of such writers as DOCTOR RUSH, MESSRS. GRINDROD and PARSONS, and a host of medical authorities; and the fact that they are unnecessary in times of arduous toil and severe labour, is borne out by the experience of millions of men. The working-man may imagine that he cannot perform his task without the aid of malt liquor; but, has he given the plan of total abstinence a fair trial? The first hours or days of departure from an inveterate or deeply-rooted habit will be probably characterized by certain feelings of uneasiness; but this sensation soon wears off, and the beneficial effects of total abstinence speedily manifest themselves. The working-man will then discover that he had all along mistaken an "artificial state of excitement" for an "increase of ability to labour and toil;" whereas that unnatural excitement has in reality been constantly undermining his physical powers and capacities. Strong drink disposes the body to the reception of several diseases from which the total abstainer escapes; it wears away the constitution as the perpetual dash of the billow rounds off the asperities of the rock; it neither produces permanent heat in cold weather, nor mitigates heat in the sultry season; it leaves a fearful lassitude of both mind and body, when its effects have passed away; and its influence upon the digestive powers is equally pernicious. If alcohol passed out of the human frame by the same process as other fluids, it would not produce such peculiarly evil results as it is shown to do; but it does not undergo the process in the stomach to which other matters are subjected. It becomes emancipated from the materials with which it is mixed up, by means of the digestive operation, and is then diffused throughout the frame, affecting every membrane, and settling over the whole system like a subtle and insinuating poison. It produces general excitement, and attacks the brain with unrelenting virulence, the medullary mass being essentially adapted to receive such attacks with less possibility of resisting them than any other part of the body. The nerves are operated upon by this insidious poison in a manner calculated to shake them to an extent which disposes the frame to that state of irritability which ends in madness; and, if any part of the human frame be more liable to one particular disease than another, the effects of the alcohol are invariably felt in that region. Inflammation is speedily engendered; and, every time a fresh quantity of inebriating liquor is received into the system, that inflammation is kept up and encouraged, in the same way as fuel assists the raging element of fire.

The reader has doubtless heard the anecdote of the fatal boots, in which the fang of a serpent's tooth was found to lurk. An Indian was bitten in the leg, through one of his boots, by a venomous snake; and from this wound he died. His eldest son inherited the boots, and was visited with strange symptoms upon the first occasion of wearing them. He died also; and the same fate overtook his brother, who became the third proprietor of the fatal boots. An investigation of the boots took place; they were ripped up; and a piece of the serpent's tooth was found imbedded in the seam of one of them. The fate of the two sons of the first victim was thus explained: the father had unconsciously bequeathed to them a gift that sent them to an untimely grave. Thus is it with respect to the intoxicating cup. It is handed down from father to son, and in it lurks the poisonous alcohol which decides the destinies of those who come in contact with it. Equally certain in its results, though not so speedy in its operation, as the venomous tooth of the serpent, it never fails to plant in its victim the germs of premature decay. The cup may be examined when too late—and the dire effects of the evil habit of intemperance may then be recognised by an afflicted family, from whose domestic circle one member has been snatched away; and yet the surviving relatives are incautious and reckless enough to continue those potations which proved fatal to him whose loss they deplore. How strange and yet how general is this idiosyncratic imitation of a pernicious example! With these facts constantly in view, let the moderate-drinker resign his one glass; and the example will be speedily followed by him who takes two glasses.

We set out by saying that we should appeal to the reasoning faculties of those who still persisted, in spite of all demands upon their sympathies, to reject the doctrines of total abstinence, and who adhered to the evil habit of drinking, whether moderately or intemperately. We have stated sufficient to show that alcoholic liquors are both unnecessary and pernicious; and these arguments hold good, even when the liquors containing the alcohol—such as beer, wine or spirits—are pure and unadulterated. But when we proceed to reflect upon the frightful ratio in which the naturally pernicious qualities of strong drinks are augmented and increased, in power and number, by the process of adulteration, we know not whether we should most execrate the villainy of the fabricators and transmuters of these liquors, or pity the deplorable ignorance of those who partake of such deadly poisons. It is useless to suppose that pure liquors of any kind can be obtained, even at the establishments of the most respectable venders. All wines are made to suit particular markets,—all malt liquors are adulterated with narcotic poisons and mineral substances either as correctives or preservatives,—and all spirits are subjected to similar processes, for the purpose of supplying an article at a rate which may suit the practice of competition. A reference to the daily journals, now that the Court of Excise is once more open, will furnish our readers with pretty specimens of the iniquities of publicans. The invariable excuse of these slow-murderers is that "others do it, and so must they, if they do not wish to sell at a loss." From this admission, it is evident that honest dealing in the wine, spirit, and malt-liquor trade, is an absolute impossibility. In respect to beer, when no other materials are used by the publican, large quantities of sugar and water are invariably mixed with the liquor; and, in the first instance, this beer has been well-doctored by the brewers, before it was sent to the publican's cellars. There is no trade in which so much competition to under-sell a rival establishment, exists as in that of the publicans. All such placards as "THE NOTED STOUT-HOUSE," "FINE ALES," "THE BEST CORDIAL GIN," "FINE OLD JAMAICA RUM," &c. &c., are most vile falsehoods, and bear undeniable testimony to the depraved character of the individual who puts them forth. If we were to visit a public-house at all, we certainly should choose one which did not resort to such base designs as this miserable art of puffing. Wherever those placards are seen, they are certain proofs of the iniquity of a landlord, who endeavours to obtain a sale for his doubly-adulterated liquors amongst the unwary and ignorant. When it is, therefore, shown that all intoxicating liquors are greatly adulterated, and that every illegitimate plan is put into force to conceal this fact and entrap the uninitiated, will not the reasoning faculties of intelligent beings prompt them to abstain from the poisoned liquors, and avoid the dens that sell them? We know that our time is short enough in this world: should we seek to abridge our existence by partaking of the most deleterious compounds and mixtures? Reason—religion—morality—happiness—and common sense, all exclaim against the use of intoxicating liquors; and unwearied should be our exertions to impress these truths upon the minds of those upon whom the light of Teetotalism has not as yet shone.

MARIAMNE.

A FRAGMENT OF A STORY.

"MARIAMNE, it must be to-morrow."

"Nay, nay, dearest Edmund, grant me but one other day to look upon the innocent proof of guilt!"

"It cannot be, Mariamne; the blight of mortality will be upon him ere then, and why feed the canker on that dear heart, longer on morbid unavailing sorrow? To-morrow it must be."

"Oh! Edmund, grant me but a little respite; I cannot—cannot, yet see him go down to the grave. Oh! to commit his little form to a cold bed of ice and snow, when I had hoped that this bosom would have been his resting place for years!"

"Mariamne, these regrets are natural, are honourable, are amiable; but they have no power over corruption. Answer me not again; to-morrow, half an hour before the gates shut, I will be here with all that may be necessary—farewell, dear Mariamne, farewell!"

The next day set in with a still intenser cold than before, accompanied with strong gales from the north, that swept over the level plains of frozen waters with inconceivable force and keenness. At the appointed time I left my lodgings, bearing under my arm a small box of elm, and the book of Common Prayer, and then proceeded to Mariamne. On entering her sitting-room, I looked round it for her in vain, and it was not until after some time that I found her in a corner of her inner room bathed in tears, and wrapt in a half stupor of grief. At first she did not perceive me; but on my laying my hand upon her arm, and calling her by her name, she rose gently, and laying her hands upon my shoulders, wept upon my neck, while I in utter reverence to the piety of her tear-dimmed eye I ventured to kiss the fair cheek that was presented to me in modesty, gratitude, and silence. Thus we stood for some minutes, till Mariamne broke the stillness in a low murmuring kind of voice of woe, that made the darkness and occasion doubly dreary.

"Oh! Edmund," said the poor sorrowing girl, "oh! my kind, generous Edmund, how have I tasked you for this night—this bitter—bitter night—bitterer even than that in which I woke to guilt—bitterer even than that which bore his little unscathed soul from the contamination of his wretched mother—nay, bitterer even than that in which I shall stand in shame and dishonour before the face of him who led me up the path of life with affection and pious counsels. Look! look, Edmund, on the sweet little innocent face—look on it, Edmund, and depict it to me in after days, when the worms have despoiled my rosebud. Oh! death! death! Well, I'll be calm; but who could think to look upon that little angel's countenance, that it could ever bring sorrow with it! See, Edmund, his tiny fingers once played upon my bosom, and their little motions soothed it. Oh! that they should return me no pressure now! Oh! that those lips, those eyes should give no look or kiss to comfort my broken heart, in its desolation! You never saw him, Edmund, when he looked from my heart to my face, and his little mouth to smile at me, and soothe his little happiness like a dove—and, yes, yes! he might have lived to be what his—what others of his sex are, and then could I still have loved him: he might have lived too, to despise his mother's frailty—but no, no! that is a bitter thought—I would have nurtured him so kindly, that he dare not have done that!"

"Mariamne," said I, interrupting her, "you are wearing yourself out, and have much yet to go through—be comforted; those whom the gods love best die young."

"And therefore," answered she, "do I live—live on, and cannot die."

"Speak not thus, Mariamne," I replied, "but be thankful to God for his mercies, and be calm."

"Yes, yes!" she said, "I am thankful; at least I will try to be so, and I can now be calm."

"Then leave me, Mariamne, for a few minutes."

"Leave you—leave you, Edmund? and for what? Would you, too, play me false? I know you would fling this innocent clay from me, but you shall not—he shall not be laid in the earth to-night; he shall receive my tears this one night more; he shall not, dear Edmund? Hear, hear, now, how the winds blow, and the snow comes down in frozen lumps!—you would not, could not give him to the grave on such a night—don't, Edmund—don't dear, dear, kind Edmund!" and she placed her arms round me, and laid her cheek to mine, and there was silence while our tears mingled.

"Be still, Mariamne," I said, as I led her drooping and silent, into the inner-room, "your honour, and happiness, and peace are all I consult—whatever I do be calm, or at least remain here, and pray that you may be so. No answer, Mariamne: my purpose is unalterable as 'tis necessary;" and I left her sighing meekly on her knees, to seek the God she had forsaken and offended.

On returning to the other room, I commenced my melancholy preparations. The box I had brought with me was to be the last habitation of the little innocent wreck of mortality that lay before me. It was the first time I had looked on death, and calm and beautiful to a troubled mind from its calmness, as it appeared to me, I shuddered to contemplate it; it is a weakness inherent in our system from our education, and the world will be better and braver when we are taught in childhood to look with nerve on the most harmless of all objects—inanimate humanity. Tears of sorrow, and tears of pity trickled down my cheeks; and why did they? what was there to grieve for, if we could rid our nature of its selfishness? Some childish smiles—some infantile prattle—some few playful gambols—some accession to the momentary happiness that is all that ever has been mine—were here denied me. But what were these compared with all that was spared to this poor infant—the unrequited affection—the broken friendship—the heart's ache—the spirit's suffering—and the body's pain—the blight cold that falls from day to day upon the weak, till it cankers the existence, or the sudden foils that fall roughly and bluntly on the resolves of the bold—the pains that flesh and spirit both are heir to—all, all were spared to him; and yet I grieved, and Mariamne sorrowed madly. Why is this, metaphysicians, philosophers, or schoolmen? expound to me the rational vagaries of the human mind; and I too will have faith in you.

Poor Mariamne, meanwhile, was loud in her supplications to eternity; and in her sobs, little as the world had given her of joy, and much of woe, as had been her undue lot—she could mourn the short existence of her woe-born progeny.

When I had completed all but the last efforts of my task—all but for ever closing the light of the world on the lifeless, I sought her, and kissing the heart's dew from her cheek, raised and conducted her, trembling and faint, to the humble bier I had prepared. Lonely and sorrowfully, and silently we bent over it, and our tears fell fast and thick upon it; then placing it on the floor we knelt by its side, and as well as I was able I read over the unchristened babe the sublime service, the Church of England would have denied it, that ended, Mariamne blessed the fair corpse with convulsive sorrow, then throwing herself on the sofa, hid her beautiful face and wept, while with infirm hands I ended the act I had commenced.

With heavy but hurried steps, we wound along the ramparts and issued through the east gates—Oh, it was a bitter and fearful night! Heaven seemed to denounce us and our task! It was February, but the frost had already reigned four months with uninterrupted keenness, and the snow had fallen some feet within the last four and twenty hours, and was still falling thickly and rapidly, while a cold, loud, biting gale blew it in freezing clouds into our faces: it was perfectly dark too, and the way so choked that it required us often to halt on our painful journey, to enable us to regain the road we had strayed from, and which was now only to be known by the little height the drift left above the plains that skirted it. It was late before we arrived at the plantation where our task was to conclude. I had on the previous night prepared the grave; but the snow and frost had since then destroyed all traces of my work. Resting the coffin on the ground, therefore, I hastily struck a light, and commenced a search among the trees for some marks I had cut in them to guide me; which having at length found, I left the lantern on the spot to direct me on my return, and hastened back to Mariamne. The poor girl was in almost lifeless torpor from cold, sorrow, and fatigue, but even in it the loved remains were pressed to her aching bosom, and cherished by her arms from the air. I called upon her, but she could make me no answer. I looked in her face, the paleness of death was there, and her eyes were closed, but she breathed.

"Heavens!" said I madly, "not all—not all at one fell swoop!" and releasing the box from her embrace, I chafed her hands and temples with snow till she again showed signs of animation, and at length recovered, when I put round her the cloak which I had hitherto worn to conceal my burden.

"Oh, let me die, dear Edmund!" she exclaimed faintly, "it would have been mercy to have let me glide into eternity with my babe in my arms. I cannot indeed go on; I cannot witness it. Receive my blessing with my last breath and the thanks and deepest gratitude of a broken heart, but oh! let me die here, and now, and be laid with my babe."

"Nay, nay, dear Mariamne!" I answered; "rise, rise! take my arm, and let us move forward. You must live—I hope long and happily; but you must live to make peace for your broken and contrite spirit, for the sake of those to whom you are most dear. Come, let me assist you; the night wears apace, and the storm is coming stronger. Come, Mariamne, have hope and courage!" And with the coffin slung round me, I supported her almost unmoving frame to the sad spot.

"Sit here, Mariamne, on this tree," I said, "while I seek to complete what is wanting."

"No, Edmund!" she answered: "I will kneel down and pray for blessings on you and forgiveness for myself!" And in spite of my entreaties she knelt down, hardly suffering me to place my friar's capote between her and the snow, and prayed and sobbed out the tearings of a warm though withering heart. Long was it ere I could rid the earth of its inclement covering, and prepare the narrow house of death for its young and guiltless tenant. But I accomplished it, and sighing one deep sigh over it, and shedding one cold tear into it, I turned to Mariamne, who gazed through her devotions unseemingly upon my work.

"It is done now!" said I, "it is done!"

"Done!" said she dreamingly, "Oh! then, the moment is now come! Farewell, my bootless, lifeless, care! Farewell my dearly loved, dearer bought child of sorrow and guilt. My hope, my shame, my joy, and my disgrace, farewell! Never again will the sun play upon thy little brow of innocence; thou art death's! and the grave and corruption will soon be thine! But at least the world cannot now point at thee, and taunt thee with thy mother's frailty! Thou art saved the pangs of living on the charity of hatred, and being a mark in the world for the cold and the rain! Farewell! thy spirit is with its kindred angels; and the chill of the world's neglect, colder far than the cold bed that will enwrap thy little frame, will never fall upon it. But oh! it is bitter—bitter to miss thee from the breast that has borne so much for thee! But it is bursting! bursting! my poor babe! and I will rejoice thee, and we will be separated no more! Death cannot compass the grave! Yes, I will nurture thee again in these arms; and see thy smiles, and love thee, and watch over thee, where the world cannot rail, nor the finger of scorn be pointed!"

"For God's sake, Mariamne!" I exclaimed, "be calm," for I feared she was raving. "Morning will soon be here; let us finish!" And she answered me—coldly and wildly, "Be it so!" Then I knelt by her side, and placing the coffin on the brink of the grave, we laid our hands on it; and amid the waving of the wind, the hissing of the snow as it was blown among the trees, and the groans of the disconsolate mother, I prayed a short prayer in poor Mariamne's own Frieslandic. "Amen!" I said, and she tried to repeat it, but her voice failed her; and while I lowered the little ark into its cold chamber, and hastily covered it with the frozen mould and snow, Mariamne, the most beautiful of the Frieslandic relics of the Grecian women, fell senseless on my bosom, and was pressed, unconscious, to a heart bleeding and breaking for her.

AMERICA AND THE AMERICANS.

NO. VII. AND LAST.

In seasons of peril the energy of a superior mind is an inspiration all men willingly obey. Smith now became virtually the director of the Colonists, diffused his own activity about him, and by his persuasions, remonstrances, and example, stimulated them to pursue the measures requisite for their safety, with somewhat of his own intrepid zeal. Leaving them to convert the rank grass they had been mowing into thatch, to build houses, and to cover them, he undertook to descend the river in a boat, with six men, in quest of food. Arriving at a village on the water's edge, they began to parley with the savages, who, in scornful allusion to the miserable condition of the colonists, offered handfuls of corn in exchange for their muskets, swords, or apparel. A show of force became necessary; at the report of a musket the natives vanished into the woods, and Smith and his crew entered their village to search for corn. While busily employed in collecting it, a band of sixty savages, their bodies painted with divers gaudy colours, and armed with bows, huge clubs, and round targets made of bark, was seen advancing with frightful yells and a decided step, bearing before them their Okee, "an idol made with skins, stuffed with moss, all painted, and hanged with copper." A volley of musketry, charged with small shot, wounded several, and so alarmed the rest, that in their panic they abandoned their Okee, which Smith was fortunate enough to get. A messenger soon appeared to offer peace and redeem the idol, but Smith would only consent to the latter, provided they would send six of their people, unarmed, to load his boat with provisions. The condition was complied with, the Okee restored, and Smith returned to Jamestown with ample stores of corn, venison, and wild-fowl. Having secured this important object, he next turned his attention to the discovery of the surrounding country, and the opinion of friendly communication with the savages. On his return from one of several excursions undertaken in this view, he was shocked to find the colony, for whose benefit he was exposing himself to so many toils and dangers, brought by its own distractions to the very brink of ruin. Wingfield and Kendall, taking advantage of his absence, and the insubordination and discontent caused by the president's inefficiency, had formed a plan to seize the pinnace, which Smith had fitted out for a trading voyage, and escape to England. At this critical moment the latter appeared with his characteristic promptness; he turned the guns of the fort upon the pinnace, and threatened to sink her, if not immediately surrendered by the crew. Kendall lost his life in the affair, and the rest, overawed by Smith's determination, immediately submitted. The winter had now set in, bringing with it, not privations, but unwonted luxuries to the colonists, who regaled themselves on the prodigious quantities of wild fowl which crowded the creeks and rivers, besides venison, "good bread, Virginian pease, pumpions, putchamins, and fish." This good cheer, a most tranquillizing rhetoric in all circumstances of life, operated so kindly on the spirits of the colonists, that not even the most "Tufastific humourists desired to goe for England." Still their querulousness was not entirely soothed; for though they had been mainly indebted to the foresight and firmness of Smith for their actual prosperity, no sooner did this indefatigable man relax a little from his wonted activity, than murmurs and "idle exceptions" followed. Even the council condescended to adopt them, and complained of his not having explored the head of the river Chickahaminy, which he had recently discovered. The idea of finding a communication with the South Sea was not only a dominant one with the company at home, but engrossed the attention of the colonists much more than the far more important concerns which their own safety and even existence prescribed. Yielding to a feeling which, if repugnant to his better judgment, at least accorded with his love of enterprise, Smith manned the barge, proceeded up the river as high as the bushes and overarching trees would let him, and then went on shore with two of his men, and two Indians to serve as guides. He had previously moored the barge in a safe spot, and given strict orders to the crew on no pretence whatever to leave it. No sooner, however had he gone than some of the men landed. The consequence was, they were surprised, one of them made prisoner, and forced to reveal the direction in which Smith had gone. A party of three hundred natives, headed by Bepechamcough, their chief, was sent in pursuit of him, and surprised his two companions and slew them; in this dilemma, Smith, calm and intrepid as usual, had recourse to a singular expedient. Seizing one of his guides, he tied him with his garters to one arm for a buckler, while with the other he cut down his pursuers. Unhappily, in attempting to reach the barge, he slipped with his savage into an oozy creek, where he remained until completely benumbed, and incapable of farther defence. After receiving a promise that his life should be spared, he threw away his arms and surrendered.

THE BEDOUIN ARABS OF THE DESERT.

So many romantic and contradictory tales have been propagated about these Arabs, that the following faithful narrative of an eye witness, M. Deportes, Equerry to his Majesty the King of the French, may be acceptable to our readers; for many travellers have only copied from others, and few have actually lived amongst the Bedouins, as it requires more than ordinary courage to do so.

The arrival of an Arabian horde in the desert is a very extraordinary sight. First appear a few horsemen on their mares sweeping along like the wind, armed with long lances, encircling in a gallop the place where they intend to halt; and each individual chooses a particular spot, according to his own fancy, and immediately drives his lance into the ground, in order to fasten his horse to it as a sign that he will pitch his tent there. A great many Arabs are then seen advancing in the distance, some on horses, but most on camels; and, farther off still, is a formidable army, marching along, pêle mêle, and at a rapid rate. These are the Arabian families and the main body of the tribe, with their tents, baggage, and camels. Those camels which convey the families are accounted according to the wealth of the owner. That of the Sheik carries a sort of palanquin in the shape of a canoe, placed at length, open in front to direct the animal, and containing three or four women and children in a state of nudity. Each family proceeds to the spot where the avant-courier has pitched his lance; and in a few moments afterwards a town appears to have been built. Naked children are seen running about, and gambolling in the water wherever they can find a ditch.

The camp is pitched without the least regularity; save that the tent of the Sheik is in the centre, and is distinguished from the others by its magnitude. They are all made of camel or goat skins, without elegance or neatness, and fastened each upon two poles about six feet high. The interior is divided by a carpet—one side for the women, and the other for the men. The furniture consists of a few carpets: straw or reed mats, which serve as a bed; and rude stools. The most necessary articles for cooking are a large iron pot, wooden plates, zinc cups, copper coffee pots, and casks fabricated of camel-skins.

Their toilet is as simple as their cooking utensils. The men wear a long wide shirt, until it actually becomes rotten; nor do they take it off save at night, when they lie upon it. They go bare-footed, and never leave their tents unarmed. Their weapons consist of a sword, a bad gun, and a lance,—or axes, hammers, clubs, and anything with which they may destroy life.

The women wear a long shift of blue linen, and a black veil, drawn in a knot under the nose, and falling down upon their body. They often let it fall to exhibit a large ring drawn through the right nostril, and fastened with a chain to the temple. They are fond of showing their lips, which are painted with blue colour; and they have several figures daubed upon their chins and necks. They never leave their tents uncovered. They are above the middle height, and walk majestically: their black eyes are very beautiful; their nose is well formed, but the remainder of their face is disfigured by scars and different marks. Their hands and arms are well-modelled; but their feet are rather wide, never having been compressed with shoes.

The children walk about naked, the boys only wearing a narrow leathern belt tightly laced round their bodies. This custom originated in the idea that the girdle makes the boys strong and fast runners, and that they do not require so much food as they would without it. The men also wear this belt. There are few instances of deformity amongst the children of the Arabs. They are very hardy, are exposed to a burning sun, without injury, during the whole day, and practise the use of the lance and athletic exercises.

The women direct the household, and weave or spin the cloth; but the economy of the kitchen does not occupy much of their time as the Arabs, although particularly voracious when they have an opportunity of exercising their gluttonous propensities, mostly live upon meagre fare, their meals usually consisting of a pilau of red rice with melted butter. During the dinner, sour milk, dates, honey, &c., are sometimes added. The women grind the grain in clumsy handmills: the bread is baked upon iron plates, and resembles a flat cake. The women have also to fetch the water, which is sometimes procured from a great distance; but the Arabs are disgustingly economical of this article in respect to its outward application to their flesh.

They are very superstitious, but much less religious than the Ottomans. Many, however, observe the Ramadan; they all pray in company, ranged in a long line, with a leader at their head; and this individual makes the most horrible grimaces that can be conceived. Their wealth consists of camels and horses, but no cows; they have however a few herds of sheep and goats, which, together with their camels, supply them with milk.

The Arabs certainly possess the finest race of horses known to us; but such a mass of nonsense, such erroneous and romantic stories have been promulgated with respect to the Arab's horse, that it would be difficult to enable the reader to see through the dark mists of untruth; plain facts shall therefore now be alone stated.

The Arabian horses in general come from the district of Nedjid, and are generally called Nedji. A more noble race is called Koelan; and this is divided into five different families, supposed to have sprung from the five Blessed Messias of the Prophet: their names are Tonnand, Gilpha, Maregina, Pedia, and Seclacoa. Besides these, there is a number of other equestrian families too difficult to enumerate. There are no certain signs by which the distinction between a Nedji or Koelan is to be recognised; and the most intelligent Arabs have declared that they themselves cannot tell the difference, unless the origin of the dam be known to them. The Arabs have no strict record, as has been asserted in the English Sporting Magazines; nor do they summon a number of witnesses when a foal is born.

The Arabs generally ride without a bridle: a halter, with a nose-band covered with iron, serves them instead; and, in lieu of saddles, their noble coursers have only pieces of wadded linen upon their backs, with two nooses for stirrups. The horses are, moreover, seldom shod on the hind feet. At night, so far from being admitted into the tents of their masters, the poor animals are fastened by one leg to a string communicating with the poles that support the frail tenement.

A few of the Arab horses remind the European spectator of English thorough-breeds, and are much more active and pleasant to ride, when broken in a little: but the hyperbolic extremes to which it is the fashion to extend in describing the good qualities of the Arabian horses, are perfectly absurd. The real value of an Arab horse is doubtfully ascertained when under the hammer at Tattersall's!

REVIEWS.

The Temperance Messenger. No. XII. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

THE first volume of this excellent periodical is now complete, with preface, title-page, and copious index. The current number contains some good papers, amongst which "A Hint to Temperance Societies" is the best. We cordially agree with the writer of this article, "that some means should be adopted for the employment of that spare time which was formerly spent in the public-house." Altogether, this is an useful publication.

Temperance Rhymes. By THOMAS DEXTER. [London: J. Pasco.

THE dedication to the Right Honourable Earl Stanhope, President of the British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, is the best part of this publication. The sentiment expressed in the words, "When your Lordship shall be called upon to lay down your earthly coronet, it shall only be by way of exchange for one that is incorruptible," is highly creditable to the writer. We wish we could pass the same eulogium upon the hymns, which are miserably defective in the mechanical combinations necessary to constitute even mere verse. Some of the ideas are good; but the incorrectness of the metre, and the defective state of the rhymes, ruin their embodiment in verse. If Mr. Dexter would confine himself to prose, he might prove of considerable service to the cause of Total Abstinence.

Lee's Book for all Seasons; a Holiday Offering for Youth of both Sexes. 1 Vol. 16mo. pp. 200. London: J. Cleave.

THIS pretty little "Forget me not," for the working classes, contains some beautiful literary contributions, and a number of embellishments very neatly executed. "The Preacher's Widow" is a sweet tale: "The Man Hunter" is a narrative of soul-harrowing interest: and "The Love-Devil" is a pleasant Scandinavian legend. The work is well-got up, and its extreme cheapness—eighteen-pence—will doubtless ensure it an extensive sale. We extract the following tale as a specimen of the nature of its general contents:—

THE THREE THIEVES.

A FEW years ago there were three thieves in the vicinity of Lan, whose joint talents had for some time put both laity and clergy under contribution. Two of them were brothers, called Hamet and Bernard. Their father, who had followed the same profession, ended his days on the gallows, the common fate of talents so employed. The name of the other was Travers. One thing in their favour was, they never committed murder, but were satisfied with picking pockets, and such like depredation, in which their address was almost incredible.

One day, when they were all three walking in a wood, near Lan, their conversation fell on their own exploits; and Hamet, the elder of the two brothers, spying a magpie's nest, with the bird in it, at the top of a large oak, said to his brother Bernard, "If any body were to propose to you to take the eggs from under that bird, without disturbing her, what would you say?"

"I should say," replied the young one, "he was mad, and required an impossibility."

"I would have you to know then," replied Hamet, "that one not able to do that must be an awkward hand at picking a pocket; look at me."

So saying, he immediately climbed up the tree, got to the nest, and opening it gently at the bottom, caught the eggs one by one, as they slid out, and brought them down, boasting that not one was broken.

"Faith it must be owned that you are an incomparable fellow," cried Bernard: "and now if you can put the eggs under the bird again, as you took them out, you may fairly call yourself our superior."

Hamet accepted the challenge, and mounted again; but this was only a trick of Bernard's, for when he saw him at a certain height, he said to Travers,—

"Now you have seen what my brother can do, you shall have a touch of my art," and instantly mounted after Hamet, followed him from branch to branch, and while the other glided along like a serpent, with his eyes intently fixed on the nest, watching the slightest motion of the bird, that he might not frighten her, the adroit rogue untied his drawers, and returned with them in his hand, as a trophy of his victory. In the meanwhile, Hamet, having replaced the eggs, came down, expecting the praises due to such an exploit.

"That's a good one," said Bernard, laughing, "to attempt to impose upon us! I'll lay a wager he has them hid in his drawers."

The eldest looking down, found they were gone, and immediately knew it was a trick of his brother's. "He is a clever thief indeed who can rob another."

As for Travers, he so equally admired the two heroes, that he was doubtful which merited the palm. But so much address humbled him; and, mortified to think he was not qualified to enter the lists with them, he said,—

"Gentlemen, you know too much for me, for you would escape twenty times, where I should always be taken. I see I am too awkward ever to succeed in this occupation, therefore I will renounce it, and take to my own again, live with my wife, and work hard: and I hope, by the blessing of God, we shall not want."

He really returned to the village, as he said; his wife was very fond of him, he became a very honest man, and worked so hard, that, in a few months, he was able to buy a pig, and fatten it at home. At Christmas he killed it, and as is usual, hung it up by the feet against a wall, and went to his work in the fields. It had been lucky for him if he had sold it, and saved all the trouble and anxiety it gave him, as you will see.

Just after he had gone out, the two brothers, who had not seen him since the day they had parted, came to pay him a visit. His wife was alone, busily employed in spinning. She told them that her husband was out, and would not return till the evening. You may well suppose that the pig did not escape their watchful eyes; and when they left the house they said to each other—"So, so,—this rogue has a mind to regale himself, and not invite us. As that is the case, we must carry off the pig, and eat it without him." They then laid their plan, and went and hid themselves in a neighbouring hedge till night.

When Travers returned in the evening, his wife told him of her strange visitors. "They were such ill-looking fellows," said she, "that I was frightened, being alone, and durst not ask either their names or business. They pryed about everywhere, and I don't believe a single nail escaped them."

"Alas! these are my two roguish companions," cried Travers, dolefully. "The pig is gone, that's certain:—oh, that I had but sold it!"

"There's still one way to save it," said the wife, "let us take it down from the hook, and hide it somewhere for the night. To-morrow, as soon as it is light, we will consider what further to do with it."

Travers followed his wife's advice, took down the bacon, laid it on the floor at the other end of the room, and put the kneading-trough over it. He then went to bed, but not without anxiety. At midnight, the brothers came to put their scheme in execution. The elder kept watch, while Bernard bored a hole in the wall opposite the place where piggy had hung, but he soon found out there was nothing left but the string.—"The bird is flown," said he,— "we are come too late."

Travers, whom the fear of being robbed kept in continual alarm, and hindered from sleeping, thinking he heard a noise, awakened his wife, and ran to the trough, to see if the pig was there. It was: but having also fears about his poultry-loft, he set off thither, armed with a hatchet. Bernard, who heard him go out, took advantage of it directly to pick the lock of the door; and going softly up to the bed, said to the wife, counterfeiting the voice of the husband,—

"Mary, the bacon is not on the wall—what have you done with it?"

"What have you forgot," replied the woman, "that we hid it under the kneading-trough!—has fear turned your brain?"

"No, no," said he; "but I had forgot it,—do you lie still—I'll go and take care of it." Saying this, he took the pig on his shoulders, and carried it off.

When Travers had gone his round, and well secured all his doors, he came back.

"It must be owned," said his wife, "I have a husband with a poor memory! Why you forgot just now, where you had put the pig?"

These words made Travers roar again—"I said it would be so! I knew they would steal it! it's gone! I shall never see it more!"

In the midst of these lamentations however, it struck him that the thieves could not have gone far with their prize in the time; so he posted after them directly, with some hope of recovering the pig. The rogues had taken a bye-path across the fields, that went straight to the wood, where they hoped to hide their prey more securely. Hamet went first, to make sure of the road; and his brother, who walked slower, on account of the weight, followed at some distance. Travers soon overtook him, and, knowing him immediately, said, imitating the tone of voice of the elder brother—"Come, you must be tired; give it me to carry in my turn."

Bernard, who thought it was his brother, gave Travers the pig, and went on in front, but had scarcely gone a hundred paces, when, to his great astonishment, he met with Hamet.

"Zoons!" said he, "I have been trapped: that rogue Travers has played me a trick. But never mind, you shall see I know how to repair a blunder."

So saying, he stripped himself put his shirt over his clothes, made up something like a woman's night-cap on his head, and thus equipped, ran full speed by another path to Travers's house, and waited for him at the door; but when he saw him coming, he went forth to meet him, as if it was his wife, and, counterfeiting her voice, asked him if he had got the pig again.

"Yes, yes, I have," replied the husband.

"That's well! Come, give it to me, I'll carry it in; and do you run to the roost, for I have heard a noise there, and am afraid they are breaking in."

Travers himself put the animal upon his shoulder, and set off a new round, to see that all things were safe. When he returned he was surprised to find his wife in bed, crying, and very much alarmed; and then found out that they had deceived him again. He determined, however, not to be baffled so; and, as if his honour was concerned in the affair, swore not to give it up till some how or other, he was victorious. He rather doubted if the thieves, this time, would take the same road; but rightly suspected that the forest being for them the nearest place of safety, they would go there, as before; in fact they were there already; and eager to taste their prize, had lighted a fire at the foot of an oak to broil some steaks: the wood was green, and burnt ill, so, to mend it they went to pick some dry leaves and sticks. Travers, who had easily found the rogues, by the light of the fire, took advantage of their absence to strip himself entirely, climb up a tree, and suspend himself by his arms like a person hanging: and when the thieves returned, and were busily employed in blowing the fire, he roared out, in a sepulchral voice,— "Wretches, you will end your days as I did!"

They firmly believed it to be their father's voice, and, frightened out of their wits, thought of nothing but running away. The other took up his clothes and ran in great haste, and returned in triumph to relate his victory to his wife who embraced and congratulated him on this bold and dexterous exploit.

"Don't let us flatter ourselves too soon, the knaves are not far off: and as long as the pig remains here I shall be in a fright, so heat some water, we'll cook it; then let them come—I'll defy them to get it."

One lighted the fire, and the other cut up the pig, and put it in the cauldron in large pieces, then they both sat down in the corner to watch it. Travers, who was much fatigued with his labour and anxiety all night, soon became drowsy, and his wife said to him, "You go to bed. I'll watch the boiler, and as every place is well secured, there's nothing to fear: at all events, if I hear any noise, I can wake you."

On this assurance he threw himself on the bed in his clothes, and soon fell asleep. His wife continued to watch the cauldron for some time, but at last grew drowsy, and fell fast asleep in the chair.

During this time the thieves recovered from their first alarm, had returned to the oak, and not finding either the man hanging, or the pig, easily divined the real truth of the matter. They would have thought themselves disgraced for ever if Travers, in this skirmish of stratagems, had gained the victory, and went back again to the house, fully determined to exert their utmost dexterity in the art of thieving, in one great final effort.

Before they laid their plan, Bernard looked through the hole he had made in the wall, to know if the enemy were on their guard. He saw on one side Travers stretched upon the bed, and on the other his wife, with a ladle in her hand, and her head waving backwards and forwards, asleep, close to the fire, and the bacon boiling in the pot.

"They are willing to save us the trouble of cooking," said Bernard to his brother, "though after all it is no—" hing but their fear of us made 'em dress it. Do you remain quiet; I'll engage you shall eat some of it yet." He then went and cut a long pole, made it sharp at one end, and, getting on the roof of the house, thrust it down the chimney, stuck it into one of the pieces of meat, and drew it up. It happened that Travers at that moment awoke, and saw the manœuvre. He considered that, with such skillful enemies, peace was better for him than war; and finding it would be useless to contest any longer which had the most cunning, he opened the door, and invited them to come in and feast; so they all sat down to table, quite reconciled and cordial together.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

SHREWSBURY.

In No. 23 of The Teetotaler we noticed the first meeting which was held by the friends of the doctrine of Total Abstinence, at the Mechanics' Institute, over the Corn Exchange, at Shrewsbury. The second Teetotal Assembly took place a short time since, and a gentleman of the name of BAXTER, delivered a most excellent lecture upon the subject. A most disgraceful scene however occurred upon the occasion, the particulars of which are thus related by a correspondent of the Shrewsbury Chronicle—

"For nearly an hour the audience seemed very attentive, and to enter much into the views of the speaker, when some voice was heard towards the lower end of the room, attended by a striking of the partition wall, evidently with the intention of disturbing the meeting: then several voices were heard, and a commotion commenced so loud that the speaker was obliged to sit down, and Mr. Brown, the chairman, stood up and requested them, in a respectful and friendly manner, not to disturb the order of the meeting, stating, that if they had any objection to make he would be glad to hear them at its close. This reasonable proposal had not the desired effect then, but after a little, order was again restored, and Mr. Baxter proceeded to conclude his lecture. Meantime I was informed that the parties who had given the annoyance had retired to the Plough public house, to prepare for another rally on the meeting, by supplying themselves with intoxicating potations, some menials and such weapons as would best suit their disgraceful purpose: when another interruption, still more disorderly than the first took place." The whole party linked together at the door of the Hall, and made a violent rush towards the platform; the voice of the Advocate was completely drowned in the noise occasioned by the upsetting of benches, the tumbling of persons trying to get from them, and the screams of females rushing towards the chair for protection. Fortunately I had advised my wife to remove to a front bench a few minutes before, knowing her nervous disposition, or the consequence to her might have been more serious. The most intense enquiry was then making, in order to ascertain who were the promoters of conduct so brutal, immoral, and illegal. One said 'the Factory lads,' another said 'they were sailors,' but what was my surprise when I learned that the chief movers in the scene were persons who, if they are not the defenders of peace and order, at least, I presume, they would wish to be thought respectable, from the stations they hold in society. will here give their names, and leave the public to decide:—Mr. John Eddowes and Son, booksellers; with Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Hunt, their servants; Mr. Hughes, wine merchant; Mr. Scoltock, grocer; Mr. Devereux; and other persons employed by them as lacqueys. At the conclusion of the meeting the Christian Doxology, which is always sung at Temperance Meetings, was chorussed by the intruding party with the profane song—'Well all get drunk together,' alternately swearing and using most impious execrations. How those gentlemen feel after such an outrage on common decency, I leave to their own private reflections; but this I would wish them to know, that those very factory lads and sailors who were at first expected to have been the cause, to their honour be it spoken, cried 'shame' at their conduct." It appears that three of the drunken brawlers are opulent tradesmen:—viz, Messrs. J. Eddowes, Hughes, and Scoltock. A few days previous to this disgraceful scene, Mr. Hughes had followed the remains of his brother to the grave. If these fellows (for we can call them by no other name) imagine that their brutal and degrading conduct can be justified even by the plea of difference of opinion, they are very much mistaken. No respectable persons, however much they may be opposed to the doctrine of Teetotalism, will countenance such proceedings as these; and we only hope that the inhabitants of Shrewsbury will testify their disgust at the behaviour of these shameless individuals.

YORK.

The Temperance cause progresses most favourably in this city. A tent of the United Order of Female Rechabites has just been opened there by Mr. C. F. HANBY, chief ruler of the East Riding District, whose noble exertions in the cause of Teetotalism cannot be too greatly extolled.

LAUNCESTON (CORNWALL).

Several highly interesting meetings have been held at this place, since we last noticed the proceedings of its Teetotal Society. Mr. MUDGE, a surgeon of Bodmin, has taken a most active part in these assemblies, and has delivered, amongst others, a powerful lecture upon the evil effects of the use of tobacco. Mr. THRELKONER of Falmouth, also lectured at Launceston with considerable success. He took an opportunity of especially praising the Independent order of Rechabites, one of the first tents of which fraternity was established at Launceston. The advocates of the Teetotal Society of this town, have commenced the winter campaign, by dispersing themselves amongst the adjacent villages and hamlets, where they successfully wage a war of extermination against the principles of intemperance.

The Literary and Scientific Institution, connected with the Teetotal Society of Launceston, has concluded its course of lectures for the summer. The progress of these lectures has been productive of the most beneficial effects.

CALLINGTON (CORNWALL).

Mr. PEARSE, a surgeon of Launceston, lately delivered a lecture upon the physiological effects of intemperance, to the teetotalers of this place. A gentleman, whose name has not reached us, rose to oppose him, and was completely beaten. Mr. Pearse is a gentleman of considerable intellectual acquirements, and a staunch friend to the cause of Teetotalism.

GLASGOW.

The rise and progress of Temperance in this city afford a strong proof of the inefficacy of mere moderation doctrines, and the excellence of the principles of total abstinence. The Temperance or Moderation Society of Glasgow, after numbering eight thousand members beneath its banners, fell off, and died of pure inanition about a year ago. Societies on the principle of total abstinence have been founded, and their numerical strength consists of fifty thousand members; viz, thirty-five thousand Roman Catholics, and fifteen thousand Protestants. The city is divided into districts, in each of which one or more weekly public meetings are held. The weekly increase of Protestant members is about two hundred and fifty, and that of the Catholics five hundred. There are about fifteen or sixteen large Temperance Coffee-houses in Glasgow, which can now boast of upwards of two thousand reformed drunkards. Occasional soirées are given for the benefit of the funds of the Teetotal Societies. On the whole, the cause is progressing as favourably at Glasgow as in any other part of the United Kingdom.

SUNDERLAND.

Mr. W. PEARL, the Deputy District Ruler, has lately opened a tent of the Independent order of Rechabites in this town, where Mr. T. WILKS has also founded a similar institution with considerable success, and to the unfeigned satisfaction of numbers of the resident miners. A female tent has also been opened at Sunderland, under the denomination of the "Rising Sun." The Arcade Temperance Hotel, at the same place, can moreover now boast of its Rechabite tent, which was lately founded there by Mr. R. P. Kay, the District Chief Ruler.

LEICESTER.

The December number of the Temperance Messenger, which represents the South Midland Temperance Association, contains the following interesting article, by which it will be perceived that a Bazaar, for the benefit of that society, is to be shortly established at Leicester. Speaking of the next delegates' meeting, it says:—

"We no sooner close our report of one of these most delightful and important gatherings than it becomes our duty to call attention to its successor. While the happy feelings engendered by the Wellingborough convention still animate our souls, we are also inspired with new hopes in reference to the contemplated LEICESTER assemblage. We have only time to remind all our brethren that Tuesday, the 29th of December, is the day fixed for the meeting, and that we are to meet, 'for dispatch of business,' at nine o'clock in the morning! We are not in a capacity to say what arrangements will be made by our Leicester friends, but rejoice to know that they are alive to the importance of the occasion. A large number of ladies are 'busy as bees' preparing for the Bazaar, and our 'brethren' too, are 'wide awake' about the matter.

"In other places the matter has been taken up with considerable zeal. We believe that it is intended to engage the New Hall in Wellington-street for the bazaar and other meetings; and we would just suggest to our Leicester friends, the propriety of getting up a very large Tea Party on the Tuesday Afternoon. As we begin business early, there will be more time for a recreation of this kind; and if a grand concert is got up, it may be made to realize a good sum towards the expense of the hall. The bazaar should be opened on Tuesday morning, and kept open, if possible, the remainder of the week; and, in order to keep the town teetotally alive, it would be well if a series of public meetings could be held to the close of the week."

WIGAN (LANCASHIRE).

A BRANCH of the Rev. T. MATHEW's society has been formed in this town by the Rev. THOMAS DILWORTH and the Rev. EDWARD MORRIS, who have accepted the offices of Vice-Presidents. This new Catholic Association already numbers about twelve hundred members; and it is expected that these will have increased to two thousand by Christmas.

TOWN NEWS.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Wednesday Evening, Dec. 9th.

Mr. BENSTAD, upon taking the chair, observed that the honour of so frequently presiding at the meetings of that society, at the Aldersgate-street chapel, was rather forced upon than sought by him, although he was ever ready to exert himself to the utmost in the cause of Teetotalism, which was the only doctrine calculated to effect the regeneration of a degraded nation. He had now been a Teetotaler for upwards of six months, and most unquestionably had experienced the good effects of the principle in himself, and had witnessed its cheering results in others.

Mr. CRUMP (the registrar) gave an account of his campaigns in the Peninsula, and narrated how his hopes of promotion had been frequently defeated in consequence of his intemperate habits at that period. He interspersed his history with a variety of interesting anecdotes and observations, and declared that he had never fully experienced the true enjoyment of the mens conscia recti until he had become a convert to the doctrines of Total Abstinence.

Mr. FULLER, a large landholder in the Isle of Ely, said that he had come up to London for the express purpose of hiring some Teetotal servants and labourers. He gave an interesting account of the Teetotal Irish labourers who dwelt in the vicinity of his property, and delighted the audience with a description of the kind feeling which existed between them and their employers, who were also disciples of Teetotalism.

Mr. BENWELL addressed the meeting upon the generally beneficial effects of Teetotalism.

Mr. MAX (of the Kensington Branch) made an admirable speech upon the happy application of the doctrine of total abstinence to the interests, the health, the patriotism, the morals, and the religion, of the community at large.

Mr. DEXTER promised to address the audience at greater length at the next meeting, as it was then late. He however made a few striking remarks upon the progress and utility of the principle he had come thither to advocate.

"In obedience to the wishes of our respected friend, Mr. BENSTAD, we beg to suggest to the members of the United Temperance Association, the propriety of assembling a little earlier at the Chapel, on the Wednesday and Saturday evenings.

Saturday, Dec. 12th.

The meeting at the Aldersgate-street Chapel, was as usual, well attended on this occasion.

Mr. CRUMP (the registrar) upon taking the chair; expressed his regrets that certain individuals, who called themselves Teetotalers, should oppose the United Temperance Association. He said that such men could not possibly have signed the pledge from purely moral motives. They had evidently done so from interested views. He then ably expatiated upon the effects of alcohol, which he denominated a slow but certain poison.

Mr. G. W. M. RAYNOLDS next addressed the meeting. He regretted that for the past few weeks he had not been able to attend the meetings at the Aldersgate Chapel; but stated his intention of regularly appearing upon the platform in future. He then addressed the audience in a speech which forms the subject of the Leading Article of this week's number of The Teetotaler. (See LEADING ARTICLE).

Mr. HOCKINGS observed that the object of the United Temperance Association was a good one, and would ultimately succeed in accomplishing all its aims, if properly conducted. He then took a general view of the direful effects of spirit-drinking, and stated many instances which had come under his own immediate knowledge.

Mr. JOHNSON next addressed the audience with his usual eloquence and spirit. He impressed upon the minds of those present the necessity of renewed exertions in the Teetotal cause, and pledged himself to support the principle until his death. He concluded an energetic address, by enforcing the necessity of union.

CATHOLIC SOUTH LONDON TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

This Association will hold a grand meeting in the Temperance Hall, Saint George's Road, near the Elephant and Castle, on Tuesday evening, December 22nd, on which occasion, Mr. G. C. SMITH, whom we are happy to find emancipated from the Queen's Bench, will deliver a lecture upon the drinking customs in prisons. The chief design of this lecture will be to induce Teetotal societies to memorialize the Home Secretary in order that the laws against the introduction of spirituous liquors into prisons may be strictly enforced.

THE PROGRESS OF INTEMPERANCE;

DEVELOPED IN THE LIFE OF A WORKING-MAN.

Such is the title of the series of illustrations presented gratis with this journal. And what subject is fraught with more important considerations for the moralist, the politician, and the philanthropist, than the welfare of the working classes? Until the light of Teetotalism shone upon this nation, the existence of the working classes was characterised principally by one demoralizing and ruinous habit—intemperance; and the life of one man told that of another, so few were the exceptions from the general rule,—so rare were instances of sobriety,—and so very, very scarce were examples of total abstinence. The lives of the working-men and their families were passed away in the necessary toils of their occupations, and the drunken revelry of the tap-room. Intellectual pursuits were almost unknown among them; and their ignorance was as fertile a source of immorality and actual crime, as their intemperate habits. Then came the well-meaning but mistaken men, who founded the old Temperance Societies, with their moderation-doctrine, which aimed only to check and not to extirpate the evil. Experience soon demonstrated the inefficacy of this principle; and the philanthropists of Preston founded those Teetotal Associations which have already reclaimed so many thousands of degraded drunkards, prevented such multitudes from becoming so, and taught a doctrine which will supersede even the chance of rising generations falling into the erroneous ways of their ancestors.

To advocate this grand principle of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors,—to prove the truth of the doctrine "that nothing but Teetotalism can cure the drunkard, or prevent the moderate drinker from becoming one,"—to impress upon the minds of men that inebriating potations neither afford nutriment, health, nor true happiness,—to keep before the eyes of our fellow-countrymen the appalling fact that intemperance alone supports the scaffold, the hulks, the penal settlements, the penitentiaries, the hospitals, the lunatic-asylums, the workhouses, and the pawnbrokers' establishments—and to induce the world to abandon a habit which possesses principles of evil a thousand times more than commensurate with the trifling pleasure afforded at the time by the unnatural excitement and brutal recklessness produced by intoxicating liquors,—for these objects has The Teetotaler been established. The aim of the journal is purely philanthropic,—the morality it teaches is in strict accordance with the ethics of the Christian religion,—and the information it seeks to convey through the medium of its columns, is of an useful and beneficial kind. Its tales of fiction invariably contain some moral of utility; and every branch of the great question of Teetotalism, whether in reference to science or to the nature of humanity, is in its turn considered and explained. But the tastes of all classes of readers incline to variety; and that journal will prove the most effective and the most truly useful, which, by skillfully adapting itself or its circumstances to the inclinations of its audience, in a proper manner, conveys its opinion or its doctrines in the most striking forms. The praiseworthy taste for pictorial embellishments,—a taste which argues well in favour of the improved state of intellect brought about by the principles of Teetotalism,—suggested to us the propriety of placing the evils of intemperance in a striking and popular shape before the public, and hence the series of six plates, which have already been published with this journal, and which have borne the title at the head of these observations. Let us consider those six illustrations of the career of the drunkard seriatim, and in reference to the train of thought which those lithographic drawings are calculated to awaken in the mind of all those whose intellectual capacities are not altogether destroyed by the habit of inveterate intemperance.

PLATE I.—We are here introduced to the hero of the pictorial narrative, in the printing establishment where he is an apprentice both to the business he has selected, and to the scenes of human life. We can conceive how his early days have been passed beneath the control of moral and industrious parents, otherwise he would not manifest that unfeigned aversion which we behold him display to the tempting liquor which is proffered him. Had he (which is too often the case) imbibed in his childhood a relish for the inebriating dram, either from the example or mistaken indulgence of his parents, he would not now have so strenuously resisted the persuasions of the wretches who are enticing him to take the first step towards years of intemperance. Here, then, we have a youth of sixteen or seventeen years of age—endowed with a personal appearance, which is a considerable auxiliary to success in this life, and possessing a countenance beaming with intelligence,—placed in the way of men whose vicious habits speedily communicate their pestilential infection to the pure and unsophisticated mind of that promising young man. While the more aged sinner, of the two tempters, is urging the poor youth to partake of the glass at which his innocent mind revolts, a younger but not less dangerous votary of intemperance assails his most vulnerable point, and attacks him with gibe and jeer. "Come, come, lad," says the former, who is probably the overseer in the establishment, "only just put your lips to the glass, it can't kill you, and is sure to do you good."

"I had much rather not," replies the youth. "I do not like the liquor, and am convinced that I am better without it."

"How do you ever expect to get on, unless you do as others do?" asks the second tempter. "Why, you will never be a man until you can take your glass with the best of us. A good-looking young fellow like you would soon be sought after, if you only got rid of these silly ideas and stupid squeamishness which your mamma and papa most likely taught you. Now then, be a man, and don't play the school-boy." These taunts produce the desired effect,—the vulnerable heel of Achilles is touched with the arrows which rebounded from every other part of the body,—the youth is laughed out of his good resolutions, from which no persuasion would probably have driven him, and that power is found to exist in ridicule which never would have been produced by entreaty. The youth is anxious "to be thought a man, and to do as others do," and he falls!

PLATE II.—Ce n'est que le premier pas qui compte,—"It is only the first false step which is accompanied by remorse," says the proverb; and the experience of individuals and of nations justifies the truth of this aphorism. Driven from the strongholds of his good resolutions by the almost irresistible weapons of ridicule, the effects of which are materially aided by his own conceit, the subject of our narrative is now seen wasting the most valuable time of his life in a skittle-ground attached to one of those vile dens, which bear the denomination of "public-houses." When the youth had once imbibed the first glass of intoxicating liquor, he was easily induced to repeat the dram on the following day. On the third he took it as a matter of course; on the fourth he inquired after it; and by the end of the week he himself went to the public house to fetch it. The road to ruin is rapid and easy; and when the first barrier is over-stepped there is none other to oppose the progress of the victim to the dark abyss to which its downward way conducts his steps. When once the youth is induced to enter the public-house, one half of his ruin is accomplished. He there hears obscene language, in which he joins because he is told that such conduct is manly. He is encouraged to drink with one and with another, who call themselves his friends: and he is taught to laugh at those who will not follow the same example. The publican himself affects to admire his proceedings. "This young fellow can take his glass with the best of them," will the wretch say; and this compliment obtains an order for "drams round." A game of skittles is proposed: the day is warm, and several pots of infamous beer are ordered. The stipend allowed the youth by his parents or his master is expended for the benefit of the publican; and another step towards the destruction of the victim is thus accomplished. The disgraceful scene is only interrupted by the entrance of the youth's master, with an officer of justice, to drag him away from that den of iniquity.

PLATE III.—The solemn lecture addressed to the youth by the magistrate into whose presence he is conducted, for having neglected his work, produces a good effect for a period. The lad is not hardened in crime; and were he removed from his dissipated companions, would still have retrieved his character and prospered. But he is sent back to the same workshop, where he meets with the same individuals who led him astray. "Evil communications corrupt good morals;" and the force of example once more induces our unfortunate hero to relapse to his former habits. He gradually becomes a more frequent visitor to the public-house, and the fawning civility of the landlord flatters his weak mind. "Oh! I felt convinced that you would not desert us," says the publican. "Come—I must stand a drop of something on this occasion. Give you like, and I know it's of no use to give you anything but the very best. It isn't every one that's no good a judge as you." These compliments, so admirably thrown out as a bait by the publican, and the proffered "treat" produce the desired effect. The youth considers himself bound in honour to return the landlord's civility; and fresh glasses are ordered. One or two of the youth's fellow compositors drop in at the moment; and the landlord is soon busily employed in drawing liquor for the whole party. When our hero's brain is heated by the inebriating draught, he begins to talk about the unkind treatment of his master in having him taken before a magistrate. The landlord instantly takes the youth's part. "Ah! it was a burning shame," he says, "and if he'd only dared to have served a son of mine so, I'd never have let my boy go back to the place again. Just because one chooses to take a little innocent recreation, one is to be treated in this way! It is shameful!" Our hero cordially assents to these observations of the landlord, who invariably encourages apprentices and subordinates to rebel against their masters; and fresh supplies of liquor are ordered. After having wasted two or three hours of valuable time and two or three shillings of useful money in the public-house, the young man returns to that work for which he has unfitted himself by his numerous potations. He then becomes a regular attendant at the public-house between twelve and one every day, and invariably has his seat kept for him in the parlour of an evening. The landlord allows him to incur a weekly bill, and when he alludes to him, calls him "that gentleman." The young man becomes pale and thin—the effects of gin and tobacco: he loses the fresh colours of youth, and is nervous and suicidally melancholy of a morning. He cannot commence his daily toil without a dram; and his eyes are red, his mouth parched, and his limbs quivering from the previous night's debauch. At length he is turned away from his place; and, with the few shillings remaining in his pocket, he hurries to drown his cares at a public-house. The landlord who has heard of the loss of his situation, requests payment of the current account, and declines opening a new one. He also forgets that the youth used to be desominated "a gentleman;" and when a pot of beer is ordered, he simply says, "Here, young fellow," and holds the pot in one hand until he receives the money for it in the other. The youth perceives this change of behaviour, and is galled by it: he accordingly spends all his money at the bar out of sheer bravado. The publican sees that all the young man's coin is rapidly cooing away, and only increases in early idleness. The young man remonstrates, and becomes turbulent. "Now I just tell you what it is, young chap," says the landlord, "I won't have any disorderly people in my house, and I have long disapproved of your conduct. A fellow like you, coming and giving himself such airs—I never heard such a thing! What the deuce do you think my house will be thought of, if I tolerate such worthless characters as you here?" Our hero recriminates in louder tones, and even his old associates, the very men who originally led him away, raise the cry of "Turn him out!" the hint is no sooner given, than the landlord hastens to put it into execution,—not, because the youth is really noisy, but because he has no money left in his pockets!

PLATE IV.—Two or three years we suppose to pass away between the episode described in the last plate and that which forms the subject of this. The altered appearance of the young man convinces us of this fact. In the mean-time his parents have probably died of a broken heart, occasioned by his vices and intemperance, and he is now expending the little they have left him in public-houses and with the most depraved characters. His associates are blacklegs, thieves, and women of the town, whose flaunting garb cannot conceal the deformities of minds abused by the horrible trade to which they have devoted the charms of their youth. Dressed out in the meretricious apparel, these depraved females exercise a certain magic over the minds of the young men who are unfortunate enough to fall within the scope of their spells, and our hero has now suffered himself to be drawn and within the reach of that fatal influence.

various species of bad company with which it is possible to associate, that of profligate women is the worst, because they have a direct interest in cheating the victim into a belief of their affection, and then of plundering him at favourable moments. They will not desert him as long as he possesses the means of satisfying their extravagant wishes; but when his purse is empty, then—good-bye love,—good-bye, delusion!

PLATE V.—Our hero is now about five or six and twenty. For some years he has been leading a life on which he is himself ashamed to retrospect. The property left him by his parents was speedily dissipated, and when poverty again stared him in the face, he was constrained to seek for employment. He, however, continued to frequent the public-houses, where he expended his earnings in liquor. He seldom partook of a good and wholesome meal; but he was clamorous against the "corn-laws" and the "taxed state of the country which rendered provisions so dear," and yet he imposed a far greater tax upon his own income by means of his dissipated habits. Bread was a luxury to him—meat an article with which he was almost unacquainted—and the money with which he purchased potatoes was doled out with reluctance; and then he complained that every thing was so dear! But it was his dissipated conduct which made every thing a hundred per cent. dearer to him, because he expended in drink that which would have purchased bread and meat, and coffee, and bacon, and cheese, and butter. If he ever did pay a visit to the butcher or cheesemonger, he endeavoured to drive a bargain for the articles he required; and the idea that "every thing was so dear," was perpetually in his imagination. But at the public-house he never beat the landlord down in the price of his liquors, nor did he exclaim that gin, or ale, or rum, was dear! It is impossible to say how he contrived to exist during the interval above alluded to. Sometimes he worked with tolerable diligence, when an empty pocket and a failure in credit closed the doors of the public-house against him; and then, when he earned a little money, he would abandon his employment, and return to the public-house. He seemed only to exist for the public-house, and all his ideas of happiness in this world were measured according to the amount of liquor he could procure. A good man in his estimation was one "who would stand his glass," and the landlord was the most estimable individual with whom he was acquainted. His views of the world were limited to the four walls of the tap-room; his recreations were the changes of scene afforded by visiting different gin-palaces and low places of entertainment. Such must we suppose to have been the tenor of his existence during the interval between the scenes represented in the fourth and fifth Plates. The subject of the latter is his marriage, which, when the religious portion of the ceremony was over, was celebrated in one of those sinks of infamy denominated tea-gardens. Those places of entertainment are bastard public-houses where morality is seen on the lowest scale. It is at such a place that he assembles with his friends, and drinks deeply in honour of the virtuous and amiable young woman who has bestowed her pure affection upon so unworthy an object. Reeling beneath the influence of his potations, the bridegroom hastens to present a glass of the destructive liquor to his young wife, but she refuses it from a motive of intuitive propriety and female delicacy. There is a lamentable mockery in the custom of associating so holy a ceremony as that of marriage with the abhorred, the demoralizing, and the degrading habit of drinking. And yet, in the upper, as well as in the lower classes of society, it is the custom to provide banquets or entertainments on these occasions. The breath which utters the tender language of love, should not be rendered pestilential with the fetid odours of strong drink; the sighs, which emanate from the breast where affection dwells, should not be accompanied with the hiccoughs of the drunkard, nor should the aspirations of the sacred ceremony be mingled with the shouts of bacchanalian revellers. The drinking songs and the boisterous toasts which characterise such scenes, seem but little suited to the mysterious solemnity of wedded love; and the staggering gait of a drunken husband is but a sorry substitute for the graceful activity displayed in the cheerful dance.

PLATE VI.—We now arrive at the last plate in the series which traces the progress of the drunkard. Were it not the object of the artist to develop in six successive pictures, the improvement and prosperity of our hero's circumstances, under the genial influence of Teetotalism, he might have represented him now ending his days upon the gibbet, or toiling in chains in the penal colony. As it is, we have before us the domestic scene to which the preceding one necessarily prepared the way. Not contented with having reduced himself to misery and degradation by his dissipated habits, he has associated a young and loving female with him in his poverty. Every thing did she share with him—his sorrows, his want, his wretchedness,—save his crimes! Behold the denuded condition of their chamber, reader,—and remember that it is not the representation of a solitary instance in the great drama of human life; but that it is the faithful portrait of an episode which occurs in the existence of all drunkards! How appalling is it to meditate upon the wretched state of that poor young woman—a wife, and a mother—who sees her husband and her child starving near her, and feels herself the bitter, bitter pang of want. Oh! what a heart must the man possess, who can observe without remorse the wreck his own vices have occasioned! That affectionate young woman left her parents, her family, and friends, to follow the fortunes of the man whom she loved,—she still adores him in spite of his harsh treatment to her during his drunken moments of intellectual aberration,—no word of complaint issues from her lips, although he has reduced her to the limit of starvation,—and still would she lay down her life to benefit him. Cold, hungry, and unhappy,—not daring to contemplate the past, and dreading to conjecture relative to the future, the miserable husband himself is alone saved from ending his days as a miserable suicide by the attentions and caresses of that faithful creature. As he has formerly been maddened by drink, he is now maddened by the contemplation of the horrible state of destitution to which he has brought himself and his family. And where are now the friends who flocked around him in the tap-room,—the boon companions who have often sworn that they would never desert him? Not a soul comes near him—not a human being will give him a loaf for his little one! He dragged himself to the public-house, where he had expended scores and scores of pounds, and requested the loan of sixpence. "Never lend money," was the brutal reply. Could he have a pot of beer and some bread and cheese on credit?—"Nonsense! get along with you; don't come bothering here!"—"For God's sake, lend a few half-pence to a man who is only anxious to obtain a morsel of bread for his family!" he urged, in a piteous tone of voice.—"If you don't get out of the place, I shall call a policeman to put you out; we don't want beggars here!" was the brutal answer. He rushes home in despair,—flings himself upon a seat, and remains absorbed in the most bitter reverie into which he had ever fallen from the moment of his birth. This scene is well described by the sixth plate.

MEMOIRS OF A WAG.

THE subject of these memoirs was a Mr. Jesse Weevil; and a contemporary chum has described him as a very little man, with a very little head, and a very little in it. At an early age he indicated a disposition for practical jokes, industriously planning without the requisite ingenuity and adroitness to carry the projects into execution. Jesse had barely attained his eighth year, when he accidentally witnessed the extrication of a half-guillotined mouse, whose predatory exploits in the larder were most ignominiously closed by a trap, baited with toasted cheese on the over night. His tender parent, as she raised the iron bar, and liberated the mangled body of the nibbler, endeavoured in a very feeling speech to impress upon his infant mind the wickedness of self-appropriating the goods of others, and the punishment which attended the infringement of the law of mum and tum. Jesse opened his mouth, and stared, and exhibited many other amiable expressions of attention, at the same time shily pinching the tail of the deceased mouse to induce "a last kick,"—but in vain; and just as his self-satisfied mamma had concluded her moral deduction, her interesting offspring had succeeded in attaching a string to the aforesaid tail of the victim, and was dragging it about the floor.

She turned angrily upon him, and chided him for his cruel disposition; and snatching away his "plaything," made him toast a piece of double Gloucester, for a fresh bait. Jesse went sulkily to his task; and his affectionate mother, in order to light a smile upon his innocent countenance, and implant a taste for mechanism in his mind, explained the construction of the trap as she set it.

In the afternoon (it was a half-holiday) he was allowed to invite little Sammy Wilkins to tea.

"Now for a bit of fun," said Jesse to himself. "I say, Sammy," he added aloud, "did you ever see a trap?"

"What's a trap?" enquired his friend.

"What! don't you know?" said Jesse, delighted at his ignorance; and mounting upon a chair, he drew the mouse-trap carefully from the shelf. "Do you see that cheese?"

"Is that cheese?" said Sammy.

"Touch it, and try."

"What for?"

"For fun, to be sure," replied Jesse anxiously. "Now, look here—just put your finger at it so—don't you see how I do it?"

"No," said Sammy, blundering forward, and running against Master Jesse's elbow, so that the said Master Jesse's finger was poked into the trap, whereat he roared out most lustily.

Such an early impression would have endured, and been a wholesome warning to many during the rest of their lives;—but Jesse Weevil was a strange compound; and the incident had no more effect on his mind than a pebble cast into a pond, which is now wrinkled and ruffled (like an old dowager), and almost immediately becomes smooth and glossy again.

The old proverb of "birds of a feather flock together," was verified in Weevil's selection of his friends. They were all devotedly attached to the same elegant pursuits, and generally met weekly (Weevil was now of age) at a certain house of entertainment, where they smoked cigars and each other simultaneously, and discussed Welch rare-bits. The ingenious Weevil was unanimously elected their president; and many a wayfarer was startled by the boisterous chorus of "We won't go home till morning!" &c., as he passed the windows of the room where the young men were performing their Bacchanalian orgies.

It happened one day that a basket of game was left at this rendezvous, addressed to "JESSE WEEVIL, Esquire, —Carriage Paid." It soon attracted the notice of one of his companions, who dexterously reversed the card, and wrote thereon the name of Walter Trott, who was another member of the intelligent clique. Weevil arrived soon afterwards.

"What sport?" demanded he.

"No sport," was the answer, "but here is some game."

"Say no more!" exclaimed the delighted Jesse, slapping his forehead. "I've an idea: now, mum's the word! Fetch up Griggs."

Griggs was summoned, and he entered with a grin.

"I say, Griggs," cried Weevil, cutting the string of the basket, and producing the game, "we want you to dress this hare and these two pheasants for supper, and serve them up in your best style."

"Leave it to me, sir," was the reply, as the host walked off with the spoil, just as the whole crew began to drop in.

The conversation soon became general, noisy, and interesting. At last the cloth was laid.

"Halloo!" enquired Walter Trott; "what's in the wind now? Here is an unusual display!"

"Only a snack," said Weevil, "and we must beg you to take the chair on the occasion."

"I!" ejaculated Mr. Trott. "Yes,—you," answered Weevil.

"Well, I'm sure—the honour—but I'm always ready to do anything that will conduce to the harmony of the company," replied the by no means reluctant Trott.

The supper was served forthwith; and, upon the removal of the cloth, Jesse Weevil arose, and, in an elaborate mock speech, returned thanks for the very handsome entertainment the chairman had provided.

"What? eh? how do you mean?" cried the astonished Trott.

By way of explanation, the basket was handed to him amidst peals of laughter.

The unconscious entertainer looked blank, and pretended to read the card; but, in twisting it in his hand, he turned it over, and discovered the original address.

"Gentlemen," said he, rising, "nothing, I assure you, would be more gratifying to my feelings than to entertain my friends (hear! hear!)—but I cannot allow (shouts of laughter)—that praise, which is due to another, to be bestowed upon myself. Instead of returning you my thanks, allow me to call your attention to the founder of the feast—Mr. Jesse Weevil—to whom (I speak by the card) it appears to me that this basket is addressed; and to him therefore let our thanks be paid."

Weevil seized the basket: the trick was too obvious to be misunderstood, and the facetious Jesse, unable to support the jeers and laughter of his friends, flung down the basket, and rushed from the convulsed assembly.

A few days after this incident, Mr. Walter Trott, who was rather an exquisite in his way, was standing with his back to the fire in the room where the friends met, and was relating a prime adventure of which he was the hero when Mr. James Dawson (one of the clique) drew Weevil aside, saying, "We shall have a novel dish to-night."

"How do you mean?" demanded Jesse.

"Why, don't you see that Trott is roasting his kid for our entertainment?" returned Dawson, alluding to the beautiful new gloves which Trott carried in his hands.

"Admirable!" cried Weevil; and he ran out of the room to procure a pair of scissors. When he came back, he said to Dawson, "Keep him in conversation, and you shall see how I'll carve the kid."

Weevil accordingly beat about the bush a little time, and then approached his victim, from whose delicate hands, which Trott held behind him, dangled the fingers of a new pair of lemon-coloured gloves. Adroitly clipping off the fingers, Jesse deposited them in his pocket, and then wheeled round to the front, to join in the laugh that was created by Trott's story.

"And then putting out my hand in this fashion," continued Mr. Walter Trott, extending his right fist, and at the same time producing the curtailed gloves in his left: but he stopped short in his exciting narrative, and eyed the clipped articles with a look that produced a simultaneous roar.

"Now, 'pon my word," cried he, "this is really too bad!"

"Nay, don't whimper about it," said Weevil, scarcely able to utter a word for laughter. "Don't whimper, Trott: I'm sure the amusement is worth a dozen pairs of the best that ever came from France."

"I wouldn't care a pin about the matter," said Trott; "but the fact is—"

"They are the gift of your sweetheart, I suppose?" interrupted Weevil.

"But the fact is, the mirth is not at my expense," resumed Trott, "for in a freak, I extracted these same gloves—"

"Call 'em mittens now," said Weevil, with tears in his eyes.

"From the pocket of our excellent friend Weevil," continued Trott, handing him the mitts.

The fun, which ensued, may be easily imagined.

The "deeds which were done" by Weevil and his facetious friends of dark nights were as innumerable as they were annoying to every inhabitant in the vicinity. If a board were placed in the front garden of any house to intimate that lodgings were to let, it was sure to be transferred to some crusty neighbour's, who was well known to have too much pride to offer such accommodations. Impertinent applications and angry altercations were the consequence. Bells were rung alarmingly—the knockers were twisted from the doors—and the night-caps of the drowsy inhabitants who ventured to peep from an open window were the chosen marks for the well-directed pea-shooters of this irregular troop.

Having read an account of how the Marquis of Brandyford and the Earl of Maldegrave had daubed a sign-board various colours in one of their nocturnal exploits, Weevil proposed "to get up a similar entertainment;" and a large pot of white-wash and a brush were accordingly provided for the operation. The appointed hour arrived, and the young men sallied forth, Weevil carrying the pot and brush, and six others bearing a light ladder, borrowed from the stable-yard of the inn where they held their meetings. Their first attempt was made upon the Black Boy, which having completely daubed over, Weevil declared that he deserved the thanks of the world for having discovered how to wash the Black-an-moor white. The Red Rose next grew pale under his able hand; and having accomplished this transformation to his taste, he ordered the troop to proceed to the Red Lion. This was to be the crowning feat.

Having mounted to the ledge whereon the representative of a real lion was fixed, he began to apply the white-wash with considerable vigour, and had already completed the half of his task, giving the animal the appearance of a shared puddle, when he was startled by a fearful roar—not from the lion, but from his affrighted companions, who beheld a detachment of police close upon their heels. Pot and brush fell from the grasp of Weevil; and our hero, who thought with the redoubtable Falstaff that "discretion was the better part of valour," made for the ladder: but, alas! his dear friends, in their confusion, had kicked it down!

His situation was by no means enviable—hope of escape was vain,—detection was certain—and—but we shall beg leave to quote from the columns of the Morning Scourger, as we feel by no means competent to give so lucid an account of the catastrophe:—

"POLICE OFFICE.—A gentleman about three and twenty, with fair hair, and of a slight and rather genteel figure, was yesterday brought before Mr. Mitimus, the sitting magistrate. He was dressed in a fashionable suit of black; but this was so ridiculously daubed with white, that a zoologist would have unhesitatingly pronounced him to be a species of that party-coloured bird called a magpie.

"What is the charge?" demanded Mr. Mitimus.

"Please your worship," said a policeman, "I discovered this gentleman, about one o'clock this morning, in a very suspicious situation."

"Indeed!" said Mr. Mitimus. "He looks very much like a man who has just come from the Insolvents' Court, where he has undergone a process of white-washing. Pray describe the situation, in which you found him."

"He was crouched on the ledge of the Red Lion inn, in ——— Street," was the answer.

"Very suspicious, indeed," said Mr. Mitimus. "What is your name?"

"Henry Jones," was the reply.

"What are you?"

"A gentleman at large."

"Not at present," remarked the facetious magistrate. "And, pray, what did you on the ledge of the Red Lion?"

"Only half of what I intended, sir."

"What was that?"

"Why—I intended to paint the Red Lion white, and only did half before the police came up."

"Well, you are candid at any rate," said the magistrate. "But what induced you to make the noble animal change colour?"

"The fact is, I was elevated at the time."

"Yes, and you were found so too," laconically observed the magistrate.

"And then," continued the prisoner, "the policemen interfered, and took me up."

"Took you down, you mean," said the magistrate.

"Exactly," rejoined the accused.

"Well, you must pay five shillings for being elevated," said Mr. Mitimus, "and make an arrangement with the people whose property you have disfigured."

Such was the account of the transaction.

A dull, damp, foggy night, in November, offered a favourable opportunity for the exercise of Weevil's peculiar talents. A dark lane leading to the town where these ventures took place, was the chosen spot for his exploit. The muddy state of the road was a source of particular gratulation to our hero; and he sallied forth inwardly rejoicing at the anticipation of his charitable intentions. Carefully affixing a cord to the stump of an old tree, he drew it scientifically across the muddy road, and fastened it to a fence on the opposite side of the thoroughfare, making it form a straight line about a foot and a half from the ground. Concealing himself, with a chuckle behind the projecting angle of a shed, Weevil anxiously awaited the issue of his stratagem.

Presently the voice of a passenger came singing up the lane. Louder and louder grew the voice, as the singer approached, but still the thickness of the fog prevented Jesse from beholding the form or figure of his unconscious victim. He was indeed to him vox et præterea nihil. Weevil scarcely breathed, although his heart panted almost audibly. Nearer and nearer the stranger approached; and, at last, a stumble, a splash, and a sudden exclamation, indicated to the critical ear of Weevil that the "singing bird" had fallen into his trap.

Several people attracted by the cries of the floundering youth, ran to the spot; and Weevil having cut the treacherous cord, joined the group.

"Here's a precious go!" exclaimed a whimpering boy of about fourteen, with a clothes-basket in his hand, the contents of which basket were fearfully scattered in the road.

"Nerer mind, my lad," said Weevil, in a half pitying, half consolatory tone.

"It's easy to say 'never mind,'" replied the boy, jamming the linen all pell-mell into the basket again: "but shan't I get a leathering?"

Every one of the by-standers charitably endeavoured to comfort the unfortunate boy.

"Have you injured yourself?" demanded the kind-hearted Weevil.

"Injured myself!" repeated the boy, "no—I should think not! There ain't no chance o' breaking one's bones in tumbling into such a puddling as this here. But I ain't in a mess, am I?" continued he, half sobbing, and half laughing.

"The more dirt, the less hurt," cried Weevil; and at the same time the boy inadvertently shook off the liquid mud, with which the too curious Jesse was splattered from top to toe. The crowd, of course, laughed heartily; and Weevil aware that any remonstrance on his part would have been jeered at, pocketed the affront, and walked quietly home.

His suit of black was quickly thrown off, and his limbs enveloped in an elegant dressing-gown. He then seated himself by a blazing fire, and indulged in reading until nine o'clock, when, ringing the bell, he ordered his housekeeper to bring up his clean things, as he was going to dress, preparatory to starting for an annual ball given at the principal inn in the town, and at which all the beauty and fashion of the neighbourhood were to display their attractions.

"Directly, sir," replied the obsequious servant, and retired.

Meanwhile, Weevil began to practise his new steps, and try over some concerted phrases intended for the ear of the delectable Miss Jane Souggins, at the same time extending his hand in a right line from his heart to the looking glass, and grimacing in a manner which he concluded must be perfectly irresistible.

"I think that's a killer!" said he to himself.

"Oh! mercy on us!" cried the housekeeper, breaking in upon his physiological studies.

"Eh! what—is the house on fire?" demanded he.

"Worse nor that, sir," said the dame: "such a pickle—such a misfortune—who could ha' thought there was such a set of wicked people in the world? Only to think—"

"What is the matter?" demanded Weevil.

"The shirts, sir—frills, ruffles, and all—not one to put on! Every man John of them rolled in the mud. The poor mangle boy has been thrown down by some mischievous villain, and almost killed. His mother—poor dear old soul—has just been here, and is ready to cry her very eyes out."

Weevil whistled so loud, and long, and shrilly, that the housekeeper was startled; and when he calmly declared "that he must stay at home," the old woman retired—wondering at his equanimity!

Jesse Weevil, unfortunate as he was in his jokes, was no less so in his serious attempts. His whole career was one grand mistake! He eloped with a "sweet young lady" (no other than Miss Jane Snuggins) who was reported "to be a fortune," and he discovered when too late, that she was the portionless daughter of an extravagant insolvent. To add to his disappointment, Mrs. Weevil proved an incorrigible shrew, whose eloquent tongue annoyed him unceasingly.

Proud, however, of his boasted tact and abilities, Weevil resolved to tame her; and, after pondering for some months upon the subject, he resolved to put in force the following novel and extraordinary experiment.

Having purchased some white arsenic, "upon the paper of which was duly printed 'ARSENIC—POISON,'" he consigned the deleterious mineral to the flames, and replenished the envelope with white sugar. Watching his opportunity, when Mrs. Weevil was in her tantrums, he calmly proceeded to the cupboard, and pouring out a cup of milk, mixed up the sugar with it.

"Jane," cried he, in a melancholy tone, as he stirred up the potion with the fore-finger of his right hand,—"Jane, listen to me for a few short moments—I shall not long be a burthen to you."

His look and impressive manner silenced the storm. Quaffing the draught at one gulp, he cast the cup into the grate, and threw the paper upon the ground.

"What have you done?" shrieked Mrs. Weevil, snatching up the paper, and turning pale as marble.

"Poison!" muttered Jesse, with the most thrilling tragedy-look he could assume. He then buried his face in the sofa. A shriek, followed by an awful silence, ensued. Jesse ventured to peep between his fingers, expecting to see his rib extended on the hearth-rug in a swoon—but she had vanished.

"Where the dickens has she gone?" cried he, rising. "Jane!"—no answer. He rested upon his elbow, and listened. A trampling of many feet upon the stairs, roused him from his posture; and the next moment his better half rushed wildly into the room, followed by three men and the servant-maid.

"My dear Mr. Weevil," said the foremost gentleman in black, in whom Jesse recognised a neighbouring apothecary,—"what could have impelled you to this rash act?"

Weevil was really alarmed by the crowd which had so unexpectedly brought about him.

"What act?" demanded Weevil.

"You have swallowed poison!"

"Nonsense—nonsense—" said Weevil.

"Where is the cup, ma'am?"

"He has thrown it away," replied Mrs. Weevil: "but—here is the horrible paper!"

The apothecary looked at the paper, shook his head, and then looked significantly at his assistants, who immediately laid violent hands upon the disconcerted Weevil, and threw him at length upon the sofa.

"What are you about?" demanded Weevil, glaring wildly upon the medical operator, as he drew a stomach-pump from his coat pocket.

"You must submit, sir," said he: "in a case like this, I am bound to act with firmness. Resistance shall avail you nothing."

"Pooh! pooh! nonsense—'pon my word, 't was only a joke—a mere ruse—don't be a fool," cried Jesse, struggling. "May I die if—"

The forcible introduction of the admirable machine put an end to further opposition. Weevil kicked and plunged in vain. The whole operation was speedily performed; and, feeble, spiritless and exhausted, the unfortunate patient was left extended upon the couch. The apothecary promised to send a composing draught immediately, and left him in the meanwhile to the tender care of his wife, who alternately wept and scolded, winding up her hysterical harangue with a bitter remark "upon his cruelty in wishing to leave her unprovided for."

PRINTING.

PRINTING is the art of producing impressions from characters or figures, moveable and immovable, on paper, linen, silk, &c. There are three kinds of printing; one from moveable letters, or stereotyped plates, for books; another from copper-plates for prints, and the last from blocks or wood-cuts. The first is called letter-press printing; the second rolling-press printing; and the third calico-printing. The principal difference between the three consists in this—that the first is cast in relieve in distinct pieces, the second engraved, and the third cut in relieve on the surface of wooden blocks.

The origin of printing is completely enveloped in mystery, and an art which commemorates all other inventions—which hands down to posterity every important event—which immortalises the discoveries of genius and the exploits of greatness—which has been the most effectual instrument in banishing the darkness and overturning the superstition of a bigoted age—and which, above all, continues to extend and diffuse the word of God to all mankind,—this very art has left its own origin in obscurity, and has given employment to the studies and researches of the most learned men in Europe to determine to whom the honour of its invention is due.

The art of printing combines such a number and variety of branches that it would be absurd to suppose any one could have invented the whole. In its present state of perfection, it is divided into eight or ten different kinds of manufactures; and, even in its most pristine state, must have required such an extensive acquaintance with mechanics, chemistry, and other branches of science, as would not be supposed to fall to the lot of any one or two men. The simple idea may have originated with a single individual, but a second person may have made such an important improvement as almost to eclipse the value of what his predecessor had accomplished. The honour of the invention has been appropriated to several places,—Mentz, Strasburg, Haarlem, Dordrecht, Venice, Rome, Florence, Basle, Augsburg, &c. Three only of these places, however, deserve any very serious consideration; viz. Haarlem, Mentz, and Strasburg. At the latter place many attempts appear to have been made towards the discovery and completion of the art by John Guttengberg; but as there is no evidence to show that he brought his experiments to bear in the publication of any work at Strasburg, nothing more need be said of this city.

Hadrian Janus, in his Batavia, which was published more than a century after the supposed invention of the art, assigns the honour of that invention to Laurence Coster, a native of Haarlem. The substance of the narration of Janus is as follows:—"It is now about a hundred and twenty years since Laurence Coster, of John, a citizen of Haarlem, and paragoned Coster, amused himself during his walks in the broad market city, with forming letters of the letters of the alphabet."

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We should gladly comply with the wishes of our Shrewsbury Correspondent, and insert the extract forwarded to us; but the opening of the establishment alluded to, occurred too long ago to warrant us in laying it before our readers.

Q in the corner is thanked for his letter. The Roman Catholics of the United Kingdom could not possibly feel offended at our allusions to the Roman Catholics of Italy, in the two articles just published in The Teetotaler under the head of Italy. We esteem and respect the Catholics of the United Kingdom, and invariably report the proceedings of their Teetotal Associations when sent to us. With regard to the remaining portions of Q in the corner's letter, we beg to inform him that other plates are to be given, Grates, with our Journal, when the present series is complete. We fear no competition, and are alarmed at no opposition on the part of the malignant enemies alluded to.

Mr. Mingay Syder's Letter on "BRANDY AND SALT" in our next.

E. F.'s rhymes are not correct. Let him look at the rules we laid down in the article entitled Verification.

NOTE.—A portion of our impression of last week was issued with NUMBER 25 instead of NUMBER 26 at the head of the Journal.

ERRATUM.—In the tale of Angela and Angelo fifth line from the commencement, read deepest instead of desperate.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26th, 1840.

In an account given, some days since, by the Morning Herald, of "The First of the Present Mayoralty-Dinners," it is stated that "a good deal of execution was done with the decanter by half-past ten o'clock;" and, in a speech relative to the birth of the princess, the LORD MAYOR is represented to have observed, in reference to an illumination to celebrate the event, that "those who could not sport their tallow-candles might, with equal loyalty, express their feelings over their pot of porter."

Thus, while so many thousands of disinterested and philanthropic individuals are exerting themselves to prevail upon the poorer classes to relinquish in toto the evil habit of intemperance, the first civic magistrate gives utterance to language calculated to render those strenuous endeavours abortive. And yet this same magistrate sits in judgment upon those unfortunate or degraded wretches who are brought before him, charged with having been found intoxicated in the streets or creating a disturbance in public-houses, and are punished by fine or imprisonment. Here is an authority, whose principal duty is to prevent, correct, or punish crime, absolutely encouraging the poorer classes to enter upon those very ways which, by a circuitous route, conduct them to his tribunal. If ever there were cause for public outcry against the deliberate wickedness or the deplorable ignorance of an individual, who is raised to an eminence the principal honours of which he imagines to consist in giving entertainments where "great execution may be done with the decanter,"—that occasion now exists in respect to the new Lord Mayor. By recommending an illumination, he manifested a selfish regard to his own interests, because he is himself a dispenser of oil and candles; but what purpose he had in view, when he gave utterance to the vulgar and demoralizing wish relative to the "sporting of the tallow-candles," and the "pots of porter," we cannot rightly understand. We should be sorry to imagine that sheer wickedness instigated him thus to propagate a recommendation to the people to partake of that liquor, which is one of the curses of the land; and we cannot suppose him to be so ignorant of the doctrines now professed by five millions of men, as not to know that the moderate use of strong drink of any kind leads to the abuse thereof. We neither envy the hearts nor the heads of those civic gentlemen, who imagined that there was so much cause for self-felicitation in the revival of those gluttonous feasts at the Mansion-house, "where so much execution is done with the decanter."

THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION was founded at the commencement of January, 1840; and the anniversary of its establishment is to be celebrated by a grand Members' Meeting at the Chapel, in Aldersgate Street, on Wednesday, the 21st of January, 1841. On this occasion it is expected that the worthy and esteemed President, Mr. BILTON, will take the chair. Measures will be adopted by the Executive and General Committees of the Association to ensure the attendance of the most able Advocates of the Teetotal cause upon this memorable occasion; and we have no doubt that all the real friends of the society, and of the glorious principles of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, will be present. For the honour of the great cause, and to convince the disciples of those drinking cus-by means of which he printed upon paper some verses and short sentences, for the instruction of his grandchildren. With the assistance of his son-in-law Thomas, the son of Peter, he afterwards invented an ink more viscous and tenacious than common ink, which was found to blot and fill the letters: with this new ink, he printed in the Flemish language, the Speculum Nostræ Salutis—a work composed of images and letters. The leaves of this book being printed on one side, only the pages, which were left blank, were afterwards pasted together. After this, Coster abandoned the use of wooden letters, and adopted metal ones, forming them at first of lead, and latterly of tin, which metal is rather harder than the former. The great profits, which the inventor derived from this new art, induced him to increase his establishment, and, with this view, he took some workmen into his family. One of these was called John, surnamed Faust: and he, after having learnt the art of arranging and casting types, as well as all other matters relative to the art of printing, seized the opportunity of his master being at mass one Christmas eve to carry off all the types and implements used in the printing office. He went with his plunder to Amsterdam, in the first instance; then to Cologne, and finally settled at Mentz, where he established a printing-office!"

This account has been questioned by many writers of great eminence; and it certainly appears a most wonderful circumstance that no Dutch writer, nor any work of the fifteenth or of the beginning of the sixteenth century, has made the least mention of this fact.—not even the celebrated Erasmus, who from having been long at Rotterdam in the year 1467, could not have remained ignorant of so remarkable an event, and con so creditable to his native country. We must however believe that Lawrence Coster carried the art of printing from impressions cut upon blocks, to a greater extent, and applied it to a greater variety of purposes, than any person in Europe who had preceded him, though the merit of even this part of the art is not due to himself, but had been practised in many countries for centuries, especially in China, where it continues to the present day, with scarcely any variation or improvement.

It may be advisable to divide the progress of the art into four stages. The first was the mode of striking impressions from signets, seals, and other emblems cut on wood or other substances, the origin of which is totally lost in the ages of antiquity. The second stage is that which introduces us to the name and labours of Lawrence Coster, who applied this block-printing to the publications of books, and of which his Speculum Nostræ Salutis is said to be the first of his works. He may also have the merit of printing from separate wooden letters, cut so as to fit one another when composed together, with no doubt the small words of most frequent use cut upon one block, to save the time and labour of the compositor! This occurred between the year 1431 and 1443. The third stage of the art was the adoption of cut metal instead of wooden letters, which is doubtless to be traced to the labours of John Geinsfleisch, Junior, who was distinguished by the name of Gutenberg. This person, with the assistance of his father Geinsfleisch, the elder, first invented cut metal types, with which was printed the earliest edition of the Bible. This edition appeared in 1450; and the completion of it occupied seven or eight years. The fourth and last stage of the art which brought it to almost as high a state of perfection as it attained for two centuries afterwards, was the mode of casting types in matrices, which was invented by a servant of Gutenberg's of the name of Peter Schœffer. For this valuable service he was admitted into the family of his master, Faustus, and espoused one of his daughters. This Faustus was not the person who was supposed to have communication with his Satanic Majesty; that individual lived at a much earlier period than the printer.

In the year 1462, the city of Mentz was taken, plundered, and deprived of all its ancient rights and franchises; and the art of printing, in the general ruin, was made public, and quickly spread itself over a great part of Europe. Haarlem and Strasburg practised it very early; and thence it proceeded to Paris, to Rome, and to Constantinople, and to most of the principal towns on the continent.

The date, as well as the mode of its introduction into England is a subject involved almost in as much mystery as the original invention of the art. It was a constant opinion delivered down by our historians that the art of printing was introduced and first practised in England by William Caxton, a mercer and citizen of London, who, by his travels abroad, and a residence of many years in Holland, Flanders, and Germany, in the affairs of trade, had an opportunity of informing himself of the whole method and progress of the art, and by the encouragement of the great, and especially by the Abbot of Westminster, first set up a press in that Abbey, and began to print books soon after the year 1471. But a chronicle is in existence, bearing date of 1468, several years previous to Caxton's return from the continent, and printed from wooden types by Corseles. It is therefore doubtful to whom the honour of initiation, with respect to England, must be accorded.

It was not long before types were cast in other characters besides the ordinary Roman letters. In 1480 the Italian artist cast a set of Greek types, and the same ingenious artist also cast Hebrew characters. It was not until 1477 that titles were printed on detached leaves: titles to chapters were first used in 1470. In the infancy of printing, capitals were not used in the beginning of sentences; there were no breaks or divisions in the pages: no stops were used save the full stop, and the types were of various sizes, so clumsily were they executed. Catch-words, and letters or figures at the bottom of the sheets, for the guidance of the binder, were also subsequent improvements.

In 1642 a Hebrew Bible was printed at Mantua, under the care of the most learned Jews in Italy. This Bible was not at that period known among the Christians in this country, nor perhaps in any other, though the nature of it is very extraordinary. The text is nearly the same with that in other modern editions; but at the bottom of each page are various readings, amounting on the whole to about two thousand, and many of them of great consequence, being collected from manuscripts, printed editions, copies of the Talmud, and the works of the most celebrated rabbies. In one of the notes is this remark:—"In several passages of the Hebrew Bible, the discrepancies are so many and so great, we know not which to fix upon as the true reading." Dr Kennicott declares that the first printed Bibles were far more correct than the latter ones; and thus the variations between the first edition printed in 1488, and Vander Hoot's of 1705, at Amsterdam, in 2 vols. 8vo., amount in the whole to above twelve hundred.

Printing presses were first made of wood; but by them an immense deal of time was lost. They are now of iron, and are so beautifully contrived that much labour and time are saved. The power of the iron press is almost incalculable at the time of making the impression, so admirably arranged are the levers. The late ingenious Earl Stanhope effected several important reformations in the press; and his improvements have contributed materially to the excellence and beauty of the workmanship. Passing from these simple machines, we must now mention a new species of invention—the steam-press: the wildest flights of Persian fiction would scarcely have been considered more incompatible with the results of sober science, than would the productions of this extraordinary instrument, if they had been described prior to the commencement of the present century. This machine self-inks the types, supplies the paper, and prints the sheets at one operation. To convey some notion of the extraordinary speed of this machine, it may be enough to state that two strong men working with the ordinary printing-press can only complete one thousand copies of The Teetotaler in a day, whereas the steam-press, by which it is printed, will perfect ten thousand in half that time.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

SONNET.

By Mrs. Reynolds.

When through th' expanse of heav'n the thunders roll,
And the fork'd lightning flashes o'er the main;
When the floods sweep the hamlet from the plain,
And Nature seems convuls'd from pole to pole;
And when the forest bends beneath the blast,
That like the desert-hurricane sweeps by;
'Tis then the reminiscence of the past,
Aray'd in terror, meets the sinner's eye;
While his imagination ponders o'er
The deeds of former days, and marks the time
Stain'd with the memory of a hundred crimes,
For which he ne'er was penitent before.—
Oh! in such hour, the guiltless martyr's doom
Were enviable for him who fears the tomb!

THE BONNIE LASSIE.

Then have ye seen the dearest lassie?
An' little care I wad may ken,
To me she's the sincerest lassie!
Her cheek o' bloom, and e'e o' light—

By a' that charms the soul and sight,
My Mary is a bonnie lassie!
Sae sweet as summer's morning smile,
As gentle as its eve, my lassie;
An' friends may frown, an' wealth may wile,
But never make me leave my lassie!
By ilka grace o' mien and mind,
That e'er e'er evall'd onie lassie,
Oh! she's the wale o' womankind,—
My Mary love, my bonnie lassie!

A LYRIC OF HIGH-LIFE.

By Thomas Ryan.

We're just come to town for the season:
Next Thursday we give a grand rout—
The week after, an Exquisite's ball,
At which I am sure to come out.
Last winter my sister Augustus
A sleight and a common-place girl,
By the aid of my dext'rous mamma,
Manœuvred, and married an earl.
My ma, and some wisdom-fraught mother,
Have made out a list, quite complete,
Of younger and portentious brothers
We're certain in "high life" to meet.
I know, from these names, whom to shun,
And whom to be bippant and pert with;
Mamma, too, has mark'd every one
Whom 'tis fit I should ogle and flirt with.
My fortune, 'tis true, is a trifle—
Of the real-rob but little remains;
But then I am highly accomplished,
And I've very high blood in my veins.
My hopes are, at least, to secure
Some dandy of wealth, rank, or station,
Who has gain'd a delightful estate
By his pot-p at the last Coronation!

toms, which have proved so fatal to so many millions of individuals, that the army of staunch Teetotalers is divided into numberless powerful and important sections, we entreat the members of the United Temperance Association to attend this meeting; and we shall then put to a fair test the superiority of the Teetotal legion over the publican's phalanx. The enemy is active and strenuous in its exertions to defend the strongholds of tyranny and vice; and, as all the legitimate means of opposition have failed, it is exercising the most degrading and iniquitous measures—not to reconquer its arbitrary sway over the habits of millions, because that it knows to be impossible—but to prevent farther desertions from its ranks. In common parlance, the publicans are adding to their establishments every attraction calculated to impose upon the weak-minded and the credulous. Bands of music are procured for their parlours, and flaming placards are posted at their doors, announcing the attendance of "eminent vocalists." They are patronizing anti-teetotal lectures, and purchasing large numbers of anti-teetotal publications. They take every opportunity to abuse the votaries of the principle that is rapidly undermining their trade; and, while they strive to conceal the ruin that menaces their dens from those who frequent them, they cannot close their own eyes to the too-palpable fact. Each day are numbers of their establishments closed; and each day do they find it necessary to increase the practice of adulterating their liquors. It is, therefore, natural that men in so desperate a situation should have recourse to the most probable means to avert the impending blow; and their natures, which are thoroughly degraded and debased by their dishonest, murderous, and immoral trade, do not experience the least compunction as to the species of the measures to be adopted. For these reasons the Teetotalers should arm themselves for the fight with more alacrity and courage than ever: they should look upon past advantages as the prognostics of future success, and as proofs of the righteousness of their cause; they should not now relax in their exertions because they have already accomplished much, for much yet remains to be done; and they should remember that many a campaign in real warfare has terminated unfortunately, because the victors in the first instance have neglected to follow up their advantages. No Fabian system of campaigning will now suffice for the interests of Teetotalism; we must not be content with merely watching the motions of the enemy, and of attacking when we ourselves are attacked; but, in imitation of the tactics adopted by NAPOLEON, we must beat the enemy in detail. The defeat of one squadron should be immediately followed up by an assault upon the next; and by these active and unwearied measures, we cannot fail to accomplish all our ends.

The greatest source of delight to the publicans and their supporters, is the indifferent attendance at any Teetotal meeting-house which once was filled. This must not be the case upon the 21st of January, 1841, when the anniversary of the establishment of the United Temperance Association is to be celebrated.

One of the principal features in the English character is the extreme tenacity with which ancient prejudices are adhered to. We may daily hear men declaiming most violently against foreign institutions and customs; and if the cavillers be questioned relative to the grounds on which they found their objections, they are totally incapable of returning an efficient reason. They have never visited the country against which their invectives are levelled; and if they have sought to enlarge their minds upon the subject by consulting books, they have most probably referred to those which were written by individuals as prejudiced or as ignorant as themselves. These observations apply equally to the opponents of Teetotalism. These opponents are for the most part totally unacquainted with the nature of the arguments adduced by the friends of this great doctrine; and they prejudice the question upon a consideration of what they conceive to be its fundamental principle. The idea that alcoholic drinks can be either strengthening or nutritious, is an absurdity that no one would attempt to support, were he conversant with the nature of alcohol itself; and to attempt to defend the use of intoxicating liquors on the score that our ancestors partook of them, is to argue against the possibility of new discoveries either in matters of science or morals. Our ancestors believed in the Ptolemaean system of astronomy; viz. that the earth was flat and that the sun moved round it: and the doctrines of Copernicus, who taught that the earth was round and revolved round the sun, were opposed on the ground that such a belief contradicted the account of the miracle performed by Joshua, and related in the Old Testament. In the same way do the enemies to Teetotalism exclaim against us, founding their objections upon the presumed fact that our SAVIOUR sanctioned the use of fermented wine. Now, with respect to the miracle performed by Joshua, we may observe that, as the Jews at that time believed that the earth was stationary and that the sun revolved round it, Joshua spoke in terms which they comprehended, and which were consonant with their belief. With regard to the presumed sanction given by our SAVIOUR to the use of fermented wine, we have two replies to make to the assertion:—I. We believe that there is sufficient evidence to show that the wines of the Hebrews were generally un-fermented, and consequently not intoxicating; whereas there is no testimony to support the idea that our SAVIOUR in any way sanctioned the use of fermented wine;—and II. We believe that a system, which, like Teetotalism, has the reformation of the world in view, must be consonant with the doctrines of Christianity. Deeply rooted must be that prejudice against the salutary principles of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, which could find a justification for its own existence in the belief that the extirpation of a crying evil is contrary to the doctrines of Christianity!

ANGELA AND ANGELO:

OR THE ITALIAN SISTERS.

(Concluded.)

"In the morning the Count took his farewell of me at the carriage door, and as he touched my forehead with a paternal kiss, I saw that a tear stood in the old man's eyes, as though some prophetic spirit had whispered in his ear, 'Never shalt thou see her again as now she is, but wronged and lost, a sacrifice and a shame!'"

"In the evening of the second day I found myself within two leagues of Florence, and another hour brought me to the palace gates. I leapt from the carriage with a breast full of joy, and hastened to the room where my childhood had been nursed and my girlhood developed. No one was there, but, looking from the window into the garden, I perceived my sister and Angelo issuing from the arbour at the extremity of the great walk. They were hand in hand! Eudocia suddenly stopped, took a rose from her bosom and placed it on his breast, with a look of admiring pride, which he returned with a passive smile; and as they approached the fountain I concealed myself to surprise them. Nothing did I feel then of jealousy, not a thought, or the shadow of a suspicion; but my blood turned cold in my veins when, as I then entered the room, I observed Angelo's arm was encircling Eudocia's waist! I then heard her, yes, her, addressing him in the tender language of love. They started when they saw me, and a flush mounted into Angelo's cheek; but, after the first moment, Eudocia seemed unmoved. Could I have been mistaken? Might I be misconstruing the easy familiarity of friends? I feared to believe, and believed not. I would not believe that he was false, it could not be. I arose and ran to him, but the smile, the look, were not the same; some wizard's charm was upon him, he spoke, but his voice unkindly turned; and a cloud immediately passed athwart the heaven of my hopes.

"What was the issue? Nature that adapts all senseless things unto their uses, and all creatures to their climes, leaves, more or less, the development of the human mind and the feelings and the passions of mortals to the influence of that power which we name circumstance. In me the whole tenor of my soul was turned by this one decree of fate; and in one night the golden tresses of my youthful joys were grey and withered. I was as gentle in my disposition as the fawn in the wood; I became more desperate and more implacable than the tigress of the waste. I was calm and timid; I became restless and thoughtful. I was sensitive and fond; I became bitter and revengeful.

"The pitiless Eudocia pursued her triumph with remorseless diligence. The appearance of continued affection was soon thrown off by the betrayed and thoughtless Angelo. The cruel eyes and wicked heart of my sister had bound him to injustice, and though he struggled to relieve by temporary declarations of his unaltered love the wound his fond deceit had caused, he was caught in her net, and to recover himself was impossible.

But not long, not long, can the afflicted bosom hush up its wrongs, nor can philosophy find a healing anodyne for a broken spirit. In the day time, I wandered to and fro, like a creature bereft of her young; and so was I bereft, for the dear children of my heart, were perished and torn from me. At night no sleep visited my eyes; or as a shadow of slumber passed across my senses, there arose but a vision of vanished happiness. Many were the times that the perfidy of the once loved Angelo was too palpably manifested to afford the meanest foundation for a doubt; and Eudocia on her part delighted to multiply those occasions, as frequently and effectively, as her wretched artifice could devise.

"But little was wanting now to complete the ruin of all I had ever hoped of love and joy, and it was soon afforded me. You know behind the palace is a fair and verdant grove, and there, when I was happy, did Angelo and I wander together, on many a sweet and joyous day. With slow steps and mournful I would through the shadowy trees, stopping here and there, I knew not why, filled with sad thoughts and melancholy. Through the green alleys and tangled boughs, I still went on, when my ears were saluted with the sound of a woman's voice: I heard Eudocia speak in a subdued tone, and Angelo reply.

"'Angelo does not love me, then; he does not love me now,' said Eudocia, in a tone of happy fondness. 'Where are his smiles, his looks, and kindness? Is he angry? Oh! now he is kind again. Those eyes! what joy to gaze on them.'

"'How greater far the joy to gaze on thine,' replied Angelo. 'Eudocia knows what tyranny she bears in both, a double despotism of two such beautiful sovereigns, so fair, and lovely, that to be free, were to be worse than dead.'

"'As last night, I sat at my window,' proceeded Eudocia, 'gazing upward at the moon, I was suddenly startled by a noise, and thought I heard your voice, Angelo; I called to you, and besought you to fly for my honour's sake. I paused for an answer, but the soft breeze sweeping through the grove was the only reply. —It was not you, Angelo, was it?'"

"Angelo hesitated for a moment, and seemed to smile: I marked his guilt, and my face burnt with shame and indignation.

"'And if it had been, Eudocia,' said Angelo, 'would you not have screened me from the swords of the vile vassals who might have set upon me?'"

"'I have often returned later, and gazed up to your windows, and sighed, he continued; 'but Eudocia was lost in dreams, in which Angelo was partially forgotten.'

"'Ah, Angelo, do you not think Eudocia loves you? What makes her love you so? Did she love you less, she were perhaps more happy.'

"I then heard an appointment given and arranged. How I reached the palace I know not, for I was bewildered. My mother met me and remarked how pale I looked.

"The night was fair and beautiful, as soft and as serene as my spirit was dark. I looked around me, and all things seemed to mock me with indifference and calmness. But a tempest tore my agitated bosom, my brain was hot as melted lead, and I wandered forth to cool my brow, but the sod burnt beneath my feet and I fell upon the earth. Heaven! what vision oppressed my spirit! I saw, or thought I saw, Angelo stealing through the branches. I turned towards Eudocia's window; and she beckoned him, and whispered, and smiled. I then saw her in his arms! My bosom was on fire: I leapt from the ground, and, seizing a dagger from my vest where I had concealed it, hastened to her room. I knocked, there was no reply. —Again I knocked, her voice spoke, and I answered her.

"'Who is there?'"

"'It is I.'

"'Angela?'"

"'The same, admit me;' and I heard her mutter something indistinctly within.

"'Nay, Eudocia, do not deny me,' I cried; 'though the door between us were of ten-inch iron, I would reach you;' and with the energy of madness, I burst open the door and stood before her.

"'Where is he?' I exclaimed: 'where is he? You have hidden him, but you shall not escape me.'

"'What, what?' she cried. 'Of whom speak you? Heavens! I do not look so wildly on me, Angela. What have you there?'"

"'Revenge!' I answered: 'and it shall reach you. —You have seen him to-night, here.'

"'Who, who?' she cried.

"'Angelo, Angelo, my Angelo,—mine no more,' were my words, and the blood seemed bursting from my temples. 'Where is he?'"

"'Mercy!' she shrieked; 'are you mad, sister?'"

"'Am I mad, ask ye? Yes, I am mad. Have I not cause. Ask of my widowed heart where is its comfort, peace? Yes, I am mad,—I am,—I am;—and I flew towards her with the poniard in my hand. She ran from me, but I was resolved. Madness was in my brain; and I plunged the weapon straight into her breast. She screamed and fell. Her child awoke but never more should it draw life from its mother's breast! A few minutes passed, and she was silent. Her eyes began to lose their lustre, and her cheek grew pale, her lips trembled, her hands were clenched, her breath came quick and irregularly, and her low sighs grew weaker and more weak. Another moment and she was gone.

"'Miserable! miserable!' I exclaimed, and flinging myself upon the body, I swooned, and fell into forgetfulness of all things.

"How long I remained in that state of mental torpor I know not; but the first sense of returning life and apprehension was awakened by the repetition of the name of Eudocia. I heard a voice call Eudocia thrice. It struck upon my soul like the elegy of one departed, or the voice of sorrow for one that is afar off. I heard, and I was not deceived. It was Angelo.

"Eudocia, Eudocia!" he called in a subdued tone; and the whole truth rushed across my mind, and a new source of retribution suggested itself to my tormented spirit.

"Who is it?" I whispered from the window.

"Angelo," he answered; "it is I, Eudocia, I have been long calling to you, but you have not heard."

"I have," I replied, "but I, dared not come to you before. There is a stir in the house, hide yourself behind yonder tree, and in a moment—"

My voice was hushed in my throat, and I could say no more. My bosom was torn with anguish; and, turning from the window, I raised Eudocia's body in my arms, and stretched it upon the couch. The blood came trickling cold upon my bosom as I laid it upon the bed. I then parted the tresses over her brow, and drew the sheet upon her. The tears fell rapidly from my eyes, as I performed these sad offices, and my heart swelled to bursting within me. But I soon became collected and calm. I was moved by some inward spring,—I know not what.

"Eudocia," cried Angelo again.

"I come," I whispered; "one moment." But Angelo leapt up to the balcony of the window. I seized the curtain, drew it over him, and thus hid the rays of the moon that fell direct into the chamber. He held my hand, and kissed it: but a statue had been more fervent and more glad than I.

"My sweet Eudocia," said Angelo, "how you tremble."

"It is with joy," I replied.

"For Heaven's sake," he said, "what is the matter?"

"Nothing, nothing, dear—" I could not pronounce his name. "But hark! some one stirs." I added. "Heaven send it be not Angela, she sleeps in a chamber near."

Angelo was silent, and I thought I heard a faint sigh break from his bosom.

"Angela!" he said at length, "Is she so near?"

"A breath will reach her. Poor thing! she sleeps but lightly, as they do all whose hearts have been betrayed."

"Why speak you of her?" he said with vexation, "your love, Eudocia, at least is mine?"

"But how soon may it be lost! how soon!" were my words. "When you reflect on whom you have set your affection,—from whom withdrawn it; when you consider how bound I am by the oaths of wedlock, and how I thus am perjured: may you not, and will you not turn from me, in disgust at a being so poor and valueless, cast me away, and hate me, as now you love?"

"I never will," he replied.

"Then we will love each other marvellously well."

"I perceived that he was alarmed. He began to feel it was not Eudocia who addressed him; and he startled when I placed my hand upon his arm.

"Why do you shrink?" I resumed. "Will you not let me love you? I see! your heart is still with Angela."

"Why do you torture me?" exclaimed he: "would that I were away!"

"What! from your own Eudocia?" I said, "A! I see that you love me not!"

"Away!" he cried, "do not approach me. My mind is haunted by a hundred fearful thoughts. Who art thou?"

"I am thine own," I answered, "she who has broken a sister's heart! Angelo, behold!" and I led him to the couch. "Stoop and kiss her frozen lips. Thus, and in this posture, doth she await you," and I drew the curtain aside, and the moon fell direct upon Eudocia's face. "There, there," I cried, "clasp her to your heart, for she is yours—and Angela is avenged!"

"Heaven's!" cried the traitor, "what a sight is this! Blood! who has done it?"

"I!" was the answer. "Thou knowest not with what fatal certainty the passions may be warped into despair!"

And how did Angela die? My foot had scarcely retired from the gate of the jail when a person in the habit of a priest presented himself at the wicket, and, with a blessing upon the poor inmates of the place, desired to be shewn to Angela's cell. A rosary hung from his neck, and though young, his face wore the traces of thought and rigid piety; and they led him, at his request, to Angela's dungeon.

"Heaven prosper your holy duties," said the warder, closing the door behind him.

An hour elapsed, and the weary warder was slumbering on his bench; but starting up suddenly, he took his keys, hastened along the echoing gallery, and drawing the bolt, entered the cell, where such a sight was presented to him, that even his obdurate bosom shuddered; and for an instant he stood dumb with amazement!

Side by side lay two bodies, dead but scarcely cold. The one was Angela, the other Angelo. On a table was a phial, the fatal contents of which had frozen the currents of life; and with that pardon which their clenched hands betokened, they had expired, forgiving—but unforgotten! Their lips were black with the poisonous juice; but their features were unmoved, save by a soft smile that lived amid the ruin of their mortality, like a rose in a charnel-house, the mockery of death!

For myself, erring and evil, I can only wish rest to them. To judge is not for me. To breathe the tender tones of charity; to smooth the angry jars of nature; to wipe away the tear of suffering, are man's best ministrations, and be they mine!

PICA.

TO THE RECLAIMED DRUNKARD.

MAN of Temperance! you have done much. You have achieved a conquest over passion, and a deliverance from the power of lust. Having thus defeated the desires of the flesh, and established the supremacy of your mind over the cravings of appetite, you prove yourself to be an intelligent being. Although you have done much, you have far more to do. Standing now upon higher ground than you did formerly, it becomes you to act in a way befitting your exalted position. There was a time in which you were regardless of yourself and others; and then how many duties were neglected! Seek not to forget your former days:—look at them well; and from such retrospection as this you will gather new strength for the contest with passion, and acquire renewed hope for victory. Look at the past; and, as you look, mourn over the follies of that epoch. The heavy clouds of darkness rest upon that night: but now that the light of morn has dawned upon your path, thank Heaven for your blessings, and spend your day well. Never let it be seen that conquest over one evil has rendered you careless to the existence of others. Remember the past; and let your future life in some measure atone for your former transgressions.

Many are now looking upon you: they expect something good from the man who has dared the frowns and ridicule of the world in the cause of virtue. Much is expected from you!

Remember the sufferings your wife has endured on your account. Call to mind her watchings, her anxieties, her tears, her wants. Think how you have embittered her past hours and her past thoughts. How oft have you excited her brain almost to madness! Have you not debased her noble faculties, blunted the feelings of her heart, and made almost a ruin of her nature? Such has been the influence of your conduct. You are now a reclaimed and sober man! O, how much have you to do! Raise up that fallen creature—strive to awaken her soul from the torpor into which it has fallen, converse with her rationally, that her reasoning powers may be exercised—lead her to feel herself a being that shall live for ever! If Temperance have brought you to receive the holy truths of Christianity, labour earnestly that your partner may know their ennobling influence. Inspire her with a longing after more enduring joys and happier hours than earth can yield. But this is not all: let tenderness and real affection henceforth be exercised towards her. If you have caused a wrinkle to appear upon her brow, strive to smooth it down again. Should she occasionally give proofs of the sadness of her spirit, or the harshness of her temper, believe yourself the cause, and let your smiles dispel the rising cloud. Perhaps the spring and summer of her life have been like winter to her troubled breast; let then the autumn of her days be passed in peace, serenity, and happiness.

In your selfish days your children were neglected. The morning shed no smiles upon them; and the evening had no joys. The eye that should have watched them, the hand that should have guarded them, the lips that should have taught them, were otherwise engaged. Perform now your duty. If they fly your presence and your counsels, be not harsh with them, but win them by your kindness into confidence again. Watch over their morals, neglect not the cultivation of their minds—personally examine into the character of the schools in your neighbourhood, that your children may receive an effective and useful education. How much pleasure have you lost in forsaking the society of your little ones! Be with them more frequently: their artless language will afford you continual delight, and the gradual development of their minds will produce pleasure in your heart. Be much at home—look after the little wants of your family—and, above all, remember your exalted position as the head of a household. Great are your responsibilities. The future and the eternal destiny of your offspring depends upon your conduct towards them.

Your friends have been degraded by your late conduct. Take every opportunity of showing your affection towards them, and your sympathy in all their circumstances. They expect that, by the future rectitude of your conduct, you will confer honour upon your name and connexions. They have a right to expect this. Seek, therefore, the elevation of your mind by knowledge. Read works calculated to strengthen your intellect, and improve your heart.

Your neighbours once beheld you in a state of foolishness and recklessness: may they now perceive wisdom, humanity, and uprightness in your conduct. They know that you have placed yourself beneath the banner of Temperance, and they expect from you great things. An unflinching adherence to honesty, a faithful performance of the duties of social life, and an affectionate earnestness for the well-being of others, must be exhibited in the sight of all men. Regard your erring and unheeding neighbours with an eye of pity, and use strenuous efforts to awaken them from their state of self-degradation. Bear with their unkind remarks, and strive to release them from the thralldom of their prejudices. Let your language toward them be the language of friendship and persuasion, not of ridicule and reproach. Then will the expectations of your neighbours be realized; and, while your conduct will excite their admiration, your principles will receive their attention and respect.

For a long period you were an obstacle to the improvement of society. As an individual, you opposed, by your conduct, the progress of virtue; and, the influence of your example hindered the labours of philanthropists. But you have now cast aside the shackles of slavery, and stand forth a free, unfettered man. You have gained a victory—a glorious victory, over the tyranny of maddened passions. Now, therefore, your country expects much from you. You are called upon to aid the cause of benevolence, to assist in the work of ameliorating the woes of your fellows, and to spread around you light, liberty, and peace. You owe this to society: you have to retrieve your past folly and neglect. You, who have so often been a source of disquietude to good men, are now called upon to join the ranks of these, who seek to bless their fellow-subjects with knowledge and happiness. Awake! and put on your strength! Be a zealous advocate for truth and Temperance. Seek not merely to make your countrymen sober men, but good men. He is the true patriot who is actively employed in bringing peace and comfort to the dwellings of his countrymen. Up, then, and be diligent in your labours for the good of mankind.

A LOVER OF MAN.

LATUDE'S ESCAPES FROM VINCENNES AND THE BASTILLE.

A SILLY attempt at imposition upon the Marquise de Pompadour plunged Latude, at the age of five-and-twenty, into the dungeons of the Bastille. There he was lodged in the Tour du Coin. The day after his incarceration, Latude was interrogated by the Lieutenant of police; and so deeply did the prisoner work upon the feelings of that functionary, that his sufferings were alleviated by the society of a comrade, a Jew of the name of Abuzaglio, whom the lieutenant suffered to dwell in the same apartment with him. A close friendship speedily sprang up between the fellow-prisoners; and as both had more or less hopes of liberation at an early period, they mutually agreed that the one who should first taste the delights of freedom, should immediately exert his influence in favour of the other. Four months elapsed; and Latude was one morning informed that he was free. Abuzaglio embraced him, and conjured him to remember his promise. But no sooner had the joyful Latude crossed the threshold of his prison when he was told that he was only going to be removed to Vincennes. Abuzaglio was liberated shortly after; but, believing that Latude was free and had broken his word, he ceased to take an interest in his fate.

Latude, on his part, believing that Abuzaglio had forgotten his engagement, determined to effect his escape from an imprisonment which the Marchioness of Pompadour destined to be perpetual. No less than nine long weary months passed away, ere he could find the opportunity. The moment at length arrived. One of his fellow-prisoners, an ecclesiastic, was frequently visited by an abbé; and this circumstance he made the basis of his project. To succeed it was necessary for him to elude the vigilance of two turnkeys, who guarded him when he walked, and of four sentinels, who watched at the outer doors—and this was no easy matter. Of the turnkeys, one often waited in the garden, while the other went to fetch the prisoner. Latude began by accustoming the second turnkey to see him hurry down stairs and join the first in the garden. When the day came on which he was determined to escape, he, as usual, passed rapidly down the stairs without exciting any suspicion, his keeper having no doubt that he should find him in the garden. At the bottom was a door which he hastily bolted, to prevent the second turnkey from giving the alarm to his companion. Successful thus far, he knocked at the gate which led out of the castle. It was opened; and, with an appearance of much eagerness, he asked for the Abbé, and was answered that the sentinel had not seen him. "Our priest has been waiting for him in the garden more than two hours and a half," exclaimed Latude; "I have been running after him in all directions, to no purpose. But, egad! he shall pay me for my running!" The sentinel and door-keeper, thinking that he was a lackey employed at the convent in the vicinity, allowed him to pass. He repeated the same enquiry to the three other sentinels, received similar answers, and at last found himself beyond the prison-walls. Avoiding as much as possible the high road, he traversed the fields and vineyards, and finally reached Paris, where he shut himself up in a retired lodging.

From that seclusion he addressed a petition to the King, acknowledged his fault, humbly solicited pardon, and mentioned the place of his concealment. But instead of experiencing the clemency he so fondly anticipated, he was again arrested and consigned to the Bastille. At the expiration of about a couple of years, he was once more allowed the society of a fellow-captive; and, as on the former occasion, a perfect communion of feeling instantaneously sprung up between them. Circumstances soon convinced them that Madame Pompadour was inexorable; and in spite of the almost insuperable difficulties to be overcome, the two friends resolved upon effecting their escape. In order to do this, they must either pass through gates ten-fold guarded; or else ascend, through the strogly-grated chimney, to the top of the tower in which they were confined—descend from that dizzy height of more than a hundred and fifty feet, into the ditch—and then break through the outer wall, in order to obtain their liberty. Great were the dangers to be encountered; but Latude and Dalégre trusted to time and perseverance, the efficacy of which has often been proved.

The first step towards the execution of their scheme was to discover a proper hiding place for the tools and materials which must be employed. Circumstances soon convinced Latude that there was a hollow space between the floor of his chamber and the ceiling of the one immediately beneath; and calculation enabled him to ascertain that the depth of that vacuum was from four to five feet and a half. There, then, was sufficient room to conceal their implements. "But of what were those implements to consist?" Such was the question of Dalégre,—and such doubtless is the interrogatory of our readers.—"What!" replied Latude; "have I not in my trunk a vast quantity of linen—nearly fourteen dozen shirts—many napkins, stockings, night-caps, and other articles? Will not these supply us? We will unravel them, and shall have abundance of rope."

The first attempt at tool-manufacturing upon which the two prisoners entered, and to which they devoted all their energies both moral and physical, was to extract two hooks from a folding-table, and grind them to an edge on the tiled floor. They had converted a portion of the steel of their tinder-box into a knife; and with that useful instrument they made handles for their hooks, by which latter agency the tiles of the room were shortly raised; and it was thereby ascertained that Latude's calculations relative to the vacant space were correct. The threads of two shirts were then drawn out, one by one, tied together, wound into small balls, and subsequently formed into two larger balls, each composed of fifty threads, sixty feet in length. These were ultimately twisted into a rope, from which was made a ladder of twenty feet long, intended to support the captives, while they extracted the bars by which the chimney was closed. Six months of unremitting toil were bestowed upon this single object.

Having opened the passage up the chimney, they proceeded to construct the ladders. Their fuel, which was in logs of about eighteen or twenty inches long, supplied the rounds for the rope-ladder by which they were to descend from the tower, and the whole of that by which they were to scale the outer wall. More tools being required to cut the wood, Latude converted an iron candlestick into a saw, by notching it with the remaining half of the steel belonging to the tinder-box. To this implement he afterwards added others. They then set to work on their wooden ladder, which it was necessary to make of the length of about five and twenty feet. It had only one upright, three inches in diameter, through which the rounds passed, each round projecting six inches on either side. The pieces of which it consisted, were joined together by fixing one end into the space cut out of another, and each joint was fastened by two pegs to keep the whole perpendicular. As fast as the pieces were finished, the rounds were tied to them with a string, that no mistake might occur when they were put together in the dark. They were then carefully concealed in the space under the floor.

It now remained for them to make the principal rope ladder. This was an arduous and almost endless task, as it was more than a hundred and eighty feet long, and consequently double that length of rope was required. Latude however commenced his enterprising work by unravelling all his linen, and when he had thus acquired a sufficient quantity of threads, he and Dalégre employed themselves in twisting them into ropes. To be brief, the whole of their manufacture amounted to more than fourteen hundred feet of rope, and the preparation of this and other materials essentially necessary to ensure the practicability of their flight, occupied another year and a half. Such perseverance, ingenuity, and almost unparalleled courage, were indeed deserving of eventual success.

All was now prepared for their flight, and they had only to decide upon the day for attempting their hazardous enterprise. The 25th of February, 1756, was the day which they chose. A portmanteau was filled with a change of cloths; the rounds were fastened into the rope-ladder, the wooden ladder was got ready, the two crow-bars were put into linen cases to prevent them clanging, for they knew that they should have to work in the water, on account of local circumstances. The Seine had overflowed, and at that moment there were from four to five feet of water in the moat of the Bastille, and ice was floating upon it.

Latude was the first to commence the perilous undertaking. With pain and difficulty he clambered up the chimney, and, on his arrival at the summit, let down a rope by means of which he drew up the ladders, portmanteaus, ropes, and other implements fabricated for the occasion. Dalégre shortly followed his friend, and in a few moments, they breathed together the fresh air of heaven on the platform of the Bastille.

As the Tourd Tresor appeared to be the most favourable for their descent, they carried their apparatus thither. One end of the rope was made fast to a cannon, and the other was gently let down. The safety rope was next passed through a firmly fixed block, and it was tied securely round the body of Latude. The daring adventurer now recommenced his fearful descent of more than fifty yards, Dalégre meanwhile slowly letting out the rope. It was well that they had taken this precaution, for at every step that he took, Latude swung so violent in the air that it is probable he would have lost his hold, had not the safety rope given him confidence. In a few moments, which must however have seemed hours, he reached the ditch unhurt. The portmanteau and the other effects were then lowered to him, and he placed them upon a spot to which the water had not risen.—Dalégre himself followed, and, as Latude applied all his strength, to steady the ladder, the descent of his companion was effected with less annoyance and hazard than his own had been. As they heard a sentinel pacing along at the distance of ten yards, they were compelled to relinquish the scheme of climbing the parapet, which they had still cherished a hope of carrying into execution. There was therefore no resource but to break a hole through the wall. They accordingly crossed the ditch of the Bastille, to the spot where the wall separated it from that of Porte Saint Antoine. Unluckily the ditch had been deepened here, and the water on which ice was floating, was up to their arm pits. They nevertheless set to work with a vigour which can only be inspired by circumstances, like those under which they were placed. Scarcely had they begun, when, about twelve feet above their heads they saw lights cast upon them, from a lantern carried by a patrol-major: they were compelled instantly to put their heads under water, and this they had to do several times in the course of the night. The wall at which they were working was a yard and a half in thickness, so that although they plied their crow-bars without intermission, they were nine mortal hours in making a hole of sufficient size for them to creep through. Their task was at length achieved: they passed through the aperture, and were speedily beyond the walls of their prison. But at the moment of exultation, they had a narrow escape from perishing. In their way to the road by which they were to go, there was an aqueduct: it was not more than six feet wide, but it had ten feet of water and two of mud. Into this they stumbled. Fortunately, Latude did not lose his upright position, having shaken off his companion, who had mechanically grasped him, he scrambled up the bank, and then drew out Dalégre by the hair of his head.

The clock struck five as they entered the high road.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

COVENTRY.

In a recent number of The Teetotaler we published an account of a disturbance which was created at Coventry, and, since that period we have received a letter from Mr. THOMAS MACLEAN, the individual principally complained of, which communication sets us right in several points. We concluded, from the report forwarded to us, that this Mr. MACLEAN got up an anti-teetotal meeting, whereas we find that he has been a staunch Teetotaler for upwards of five years. It was this wrong impression which induced us to vituperate, in the strongest terms, the supposed conduct of a man who had experienced such beneficial results from the principle of Total Abstinence. We now deeply regret having made use of the language in which we clothed an account of his conduct, and, by way of convincing him of our impartiality, shall publish the following extract from his own printed circular:—"At the conclusion of the meeting held in the Mechanics' Institution, on Tuesday evening, November 10, 1840, I there informed the audience that I had assisted in the formation of a second Total Abstinence Society, on account of the misapplication of the public money on the part of the Committee of the pre-existing association. I have now stood before the public for five years in the character of a Temperance Advocate, and, I trust, unspotted before the world, as every disinterested individual will admit."

Signed,
T. MACLEAN."

We make no comment on the cause of dispute, inasmuch as we do not wish to interfere with local dissensions: we have merely made the above observations from a sense of duty incumbent upon impartial journalists.

SHREWSBURY.

The greater portion of the members of the Mechanics' Institution of this place consists of Teetotalers. The lectures, which have lately been delivered there, have been devoted to Electricity and Galvanism. Our correspondent at Shrewsbury commences his last communication with the following admirable remarks:—

"Destroy the national appetite for intoxicating drinks, and the national propensity for assembling at those places where they are vended, by affording elsewhere amusement and instruction of the most elevated kind, and then we may say good bye to the blazing gin shop lamp, the large plate glass squares in the windows, their costly mahogany doors, and the other gorgeous attractions. Boz has humourously alluded to the lying inconsistency of many of the Metropolitan publicans in thus puffing the wonderful magnitude of their stock and trade.—'In the lower windows which were decorated with curtains of saffron hue, dangled 2 or 3 painted cards, bearing reference to Devonshire Cider and Dantzic Spruce, while a large black board, announcing in white letters to an enlightened public, that there were 500,000 barrels of double stout in the cellars of the establishment, left the mind in a state of not unpleasant doubt and uncertainty as to the precise direction in the bowels of the earth in which this mighty concern might be supposed to extend.' The prodigality of the Kings of the Gin Palaces is perfectly ridiculous, but we hope that the fall of their palaces and their application to better and more rational purposes, are near at hand."

LEADS, YORK, LINCOLN, &c.

Very great pleasure has been caused to the friends of Temperance in the large towns of the north, by a series of scientific and physiological lectures, delivered by Mr. L. H. LEIGH, whose humorous and original manner of laying bare the abominations of the traffic in intoxicating drinks,—the filthy and poisonous ingredients used by the dealers in adulterating them,—the iniquities of the licensing system,—and the desolating effects of Intemperance to all classes, has attracted crowded audiences. Great numbers have signed the pledge of Teetotalism, during and subsequent to Mr. LEIGH's visit. This gentleman was honored with repeated votes of thanks by many very large and respectable meetings. Several eminent medical men (amongst whom was Dr. BEAUMONT of Bradford), presided at some of Mr. LEIGH's lectures, and bore their public testimony to their truth and excellence.

WAKEFIELD.

The Scientific Temperance Lectures delivered in this town, in the Friends' Meeting House, and in the splendid room of the Court House, and also in neighbouring towns, by Mr. L. H. LEIGH, have roused a spirit of enquiry amongst the better educated classes. For nine evenings (at Wakefield) Mr. LEIGH's eloquence won the applause of highly respectable and crowded audiences. His physiological lecture carried conviction to the minds of all, and won hundreds of converts to the Teetotal Pledge. Several medical men of high standing were present; and to these Mr. LEIGH gave a respectful challenge to contradict anything advanced by him; but from the manner in which Mr. Leigh handled the question, it was utterly impossible to arrive at any other conclusion than, that, all intoxicating drinks are not only useless but injurious, and therefore ought to be altogether abolished. The effect of these lectures have already silenced opposition, and prevailed on many leading individuals to give their decided support to the Teetotal movement.

BARNESLEY.

The Teetotal societies of this place are becoming strong in number. The greatest harmony prevails between the members of the Catholic Society and the original Teetotal Association; and the members of both societies amount to one thousand or more. Not less than five hundred individuals are practising Teetotalism who have not joined the society. So energetic has been the crusade in this town, that no less than seventeen publicans have been compelled to relinquish their dishonourable calling, and many others are in a fair way to follow their example. There are also several of the old established public-houses "To Let," and some of the others have been under the necessity of letting part of their buildings to persons who are following a more honourable trade. The only public brewery in the town is closed and on sale. We understand that where a brewer's dray formerly came twice into the town, it only now comes once, and that a miller's waggon, which came once a week, now comes twice; so that the business of the brewer is falling into the hands of the miller.

NEWCASTLE.

On Monday, December 5th, a meeting of delegates from the different tents of the Independent Order of Rechabites was held at Brother Macdonald's Temperance Hotel, Royal Arcade, for the establishment of a Widow and Orphan's Fund, and it was unanimously agreed to commence the fund immediately, and for the government of which a code of rules were adopted, and an executive committee of nine members appointed to act in conjunction with the district officers in superintending its establishment and operations. The payment for the support of this fund will be trifling, and the benefits considerable for the assistance of the objects of its care. The establishment of this fund will be one of the leading features in the operations in recommending this useful order to the attention of the benevolent, for what can be more noble, what more humane, what more beneficial both to the giver and receiver than to afford relief to those who, in too many instances, are slighted and neglected, the widow and the fatherless.—Northern Temperance Advocate, GATSBYMAN.

The Northern Temperance Advocate of December 12th, contains the following passage:—"Our Gateshead friends have commenced open air meetings, which we hope may prove as useful as they have been in Newcastle in spreading the principles of Teetotalism. On Sunday week, an interesting meeting was held at the Head of Pipewellgate, at two o'clock, which was addressed by Mr. W. WALTON. At three o'clock another meeting was held at Swan-street, when several addresses were delivered."

STAFFORD.

The Teetotalers of the Stafford, Plinton, and Bow Auxiliaries to the New British and Foreign Temperance Society, have been highly delighted by attending a course of Five Scientific Lectures, delivered last week, by Mr. L. H. LARON, who has just returned from a most successful northern journey, and was especially engaged by this society to deliver these lectures.

The first lecture gave birth to a mass of entirely new and deeply interesting information, respecting the abominations of the traffic in intoxicating drinks. The second showed that the stagnation of trade, bankruptcies and distress so generally felt throughout the kingdom, are entirely occasioned by the enormous sums annually expended in the consumption of intoxicating drinks. The third lecture adduced some powerful arguments to prove the immense advantages of Teetotalism to the trading and manufacturing classes, and to farmers and landowners. The fourth, or scientific physiological lecture, was the most lucid and practical of all. The nature and properties of alcoholic drinks, and their effects upon the human frame were fully explained. The fifth lecture was looked forward to with a good deal of anxiety, in consequence of its having been announced that the lecturer would prove from the Holy Scriptures that God had prohibited the use of intoxicating wine. The lecture commenced with arguments to show the untenable doctrine of moderation; and after a severe castigation on the inconsistency of the members of the old Temperance Society, the lecturer proceeded, from one text of Scripture, most convincingly to demonstrate the truth of the doctrine he had propounded.

TOWN NEWS.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

The meetings at the chapel, Aldersgate-street, on Wednesday and Saturday evenings, have been well attended lately, in spite of the inclement nature of the weather. We are compelled this week to omit any lengthened report of the proceedings; but shall next week give a detailed account of the usual meetings held by this flourishing society.

HACKNEY.

The Christmas Festival of the Teetotalers of Hackney will take place at the Hackney Temperance Hotel, on Tuesday, December 29th. It will commence at five o'clock; and, after tea, a Public Meeting will be held. DR. OAKLEY will take the chair at eight o'clock precisely. The Rechabites are expected to meet their brethren of the House of Shalom tent on this occasion. Several popular advocates will attend this Festival, which is expected to prove one of the most brilliant ever given in or near the English metropolis. Let the friends of total abstinence remember that "they cannot meet too frequently to celebrate the glorious onward movement of the cause."

GRAND MEETING AT EXETER HALL

TO WELCOME THE RETURN OF J. S. BUCKINGHAM, ESQ., TO ENGLAND: FROM AMERICA.

The New British and Foreign Temperance Society held a Grand Meeting at Exeter Hall (in the large room), on Monday evening, December 21st, to welcome the return of Mr. JAMES SILK BUCKINGHAM to England, from an American tour which had lasted for upwards of three years and a half. It will be remembered that this gentleman was the originator and the Chairman of the Committee of the House of Commons, which was appointed, in the year 1834, to enquire into the causes and effects of Intemperance in the United Kingdom. Mr. BUCKINGHAM is therefore one of the most eminent advocates of the great Teetotal movement now going on; and his entrance into the Hall was welcomed by a numerous audience with the most unequivocal demonstrations of joy.

The chair was taken shortly after seven, by Mr. W. JANNON, the President of the Society; and this gentleman introduced Mr. BUCKINGHAM to the audience in a neat and complimentary speech.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM commenced an eloquent and most interesting oration with several observations upon the cause of Total Abstinence, which portion of his speech we are compelled, from want of room, to omit. We have however retained the most interesting features of his oration. He observed that, on his arrival at New York, he was received by Mr. DELAVAN, that true friend to the cause of Teetotalism,—by whom he was introduced to a grand public meeting, where he was most cordially welcomed. No question of nationality interfered with the cordiality of that reception; and certainly no American was ever received with more kindness in this country than he was there. At New York he found the cause of Temperance in the most flourishing condition; the principle had been progressing there with as much success as it had here. Like all moral reformations, the cause of Teetotalism (in America, as in England) had emanated from a few individuals. As a cloud, which, from the size of a man's hand, upon the ocean, expands over all the earth,—so did the Temperance reformation rise, and so did it extend its influence. All reformations begin in that way; but the cause of Teetotalism was peculiarly fortunate in respect to the rapidity with which it had spread. As all present doubtless well knew, Moderation Societies were first established in America; and then, although people left off drinking spirits, they indulged the more copiously in various potations. At length Societies upon the total abstinence principle were formed; and in England the name of the new principle was Teetotalism. He (Mr. Buckingham) did not however admire that denomination, and he hoped another would be eventually found for so grand a doctrine. He however admired and loved it, whatever might be its name. To return to America;—the numbers of the total abstinence association rapidly increased; and no principle is there so popular as this. Without exaggeration, he could safely declare that not half of the American population professed and practised the doctrine. One great advantage in America was that the clergy were far more influential with their flock, than they are in this country: the American clergy were neither so well paid, nor so dignified as the English clergy; American pastors knew their flocks; and the flocks were well acquainted with the shepherds; and all the American clergy, if not total abstinents themselves, were not at least opposed to the doctrine. In America the ladies advocate the pledge upon public platforms; because the American woman fully comprehends the dread fact that the effects of a husband's or a father's intemperance redound upon herself. Although New York is a very gay city, he (Mr. Buckingham) dined at upwards of fifty houses, where the most costly and luxuriant viands were provided, but where the only beverage was water. The Americans will not provide for others that which they know to be pernicious to themselves. At Philadelphia he (Mr. Buckingham) was present at an entertainment given by one of the most wealthy merchants of the place to Mr. CLAY—that illustrious statesman, who will doubtless occupy the Presidential chair after General Harrison. At this entertainment there were about six hundred of the most eminent politicians of the same class of opinions. The house was a magnificent one—all built of marble; and the repast was in accordance with the splendour of the dwelling and the wealth of the host. But no beverage of an alcoholic kind was introduced. There were hospitality and conviviality, without any artificial stimulant. He (Mr. Buckingham) hoped that some worthy individual in London would give a similar entertainment one of these days. The custom of drinking (he observed) is merely preserved because it was handed down, with many other absurdities, from our ancestors. It is a most disgusting habit for the gentlemen to sit at table an hour or two after the ladies have retired, and there fill themselves with wine. The ladies consider the interval a long one, and still dread the moment when the gentlemen will join them in the drawing-room, because they may be a little overcome with wine. In France a higher respect is paid to the ladies; and the gentlemen leave the table with them. If water only were drunk, English gentlemen would follow this example. During his (Mr. Buckingham's) stay in Philadelphia, a Temperance entertainment was given at the theatre of that place; and twenty dollars' premium were given upon hundreds of tickets of only one dollar each. Four hundred pounds sterling were thus added to the funds of the Association at Philadelphia. There is also at Philadelphia a Temperance Society, to which the members of Congress belong. It would be a vain attempt (said Mr. Buckingham) to induce the House of Commons in England to follow such an example. When he was a member of that House, there were not above two or three water-drinkers in the House; and he should feel surprised if that number had increased to twenty. Why—strong liquors were absolutely to be obtained in the premises of the House of Commons itself! The present audience (he continued) would be astonished when he informed them that he had addressed a Temperance meeting, from the Speaker's Chair in the American House of Representatives, on the anniversary of the birth of the great Washington. At Quebec, in Canada, he had also addressed a Temperance meeting held in the senate-house, and sat in the chair lately filled by Papineau, the Speaker. From Philadelphia he proceeded to visit the falls of Niagara, and the city of Vermont. Every week he delivered a Temperance address. The churches in America are the seats of Temperance lectures, no time nor place being considered improper to agitate the great principle. For fifty consecutive sabbath evenings did he (Mr. Buckingham) lecture upon Temperance from the pulpits of various churches. He went into the southern states of the Union, where he found the cause flourishing, though scarcely so much as in the north. The extreme heat of the climate induced people to drink in the south. He would here occasionally relate an anecdote that had occurred at Boston. A frigate and two sloops arrived there from the Mediterranean, and were paid off. He had never seen such handsome, respectable, and cleanly sailors as those on board these ships. They were a thousand in number altogether. Each man had about a hundred pounds sterling to receive. The moment their pay was put into their hands, they were induced to drink (in many cases against their will) by the crimps, or land-sharks, who accosted them. On the third day after their arrival, they were lying, drunk, in heaps in the public streets. This circumstance induced him (Mr. Buckingham) to propose the foundation of a Sailors' Home, or boarding-house where no alcoholic liquors should be used. Twenty thousand dollars were immediately subscribed to build this establishment. In the south, he visited Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, and New Orleans. At Charleston he projected the establishment of an institution similar to that founded at Boston. He proposed that a sum of money should be raised by every merchant subscribing one cent upon each barrel of rice, and two cents upon each bale of cotton, which he might ship. Thirteen thousand dollars were thus raised. At Savannah a similar proposition was made: the merchants there subscribed two cents upon a barrel of rice, and four upon a bale of cotton. At New Orleans a spirit of rivalry enlarged upon this munificence. One gentleman declared that he would give five dollars upon each bale of cotton he might ship, if the other merchants of the place would each give one. Some one seemed to quibble at this arrangement. Another gentleman accordingly got up, and said he would make up any deficiency that might occur by the niggardiness of any merchant of New Orleans. Mr. Buckingham then said that he proceeded in a westerly direction, towards the mighty lakes of Michigan and Huron; he saw the "far west" which is visited by emigrants. The principle had not produced great effect in those vast districts. Emigrants are generally men who have been unfortunate in their own country, and are consequently addicted to drinking, to drown care. Those districts are also moist and marshy; and this is another excuse for the use of strong liquors amongst the emigrants. Mr. Buckingham however succeeded in making an impression amongst them. He lectured at Saint Louis and Chicago, where the doctrine has since progressed favourably. The steam-boats, upon the rivers and lakes of the west, are accustomed to race with each other; and dreadful accidents sometimes occur. No accidents arrive, however, to those which are managed upon principles of total abstinence. During his sixteen days' voyage home in the President, he had seen more intemperance than during any sixteen months of his residence in America. The last time he was at Exeter Hall, Earl Stanhope occupied the chair; and the hall was occupied by the Moderation Society. He himself (Mr. Buckingham) would not however "touch, taste, nor handle" nor supply alcoholic liquors to others. The Moderation, or Temperance Society was now all but extinct. When he returned from India, he saw the dreadful evils of intemperance in this land; and he thought that the best means of opening the eyes of the nation to the crying evil, was to bring it before the House of Commons. At this time, although he had long before given up spirits, he was accustomed to take an occasional glass of wine. He however abandoned the use of alcoholic liquors altogether, in order to agitate the question with propriety. Dr. Armstrong, his medical attendant, assured him that he would be much better without any strong liquor whatever. In a short time he began to like water—he acquired the taste for it—and he has never been visited with ill health since that period. At dinner, in America, he invariably asked ladies to drink with him—but the beverage proposed was water. On landing in England, he immediately received cheerful tidings relative to the progress of Teetotalism here. He was delighted to find that in London there were three parent Societies*, with auxiliaries and branches in all directions. He intends to remain in England until the month of May; and during this interval, he will exert himself to the utmost of his endeavours to promote the great cause of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM was much cheered during the delivery of this speech, which occupied about an hour and a half. He appeared to be in excellent health and spirits, and had every reason to be satisfied with his reception by the Teetotalers of London.

PREJUDICE AND HABIT.

It is necessary in a journal like this, to recur frequently to the effects of habit and prejudice; because by these two phenomena almost all the world is governed. It is only by very gradual progress that water can wear away holes in rocks: it is only by the same imperceptible degrees that the flood of reason can undermine the useless masses of absurd custom, that now at all moments are seen whichever way we look. When any new moral or political system is propounded, the venerable desires of society exclaim, "What! does the supporter of this doctrine intend to brand as absurd that which we have always revered as the height of wisdom? I, for one, am determined not to change my sentiments." Good unchangeable old persons—how we deplore his ignorance and obstinacy! It seems to be ordained that the ability to undo ideas and arrange them anew should pass when such ability would be of no general benefit: the minds of very few elderly persons, who have been men of indolent habits all their lives, become active towards the close of existence, when infirmities of every kind—blindness, deafness, &c.—would disable them from effectually enforcing on others any thing that would strike them as fit to be imparted. This is a merciful dispensation: for by it old people are enabled to be at peace with themselves and the world a few years before they leave it. As this is evidently the will of heaven, it is to be observed that the utmost delicacy should be used in attempting any particular conversion with respect to an individual of advanced age.

The Indian Fakir, whose right arm, with the hand clenched, has been kept in the same elevated position above his head during perhaps forty years, is an example of the effect of habit, as the old man is an instance of prejudice. However absurd and unnatural that habit may be, the arm grows very firmly fixed in its inconvenient position; and instances have been known amongst the Fakirs, where both arms have been thus raised, and the hands clasped tightly together over the head. It is possible by slow degrees, by means of friction and constant efforts, to bring down to his side the arm of the Fakir; but this would not be rendering him an immediate servant, because his other habits have become modified to an accordance with the position of his arm—unnatural harmony has existed so long, that nature itself, in respect to him, is no longer natural. When, after perhaps a length of time and a vast amount of trouble, the limb or limbs, thus rendered to use, have again become servicable, old age may have rendered him too weak and feeble to avail himself of their powers. The effects of habit upon the body are precisely similar to the effects of habit upon the mind, which—through the actions that warp its action be of the most strange, absurd, and foolish description—after a lapse of some years, is past redemption. Very few mortals take the trouble to reason, examine, and reflect as they ought to do; and as old age advances, it becomes more and more difficult, unless those operations of the intellect have been in constant activity, to settle the mind to continuous and useful rumination. Thus was it that no physician past fifty years of age, would believe in Harvey's system of the circulation of the blood. If men of science, who have gone through a certain course of mental exercise, will not take the trouble to acquire a certainty when they entertain a doubt as to the truth or falsity of that which is novel, what can we expect from individuals who do not comprehend the meaning of reflection, but have been content to take everything for granted all their lives? "The errors of the human race are universal," says a celebrated French philosopher, "because experience preceded reason: those errors have become sacred, because they have never been thoroughly investigated; and they have appeared respectable, because they have endured for so long a period."

Having thus afforded the reader some familiar ideas of the effects of prejudice and habit, he will easily perceive how great is the amount of obstacle existing in the way of all advocates or propounders of new systems. The doctrine of Teetotalism has to contend against those who are prejudiced, and those who are the slaves to a vicious habit. The prejudiced individual quotes the acts or sentiments of his ancestors as an authority for his own opinions; and he cannot be readily brought to understand how his forefathers could have laboured under an error for so many centuries. The fact is, that the error only existed so long as it remained without investigation. We may suppose that on some occasion a person, being cold, took a glass of brandy, and declared that it produced a lasting and genial warmth, useful both to comfort and health. Here was the experience preceding reason. That individual felt a certain excitement which seemed pleasurable, communicated his discovery to his friends, and thus laid the foundation of an error which was only established upon his simple assertion. This error has existed for centuries; and all the successors of that individual, down to a few years ago, adopted the opinion he had originated, and took it for granted, without ever giving themselves the trouble to think or enquire whether it might not be wrong. Then, accident more than anything else, detects these kinds of errors. The advocates of Teetotalism began to preach; and some opponent might have observed, "Well—but if you take away from me my glass of brandy, what shall I have to warm and comfort me on a cold night, outside of a stage-coach, or elsewhere?" This question, we will suppose, puzzled the reasoner for a moment; and he then set himself to work to think whether brandy would really produce that effect, or not. Here was the idea of suspecting the error suddenly encouraged in his mind. He began to meditate, and he soon perceived that ardent spirit, imbibed to expel the cold, certainly produces a feverish and unnatural glow of heat for the moment—or rather an improper excitement; but that its effects very speedily wear off in that respect, and the re-action produces on the frame a greater degree of cold than was experienced before the liquor was drunk. This same line of reasoning also showed him that a glass of cold water, if taken in the midst of the most severe frost, although extensively chilly to the lips and palate, will speedily accelerate the circulation of the blood to such a degree as to produce a pleasant, a permanent, and a natural heat throughout the body.

Here was an error, which had existed for many centuries, suddenly refuted and explained, in spite of all the authority and sanctity conferred upon it by the opinions of millions of our ancestors. We do not assert that these were the circumstances of this particular error; we merely adduce it as affording scope for a proper illustration of our line of argument. But prejudice, as stated at the beginning of this article, is principally entertained by old people, who are wedded to antiquated notions and opinions, and whose incessant impression is that they cannot be in fault if they only adhere to the examples set them by their forefathers. They dread all innovation and change, timid lest such variation prove a detriment instead of a benefit. They saw their parents partake of their wine at dinner and their hot spirits and water in the evening; and they suppose that those parents would not have done so if they had not known that they were doing right. The fact is that those parents adopted the same system of reasoning as their silly children; and the parents of those parents had no better reasons for their conduct, before them. If we tell an old man that he is only abridging his short existence by partaking of alcoholic liquors, he will most probably observe that he has always felt so well with them, he shall not leave them off. But did he ever try how he would have felt without them; and if he have been so well with them, how very—very much better would he not have been without them! Instead of living to eighty, he might reach ninety or a hundred; instead of losing half his intellectual faculties at seventy, he would preserve them till ninety; instead of requiring spectacles, a walking stick, and soft cushions or foot-stools, at sixty, he would have remained stout and hearty until eighty. This is the species of reasoning to be brought against prejudice, and the only one which, with elderly individuals, stands the slightest chance of success.

We observed, in an article in this journal some time ago, that there is one thing which keeps people more in error, than all the rest put together; viz., the giving our assent to common received opinions, as if the first propagation of them could not have been wrong. Error principally proceeds from false impressions made upon the mind when young; and all prejudices are founded upon error. We see a great part of the ignorant portion of the community, and even persons of cultivated understanding, afraid to go into a church-yard at night, for fear of ghosts; and yet these same persons will traverse the same place in the day-time without the least fear. This must certainly be an error; for, if ghosts really appear, there assuredly is no more reason to be afraid of them in the night than in the day-time, or in a church-yard more than in any other place. This error is owing to being told by somebody of ghosts being seen at night: Yet we never hear of them being seen in the day time. Now, we hearing these tales when young, the ideas of darkness and the fear of those frightful apparitions, are so closely connected and imprinted in our minds, that all the reasoning in the world can scarcely separate them; so that when darkness appears, the ideas of these frightful apparitions also accompany it.

We have now shown, by argument and illustration, the force of that prejudice against which the advocates of any new system must expect to have to contend. Let us then devote an equal share of attention to the power of habit; and, by rightly understanding the nature of these formidable enemies, the supporters of Teetotalism will know how to attack them in their most vulnerable points. Habits are trains of ideas fixed by repetition, and are lost in the same way as they are acquired—by repetition. Thus, they are caused by external objects, example, sympathy, or our own industry; and they are lost by a discontinuation of their causes, or from working out different channels. The results of habit are as extraordinary as their causes are varied. The cataract of Niagara is so very loud, that foreigners, who visit it, are compelled to stop their ears for fear of being deafened; but the inhabitants of the adjacent country can hear one another in a whisper. The beating of the heart takes place with the force of some thousand pounds' weight; but habit in this case has destroyed the perception of the fact. The circulation of the blood inside the veins is not so soon perceived as warm water poured down the flesh, from the same cause. There is also an association of idea from habit, which should be here noticed. Thus, when a girl begins to learn the piano-forte, she first has to look at her notes, then at the instrument to find the suitable key, then to put her finger upon it. But when she has practised for a time, by the help of associations the sight of the note almost spontaneously direct her fingers to the corresponding key. By dint of habit, our appetites become associated with times and places. A man, who is accustomed to dine at five, feels an inclination for his dinner at that hour, even though he may not know what o'clock it is; and in reference to place, if a robber has accustomed himself to get drunk at a particular public-house, he cannot go by the door without his thirst for liquor returning; whereas, if he were at his work, he would not once think about it. Such is the force, and such also is the eccentricity of habit; and from these explanations, the reader will comprehend the necessity of adopting that firmness of resolution which may enable him to triumph over evil habits, and adhere to good ones. Evil habits are generally attractive, and are therefore more or less difficult to shake off; but perseverance will soon enable an individual to forget that he ever entertained a bad habit, which he has abandoned.

A person gives himself up to drinking, and, from mere habit, longs for his glass of liquor at stated hours every day. He then flatters that he cannot do without that liquor; whereas he is merely the slave to a habit which he might abandon and exist without, in the same way as he existed before he had imbibed it. Habits grow upon us, and become deeply rooted in our minds or system; but some are so permanently fixed that they cannot be extirpated. If a person, who for years has been accustomed to dine at five, suddenly change his hour to one, he will for some time feel a certain inconvenience and uneasiness at this alteration; but in process of time, he will forget that he ever required his dinner at five. By habit we accustom ourselves to all situations in life; and the habit of knowing that death is something which we cannot avert, reconciles us to meet it. The drunkard is the willing slave to a habit which he can abandon by firmness of purpose and perseverance; and in process of time he will learn to hate the mere mention of the habit to which he was the slave. The opponents to Teetotalism must not therefore urge that the habit of an evil indulgence is against the common sense or logic of the doctrine; because every reformation triumphs over some bad habit in some quarter or another. Happy is the man who has few habits of any kind,—who eats only when he is hungry, sleeps only when weary, and rises when refreshed. Nothing is more envying than a peevish series of habits, because it induces us to accord the same amount of sleep to a night succeeding a day of no fatigue which we devote to that following hours of arduous toil. Regularity and habit are not precisely the same things,—or ought not to be. Regularity depends upon a consenting will; but habit fixes inclination in many cases.

It is therefore against prejudice and habit that the advocates of Teetotalism should direct their chief assaults. Undermine prejudices, and eradicate evil habits; and the work is achieved. These aims can only be brought about by appeals to common sense, and not by prayers addressed to the sympathies. A man may be induced to weep at imaginary evils; but his common sense will not be deceived by similar delusions. If he weep for an evil, he will not long remember the tears extracted from his eyes by that appeal to his tenderness; but, if his reasoning faculties be exercised in the consideration of broad and substantial grounds of argument, a deep impression will be made upon his mind. It is not only necessary to implore him to lay aside a certain habit: he must be first convinced that that habit is really injurious. In the same way, we must not endeavour to root out a man's prejudice by ridicule or declamation; we should endeavour seriously to convince him that it is founded upon an error.

THE MATRIMONIAL SPECULATOR.

A SENTIMENTAL STORY.

WHY should I break into the family vault of the Cobbs? Will it not be sufficient to state in solemn whisper, that Mr. Drinkwhistle Cobb was the son of the late Mr. Joseph Cobb, who, some years ago, was kicked into eternity by a cow-hoof, to which he was perhaps too weakly attached,—and who still lies (it is to be hoped so) on the east side of 'Saint Magnus' Church?

Mr. Drinkwhistle Cobb was a tobacconist and snuff-manufacturer, occupying a house in a street appertaining to the parish of Saint Magnus, and who by dint of scraping, and screwing, and pinching, had contrived to amass as much property as justifies a respectable man in slightly elevating his eyebrows when he condescends to look upon his less fortunate neighbours. It may readily be believed that Mr. Cobb had his faults. Some few human errors had indeed fallen to his share. His chief foible, however, was an insatiable thirst for specie. To the attainment of riches Mr. Cobb sacrificed his time, his talents, his health, and, at last, himself into the bargain;—and a bad one he made of it, after all.

It was a mistake when Mr. Drinkwhistle Cobb united to the pectoral department—or, in plain language, when he took to his bosom Mrs. Martha Murgatroyd. The woman had a look of stability certainly;—there was a solvent appearance about the widow that augured well of present assets, if not of contingent remainders. It is painful, however, to be compelled to observe, that Mr. Cobb, was, on this occasion, quite out of his reckoning; and that, beyond a four-post bedstead—an impracticable clothes-press too long for the door-way, and a complete drug in the upholstery market—several bandboxes of various hues and sizes—and a portrait of one Mr. Hodgkinson, there was nothing (except the lady herself) on which Mr. Cobb could justly or conscientiously pride himself.

This was a legitimate cause of irritation—a justifiable source of discontent to the tobacconist. But however deeply the reader may be inclined to sympathize with Mr. Drinkwhistle Cobb, it must nevertheless be remarked—however startling in these times and in this metropolis the observation may appear—that the attainment of capital was not originally contemplated as the end and aim of marriage. Are the cardinal virtues to go for nothing? Are the domestic qualities at a discount? What puppy shall tell me that all sentiment is gone to the dogs? What periwig-pated fellow shall presume to doubt the existence of ties? Why therefore should coin be potential—wherefore bullion paramount?

Unfortunately, however, the newly-created Mrs. Cobb was no better provided for on the mental, moral, and amiable score than she was furnished with the secular; and hence her temper and her temporalities were equally despicable. To say that Mr. Drinkwhistle Cobb was hen-pecked, would be to go to the poultry-yard for an illustration which might be more fitly sought in a menagerie. He was vulture-torn—he was condor-clawed. St. George had an easy task cut out for him; he had only a dragon to deal with,—and that was most probably a green one. Mrs. Cobb was nothing like that colour: it was he, alas! who had been green!

That Mr. Drinkwhistle Cobb survived this calamity is only another evidence of the partial and unfair dealing which has been so often attributed to the grim feature. What was life to him? He would not give a pinch of his own snuff for it! What pleasure could he derive from his domestic hearth, when the house was too hot to hold him? What happiness from a better half, from whom he could obtain no quarter? Is it a wonder, then, that he would rather have been under the ribs of death, than under his own living rib? I should think not.

Must it be inferred that Mr. Cobb bore his heavy affliction with patience? No—that were a wrong inference. Sometimes, indeed, he asked himself a few questions, which he could by no means satisfactorily answer. For example,—Why should he, figuratively to speak, be under the thumb of a woman whom he could twist round his little finger? Why should he be always on the domestic side of the street-door, while she so frequently was gadding about to places of amusement? And lastly, why should he be so staunch an observer of the Teetotal pledge, whilst Mrs. Cobb had the spasms every day after dinner?

Although Mr. Cobb dared not himself make use of the cudgel, the prescribed thickness of which for visitation upon a wife's shoulders is laid down by law, it was nevertheless a perfect delight to him to behold the generous indignation of Punch, when, hugging one end of a sensible staff to his bosom, he applied the other to the skull of Judy. And how his eyes were lighted up, when he perused, in the newspapers, those police-cases that were headed—"Brutal conduct of a husband," "Savage assault upon a wife," &c. It is also astonishing to reflect how often he beheld himself, in his mind's eye, clothed in black, with a white cambric handkerchief at his nose, stepping sedately into what has been sarcastically denominated a mourning coach!

Three years rolled—or rather, grovelled on under the weight of Cobb and his afflictions, when an event fell out which had taken precedence of all others in the breast of the tobacconist. Mrs. Cobb had been long ailing, and, although no jury sat upon her body when she did die, it was very well known that she had killed herself with the drop of gin in the morning—her thimble full at eleven—her little dram just before dinner—her hot grog after it—her gin and bitters before tea—her rum in her decoction of Bohea—her beer at supper—and her second edition of hot grog before she went to bed! It is but justice to state that Mr. Cobb bore his bereavement with extraordinary equanimity: he neither laughed nor cried, lest the world should ascribe his laughter to phrenzy, or the tears to mirth of a crocodile kind. He only said that "it was a happy release,"—and people believed him.

It is well that a man should overlook his destiny from as elevated a position as possible, that he should as it were "see, as from a tower, the end of all,"—that he should take a bird's-eye view of his own prospects; but it is not so well that the bird taking such survey should be a goose. Whether it was that Mr. Cobb argued, as the doctrine of chances, that he must necessarily have better luck next time,—or whether he thought, since two negatives make an affirmative, that two bad wives would form one good one, cannot be ascertained: certain it is, however, that very soon after the death of the first, Mr. Cobb began to apply himself to the search after a second wife. I fear the truth, after all, is this, that pounds, shillings, and pence were the three witches that stultified his fortune.

Mr. Griskin, the pork-butcher, lived in the next street, just round the corner. Griskin was one of those plain, straightforward gentlemen of the old school who gloried in being an Englishman, and did not care who knew it, or knew anything else for that matter, since that could not interfere with him. Had hogs been erudite, Griskin had been a most learned man: as it was, he was content to slaughter and sell pigs enough to make a Jew stare or a Christian happy; and he was, or appeared to be so; for after business he regularly smoked three pipes of tobacco purchased at Cobb's comptoir, and had his nap in the arm-chair.

Griskin had one daughter—his only child—who, ensconced in a kind of sentry-box in the shop, received and disbursed such sums as the complicated nature of her father's swinish transactions might render necessary. Some have given it as their opinion that she was not beautiful. Beauty is only skin-deep, to be sure; and yet I have known many fastidious judges who do not admire a skin the more for being a whitey-brown, with a slight tinge of yellow ochre for its complexion. The devastations of small pox are thought by a few to detract from loveliness, although they may impart expression. It is frequently considered that two eyes should concur to the distinctness of one glance; and there is a prejudice (it cannot be denied) against a too pointed nose. But these are merely matters of taste, which love cannot and must not recognise. Besides—the passion of Mr. Cobb was for booty, not beauty.

It was ostensibly to cheapen a sucking-pig, but in reality to ascertain the value of Miss Betsy Griskin, that the tobacconist one day looked in upon the pork-butcher. He found him, in conversable cue, and quite prepared to go into matters at large, and to enter upon affairs in general. But, touching the one point, although Cobb glanced at it in the most salient manner—although he hopped about it, advanced towards it, and receded from it, with a most diplomatic finesse, he found the parent of his prey close—plaguy close; indeed, he afterwards said, "uncommon close." He was a cunning old rascal, that Griskin—a sly old fox, with lots of money, no doubt; but he did not wish all the world to know it. And he was right—perfectly right.

So thought Cobb;—he however gained something by his motion—he received an invitation to come frequently and take tea with the pork-butcher. That was a point gained, at all events. It was a clear case too. Griskin wanted to entrap him into the match: Cobb could not help smiling at that, he who had prepared such a spring for Miss Betsy! It was ridiculous certainly. He had his eyes open now. He should like to catch any one catching him. No more Cobb-webs for him! And, then, Griskin of all men! He was decidedly monied. Why, the hoarding old sinner!—but then he wanted to see his daughter respectably settled. That was judicious. He was a good—sensible—honest fellow. It showed a fatherly feeling.

Impressed by these convictions, Mr. Cobb renewed his ancient intimacy with Griskin. During his visits, which soon became pretty frequent, the tobacconist observed so much, and to such good purpose—saw so much to approve, and so little to condemn—was altogether so satisfied as to essentials, and so tolerant of minor objections, that (Griskin being by this time ripe for such communication) he took the liberty one night of opening the question after the hypothetical method.

"Suppose the case, that a gentleman should take a fancy to Miss Betsy, and should propose marriage, and suppose he should prove agreeable both to father and daughter—what then?"

Griskin did not appear to be taken by surprise: his reply was nearly in these words,—"Why, you know, I should be sorry to lose the girl: you know she's my only chick and child, you understand;—but, if any respectable man should take a fancy to her, then, of course, you know—"

Griskin hesitated and smoked his pipe. Mr. Cobb pressed the subject something to this effect:—"But then marriage is a serious thing. In an artificial state of society, money was an object—a consideration. In the case of death, therefore—his (Griskin's) death—how then?"

The swine-slayer looked rather blue at the contingency hinted at.

"Why—you know, what I have, in the event of death, would go to her, you know—of course."

"But then—in these cases, it was usual—very common indeed, on the day of marriage,—did Mr. Griskin perfectly comprehend his meaning?—it was usual, he said, that there should be a certain sum—money down, eh?—dowry, it was called."

Griskin laid down his pipe, and gazed at his companion. The tenor of his reply was this:—Did Mr. Cobb consider him mad? Did he (Griskin) want his daughter to leave him? Was he going to give any thing to a person for fetching her away? Could he entrust his money to a man, until he had had experience of his worth? Not he! He didn't like that system; and, when Cobb was about to argue the matter coolly, and to show how much better now was than then, he was cut short by the peremptory dissyllable, "Gammon!"

Cobb pondered intensely upon the extractable matter to be gathered out of Griskin's discourse. One thing was at least certain,—he could obtain his daughter, if he pleased. But the main point was still open. The old gentleman might still come round. He tried him again, therefore, and often; but the old gentleman—perhaps because pigs were the staple of his thoughts—had become pig-headed, and would not listen to reason, or what Mr. Drinkwhistle Cobb believed to be so. The tobacconist concluded in his own mind that all wealthy people will have their own way; and, having taken a sober and sedate view of the question, he decided upon submitting himself and his pretensions for Griskin's acceptance forthwith. He did so, and was referred in due form to the daughter.

Cupidity is as powerful as Cupid; and, if Mr. Cobb did not enter upon the business with very sentimental palpitations, he was quite as successful as the lover who pleads his suit in the most impassioned blank verse.

This little matter was settled, every thing went on smoothly enough. Mr. Cobb surveyed and estimated his wardrobe with a view to ascertain whether any and what additions might be made thereto. A strange little woman, who seemed formed for the purpose, was engaged by Miss Griskin, at so much a day and her meals, to complete the wedding-paraphernalia; and ladies elbowed each other at church, when Cobb appeared—some thinking how funny, others how strange, and others again how unfortunate, that he should have made such a choice.

One morning Mr. Cobb was sitting behind his comptoir, pondering on his anticipated change of condition, when the entrance of Mr. Larkins into the shop, to have his box replenished, recalled his wandering thoughts into their most legitimate channel—business. Mr. Larkins was an old gentleman who had been for many years past stamped by the neighbourhood as the most inveterate newsmonger extant; and the wonder was that he had not long ago been required to get himself stamped every morning at Somerset House and to pay the duty. Upon this occasion, however, he came to imbibe, and not to convey intelligence.

"Well, going to be married again, Cobb?" said Larkins.

"I am about to be united, certainly," answered the tobacconist.

"To Miss Griskin?"

"To that lady."

"Ah! I wish you joy—ahem!"

"Thank'ee," said Cobb; but there was something which he could not but consider strange in the tone adopted by Larkins.

"Money in that quarter, I fancy—isn't there?" enquired Larkins.

"Why, yes—a little," replied the other.

"Ah! I wish you may get it," said Larkins.

"Eh!"

"I wish you may get it, I say. Money is a scarce article—very scarce. I find it so."

"True—very true," said Cobb, somewhat relieved.

"Did you know the mother, eh?" enquired Larkins.

"I had not the pleasure of knowing the mother," was the reply.

"She was a nice woman," said Larkins—"a very nice woman. Strange you don't find children take after their parents, sometimes. But tempers will vary. We are all frail creatures, Cobb. Pity you didn't know when you were well off. Good morning, Cobb;" and ere the tobacconist could arrest his retreating steps by speaking a word, the old gentleman had departed.

Shortly after this conversation, Cobb left the shop to the care of the assistant, and retired to his little parlour. Here was a terrible suspicion raised in his mind. Cobb loved money, to be sure; but life was precious also, and he did not choose to be saddled by or bridled with a second Martha Murgatroyd. But stop! Larkins was the most calumniating old fellow in the whole parish!

In the midst of these ruminations, a lady entered the shop, with a bonnet like an inverted black japanned coal-scuttle. It was Mrs. Draper!

"Ah! Mr. Cobb," said that lady, as the tobacconist returned to the shop to serve her, "I'm so glad to see you. What do you think I heard just now? That you were going to marry Griskin's girl. It can't be true?"

"My dear Madam—"

"Oh! I never believed it," interrupted Mrs. Draper; "such an infamous temper never would suit you. Besides, her manners is so vulgar, she'd never be fit for the bakkiniat's business."

"Will you have the kindness—"

"Oh! I told Mrs. Malony down by the pump there, that it was all nonsense; but she had heard it from Mrs. Grubb, who was told of it by the pot-boy at the Dog's Nose—"

"Here is the snuff—three pence," said Cobb, doggedly.

"Well—well—good bye," rejoined Mrs. Draper; "I see as how you're vexed at the report as is got abroad; but I never was afeard it was true. I know our neighbourhood too well for that, since I've lived in it goin' on for fourteen year now, come next Christmas!"

Mrs. Draper departed the shop, and Mr. Cobb nearly departed this life—the former with her snuff, and the latter with his vexation. As he gazed round his shop, it seemed to him as if the little negro on one side of the door was veritably leering maliciously at the Highlander on the other; and when he retired to bed that night, the portrait of Mr. Hodgkinson, which had for some years officiated as a chimney-board, appeared to wear a quizzical expression about the eyes which he had not heretofore remarked.

Next morning Mr. Drinkwhistle Cobb walked to his small desk in his small counting-house, and, taking a sheet of paper, wrote the following letter.

"Sir,—An unforeseen distressing circumstance compels me to relinquish the hand of your amiable daughter. Be assured, I shall, during my existence, entertain a lively sense of her excellent qualities. I will explain more hereafter. Meanwhile, believe me to be, &c.

"DRINKWHISTLE COBB."

Having despatched this laconic epistle, Mr. Cobb sat down to felicitate himself upon the measure which he had adopted. He was however slightly startled when he saw Mr. Griskin's boy enter the shop, and hand him a letter, of which the following is a copy:—

"Mr. Drinkwhistle Cobb,

"Sir,

You wants to edge off; but it's no go. You shan't play upon the girls feelings in this here unperwoked manner. I'll tell you what I mean to do: it's a thing I can't abear, but I must. I shall put the bisness into the hands of Rackem and Wrench; and if they don't serve you out, my name's not

"THOMAS GRISKIN."

Here was a precious piece of business! Cobb said advisably, that it was "an uncommon rum go." To be plunged into a vortex of litigation, was deplorable: he should certainly lose his all, and get nothing. That must not be:—but how could he escape? Cobb sorted together his multitudinous thoughts, and at length selected the following:—Griskin was rich! He (Cobb) therefore had a reversionary interest in Griskin. Griskin was more than sixty, was afflicted with asthma, had a short neck, and was no bad subject for apoplexy. And, then, Miss Griskin herself was no chicken—and was very delicate. No actuary at a life-office would have withstood this reasoning: Cobb therefore put on his hat, and hastened towards the house of the pork-butcher.

He found that gentleman on the point of going out, and he stopped him by saying, "My dear Mr. Griskin, hear me for one moment."

"I won't hear nothing, you know," said Griskin, "without a witness."

"My dear Sir—"

"Here, Chitterling," cried Mr. Griskin, calling his man into the back-parlour, where this colloquy took place; and the man accordingly rushed in with his abirt sleeves rolled up to the shoulder-blade, and looking like a gymnast prepared for combat.

"There, sit down there, Chitterling," continued Mr. Griskin, pointing to a chair: "the sassage machine 'll mind itself for a few moments; as I want you to listen to wot this here gen'leman may have to say."

Chitterling intimated that the sassage machine was well supplied and he then leant his great brawny arms upon the table, and fixed his frightfully extended eyes upon the countenance of Cobb, with a look of profound attention. Cobb was fain to state, with artful solemnity, that he had recently met with a severe pecuniary loss, which he thought might prevent him from entering into a contract otherwise so highly desirable.

"And so it was nothing you heard about me?" said Mr. Griskin.

"My dear sir, how could that be?" replied Cobb; "so respectable an inhabitant of the parish—"

"Why, then," said Griskin, appeased, "enough of that, you know. But do you think I think worse of a man because he's poor? I should be a despicable wretch, if I did. Why, you don't—do you?"

"Not I," said Cobb. "But let me hope that Miss Griskin has not been informed—"

"Not a word, all right—ain't it Chitterling?" said Griskin, and he shook Cobb's hand with great cordiality. And that business was settled.

And here I would willingly drop the pen, and leave it to the reader's imagination to conceive what sort of a marriage (which, by the bye, Griskin urged on with strong rapidity) Mr. Drinkwhistle Cobb made of it. But it may be as well to say that Miss Griskin made him a much better wife than from all he had heard of her, he had expected, and, from what the reader has seen of him, he deserved.

And perhaps it is necessary also, to mention this trifling incident. On the very day week after his marriage, Mr. Drinkwhistle Cobb, taking up the newspaper and casting his eyes casually on the columns, found his vision magnetically attracted by the following words, printed so plainly that the compositor must have selected new type for the occasion:—

"THOMAS GRISKIN, Pork-butcher, 73, — Street. To surrender at Basinghall Street, Dec. 6, and Jan. 11, Solicitors, Rackem and Wrench. Official Assignee, Mr. Tucker."

A little above this announcement, and in a bolder letter, were the words—"LIST OF BANKRUPTS."

THE TEETOTAL "CLOUD OF WITNESSES."

We have often observed in the columns of The Teetotaler that the whole system of drinking alcoholic liquors is based upon a delusion; and on looking for the fiftieth time, a few days ago, over Mr. Grindrod's admirable work Bacchus, we were delighted to find the numerous authorities he had quoted in support of this opinion. The delusion consists in the belief that there are certain times and conditions when alcoholic liquor is either useful or necessary; but it appears that, with the exception of a very few cases where it may be prescribed in medical treatment, there are no circumstances under which it can be termed useful or necessary. Frederick Hoffman says, "Pure water is the best drink for persons of all temperaments; it promotes a free and equable circulation of the blood, on which the due performance of every animal function depends. Water-drinkers are not only the most active and vigorous, but the most healthy and cheerful." Michaelis says, that "man is naturally a water-drinker; and when he is so, seldom fails to be cheerful and happy. His first step in the descending scale is to become a drinker of wine."

Mr. Grindrod himself assures us that "intoxicating liquors merely stimulate or accelerate the vital actions, and do not increase the actual strength of the physical powers." The celebrated American writer, Dr. Rush, in his Inquiry into the Effects of Spirituous Liquors, positively declares that no error is greater than that which supposes "that spirituous liquors lessen the effects of cold upon the body. On the contrary," he adds, "they always render the body more liable to be affected and injured by cold. The temporary warmth they produce is invariably succeeded by chilliness." In Rees' Encyclopædia, under the head of "Cold," there is a most interesting account of the results of a number of attempts to winter in the arctic regions: and from that account we select the following extract:—"The three principal circumstances which distinguish the fatal attempts from those which succeeded, are, that in the former instances, the men fed on salt provisions, drank spirituous liquors, and lived in indolence; whereas, the men who survived the winter, and were but slightly affected by, or altogether escaped, the scurvy, fed upon fresh animal food, or at least preserved without salt: they drank water only, and used much exercise. On the value of fresh meat and exercise as preventives of disease, it is unnecessary to comment. With respect to the use of spirituous liquors, the preceding facts are extremely important and satisfactory. These pernicious liquors, indeed, are now generally understood to be prejudicial during severe and continued cold, although they may afford some support against the temporary effects of cold and moisture. The brief elevation of spirits which they produce is a very fallacious token of their good effects, as it is always succeeded by the greater depression, and therefore tends rather to exhaust than to invigorate the principles of vitality."

The individual, who has not embraced the doctrines of Teetotalism, nor studied its elementary principles, is perfectly unaware of the importance and the extent of the testimony that can be brought against the drinking usages which have entailed so much misery upon the world. "Coachmen," says Mr. Grindrod, "who travel both by day and night during the most severe frosts of winter, are enabled the better to withstand the effects of cold, by entirely abstaining from all kinds of alcoholic stimulants, and partaking only of tea, coffee, or simple water." With respect to the idea that spirituous liquors diminish the effects of heat upon the body, we have numerous authorities to refute it. Dr. Mosely declares in his work on tropical diseases, that from his own "knowledge and custom, as well as from the custom and observation of others, those who drink nothing but water, or make it their principal drink, are but little affected by the climate, and can undergo the greatest fatigue without inconvenience." Dr. Rush observes that "half of the diseases which are said to be produced by warm weather, are originated by the spirits which are swallowed to lessen its effects upon the system." Speaking of France, Lady Morgan says, "The very trifling abuse of spirituous liquors which occurs in France, and the little intercourse which subsists between that country and the West Indies, very much exempt the inhabitants from that class of liver complaints which are so abundant in England, and which, masked under various insidious forms, extend to a vast many complications of disease. The same abstinence also operates to simplify fever, and to render its connexion with visceral obstructions less common and less violent."

Speaking of the effects of alcoholic liquor upon the frame, with regard to enabling it to support fatigue, Dr. Beddoes has the following remark:—"I shall go far towards convincing every thinking reader, and it may stagger the most obstinate, if I show that the hardest out-of-doors summer work is in some places perfectly well borne without a single drop of strong fermented liquor. The drink of one day exhausts the frame more than the sober exertions of three; though without such a help as strong liquor, a hot sun and a long day's hard labour are sure to produce fever enough. This fever should never be fomented by such things as drive on the heart to beat with fresh fury, although in so doing they may give the spirits a momentary excitement: it ought, on the contrary, to be kept down by diluting drinks." M. Grindrod concludes his chapter upon popular errors in respect to alcoholic drinks with these words:—"On a candid review of the preceding observations and facts, it will surely be acknowledged that the delusion in question has been one of the most fallacious, as well as deeply-rooted and fatal, that ever took possession of the human mind." Let us add, in conclusion, that Mr. Grindrod's Bacchus is decidedly one of the most talented productions of the age.

COMPOSITION.

THE article, which appeared in our columns, under the title of "Versification," a short time since, seems to have given such general satisfaction, if we may judge by the letters we have received from various correspondents, that we have thought it incumbent upon us to lay down the fundamental rules of Composition, either in respect to prose or verse. In undertaking this task, our chief aim will be to correct those errors which most frequently occur in the compositions of persons whose educations have not been conducted upon very extended principles.

One of the principal faults usually observed in such cases is the redundant use of the conjunction and; for example,—"Drinking is very injurious to men, and ruins them mentally and bodily, and destroys their families, and creates domestic unhappiness; and therefore drinking should be altogether avoided." A little care in the composition of this sentence would have arranged it thus:—"Drinking is very injurious to men: it ruins them mentally and bodily; it destroys their families, and creates domestic unhappiness. Drinking, therefore, should be altogether avoided."

The proper use of the pronouns should be learnt with accuracy. Many persons say or write, "There are men which hold such opinions;" or "There are able advocates which will now address you." The word who should be used in such cases: which is neuter, and applies to inanimate things, or those living species that are not human. "The snake which stung me,"—"The house which he built," are correct. Which may also be used when relating to a noun of multitude; as,—"The audience which he addressed,"—"The crowd which dispersed,"—"The meeting which applauded,"—"The army which was conquered," &c. &c.

With regard to nouns of multitude, the verbs, which they govern, may be either singular or plural. It is as correct to write, "The multitude were dispersed," as "The multitude was dispersed;" or "The committee were addressed," as "The committee was addressed."

Great care should be taken in placing the pronouns in such a way as to leave no doubt concerning the particular antecedent to which the relative may refer. In such a sentence as the following, this care is not taken:—

"The national opinion with regard to the evil effects of intemperance, which no individual can control, &c." The pronoun which may either refer to the national opinion or to the effects of intemperance. It is however very easy to remove all room for doubt. If the writer of such a sentence intended the pronoun to relate to the national opinion, he might place his phraseology thus,— "The national opinion with regard to the evil effects of intemperance,—that opinion which no individual can control, &c." And if he required the pronoun to allude to the effects of intemperance, he could compose his sentence in this manner,— "The national opinion with regard to the evil effects of intemperance,—effects which no individual can control, &c." A second instance of the necessity of care in the proper use of the pronouns may be illustrated by this sentence,— "The man in the power of a creditor, who knows not what course to pursue, &c." If the pronoun who should refer to the man, the sentence should stand thus,— "The man in the power of a creditor, and who knows not what course to pursue, &c." The conjunction and may here be used, because the pronoun who is understood in the first part of the sentence, which ought, strictly speaking, to be written in this manner,— "The man, who is in the power of a creditor, and who knows not what course to pursue, &c."

Great difficulty is frequently experienced by those who have not received a perfect grammatical education, in discriminating between the proper times to make use of were and was. Were is not only the plural in one mood, but also the singular in another. When a sentence is simply indicative, as "A man was going to London," then was is used; but if the sentence expressed a condition or a wish, then were should be used,—thus, "If a man were going to London,"—or, "I would that some man were going to London, &c." The conditional mood always requires the use of the word were; ex. gra. "Although he were a man of good character, I would not employ him;" but if no condition, but an absolute affirmative should be expressed, then the sentence would stand thus,— "Although he was really a man of good character, I did not employ him."

The word that is frequently used as a pronoun, but should be so used with caution, and only to vary a sentence, for the sake of euphony. Thus, instead of saying, "The man went to the chapel, which is in Aldersgate Street, and signed the pledge, which is so conducive to real happiness,"—we should say, "The man went to the chapel, which is in Aldersgate Street, and signed the pledge that is so conducive to real happiness." A member in the House of Commons once made the following observation,— "I declare most positively that that, that that man said, is false!" He should have said,— "I declare that that, which that man said is false." Had he studied euphony of expression, he would have varied the remark in some way like the following one,— "I declare that the statement, which was put forth by the man, to whom allusion has been made, is false." Here the same pronoun is only used once, and there are only two pronouns in the sentence. In the sentence where that is repeated four times, the first that is used as an adverb, and the other three as pronouns.

The verb is invariably used, with its plural termination, in cases where conditions or real doubts are expressed. Instead of saying, "If my father does go to Canterbury to-morrow," we should say, "If my father do go to Canterbury to-morrow." A second example of this rule is afforded by the following sentence:—"Although he requires the document by Monday next, it will not be ready for him:"—to say, "Although he *require*s the document, &c.," would be incorrect. In the same way, it would be improper to say, "If I am decided to address you again;"—the sentence should stand thus,— "If I be decided to address you again, &c.;" and, farther, "If there be no more to write, we may fold up the letter,"—instead of "If there is no more, &c."

In the English language two negatives make an affirmative. Thus, if we say—"I did not mean to do him no injury,"—or, "I did not intend to do nothing to him," it is the same as saying the precise contrary. To speak correctly, these sentences should thus be arranged,— "I did not mean to do him any injury,"—and "I did not intend to do anything to him." In the Greek language, two negatives strengthen the denial or refusal; and for this reason, Milton, availing himself of poetical licence, has once or twice employed the Greek idiom in his poem. But this usage of two negatives is really improper in English composition. "Nor do I not deny th' ambitious aim, &c." is to say, properly speaking, "I do deny the ambitious aim;" the word not should have been left out to constitute correct phraseology. Poetry, however, admits of many licences, amongst which the transposition and total omission of words are the principal.

Even men of education have imbibed certain errors with regard to the proper use of words,—errors which cannot be too promptly corrected. "I deign to look upon you," is to say "I condescend to look upon you," and not (as is intended) "I disdain to look upon you." Again,— "I would not demean myself in such a manner," does not express this sentence—"I will not degrade myself in such a manner;" but simply, "I will not conduct myself in such a manner." The verb demean signifies to behave, to conduct, and not to degrade one's-self. To use the word Temperance to express total abstinence, is incorrect. Temperance signifies a temperate, or moderate use, of anything. For this reason, the globe is divided into zones, named according to their relative degrees of heat; viz., the Frigid Zone, the Temperate Zone, and the Torrid Zone. The Temperate, or Intermediate, or Moderate degree of heat is here expressed. The readers of this journal will observe that we make use the word Teetotalism upon almost all occasions to express total abstinence, which idea is not represented by the word Temperance.

Many words have been borrowed from the French, and other languages,—or are formed of compound words in the English languages; and, however these words may be pronounced, care should be taken to write them correctly. There is a species of cherry which was originally imported from Médoc, in France: when alluded to, we should write Médoc cherries, and not May-duke cherries, although the latter be the pronunciation of the first word. Instead of writing a Welsh Rabbit, we should say, a Welsh rare-bit. A Bay-window, and not a Bow-window, is correct. To show the reader how words may be corrupted, we need only observe that Curmudgeon is formed of the two French words Cœur Méchant (a "bad heart.") The exclamation of the crier in the courts of justice in England,— "Oh! yes! oh! yes! oh! yes!" is a corruption of the French word Oyez ("Listen!") The word Bourgeois (the name of a particular kind of type) is a French word, the pronunciation of which is Anglicised: Long Primer (another name for a peculiar species of type) is a corruption of the French term for the same article—Longue Premier. Nearly all the words used in military drills, or evolutions, and in fortification, are either pure or corrupted French; viz., Echelon, deploy, march, manœuvre, alignement (Echelonner, deployer, marcher, manœuvrer, alignement); and Counterscarp, escarp, demilune, bastion, glacis, fascines (Contrescarpe, escarpe, demilune, bastion, glacis, fascines), &c.

One of the principal errors into which unstudied composers fall, is the repetition of the same word so closely to each other, as to destroy the euphony of the sentence or paragraph. This is called tautology: the composer must therefore exercise his memory, and find, on the second occasion, another word of the same meaning, or else adroitly express the first by means of a relative. Long sentences and a great redundancy of verbiage are striking defects; and a nice discrimination is required in the use of very metaphorical language, for fear it should verge into bombast. There is but so small an interval between the sublime and the ridiculous—between high-flown language and absurd twaddle, that the young composer had better avoid rhetorical flourishes as much as possible. When an English poet writes—

"Oh! for a lay, loud as the surge
That lashes Lapland's sounding shore"

—he committed to paper a most ridiculous idea, instead of a sublime one, at which he aimed.

The next article we shall publish upon the subject of literary study, will relate to the CHOICE OF LANGUAGE IN PROSE AND VERS.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

AMBITION.

By Mrs. Reynolds.

Oft does th' unconscious vessel fly
To distant coasts where billows high
In dread confusion roar;
And, of the danger unaware,
Hoping to find a refuge there,
She splits upon the shore;—
So does ambition urge us on Inviting power to gain!
And when our highest hopes are won,
We find our happiness undone
By that we would attain.
Ambition bids us stoop to crime,
And bears unto the latest time
Of frailty many a token;
The wisest often fall away,
And chiefs regret their peace decay.
When honour's laws are broken,
Ambition is the nurse of woe,
And hastens to the grave,
Of life the evanescent glow,
And bids the crimson current flow
From them it cannot save!

DEATH AND ETERNITY.

By Mrs. Reynolds.

Hast ever mark'd the fading spirit fly—
The parting of the body and the soul?
There is a kind of mental agony,
As it would seem, that often thrills the whole
Of the decaying frame, as to its soul
The vital breath is ebbing sure and fast:—
Perchance a secret dread, beyond control,
During brief retrospection of the past,
And shudd'ring what may be th' eternal doom at last?
O! let this be the virtuous Christian's stay,
When he remarks a parent's race is o'er,
That though the vital tide be pass'd away,
And the soul fled to a far distant shore,
Yet they shall meet again, for evermore
To dwell in happiness, and in the sleight
Of Him who bids the stormy ocean roar,
Who made the world, the darkness, and the light,
And dwells omnipotent in regions infinite!
Sopremely blest shall be their state above—
For ne'er the virtuous can have roll'd in vain,
Or liv'd for ought in vanity and love
With those on earth! When they shall meet again
All they held dear, in the celestial train,
Joy shall transfigure its radiance to their eyes,
And they shall reap reward for all their pain,
What time the trump shall echo through the skies,
And earth and sea shall render all that in them lies:

And when the boasting Sadducee shall hear
The knell of future woe for him to be;
And when the proud Idollater shall mark
The ruin of his false divinity!
And when the truth upon the Pharisee
Shall break in all its terror, that his prayer,
Array'd in guises of hypocrisy,
Has fail'd to save him from a long despair;
For heav'n is won by truth,—no hypocrite is there!

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We regret that G. A. R.'s article will not suit our columns, as it contains remarks upon subjects which have already been treated of in this Journal. We however thank him for his kind intentions.

Mr. W. Rodhouse, of Coventry, is thanked for his letter. He will perceive that we have anticipated the subject of his communication in our Journal of last week.

We beg to call the attention of the Reader to the Tenth Number of a Series of Illustrations, which is given gratis with "THE TEETOTALER" of this day.

The Series will be complete in Twelve Illustrations, and will be continued for as many consecutive weeks.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1841.

THE real and avowed object of Teetotalism is to extirpate the vice of intemperance from the earth, and to propagate the salutary doctrines of unexceptionable abstinence from all intoxicating liquors. It would therefore seem natural that the advocates of Teetotalism should adopt all possible measures, that are honourable and legitimate, to accomplish their object; and that they should hail, with unfeigned joy, the establishment of new Societies and new journals upon similar principles. The increase of Teetotal Associations, and the extension of the Teetotal press, should be considered the certain evidences of triumph and success; and should encourage pre-existing associations and journals to renewed exertions. But, alas! such is not always the case. There are certain individuals who style themselves Teetotalers, and who probably practise the doctrine from interested motives, but from whose tongues emanate the most cordial expressions of hatred against those societies which they are pleased to consider the rivals of their own. All their ideas seem to be centred in the words "opposition" and "competition;" and some of these persons have not hesitated to declare, upon public platforms, that they hoped "such-and-such an Association would speedily fall to the ground." They have prophesied such a fate for several organized bodies of Teetotalers now in flourishing circumstances; and their heart-felt wish has been the parent of the prediction.

We regret to be compelled to notice such conduct in our columns: we regret that we should be compelled to expose it to those of our readers (and we have some thousands) who have not as yet joined Teetotal Associations;—but we are only fulfilling a duty, albeit a painful one, which circumstances have imposed upon us. What can we think of such individuals as those to whom allusion has been made above? Are they not, in fact, as inveterate enemies to the real interests of the cause as the publicans and vintners themselves? To exult over the fall of any Teetotal society, or to predict such an occurrence with savage glee, is to divulge the real sentiments which originally induced such men to join the ranks of those who are embarked in this great work of moral reformation;—and these sentiments are interest and views of pecuniary advantage. We earnestly entreat all Teetotal audiences to express, in the strongest terms, their disapprobation of such disgraceful conduct as that to which we have ere now alluded, whenever they see it displayed upon any platform. The cause sustains the greatest injury from these paltry discussions and feuds; and the world beyond the sphere of Teetotalism imagines that "we are split amongst ourselves." If such an opinion be suffered to gain ground, the doctrine of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors will not experience that rapid popularity which its true friends hope to see realized.

While we are recording our observations upon this very important subject, we shall avail ourselves of the opportunity to make a few remarks upon the disgraceful attempts set on foot in certain quarters to injure the circulation and reputation of The Teetotaler journal. At the commencement of this publication, its enemies declared that its price and its plan were against its success. It was argued that a journal, which admitted tales and light matter, would not suit the Teetotal world. But these opinions were speedily refuted. The Teetotal world liberally supported the publication; and the variety of its matter ensured it immediate popularity. Its enemies saw that it was prospering; and their wits were set to work to imagine a means of injuring it. With a policy more infernal than that which suggested to Khalil Tschendereli the establishment of the corps of Janizzaries,—with a malignity more despicable than that which prompts the vindictive wretch to throw vitriol upon the countenance of his enemy,—and with a restless energy, well deserving a better cause, did the opponents of The Teetotaler circulate a report that its columns contained matter of an infidel and irreligious tendency. This execrable falsehood was industriously circulated, and produced more or less effect upon weak minds. And yet, we can safely challenge our enemies and the whole world, to select one sentence of an infidel or irreligious tendency from the pages of The Teetotaler, from its commencement up to the present day. On the contrary—yes, reader, mark—on the contrary, the spirit of the matter contained in this journal is, and always has been, of a purely moral tendency, having the Christian creed as its firm and unalterable basis. In the third Number of The Teetotaler, the Leading Article contains the following words,—“A word shall never appear in its columns which may call a blush to the cheek of the most fastidious, or militate against the religious sentiments of the most punctilious.” In the fifth Number, also in the Leading Article, we observed that “we do not believe that any minister of the Gospel would have the unblushing effrontery to come forward, and maintain, by implication, that the Saviour of the world would advocate that habit which has destroyed more lives than the sword” (alluding to the miracle performed at Cana in Galilee). “God alone can replace Man, by man destroyed,” says the Article entitled “The Mechanism of Art and of Nature” in the sixth Number. The Article called “Instinct and Reason,” in the seventh Number, is written expressly to prove the immortality of the soul of man. In the Leading Article of Number XVI, the following passage occurs:—“The principles of total abstinence have turned men away from the paths which lead to the ale-house, and taught them to pursue those that conduct their steps to the shrine of the Almighty.” These quotations will at once give an unequalled denial to the base calumnies of our enemies; and, in addition to this evidence, we may call the attention of the public to the readiness with which we have always extracted from religious publications, when connected with Teetotalism. We again repeat, that we defy the world to produce one passage in the columns of any Number of this journal, which at all “militates against the religious sentiments of the most punctilious.”

To stab a man in the dark is not a more dastardly act than to raise against him the cry of infidelity. Men of rightly-constituted minds are not swayed by such infamous calumny; but those individuals, whose imaginations are weak and prejudices strong, readily imbibe the scandalous opinion, and retail it again. Despicable indeed must be the characters of those wretches, who have recourse to such means of petty vengeance as these.

We commenced our editorial superintendence of The Teetotaler, with the determination of providing for our readers not only a journal which should inculcate and support the doctrines of Teetotalism, but which should also afford them general information and amusement at the same time. The immense circulation which The Teetotaler now enjoys is the best test of the success of our plan; and our continuous endeavours shall still be to supply our readers with a good family journal, the variety of whose contents shall relieve the mind from the monotony attendant upon one particular study. We have received hundreds of letters acknowledging conversions from habits of intemperance or moderate-drinking to those of total abstinence,—conversions effected by this publication; and the fearlessness with which we have exposed abuses where abuses exist, and where they seem to regard the principle we advocate, has obtained for us general applause. The Teetotaler is, moreover, at this moment the cheapest periodical of the day, when the illustrations given with it are considered; and, placing them aside, it is still the cheapest, Chamber's Edinburgh Journal alone excepted. It is for these several reasons that the public has generously and nobly accorded us its patronage; and, so long as we please generally, we shall not do otherwise than smile at the impotent attempts of a few envious individuals to injure us.

Supposing that those aforesaid envious individuals had succeeded in swamping this journal, as they hoped and predicted, would they not have inflicted a grievous injury upon the cause of Teetotalism? Would not the publicans and anti-teetotalers generally have hailed the fall of a Teetotal publication as a sign of their own victory? Most assuredly would such have been their boasting. But the malignant enemies, who raised the false cry of infidelity against us, would not have felt one pang at the blow thus struck at Teetotalism, so long as their own selfish views were accomplished, and their nefarious plans proved successful. This observation shows how sincere are they in the Teetotal cause, and how much of their own private interests they sacrifice for the welfare of that principle of which upon public platforms they declare themselves to be so deeply enamoured. At the outset of this article, we had intended to have published the names, occupations, and residences, of several of the envious calumniators here alluded to; but we shall demonstrate in this respect the forbearance which is taught by the Christian creed,—that creed which we practise without affectation, and which they affect without practice.

We certainly have a right to mistrust the sincerity of the Christian professions of those who deal in the vilest and most uncharitable of all scandal. “Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour,” is a precept which should have its weight not only in a public tribunal of justice, but also in private life. But how can they attempt to follow so divine a command, whose hearts are not free “from envy, hatred, and malice, and all uncharitableness.” Back in their own teeth do we hurl the accusation of infidelity: upon them rebounds the barbed and poisoned arrow they aimed at us. It is not by simply declaring themselves to be Christians, that the world will regard them as such. Interested motives will induce millions to proclaim their religious piety; but we may be permitted to doubt its sincerity, unless its assertion be supported by actions. If the individuals, who assailed ourselves in the manner above described, wish to acquire the characters of Christians, let them practise the doctrines of Christianity;—let them act openly, honourably, and fearlessly, and not endeavour to encompass their aims by a system of back-biting, scandal, and vilification. These are the deeds of true Christians;—but words are too frequently considered before actions in the minds of the weak and uneducated. Let it also be remembered that those who negligently suffer themselves to be biassed, to the prejudice of their fellow-creatures, by the wicked calumny of others, are only one degree removed from the original propagators of the slander themselves; because it is the duty of every honourable and just man to weigh well and investigate the attacks made upon the characters of third parties, before he allows them to make any impression upon his mind.

AURINIA, THE VICTIM.

BY JOHN WILSON ROSS, AUTHOR OF “NINIAN.”

I.

It was in those ancient times when foreign conquest had not yet given to the west of Europe the dubious advantages of civilized slavery in exchange for rude independence, that Gallia, which the hands of the succeeding generations have ploughed, and tilled, and cultivated, offered to the sight nothing but dreary forests, vast marshes, and wide waste plains studded with innumerable villages, and now and then a few cities surrounded by the walls which no Vauban or Cormontaigne had yet systematized.

The men, whose manners were barbarous though simple, were tall in stature, and the beauty of the women was in strict harmony with the majesty of their wild nature. Such were those noble people the Gauls and Celts, now so often confounded under the same name—those fair, blue-eyed Gauls, who when the period of their warlike colony had passed away, traversed the whole of Europe, penetrated into Asia—the cradle of their race—and afterwards took by assault the haughty Rome.

In spite of the names of Barbarians which was given to these ancient Gauls by the Greeks, and their foes the Romans, they nevertheless surpassed those miserable people who exist at the present day in a savage state in New Zealand, and who are so immersed in moral obscurity, that bodily strength among them constitutes a title to consideration, and consequently a more cruel servitude is inflicted on the softer sex, inasmuch as woman, on account of her physical debility, is placed under the brutal dominion of man.

Far different was the lot of women among the Gauls, in spite of their sanguinary religion, and the warlike habits which somewhat augmented the severity of their character; esteem and affection for the female sex seemed innate in this heroic race. The Gauls made them not their companions like the Cavaliers of the middle ages, merely for the purposes of passive adoration, oftentimes tyrannical in proportion as it was contrary to their divinity. Women in those ages were much superior to women in the middle ages; their advice was listened to, and their opinions taken; their countenances were auxiliaries, and their voices fraught with inspiration to the warrior in the field of battle; they were regarded as the prophetesses of his destiny. Their mystical exaltation, their unexpected inspirations, and their sublimity, which sufficiently compensated for a less vigorous intellect, induced these people to attribute to them supernatural faculties. They imagined that their gods had revealed to this sex the mysteries of reading the future, and even the power of commanding the elements.

Hence originated enchantresses, of whom traditions, much disfigured, it is true, have nevertheless served to allure our infancy.

Besides these extraordinary women who exercised for a long time a strong influence over the destiny of the Gallic and Teutonic nations, there were colleges of Druidesses organized throughout different parts of Gallia, like those of the Druids, the formidable priests of the Celts. The most renowned of these assemblies, dedicated to the worship of the Gallo-Celtic deities, was in the island of Syesia, situate at the mouth of the Manica, between Armorica and Britain.

Such was for many ages the state of Gallia, till the Romans, already masters of the province of Rodano, ventured to penetrate into Central Gallia, favoured by the dissension of its own inhabitants. These united, not before it was too late, against the common foe, and soon the reports of the Roman victories spread to the remotest extremity of the country.

II.

It was the last night of the year. From a dark grove of the forest of Armorica were seen the flashing of a thousand torches, and a long procession of phantoms clad in white garments moving slowly in death-like silence. It was the band of the Druids and the people of Lemorrici coming to seek in the barks of their oaks the Sacred Mistletoe of the New Year. By the rays of the moon and the lustre of their torches, they sought and resought in vain, regarding each other in silent sadness, for their fruitless search announced the wrath of Heaven. Suddenly the dry leaves rustled beneath some hasty steps, and a breathless warrior rushed into the midst of the band.

“Woe! woe!” he cried, “woe to our country! Alas! that the gods protect us no longer! The great city Alessia is destroyed; and after a two years’ siege, its walls are now crumbling before Julius Cæsar. The leader of the Gauls is the conqueror’s prisoner, and the deputies of Cæsar are marching towards Armorica.”

A fearful shudder passed through the crowd.

“Silence!” exclaimed a voice; and in silence the priestess Aurinia advanced; her eyes sparkling, her brow garlanded with vervain, and her dark hair streaming in the wild breeze of the night: “Alas! ye gods, reveal to us our impiety! Woe to you, Armoricans, if you appease not the gods that have vowed vengeance against you in their anger! You have neglected their worship; you, Gauls, stand harassed by the very bands of Gauls: behold, thence, our Alessia taken! behold, thence, the sacred tree concealed from our search! Pacify the mysterious power! Dedicate to Hy-ra-Bras* the first strangers that shall profane our solitude, and Armorica shall yet be safe from invasion. He that shall defraud the Great Spirit of his victims shall be given alive to the flames, slain for the black Teutates—the god of vengeance!—Do you swear?”

“We swear!”

III.

There was heard the sound of rustling arms in the frontiers of Armorica. The Romans, governors of the country of the Cenomani, had entered the peninsula of Brittany, and were waiting from day to day the approach of the victors.

Aurinia was wandering beneath the grove of oaks, pondering on her terrible vow, and the fate of her country, when a distant noise sounded through the forest. The Celtic troops were disturbing the sacred place with the voice of mirth. Immediately afterwards a numerous band of Armoricans presented itself to the sight of the priestess, dragging along, bound two by two, a hundred men of dark complexions, covered with foreign armour.

“Rejoice, prophetess Aurinia,” exclaimed the victors, “for you are about to fulfil your vow to Hy-ra-bras. A party of Roman knights are captives in our chains; hither they approach, we have preserved them for our Great Deity.”

Aurinia answered not—she leant against a tree—her heart beat violently—a mist covered her eyes. When she raised her head, she met the full gaze of the vanquished chief contemplating her with admiration. Uttering something in an unknown language, he lifted up his bound hands towards her, but with an inhuman shout he was dragged across the grove with his unfortunate companions.

* Hy—the great—the great God

Aurinia could not drive from her mind the form of the pale and bleeding youth, noble, and even engaging, in his adversity. She now no longer commanded that maddening sacrifice which her fatal vow required of her—contending emotions agitated her breast—the inexorable Druidess had become a woman.

She passed into the deep wood, where in her terror she accused herself of impiety, for she felt the horror of her vow, and cursed the victory which had so soon caused its fulfilment. When her functions were called for at the dark ceremonies, she assisted not, for her thoughts were too profane. She fled across the Blavet into the county of the Veneli, thinking thus to escape in flight the pangs of misery and remorse which racked her bosom. Here she soon lost herself amid the thousand paths of the forest. And the next morning found her reduced by fatigue, sleeping at the foot of a young oak. A confused remembrance seized her when she awoke, but the first glance showed her, alas! her sad solitude.

Behind her extended a vast lake, and over against it stood a dense crowd of gigantic trees girt everywhere by immense rocks of granite. As she was strolling beneath these rocks, she fancied a high meinhir or Druidic column, uttered an exclamation of surprise, which induced her to take flight, but a kind of fascination attracted her towards the trees. Darting into a shady path, she pursued her way till she suddenly discovered herself to be in a small plain that stretched circularly in the middle of the wood. Some enormous stones were placed upon the sands in a mysterious order: in the centre a grand Dolmen elevated itself above four columns; and a granite table, stained in many places with human blood, met her eyes.

It had the appearance of such a terrible altar that it caused a cold perspiration to creep over Aurinia's brain, and made her reel as if she had been struck by lightning. Extended along the plain, lay a figure almost buried in the ashes of the burnt oak, his hair floated down upon his broad shoulders, and his captive limbs seemed to quiver with remaining life.

Aurinia recognized the sacred Dolmen which was to have been burnt with the human hecatomb. For a long while she stood motionless, with her eyes fierce and fixed, as if the sight of that colossal image had transformed her into a statue.

Reanimated with superhuman energy, she sprung forwards, and staid not her course till she arrived in the midst of the council of the Druids. There was an exclamation of surprise at her approach.

"Listen" she exclaimed, "since the capture of these prisoners, wonderful mysteries have passed my mind. I had received warnings which bound me to abstain from the sacrifice, and I sought to abandon the earth, but, behold, an invisible power hath reconducted me against my will to this sacred wood! Priests of Hy-ra-bras, the Great Spirit hath refused our victims: give the Romans their lives!"

"Is that indeed the voice of Aurinia that has struck our ears?" replied Ur-enzio, the chief of the Druids, "Has Hy-ra-bras deserted her, or has she conferred with some hostile god? It was but yesterday she dictated to us the sacred vow, like one inspired by the Great Spirit; and now she sues for these Romans with the fury of a maniac! We listen to Aurinia's yesterday's voice, and not to day's! The victims shall be sacrificed to-morrow."

"They shall be sacrificed," shouted the crowd of priests.

Pale and melancholy, Aurinia left the assembly with lingering steps. As she passed by the statue she beheld the young Roman Tribune. There was a manly resignation, and proud, though sorrowful look, upon his countenance. The sight passed through her heart like the lightning's flash. What a terrible contrast between the feelings she then experienced for her God and the stranger! How much stronger were they in favour of the latter! Humanity and compassion for him alone engaged her thoughts, and perhaps a more powerful sentiment yet.

At the return of night the prisoners observed with wonder that the soldiers who guarded them were suddenly seized with a species of delirium. Their passionate gestures were not those of a war-dance; they ran and leaped about, with howls and unintelligible cries, and brandished their weapons in such a manner that the prisoners thought that the period of their existence was arrived. But this violent paroxysm of rage soon ceased as it had begun, without apparent motives, and the Gauls, overwhelmed by fatigue, sank one by one into a deep sleep.

At this instant, a figure clad in white appeared between the distant trees, and passed quietly through the midst of the slumbering guards. Those that chanced to be awake, believing it to be Cerid-guen, the guardian goddess of Amoric, closed their eyes and muttered an invocation.

The figure approached, and the Military Tribune recognised the beautiful Druidess. She made a sign of silence, and cutting down with an axe the entrance by which the prisoners had been conducted into the body of the image with which they were to have been consumed, unbound their shackles, and bade them depart in silence.

"Art thou, then, the chaste Diana, goddess of the night and of this grove?" asked the Tribune Septimus, when they had passed from without the sacred wood.

"I am only a mortal inspired by the gods, who have prohibited me to let you perish. To afford this easy escape, I mingled the seed of the inebriating henebane with the food of your guards. You may now rejoin your countrymen, if you will solemnly vow, never to set your feet again upon the land of my forefathers."

IV.

Septimus on his return to the camp of Cæsar's lieutenant-general, was anxious to keep his promise, but his companions accused him of cowardice. To a soldier of Julius Cæsar the gods were nothing—military glory was all. He yielded and served to conduct the legions into the bosom of the forest of Lemoric, the inhabitants of which were so disheartened at the escape of their prisoners that they were vanquished in the first onset, and retired to another part of Gallia, abandoning their sacred wood to the conquerors.

V.

It is night! The cries of the people, the chiefs of the soldiers, the heads of the priests, are assembled beneath the dark rocks that border the boundless ocean—the last asylum of the still free Americans. As they are pondering on the battle which has thus put an end to the safety of their country, in the midst of them suddenly stands Aurinia. Her eyes sparkle with a wild inspired phrenzy; her brow is crowned with heroism; and her dark hair floats behind her as she passes on.

"Why are ye thus desponding, Armoricans?" she exclaimed. "Think you that no power can yet appease the wrath of Hy-ra-bras?"

And sorrowful silence was the only reply.

"People! an evil spirit hath deceived the soul of your prophetess. I am she who gave the Latins their liberty. He that shall defraud the Great Spirit of his victims, shall be given alive to the flames, and, shall die for the black Teutates!" Do you remember who uttered these words?"

A thousand arms were extended towards her, and a loud, and terrible murmur accompanied the motion.

"You have said it. I am she that hath pronounced them. To your work then, ye priests of Teutates. I die to redeem my country, and I die for the salvation of my people."

And unbinding her garland and tearing the sacred fillet from her hair, she resigned her hands to the cords of the executioner.

VI.

Such a horrible and magnanimous sacrifice as this failed not to revive the fanatic enthusiasm of the Lemorici. They marched against the Romans, and sought an engagement on the uncultivated plains of Cornuallia. Septimus, desperate at having been the cause of the fatal sacrifice of his liberatrix, found in battle a wished for death; and the hostile legions were driven for many years from the American peninsula.

The Romans, however, eventually obtained possession of Gallia; but the image of Hy-ra-bras tottered not before the altar of Jove; the sanguinary divinity of Armorica vanished only before the glory of the Cross.

A WARNING TO DRUNKARDS.

DRUNKENNESS expels reason, drowns the memory, defaces beauty, diminishes strength, inflames the blood, causes internal, external, and incurable wounds; is a witch to the senses, a devil to the soul, a thief to the purse, the beggar's companion, the wife's woe, and the children's sorrow. It makes a strong man weak, and a wise man a fool. He is worse than a beast, and is a self-murderer, who drinks to other's good health and robs himself of his own. He is worse than a beast, for no animal will designedly intoxicate itself; but a drunkard swallows his liquor well-knowing the condition to which it will reduce him, and that the draught will deprive him of his reason. By the effect of liquor his evil passions and tempers are freed from restraint; and while in a state of intoxication, he commits actions which when sober he would have shuddered only to have thought of. Many an evil deed has been done, many a murder has been committed, when those who did those things were intoxicated. Scarcely an assize passes, without some unhappy prisoner attempting to excuse his guilt by the plea that he was under the influence of liquor. This excuse the law allows not, and most justly; for if men voluntarily deprive themselves of their reason, surely they cannot be innocent of whatever evils they commit in their ebriety. Tremble, O drunkard, remember that you are about to make yourself ready to commit every crime to which an evil nature no longer checked can incite you, and that you may awake from this state guilty of offences against the laws of your country, sufficient to draw down just vengeance upon your head. While suffering the punishment of your evil deeds, or reflecting on the harm you have done, perhaps to your best friend,—what consolation can the remembrance of your worse than beastly enjoyment give you?

REVIEWS.

A Letter to Parents upon the Education of their Children. By JAMES BRUNSWICK and THOMAS TURNER, pp. 12. London: Harvey and Darton.

THIS valuable little pamphlet deserves universal patronage. It is a sound, moral, and religious system of admonition to parents who really feel interested in the welfare of their children. The work is divided into three parts. The first gives some excellent advice relative to the Physical Education of youth, under the several heads of Good Air, Food, Exercise of Muscle, Clothing, Cleanliness, and the Exercise of the Brain. From this division of the pamphlet, we select the following extract as a specimen of the authors' style:—

"Food.—We would urge the importance of your children using the most simple food. Let meals be regular. Let animal food be taken at dinner, but not in great quantities. Do not encourage an inordinate desire of food for the mere purpose of gratifying taste. Never let your children have strong tea or coffee, as the stimulus would be injurious. Allow no intoxicating liquors, for their injurious effects upon the nervous and circulating systems more than counterbalance any small quantity of nourishment that may be derived from them; such nourishment, also, could be obtained from other sources, without that accompanying evil. No great exertion of mind or body should be taken immediately after meals; for the active operations of the brain cannot go on with those of the digestive organs, without both greatly suffering thereby: this is the fruitful cause of insanity in America."

The next section is devoted to the consideration of the principles of Moral Education; the principles of which may be thus classed,—Love, Justice, Prudence, Courage, Desire of Employment, Sense of Order, Respect for Superiority, Desire of Praise and Hope. These various manifestations of moral education are descanted upon with an ability that shows how intimately the authors of the little pamphlet under notice have made themselves acquainted with their subject. They write without pretension, and yet with a vigour and earnestness which cannot fail to impress their lessons upon the memories of their readers. We quote a paragraph from this second division of the publication:—

"Sense of Order.—By an observance of such, your children will be able to accomplish their objects without bustle or confusion. Let them know not only the beauty of order in place, but order in time; that is, make them to value punctuality. By noncontrol of this useful sense of order, we become excessively attentive to method, and nervously irritable at irregularities. The consequences of a neglect of this, are, a carelessness of person, extra labour in occupations, and continual mishaps from loss of time. Guard your children from roughness of conduct, coarseness of language, and vulgarity of habit. Let youth act upon these maxims:—a place for everything, and everything in its place; a time for everything, and everything in its time."

Intellectual Education forms the third division of the pamphlet, and the most interesting one of the three. It classes the several movements of mind under the denominations of Application to Senses, Arrangement of Ideas, Memory, Reasoning, and Employment of Ideas. The authors show the dependence of mind upon the senses, and thence succeed in proving the necessity of educating the mind by attention to the objects of sense. A portion of the means to accomplish this grand aim is explained in the annexed paragraph:—

"Let, therefore, a number of objects be presented to your child for examination. Engage not the action of one sense only, but allow all to be brought into active co-operation. See that your children well understand the peculiar form, and relative situation of objects. Allow their eyes to be long and attentively fixed upon anything. Take them to the fields, and there train their eyes and their ears. Strive to give them a perfect distinction of sounds and of colours. Put a pencil into their hands and early train them to sketch from nature: nothing tends to give so accurate a habit of observation as the power of drawing. INFANT SCHOOLS, when properly conducted, are well adapted to improve the mind in observations, and also to furnish the child with a good selection of useful ideas. According to the object presented to the senses, so will the mind be affected. Hence we learn the great need of caution in the presentation of objects of sense. O parents! guard with extreme jealousy the eyes and ears of your offspring. Let them go into no society in which these organs may be exposed to evil influence. Beware of your own behaviour in their presence. Let not their eyes behold a countenance convulsed with passion, nor their ears be assailed by the language of foolishness or impiety. As reading is an exertion of one of the senses, take care that your children read no books which are calculated to injure them. Lastly, teach your children to have self-command over their senses."

We strongly recommend this admirable publication to all parents, and to those persons who are engaged in the education of youth. Many of the ideas and suggestions contained in it are calculated to enable the schoolmaster effectually to work out the principles of instruction laid down by the great Pestalozzi.

The Children's Temperance Magazine: A Cabinet of Amusement and Instruction for Young Teetotalers. Vol. I. pp. 368. London: Houlston and Stoneman; Market-Harborough: T. Cook;

THE first volume of this admirable little publication is now neatly bound, and forms a suitable present for parents to bestow upon their young children. The Preface informs us that "the little work was commenced under a deep impression of the importance of an early inculcation of Temperance principles on the minds of the rising generation." The conception of such a publication does honour both to the publisher and editor; and we sincerely hope that both are rewarded for their labours by an extensive circulation. The literature and the pictorial embellishments of the work are both of a superior order, when we consider the cheapness of the magazine, and the class to which it is especially addressed. We shall make a few extracts to corroborate the truth of our opinion relative to the merits of this publication:—

"There is a Rabbinical tradition related by Fabricius, that when Noah planted the vine, Satan attended and sacrificed a sheep, a lion, an ape, and a sow. These animals strikingly symbolize the gradations of inebriety. When a man begins to drink, he is frisky and cheerful as a Lamb; then he becomes as bold as a Lion; his courage is soon transformed into the foolishness of an Ape; and at last he wallows in the mire like a Sow."

We proceed, with great pleasure, to lay the following article, entitled "Bad Company Ruinous," before our readers:—

"Bad company, and especially drunken company, is the greatest evil to which young persons can be exposed. Millions of unhappy young men and women have had to attribute their ruin to this source. Allow me, then, dear friends, to warn you of this danger:—

"I. The property of a companion of fools will be destroyed; for they will lead him on to various excesses, until his purse is drained, and he is left penniless and helpless. Those who spend their wealth in riotous living are generally the companions of fools. We ought to remember the command, 'Occupy till I come!'"

"II. His health will be destroyed. Fools lead their companions into excesses which destroy the constitution. It is a lamentable fact that lads of a dozen, or even less, years of age, make a practice of visiting public-houses for the purpose of gambling and drinking. It is with sorrow I reflect that, at the age of twelve years, I was led by vicious companions to these places of ruin, where we played at the bagatelle-board, and frequently got intoxicated. It is admitted on all hands that drinking is ruinous to the health—that best of all earthly blessings.

"III. His reputation will be destroyed. Though he may refrain from many of their evil doings, he will suffer with them in public estimation: the old proverb will be applied, 'Birds of a feather flock together.' The wise man says, 'A good name is better than riches.' May my young friends not share the reproaches of the foolish, by being found in their company.

"IV. His soul will be destroyed. If he live and die a companion of fools, he will not be a fit subject for the society of the wise in glory. God's word declares that 'the drunkard shall not inherit the kingdom of heaven.' May all my young friends 'escape the foolish and live.'"

The Temperance Messenger. Vol. I. pp. 184. London: Houlston and Stoneman; Market-Harborough. T. Cook.

ALTHOUGH we have several works before us, all claiming our attention—and a probable right to our preference, by priority of arrival,—we nevertheless throw them on one side for the moment, to make room for a notice of works professedly devoted to the Teetotal cause. The periodicals issued from the South Midland Depot are a credit to the Teetotal press. In casting our eyes over the first volume of the Temperance Messenger (which, like the Children's Temperance Magazine, is a monthly publication) we perceive many papers of sterling worth and interest. In the July Number there is very admirable article, called "A Friendly Message to Field Labourers, with Hints to their Employers." From this paper we shall make a few extracts:—

"The amount of your labour is increased by your drinking habits, and you are also deprived of that rest which Nature requires, and which God has provided for you. You begin to drink the first thing in the morning, and thus lay the foundation for a day's thirst. You cannot eat with a good appetite; but every hour you must be running to the bottle, to slake your raging thirst, and raise your sinking powers. You fancy that the beer revives and strengthens you; and for a time after you have drunk it, you work like horses that are goaded by the whip and spur. If the beer should happen to be very strong, and you take plenty of it, you mow an acre, or reap a rood in 'no time'; and you go to the task with these energetic feelings until the spirit begins to die within you; and then you seem as if you were in a dying and drooping state also. When night comes, you are fairly fagged out; and when you lie down upon your bed, every limb aches, and you are in a burning fever; then you complain of the hot weather and hard labour. Your repose is broken; you doze and dream of the field and bottle, and are not easy until you get to the farmer's kitchen early in the morning, for the first pint. * * * I need not say much about the causes of the numerous accidents which take place in the harvest field. You know that nearly all of them originate in drinking. It is this too which disposes men to quarrel and fight; and, in some instances, the scythe of the mower has been converted into the scythe of death! But, notwithstanding all these things, you no doubt still think ale to be NECESSARY. I think it is not; and I will give you the very best reasons for thinking so. I will furnish you with the opinions of an eminent medical gentleman, and the experience of some who have tried the abstinence plan; and they are men who are not ashamed of their names being attached to their declaration of the benefits arising from Teetotalism. You may enquire of them, or of their masters, if you like, for the truth of what they assert."

Then follow the medical testimony of Mr. Higginbottom, an eminent Surgeon at Nottingham, and the testimonials of several Agricultural Labourers, Brick-makers, Quarrymen, &c. From the medical testimony we quote the following extract:—

"There is neither strength nor nourishment in ale, porter, cider, or in any alcoholic drink, to produce proper vigour for labour in the harvest field: the artificial strength thus obtained is only of a transitory nature, and followed by an increased weakness and fatigue. This may be easily understood, when we know that alcoholic drinks stimulate the nervous system—quicken the circulation of the blood—increase the labour of every organ of the body—injure the quality of the food, and of course lessen the nourishment, and materially impede digestion or assimilation. By this fourfold process the body is weakened, and consequently not so fit for labour. Alcoholic drinks are altogether unfitted to repair the deficiency produced by the great waste from perspiration caused by labour in the harvest field, &c. The most natural and the only drinks necessary are those of a cooling nature, as water, milk-and-water, weak tea or coffee. Such drinks will not unduly increase the action of the heart."

The Border Herald of Temperance. Numbers I. to IX. Carlisle: Hudson Scott.

THIS excellent monthly journal is conducted with great ability and discrimination. Its editors have adopted the wise plan of introducing agreeable and moral fictions into their columns, for the purpose of amusing, as well as instructing their readers. This plan is sure to succeed, if properly worked out; and, in this instance, the scheme appears to have met with its due share of encouragement, if we may judge by an announcement in this month's Number, stating that the journal is to be enlarged, and the price increased to two-pence. We hail this advertisement as another instance of the success of the cause of Teetotalism, and are glad to proclaim the prosperity of a contemporary. The following extract is the conclusive passage of a very powerful tale, which has lately appeared in The Border Herald, under the title of "The Destroyer Destroyed":—

"She went to service,—and those delicate hands, that while her father was a sober man, knew not what work was, for two years performed the hardest drudgery. Her uncommon beauty attracted the notice of a fellow, who passed under the disguise of a gentleman; he assiduously and perseveringly addressed the most marked attentions towards her—and supposing that I was dead, not having heard from me for two years (my letters had miscarried) she listened to the promises of the

and—Mary was but mortal—was deceived, and fell. The sequel is soon told, after spending four months of splendid misery, she was basely deserted by her seducer, and left destitute of the common necessities of life; she had no means of providing for herself, she was without friends, no one to give her a character, and in London. She almost starved for a week, and then in the last gasp of moral and physical wretchedness—the poor outcast had expended her last trifle in GIN AND OPIUM, and senseless and stupefied with the drug, was going when I saw her to end her earthly horrors with her life in the Thames. Poor Mary! thy sad history is but a transcript of that of thousands of 'pale romances of the night,' whom society spurns, and whom we shake off contemptuously, perhaps insultingly, in the streets, little thinking that probably they are drunkard's daughters, whom their parents' crimes have driven to vice and folly—but thou wast not like them, for thou choosdest death before continued dishonour.

"In three weeks Mary died—a true penitent, resting on the mercy of that Merciful Saviour who said to the expiring thief on the cross, 'This day thou shalt be with me in Paradise;' and I believe, that her repentant spirit—which was even, 'more sinned against than sinning'—through the merits of her Redeemer has found rest where the 'wicked cease from troubling.'"

"I attended her to the grave, and as the cold earth fell heavily upon her coffin lid, its echo seemed to smite upon my heart like the knell of death. I stood upon the edge of that low narrow bed, and felt that the only ray of hope I had was quenched in perpetua night, and that I was alone—a solitary being in the world—bereft of home, of friends, of every sympathy, which sanctifies our nature, of every tie which binds the heart to life and its enjoyments. I asked myself, what had caused all this—and what had made my father a bad and unfeeling man—what had driven me from home and broken my best of mothers' heart—what had cut my sorrowing parent off in the middle of his days—and most cruel of all, what had driven my Mary from her father's home to ignominy, wretchedness, and the grave? Who has been the Destroyer, and what has caused this mighty wreck? The answer, as from a thousand voices, was 'STRONG DRINK.' And then—gazing upon the last broken link of all my joys—I vowed never to let the destroying agent pass my lips again.

"I placed a plain marble slab over the tomb, and in— church you may see the following simple memorial:

M. P.
Aged 22 years.

"I left England immediately, and five years have elapsed and I am still a wanderer upon the face of the earth. From that time until now

'I have breathed not her name—it has slept in the shade Where cold and unnoticed her relics are laid.'

"I have told it now; not so much because it was asked, but because I thought it might do good. I am a stranger to you, and in a few days we separate. You go to your friends and your homes; bright smiles and fond welcomes await you. I, when I step upon the shores of England, shall feel that I am a stranger and an alien in the land of my fathers. I shall go again over the path of the DESTROYER, and again visit the grave of Mary."

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

WORCESTER.

There is a Primitive Methodist Total Abstinence Society in this city, the meetings of which are well attended. The following paragraph appears in the British Temperance Advocate for December:—"The chaplain (Rev. J. Adlington,) of the county gaol, and of the House of Industry, alias union workhouse, has recently started a Church of England total abstinence society at Worcester, holding meetings once a month for the public advocacy of its principles, on the first Wednesday evening, at the Girls' National School-room. This society is distinct as to management and funds, but not antagonistical. Thus you will perceive there are some signs of life among us, although I feel, for one that the cause is not taken up in our highly professing city as it ought to be. We hold meetings three times in the month for the promotion of total abstinence, embracing all persuasions, but excluding sectarian usages in conducting them; in the first and third Monday in each month at the Primitive Methodist meeting-house, and each second Monday in the month at the Friends' meeting-house, for temperance members only. Upon the whole there appears to be a lively interest kept up. A constant addition of names to our members indicates progression.

UXBRIDGE.

The cause of Teetotalism progresses most favourably at Uxbridge. At a late festival which was given there to reclaimed drunkards, a brickmaker declared that when he was addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors, he was once so denuded of all his clothing, that he absolutely gave chase to a dog which had a hat affixed to its tail, and was glad to avail himself of this opportunity of obtaining a tegument for his head. There are between forty and fifty members of the Total Abstinence Society of Uxbridge, who have been reclaimed from the most degraded habits of drunkenness, and who are now rendered worthy and useful members of society. These individuals all bear their testimony to the fact that nothing but Teetotalism can cure the drunkard, or prevent the moderate drinker from becoming one.

BADLINGTON.

We are indebted to The British Temperance Advocate for the following pleasing news respecting this place:—"The Temperance cause in this town, in spite of all the persecution exercised last year, still continues to prosper. Indeed, so great and beneficial is the change, that nearly all the ministers of the gospel in the parish are engaged in its favour. The Rev. ROBERT HARRISS, Baptist, signed the Teetotal pledge. We have one minister belonging to the establishment, one of the Independent Church, two Baptists, two Wesleyans, and six Primitive Methodists: total, eleven ministers, pledged Teetotalers, as well as most of the other ministers in the parish who are favourably disposed towards us. The religious bodies are now adding to their churches constantly such as, it is hoped, shall be eternally saved. To the Baptist church twenty-seven members have been added in the space of a few weeks, while the other denominations have received a proportionate increase. At the last fortnightly temperance meeting, held in the Friends' Meeting House, four ministers took their station on the platform, and another would have done so, but he was prevented by urgent business at the time. Preparations are being made on a grand scale, for the annual festival, to be held on the 6th, 7th, and 8th of Jan. next, and which we trust will be attended with desirable results. A very promising juvenile temperance society has been established upwards of a year, and conducted chiefly by Mr. THOMAS C. TROTTER, and which, if properly supported, must prove of immense service to the rising generation."

ROTHERHAM.

As the discussion between the Rev. Mr. BROMLEY and Mr. F. R. LEES took place at this town, we quote the locality for the purpose of introducing a very powerful passage, which appears in The British Temperance Advocate, in a letter addressed by the latter gentleman to the editor of the Bristol Temperance Herald. The passage alluded to is the following:—

"In the second place, before you argue that intoxicating wine is never condemned in the Bible, (which is not true,) and that the errors of patriarchs, priests, and prophets hereon are not corrected, or infer from thence that there were no errors in judgment or practice to correct, you are first bound to show that such was the object, or came within the province of revelation, or, to adopt your own language, that 'in regard to everything essentially sinful, it is prohibited totally and unconditionally.' In fact, your theory is a revival of Mr. Jordan's, who, at the Masham discussion, summarily argued thus:—'There is no eleventh commandment to abstain from alcohol; therefore the use of alcohol is sanctioned and cannot be wrong!'"

"In the third place, when you refer herein to the authority of any one in the Bible, you must prove, first, not only inspired, but inspired on the qualities of intoxicating wines; and, second, that being so, his own supernatural knowledge must necessarily be recorded in the form of an unconditional prohibition. 'Judas went out and hanged himself.' Now, this may be in the Bible, and yet no part of its inspired contents, much less is it an authority to go and do likewise. Noah became intoxicated, which you quote. Did his ignorance of what was going to happen form a part of his inspiration? Noah thought that in using a certain quantity of wine there would be no harm, probably not knowing that it had become strongly intoxicating; yet he was fearfully mistaken.

"And now, my dear sir, if you dare venture on this important argument, step by step, I shall be happy to discuss it with you, in a patient and Christian spirit, looking only for the truth; and in case my invitation be accepted, (not to refer to polygamy, divorce, and slavery under the Mosaic dispensation,) I at one refer to a case in the New Testament, as furnishing material for discussion, and an illustration of my views.

"I maintain, then, that the same principles which would prove alcoholic wine to be sanctioned, would identify CHRISTIAN SLAVERY with the sanction of God! In the early days of Christianity slavery was common and legal, and in no part of the document of our common faith do I find the institution expressly repealed or 'totally prohibited.' The apostle Paul, on this very subject, says—'Masters, or rather lords (kurion) and despots (despotes), render to your slaves what is just and equal.' And you, slaves, that have believing despots, do not despise them, because they are your brethren; but rather do them service,' &c. 'Again, are you called, being a slave? Care not for it; but if you can be made free, use it rather.' In these passages, in which the apostle is promulgating directions or laws in relation to Christian slavery, he assumes that institution to exist: he does not repeal it, and say—'Eman- cipate your slaves, and, on entering the church, put an end to this essentially sinful relation;' but, as far as he is concerned, it is 'allowed' to continue, and, upon the assumption of its 'allowed' continuance, he goes so far as to give direction to the slave and the slaveholder how to fulfil what he regards their respective duties! In this case, to employ your own words, and apply your own principles, 'there is no qualification in the matter—nothing conditional.' Now, had the apostle been speaking of a practice essentially sinful, it cannot for a moment be supposed he would have thus expressed himself. But you see, my dear sir, he did so express himself, and hence, upon your principles of interpretation, it follows that slavery is not essentially sinful, but, on the contrary, sanctioned by the word of God!!! 'Such is the frightful and revolting conclusion which unavoidably follows' the application of those principles by which 'it is proved that the use of intoxicating wine is sanctioned in scripture. That principle may be allowed in the latitude of Virginia, where even ministers hold slaves! or it might accord with the notions of Mohammed Ali; but I greatly err if it be adopted to convince an honest Englishman, who, notwithstanding the silence of the apostles, reprobates, and will continue to reprobate, all slavery as essentially iniquitous! For myself, 'in common with many of our friends,' adopting your own language, I would say—'We cannot suppose that our (Bristol) friends ever contemplated such a conclusion as consequent on their theory. Here, however, it is—clear and distinct enough! We ask, then, if it does not best consist with the true interests of the cause, to point out this heresy, and to endeavour, by every means, to purge our camp from such defilement. Will not the infidel (who is sharp-sighted enough,) represent such dogmas as part and parcel of Christianity, if our periodicals do not utterly disavow and repudiate them as unsound and dangerous.'"

TOWN NEWS.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Saturday Evening, Dec. 19.

We merely refer to the meeting of this date, which was held at the Aldersgate Street Chapel, for the purpose of giving an outline of an admirable speech made on the occasion, by Mr. MINGAY SYDER. This gentleman spoke for one hour and a half, to the great delight and edification of the audience. His speech abounded in wit, amusement, instruction, and original argument. He explained wherefore the cause of Teetotalism spread so much more rapidly in Ireland than in England. In Ireland the priests themselves adopted the principle; and, as they enjoyed the confidence of their flock, they inculcated the good doctrine with success. In England the clergy were for the most part opposed to Teetotalism. Some of the dissenting ministers themselves (said Mr. Syder) sold intoxicating liquors, and many of the trustees of dissenting chapels were either maltsters, brewers, or wine-merchants. These individuals of course would oppose the progress of Teetotalism with all their energy. He (Mr. Syder) had travelled a great deal about England, and he said that he should shortly publish a work called "Temperance Libels," which would make some of these worthies blush and tremble. He then argued that if the drinking customs in the country were a physical evil, they must also be a moral evil, and he illustrated his arguments with a number of interesting anecdotes and examples.

Wednesday Evening, Dec. 23.

At the meeting at the Chapel on this occasion a numerous and most respectable audience attended.

Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, upon taking the chair, entered upon a narrative, historical and chemical, of alcohol, and described its various peculiarities, its combinations, and its effects. He concluded a lengthened speech with some allusions to Christmas day, observing that the Teetotalers would enjoy their roast beef and plum pudding as well with potatoes of water and coffee, as if they indulged in the most exquisite (so called) wines. He wound up his remarks by declaring that no deed of irreligion could be more abominable than the fact of celebrating with a drunken orgie the anniversary of the birth day of the Saviour of mankind.

Mr. H. W. WESTON also alluded to the approach of Christmas Day, and, after commemorating the various blessings enjoyed by those nations only which professed the Christian religion, he enjoined those present to pass the day rationally and soberly, and not suffer themselves to be led into the temptations so often thrown in the way of Teetotalers by unprincipled drunkards.

Mr. BENSTEAD, in commenting upon the speech of the chairman, said that although such details as those into which Mr. Reynolds had entered, were instructive and amusing, it was still not necessary to be acquainted with them in order to arrive at the conviction that alcoholic liquors are physically and morally prejudicial. Mr. Benstead then expatiated, with his usual eloquence, upon the necessity of abstaining from those liquors which destroy the intellect beyond remedy.

Mr. CAUMP (the Registrar) observed that he should pass a widely different Christmas day from that which he had spent two years ago, on which occasion he was taken to the station-house in a dreadful state of intoxication. He then addressed the audience upon the efficacy of the principle he stood there to advocate.

Saturday Evening, Dec. 26

Mr. DEXTER delivered a most instructive and entertaining lecture, at the Chapel, Aldersgate Street, upon the following subject:—"Teetotalism is in accordance with Reason and with Revelation; and we have before us the most cheering prospects of its ultimate success." The Chapel was well attended; the audience was most respectable; and the lecturer produced a deep impression. We regret that we have not room this week to give an analysis of it.

ISLINGTON YOUTHS' TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

The meetings which the members of this admirable society have lately held at Adelaide Square, have been well attended. Amongst the best advocates of the Association are MASTERS GILBERTSON, CHALMERS, HYDEARD, BROOKS, COTTELL, &c. Much good is effected by the able advocacy of these youths; and, altogether, this is one of the most flourishing of the metropolitan Teetotal Societies for youths.

HACKNEY.

On Tuesday the 29th of December, the Hackney Christmas Festival took place at the Hackney Temperance Hotel, which is placed under the superintendence of Mr. H. W. WESTON, the late Secretary to the United Temperance Association. Dr. OXLEY presided on the occasion; and after an excellent tea, the Chairman and several popular advocates addressed a numerous audience with considerable effect. On the whole, this entertainment was highly creditable to Mr. H. W. Weston, who deserves the support of all who are desirous of seeing good Temperance hotels flourish in the country.

HATFIELD HOUSE, WESTMINSTER.

HATFIELD HOUSE was opened as a place of Teetotal meetings on Monday evening, the 21st of December; and a numerous audience attended.

Mr. BENSTEAD took the chair. He explained the motive of the meeting, and declared that the question of Teetotalism was intimately connected with the proper observance of the Christian religion; inasmuch as no intemperate man could possibly practise Christian doctrines.

Mr. HOCKINGS of Blackman Street, Borough, told a most affecting tale, the particulars of which had come beneath his own cognisance. The subject of this tale was a lady, who was accustomed to purchase opium and other narcotics when she could not obtain alcoholic liquors, to sustain the excitement of intoxication in her system. She was the wife of a surveyor of high respectability, and was the mother of several children. She was however separated from her family, and subsisted upon an allowance accorded her by her husband. Although this allowance was most ample, Mr. Hockings found, upon visiting her abode, that she dwelt in a wretched and filthy apartment, denuded of all comforts. Mr. Hocking discovered the chemist's shop at which she purchased the opium, and hastened to remonstrate with the dispenser upon allowing the female to obtain it there. The chemist contented himself with replying, that she had now arrived at such a pitch, she could not do without the drug. Mr. Hockings, who felt deeply interested in the unfortunate woman's fate, hastened to call upon one of her daughters in a fashionable square at the West End, but this young lady declared that nothing could reclaim her mother. It was in vain that Mr. Hockings suggested Teetotalism as a remedy: all his arguments to persuade the daughter to allow her mother to enter his house, and dwell with his family, were abortive. There was a wretched instance of a most respectable lady becoming a degraded drunkard, into which state she had passed from the preparatory condition of a moderate drinker!

MESSIEURS SMITH, WILLIAMS, and BENETTO, (Members of the Committee of the new society, whose locale is Hatfield House) then addressed the meeting, each in an appropriate speech upon the occasion of opening the new Teetotal Hall.

CHELSEA AUXILIARY TO THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

This society will hold a grand public TEA FESTIVAL on Wednesday evening, January 6th, on which occasion the members of the Committee will exert themselves to the utmost, to render the entertainment as agreeable as possible to those present. Tea will be upon the table at five o'clock precisely. Cards for admission, one shilling each, to be had at the door of the New Temperance Hall, 56, George Street, Chelsea. A public meeting will be afterwards held; when the attendance of MESSIEURS G. W. M. REYNOLDS, CRUMP, BENSTEAD, POCKNELL, WESTON, and other advocates and officers of the Parent Society is expected. The hall will be decked with banners, &c.

CLERKENWELL AND PENTONVILLE YOUTHS' TEETOTAL SOCIETY.

On the 16th of October, this Society held a meeting at the Chapel in Castle-street, Turnmill-street, when the Rev. H. REED presided; and addresses were delivered by MESSRS. ANDERSON, LATEY, and BUTLER; by MASTERS BROOKS, MULLARD, and PAYNE; and by the Secretary, Mr. R. P. BAKER. On the 20th of the present month, a similar meeting was held at Aldersgate-street Chapel, when the Rev. C. STOVEL occupied the chair. Very admirable and suitable speeches were delivered.

NAPOLÉON.—For some time previous to his death he had considered himself attacked by an internal disease, which would speedily prove fatal to him. He often mentioned it, accompanied with sombre presentiments; but it was supposed to be nothing but the wanderings of an active imagination left unemployed. Some weeks before his death, he laboured with a spade in his garden so long and so severely as almost to faint from fatigue. Somebody suggested to him the probable injury to his health. "No," said he, "it cannot hurt my health—that is lost beyond all hope. It will but shorten my days." He gave but little time to the composition of the memoirs of his life. Bertrand one day urged him to labour with more assiduity. "It is beneath me," said he, "to be the historian of my own life. Alexander had his Quintus Curtius, and I shall have mine. At all events, my life is recorded in my achievements."

THE PROGRESS OF TEMPERANCE; DEVELOPED IN THE LIFE OF A WORKING-MAN.

IN a former article we traced the career of a working-man through the six various stages of intemperance, as those stages are represented by the first half-dozen plates of the series of illustrations now given with The Teetotaler. We left the hero of this pictorial history in the last stage of destitution and misery. Misfortune finds a means of solace in conscious innocence, but when it arises from our own imprudence or vices, how galling is its sting! The category of human sufferings has scarcely any degree of mental anguish upon its dark list so acute as that which attends upon poverty brought about by our own folly or turpitude. The ray of conscious guiltlessness can penetrate, with cheering influence, into the darkest cells of the human mind, and will dispel much of the gloom occasioned by adversity; but no sunshine can find its way to the heart which has woven for itself the cobwebs of that despair which surrounds it. The word "Starvation!" sounds in the ears like words heard in a dream—one of those dreams of prisons and of cold which fill up the sleep of the friendless—painful dreams which linger the live-long night, and are yet regretted when the morning has dispelled them! Oh! cold and hunger make heavy dreams! but even these are light beside the waking pangs that realize the visions! Everything yields to the strife of hunger; vanity—chastity—innocence—and honour, all succumb beneath the irresistible force of that sensation! There is a beautiful Arabian fiction, which strikingly illustrates the weakness of humanity beneath the maddening impulses of hunger or of thirst. A venerable Sheik, who was renowned for his piety, had been on several occasions tempted by the Evil One. Wealth, Beauty, Grandeur, and all the inducements which Satan could hold out to man, were proffered to the Sheik, on condition that he would deny his God. But, with the sternness of resolve manifested by St. Anthony in a similar state of temptation, the Sheik preferred his flint-strown grotto, his ascetic habits, and pious devotion, to all the pomps and vanities which the Evil One proposed as the price of his defection from the paths of virtue. In the course of time, the Sheik undertook his tenth pilgrimage to Mecca; but the caravan, with which he journeyed, was attacked by the Arabs, and its members dispersed in various directions. The Sheik only succeeded in saving his life by flight; and he found himself, alone—wearied—and without a guide, in the midst of the burning desert. Presently he was seized with an intolerable thirst, the acuteness of which was increased by his fruitless wanderings about to discover a spring. In that hour of mental despondency and severe physical suffering, all his boasted courage gave way,—the tempter came,—and for one drop of pure water did the Sheik abjure that creed from which, in times of ease, all the blandishments of the earth failed to draw his footstep aside!

Hunger and thirst are also good moral teachers, even if they, on the other hand, frequently prepare the paths of crime. By hunger and thirst are the eyes of the spendthrift alone opened to the folly of his ways; and the same cogent arguments compel the drunkard to reflect upon the causes of his destitution and ruin. Some individuals, in these situations, are tempted to exclaim against their "evil fortune"—"their stars"—or their "tide of bad luck;" but they forget that these are merely conventional and figurative terms; and that the real principles of men's success or failure in the affairs of this life, exist in their own conduct, abilities, and pursuits. When, by years of dissipation, neglect, or evil behaviour, we prepare the way for irretrievable ruin, should we not rather blame ourselves, than endeavour to soothe our consciences by attributing our difficulties to our "bad luck?" That men do experience real misfortunes in life, over which they have no control, is certain;—but ruin and disgrace are to be attributed far less generally to this source than to misconduct and irregular habits. The road of pleasure and dissipation is sufficiently pleasant, so long as reflection is drowned in a vortex of excited passions, hurried scenes of revelry, and the thousand and one measures adopted by rakes, rakes, or drunkards, to stifle the whisperings of conscience, and banish the presence of care; but, when the goal of ruin is at length reached, and when naught is perceived at that termination of the paths of vice and intemperance, save the hideous haunts of poverty and want,—

Oh! then is sober and serious reflection forced upon us against our will. We cannot then fly from the questions which Remorse will put to us; for, with the pertinacity of a judge or a counsel, will Remorse require unvarnished answers—answers denuded of all metaphorical disguise—to its dread interrogatory. It is then that the victim of dissipation must look his prospects and his present condition in the face; for, avert his head to whichever side he will, the lean and haggard countenance of Starvation will meet his eyes.

Urged by such impressions as these, the hero of the pictorial narrative before alluded to, is resolved to turn from his evil ways, and enter upon a career of honesty, sobriety, and domesticated habits. His life, as a total abstainer from all intoxicating liquors, forms the subject of the last six plates of the series of twelve which details his whole existence. We have now three before us; and shall endeavour to explain their import, their narrative, and the ideas with which their subjects are severally associated, in the same way as we treated the first six illustrations. We shall, therefore, have to expatiate upon the three first scenes in the Progress of Temperance, which are comprised in the seventh, eighth, and ninth plates of the present series.

PLATE VII.—The hero of the pictorial drama is now signing the pledge of total abstinence. His garments are tattered;—in a word, he wears the "drunkard's livery." He has however entered upon the only path which will lead him afar from his ancient haunts, to future felicity and peace. He will soon learn to abominate those vile customs to which he has so lately been the prey;—he will feel that he is a renovated being; he will ascertain the value of his intellectual capacities; and he will know how to appreciate the blessings of an existence of sobriety and virtue. His conversation will become altogether changed. He will no longer delight in obscene talk, in bacchanalian toasts, and in filthy jests. Without falling into the opposite extreme, and assuming an aspect of demureness and rigidity which is as unnatural as it is ridiculous, he will become gay without boisterous mirth, lively without turbulent excitement, and happy without an artificial effervescence of the spirits, which exhaust themselves by their extreme buoyancy. He will marvel at his folly in having passed so many years of his past existence in the dingy atmosphere of filthy public-houses, where all ideas—all interests—and all pursuits are centred in one single object—the gratification of an unnatural craving! He will become a constant attendant at the house of God; and from the produce of his earnings he will be enabled to subscribe to a circulating library. If a man possess principles really virtuous, and an inclination to earn his livelihood respectably and honourably, his views will be materially aided by the doctrine of Teetotalism. Honesty, perseverance, and cold water will raise him to rank and fortune.

PLATE VIII.—The previous observations, connected with the seventh plate, have all been necessarily recorded in the future tense, inasmuch as the subject of the drawing only permitted us to indulge in a speculation with regard to the future destinies of our hero. The eighth plate seems to corroborate all that we have prophesied concerning the individual who may sign the pledge of total abstinence. In this illustration, we are introduced to a comfortable apartment, neatly furnished, and with various indications of the improved state of the finances of the Working-Man. As he opens the door, on his return from his day's toil, he is immediately welcomed by the smile of an affectionate wife, and the artless joy of his children. When he was a drunkard, his first-born child cowered beneath his glance, so wild and unnatural was it, under the influence of liquor; but now that innocent and interesting being hastens forward to receive from the hand of her father the orange which his paternal love has induced him to bring home for her. His tender wife has prepared his little domestic comforts with the pleasure arising from the happiness she enjoys in consequence of his reformed habits; and, while his supper is being served up, he will seat himself before a cheerful fire, and either amuse himself with his children, or cast his eye over the Temperance journal which lies upon the table. Even the very cat upon the hearth-rug proclaims, by its sunny and sleek appearance, the change that has taken place in the victualling-department of our hero's dwelling. How interesting is this happy group! The word TEETOTALISM seems to be written in every part of the room, as well as on the countenances of all its occupants. Contrast that apartment with the one in which the drunkard and his starving wife were sitting, as represented in the sixth plate. The home of a drunkard boasts of no book-shelf: he does not require food for that intellect which is not in a condition to enjoy it. The home of a drunkard never contains a clock: he has but one lounge—the public-house—and no regular meals, and therefore has no appointments to keep. The home of a drunkard does not exhibit such a substantial article of food as a ham, hanging from the ceiling: he never has enough money at one time to spare for the purchase of such a thing. In a word, there is a vast and essential difference between the home of a drunkard and that of the Teetotaler;—the one is dirty and denuded even of necessities; the latter is the picture of cleanliness and comfort; the one is the scene of starvation and misery; the latter is the abode of plenty and of joy! The regularity, with which the Teetotaler keeps his accounts, and thus avoids debts, is demonstrated by the file of papers hanging against the book-shelf. On that file are the receipts for his rent, and taxes, and rates; and all his tradesmen's bills, with the pleasing monosyllable PAID upon them, are there also. In person, he himself is neat and clean: his family is well provided with decent attire; and the young mother can now take a proper pride in attending upon her children. Oh! who would exchange the smiles of an affectionate wife, the happy countenances of healthy and fond children, the comforts of a cheerful home, and the blessings attendant upon a virtuous course,—oh! who would exchange these for all the demoralizing and obscene revelry, the applause of dissipated friends, the fawning compliments of the landlord, the wretched home, the starving children, and the terrors of a jail, which form the existence of a drunkard? What individual can be so enamoured of all that is degrading, revolting, and ruinous to the mind of man, as to prefer the bacchanalian orgies of a tap-room to the comforts of his own fire-side?

PLATE IX.—The frequenter of the tap-room knows not the beneficial results of the doctrine of Teetotalism—that doctrine which he abuses, while he does not comprehend it. A few years have passed away since the hero of our narrative signed the pledge of total abstinence; and his affairs have prospered in no moderate degree. He is now a master-printer, owns a large establishment, and is on the way to make a rapid fortune. This is the anniversary of the day of his regeneration—the day on which he abandoned his dissipated habits—the day when he awoke to a sense of duty and virtue—the day, in fine, on which he placed his hand to that pledge whose principle he has never once broken. With him this day is always a holiday: it is the one to which he looks back with emotions of the most heart-felt joy. His men are, on this occasion, allowed a suspension of their labours; and, as he employs none save those who have adopted the same salutary principles, they partake of some amusement as innocent as that in which their master and his family are now indulging. To what happy days—save those of spotless childhood—can the drunkard look back? But how bright a day is that to which the votary of the great doctrines of total abstinence can turn his eye, and hail it as the one whose distinguishing feature was the foundation of fortune, happiness, and domestic prosperity. Oh! if Teetotalism be wrong, let not its opponents destroy these bright and glorious visions! With pride and admiration the fond parents behold their children disporting in the field from which the new-mown hay is not yet removed; and the mother, raising her eyes from the volume which she holds in her hand, surveys those pledges of affection with emotions of joy and gladness, because she needs now no longer tremble for their future destinies. She knows that their after-condition in life will be ensured and provided for; and she thanks—oh! how unfeignedly does she thank the happy day the anniversary of which she and her family are so cheerfully celebrating. As the path seen, beyond the stile, in the distance, winds up the hill, on the summit of which stands the temple of Jehovah, so does the road of Teetotalism conduct the traveller's steps to a scene of joy, and plenty, and peace, where the jars and turmoils of this life are deprived of nearly all their rancour, and where the holy ties of wedded affection are not loosened or altogether severed by the devastating hand of Intemperance!

In the course of a few weeks we shall lay before the reader our observations upon the three remaining pictures, which will complete the first Series of illustrations accompanying this journal.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF AN ARTIST:

OR, RAILINGS AGAINST PORTRAITS.

My mother—and I state it with confidence—was a woman possessed of a moderate share of female beauty, and endowed with an immoderate share of presence of mind—the which has been handed down to me—by the bye, the only presence of mind or anything else I ever had from her, except advice, which, not being an article in great demand, is generally given with exceeding liberality. It will take too much time to enter into all the minutiae of my childhood's history. I did as other children did and do; and, in process of time, my outward man was clothed in corduroy unwhisperables, and ditto jacket, with a double serpentine row of buttons thereon. In early youth I was much addicted to waste my time by playing at marbles with the little boys in the streets; and as my father and mother were not at all times aware of the cause of my protracted absence—or, to use more modern phraseology, "my mother not knowing I was out,"—they watched me. My pursuits were discovered; and my kind parents determined to give me—a profession? No.—Money? No.—a good thrashing! But this had the contrary effect to that intended; for it only made me obstinate. I played till I lost all my marbles, all my money, then my father's protection—next, my mother's advice; so I determined to run away from home, and launch my human bark on the ocean of chance. Having arrived at my nineteenth year, and being deprived of my home's society, I began to yearn after a companion; and so, as I could not keep myself, I resolved to see if I could not keep a wife. I loved Mary the moment I first saw her: our destinies seemed similar—so did our tastes (except that she did not play at marbles); and she had even the same sum of money as myself. So we clubbed our fortunes together, and found ourselves possessed of the vast floating capital of four pounds, sixteen shillings, and ninepence halfpenny; out of which we paid the fees which belonged to the ceremony that made us one.

As it became necessary at times to follow the vulgar practice of eating, I found that unless occupation were obtained, we should soon be enjoying our state alone, leaving the vulgar to feed, whilst we enjoyed the fashionable resort of Duke Humphrey. My first essay was at letter-writing—I don't mean a polite letter-writer, but a writer for transparent blinds; and although I often wrote, "Five Coronals may be had within," I always found that food could not be had without—the money! Scarlet borders and designs of all descriptions for marquees, I also did; and whatever any unkind person may assert to the contrary, if I disliked "port," I certainly was accustomed to "tent." Many a "Crooked Billet," "Goat and Tinder Box," "Pig and Whistle," "Puss in Boots," &c., &c., now swing and creak in the vicinity of Portsmouth (whither I and my better half proceeded) painted by my hands, and whatever and however politicians may argue, those are the "signs of the times," after all!

But, although I wrote a great many letters, I received very few notes in return. All the inn-signs being finished, I thought of corporal sufferings the major part of the week, fell into a general despondency, and felt assured that I still had many a hard nut to crack before I could get at the kernel. But whilst my energies were flagging, my wife's spirit rose superior to every thing; and, as she felt the ground slipping from beneath our feet, she clutched at the boughs of perseverance for support, till at last—when all the blinds were painted, all the signs finished, and my wife's fingers were worn to the bone by needle-work—gaunt poverty, a cold piercing winter, and dire disease (a goodly trio) burst at once over our threshold, and took joint possession of our lukewarm hearth, whose dying embers threw a pale jaundiced light on the fading cheek of Mary. It was then that Heaven gave us a son. Yes,—without a shilling—without a penny in the wide world, in hand or in expectation, and with the cold wind whistling through every crevice (I feel it now at my heart) did my Mary give birth to our first-born. She did not complain,—she taught me to endure—to thank! for with the first return of her strength, she beckoned me to her; and at the bed-side, (a straw-pallet), with the pale moon above, and the white snow beneath, the poor artist and his Mary knelt and gave thanks to Heaven. Her little sickly voice seemed to roll in thick volumes to my heart. I rose happy—aye, happy! for in that prayerful moment I felt I had a guiltless conscience—I knew and felt we had a protecting God!

A few years passed away; and after many ineffectual struggles again to obtain settled employment, I yielded to the solicitations of a friend—the captain of a small craft—and sailed, accompanied by my wife and two children, for Jersey, in the vain hope that in another land my star of fortune might rise in the ascendant. Although Portsmouth had refused to support me—although it had been the scene of all my misery and wretchedness, I could not help feeling some pang at the separation from that scene of my first efforts and of the birth-place of my two eldest children. A short voyage found us solitary in a joyous country, where every thing seemed to grow for others, and naught for ourselves. On our arrival, the season was at the coldest; but, through the kindness of the captain, we were introduced to a very humble lodging. The least shelter and the coarsest food are made by imagination palaces and banquets. By degrees I got introduced to a set of jolly fellows, who held weekly meetings at an inn in Saint Helen's.

"It is a very long lane that has no turning," said I, and every moment of my life, I endeavoured to reach the end of it. Well, time will go on at Jersey, as well as at other places—and with it went the few shillings I had on my arrival. Still there was a decided disinclination on my part to let others know that I was penniless—and starving—that my wife and children were sick—and that the open country would soon be free for us to choose our bed in. It was at one of these meetings where I was an established favourite for my vocal abilities, that I was gaily singing a merry ditty with a smiling face, whilst my heart was well nigh bursting, and the laughing chorus I had to lead came from my heart as hollow and as empty as my pockets, that I so far lost mastery of myself as to burst into tears. I had been thinking of my starving babes and enduring mother—and—and—I wept from my heart. I had dined with my friends, but dared not tell them that my wife had had nothing the whole day to eat—I could not tell them—no, I could not relieve my mind of its burthen; and it found vent in grief. During the confusion, a French gentleman, by the name of Le Breton, a right noble fellow, left the room; and, having declared that I had merely suffered from an attack to which I was often subject, I also speedily departed, on the plea of indisposition. I shall never forget the struggle I had with my honesty on passing the larder of the inn. There stood joints cut and uncut, bread wasting in heaps,—fowls, and every thing in profusion and confusion, and no one to guard them. I hesitated—stopped—threw my eyes cautiously around,—my pulse rattled in my wrists with excitement,—my hands were taken from my pockets,—I advanced,—thought of my barren home,—my dying wife,—my sickly babes;—my hand was on the lock,—the door was opening,—when I stayed to listen! That delay restored my reason—I withdrew my hold—and whilst a deep, deep groan burst from my breast, I rushed for plenty to my bowl. I could again face my wife, for I had saved my honour!

Judge of my astonishment, when, on reaching home, I found them all seated at table, with the identical leg of mutton before them which the club had sent from table: there was no deceiving me, for I had gloated on it as it was placed for me to carve. I had envied every morsel as it had been devoured. There was the same joint on my deal table, with my own wife and youngsters eating from it. I knew I was not either drunk or mad; but she told me a friend had left it, but who she knew not. I afterwards discovered that Le Breton had found out my secret, and purchased provisions for my family. That was a noble act! The next morning Le Breton after having strongly recommended me to one or two of his friends, left the island, and returned to France: had he stayed in Jersey, the lane might have soon turned; but it was a great deal longer than I had imagined.

When I considered that every chance had failed, I was sitting late one night, supporting Mary's head on my knees, whilst my hands were pressed firmly on her fevered and throbbing temples, and the dim light of our solitary candle waxed fainter and fainter—the children (now three) sleeping from sheer exhaustion in one corner of the room, whither they had been induced to retire on the promise of food for the morrow,—that a knock came at the door. There was no surmise as to what or whom it might be—no thought, save the bailiff's visit, holding possession of our minds. With a firm voice I bade the stranger enter, whilst Mary clung to me with that nervous agitation which so soon numbs even the bravest. The stranger did enter; but instead of the unwelcome messenger of the law, he was the bearer of a letter from a friend of Le Breton's, appointing seven the following morning to have his portrait taken. With a cheerful voice I bade him "Good night;" and, sinking on my pallet, with the prayer of thanks on my lips, I slept the sleep of hope—deep—thick—heavy! Not so with Mary; again the drowning man's straw was within her reach; and, fearful lest my long suffering from fatigue and poverty might cause me to sleep beyond the time appointed, she sat at my side, with one hand clasped in mine—her hollow cheek being supported by the other; and, when once sleep had assumed its empire over me, she crept cautiously away; and gathering together all the sticks of which we were possessed, she lighted a fire, and made her poor but loving preparations for my breakfast, covering my plain deal table with all the scraps she could collect to cheer me on my road; then when the first streaks of daylight appeared through the latticed broken casement, it discovered the constant, starving, heart broken, but enduring wife, seated to receive her pauper husband, who lay still wrapped in the delicious forgetfulness of his past sufferings and his present first appointment. Oh! all this is true—while her brain was whirling into madness, she refused to sleep—to rest—whilst one solitary shadow of a hope remained of my earning bread. "Mary, God bless you, Mary," was my opening prayer; and God has since answered it.

To pass over the appointment, which of course I kept, until the finishing stroke was put to the portrait, I will jump to my delivery of it at the house of him who ordered it.

The man for whom I had painted it, was in his heart a good-natured man, when left alone, but was always so swayed when others were present that he blew hot if they liked—cold if they wished it, or, if they were unanimous on the subject, he wouldn't blow at all. My portrait was home—his friends were there; and when I first placed it in the most favourable light, there was not a single exclamation but of praise. "Striking!"—"Speaking!"—"Exact!"—"To a nicety!"—"The very nose!"—"The identical eye!"—"The lips themselves!" &c., &c. To say that I did not feel pleased would be to say untrue: of a verity I did, and in imagination rattled the coin I was to receive. My patron was, and would have remained, very well pleased: only one began to think, "on second examination," that the eyes were rather large; another, "bowing to my better judgment," that the face was rather too full; a third, with timidity, presumed that the hair was too light; a fourth confidently asserted that it was too dark; in fact, they collectively agreed that it was a striking likeness, and yet individually picked it completely to pieces. At last my patron, who saw with their eyes and not with his own, in the blindest manner in the world, refused to take it.

All this was bad enough; but I would have endured it all, had it not been for the presence of one Gubbins, an English artist. Ever since I saw that man, black tights have been my horror—he wore them! O good angels protect me from old Gubbins' tights! In a full suit of black, with a gold-mounted cane in his hand, he stood hewing the ground from under me. As an artist his opinion had weight, and he did what he wished,—viz. to get my picture refused and to paint one himself; and whilst I returned to my expectant wife and starving children, penniless, he rattled home in his chariot: but all things equalise themselves in this world. So it has been with Gubbins and myself: he now rents a solitary garret, while I enjoy luxuries! But I must not anticipate.

Some little time after this incident, I was induced to enter into a partnership with a man by the name of Roberts, in the manufacture of papier maché trays—I to do the designs, he to find the money. All promised well. Mary laughed—the children screamed—I sung, and we confidently believed that the long, dark, barren lane had turned at last. But I never was more out in my life, and yet was let precious in for it. My part of the agreement was performed; but, owing to some trifling mistake on the part of my partner (unintentional, no doubt,) he omitted to advance the money; but, as he was known, the houses with whom he did business did not hesitate to supply the materials, provided we gave bills to the amount. So far, so good; but again an unpleasant obstacle obtruded itself—Roberts could not write—unfortunately I could. This ended by my accepting for all goods in the joint names of myself and Roberts.

Things all went on for a time, swimmingly, the children's cheeks again assumed the ruddy glow of health—Mary's step again became elastic—and sunshine seemed again destined to warm our bosom. The trays did not sell as fast as we could wish, but we lived in hope that a better season might carry off the supply we had on hand; and so perhaps it might, had not the bills been inconsiderate enough to fall due, the holders to grow clamorous, and as anxious for Roberts' appearance as I was. He left on pretence of forwarding the sale of our manufactures in England, and, as a matter of course with all men of the world, forgot to return. I battled with the creditors single-handed as long as I could—urged upon them the utter destitution of my lot—placed them at once in view of my shattered home—offered to paint portraits to the last day of my existence to liquidate their claims—but no—nothing would satisfy them save the "bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill!" They seized—ha! ha!—what a seizure! down to the very cradle—stripped us of everything, and would have also seized me had I not been warned by my friend the captain, who had just arrived from Portsmouth, that the bailiffs were after me. I took a hurried leave of my now desolate wife, pressed my ragged children to my heart, and promised to return or send for them as soon as possible, jumped into Jack the Captain's boat, and pulled at midnight, on board his craft, leaving for the first time all I held dear! Bankrupt at heart and pocket, I waited with streaming eyes for Jack's appearance with the ship's clearance, not feeling any degree of safety till the ship had obtained a good offing.

We arrived safely at Southampton; and I once more set foot in England. I walked step by step to Portsmouth, and, jaded as I was, trod the streets of my own town with a light step. I made for my home, saw my mother, had some supper and advice, and retired to bed. Finding after a short stay, that the fine arts were in the same amiable state as at my departure, and procuring supper and advice, and that only from my friends, I started on foot for the metropolis, in company with an old schoolfellow, who had no more cause to be afraid of thieves upon the road than myself. In London we arrived, care-worn, barefooted, and with the extravagant sum of 2s. between us.

"It's a long lane without any turning," said I to my companion.

"So it is," said he; and 'twas a long way from Portsmouth to London."

In this I agreed. Well, here we were, solitary in a great and crowded city—superfluous in a luxurious country; and all this with health, will, and strength to work! But, as it was necessary to have some slight repast however trifling, we turned into a place over the door of which were the words, "House of Call for Painters." In the sanded room, lighted by one melancholy tallow dip, we sat down apart from a large group of men; but whether they were painters waiting to be called, we left to time, chance, or their conversation to determine.

Our bread and cheese, two pints of coffee, and the world, were before us; and we ate heartily and thankfully.

"I tell you, Jem," said a man in a fustian many-coloured suit, evidently continuing the conversation, which had been interrupted by our entrance, "he can't get them any where in town or out; thirty now are wanted. None of us can do any more than we do—and yet the work must be finished."

Our masticatory operations were suspended. I listened with open mouth and greedy ears, for a continuance of the conversation; but it changed to other topics, and we remained in darkness. I fumbled my one shilling in my capacious pocket, and wondered when I should have another to jingle against it; till at last I summoned courage, and addressed the first speaker.

"You were speaking just now," said I.

"Yes, sir, I was—and what of that?"

"Why—we are in want of employment, and——"

"Why didn't you say so before?"

"We are painters—portrait painters."

"Ha! ha! ha! only artists—that's all!" roared all the men present.

"Well," said I, colouring (I don't mean painting), "we are honest, and have walked all the way from Portsmouth to earn a crust. I was anxious for employment; but if I have offended——"

"Psha! man," said he whom I had first addressed; "you didn't offend, only it's the custom of our branch of the profession to laugh at your's. Why, we get more in one week by painting railings, than you do in a month by painting portraits."

"Well," said I, "we have no objection to paint railings."

"Give us your hand my fine fellow. I see you have a proper feeling for the arts—and, without being ironical, I will back railings against portraits any day."

To cut the matter short, on the following morning we went to the large master, as he was called, recommended by the men, and in the afternoon we might be seen in Piccadilly, properly equipped—work tools, green paint and all, busily occupied in painting the railings of a mansion there;—and, if the strict observer did detect the big tear rolling down my face, it was not that I felt degraded—but that I was crying for joy, when I thought I might soon clasp my Mary in my arms, which I soon did—and she was as happy as the journeyman painter's spouse as if I had had R. A. to my name, and a carriage for her convenience.

"The lane has turned at last," said I, but it hadn't: no—it was as straight, as long, and seemingly as untrollable as before.

When the daily work was done, I painted pictures, which I raffled amongst my fellow workmen, but at last I agreed with my introducer in backing 'railings against portraits,' the one was a certainty the other not; the one brought in some grist, the other none. The jobs were all finished, and the men all discharged save a few, who were painting the interior of Covent Garden Theatre; and amongst these I was included. Chance threw in my way one whom I imagined might prove a lasting friend: he promised, but he performed afterwards—but only as an actor. I was ordered to prepare the groundwork of a basso-relievo, representing tragedy and comedy over the proscenium, for the artist who was to complete the work. The ground-work I finished; but no artist arrived, and, wishing to employ my leisure, I proceeded to execute the work designed for him. In my progress, Fawcett, the then manager, arrived—commended my performance, and authorised me to proceed. I did, and entirely to his satisfaction: he promised to help me forward; but, like my partner Roberts, he forgot.

This time I thought the lane had turned—but it hadn't indeed. After finishing painting a house in Montague Square, I, with many others, was dismissed, and was again adrift upon the metropolitan ocean, and poverty once more entered my domicile. We were again without food, with another addition to the family; but heaven having preserved us so long, we felt we had no right to presume we were deserted now. When hope was at its lowest, and spirits at the ebb, without food of any sort, and without any settled object in view, I, one foggy, cold November morning, wended my way along the New Road, building castles in the air, as they are much more speedily erected and with far less expense than earthly tenements. On I went, with my head buried in my breast towards Portland Place, wrapped in my thoughts—not having a great coat—and was in the act of incautiously crossing, when a gig rapidly turned through the Park-gates.

"Hi! hi!" cracked in my ears.

"Holloa!" said I, "do you mean to run over me, sir?"

"No, my good man," said the gentleman. "But—you should be—surely you are—but you're very much altered—you must be—Mr. Maceazar."

"It must be," said I, and looking up, I beheld—Oh! horror, the face of a doctor who had attended upon my wife, and to whom I owed six guineas. But I thought it was better to put a good face upon the matter; so I speedily offered to put his good face on canvas, in part payment of the demand. He agreed to have his likeness taken, but objected to have it in part payment—was glad to see me, made me jump into his gig, and gave me the money to buy the canvass for it.

"The lane has turned at last," said I, and so it had.

I painted his portrait, was successful, secured his patronage—was continually employed, and that which was at first considered a horror, proved a blessing on me and mine. Had I not taken to paint railings, the chain of circumstances would have been broken that thus led me on to paint portraits with success.

I cannot however conclude this sketch without mentioning a singular coincidence. On one occasion I received a note desiring me to proceed to a house in Montagu Square. I went—and it was the identical one I had painted from top to bottom. I was asked to dinner, and was seated as a gentleman in the very room where I had toiled as a journeyman.

It was thus that I rose to my present eminence. I have now a splendid mansion—servants—horses—carriages—and all the luxuries and comforts that wealth can purchase. I have also more work on hand than I can well accomplish, and for all of which I shall receive princely payment. I can nevertheless spare an hour to sketch my autobiography for the benefit of young artists, and I hope that I shall have no cause to regret the publication of my "RAILINGS AGAINST PORTRAITS."

EXAMPLES OF INTEMPERANCE.

Men are said to be drunk when they go to the pump to light their pipes; when they can not see a hole through a ladder; when they lie in the gutter and call out to be tucked up; when they go home, and, not being able to put the key in the door, swear that somebody has stolen the key-hole; or when they attempt to wind up their watches with the fire-tongs. But the effects produced by intemperance are not always of a laughable character: they are more frequently of a most deplorable nature.

It was under the influence of wine that Caligula, the Roman Emperor, perpetrated all those cruelties which have attached so terrible a renown to his hated name. In the paroxysm of his drunken insanity, Caligula was lavish of the blood of innocence and virtue. It would be superfluous to enumerate and disgusting to specify his cruelties. Rome was stained with wanton murders, monstrous in their character, in their numbers infinite: the security of high and humble life was utterly destroyed by an insidious system of abrupt, but secret massacre: natural affection, for a season, seemed to be extinct; and the very blessing of domestic confidence receded before a gloomy spirit of mistrust. Yet the copious bloodshed of the citizens was insufficient to assuage the sanguinary thirst of Caius Caligula, who was heard at a bacchanalian orgie to exclaim, amidst the lamentation and terror of the people, that "he wished the Romans had but one neck, that he might exterminate them at a single blow."

It is a remarkable fact that on the night previous to the battle of Hastings, which gave William the crown of England with the distinguishing title of "The Conqueror," the victorious Normans passed the interval between sunset and the morning of the engagement in fasting and prayer, while the English, who were routed, wiled away the hours in bacchanalian revelry.

Selim I. Sultan of the Ottomans, dishonoured all his brilliant qualities by the cruelties and tyrannical acts of which he was guilty, when under the influence of wine or opium, in both of which he indulged to excess. On one occasion, this monarch commanded his Grand Vizier to change all the Christian churches of Constantinople into mosques (or places of Mussulman worship), and to put to death all those Christians who would not abjure their creed and embrace that of Mohammed. The Grand Vizier knew that when the influence of the wine which the Sultan had imbibed, should have passed away, he would regret ever having expressed so dreadful a wish; and the order was not put into immediate execution. On the following morning Selim was delighted to find that the Grand Vizier had thus ventured to disobey the imperial decrees of the preceding day.

The histories of many literary men furnish memorable examples of the miseries arising from the possession of extraordinary talents, unaccompanied by habits of temperance and self-control. Amongst these individuals must be mentioned Robert Burns. As the talents for conversation of this distinguished poet were powerful and striking, he soon became an acceptable guest in the most fashionable circles of Edinburgh; and Edinburgh at that period contained an uncommon proportion of men of considerable talents devoted to social excess, in which their talents were wasted and debased. It was amongst characters of this description that Burns imbibed that fatal habit of intemperance which operated so strongly upon him, both physically and morally. He frequently saw his danger, and at times formed resolutions to guard against it; but he had embarked on the tide of dissipation—he possessed but little control over his own passions—and he was borne along with the fatal stream! It is true that in his case the temptation was strong. He had been reared amidst poverty and toil; and he had been suddenly introduced to a state of idleness and to a train of extreme and unusual luxury. Still, had he been a man who was determined to exercise his powers of self-command, he would have arisen superior to the weakness of the flesh, and would have triumphed over that fascinating habit, which speedily undermined his health, his happiness, and his reputation. He was well aware of the causes of his misfortunes; speaking of his besetting sins, he blames the spirit of evil for—

"Showing us the tempting ware,
Bright wines and bonnie lassie fair,
To put us daft."

He had splendid opportunities of doing well in this life; but he died in the most abject poverty, leaving a wife and four children totally unprovided for. The melancholy fate of this master-genius suggests the most important reflections. The first and most obvious is the importance of the virtue of self-command, which enables its possessor to withdraw from the society of those who practise habits of a pernicious tendency. The mind of Burns belonged to the highest order of intellect; yet, from the want of this virtue, his happiness, and ultimately his life, suffered shipwreck. He was cut off at what ought to have been his best days, when his mature talents were most capable of rearing a lasting monument of their own superiority.

Henry Fielding is another instance of the dreadful results of dissipation in the life of an author. Every one of our readers is doubtless familiar with the novels called "Tom Jones," "Amelia," "Joseph Andrews," &c.; and many are probably aware of the leading circumstances in the biography of their writer. He married a lady of large fortune, and commenced life with the most brilliant prospects of success. But he soon fell into bad company, dissipated the wealth his wife had brought him, and fell into a state of the utmost poverty and privation. With poverty came gout and all the diseases incidental to a constitution that was ruined by intemperance; and he was compelled to proceed to Lisbon for the benefit of his health—or rather, as a last effort to preserve life. He died in that city in the forty-eighth year of his age.

It is a most extraordinary fact that, with these examples perpetually before us, there should be found so many who still advocate or adhere to the custom of partaking of alcoholic liquors. Every historian, every biographer, has to record the fatal effects of intemperance with respect to one or more of his heroes. And, while he deprecates the evil and its source, he does not bethink himself of the only efficient remedy. He preaches about moderation, as if the virtue of self-command were the general characteristic of mankind, and that the cases of intemperance which are known or recorded, were only the very few exceptions to a general rule; in other words, as if those cases were only solitary examples of men not possessing the virtue of self-command. Now, these cases are neither far nor solitary; they are numerous, and present themselves before us in dense crowds. Here, then, is the direct denial given to the idea that self-command is a prevalent virtue. No: man is naturally weak, and yields to peculiar temptations with remarkable facility. As this is a truth which requires no argument to support it, it is evident that mankind should not place any reliance upon the assumed possession of the virtue of self-command. The temptation must be removed altogether; and the existence of that virtue, in respect to strong drink, must not be put to a test, where this test itself creates the appetite. Nothing but total abstinence from all inebriating liquors will secure individuals against the chance of becoming a prey to the insidious vice of intemperance. A man would not be a moderate drinker, unless he really liked the liquors of which he partakes; and if he have once learned to like them, it is very certain that he will gratify himself with something agreeable to him, as often as convenient. Thus, will he increase the number of his glasses daily, and also augment the strength of his potations: then, without ever perceiving the gradual progress he is making towards the state of a confirmed drunkard, he becomes one even before he is aware of the fast hold which the fascinating indulgence has taken upon him. If there were no moderate drinkers, there would be no drunkards; abolish then, that, which makes the moderate drinker.

A FEW POPULAR ERRORS CORRECTED.

There are many popular fallacies, both in respect to quotations and to circumstances, which we do not ever remember to have seen corrected in any article or essay devoted to the purpose. Many of these errors are used by some of the most eminent literary, and by some of the best educated men of the day, both in their writings and conversations; and these errors, like the authorities of many of the institutions of our country, have been consecrated, as it were, by long use. We shall endeavour, in this article, to explain and rectify an many of these fallacies which present themselves to our memory at the moment.

The following lines are usually quoted, as if they were to be found in Hudibras:

"A man, convinced against his will,
Is of the same opinion still."

Now it is impossible to be convinced against one's will; and Butler could not have written such an absurdity. The lines should be quoted thus:—

"He, that compels against his will,
Is of his own opinion still."

A man may comply, or consent to an argument, from motives of courtesy or other reasons: but he could not be convinced upon the same terms. Consent is merely the expression of the lips; conviction that of the mind. We have power over our words, but none over our volition.

The celebrated line, which conveys so true a maxim, and which never can be too often quoted, in application to the affairs of life—

"Incidit in Scyllam, qui vult vitare Charybdem," —is generally believed to exist in Virgil's Æneid; and it certainly is worthy of a place in that poem. But it is not to be found in the works of any ancient author. It exists in an old Latin poem, composed by an Englishman.

The following lines are invariably attributed to Pope:—

"Immodest words admit of no defence,
For want of decency is want of sense."

Roscommon was however the author of the couplet, which is to be found in one of that nobleman's poems.

Nearly all the publishers (Mr. Murray included) of Lord Byron's works, have, until the editions of the last four or five years, included amidst the miscellaneous effusions of that poet, the celebrated enigma upon the letter H, commencing thus:—

"'Twas whispered in Heaven, 'twas muttered in Hell,
And echo caught faintly the sound as it fell," &c.

The writer of this enigma was a Miss Fanshawe, who composed and published a volume of poems, many years ago, for a charitable purpose.

The well-known poem, entitled "The Devil's Walk," has invariably been attributed to Southey; whereas Southey only wrote two or three stanzas of it, the remainder and principal portion having emanated from the pen of Coleridge, who also conceived the idea. And yet the poet laureate has most basely and dishonestly included the whole of this poem in the complete edition of his works lately published by Messrs. Longman and Co.

Charles VII. of France is invariably quoted as the founder of standing armies in the middle ages, whereas the principle commenced with the Ottomans in Asia Minor, in the reign of Urkhan; in whose time Aladdin, the brother and Grand Vizier of this monarch, established a standing army upon a regular footing. The corps of Janissaries was established at the same period; and this circumstance would alone prove that the initiative honour was not due to the French monarch.

It is generally imagined that the guillotine was invented by Dr. Guillotin, who was himself one of the first to suffer by it: but this idea is erroneous. Guillotin only revived the instrument, which, under the denomination of the Moid, had been in vogue some time previously in Scotland.

The visitors to Saint Peter's Cathedral at Rome are shown a grand red banner, which nearly all the world believes to be the sacred standard of the Prophet taken by King Sobieski of Poland, at the battle of Vienna, in the seventeenth century. Now the sacred standard of the Prophet Mahomet has never been taken: it is of a dark green colour; and that at Rome is red. The standard of the Seraskier, or Ottoman Generalissimo, Kara-Mustapha-Pascha, has been hitherto considered to have been the banner of the prophet.

In speaking of a person who has arrived to a very great age, a common phrase is to compare him with Mathusalem; but the usual, and improper expression, is, "Oh! he's as old as Mathusalem."

When a low fellow wishes to annoy a gentleman with whom he is quarrelling, he exclaims, "Oh! you are no gentleman!" Now, the very reproach itself convinces him against whom it is levelled that he who utters it really knows that his adversary is a gentleman, and that he thinks that a denial of the fact will be a means of annoyance. As this is the case, no sensible person ever ought to suffer his temper to be ruffled by such a piece of abuse. The abuser only affects to think that the other is not a gentleman, or else the abuse itself would lose its point.

The words "fixed stars" constitute a misnomer; as those stars, which are called fixed, are really in motion. The sun itself is in motion, and has an orbit of its own, the centre of which is unknown to us. All the stars, which are called fixed, are suns to other systems of worlds, which they drag with them. Not only have planets, moons, and suns their motion, but assemblages of systems have also a motion; and probably assemblages of assemblages are influenced by the immutable and invariable law of motion in a similar manner. Thus the earth has four distinct species of motion: viz. I. It revolves in its orbit round the sun; II. It revolves upon its axis; III. Its axis itself has a motion from north to south; IV. And the earth also moves, with its orbit, in the assemblage of worlds to which it belongs, in obedience to the motion of the sun.

* This motion is caused by the attraction of the moon, and accounts for the position of the earth, in respect to the north pole being raised so many degrees above the equator. In the course of millions of years the north pole will become the south pole.

It is frequently asserted that the cause of heat in animals has not been ascertained; and this answer was given to a correspondent in a leading Sunday newspaper a few weeks ago. The cause of animal heat is, however, now indubitably shown to arise from the specific degrees of nervous irritability in living beings.

Fulton, the great American engineer, is usually quoted as the first individual who applied steam to the purpose of propelling vessels through the water. Several years, however, before Fulton made his experiments near the Isle des Cygnes, the Marquis de Jouffroy, an enterprising French nobleman, constructed a steam-boat at Lyons, of a hundred and forty feet in length. With this he made several successful experiments on the river Saone, near that city, as far back as 1781. At the same time that Fulton was only labouring to convince himself of the practicability of the scheme, another Frenchman, named De Blanc, obtained a patent for the construction of a steam-boat, which was built from such information as he could procure relative to the experiments of the Marquis de Jouffroy, to whom the honour of having first applied the use of steam to vessels must decidedly be given.

The idea that gunpowder was unknown to the world until the time of Schwarz, is erroneous. The Chinese have been acquainted with the properties of the combination for many, many centuries previous to the introduction of the deadly article into Europe; and they made use of it to propel stones from canes or pieces of wood hollowed for the purpose, and tightly bound round with iron hoops. Schwarz may however be termed the inventor—or one of the inventors of gunpowder, because he did not borrow the idea from the Chinese.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

ON THE DEATH OF MY CHILD.

By H. W. Weston.

While wand'ring in a verdant grove,
A faded lily I espied;
It once was sweet as parent's love,—
But, ah! it wither'd, and it died!
Blither the pang it brought to mind—
A pang that none but parents know;
For by that emblem was defin'd
The child that sleeps the turf below!
It told me that the hand of Death,
The choicest flow'rs untaught to spurn,
Had snatched away my infant's breath,
As it had crush'd the lily there!
And, like the lily too, how brief
The days that by my boy were spent,
Ere Death—perhaps for his relief—
To bear him to the tomb was sent!
Yet, Ah! what solace 'tis to know,
Belov'd child, while far from thee,
That Christ, from whom all bounties flow,
Has said, "Let children come to me!"

MORNING.

By Mrs. Reynolds.

The blushing radiance of returning light
Dispels apace the shadows of the night:
In golden glory, through the azure sky,
Phœbus pursues his course in grandeur high,
Still counting onward, by his march sublime,
New dates to swell the history of Time.
Fresh from his palace in the eastern main,
The lum'rous god comes forth to earth again;
Looks from his vap'ry canopy above
First on the children that implore his love—
That clime which erst—forgive them, tho' they err!
He daily mark'd his constant worshipper:
Then, in progressive beauty drawing near,
His beams disperse the dew-drops of Jndea;
Ope the reclining buds and sleeping flowers;
To blush once more upon their fairer bowers;
And, falling lightly on the slumberer's eyes,
Resuscitate his strength and energies!
None mourns his presence! Captives in their cell
Delight upon his partial beams to dwell,
That thro' the iron'd lattice in their wall
Deluge with a tantalizing glare to fall!
The birds in every grove his coming greet,
And tell their gladness by their warbling sweet;
And Nature leaps with joy to hail again
The bright assertion of his golden reign!

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ERRATA.—In Number 28, page, 219, 1st. column, 17 lines from the bottom, read advisedly for advisably; and page 220, 2nd column, 34 lines from the top, read wrote for write.

We regret that we cannot insert Mr. Elijah Browne's address to the Teetotalers of Lincolnshire and Norfolk. We do not receive advertisements, and his address would come under that denomination. If he will send us his publications, we will notice them in the department allotted to Reviews of Books, &c.

We are much obliged to J. W. (Once a spirit-dealer) for his courteous letter. We do not, however, insert articles extracted from other publications, unless they be from Teetotal publications, or in the Review department.

Q in the Corner is a most facetious correspondent. His last letter is really very clever, and full of pointed humour and just sarcasm. We know that the meeting to which he alludes, was the most complete failure possible; but we do not wish to expose any weak point in respect to Teetotal transactions, of whatsoever kind, because such behaviour on our part would only afford a ground of triumph for the enemy (the publican).

We shall be glad to hear from Mr. J. W. D. (we believe that these are his initials) of Poland Street.

The clergyman in Wales, who honoured us with a letter ordering "The Teetotaler" to be forwarded to him regularly from the beginning of this year, should apply to a local bookseller, as our journal not being stamped, cannot be sent by post, save at a heavy expense. Should local booksellers be unable to supply the journal every week, they can at all events procure the Monthly Parts for all subscribers.

We beg to call the attention of the Reader to the Eleventh Number of a Series of Illustrations, which is given gratis with "THE TEETOTALER" at this day. The Series will be complete in Twelve Illustrations, and will be continued for as many consecutive weeks.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 9th, 1840.

THE Genius of Britain exercises a dominion co-extensive with the waves of that ocean which has been the field of fame to so many of her gallant and patriotic sons, and embracing a very large portion of the habitable earth as well as of the civilised intelligence of the whole world—a dominion greater than Alexander attempted, or than Cæsar possessed—greater than republican Athens, in the zenith of her glory, ever exercised, or than imperial Rome, with all her ambitious heroes, ever wielded—greater, in fine, than Jhenghis-Khan, Timour, or Mahomet, ever achieved over savage clans and roving barbarians. This mighty empire is ruled by a lady, whose countenance beams with a smile which bespeaks the kindly feelings, the generous affections, and the benevolent sympathies which play around the heart. Her Majesty had the good fortune to be educated under the eye of a mother possessed of an excellent understanding and a most amiable disposition. Deeply sensible of the importance of the task which the nation entrusted to her care, that mother fulfilled the hopes and expectations of the people: she prepared the ground for cultivation; she sowed the good seed; she has seen the goodly plant thrive; she has marked its firm root—its gradual growth—its opening bloom—and its displayed effulgence: her fond heart has cherished no other object than this,—her fervent orisons have had no other aspirations—that her daughter might be found worthy of the nation's fame—worthy of the people's love—and worthy of the spirit of the age. Her Majesty exhibits the truth of the beautiful Aristotelian adage in Diogenes Laertius, that, if the root of learning be bitter, the fruit is sweet; for, by the soft persuasiveness and tender care of her mother, was the royal lady conducted to a hill-side, laborious indeed at the first ascent, but else so smooth—so green—so full of goodly prospects and melodious sounds on every side, that the harp of Orpheus is not more enchanting. Amidst the various accomplishments with which the mind of Her Majesty is stored, is the study of History. In traversing the pages of the History of the World, she could not have failed to observe the important truth, which should be so deeply imprinted on her mind, that dissipation has been the bane of empires!

That mighty dominion which the Genius of Britain now exercises, is menaced, by an enemy more potent than the Grand Army of Napoleon—more insidious than a pestilence amongst the people. This enemy is Intemperance; and by this foe are ruled not only the United Kingdom, but also the Indies of the eastern and the western world, the islands of the Mediterranean, and the settlements in Australasia,—in a word, the whole British empire. At this moment thousands of individuals are pining in gaols and in captivity, whose hard fate has been brought about by Intemperance. Let, then, the nation take advantage of the circumstance of a lady being seated upon the throne; let Teetotalism agitate the great question of moral reformation, until its name shall become a familiar and household word even in the palace of the sovereign; and let the whole body of the Teetotalers in the United Kingdom adopt measures to petition and memorialize the House of Commons at the approaching session. The Queen cannot fail to hear of this agitation; and her naturally generous nature, her high moral character, and her enquiring disposition, will be found powerful auxiliaries in favour of the cause of Teetotalism. Should Her Majesty countenance the proposed measure of social reformation, she will then convey to the hearts of all philanthropists tidings of great joy,—and, in the language of Lord Chatham, she will be "enthroned in the hearts of the wise and of the good."

So soon as intemperance shall be swept from the face of this mighty empire the torch of crime will be converted into the calumet of Christian peace. The promotion of Mechanics' Institutes, a more extended system of national education, and the establishment of public libraries, naturally suggest themselves as measures to assist in the attainment of the grand object in view. These institutions would be attended with most beneficial results, in collecting and diffusing information, in rousing dormant energies, in fanning the intellectual flame, and inspiring generous emulation. One of the collateral advantages which would emanate from such institutions would be, that men of real ability and talent, of all classes, would be brought into the society of each other; and while the accidents of conversation might be the means of communicating valuable suggestions to each other, the personal intercourse would lessen the interval that separates each grade of society from another,—produce mutual respect and esteem,—prove that the working-classes only require to be known to have their merits and their capacities duly appreciated, and lead to all the courtesies, amenities, charities, and utilities of free and frequent intercourse. Then would it become apparent to the world that all moral reformation in reality emanates from the working classes,—that to them are alone due the honour and the glory of the Teetotal principle,—and that it is especially for their interests that the progress of the great doctrine should meet with all possible encouragement.

We are for plain argument and fair reasoning: we have no prejudices; but we are desirous of acting on a conviction of what is right, and to support the cause which we believe to be the most conducive to the real interests of society. We reject false colours, meretricious ornaments, and delusive lights, and wish to speak forth the words of soberness and truth. We should not disguise from ourselves the truth, however disagreeable that truth may be. It is, influenced by impressions of so grave a nature as these, that we unhesitatingly declare the British empire to be in danger of perishing, like Rome, and Carthage, and Byzantium, a prey to the evil Genius of dissipation, unless the advocates of Teetotalism persist in their strenuous endeavours to overturn the temples dedicated to Intemperance. "Teetotalism has done much; but much still remains to be done," was our remark on a former occasion. Teetotalism has to contend against a powerful press, a mighty phalanx of individuals who fatten upon the ruin it vainly would arrest, and a host of men whose vicious inclinations form a strong barrier against the popularity of the doctrine of total abstinence. The flowers of rhetorical vituperation are scattered with a prodigal hand, against Teetotalism, on all sides,—the vocabularies of slang have been exhausted by the publicans in their abuse of a system which undermines their infamous traffic; but Teetotalism is still prospering and triumphant. One of the true methods of contending with the wiliness of the serpent, is to exhibit in ourselves the harmlessness of the dove. Teetotalism is based upon a rock; and the billows of opposition, beat they never so high, cannot overturn it.

In vain have we perused the annals of history and the mighty volume of nature—small fruit have we reaped from past experience, and to no good purpose have we conversed with mankind, if a measure of Union be not one of the most efficient to enable Teetotalism to produce instantaneous effects. The imagination must not be fed with any speculations relative to the superiority of one Total Abstinence Association or Sect over another,—speculations which daily carry men farther away from the expediences and utilities of the Teetotal doctrine, the higher they ascend, and the deeper they dive. The real strength of the Teetotalers will be best shown, felt, and exercised by the compact firmness and the strict union of the immortal phalanx. They must abstain from all topics of irritation, from all uncharitableness and hatred, amongst themselves: they should steer the even course of patriots and philanthropists, accomplishing whatever can be accomplished by argument and eloquence, by talent and prudence, by knowledge, by firmness, consistency, and wisdom; and they should remember that a general and simultaneous assault has carried many a fortress which had long withstood the petty annoyances of detached parties.

We therefore say to the Teetotalers of the United Kingdom,—“Combine your forces,—petition Parliament,—memorialize the Queen through her ministers,—and cease those intestine bickerings, and jealousies, and strifes, which only militate against the interests of the most glorious principle which, since the origin of the Christian religion, has been promulgated amongst men.” This is our calm and dispassionate advice,—this is our earnest counsel; and we know that success will attend those who follow the suggestions.

FRENCH CHARACTERS CARICATURED.

NO. I.—THE COMMERCIAL TRAVELLER.

SOME years ago there was an old man in Paris, who went about the streets exclaiming in the same unwearied tremulous tone, the following words:—“For two sous I sell a rhyming almanack, a spelling-book, a tooth-pick, a stay-lace, a needle-case, a yard of riband, and four numbers in the Lottery. It is impossible that, amongst these various articles, there should not be something which will suit the purchaser; and that one object will alone be worth two sous.”

In his younger days, this old man had been a commercial-traveller; and he had acted in accordance with the maxim that a tradesman had always something in his warehouse which must absolutely suit some one. He was resolved never to present himself to a provincial firm without compelling the partners to purchase, or rather order, some kind of merchandise. It was by these means that he acquired such a reputation for his powers of eloquence and persuasion. Suppose he waited upon a small tradesman in the country, he would endeavour to do his duty in behalf of all the individuals in Paris by whom he was charged with commissions. For instance, he would begin with an enlogium upon a new journal for which he was to obtain subscribers:—

“Well! upon my word, M. Dumont! I am surprised that a man of intellect—a man of sound sense and sterling judgment, like you—should refuse to subscribe to the new journal!”

“No—no,” returned the tradesman; “I had rather not.”

“You are quite right! But I must beg of you to take a small cask of excellent claret!”

“No! The wine is too cold—I don’t like it.”

“Well, upon my word, you are quite right! We won’t say another word about the matter. I shall only just write down your name for the journal and the cask of wine.”

“No—a thousand times, no!”

“Good! good!” cries the commercial traveller; “you can pay me when you like!—I shall send up the bill and receipt in the morning.”

And the poor tradesman is so bewildered by the manner in which the commercial traveller transacts business, that he is absolutely driven into the two bargains he so strenuously refused to accede to.

The commercial traveller’s first care, when he arrived at an inn, was to request the landlord to give him gold for all the silver he carried about with him, and for which accommodation he paid the difference caused by the premium on the exchange. When he was about to depart, he had an excuse for not liquidating his account.

“My dear friend,” he would say to the landlord, “I will settle my score the next time I come this way: I have nothing but gold about me now.”

It is scarcely necessary to observe that the commercial traveller never returned to that inn again.

When he arrived at Beanne, Nuits, or Ai, or any other of the towns in the wine-country, he presented himself at the counting-houses of the first wine-merchants, and gave them orders of vast magnitude in behalf of several of the most eminent houses in Paris, promising that the wine would be settled for with payment upon delivery. The wine-merchants, who were well acquainted with the solvency of the houses alluded to, paid the commercial traveller his commission in advance. The wines were sent, as ordered; and a few days afterwards the merchants received letters from Paris declaring that no such commission had ever been entrusted to the individual who ordered the wines. The commercial traveller, in the meantime, was already far away, puffing off cloth, leeches, and dictionaries in an adjacent department.

At the hotels where the commercial traveller stopped, he always took upon himself the task of carving at the table d’hôte. While he was thus engaged, he invariably expatiated upon an epidemic disease which he stated to exist amongst poultry, and warned the company at the table d’hôte not to eat the wings. So reckless was he, however, of the danger, that he did not hesitate to eat the very parts he would not recommend to those present. At dessert, he gave the company a specimen of his versatile talents: he imitated the noise of a saw with his mouth, and then regaled the ears with the sounds of a plume;—he would also exhibit his ventriloquism, and swallowed knives. When the table d’hôte was particularly animated, he boldly entered upon that species of speculation called betting. If it were fine weather, he would wager ten silk pocket-handkerchiefs against one that the weather would change before the morning; only—in order to equalize the chances a little—he used to stipulate that the opposite party, in case of winning the bet, should give him a couple of francs upon each handkerchief thus gained—a mere trifle, he would observe, when compared with the real value of the article. Even when he lost the wager, the commercial traveller was a gainer of one franc; because each handkerchief only cost him a franc at the manufactory—so well was the effigy of silk imitated in cotton!

The commercial traveller sometimes performed his journeys in a handsome gig or curriole. On these occasions, he would offer a place to any other gentleman, in the same line, whom he might meet at an inn on the road, and to whom he would leave the trifling task of paying the tavern-bills for the rest of the way. If our commercial traveller journeyed in a post-chaise with a brother of the same profession, he invariably slept so soundly when the horses were changed, that the expenses of the travelling fell upon his more wakeful companion. On one or two occasions, he had forgotten his companion on the road,—but only in those cases when the said companion’s trunk and cash-box were safe in the vehicle.

Sometimes, when the commercial traveller arrived at a crowded inn, and was compelled to occupy a couch in a double-bedded room, or even to share that of another traveller, he was invariably seized with the most extraordinary fits of somnambulism in the night. He would rise, when all others slept, and proceed straight to the pockets of his companion, whose memorandum-book he would refer to. He thus transferred to his memory the notes of the commissions entrusted to his fellow traveller. If he were ever detected in these nocturnal wanderings, he used to laugh them off; and, if not, the commissions were confided by him to a rival house, which executed them at a cheaper rate than the terms of the one for which they were originally destined.

The commercial traveller founded a charitable institution, with the view of succouring those gentlemen of the bag who might be robbed during their travels. This institution was enthusiastically approved of by all the commercial travellers of Paris; and they offered the founder their best thanks, which he modestly declined, and a gold medal, which he put into his pocket.

By a most strange coincidence, it was remarked that, from the moment this establishment was founded, the projector of the charitable and philanthropic plan was himself very frequently plundered of all he possessed, during his journeys,—and even of his most necessary clothing!

“If my general probity were not so well,” said he, at a grand meeting of the directors, on one occasion, “I might be accused of having robbed myself. Fortunately, however, my commercial honesty is beyond the reach of such calumniating suspicions. The highway robbers owe me a grudge,—and that’s all! But, nevertheless—with a view to the interests of the institution—I think I had better give up all further journeys into the country, or I should ruin the treasury. I would much rather that the directors should allow me an annual income, upon which I can exist at my ease. When once I am no longer compelled to travel, there will be no more highway robberies.”

The directors negatived this proposal; but they passed a resolution that the same traveller could only be recompensed for losses once a year. The hero of this brief Memoir from that time forth, until he took to selling small articles in the streets of Paris, only applied to the institution on every new year’s day, as it invariably happened that he was plundered on his travels, just about Christmas time.

NO. II.—THE LODGER.

WHEN the cold wind of vicissitude whistles in the ears of the fashionable gentleman, he is compelled to seek a retreat in an unfurnished lodging, into which he is prudent enough not to introduce many articles of furniture which may be denominated his own property. Nor does he pay his quarterly rent very regularly; on the contrary, he adopts the custom of never paying anything at all—a system pursued with admirable uniformity four times every year.

The lodger, whose furniture consists of nothing more nor less than a camp bedstead, one mattress, a pair of sheets, and a bottle to put a candle in, defies all proceedings at law; inasmuch as the French Codes do not allow a man’s bed to be taken away from under him. It is thus that the lodger profits by his social position to laugh at all landlords who might have the incivility to request him to liquidate his rent.

At the first demand for payment—a demand which is made through the porter of the house—the lodger only replies by the silence of contempt; and a second demand, also conveyed through the same medium, elicits nothing but a smile of pity or disdain. The landlord then determines to visit the extraordinary tenant in person; and this is most probably the nature of the interview:—

The landlord, who is naturally ugly, as all good and honest landlords are and ought to be, assumes his least agreeable expression of countenance—a circumstance that renders him absolutely frightful: he thus suddenly presents himself in the apartment of his lodger, at whom he darts a glance of crocodile ferocity; and then, crossing his arms in imitation of many great men, he gives utterance to the following words in an abrupt and savage tone:—

“Well, sir, might I enquire when it will suit you to pay your quarter’s rent? This is the third time you are asked for it, and you do not even condescend to utter a syllable in reply. This condition of things cannot last; and I am come to know what steps I am to take with regard to you.”

“Oh! here you are, Mister landlord,” ejaculates the lodger, also crossing his arms, in imitation of his visitor, and seating himself upon the edge of his only article of furniture: “upon my word, I am very much pleased to have this opportunity of expressing to you my private opinion relative to the line of conduct you have adopted with regard to me.”

"What do you mean? what line of conduct?" cries the astonished landlord.

"Do not take up my words, if you please," says the lodger. "It is I, on the contrary, who am entitled to ask an explanation of what you mean?"

"What I mean!" ejaculates the landlord. "Why—is there anything strange in my conduct?"

"What!" vociferates the lodger; "you affect not to understand me! Well, upon my honour—I cannot but admire so much dissimulation! I must confess that I never met your equal—and yet I have been acquainted with very many landlords! What—is it possible that you are not put to the blush?"

"Blush at what?" cries the landlord, more thoroughly exasperated.

"Why—blush at your conduct, to be sure," replies the lodger. "Is it possible that you do not blush—you, a landlord—at the mere fact of coming to ask a poor wretch of a lodger for money?"

"And pray of whom should I ask for money?" demands the landlord:—"of the tax-gatherer, I suppose."

"You may ask any one whom you choose," returns the lodger; "but you certainly will get none out of me! On the contrary—"

"On the contrary!" cries the landlord; "I suppose I must give you some to get rid of you?"

"Exactly what I mean," says the lodger. "You will give me money to induce me to quit—you will give me money to convey away my traps—and you will give me money to indemnify me for my trouble and loss of time in moving;—or else I shall stop where I am. In this latter case, you will commence a law-suit against me: you will serve me with a notice to quit—then a writ of ejectment—then an order to appear to tax costs—and then the notice of judgment—all in regular order, which will take six months;—and, in the meantime, we will laugh like madmen!"

Imagine the countenance of the miserable landlord, overwhelmed by this announcement! He must naturally be of a very strong constitution not to have a sudden attack of apoplexy.

When he again collects those ideas, which the lodger's discourse so effectually disperses, the poor landlord has nothing to do but to cast his eyes around the room, and thus convince himself of the exact truth of all his tenant's advances. There, where there is nothing to seize, the king loses his authority—and the landlord much more so. The only consolation which he can permit himself is to heave a sigh—or two sighs—or even three sighs, if he like; as the lodger is too polite to endeavour to enumerate them.

The landlord returns to his own apartments, in a state of uncertainty how to act. He orders his house-keeper to heat some water of fifty degrees (Reaumer)—which is the temperature of Senegal and of foot-baths. But scarcely has he placed the extremities of his legs in the liquid in question, when the lodger bursts into the bedroom where this operation is going on, and exclaims as follows:—

"By the bye, my dear sir, I had forgotten to tell you just now that you had better order your porter not to injure my credit when I send to you for a reference in respect to new lodgings. What I now say is expressly in your interest; because if you agree to pay the expenses of the law-suit I detailed to you just now, I should be sorry were your porter to compel me to keep your lodging any longer than was absolutely necessary. And I should also be compelled, on my part, to commence an action against your porter to seek damages for defamation; which damages you would have to pay, as you are responsible for the conduct of your dependants."

The unfortunate landlord, thoroughly unnerved by this second announcement, faints in the foot-bath, and keeps his bed six months afterwards.

BALLOONS.

On the 21st of November, 1783, the first ascent ever attempted by aeronauts was carried into execution from the castle of La Muette in France. The aeronauts were the Marquis d'Arlandes and Pilatre de Rozier, the latter of whom was superintendent of the Royal Museum of Paris. These intrepid individuals ascended with a machine containing six thousand cubic feet. The balloon, after attaining a considerable height, came down, in about half an hour, about half a mile from the castle. But the aeronauts had been exposed to considerable danger: the balloon was agitated very violently several times; the fire had burnt holes in it; the car was injured; and several of the cords were broken. They perceived that it was necessary to descend without delay; but when they were on the surface of the earth, new difficulties presented themselves. The weak coal fire no longer supported the linen balloon, the whole of which fell into the flame. Rozier, who had not yet succeeded in descending from the car, narrowly escaped being burnt to death.

The second ascent ever attempted was also performed by two Frenchmen. These aeronauts were named Robert and Charles, the latter of whom was a distinguished professor of natural philosophy in Paris. These gentlemen ascended with a balloon of a spherical form, twenty-six feet in diameter, and consisting of silk coated with a varnish of gum-elastic. The car for the aeronauts was attached to several cords which were fastened to a net drawn over the upper part of the balloon. A valve was constructed above, which could be opened from the car, by means of cords, and shut with a spring. This seemed to afford an outlet to the inflammable air, if they wished to descend, or found it necessary to diminish it. The filling lasted several days; and on 1st of December 1783, the voyage was commenced from the gardens of the Tuileries. The balloon quickly rose to a height of eighteen hundred feet, and disappeared from the eyes of the spectators. The aeronauts diligently observed the barometer, which now stood at less than 26°, threw out gradually the ballast they had taken in to keep the balloon steady, and descended safely at Nesle. But as soon as M. Robert had stepped out, and the balloon was thus lightened of his entire weight, it rose again with great rapidity to the distance of about nine thousand feet. It expanded itself with such force, that it must have been torn to pieces, had not M. Charles, with much presence of mind, opened the valve to accommodate the quantity of gas to the rarity of the surrounding atmosphere. After the lapse of half an hour, the balloon sank down upon a plain, about three miles from the place of its second ascent.

On the 15th of July, 1784, the Duke de Chartres, the two brothers Robert, and another person, ascended with an inflammable air balloon, from the park of Saint Cloud, near Paris, at eight minutes to eight in the evening. This balloon was of an oblong form, measuring fifty-five and a half feet in length, and thirty-four in diameter. It ascended with its greatest extension nearly horizontal; and, after remaining in the atmosphere about forty-five minutes, it descended at a little distance from whence it had ascended, and, at about thirty feet distance from the Lac de la Järerne, in the park of Meudon. But the incidents that happened in this aerial excursion deserve to be particularly described, as nothing like it had happened before to any of the aerial travellers. This machine contained an interior smaller balloon filled with common air; by which means, according to a mode hereafter to be mentioned, the machine was to be made to ascend or descend without any loss of inflammable air or ballast. The boat was furnished with a helm and oars intended to guide it, &c. At the place of starting the barometer stood at 30°. 12'. Three minutes after its ascending, the balloon was lost in the clouds; and the aerial voyagers lost sight of the earth, being involved in a dense vapour. Here an unusual agitation of the air, somewhat like a whirlwind, in a moment turned the machine three times from the right to the left. The violent shocks which they suffered prevented their using any of the means prepared for the direction of the balloon; and they even tore away the silk stuff of which the helm was made. Never, said they, had a more dreadful scene presented itself to any eye than that in which they were involved. An unbounded ocean of shapeless clouds rolled one upon another, beneath, and seemed to forbid their return to the earth, which was still invisible. The agitation of the balloon became greater every moment. They cut the cords which held the interior balloon, which consequently fell on the bottom of the external one, just upon the aperture of the tube, which went down into the boat, and stopped it up. At this time, the thermometer showed a little above 44°. A gust of wind from below drove the balloon upwards to the extremity of the vapour, when the appearance of the sun showed them the existence of nature: but now both the heat of the sun, and the diminished density of the atmosphere, occasioned such a dilation of the inflammable air, that the bursting of the balloon was apprehended; to avoid which, they introduced a stick through the tube that proceeded from the balloon, and endeavoured to remove from its aperture the inner balloon that closed it; but the dilation of the inflammable air pushed the inner balloon so violently against the aperture of the tube that every endeavour proved ineffectual. During this time they still continued to ascend, until the mercury in the barometer stood not higher than 24°. 36' inches, which shows their height above the surface of the earth to have been about five thousand one hundred feet. In these dreadful circumstances, they thought it necessary to make a hole in the balloon, in order to give an exit to the inflammable air; and the Duke de Chartres, by means of one of the banners, made two incisions which caused a rent of between seven and eight feet. They then descended very rapidly, seeing at first no object on earth or in the heavens; but a moment after they discovered the fields, and saw that they were descending straight towards a lake, into which they must have fallen, had they not thrown overboard about sixty pounds' weight of ballast, which occasioned their coming down at about thirty feet beyond the edge of the lake. Notwithstanding this rapid descent, occasioned by the great quantity of gas which escaped out of the two rents in the balloon, none of the four adventurers was hurt; but they all spoke in the highest terms of excitement of the pleasures of their expedition.

These successful aerial voyages were soon followed by others. Blanchard, also an enterprising Frenchman, had already ascended several times, when he determined to cross the channel between England and France, which is about twenty-two miles wide, in a balloon filled with inflammable air. He succeeded in this bold attempt, on the 7th of January, 1785, accompanied by an American gentleman, Dr. Jeffries. About one o'clock they left the English coast, and, at half past two, were on the French. Pilatre de Rozier, mentioned before as the first aeronaut, attempted, on the 14th of January, 1785, in company with M. Romain, to pass from the French to the English side; but the attempt was unsuccessful, and the adventurers lost their lives. M. de Rozier had, on this occasion, united the two kinds of balloons: under one, filled with inflammable air, which did not alone possess sufficient elevating power, was a second, filled by means of a coal fire under it. Rozier had chosen this combination, hoping to unite the advantage of both kinds. By means of the lower balloon, he intended to rise and sink at pleasure, which is not possible with inflammable air; for a balloon, filled with this, when once sunk to the earth, cannot rise again with the same weight, without being filled anew; while, on the contrary, by increasing or diminishing the fire under a balloon filled with heated air, it can be made to rise and fall alternately. But this experiment caused the death of the projectors. Probably the coals, which were only in a glowing state near the surface of the earth, were suddenly kindled to a light flame as the balloon rose, and set it on fire. The whole machine was soon on flames, and the two aeronauts were precipitated from the air. The condition of their mangled bodies confirms the conjecture that they were killed by the explosion of the gas.

Blanchard rendered an essential service to aeronauts by the invention of the parachute, which they can use, in case of necessity, to let themselves down without danger.

Major Money ascended from Newark, under the impression that the aerial current would take the balloon in the direction of Ipswich. Scarcely, however, had he attained an altitude of one mile, when a violent hurricane, operating in a new direction, drove the balloon towards Yarmouth. Several small row boats immediately put out from that port, and endeavoured to keep pace with the balloon, but without success; and Major Money first touched the sea about nine miles from land, and more than three from any means of assistance. The major was immersed to his middle in the water, and, thus clinging to the cords of the balloon, was dragged through the ocean at so rapid a rate, that it was only by the superior speed of a fast-sailing cutter, which happened to lay in the track of the balloon, that he was saved, when almost exhausted.

By means of balloons, the shape of certain seas and lands may be better ascertained; men may ascend to the tops of the mountains they had never visited before; they may be carried over marshy and dangerous ground; they may by that means come out of a besieged place, or an island; they may, in hot climates, ascend to a cold region of the atmosphere to observe the ice which is never seen below; and, in short, they may be thus taken to several places to which human art hitherto knew of no conveyance.

BRANDY AND SALT.

To the Editor of "THE TEETOTALER."

Sir,

I am requested by a correspondent who signs himself MEDICUS to answer him through the medium of your excellent journal; and although I comply, I must express my regret that the gentleman has not been confidential enough to favour me with his name. He observes as follows:—

"We find that boiling alcohol will dissolve dried chloride of sodium (salt), and, on the liquid cooling, irregular crystals will be deposited. These will be found to consist of alcohol and chloride of sodium. The same will result by treating alcohol with chloride of calcium and other chlorides: these compounds are called alcohates."

"Sulphuric acid (oil of vitriol) has a vast affinity for water, and readily absorbs it from the atmosphere. By treating it with alcohol and applying heat, ether is distilled over. The theory laid down is that the acid, from its great affinity for water, takes oxygen and hydrogen (the elements of that fluid) from the alcohol, thus converting it into ether by disturbing the proportions of its elements,—the heat employed being chiefly instrumental in driving the ether over as it is generated."

"It is quite clear that the production of ether does not depend upon the heat alone; for if the acid and the spirit be mixed at common temperature, the smell of ether perceptibly demonstrates its presence."

"The water of dilution of acid and alcohol does not stand in the way of the chemical action of the acid upon the elements of the alcohol."

"QUESTION: Is not an alcoholate formed in solution on simply adding chloride of sodium to Brandy; or may not some new properties resulting give the mixture powers neither possessed in their separate state?"

ANSWER.—By treating boiling alcohol with certain chlorides, crystals have been produced on the fluid cooling. And on examination, these have been found to consist of alcohol and the chloride used in definite proportions. From their analogy to hydrates (or those bodies that combine in definite proportions with water) they have been termed Alcoholates."

When an alcoholate is thus formed it is owing to the absence of water; for if the salt or the alcohol contained water, then crystals would not be produced. The chlorides crystallize more readily with water than with alcohol; indeed from their known affinity for water, they are often employed to strengthen alcohol, in other words to obtain absolute alcohol by the abstraction of water."

PRICE TWOPENCE.

ADDRESS TO OUR READERS.

We should be paying a sorry compliment to the numerous readers who have so liberally bestowed their patronage upon us, did we not accord an attentive ear to the suggestions and wishes which have been lately submitted to us in a voluminous correspondence from all parts of the country. We are pleased to find that the general plan upon which THE TEETOTALER is conducted has given satisfaction; and a rapidly increasing circulation holds out to us fresh inducements to exert ourselves, to the utmost of our power, to render the journal as welcome to our audience as possible. The general wish appears to be, that we should commence another continuous Tale in THE TEETOTALER; and, without offering any opinion of our own upon this suggestion, we signify our readiness to please by complying with it. We therefore earnestly request the attention of our readers to the announcement that, on January 23rd will be commenced, in THE TEETOTALER, a new Tale by the Editor, G. W. M. REYNOLDS, Esq., entitled

"PICKWICK MARRIED."

This tale will be continued weekly in THE TEETOTALER, until its completion.

We have also the pleasure to announce that with next Saturday will commence a new Series of Pictorial Embellishments, uniform with that which is now complete, and developing the Effects of Intemperance and Temperance in the LIFE OF A GENTLEMAN. This new Series will also consist of Twelve Illustrations.

We avail ourselves of this opportunity to remind our readers, that, while we use our most strenuous endeavours to advocate the grand cause of Total Abstinence from all Intoxicating Liquors, our columns are also devoted to General Literature, Science, the Arts, Belles Lettres, and all subjects calculated to amuse or instruct our readers. In this plan we shall persevere; and, in consequence of the liberality of the public patronage which has been bestowed upon our undertaking, we are happy to be enabled to announce that the publisher of THE TEETOTALER has completed arrangements with some of the most eminent literary men of the day to contribute papers of first-rate talent to its columns. By these and other plans for the improvement of the journal, an increased share of public approbation is anticipated.

THE PROGRESS OF TEMPERANCE;

DEVELOPED IN THE LIFE OF A WORKING MAN.

With the number of The Teetotaler, in which this article appears, is given the twelfth pictorial illustration of the events in the life of a Working-Man who has passed through the different phases of intemperance and of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors. Pregnant with the most truthful morals are the twelve plates which have lately been issued with this journal; and the contemplation of the contrast they afford between the miseries attendant upon a life of intemperance and the blessings which await the sober man, should alone be sufficient to induce every sensible person to turn towards the Teetotal pledge as the only rock of earthly and eternal safety. As, on former occasions, we shall endeavour to convey to the ideas of our readers, a concise history of the last three plates of this series.

PLATE X.—We perceive by this illustration that the hero of the pictorial history has lost his wife—the partner of all his former cares and late happiness—by the hand of Death. The artist has done well to introduce this episode into the life of his hero, because it reminds us that all sublunary joys are subject to the gall of bitterness, and that good is so essentially commingled with evil in this world, it would almost seem as if those principles were inseparable. Successful as the Working-Man has been in life, since he embraced the doctrine which regenerated him, he has still tasted of those adversities which arrive from time to time to remind us of our mortality. We now find him sitting in a beautiful summer-house attached to his garden; and, if we may judge by those houses which join his own, he is now in a condition of great affluence. His son, an interesting boy about ten years old, is sitting near him, reading the Bible—for it is Sunday! At a distance, his daughter, who is about sixteen, is seen conversing with the youth whose suit has found favour in her father's eyes, and who is the son of a rich neighbour. This plate is a very excellent one, and bears evidence to the good taste of the artist who designed it. While the father is listening to the word of God, the daughter is receiving the avowal of a pure and sincere affection from the lips of her lover; and these two circumstances have given the denomination (a Latin derivative) of "The Auscultation" to the picture. The highest ambition of the hero of this narrative is now to see his daughter well married; and she is too prudent a girl to form a connexion that would not meet with the approval of her sire.

PLATE XI.—This picture enables us to obtain a correct idea of the realisation of the plans of the good genius of Teetotalism on one side, and of the demon of intemperance on the other. This is the bridal-day of the daughter of our hero and the youth to whom she has been some time attached. The young bride, full of life, light, happiness, and joy, issues from the temple of the Almighty; where her union with a handsome, a wealthy, and an affectionate youth has been blessed by the priest; fond relatives flock around her, and the path of her existence seems strewn with flowers. Her father, proud of the excellent match which his prudence and good character have secured for his daughter, finds all his earthly hopes now realised; and he knows that his old age will be accompanied by all the endearments of family affection. But—on the other hand—whom does he encounter at the door of the church? Surely the features of those two miserable mendicants are not altogether unknown to him! No—he recognises them but too well, in spite of the change they have undergone through privation and intemperance. Upon the breast of one is a placard, with the word "STARVING" written upon it in large characters. The merciful dispensations of the New Poor Law Bill (a statute passed in the nineteenth century, and in a civilised country!) prevent these poor wretches from openly demanding the charity of which they stand so much in need. But, as no myrmidon of the New Police Force is near, they now clamour forth for alms. It is in that condition that they are recognised by the hero of our narrative:—in a word, they are the very individuals who first enticed him to partake of the intoxicating cup—the tempters of his youth! With tears in his eyes, he hastens to relieve them—he throws them a handful of silver;—they recognise him, and the contrast is complete! The ruin of these has been realised by means of the insidious wiles of Intemperance; and the prosperity of the individual who now relieves them, has been brought about by the adoption of the pledge of total abstinence!

PLATE XII.—The twelfth and last plate requires but few words to explain it: indeed, it explains itself, and is but the natural and appropriate termination to the pictorial history of a Working-Man, who has had the courage to turn from the evil ways of dissipation, for the purpose of entering upon those of sobriety and temperance. Everything in life has gone well with him since he signed the pledge—that is, as well as mundane affairs ever do progress; and, now, in his old age he is surrounded by that happy family whose fortunes and prosperity he founded by his own industry, encouraged by his perseverance, and confirmed by his example.

EUGENIUS GARWOOD;

A CENTRAL STORY.

THE owner of the name which serves as the title of this narrative, resided—nay, I believe, still resides, in Botolph Lane, and was, or is, an orange-merchant. I would not have the thoughtless and exclusive reader imagine that Botolph Lane is altogether without the pale of civilisation and refinement; or that orange-merchants are not human, rational, and respectable beings. On the contrary, that narrow lane—it may almost be called an orange-grove—running, or rather leaping, from East-cheap into Thame-street,—that lane, I say, contains not only a fair proportion of wealth and gentility, but rejoices in men whose minds are of an expansive turn. "Souls made of fire, and children of the Sun" (although their father never comes to see them) inhabit there. One of such children was Mr. Eugenius Garwood.

From his earliest infancy, Eugenius Garwood had been accustomed to the sight of multitudinous chests of oranges, and immense limber-baskets of Barcelona nuts. He had been born and nurtured in Botolph Lane: and for many years his thoughts never travelled farther. In due time he was despatched every morning to a commercial academy in Tower-street, where he received a good, plain, sound education; that is to say, having mastered Dilworth, he was instigated to grapple with Lindley Murray, and at length sat down under his academical laurels with a gilt-calf prize copy of Enfield's "Speaker" at his feet. Nay—this was not all. He imbibed from the works of a modern Cocker the knowledge of figures, their uses and infinite combinations: he found that the multiplication of his own marbles depended upon the subtraction of those of other boys; and he had Practice, Barter, and Profit and Loss, at his fingers' ends before they were an inch and a half long. Having been thus taught the use of figures, he was removed from school; and his father impressed upon him the absolute necessity, during his life, of taking care of Number One, and died a few years afterwards in the perfect conviction that he would do so.

The extensive reputation which men of genius sometimes enjoy, even in their own time, it is gratifying to reflect—nay, to dwell upon. I am sorry that "my limits" will not permit me to expatiate upon this topic. The fame of Byron, when Eugenius Garwood was about two-and-twenty years of age, was at its zenith. Some notion of the extent of that fame may be formed when I state that it reached Botolph Lane. Every body was crazy about Byron: it was disgrace—it was infamy not to have read his last new poem, or not to be able to recite passages from "The Bride of Abydos." But the craziest of the crazed were sober and fastidious critics compared with Eugenius Garwood. The last new poem was "devoured" as soon as "made": he was on intimate terms with "The Giaour," and had made "The Bride of Abydos" his own. Eugenius raved in sympathetic concert with the bard. His felicitating denunciations were taken up by his disciples, and his rapture, his tenderness, and his passion, alternately elevated, melted, and excited to phrenzy, the sentimental, moody, misanthropic orange-merchant.

It was a strange coincidence that Byron and Garwood were alike in features and person. Miss Curtis, of Pudding Lane, a lady of unquestionable taste, and who sold herrings and hard-bake in Monument-yard, had once remarked the circumstance. Eugenius was short of stature to be sure;—but Byron was not tall; and the partial baldness of the former was a very good substitute for a high forehead. The features of Eugenius were what is called "finely chiselled," although, to say the truth, if nature had chiselled them much longer, he would have been left utterly without those items of the human face. He only wanted the club-foot;—it was a hardship, certainly—a great hardship, that he had not been provided with one: still he did not like to put his foot out of joint, in order to qualify it for a thick wooden shoe;—but he felt how delightful it would have been to denounce nature for her unkindness, her cruelty, her barbarous treatment of him!

But, although Eugenius had been imbued, permeated, saturated, with the subtle decoctions of the poet's genius, it must not be concluded that he neglected his business. Paternal precepts had taken too deep a root in his bosom to be eradicated, even by the magic finger of the Muse. He sold oranges to a world which he despised, as heretofore; and it was in his leisure, after business hours, when he had glanced over his banker's book, that he commended with himself upon the vanity, the nothingness of all human affairs, the selfishness and unfeeling and sordid views of mankind, and his own crushed and broken spirit. Wherever he went he found no sympathy: none could make him out—none could appreciate him—none appeared to care a button about him;—but all (O horror!) "wrote him down an ass." The Castle in Mark Lane, which he frequented, offered to his society a set of gossamering worldlings; the Ship in Water Lane could boast of no better specimens; and he became thoroughly disgusted with men by whom he was not understood. But why should a mind like his be compelled to do such things?—he had taken no pains to conciliate!

There was a craving void in his bosom, which required to be filled up by some congenial spirit. It was the one yearning wish of his heart to meet with some fair creature—some lone Egeria—towards whom his poisoned and wounded feelings might be carried for relief and healing. None, however, could he find! The article was not to be met with,—it was not in the market; but, in its stead, was a wretched assortment of soulless girls, who ate and drank, and laughed and cried, and were contented to possess merely human feelings.

It is impossible, and perhaps it were needless, to describe the mingled sentiments of scorn and contempt with which he regarded the young ladies who promaded the parade in front of the Custom-House, to which, on summer evenings (for the fresh breeze from the water, as he said, cooled his feverish brain), he was accustomed to resort. How unlike the glowing beauties whom Byron had delighted to paint! There was only one amongst them whom his eye could for a moment tolerate! Louisa Halibut, the daughter of a fish-salesman at Billingsgate, was a fine girl, certainly, and had shown great proofs of attachment to him;—but she had no devotion, no passion, no fervour of idolatry. She might have been—and Eugenius sighed when he reflected upon what she might have been—born under an Italian sky, or in one of the Isles of Greece. But the vile English education had spoiled her. She had been sacrificed to base conventional forms: she was the slave of decorum. And, then, her eyes were something like those of a human being: she had not the dark eye of the gazelle—at least, Eugenius strongly suspected as much, being in a kind of perplexed ignorance as to what kind of animal a gazelle might be.

Chance frequently effects that for a man which his own prolonged exertions would have failed of bringing about; and chance now stepped forward to slake the sentimental thirst of Eugenius Garwood. He was requested to take a ticket for a concert to be given at the London Tavern by Miss Spilsbury, a musical lady whose professional talents had been for many years devoted to the sacred duty of supporting an aged father and a large family of younger brothers and sisters, whom, by the by—(for genteel people in distress are invariably proud, and keep out of the way.)—nobody had ever seen.

Eugenius, besides that he was a man of exquisitely fine feelings and sympathies, was extremely fond of music. It soothed the ferment of his soul, and brought him down to the level of humanity. He availed himself, therefore, of his ticket.

When he entered the concert-room, although he had taken care to be in good time, it was crowded; and it was with some small difficulty that he obtained a seat near the entrance. Delighted, enchanted as he was, shortly after, by a brilliant fantasia upon the piano-forte performed by Miss Spilsbury, who pounced upon the keys like a cat in deadly sport with a mouse, and with a face of similarly mischievous gravity,—entranced, I say, as he was by that effect of skill, he was in no situation to observe that two ladies had entered the room during its accomplishment, and were now standing by his side. A pause, however, having ensued, Eugenius Garwood turned suddenly with the view of exposing his rapture to his next neighbour; and, as he murmured "Beautiful!" his eyes encountered those of the younger lady, to whom he forthwith mentally transferred the rapturous adjective. She was, indeed, beautiful! All that the fancy of Eugenius had ever previously conceived, or could imagine for the time to come—all this was she! The elder lady—her mother of course—was by no means so attractive a person; unless a rusty-iron-coloured front, a nose like a strawberry, and a retiring chin could make her so. She, nevertheless, betrayed—I must rather say, disclosed the perfect lady. Eugenius could see this with half an eye; for the moiety of that and the whole of the other were fixed upon the fascinating daughter.

Eugenius Garwood, I have said, was a man of fine feelings. He could not permit ladies to stand while he was furnished with a seat. He accordingly set to work in good earnest; and, by dint of persuasive eloquence, enforced by the prompt use of his elbows, he contrived to make room for the two ladies, to whom with much respectful diffidence he offered the vacant places, taking care to retain a seat near the object of his sudden, but decided adoration. The usual courtesies and bows, common on these occasions, having been gone through, Eugenius endeavoured to look like a man of the world as much as possible, feeling at the same time that the gaze of half the young men in the room was directed towards him. They were, he felt, envious of his good fortune. For the purpose therefore of bringing himself to a state of decent calmness, he stared immovably on the bass-viol for a considerable period.

A gentle tap on the arm with a fan disturbed him.

"Will you permit me to see your programme of the concert?" said the elder lady with an amiable smile.

"Certainly—with much pleasure," answered Eugenius, handing it with some trepidation.

"I perceive, my love," cried the elder lady, addressing her daughter with animation, "that we are to have a duet by Signor Rosini and Madame Schniber: that will be a treat indeed! Rosini was a favourite of your's at Paris."

"Yes—I always admired Rosini," said the daughter in a soft voice.

"You have visited Paris—of course, sir?" enquired the elder lady of Mr. Garwood.

"Y—es, I have," he replied, with considerable hesitation. He, however, qualified this venial trespass against truth by the remembrance that he had, two years ago, seen a Panorama of that city in Leicester Square.

"A delightful place, Paris," remarked the daughter.

"It is indeed," stammered Eugenius.

"Were you there, sir, when the King—"

Here, much to Garwood's relief, the orchestra struck up, and Rosini and Madame Schniber astonished the company by their singing, which completely—that was declared the beauty of it—extinguished the instrumental accompaniments.

"How very delightful!" cried the mother, with rapture.

"Oh! heavenly," said the daughter.

"Heavenly!" repeated Eugenius, who had been swilling huge draughts of love for the last ten minutes unobserved, and who was now intoxicated with the tender passion.

A delightful, because a less restrained, conversation now ensued, and was carried on at intervals till towards the close of the concert.

"Flora," said the elder lady, "how the General would have been pleased and gratified to-night!"

"He would indeed;—my father," added the artless girl, turning towards Garwood, "would have enjoyed this treat very much."

"Indeed!" said Eugenius, with polite concern, "then I am extremely sorry that he is not here."

"Oh! sir," cried the young lady, resting her dark eyes with an expression of mournful tenderness upon Garwood, "Papa is dead! He died sixteen months ago."

The sensitive Garwood could not withstand that gaze. "I am shocked," he murmured vaguely: "then, of course, he could not be—I mean, it is not very likely he could be—I mean, it is not very likely he could—I beg pardon—I meant to observe—"

Fortunately for Eugenius, the finale commenced at this instant. It was a Bacchanalian quartette by Messrs. Balf, Stunham, Goldfinch, and Growler, whose joint efforts effectually precluded the possibility of one party hearing another without the aid of a patent speaking trumpet.

The concert being now over, the company prepared to depart,—all except the two ladies, who retained their seats as obstinately as though they expected the performances to be encored.

"Ladies," whispered Eugenius, after a pause, "shall I have the honour of calling a coach for you?"

"Would you do us the favour to enquire whether the carriage for Mrs. Mac Gregor is yet arrived?" said the elder lady.

Eugenius trotted down stairs for that purpose. Mac Gregor! Delightful name—a descendant of Rob Roy, no doubt! And how very genteel the ladies were too! Evidently belonging to the highest grades of society. No carriage, however, was in waiting to convey the illustrious strangers to their destination. He returned, and made known that circumstance.

"How very provoking!" cried the elder lady, turning to her daughter: "I positively will never in future put any faith in Lady Islington's promise.—Lady Islington, sir, of Russell Square, faithfully promised to send her carriage for us.—I wish, my love, we had brought the carriage from Paris. I told you how we should be inconvenienced."

Eugenius deferentially suggested a hackney-coach, and mumbled something touching the happiness he should feel in seeing the ladies home. The latter proposition having been graciously acceded to, Eugenius drew the arms of his fair companions beneath his own, and descended the ample staircase with all that exultation of soul which can only be conceived by the man of true gallantry.

It was not long before the company were in motion towards Bernard Street, Russell Square—a locality which the elder lady assured her protector was by no means so genteel as could be wished, intimating, at the same time, that it was no great importance, since they were about to return in a few weeks to Paris.

The heart of Eugenius began to sink rapidly at this intelligence. Going to Paris! then, in all probability he should never see her again! The prices of travelling were reasonable: he would follow them! as sure as a gun, he'd be after them. So thought the enamoured Eugenius Garwood.

"Pray may I enquire," said the elderly lady, with pleasing vanity, "to whom we are indebted for the polite attention we have experienced this evening?"

With a sense of deep abasement—for Garwood possessed very little of the inventive faculty, and could not extemporaneously hit upon a romantic name—did Eugenius blurt forth his appellation and trade, which he now looked upon as hideously degrading base.

"Well, we never should have supposed that," exclaimed the mother: "should we, Flora, love?"

"Oh, dear—never!" sighed the daughter. "But, pardon me," resumed the mother, "I have a great respect for commercial men: what could we do without them? Commerce is the glory of this country, Mr. Garwood: but I really thought you were one of us."

"I was convinced of it," said Flora, with another sigh.

"It is quite clear, however," said Mrs. Mac Gregor, shaking her head and smiling blandly, "that you have visited Paris, Mr. Garwood. I could see that from the first moment."

Eugenius inwardly thought what eyes the old lady must have. A tripping against a stone facilitated the low bow, by which he acknowledged the compliment.

Some time before they reached Bernard Street, Eugenius convinced himself that Mrs. Mac Gregor was a lady of the most interesting description—a perfect lady of the old school. As they passed the lamp-posts the momentary radiance lighted up her features, and disclosed aristocratical indications which he had not before observed, although from the first he had suspected that both were far removed from every-day circles.

As they stopped at the door of Mrs. Mac Gregor's abode, the mentally-absorbed orange-merchant received a pre-sing invitation from the two ladies to come and take tea on the following evening, and, with a cordial shake of the hand bestowed by Mrs. Mac Gregor, and a gentle pressure of the fingers on the part of the lovely Flora, Eugenius was permitted to depart.

The state of mystification in which Garwood found himself as he turned away from the door, it were hopeless to attempt to describe. At length, then, he had found his soul's idol—that mysterious indispensable which he had so long sighed to discover—that oasis in the desert which the pilgrim pants to pounce upon, so exstatic was his bliss! He left time to define his happiness; and time amongst other things on his hands, at that period, did what he required of him.

Who can imagine the raptures of Eugenius when on the following evening he witnessed the condescending cordiality with which the ladies welcomed him to the second floor, in Bernard Street? They did not like first floors: it was a mistake, they said, to suppose they were more genteel than second floors;—on the contrary, they were rather vulgar than otherwise,—and they were certainly low.

Flora Mac Gregor possessed a charming voice. After tea, she favoured her visitor with part of a pathetic ballad; but it was too much for her. Just as she announced the fact that "they tell me she is happy now," she burst into a passion of tears, and, seizing her mother's handkerchief, rushed into the inner apartment.

"That dear creature is destroying herself by inches," cried Mrs. Mac Gregor, shaking her head mournfully.

"Indeed!" exclaimed Eugenius, looking aghast at the admeasured certainty alluded to;—"had you not better follow her, Madam?"

"No, my dear sir, not for the world—by no means," was the reply. "She will recover her spirits sooner by herself."

An extinguisher was placed upon the lambent flame of happiness which had begun to play in the bosom of Garwood. "Has she been long thus?" he enquired, "or is it a momentary weakness of the nerves?"

"She has been so," answered Mrs. Mac Gregor, "ever since Hector's duel with Count Hanover."

"Hector—Count Hanover?" said Eugenius, enquiringly.

"My son Hector, and Count Hanover, a Hungarian nobleman," answered the lady. "The Count saw Flora at a theatre in Paris, and became desperately in love with her. Flora, however, repulsed his advances: the poor girl has too much delicacy of sentiment;—I fear she will never meet with a congenial spirit."

"Oh!" said Eugenius with interest. "Won't she though?" he thought to himself, "I'll see that!"

"Well, sir," continued Mrs. Mac Gregor, "the attentions of the count became so excessively troublesome that my son Hector felt it proper to remonstrate with him. He, nevertheless, persevered. My son was compelled to call him out; they fought with small swords in the Champs Elysées. Would you believe it, sir, my son ran him through the body, fixing him to a tree with the point of his sabre, where he was found on the following morning a perpendicular corpse."

"How shocking!" said Garwood, clasping his hands with horror.

"Yes, very. The Count was buried under that self-same tree. Flora has never been herself since."

"Let us hope there was no attachment," said Eugenius; "no subdued—no secret passion."

"None in the world," cried the lady. "Flora's time is not yet come, although"—and she hesitated a moment, and averted her head, adding—"although I don't know how soon it may."

The heart of Eugenius waxed rigorous at this hint, and he was about to lay a train for further disclosures; but at that moment word was brought that Miss Flora was so indisposed, she feared she should not be able to return to the sitting-room again that evening. Eugenius accordingly took his leave.

The bosom of our hero was in a state of extreme confusion when he got back to Botolph Lane. He felt himself by this time in a hapless state of corroding love. How could he aspire to the hand of Miss Flora Mac Gregor? Count Hanover had got himself skewered to a tree for dreaming of such a thing. What then would be a suitable punishment for presumption like his own? The very ghost of the General, sword in hand, would rise out of the bed of honour in which he had been snugly tucked up, and warn him from the hazardous attempt. The afternoon, however, had only elapsed, before he found himself, with a calmness he himself could not account for, seated at the tea-table in Bernard Street.

He spent a delightful evening! Mrs. Mac Gregor was so amiable, so lively, so chatty, so full of anecdote, so quite the thing, and Flora was so artless, so clever, so innocent, so lovely and so charming! Eugenius, at the conclusion of his visit, was put without reserve on the visiting list; and I need scarcely say that he took advantage of the blissful privilege.

Weeks flew away and the chains forged in the smithy of love were rivetted almost indissolubly to the heart of Eugenius Garwood. He found Flora all that his fondest hopes had pictured. As yet, however, he had given no testimony of his love, except by the ocular telegraph which lovers know so well how to work, and by the tender of certain handsome jewels and other articles of value, which "his own Flora," with a delightfully frank confidence in his honour, and an enchanting alacrity, received from him.

One morning, however, he looked in at Bernard Street, with the express intention of deciding a question which was to make him happy beyond expression, or a maniac for life. It is, however, sometimes a difficult matter to put questions of this kind, and Eugenius found, when he was about to come to the point, that it would be by no means an easy one to him. A pause ensued, but, presently, Mrs. Mac Gregor whispered to her daughter, not in so low a key but that Garwood could hear her,—"Well, my love, I have decided upon applying to Mr. Garwood."

"Oh, for Heaven's sake do not!" cried Miss Flora, hiding her face in her pocket-handkerchief, "I shall faint—I shall die if you do."

"Nonsense, love," expostulated the mother. "I have the utmost confidence in Mr. Garwood's honour, and I am sure he respects us too much to—"

"May I ask in what way I can be of service?" enquired Eugenius.

"Why, my dear sir," returned Mrs. Mac Gregor, "my son Hector has most unaccountably—"

"Don't, don't now!" interrupted Flora, sobbing.

"Now I shall be really angry, child, if you act in that foolish manner!—My son Hector has been unaccountably backward in sending us our quarter's remittance, for my property is all in the French funds—"

"Do not let that annoy you, my dear madam," interrupted Eugenius. "Why did you not name the circumstance before? How much do you require?"

Eugenius Garwood felt at this moment substantial happiness.

"I think a hundred pounds would suffice for the present," was the reply;—"or shall I ask too much if I say fifty more?"

"Too much!" cried Eugenius. "I'll go for it instantly: I am unfortunately busy this afternoon in the city; but at six o'clock—my usual time—rely upon it."

"Then we expect you at six," said Mrs. Mac Gregor rising. "How kind—how amiable of you, my dear sir! Nay—do not take leave of Flora now: it will be too much for her,—she has retired to her apartment."

"My dearest madam," cried Eugenius in transport, "if I might hope that in that bosom—"

"I know what you would say," interrupted Mrs. Mac Gregor, tapping his hand with her fan, "you may hope! Such a heart—Eugenius! don't break it when I transfer it to you."

Garwood stared at his anticipated mother-in-law in stupid astonishment. "Can it be?" and he rushed to the door: "at six o'clock I will be here;"—and he was out of sight in a moment.

It wanted ten minutes to three by the clock of the Foundling Hospital when Garwood passed it on, his return to Bernard Street.

"They will be delighted to see me three hours before my time," said he. "What, oh! what will be the amount of their happiness compared to mine? Worthy—excellent beings! But we shall soon be one family!"—Clasping his pocket-book tightly as he proceeded, he soon found himself at the door.

There was a strange noise on the second floor as he ascended the stairs. Could it proceed from their room? He hastened on the landing, and listened.

"I tell you what, I will have some money," cried a gruff and ferocious voice; "mind, when I come again you have it ready for me! What—haven't you got anything out of the fellow yet?"

Garwood thought he could distinguish the voice of his Flora. "My dear Tom," it began: but the door was closed suddenly. A huddled and unintelligible conversation ensued, which lasted a few minutes, and the door was again opened.

"Well, I'll come in the morning—but don't let me see him, that's all," said the ferocious voice, and presently a pair of legs were stumbling down the stairs, and Garwood found himself face to face with a fierce-looking fellow in a great coat, with his hat on one side of his head, and a pair of awful whiskers.

"Well—and what do you want up here?" cried the phenomenon.

"I am come, sir, on business to Mrs. Mac Gregor," said Eugenius mildly.

"Oh, you have, have you?" cried the other. "Then she told me to give you this."

So saying, the monster flung his hat at the head of Eugenius, and, scrambling over his prostrate carcase with superhuman strides, vanished in a twinkling.

Garwood collected himself together as well as he was able, and, mounting the stairs, rushed into the room.

"My own Eugenius, what is the matter?" cried Flora, flinging herself into his arms.

"A man—" gasped our hero.

"That odious fellow!" said Mrs. Mac Gregor, who now, having disposed of a certain bottle and three glasses, came forward. "It does not signify, Flora, we must not permit that fellow to visit us."

"Who is it, in mercy's name?" asked Eugenius.

"A Captain Blunderbuss, my dear sir," answered Mrs. Mac Gregor, "a friend of my son Hector. Since the sabre cut he received in his head at the battle of Salamanca, he has been subject to fits of madness."

Eugenius, who was one of the most credulous of men, believed this, and a great deal more, before he left his friends for the night. The money was parted with,—the happy day was fixed, and if anything could afford him a foretaste of the bliss he was to enjoy when he obtained Flora, the perfect sympathy of souls which took place on that evening would have supplied it.

On the evening of the following day Eugenius called again. This time, however, he was stopped by the landlady in the passage.

"I am very glad you are come, sir," said she, "my lodgers are gone, and my plate and linen—"

"What do you mean?" faltered Eugenius.

"Are gone with them," rejoined the landlady.

"They were very bad characters! I hope you haven't known them long, sir?"

"Call a coach," said Garwood faintly: "bad characters!"

"Yes, sir, regular swindlers! Why, they've robbed every body in the neighbourhood, they and the young girl's lover with the great black whiskers."

Eugenius Garwood was lugged home to Botolph Lane in a state of insensibility.

EFFECTS OF ALCOHOL UPON THE HUMAN FRAME.

DIGESTION is that process in the animal body by which the aliments are dissolved, and the nutritive parts separated for the revivification of the frame. For the support and continuance of life in all classes of animals, we find a series of organs constructed by the all-wise Creator for the purpose of preparing the food, so that its nutritious particles only shall be received into the circulatory system, and form a new portion of the vital fluid, or blood, in lieu of that of the body, thus repairing the waste that is constantly going on.

The stomach is the well-known receptacle of the food, and is a large membranous bag resembling in shape the Scotch bag-pipes. It is composed of three coats: the external is denominated the serous; the middle is formed of a series of muscular fibres; and the third, or internal, is called villosa, from its resemblance to velvet. When food is received into the stomach, the nutritious portions are extracted by a series of vessels in the small intestines, called lacteals, and from them they pass into a vessel lying on the spine, and terminating in a large vein under the left collar-bone, where they enter the circulation of the blood. The useless and excrementitious parts pass through the large intestines, and are finally ejected.

Having thus explained to the reader the process of digestion in a few words, let us show the effects of alcohol upon the system, in its connexion with that process. When alcoholic liquor is imbibed into the system, the powers of the stomach separate the alcohol from the fluids with which it is mixed; the alcohol remains in the system, and the other fluids pass away by means of the large intestines. Thus the dangerous portion of the liquor is retained. In the first place, it attacks the serous membrane of the stomach, which it renders thick and inflammatory, and there lays the foundation of a cancerous disease. The schirrus, or concealed tumour, is thus engendered in a part of the human frame which, when we consider the important functions it has to perform, should be kept as healthy and free from disease as possible. The muscular fibres of the stomach are next assailed by the insidious poison, which acts upon them as an unnatural astringent, and destroys their healthy vitality. The turn of the villous membrane follows; and this, under the influence of alcohol, becomes inflamed and dry. The mouths of the mucous vessels, which moisten it, become obstructed; and thence originates that nausea which is experienced at times by most drunkards. The presence of alcohol in the stomach also accelerates the digestion of the food in an unnatural, and consequently imperfect manner; and the food passes into the circulating system in a state calculated to lay the foundation for disease. When the alcohol itself, after having worked all these pernicious effects in the stomach, follows the food into the circulation, it becomes diffused all over the frame, and attacks membrane, fibre, and nerve with unrelenting virulence. The brain especially feels the power of this insinuating poison; and the nervous system vibrates to its mere touch, with an oscillation that shakes the whole frame.

Intimately connected with the powers of digestion is the liver, which secretes the bile. The bile is useful to the process of chylification; and a healthy supply of bile is consequently necessary for the nourishment of the animal. Now the effect of alcohol upon the liver is to harden and enlarge it to an unnatural extent, to change its colour, and to cause an obstruction in many of the channels through which the bile ought to pass. The result of this evil is that the bile, instead of performing its proper and exclusive duty, is rendered unhealthy, mixes with the blood that passes through the liver, and is thus diffused throughout the system, thus constituting, in fact and appearance, the disease which is denominated the yellow jaundice.

The blood and the bile are both largely impregnated with aqueous fluid, or water; and as this fluid is naturally carried out of the system in large quantities, by the process of perspiration, its waste must be applied by an adequate quantity of fresh water. For this reason is water the proper, the wholesome, and the necessary drink; and if the waste of the aqueous proportions of the bile and the blood be supplied by alcohol, an idiot can comprehend the terrible results which must in the long run ensue. There is so essential a difference between alcohol and water, that if the blood and the bile naturally contain water, it is apparent that the substitution of alcohol must constitute a change which cannot do otherwise than prove hurtful to the frame, from the mere fact of its being contrary to the primitive arrangements, wants, and operations of nature. When, therefore, the bile and the blood are impregnated with alcohol, the benefit derived from nutritious food is altogether subverted, and emaciation takes place throughout the whole frame.

The effects of alcohol upon the heart are pernicious in the extreme, and frequently lead to the most fatal results. The alcohol hardens the membrane which covers the heart, and thus lays the foundation for ossification, obstructing all the valves of the blood-vessels, and thus impeding the proper circulation of the vital fluid. When the heart is thus ossified to a certain extent, instantaneous death will ensue from a sudden rush of blood to that part of the body under circumstances of great excitement, or an abrupt physical effort.

Emaciation and corpulency essentially depend upon the digestive powers. When the food is hurried into the circulating system in a half-cooked state, in consequence of the strong dissolvent powers of alcohol, the blood does not derive a proper nutriment from this supply, and emaciation takes place throughout the frame. In some cases, where food of a very gross nature is used as an habitual article of diet, the fatty portions, which are imparted to the circulation in a half-digested state through the effects of alcohol, are deposited all over the body, and cause that remarkable corpulency which many imagine to be a sign of health. The brewers' men should never be alluded to by antiteetotalers as evidences of the nutritious qualities of malt liquor; because their extreme stoutness is only a bloated species of corpulency by no means consistent with real health. Their flesh is not firm; and, although they appear to be bulky men, they weigh but little.

When we reflect upon all the physical evils which are brought about by the use of alcoholic liquors, surely the sensible man requires no other inducement to lead him to the shrine of Teetotalism. He, who is anxious to have a disordered stomach, a white and swollen liver, cancerous bowels, an ossifying heart, ruined nerves, nausea, sickness, jaundice, and an emaciated or unnaturally corpulent frame, will adhere to the poisons which pass under the names of Brandy, Gin, Whiskey, Rum, Wine, and Malt Liquors; but, if he wish his digestive powers to remain unimpaired, his nerves to exist in a proper and tranquil state, and his frame to possess a robust and natural health, he will at once and for ever eschew those deleterious drinks.

FRENCH CHARACTERS CARICATURED.

THE WITNESS, who has himself been accustomed to the information sometimes required by justice relative to a vast number of speculations, the principal agents of which appear at its bar, hastens to the tribunal in obedience to a summons which he has received in the name of the law. At the commencement of the business of the court, the witness thinks it fit to observe to the President and the Judges, "Gentlemen, I have the honour to present myself before you, in accordance with your request."

"The law does not request, sir," answers the President, "it commands! If you had not come, a couple of Gendarmes would have been sent to fetch you."

"I do not require those gentlemen to shew me the road," says the witness, "I come in consequence of the respect which I entertain for the Magistracy."

The Gendarmes have in the meantime conducted into the dock an individual who is accused by the King's Procurator of having pilfered a box of wafers at the office of a merchant to whom he had been sent to propose a certain speculation concocted by the witness himself.

The witness, upon being questioned relative to his knowledge of the prisoner, declares that he had never entertained a very high opinion of that sub-agent; but, surrounded with business, he says, that it is impossible to lose one's time in investigating the moral character of one's clerks.

"Add to this, enlightened magistrates!" says the witness, "that, in the course of vast speculations and affairs, such multitudes of people are employed, it is impossible to separate the tares from the wheat. There is something base and degrading in the larceny of which the prisoner is accused," continues the witness, carried away by his indignation; "and it is impossible to conceive how a man can think of stealing a box of wafers. I should think much better of a man who would appropriate unto himself a gold watch or a Cashmere shawl."

"Sir," cries the President, "you profess principles which are excessively dangerous! There is the same ignominy attached to an enormous crime as to a small one."

"And therefore, sir," replies the witness, "thieves should commit the enormous ones."

"If you continue in that manner," exclaimed the President, "I shall commit you for contempt of court."

"Galileo was incarcerated for having declared that the earth moves round the sun," persists the witness.

"Your remark is a very insolent one," cries the President: "at the same time I am inclined to think that you do not fully appreciate the evil import of your words."

"I shall not attempt to convince you of the error of your opinion," rejoins the witness. "I shall therefore return to the accused, who, I am convinced, would ask for nothing better than to return to me: but I again repeat, that man is badly organised. I ought to have guessed at his predilection for larceny and theft; for, about six months ago, I missed a stick of sealing-wax in my office: now sealing-wax belongs to the same species of goods as the wafers,—and hence it is easy to imagine how the individual who would steal wafers might be induced to walk off with a stick of sealing-wax. However—I turned away my youngest clerk, whom I suspected of the theft, and I confiscated the eleven hundred and thirty-two francs which his father had deposited in my hands as security for his good conduct."

"But," ejaculates the President, "that was a downright robbery!"

"So it was," replies the witness,—"a downright, a most disgraceful robbery! No one has any right to plunder me of a stick of sealing-wax!"

"I mean that it was a robbery to—"

"To take my sealing-wax—no doubt of it!"

"A robbery," continues the President, "to take from your clerk eleven hundred francs for a stick of sealing-wax."

"It was the best sealing-wax, sir," says the witness. "However, if your opinion condemns my act of justice, I am willing to restore thirty-two francs to the young man; and, should we ascertain in the course of this trial, that the youth whom I deemed culpable was really innocent, besides the thirty-two francs I will also restore my esteem to him whom I accused! Now, then—answer me, you fellow there in the dock—were you guilty of the robbery without violence of my stick of sealing-wax? Do not suffer the fortune of an innocent person to be any longer in a state of sequestration! I might even add, that the interests of my youngest clerk have materially suffered since I confiscated his capital."

The President here reminds the witness that he has not come to question the prisoner, and that all this declamation does not refer to the present case.

"You were sent for," says the Judge, "to give us certain information relative to the prisoner, who, in addition to his crime, has the misfortune of being houseless and penniless. Now, in case the court should show him indulgence and mercy on this occasion, will you take him back again into your service?"

"Oh! if the rascal has any security to offer for his good conduct," exclaimed the witness, "I will answer for his conversion and his board and lodging. If, enlightened Judges, you would make a subscription for him, or even give me a bill at a short date, I will take upon myself the responsibility of his future behaviour."

"The Magistracy," says the President, "is not organised with a view to furnish securities, sir."

"Well, then," persists the witness, "if the Gendarmes, who seem to feel a deep interest in the welfare of the accused, will abandon each a week's pay to form a security for the future conduct of the prisoner, we may still settle the matter in an amicable manner."

The Gendarmes shake their head.

"What, then, would you have me do with a fellow of whom the Gendarmes themselves despair?" exclaims the witness. "Such a connexion is a social impossibility! Punish him according to the law and your consciences."

The prisoner is asked what he has to say in his defence, and he addresses the court in these terms:—

"Gentlemen, this is the real truth;—I am a thief upon a small scale; and the witness is a rogue upon a very grand one. While I am standing here accused of having stolen a box of wafers, he is there at large, after having plundered a poor boy of nearly fourteen hundred francs! I have brought myself to distress and the Correctional Police-Court: he has accumulated immense wealth, and bears testimony against me."

The tribunal, not having to try the rogue upon the grand scale, condemns the pilferer in a small way to twenty-one days' imprisonment; and the witness retires, with his head erect.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Review of The Temperance Messenger for January, and of Mr. Hart's Lectures, will appear in our next.

We beg to assure Mr. Leach that we only alluded to the application of steam to the printing press to complete the historical truth of the article upon Printing, and not to advocate one system in preference to another.

We wish J. L. M. S. would try his or her hand (as the case may be) at prose composition, in which it is far more easy to succeed. We shall be happy to receive any prose specimens.

The poems by S. R. G. are good, but too long. The same observation applies to the poem of another correspondent, entitled The cup which cheers but not inebriates, in which there are some very pretty ideas.

Some of E. P. H.'s poems will be inserted. We thank him for his communications.

We beg to call the attention of the Reader to the Twelfth Number of a Series of Illustrations, which is given gratis with "THE TEETOTALER" of this day.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 16, 1841.

SOME time back a hawker of a miscellaneous assortment of goods supplied the landlord of a small beer-shop with a quantity, the price of which amounted to £12 sterling; and this sum was to be liquidated by the landlord by weekly instalments of £1. The hawker accordingly visited the beer-shop regularly every Saturday morning for twelve weeks; and always received the amount due to him; but on each occasion he thought it expedient to regale himself with some of the landlord's "best ale," as a small return for the patronage shown him by that individual. Very frequently the hawker encountered such very "pleasant acquaintances" at the public-house, that he extended his visit to two or three hours' sojourn; and during that period he treated both himself and friends to several pots of this "excellent ale." When he had received his last instalment, he began seriously to reflect how much he had gained by the bargain. The goods which he had sold for £12 originally cost him £8; but during his twelve visits to the public-house to receive his money, he had expended £5. The consequence was, that he had absolutely lost £1 by the transaction, because it had induced him to dissipate so large a sum at the establishment where he had disposed of his goods. The calculation opened his eyes to the folly of the drinking system he had long pursued; and he resolved upon becoming a Teetotaler. He signed the pledge,—he abandoned the use of intoxicating liquors; and he was soon enabled to give up his wandering life, and settle down as the proprietor of a neat little shop, where everything went well with him!

What an admirable moral is taught by this incident! The working-man is here shown that his interests—his selfish interests are intimately connected with Teetotalism. The mechanic, the artizan, and the operative, are delighted to receive the most trivial increase of wages, if it be only an augmentation of one shilling per week;—the tradesman is equally pleased with the receipt of the smallest coins for the articles which he vends;—and the lawyer, the broker, the merchant, and the speculator, hail the termination of a bargain in which they have succeeded in beating down a client or a customer by a few shillings. We are all more or less attached to money; and the most insignificant increase of income is a source of delight. How is it, then, that they, who are so careful to amass and so satisfied to receive, are still so profuse in their expenditure of the precious coin in liquors which are injurious to them? The expense entailed upon individuals by the use of intoxicating liquors is greater than at first meets the eye. The first outlay to purchase those liquors is not the only expense they occasion; the system becomes deranged by their use, and medical attendance is required. Then, much precious time is wasted at the Bacchanalian board, and occupied by indisposition—if not by absolute illness. To most people time is money; and even time cannot be devoted to a proper and beneficial use without health. Thus is it that, besides their first cost, alcoholic liquors are most expensive articles of indulgence in a variety of other respects.

It is a most remarkable fact that there is many a rich man who will not lend a friend a shilling in the moment of difficulty, but who will gladly give that friend "a dinner and as much wine as he can drink." Now this friend will consume at least half a bottle of wine; and here is an immediate expense to the rich man of half-a-crown. The reader will hence perceive that what is often termed hospitality, is nothing more than ostentatious display.

The waste of time and loss of health, through indulgence in intoxicating liquors, are amongst the most dangerous of the evils resulting from that indulgence. The most moderate use of those liquors is also attended with expense. The operative, the mechanic, and the clerk, all complain of the lowness of their wages; and, while they declare that they can scarcely procure the necessities of life, they do not hesitate to expend their hard and sorry earnings upon the purchase of beer and spirits. If a working man only regale himself with one quart of strong beer every day, he thus disposes of nearly half-a-crown per week. And yet he cannot find the money for his landlord, and is surprised that his goods are seized for rent! The very half-a-crown a-week which he disburses in the public-house will pay the rent of a comfortable cottage. The clerk, who earns thirty shillings or two pounds per week, takes his beer with his dinner, and his glass of grog at night; and on Sunday he generally wastes three or four shillings at one of those vile dens of infamy called "Tea-Gardens." If he only expend in this manner five shillings every week, he succeeds in making away with thirteen pounds a-year—a sum which would keep him respectably supplied with clothes and linen.

The perpetual cry is, "How bad the times are!" We admit that they are bad:—but why should we make them worse? The working-man is poor from circumstances over which he exercises no control:—why should he increase his poverty by means of circumstances which he can control? We are all more or less the artificers and the arbiters of our own fortunes; and yet we are perpetually complaining against that adversity of Fortune, which is to be traced in reality to our own misdeeds, imprudence, or improvidence. The money, expended upon intoxicating liquors, can not be even said to be thrown away. If it were thrown away in the literal sense of the word, this manner of disposing of it would not be so ridiculous or injurious as the use to which it is appropriated in the purchase of strong drink. If the artizan, who imagines that he has half-a-crown a-week too much for his rational wants, would throw that sum into a river, he would know the extent of his loss: but, when he takes that sum to the public house, and deluges his stomach with the poison which it procures, he cannot then calculate the injury he will sustain from his conduct. He may say that drinking is a pleasant indulgence: but, if drinking ruin his health, his morals, and his fortune, he must learn to abandon the habit. The same individual may imagine that idleness is more agreeable than occupation; but he does not abstain from work altogether on that account, because he could not exist without it. In this case he is compelled to exercise a certain control over his inclinations, because his interests compel him to do so: why, then, will he not exert the same faculty of self-command in the former case, and adopt a principle of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors?

The heart of the true philanthropist turns sick within him, when he surveys the wretched hovels in which such multitudes of his fellow-creatures reside. But so long as the working-man expends even the smallest portion of his earnings upon liquor, will his home be wretched, his family ragged, and himself unhappy. The Scripture says, "You cannot serve God and Mammon."—The Teetotalers say, "You cannot go to the ale-house, and the church also." So evident and important are the truths of Teetotalism, that they only require to be widely published, to be as generally adopted.

And now a word to the advocates of the great doctrine itself. Let them be unremitting in their energies to undermine the temples of the publicans; and may the campaign of the year 1841 be conducted with vigour, and independently of those intestine feuds which cause the sphere of Teetotalism to shake to its very centre. Let the fight be a fair one—a fight in the light of day, such as Ajax loved, and in the sight of heaven. Let all useless passion and ill-feeling be sacrificed to the interests of the cause; and let the advocates themselves act with calmness, consistency, and steady perseverance of which impetuosity shall form no characteristic. The violence of Achilles may be expected to command success in the mortal combat with Hector; but the glory of the victory need not to have been tarnished by dragging the dead body thrice round the walls of Troy! "A good cause," says the Religio Medici, "needs not to be pleaded by passion, and can ever sustain itself on a temperate dispute." Let this great maxim be ever present to the memories of the advocates of Teetotalism, and let the truth of it be brilliantly evidenced in their conduct, so that—if he be thrice-armed, whose aide is just—he alone may be entitled to anticipate success who employs legitimate means in defence of a proper cause.

Let not the vintners, the brewers, and the publicans delude themselves with the fond expectation, or buoy themselves up with the mere hope of a reaction. The isolated facts of relapse on the part of Teetotalers, with all the advantage of such juxta-position, are merely exceptions to a grand general rule; for the great bulk of those who have signed the pledge, remain faithful to the obligation. If we consider the anatomical truth, that "the spirits of the body are," in the language of the devout and eloquent Robert Hall, "collected at the heart," we shall perceive what is the proper inference to be drawn from the power exercised by the leading Teetotal societies of the metropolis. Even were the Genia of Teetotalism to repose on its couch for a short time, and survey the work which it has already accomplished, it would nevertheless be meditating fresh conquests,—it would have other laurels and trophies, other triumphs and ovations in prospect! Roused from their quietude, the people of these isles will arise at the voice of Teetotalism, and will prepare to shake off the shackles of the despot—Intemperance! They will rise,—not with the cauldron of Medea, nor with the incantations of Canidia, nor with the ægis of Minerva;—they will rise,—but not, like Cadmus, to sow dragon's teeth, which shall spring up into armed legions;—but, "in panoply complete of heavenly temper" will they rise, asserting the aristocracy of mind, and the aristocracy of virtue!

THE FOREWARNED.

"A GLASS can harm nobody; or if it does, he's a fool that takes it. As for me it has never yet done me injury. I'm for every thing in moderation, and I believe I shall continue to be sociable till the day of sickness." "But I suppose you sometimes have your tumbler when there is nothing like the plea of sociability in the case; when you have neither friend nor companion to keep you in countenance?" "Indeed I have, and see no evil in it, so long as I never drink to excess." "And yet it is not more than two or three years ago, Mr. Cooper, that you told me, when we one day happened to be on the same subject, you never drank a drop, nor thought of a dram after dinner, nor a like cordial after supper, unless some one dropped in, or you yourself were on a visit." "All true, McTavish." "Well, then, according to your own shewing the habit is gaining upon you. I remember, too, that you at that time spoke of moderation in every thing as you do now, so that your terms are wondrously elastic and supple, your principles most conveniently accommodating. I should not think it strange if in some two years hence I should still find you harping in the same tones, and preaching up the same doctrine of moderation; and yet be forced to confess that two of those tumblers twice in every four-and-twenty hours had become your regular allowance, even when quite alone, or when no one else was present to witness your debauch but your wife and daughters. To witness your debauch, did I say?—ay, and to see the inroads which an insidious habit was making upon your soul's health with sorrow, and sad though silent forebodings; or, what would be worse, with heedless and callous feelings, their moral sensibility being blighted or perverted through your evil example." "You are too hard, McTavish, too illiberal," said Mr. Cooper with some warmth, so that I felt it proper to drop the discourse as soon as possible with the due performance of what I considered it my duty to fulfil. I was well aware of the generous, facile disposition of my neighbour. I looked upon him as a man of feeble moral resolution, and I had for some time been gradually becoming more and more convinced that unless some strong arresting event or power should intervene for his salvation, he would not cease till he had arrived at a pitch of degradation that would be gross, disgraceful, and even a bye-word in the mouths of your men of moderation. In order to conclude with some effect the discussion, I bethought me of an anecdote with which my neighbour was acquainted, which was illustrative of the lax phraseology and unsettled meanings of drunkards, when you assail them relative to their darling vice. This was my story:—

"Mr. Macleod, the old red-faced minister at that time of a parish in Argyleshire, the inhabitants of which dwelt on the sea coast, many of them being fishermen, and not a few illicit distillers of Peatreek or 'mountain dew,' and most of them great whiskey swallows, felt it frequently to be his duty to declaim concerning the evils of intemperance, he being the advocate and abettor of moderation, by precept, and also, as he supposed, by practice. And this was the cast of his lecture:—

"My dear friends," he said, "let me once more address you aent the beastly habit to which so many of you are addicted. You know I am a liberal man in my constructions; I constantly inculcate charitableness of mind; and am measured and moderate in all things. I can take a glass and gie a glass with the best of you, or like any other decent person; but I canna bide, I canna awa wi't, to see you aye dram dramming." In this biting, drizzling climate of ours, and where so many of you go down into the sea in ships, I am very ready to allow that a drop of the creature is comforting and essential at times. When a man rises in the morning he needs a glass to keep out the damp, but I would na have him to be everlastingly dram dramming. At breakfast too it is my custom to take another, but awa with your never dewailing dram dramming.

"Nobody whose head is sound but will be ready for a taste at a half-way hour to dinner time; but oh fie, hae done with your constant dram dramming. After that key-stone meal, I can stomach a double dose, but none of your weariful dram dramming. Agsin, towards the setting of the sun, or down in the cool of the afternoon, the spirits require to be cherished; and once more at the six o'clock bell, you may repeat the process; but mark me I will not have you always dram dramming. And to shew you bow indulgent your minister is, you may after supper, and when your bed is at hand, drink as mickle as you please, but oh, my brethren, you must on no account be aye dram dramming!"

Mr. Cooper, although he had often heard this story, and had been ruffled by my preceding urgings, became quite reconciled while I was repeating it, and laughed heartily at the Highland minister's code of moderation. He admitted that any such code was shewn to be exceedingly indefinite and entirely relative; that it admitted of the widest stretchings and therefore grossest abuses, especially, as he himself remarked, since the term glass was vague, for he knew that in Mr. Macleod's parish the measure which went by that name was a vessel quite as capacious as two wine glasses of ordinary dimensions. "It would burn me up in a week," he added, "if I were to follow the reverend licencer's practice!" "So you would have said of your own present habit had it been recommended to you twenty years ago as the standard of moderation." The man seemed staggered. He looked thoughtful. "Do you know my good neighbour," said I, seeing him in a state of mind which I deemed might be improved upon at the moment, "do you know that I have lately observed on the market day, when we have dined together in Glasgow before returning to our farms in the evening, that you have dipped deep and oft into your tumbler; so that some of our acquaintance who meet us at the ordinary, and who are moderate men, have already set you down as something more than a tippler, just as you would construe Macleod." "But I can leave it off when I please," he quickly rejoined, rallying at the thought. "Why don't you then?" "I shall." "When?—say to-day; we are to dine shortly at the Wheatsheaf as usual; confine yourself to nature's beverage, or to toast and water; and I will yet have hopes of you." "I am resolved—there's my hand," a tear the while gathering in the corner of his eye, which put a welcome stop to our discourse.

As had been our wont on the Wednesdays, when business took us both to Glasgow, we dined together at the place just now mentioned. At that period, and for a series of years before, our farms joined one and another, and we were on terms of peculiar intimacy; the one which I rented being the largest, while he was both landlord and tenant of his. We dined on the day in question, and Mr. Cooper was as good as his word. He was for that time at least a total abstinence man; but not, I was sorry to perceive, without shewing that the sacrifice was greater than was promising. He was fidgetty and uneasy. His appetite was bad, except for the stimulus which the snuff-box lent him, to which he had constant recourse. He was cross and snappish; and when one or two of the moderates perceived him to be in this humour, and at the same time without his usual soothe, they bantered him unmercifully, to my no small anxiety. At length my neighbour lost all command of temper, and made to leave the table abruptly. And when I asked if he would not tarry five minutes that I might accompany him, his answer was, "you may go to—," slamming the door rudely on his exit, and a few minutes afterwards speeding at a rapid rate from the stable-yard. I was vexed; I was sorry that I had interfered so far between him and his vice, thinking that in future we should be on any thing but neighbourly terms. However I prognosticated too rashly; for next morning I was agreeably surprised on receiving a message from my generous hearted friend, requesting me to wait on him in the course of the day, as he wished to take my advice about some farming operations. He received me cordially, but with some tokens of embarrassment at first. Both avoided all sort of approach to the preceding day's conversation and incidents. I dined with him. There were no intoxicating liquors on the table. He was cheerful. A deep reflection, and no doubt a consciousness of having taken a right step, one which put him on the path to prosperity on earth and happiness hereafter, buoying him up.

But the reform was but temporary. Poor Cooper was a backslider.

We still sometimes rode together to market, or met in Glasgow; but it was not so frequently as before, as if the foregoing had been avoided intentionally on his part. He never more made the Wheatsheaf his headquarters nor his dinner house. Dine, however, he did somewhere; and home too he rode, with whom or how, I seldom knew. But this became notorious, that it was frequently after a night's carousing in town, or his having been put to bed in the tavern; for like all backsliders his downward course was headlong. He could not go abroad and remain sober. Business was a burden to him. It was not his "chief end." He was changing every day to the worse. His countenance was growing bloated; his dress was slovenly, in spite of the assiduities of his fine family; his gait was that of incertitude and the loss of self-respect; his affairs were running to ruin; and to all intents and purposes he appeared a lost man,—lost for ever! Alas, the wreck and havoc wrought by a grovelling vice!

His family for a while strove to conceal his conduct, to put on smiling faces, and to talk with hale hearts, even after it was rumoured, and I was convinced with truth, that he was night after night carried to his bed, his senses drowned and unable to help himself. He could not take off his clothes or keep his person clean any more than a sucking babe. Hard lot for delicate women was that of his wife and daughters! He was now a solitary drunkard; mad and outrageous when half-intoxicated; filthy and beastly when speechless.

Such was my neighbour Cooper's condition at the period of his descent of which I am now speaking; and the covering of his vice was no longer possible. Woman's patience could extend no further.

Mrs. Cooper called upon me at last, confided to me the whole, satisfying me that the country-side was not half informed of the misery which had overtaken her. "But come over and talk to him. He swallows daily and nightly enormous quantities of the strongest liquor. There is no man who has more weight with him than you have. Perhaps you may do us good. If not, you will have done a good man's part, and will have my gratitude till death. Come over and dine with us to-morrow. Promise, and I will tell him; or rather drop in at an early hour, and as if by chance, and at least for once preserve him for a few hours from flying to the poison." I promised, although disliking the office; and I kept my word.

I found my neighbour had just left his bed, and had not yet stupified himself with any very recent draughts. We took to the fields and strolled among his parks till the dinner hour, talking as husbandmen fondly do of their farming operations and schemes. I had every now and then taken it upon myself to find fault with his management, or rather mismanagement, asserting in rather stronger terms than the case really warranted, that somehow every thing gave tokens of carelessness, of want of proper superintendence. The drains were allowed to remain choked; the fences were insufficient; the corn field was poisoned with weeds. "I am almost thinking," said I, "Mr. Cooper, that you seldom look after your workmen,—I fear, (at the moment looking him searchingly in the face,) that you sit too long after your dinner, and may be that you never cross the threshold of your house when once you come alongside of the bottle. Why your very person is not so tidy as it should be; and your visage as the looking-glass I should inform you begins to tell tales." He stood stock still; he did not change colour as he had done two years previously, for it was hardly possible to red- den to a deeper hue than his face now uniformly wore. But he seemed like one suddenly smote, and exclaimed, "Convicted again! you have guessed right Mr. Tavish, but this very morning I took an oath never more to offend." "What!" said I, "another oath after the breach that have gone before?" and I shook my head in testimony of my incredulity concerning the validity of the new resolution, without however prolonging the discussion, for I was vexed and rather disgusted, pitying him and his family at the same time, not dreaming, however, that I should have before parting from him that day my worst fears confirmed in a remarkable manner.

We had dined and refrained from tasting a drop of any liquor stronger than water; but not without experiencing unusual emotions for a dinner party. He was necessarily uncomfortable, not merely from the want of his habitual potations, but from his awkward position in my sight. His wife too looked like one that was striving to lay a hold upon hope, at one time planning movements and measures for the future, at another recounting the pleasanter occurrences in her husband's past life; yet ever and anon stealing a look at him of deepest solicitude. It was impossible to observe her without thinking of matronly and comely love,—without inwardly pronouncing her chastened affection and sympathies to be beyond all price.

When it drew towards sunset, I made for departing. Mr. Cooper and myself having been left to ourselves by his wife and daughters, as I could gather, in order that I might follow up with some appropriate observation the delicate subject which I had been employed to improve. I had risen to buckle on my spurs, being so much at a loss to introduce an advice or warning without abruptness and confusion of manner, that I needed some occupation, were it only to afford me courage or diversion. During the process of personal equipment I necessarily had to bend down, having turned my back for the moment on my friend. I was just on the brink of speaking in some such terms as the following:—"I faint hope Mr. Cooper that you will never again have to accuse yourself for any indulgence of the sort we were discoursing of this forenoon; or at least that you will let it be openly and not by stealth, the latter being the deadliest, most besetting and progressive style of intemperance."—When happening to look through between my legs I actually beheld the man hastily snatch a bottle from the cupboard and put it swiftly to his mouth, which obtained one hearty draught before I could in my astonishment call out "hold"! And what think you of the secret transgressor's instant conduct and words? Why, he dashed the bottle to the floor, smote his forehead, grasped at a carving knife, with which he intended no doubt to do himself some grievous injury, but which with difficulty I wrenched from his hand by main force. He then ran on with a sort of torrent of confession and self-accusation, mingled with contumacy, uttered in tones half between a howl and a sore complaint, which seemed to me almost like the manner of a mad man, and which brought the family quickly around us. "What aileth you William," screamed his wife, "Oh, my father," his eldest daughter cried, at the same time clinging to him, and beseeching him to compose himself. "Death, devils, and hell!" was his response to these fond and imploring accents. "My poor husband is beside himself." Mrs. Cooper passionately uttered. "I have seen him this way too often before, and incurable delirium will be the early issue." "Delirium tremens," the wretched man hysterically commenced repeating, taking up the term, and hurrying into something like a lecture on the frightful effects of intemperance. "The devils believe and tremble," he shouted, and then laughed immoderately; this sentence appeared to afford him a satisfactory idea, or a fit illustration.

After a considerable time had elapsed, during which his remorse and vehemence assumed different phases, he became pacified so far as to give way to heavy sobs and a flood of tears such as strong men shed; and before I left the house he had allowed himself to be led like a child to his bed-room, where he remained quiet, as I afterwards learnt, till morning.

Till morning!—but it was then with the entire swing of his terrible propensity that he resorted to the brandy bottle; yes, bottle after bottle with a desperate eagerness, which confined him to his bed constantly. It was no use to refuse him a supply, for his violence became so extreme, that his distressed wife was glad to allow him to subdue his strength by swallowing the mastering poison. Indeed he seemed at times to harbour the thought of murdering her. He was literally mad, fit for a lunatic asylum, to which he should have been sent instead of permitting him to exasperate his disease by renewed and unlimited draughts. "Bind him with cords," said I. "Alas!" answered the heart-broken woman, "I know not what to do. I cannot bear to see my husband bound. I fear that to deny him brandy will occasion speedy death. Ah! what a death! To die by one's own hand!"

He continued for nearly a month to drink day and night after the manner that has been stated seldom tasting food. For the last week of that period, I had been from home and uninformed about his condition and progress; but on my return I was told that his excess had become almost unparalleled, that some fool ish adviser, as I think he must have been, had suggested that, as his propensity would reach a climax, the best thing to do was to raise his disgust, to force his stomach to rebel, by placing a barrel of spirits within his reach, having knocked out one of its ends and planted beside it a tin jug. My observation on hearing this, was, that it was a sure way "either to kill or cure, but to kill most probably." Nor did I lose any time in paying a visit to the abode where there was so much sorrow and distress.

"I think," said Mrs. Cooper, "your visit will be the immediate forerunner of some of some alteration. Oh, that it may be to a goodly end. Come in, Mr. McTavish, go to the distracted man. May your prayers for his recovery be answered graciously." As I approached his chamber his bellowing smote upon my ear, and almost utterly repelled me. But when I entered, my horror was vastly increased. There, pillowed up in a half-sitting posture, the self-destroyer appeared, his eyes blood-shot, his visage a deep purple, his cheeks fearfully swollen, his tongue lolling out of his mouth, his utterance inarticulate, and the fumes around him sickening. He cast upon me a sort of meaningless gaze at the same time stretching out the hand which held the jug, and with an unsteady dip endeavouring to fill the measure. I could not be an inactive witness of the monstrous scene, and dashed the vessel from his grasp before he could bring it to his lips. With almost simultaneous impulse I snatched up the small barrel and tossed it out of the window, determined that it should not afford one drop more. Hardly had I let down the sash, and presented a front of resolution to him, than with an agility quite unnatural, he sprang from his bed, and essayed to tear me to pieces. In fact he was too powerful for me, and threw me down with considerable violence; after which, perhaps mercifully for me, he rushed out of the apartment and took to the fields. I followed as quickly as possible, every one in the house likewise being in pursuit. "He is for the precipice," one exclaimed. "No, he makes for the pond," said another and on we each ran, according to his best speed,—the youngest, however, not being a match for the demented fugitive.

He had sped with extraordinary exertion some four or five hundred yards, distancing the pursuers considerably, and dreadfully alarming us. Some how the conviction was borne in upon me that his race on earth was nearly finished, that an awful fate was about to be his, that a dread judgment would be proclaimed by his end. Scarcely had this fear taken hold of me when I saw him fall to the ground as if suddenly shot dead at the height of his speed. We were soon on the spot. He was dead; his breast and front presented one sheet of reeking blood. The heart seemed to have poured out all it contained.

DUNCAN MACTAVISH.

ANECDOTES AND SKETCHES OF JAPAN.

There is perhaps no part of the world, where civilisation has entered, that is so little known to Europe as the Kingdom of Japan. The political jealousy of its inhabitants closely resembles the well-known exclusiveness of the Chinese, amongst whom this principle has existed from a very early period, and is strictly adhered to by the dynasty now in power, although the wishes of the people be opposed to a custom which has nothing better than antiquity to sanction it. There is, however, a material difference between the Chinese and Japanese with regard to the manner in which the principle of exclusiveness is considered; for, whilst the former are in a great degree indifferent to the custom, the latter, who are naturally jealous and suspicious, even in private life, individually give every practical effect to the ordination of their rulers on this head, shun, in their own persons, every species of intercourse, however casual or rare, with strangers, and invariably apprise their government of any attempt towards such intercourse on their part. Hence it happens that, while foreign individuals, and even bodies, scientific or religious, have been tolerated in China, and afforded ample information relative to at least some portions of its interior, the rigid seclusion in which the few political, or rather commercial, agents of Europe are held in Japan, have kept us in utter ignorance of the latter country; and all published works upon the subject are confessedly defective. Some particulars, therefore, of a people so little known, may not prove uninteresting to the public in general.

The Japanese Kingdom, consisting of the island of Nippon and a considerable number of smaller isles, includes an extent of about 12,600 square miles, and is separated from China and Tartary by a breadth of sea varying, at different points, from a hundred to five hundred miles.

Japan is continually involved in mists, which, even in summer months, last often from three to four days at a time; and scarcely a day ever passes of which some hours are not thus obscured by mists, clouds, or rains. The high mountains, in the northern parts of many of the Japanese islands, reaching to the clouds, the barren wastes, and the large tracts of water, all conspire to render the winds that pass over them excessively cold, even in summer.

The Japanese believe that, after the creation, the earth lay a long while under the waters, unnoticed by the Creator; until at length his eldest born, who is called Kami, received permission to reduce it to order and to people it. Kami raised the earth up from the waters, endowed it with all natural riches, and gave to one portion masculine attributes, and to another feminine; and thence man was produced. The Japanese borrowed this notion from the Chinese doctrine of the yin and the yang, or "male and female energies in Nature," by which they attempt to account for the production of all things. The brethren of Kami, with emulative spirit, were entrusted with the care of all the other countries of the world save Nippon, which is supposed to have been taken under the especial care of Kami himself; and in this manner do the Japanese explain their presumed superiority over the rest of the world.

Another tradition refers all the knowledge and skill of the natives to the physician of a Chinese Emperor, who, finding his master desirous of living for ever, pretended that there were certain plants in the island of Japan which were capable of conferring immortality, and which could only be gathered by the hands of youths and maidens of spotless character. He was accordingly allowed to embark for Japan, with three hundred young men and girls whom he selected; but, as his sole object was to escape from the tyranny of the Emperor, he remained with his companions in the refuge he had thus found, and instructed the Japanese of his time in all kinds of useful knowledge. These traditions are not however received as true amongst the enlightened portion of the Japanese, who identify their origin with that of the Kuriks, in consequence of their language, customs, and traditions.

With a few trifling exceptions, the inhabitants of the Japanese islands have for centuries been free from foreign or domestic warfare. Plague and epidemic diseases, except the small-pox, are likewise unknown to them; the kingdom is consequently over-populated;—it is however impossible to estimate the amount of the population with any degree of accuracy, for many hundreds of thousands of the poor, who are destitute of fixed habitations, are continually wandering over the country. The capital is believed to contain about ten millions of souls. Jeddo reckons about two hundred and eighty thousand houses in its principal streets; and each house contains thirty or thirty-five inhabitants: the occupants of the dwellings in the suburbs, the houseless, the royal guards, and the attendants on the sovereign, may be calculated at a million and a half more.

There is a singular institution in Japan with regard to those individuals who are afflicted with blindness. The society of blind men possesses its own privileges and regulations, and is governed by a prince who has also lost the faculty of vision. The members obtain their livelihood by various kinds of labour, and contribute their earnings to the common stock of the association: some of them are musicians, others are physicians, &c. The order owes its institution to a Japanese general, who was taken prisoner by a victorious adversary. This adversary afterwards usurped the throne, and proposed to his prisoner to enter into the newly-constituted army. "I thank you for your courtesy," was the reply; "but you have slain my prince and benefactor; and I could not serve under your banners! The mere being in your presence would stimulate me to vengeance; and to avoid the dread temptation I will see no longer?" With these words, he tore his own eyes out of his head, and threw them at the usurper's feet. The order of the blind was instituted according to the will of this heroic commander.

A strong indifference to life manifests itself amongst the Japanese. Infanticide is encouraged by the laws, as an important check to the increase of the population. Suicide is also deemed a virtue, in certain cases, amongst the Japanese; and when a man of rank is condemned to death, he is permitted to execute the sentence upon himself, the mode of dying by the hand of the public executioner being considered disgraceful. In his suicidal end, the criminal is frequently assisted by a friend. On these occasions, the condemned retires from the court of the sovereign, and summons his nearest connexions to meet him at his own house on the following day. A handsome entertainment is provided for the appointed time; and, after drinking copiously, the guests take a formal leave of the grandee, to whom the sentence of death is then read aloud. The principal performer in this tragedy next makes a set speech, or else addresses a few words of affection and gratitude to the company assembled: he then bows his head, draws his sword, and plunges the point into his bowels, at the same time that one of his trustiest attendants, who stands at his side, gives him a blow upon the head. To avoid the imputation of cowardice, the victim then inflicts three or four gashes upon his throat, and at length bleeds to death. In such a death as this, there is no disgrace in the estimation of the Japanese; and the son succeeds to the post occupied at court, or elsewhere, by his father.

When a Japanese has committed a crime, and dreads detection, he almost invariably destroys himself, in order to save his family the disgrace of witnessing his public execution. This feeling of aversion to a disgraceful death extends to all classes of the Japanese, and is not confined to the male sex. Some time ago, a person of rank espoused a woman of great beauty in Fingo. The sovereign was anxious to possess her; he accordingly issued an order for the death of the bridegroom, and directed the widow to be brought to the palace. She abhorred the idea; but, feigning compliance, requested a delay of three days to bewail her husband. At the expiration of this time, she gave an entertainment to all her friends and relatives, the king himself with his attendants forming part of the company. After rising from the table, she went up into an open balcony, and there stabbed herself in the presence of her royal lover. Another widow, the mother of three sons, lived in the most destitute condition, the labours of her children not sufficing to support the family. At that period, a proclamation was issued by the government, offering a certain reward to any individual by whom a famous robber should be delivered up into the hands of justice. Without their parents' knowledge, the three sons agreed that one should be passed off as the robber, and that the other two should appear as witnesses against him. Lots were cast, and upon the youngest fell the fatal task of personating the robber. He was denounced, thrown into prison, and condemned to death; and his two brothers received the promised recompense. But brotherly affection was not permitted to lie dormant, nor could the voice of nature be stifled in the bosoms of the witnesses: they obtained permission to visit the pretended culprit, and mingled their tears with his. The gaoler had some sentiment of curiosity which he was determined to gratify, in respect to this affair: he listened at the door of the dungeon, and heard the groans and lamentations of the three brethren. Nothing, however, was uttered by either to elucidate the mystery, or confirm his suspicion, relative to the circumstance; and he accordingly followed the two eldest brothers home to their miserable hovel. There again he listened; and this time he heard the unhappy mother, as soon as she was informed of the dread experiment, exclaim, "No—rather let me die a thousand deaths than live upon the blood of my innocent child!" The gaoler hastened to the judge, who was filled with pity and astonishment at the tale thus explained. He sent for the prisoner, and examined him once more, but could elicit nothing beyond a repetition of former statements. The judge then declared all that had come to his knowledge; he sent again for the witnesses, and at length arrived at the truth;—he then laid the facts before the king, and obtained a full pardon and a considerable pension for the three affectionate sons of the poor widow.

Duelling amongst the Japanese is but a species of double suicide: the following anecdote will sufficiently illustrate the truth of this statement. Two nobles of the court met on the steps of the royal palace; and, as they passed, their daggers happened to strike together:—this was a point of honour which demanded satisfaction. At the royal table, the conversation turned upon the circumstance; and the narrator, who was one of the parties concerned, addressing the other, observed, "My dagger is as good as thine."—"I will show thee the contrary," replied the other; and, drawing the weapon at once, he plunged it into his own body. The other hastened forward, without uttering a word, and bent for a moment over the body of the fallen one: he was overjoyed to find that the wound, though mortal, had not taken an instantaneous effect, and that the suicide was not quite dead; he accordingly declared that his own dagger was better than that of the dying man, drew it, stabbed himself to the heart, and fell dead first.

From these anecdotal specimens, it will be easily imagined that the resolution of the Japanese is not altered by danger. Though superior to the Chinese both in moral and physical qualifications, and remarkably steady, well-informed, open-hearted, industrious, patient, honest, and just, the Japanese are still suspicious, superstitious, haughty, and prone to anger; although not warlike, they are not to be subdued; and their love of vengeance is at times even heroic. Of this latter characteristic quality, we give a specimen:—A Japanese vessel arrived from the peninsula of Suzuma, to trade at Formosa, where the Dutch had a settlement in 1630. The governor of the colony treated the Japanese with great harshness, in consequence of some former misunderstandings. They complained, on their return to Suzuma, of this treatment, and begged their king to avenge their wrongs. This monarch not thinking himself sufficiently powerful to commence hostilities against the Dutch, refused to interfere; whereupon seven young men of the royal guard stood forward, and spoke in the following manner,—"We should be unworthy of our station and your confidence, if we could fear anything in supporting your honour. Blood alone can wash out the insult sustained. We will bring the governor of Formosa, dead or alive, into your presence; and seven of us are sufficient for this undertaking. Neither the foaming waves, nor the fortifications of his stronghold, nor even his guard of soldiers, shall prevent us from succeeding in our design." Their repeated entreaties finally obtained the assent of the king to this enterprise; and the address and resolution of the soldiers proved successful. The adventurous party went to Formosa; and, under pretence of paying their respects to the governor, obtained admission into his presence. Suddenly drawing their swords, and taking advantage of the surprise caused by the daring attempt, the seven rushed upon the Dutch functionary, and assassinated him upon the spot. They themselves succeeded in effecting their escape back to Nippon.

Notwithstanding the rare occurrence of wars amongst the Japanese, a martial spirit is sedulously cultivated in the education of their children at school. The pupils are imbued with a belief that their forefathers were prodigies of valour; and it has even been affirmed that the copies from which they write are the last letters of their departed heroes and self-destroyers. On the fifth day of the fifth month, a festival is held, to commemorate the total destruction of the Tartar army which invaded Japan, A.D. 781. The invaders landed on the island of Nippon, and their fleet was totally destroyed in a single night by a terrible storm: the natives then fell upon the enemy with such irresistible violence, that they left not one to return to the continent to tell the sad tale of this disaster. A similar invasion, effected by upwards of two hundred and twenty thousand Tartars, A.D. 1281, proved equally unsuccessful: the Japanese gained a complete victory over their invaders, and treated them as their forefathers had done on the previous occasion.

The inborn pride of the Japanese carries him to the most fearful excesses. He scorns all idea of reconciliation, under the impression that nothing is more disgraceful than the forgiveness of a foe. When, therefore, his vengeance sleeps, it does not slumber without watching for a favourable opportunity to awake to mischief; and he is never to be more feared than when he appears to be calm and tranquil. This feeling leads him to doubt whether an offence can ever be adequately avenged: the thirst to resent a particular injury descends from generation to generation; and the posterity of the offender constantly dreads the wrath of the children of the offended.

To sum up the qualities of the Japanese, we may observe that they are cleanly in their persons, and upright in their dealings with each other. The habit of intoxication is prevalent amongst them, though not to the same extent as in some European nations. The humblest are degraded beyond measure, if seen inebriated by day.

REVIEWS.

Before and after the Pledge. Published by F. Glover, Water Lane, Fleet Street.

This is a coloured print, which at first sight appears to represent a cold and cheerless apartment, in which a starving and destitute family is seated. There is no fire in the grate—no carpet upon the floor—no food upon the table—no curtain at the window. The principal hero of the picture is sitting intoxicated in a chair, with his half-naked wife and children around him. But if this Protean print be held against a strong light, the scene is immediately changed. All then appears to be comfort, plenty and ease. The inmates of the room are well clothed—there is a carpet upon the floor—a blazing fire in the grate—a curtain to the window—and an ample supply of provisions upon the table. This print will prove a welcome new year's gift to children; and, in that quality, do we especially commend it to the notice of our readers.

The Historical, Moral, and Weather Almanack, for 1841. Second Edition. 12mo. pp. 48. London: W. S. Orr and Co.

This is one of the best Almanacks which belong to the year we have just entered upon. The Table of important Historical Events is decidedly the most copious, the most useful, and the best selected of all those which appear in these kinds of publications. The only portion of this Almanack, to which we object, is the Table of predictions relative to the weather. We feel perfectly well convinced that such predictions will one day be made with exactitude; but a series of years of long observation and comparison of the phenomena of the weather, must elapse ere such prophecies may be advanced upon really scientific principles. If the precise relative position of the earth and other planets having any attractive power in respect to each other, be satisfactorily registered every day for a certain number of years, correct data will be obtained upon which to raise a theory relative to the weather to be anticipated on certain days as yet unborn. There are however so many local circumstances to be taken into consideration,—circumstances which materially influence the weather,—that these predictions will have numerous difficulties to contend with. A conflagration of any large building in London may so operate upon the clouds immediately above, as to change the aspect of the weather, to an extraordinary degree. We however, repeat our former observation, that this almanack is decidedly one of the best of the hundred and one that have this year issued from the press at the moderate price of sixpence. We sincerely recommend it to all our friends, who are in want of such a publication.

Fraser's Magazine. Number for January. London: J. Fraser

We merely notice this periodical (as we do not generally profess to review the Magazines) for the purpose of expressing our surprise that the editor of so well-conducted an one could have admitted into its pages such a tissue of abominable nonsense and twaddle as Nimrod's article, under the denomination of "Go—Going—Gone." When we first read the title of this contribution, a natural association of ideas led us to imagine that we were about to have a dissertation upon auctioneering; and we trembled for poor Nimrod, because we know full well that his thread-bare imagination would do anything but justice to either the avocation or the character of Mr. George Robbins, who has met a biographer that has done him ample justice in Mr. James Grant, the popular and talented author of "Portraits of Public Characters," &c. &c. But when we found that Nimrod had wasted his own time, and intended to waste that of his readers (if he could find any) with a wretched tissue of paragraphs containing nothing but a perpetual play upon the words, which he had chosen as his title, we threw down the magazine in sorrow that such astounding nonsense should have been admitted within its literary precincts. Nimrod is a literary humbug of the first water—a man who has existed upon the bastard renown obtained by a few sporting anecdotes, and essays of very equivocal merit, and who upon the strength of that renown has issued more trash to the world than any other half-dozen twaddlers put together. Amongst the mass of rubbish, we must not forget to notice a series of papers now publishing in the New Monthly Magazine,—the subject, France! Now Mr. Apperley (Nimrod) has resided in Calais for many years past, and has been to Paris twice only during the whole time: on each occasion he stayed but a couple or three days; and, yet—with all his knowledge of French circumstances to Calais and a few miles of district in its vicinity—he pretends to write a moral, statistical, and social description of France, the language of which country he cannot even speak. However—revoons à nos moutons; and let us lay a sample of "Go—Going—Gone" before the reader:—

"The going to the Post-office—what a nerve-trying act on certain occasions! For example, how awful is the answer of "Nothing for you, sir," to a man who has not a shilling in his house, in a foreign country, and this repeated every day for a week; or, which is nearly as bad, should there be something—viz., a lawyer's letter, which attracts the eye by its peculiarly ungentleman-like superscription. This last-named document, however, on one occasion stood my friend. The decease of a distant relative was announced to me by the family-solicitor, in a letter which I found at the post-office; but guessing otherwise of the contents from its lawyer-like appearance, I put it into my pocket, and did not open it for at least a period of two months. But in what was I benefited? Why the fact was, the "distant relation" was a Welsh Nobleman, and I was thus saved the expense of a suit of mourning for every man, woman, and child, in and about my house, which assuredly would have been ordered on the following day. The runaway apprentice goes to sea. The discontented yokel goes for a soldier; and should he desert in war, he goes over to the enemy. One country goes to war with another; and "Go it, Ned," said William the IV. of England to a favourite admiral and brother-messmate, when about to go to sea upon a secret expedition."

Any passage in "Jack the Giant-Killer" is superior to this abominable rubbish. Nimrod is essentially a vulgar writer; but when vulgarity and nonsense are mingled together, may the gods of Olympus save us from so severe a castigation as the mere fact of compelling us to read the abomination.

The Gipsy Chief; or the Haunted Oak. By HARRIET MARIA JONES. Part I. 8vo. pp. 22. London: George Virtue.

This is the first Number of a new tale, by the authoress of "The Gipsy Mother," and is embellished with a very good steel engraving. From the small portion of the work now before us, it is impossible to judge of the plan of the story: we should however say that it will prove interesting. Those of our readers, who are fond of works published in the serial form, will do well to give this a fair trial.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

* * In consequence of an unusual press of matter, in the shape of Teetotal news, last week, several paragraphs of importance were omitted. They are however inserted in the present Number.

COUNTRY-NEWS.

LEEDS.

ON Friday evening, 25th Dec., the annual Christmas festival of the Total Abstinence Society was held in the Saloon of the Music-Hall, Leeds. The room was tastefully decorated with laurel, the chairman's seat being quite embowered in evergreen, mixed with white flowers. At the top and bottom of the room were large flags, one representing Moses striking the rock, with the inscription, "Behold he smote the rock, and the water gushed out;" and round the sides of the room were small flags, with pithy mottoes suitable to the object, as—"Prevention better than cure;" "Temperance in the proper use of all things;" "Do thyself no harm;" and a number of others. Nearly 400 persons sat down to tea. The harmony and mild interest of the scene must have communicated delight to every teetotaler. The proceedings were appropriately commenced by the company singing a hymn; after which Mr. JOSEPH ANDREWS proposed that the Rev. ROBERT MARTIN should take the chair, which was carried unanimously. Mr. THOMAS BRAUMONT, surgeon, Bradford, had been expected to preside, but did not arrive in time.

LAUNCESTON (CORNWALL).

THE third annual dinner of the Launceston Teetotal Society took place on Wednesday, the 30th of December, at two o'clock, in the large Subscription-Room, which was fitted up by the Teetotalers for the occasion in a very splendid manner. Two hundred and twenty persons sat down to dinner. The Launceston society consists of twelve hundred and ten members, amongst whom are a hundred and two reclaimed drunkards. A Rechabite tent was fixed at the bottom of the table; and the Bible reposed upon a silken cushion at the top. The Chief Ruler sat in the tent, presiding over thirty-seven of his brethren. After dinner the chair was taken by Mr. JOHN PEARSE (of Tavistock); and a public meeting was held.

BERWICK.

THE great cause of Total Abstinence from all intoxicating liquors progresses gloriously at this place. The members of the Rechabite and Teetotal societies marched in procession to Tweedmouth Chapel on Christmas Day, and the Rev. Mr. GRANT preached a most appropriate sermon. In the afternoon the Report was read in the Town-Hall, which was kindly granted for the occasion by the worthy Mayor and Corporation of Berwick. Coffee and Reading Rooms have been opened for the use of the Teetotal society. In the evening a soirée took place, and upwards of five hundred Teetotalers sat down to tea. The meeting was afterwards addressed by Messieurs ALEXANDER (the President), BLACK, SMITH, MARSHALL, A. SMITH, and the Rev. Mr. CRAIG, Mr. PALMER (from Alnwick) also addressed the audience in a speech of great power.

LEICESTER.

MR. TARR, that truly staunch and zealous advocate of the cause of Teetotalism, has lately been lecturing with considerable success in this city.

WAKEFIELD.

MR. LEIGHS has lately delivered lectures in the Court-House of Wakefield to highly delighted audiences. This gentleman has been induced to remain in this place, in anticipation of a Festival which is in preparation. We regret to state that MR. LEIGHS had a narrow escape with his life a short time back, while he was proceeding with a friend in a pony chaise to Wakefield, in consequence of a collision that took place between his vehicle and that of a couple of drunken corn-factors. We understand the Teetotalers of Wakefield are making "immense exertions to propagate the doctrine (in the appropriate language of our esteemed correspondent) on a large scale."

TOWN NEWS.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Wednesday Evening, Jan. 6th.

MR. GREEN (of Westminster) took the chair at the Aldersgate Street Chapel on this occasion. This gentleman called the attention of the audience to the fact that all the miserable children who might be seen in a starving condition about the streets had been reduced to that state by the drunken habits of their parents. He strongly appealed to the higher classes to set the example of sobriety to their poorer brethren.

MR. BENSTEAD, with his usual eloquence and in his peculiarly impressive manner, appealed to the feelings of parents in respect to the method in which they educated their children; and then expatiated upon the sin of destroying intellectual powers by means of alcoholic liquors.

MR. STALLWOOD said that at Great Marlow, amongst a population of four thousand five hundred people, there were ten bakers and fifty two public-houses. He then explained the various evils of intemperance.

Mrs. G. W. M. REYNOLDS lectured upon the effects of alcoholic liquors upon the nervous system, and explained the intimate connexion between the nerves and the mental properties of man. He then expatiated upon the necessity of advocating the cause of Teetotalism to the utmost of the power of every disciple, on the score that a doctrine which benefitted an individual should not be withheld from the general consideration of the masses.

MR. CRUMP (the Registrar) closed the meeting with a most able address upon the miseries which the working-man experiences from the vice of intemperance, and the blessings which result from the application of a remedy within general reach.

* * The anniversary meeting of the United Temperance Association will take place at the chapel, Aldersgate Street, on Wednesday evening next. Several advocates of the first popularity and the highest talent will be present.

CHELSEA AUXILIARY TO THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

A Grand Tea Festival was given by this Auxiliary on Wednesday evening, January 6th, at the Temperance Hall, 56, George Street, Chelsea. About a hundred Teetotalers sat down to an excellent repast supplied from the adjacent Temperance Coffee House. The ladies were dressed in a very elegant manner, and the whole scene was one of cordiality and happiness. The members of the committee were most active in superintending the festival, and ensuring the comfort of those present. At half-past seven o'clock, Mrs. G. W. M. REYNOLDS addressed the audience upon the effects of alcohol on the various parts of the human frame, and at eight o'clock the Hall was cleared for a ball.

* * A full and detailed account of the lectures delivered by Mr. MINGAY SYDEN at the Chapel, Aldersgate Street, on the 13th and 16th instant, will be given in the next number of The Teetotaler.

MUTUAL INSTRUCTION SOCIETY.

A Society of Teetotalers, under this denomination, has recently formed itself, with the view of occupying leisure time in the most profitable manner. It holds its meeting every Tuesday evening, at the Star Temperance Coffee House, Golden Lane; and useful Lectures are delivered upon those occasions. The first Lecture, on the "Pleasure of Study," was delivered on Tuesday, the 22nd of December, and on the 5th of January, Mr. DEXTER lectured upon "The necessity of duly cultivating the mind." This Society is forming a library, to which the Committee respectfully solicits donations of books. Really, this is a most praiseworthy institution, and one which reflects great credit upon the honest and spirited working-men who have founded it.

VIRGINIA-STREET CATHOLIC TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

ON Sunday evening the immense room in Glass Street, opposite the London Docks, was crowded by an assembly amounting to about nine hundred persons, to hear a lecture from Mr. J. C. Fitzgerald, B. A. The respectable appearance of this large assemblage of persons bespoke the triumphs of Total Abstinence. Mr. FITZGERALD, in the course of his lecture, instanced many enjoyments of life, intellectual, moral, and religious, from which the drunkard is necessarily excluded. He observed that man's susceptibility of enjoyment depended on the composure and tranquillity of his feelings—that, when his reason was enlisted in the unbalanced service of passions, which it should calm and control, the beauties of the external world were lost to him. Behold the drunkard (said he) on a fine summer's day, surrounded with enchanting prospects, when the sun inspires all that has life with energy and vigour; when the matchless beauties of the earth harmonize with the radiant glories of the heavens; when nature wears a smile of joy, and, as it were, bespeaks the benignity of its creator, behold the drunkard! He catches no inspiration or rapture from such a scene, but is lost in miserable selfishness and sensuality. Mr. F. combatted the objections of Bacchanalian orators, and supported his views by authorities, from sacred and profane history, and also by physiological illustrations. But the great triumph of his lecture was an ingenious appeal to the peculiar prepossessions of the Irish whose hearts were led captive, when he explained to them the manifold temporal as well as religious blessings, which flow from an observance of the rites of their church. "I waive (said Mr. F.) all topics of a controversial character and confine myself to secular views. Let us imagine an unfortunate man, whom the 'still small voice of conscience' rebukes for a life of infamy. Such a hopeless being, is in most cases, an outcast from society. His bad deeds brand him as an object of avoidance. He is friendless and unknown—a suspected stranger amongst thousands. To be brief, the world shuts the door of repentance against him. What a fallen, what a miserable, what a Cain-like situation! In too many instances, the hapless wretch, having no friend to whom he could confide his thoughts or in whose condolence he might seek some little refuge, becomes a misanthrope, flies the world, ultimately grows weary of the bondage of life, and dies a suicide. How many awful instances occur in this land of boasted enlightenment! How few, how very few instances occur amongst millions in Ireland, writhing under the bitterest persecution, and subject to the miseries of indigence! And why, because the priest is regarded as the disinterested friend of even sinners forsaken by the world. The sinner confides in him, unburdens his conscience, and learns the conditions of repentance. The counsel of a good and pious priest, free from asceticism or repulsiveness, not only reforms criminals, but chases away from morbid minds those many insatiable and credulities of which so many are victims. Does the drunkard pay periodic visits to the priest?" The lecturer spoke for nearly two hours, and, at the conclusion, was honoured with a vote of thanks and long continued applause. Mr. KELSEY, whose services to this branch, cannot be too highly appreciated, was in the chair.

STANDARD THEATRE.

WE are authorised to state that several enterprising individuals, belonging to the Hackney and Haggerstone Teetotal Associations, have united for the purpose of hiring this theatre, which, from its locality (Shoreditch) will doubtless form the centre whence will branch off ten thousand rays of Teetotal lustre upon the surrounding district. We shall be enabled next week to give a more detailed account of the arrangements connected with this enterprise, to which we wish every success that it so eminently deserves.

VARIEITIES.

"THE TEETOTALER" JOURNAL.—The following notice of this periodical appeared in a recent number of the Leeds Times:—"We consider as truly delightful among other certain happy features of the Temperance system, an increased demand for literary food, for the which equally with physical, we know of no greater stimulant than sobriety. With disordered tone of stomach, we can never look for healthy tone of mind, while the converse of this is certain. Mr. Reynolds, the editor of this periodical, is a man of more than ordinary claims to respectful consideration in this now very elevated literary department. Mr. Reynolds has stepped into the shoes and worn the mantle of the immortal Boz—Dickens, with a grace and ease which leaves no doubt of the well fitting of the one, and his graceful fold of the other. With the invariable failure in all previous imitations of popular styles and authors, from Shakspeare to Sterne, Mr. Reynolds' proof of capacity to make the renowned Pickwick perfectly at home, abroad, stands out an instance of success, no less singular than great. The wretched effort at identifying sobriety with low-life and vulgarity must be seen and felt as a most keen, though undesigned, satire upon aristocracy and its self-assumed good breeding. Periodicals like this will soon carry conviction of the correct judgments and refined taste of that portion of the community, so gloriously increasing, who are insensibly blind to the gentility of drunkenness. We could enumerate the many articles which excite the warmest respect for the talent employed on it, and must recommend it as an unequivocal indication of the rapid increase of the great cause. We cordially agree in the editor's view of the ineligibility of making religious considerations the corner-stone of Temperance. It has already in our opinion been too much pressed into the cause, and it would be as well to see if sobriety's own legs are not competent to support her, before we cram conventional crutches into her hands, and forbid her movement beyond the pace of a psalm tune."

WISDOM.—He who thinks no man above him but for his virtue, none below him but for his vice, never be obsequious or assuming in a wrong place, but will frequently emulate men in stations below him, and pity those nominally over his head.

A RECOMMENDATION.—A shopkeeper, in recommending a piece of goods to a lady, remarked, "Madam, it will wear for ever, and make you a first rate petticoat afterwards."

Published by GEORGE HENDERSON, 2, Old Bailey, Ludgate-Hill; and sold by W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row; D. Campbell, Glasgow; Macdon & Co., Dublin; and all Booksellers. LONDON.—J. C. HENDERSON, 13, BARNES SQUARE.

PICKWICK MARRIED.

CHAPTER I.

IN WHICH MR. PICKWICK OBTAINS A VERY CURIOUS AND EDIFYING INSIGHT INTO THE MANNER IN WHICH THE GENTLEMEN OF THE NEW POLICE FORCE PERFORM THEIR DUTY.

THE deeds of illustrious men are emblazoned on the pages of history; and, although those pages frequently wrap up a pound of butter, or line a deal box, they are not on that account the less faithful records of the achievements of such heroes as Cæsar, Napoleon, or Pickwick. Whether we examine the researchful biographies written by careful authors, or whether we listen, with unfeigned delight, to the ballad which the beggar-woman bawls beneath our windows, we are nevertheless struck at the immensity of that space which the aforesaid illustrious personages occupy in public estimation. Thus is it that we are embarrassed whether to accord the palm of transcendent celebrity to the toga of Cæsar, the cocked-hat of Napoleon, or the gaiters of Pickwick.

It was in the month of December, of the year 1837, that a very remarkable scene occurred in the Strand, close by the Adelphi Theatre. It was half-past ten o'clock at night, and a most respectable audience (as the papers declared on the following morning) was rushing out of the portals of the aforesaid theatre in anything but a respectable manner. In the midst of the multitude, a young lady suddenly became separated from her male companion, and was carried along by the stream of people with such rapidity that she soon found herself up to her ankles in another kind of stream caused by the melting of the snow in the streets. The young lady screamed—first, because she was really alarmed; and secondly, because all ladies, who wish to be considered as such, ought to scream on such occasions; and, in her anxiety to escape from the line of carriages in the street, she wandered to some distance from the door of the theatre. Suddenly recovering her presence of mind, she turned round to seek for the male companion whom she had lost, and ran against an immense, tall, black-whiskered ferocious-looking fellow, who turned out to be a policeman.

"Well, young 'oman, what do you want?" cried the policeman, in a surly tone, as he caught hold of the lady's arms, and peered impertinently under her bonnet. "Don't you know it's agin the law to run about the streets in this here wery unconstitootional manner?"

"I meant no harm, sir—I—"

"You didn't—eh?" interrupted the policeman, looking very lovingly at the terrified young lady. "Well, all I can say is that you're evidently a wery dangerous k'racter; an' I jist tell'ee wot you must do,—you must stand two two-pen'norths o' rum."

"Pray let me go, sir—Oh! pray do!" cried the young lady. "I meant no offence—"

"Don't interrupt me in the exercise o' my dooty, young 'oman," cried the policeman; and as a crowd had collected by this time, he was compelled to assume a serious aspect. "You're drunk!" he added, brutally; "so come along—drunk and disorderly's the charge."

The young lady gazed wildly around her, and uttered a faint scream; but the policeman seized her rudely with both hands, and began to lug her towards the station-house.

At that instant a gentleman, with a most expressive countenance and very a becoming pair of spectacles, worked his way through the crowd, and inquired into the cause of this strange proceeding.

"It's only a young 'oman here as is so precious drunk she can't stand," said the policeman: "I wish as how some un 'ud run up to the station an' fetch down the stretcher."

Here the young lady recovered herself so far as to be enabled to appeal to the kindness of the gentleman who had just interfered in her behalf.

"My dear sir," said that gentleman to the police-constable, "you surely must be mistaken—"

"Law's never wrong," returned the officer brutally.

"But its functionaries are," said the gentleman.

No sooner were these words out of the mouth of the gentleman, than the policeman loosened his hold upon the young lady, knocked the aforesaid gentleman down, and then as speedily took him up on a charge of assault.

"You're booked now for this, old feller," ejaculated the policeman. "Who'll come for'ard as a witness?"

The crowd hung back; but at that instant another policeman emerged from a gin-palace close by, swore he had seen it all, and then inquired what was the matter.

"Vy, here's a feller has come up an' knocked me down, 'cos I was a-dooing my dooty with respect to a young gal as was so lussy she could'n't stand. But he must come along to the station, an' the young 'oman too. I know who he is—he's bin at the mill three or four times afore now;"—and, with these words, the first policeman commenced dragging the gentleman along the streets, while the young lady made her escape in the confusion.

In the course of a quarter of an hour, the cavalcade reached the station-house in Bow-Street; and the prisoner was introduced into a little miserable room, where an inspector was dozing before the fire.

"Well, what now?" cried the inspector, waking up, and turning angrily round upon the arrivals.

"Please, sir," began the first policeman, "here's a wery notorious bad character, which has been in custody afore, and come up and knocked me down without the slightest aggrawation on my part."

"And, please, sir, I seed it all," said the other constable.

"Oh! very well," cried the inspector, opening a large book which lay upon a little desk, and preparing to enter the charge. "What's your name, prisoner?"

"My name is Samuel Pickwick," was the calm reply; "and I protest against this most unwarrantable—this most disgraceful—this—this—"

"Hold your tongue," exclaimed the inspector: "you're known, you see. Samuel Pickwick—eh? well, what are you?"

"A gentleman," was the indignant answer.

"Ah! all swindlers is gen'lemen now a-days," murmured the inspector; and as he proceeded to write down the remainder of the charge, he diverted himself and his hearers with such observations as these:—"You can't get bail, 'spose. But what's the use of asking? A feller like you hasn't got no friends. You'll look well on the stepper, you will,—but mind you try and get next to the wall: it's easier there. I des say you don't wear them spectacles and gaiters for nothing. Who makes the charge?"

"I do, sir," was the first policeman's answer.

"Oh! John Bludgin—eh?" mused the inspector, as he continued writing. "And you're the witness—eh?"

"I'm the witness to the whole transaction, sir," answered the other constable.

"Benjamin Buffit, witness," added the inspector. "There—that'll do. Now you two fellers go back to your beats; an' if the Marquis or any o' them swells, as tips us, should take it into their heads to have a little inno'cent diversion with the bells or knockers in the Strand, you can just be going down a alley at the time, or looking into a area, or taking up a beggar—anythink so long as you don't see wot them noblemen is after."

This latter injunction was delivered in a whisper; and while policemen Bludgin and Buffit withdrew, to agree upon what they should say the next morning when they went before the magistrates as complainant and witness in this case, inspector Sunflers locked Mr. Pickwick up in a cell, telling him at the same time either to lie there all night or else go to a place where the heat rises to an inconvenient temperature. As he uttered these words, the inspector kindly bundled Mr. Pickwick into the dungeon, probably with a view of saving him the trouble of walking into it; and while the former returned to his comfortable fire, the latter seated himself upon a heap of straw, to endeavour to recover from the astonishment into which this rapid succession of events had thrown him.

For an aged gentleman to take the part of a young lady, get knocked down and then taken up by a policeman, and be condemned to pass the night in the station-house, was a vastly unpleasant adventure; and Mr. Pickwick could not help blaming his adverse stars—especially as an animal, which he shrewdly suspected to be a rat, ran across his legs at that moment.

"This is really very unpleasant—very unpleasant," said Mr. Pickwick to himself: "and those men seem inclined to swear to anything. They might say that I had robbed them;—and then not one of the spectators to come forward and speak in my favour! While I think of it, I pay a police-tax: well—upon my word, it's very pretty to pay policemen to knock you down, and then get locked up into the bargain! It is indeed a very unpleasant adventure—and that's a very annoying rat too! I wonder if they'd allow me a trap?"

Pleased with this idea, and not daring to compose himself to sleep while so strange a companion was running about the cell, Mr. Pickwick shouted out at the top of his very musical voice for the inspector; and the inspector condescended to open the door.

"What now?" growled that authority in a most discouraging tone of voice.

"I beg your pardon, sir," said Mr. Pickwick very mildly, and speaking in his blindest tones, "but would you oblige me so far as to lend me—"

"Well—lend you what? Fire away!" interrupted the inspector.

"Lend me a trap to catch a very troublesome rat which is hopping about me in all directions," added Mr. Pickwick, with a smile playing upon his expressive countenance, which was considerably begrimed with mud in consequence of his fall in the street.

"A what?" shouted the inspector, in a voice which might have been, and very probably was, heard half way down Bow-Street.

"A trap, if you please," repeated Mr. Pickwick.

The inspector banged the door with terrific violence; and as he locked it again, he muttered certain very audible imprecations against Mr. Pickwick's organs of sight, limbs, and circulating fluids; while that illustrious man threw himself upon the straw and the mercy of his good Genius simultaneously.

Mr. Pickwick has declared—and has even offered to make an affidavit of the truth of his assertion—that he did not sleep two winks the whole night: but whether he meant that he only made one wink of his whole slumber, or whether those sundry kicks and punches which the inspector inflicted upon his illustrious carcase the first thing in the morning were only the effects of spite, and were not done (as asserted) for the purpose of arousing him from his sleep and his straw, we cannot determine. Suffice it to say, that Mr.

Pickwick was permitted to wash the mud off his animated countenance, and even to procure the attentions of the barber by paying for the same, ere he was walked over to the police court opposite. It was half-past ten o'clock when he was ushered into the presence of the sitting magistrate, who however disposed of two cases before he attended to our hero.

A very elegantly dressed young man was standing near the bar, and a policeman was informing the magistrate how the young gentleman had been caught in the act of dashing his fist through a chemist's windows, and breaking a bottle filled with coloured water,—how he had cruelly assaulted the police, and nearly killed two of the constables, which was somewhat extraordinary, seeing that he was of slender make,—and how, in fine, when he was searched at the station-house, three knockers and five bell-pulls were found in his possession. The culprit had caused his name to be entered as Thomas Brown upon the police-sheet; but the accusing policeman expressed his conviction that that was only a fictitious appellation.

"This is a serious charge—a very serious charge," said the magistrate. "Two police-constables nearly killed—knockers and bell-pulls taken off in all directions—a window broken; really, I must punish you, sir, very severely."

The accused did not deign a reply, but hummed an opera-air. The magistrate was exasperated.

"Oh! you treat the matter so, do you?" exclaimed the magistrate: "well—I shall see if I can't make you more steady in future. The sentence is that you pay five pounds for each assault; and you are committed to the House of Correction for six weeks for wrenching off the knockers. Take him away."

"What!" ejaculated the culprit, who was astounded at this decision,—“commit a nobleman to prison!"

"A nobleman!" cried the magistrate. "Who are you, then?"

"Well—if you must know," was the reply, "I'm no more Thomas Brown than you are—nor yet half so much. In fact I don't look as if my name were Thomas Brown: I'd cut my throat if it were! No—my real name is Lord Edmund Theophilus Albert George Reginald Kutitphat."

"Oh! well—that's quite another thing—that alters the case," said the magistrate, now suffering his features to relax into a bland smile. "Really, my lord—I'm sorry to see your lordship in such a predicament as this—very sorry:—and how's your father, the Marquis of Kummitstrong?"

"Oh! the old dad's pretty well, I believe," was the indifferent reply.

"Well, my lord—I hope I shan't see you in this scrape again," continued the magistrate. "I am sure I have only to appeal to your lordship's good sense to persuade you not to continue these pranks:"—then turning to the policeman who had given evidence against the nobleman, the worthy magistrate exclaimed in a fierce tone, "Where are the two constables who were assaulted?"

"They're on duty, please yer washup," was the reply.

"Then how could you say that they were nearly killed?" said the magistrate, in deep indignation. "I see that you have committed wilful and corrupt perjury, constable; and I shall report the case to the Commissioners, so that you may be dismissed from the Force. My lord," he continued, assuming his mildest tone, "I shall dismiss this case, upon your paying five shillings for being—you know what I mean;" and the worthy magistrate laughed heartily.

Lord Kutitphat tossed a couple of half-crowns towards the clerk, nodded familiarly to the magistrate, and lounged out of the office, all the policemen touching their hats as he passed, while the magistrate exclaimed, "Open the door there for his lordship—do you hear!"

The moment Lord Kutitphat had disappeared, a short, thickset, shabby, ill-looking fellow, bearing a resemblance to something between a bankrupt pig-dealer and an insolvent prize-fighter, was swung up to the bar by three policemen, who seemed to vie with each other who should give him the hardest shove.

"What's the charge?" said the magistrate.

"Drunk and disorderly, please your worship," answered a constable.

"A desperate ruffian, I dare say," observed the worthy magistrate, putting on an awful frown. "Did he make any resistance?"

"Kicked and bit horribly, your worship."

"Well, what have you got to say for yourself?" demanded the magistrate.

"Please your worship," replied the man, pulling his hair with his right hand, and kicking back his left leg, by way of salutation, "I was a running-up Common Garden Market with my little Neddy—"

"Your son, I suppose," said the magistrate, gruffly.

"No, your worship,—my donkey I means—an' a nice little feller he is—trots as easy as a four-year-old, and no way vicious. He'd carry your worship ten mile or so afore your worship could know where you was."

"That's enough," said the magistrate. "You were drunk, you see—and disorderly—and you resisted the police. I can't pass this over. Has he ever been here before?"

"Never, your worship," replied the gaoler, who was standing near the door of the court.

"Oh! it's all the same. You're fined five shillings or stand committed for six weeks to the House of Correction."

"Stand down!" shouted an officer.

"Please your worship, I han't got the money," began the man, in a pitiful tone; an' if so be you sends me to the House of Correction, my wife and seven little uns 'll all have to go to the workus."

"Clear the court!" cried the worthy magistrate.

"Stand down!" shouted the officer aforesaid.

"Take him away!" chimed in the clerk; and the poor fellow was dragged off to the House of Correction, leaving a wife and family to starve, while Lord Kutitphat was already meditating another crusade against the knockers and bell-pulls for the ensuing evening, confident of being able to escape all punishment save a small fine, which he was well able to pay.

Mr. Pickwick, who had stood a wondering spectator of these proceedings, was introduced to the notice of the worthy magistrate. The general appearance of Mr. Pickwick—his low-crowned and broad-brimmed hat—his interesting round countenance—his spectacles—his brown coat with brass buttons—his white waistcoat—his eye-glass appended to a black riband his buff kerseymere tights—his little black gaiters—and his sixty summers—made a deep impression on the worthy magistrate, who exchanged a smile with the clerk, who exchanged another with the officer, who bestowed one in his turn upon the accusing constables, who grinned and looked very wise.

"What's the charge?" demanded the magistrate, as soon as the usual questions relative to name, age, habitation, &c. had been disposed of.

"I was walking very quietly along my beat between Wellington-street and Johns-treet Adelphi, last night, your worship," began policeman John Bludgin, "when a young gal came by and began a-calling me all the names she could think on. She was very drunk, your worship; and I was going to take her to the station, out o' mere kindness, when up comes this here man which is at the bar, an' without sayin' with your leave, or by your leave, hits me such a stunner on the right eye, as made me see fifty thousand lamps up the Strand in a twinkling. I was a-goin' to remonstrate with him very kindly, your worship, when he gave me another whack on t'other eye; an' so I called for assistance, an' took him to the station."

The policeman certainly shewed a tremendous black eye; but it had been caused by a blow with a pewter-pot, in an alehouse which he suffered the landlord to keep open till two in the morning, on consideration of receiving as much liquor as he could drink.

"Please your worship," said policeman Buffit, who was now brought forward, "I heard the complainant calling for assistance, and immediately left my beat to see what was the matter. When I came up to the spot I found the prisoner a aimin' sich a blow at the complainant's hie, that I wonder it didn't knock it out on the pavement. A more desperate ruffian I never seed."

"Well, what have you to say to this?" asked the magistrate.

Mr. Pickwick took off his spectacles, wiped them and put them on again. He then flung up his right arm in the air, put his left hand beneath his coat tails and commenced a fine and luminous harangue, while the magistrate read The Times. Somehow or other, magistrates always pay great attention to complainants when they are policemen; but generally have something else to do when the defendants enter upon their justification. Mr. Pickwick darted glances at the magistrate, each of which conveyed the meaning of a whole encyclopædia, and talked as much as would (if properly spun out) have furnished materials for three volumes octavo. All this display, however, produced but little effect upon the magistrate, who was about to condemn our unfortunate hero to some severe penalty, when a sudden change was introduced into the proceedings.

A young gentleman of about four-and-twenty, tolerably good-looking, pretty well dressed, and neither very genteel nor very awkward in manners, rushed into the police office just as the magistrate's mouth was opened to deliver the decision. This young gentleman, after having trodden upon the gaoler's toe, nearly knocked down an old woman, and totally deranged the equilibrium of a police-constable, succeeded in clearing his way up to the presence of the magistrate, to whom he declared he had something important to communicate. After a little parley, the newcomer succeeded in ascertaining that the very case in which he was interested was before the bench at that moment; and, when he had recovered a fresh supply of breath, he spoke as follows:

"Your worship, my name is Sago—Francis Sago—and I am the son of a respectable wholesale grocer in Wood-street, Cheapside. Last evening I accompanied my sister, Teresina Hippolyta, to the Adelphi Theatre; and, by some accident or another, we were separated in the crowd. She was carried by the multitude into the street, where she was dreadfully insulted by a policeman, whom, by the description she gave, I can instantly recognise in the person of this individual (pointing to Bludgin); and when a gentleman came up to her rescue, this policeman instantly knocked the gentleman down without the slightest provocation. My sister made her escape at that moment and obtained a cab, and returned home. She would have attended in person, but the fright has made her quite ill. She has, however, signed this deposition, which I drew up in writing to her dictation."

The magistrate now began to understand the real merits of the case; and, after a considerable deal of cross-examination, he succeeded in convicting the two policemen of such extraordinary contradictions that Mr. Pickwick came off triumphant. He was discharged, and policemen Bludgin and Buffit were shortly afterwards dismissed the Force; whereupon they took to the honourable and profitable trade of thimble-rigging, which they had carried on before they had entered the service of the new police.

THE SOLILOQUY OF A TOWN-PUMP.

NOON, by the clock! High noon, too, by these hot sunbeams, which fall, scarcely aslope, upon my head, and almost make the water bubble and smoke in the trough under my nose. Truly, we public characters have a tough time of it! And, among all the town officers, where is he that sustains, for a single year, the burthen of such manifold duties as are imposed, in perpetuity, upon the Town-Pump? The title of "town-treasurer" is rightfully mine, as guardian of the best treasure that the town has. The overseers of the poor ought to make me their chairman, since I provide bountifully for the pauper, without expense to him that pays taxes. I am at the head of the fire department, and one of the physicians to the board of health. As a keeper of the peace, all water-drinkers will confess me equal to the constable. I perform some of the duties of the town-clerk, by promulgating public notices when they are posted on my front. To speak within bounds, I am the chief person of the municipality, and exhibit, moreover, an admirable pattern to my brother officers, by the cool, steady, upright, downright, and impartial discharge of my business, and the constancy with which I stand to my post. Summer or winter, nobody weaks me in vain; for, all day long, I am seen at the busiest corner, just above the market, stretching out my arms, to rich and poor alike; and at night, I hold a lantern over my head, both to show where I am, and keep people out of the gutters.

At this sultry noontide, I am cupbearer to the parched populace, for whose benefit an iron goblet is chained to my waist. I cry aloud to all and sundry in my plainest accents, and at the very tiptop of my voice. "Here it is, gentlemen! Here is the good liquor! Walk up, walk up, gentlemen, walk up, walk up! Here is the superior stuff! Here is the unadulterated ale of father Adam—better than Cognac, Hollands, Jamaica, strong beer, or wine of any price; here it is, by the hogshead or the single glass, and not a farthing to pay! Walk up, gentlemen, walk up, and help yourselves!"

It were a pity, if this eatery should draw no customers. Here they come. A hot day, gentlemen! Quaff, and away again, so as to keep yourselves in a nice cool sweat. You, my friend, will need another cupful, to wash the dust out of your throat, if it be as thick there as it is on your cowhide shoes. I see that you have trudged half a score of miles to-day; and, like a wise man, have passed by the taverns, and stopped at the running brooks and well-heads. Otherwise, betwixt heat without and fire within, you would have been burnt to a cinder, or melted down to nothing at all, in the fashion of a jelly-fish. Drink, and make room for that other fellow, who seeks my aid to quench the fiery fever of last night's potations, which he drained from no cup of mine. Welcome, most rubicund sir! You and I have been great strangers hitherto; nor, to confess the truth, will my nose be anxious for a closer intimacy till the fumes of your breath be a little less potent. Mercy on you, man! The water absolutely hisses down your red-hot gullet, and is converted quite to steam, in the miniature tophet, which you mistake for a stomach. Fill again, and tell me, on the word of an honest toper, did you ever, in cellar, tavern, or any kind of a dram-shop, spend the price of your children's food, for a swig half so delicious? Now, for the first time these ten years, you know the flavour of cold water. Good by; and, whenever you are thirsty, remember that I keep a constant supply, at the old stand. Who next? Oh, my little friend, you are let loose from school, and come hither to scrub your blooming face, and drown the memory of certain taps of the ferule, and other school-boy troubles, in a draught from the Town-Pump. Take it, pure as the current of your young life. Take it, and may your heart and tongue never be scorched with a fiercer thirst than now! There, my dear child, put down the cup, and yield your place to this elderly gentleman, who treads so tenderly over the paving-stones that I suspect he is afraid of breaking them. What! he limps by, without so much as thanking me, as if my hospitable offers were meant only for people who have no wine-cellars. Well, well, sir—no harm done, I hope! Go draw the cork, tip the decanter; but, when your great toe shall set you a-roaring, it will be no affair of mine. If gentlemen love the pleasant titillation of the gout, it is all one to the Town-Pump. This thirsty dog, with his red tongue lolling out, does not scorn my hospitality, but stands on his hind legs, and laps eagerly out of the trough. See how lightly he capers away again! Jowler, did your worship ever have the gout?

But I perceive, my dear auditors, that you are impatient for the remainder of my discourse. Impute it, I beseech you, to no defect of modesty, if I insist a little longer on so fruitful a topic as my own multifarious merits. It is altogether for your good. The better you think of me, the better men and women will you find yourselves. I shall say nothing of my all-important aid on washing-days; though, on that account alone, I might call myself the household god of a hundred families. Far be it from me, also, to hint, my respectable friends, at the show of dirty faces, which you would present without my pains to keep you clean. Nor will I remind you how often, when the midnight bells make you tremble for your combustible town, you have fled to the Town Pump, and found me always at my post, firm amid the confusion, and ready to drain my vital current in your behalf. Neither is it worth while to lay much stress on my claims to a medical diploma, as the physician, whose simple rule of practice is preferable to all the nauseous lore which has found men sick or left them so since the days of Hippocrates. Let us take a broader view of my beneficial influence on mankind.

No; these are trifles compared with the merits which wise men concede to me—if not in my single self, yet as the representative of a class—of being the grand reformer of the age. From my spout, and such spouts as mine, must flow the stream that shall cleanse our earth of the vast portion of its crime and anguish which has gushed from the fiery fountains of the still. In this mighty enterprise, the cow shall be my great confederate. Milk and water! The Town-Pump and the Cow! Such is the glorious co-partnership that shall tear down the distilleries and brewhouses, uproot the vineyards, shatter the elder-presses, and finally monopolize the whole business of quenching thirst. Blessed consummation! Then Poverty shall pass away from the land, finding no hole to wretched where her squalid form may shelter itself. Then Disease, for lack of other victims, shall gnaw its own heart, and die. Then Sin, if she do not die, shall lose half her strength. Until now, the phreasy of hereditary fever has raged in the human blood, transmitted from sire to son, and re-kindled, in every generation, by fresh draughts of liquid flame. When that inward fire shall be extinguished, the heat of passion cannot but grow cool, and war—the drunkenness of nations—perhaps will cease. At least, there will be no war of households. The husband and wife, drinking deep of peaceful joy—a calm bliss of temperate affections—shall pass hand in hand through life, and lie down, not reluctantly, at its protracted close. To them, the past will be no turmoil of mad dreams, nor the future an eternity of such moments as follow the delirium of the drunkard. Their dead faces shall express what their optics were, and are to be, by a lingering smile of memory and hope.

Ahem! Dry work, this speechifying; especially to an unpractised orator. I never conceived, till now, what toil the temperance-lecturers undergo for my sake. Hereafter, they shall have the business to themselves. Do, some kind Christian, pump a stroke or two, just to wet my whistle. Thank you, sir! My dear hearers, when the world shall have been regenerated by my instrumentality, you will collect your useless vats and liquor casks into one great pile, and make a bonfire in honour of the Town-Pump. And when I shall have decayed, like my predecessors, then, if you reverence my memory, let a marble fountain, richly sculptured, take my place upon this spot. Such monuments should be erected everywhere, and inscribed with the names of distinguished champions of my cause. Now listen; for something very important is to come next.

There are two or three honest friends of mine—and true friends I know they are—who, nevertheless, by their fiery pugnacity in my behalf, do put me in fearful hazard of a broken nose, or even of a total overthrow upon the pavement, and the loss of the treasure which I guard. I pray you, gentlemen, let this fault be amended. Is it decent, think you, to get tipsy with zeal for temperance, and take up the honourable cause of the Town-Pump, in the style of a toper, fighting for his brandy-bottle? Or, can the excellent qualities of cold water be no otherwise exemplified than by plunging, slapdash, into hot water, and wofully scalding yourselves and other people? Trust me, they may. In the moral warfare which you are to wage—and, indeed, in the whole conduct of your lives—you cannot choose a better example than myself, who have never permitted the dust and sultry atmosphere, the turbulence and manifold disquietudes of the world around me, to reach that deep, calm well of purity, which may be called my soul. And whenever I pour out that soul, it is to cool earth's fever, or cleanse its stains.

One o'clock! Nay, then, if the dinner-bell begins to speak, I may as well hold my peace. Here comes a pretty young girl of my acquaintance, with a large stone pitcher for me to fill. May she draw a husband, while drawing her water, as Rachel did of old. Hold out your vessel, my dear! There it is, full to the brim; so now run home, peeping at your sweet image in the pitcher, as you go; and forget not, in a glass of my own liquor, to drink—"SUCCESS TO THE TOWN-PUMP!"

THE PLAGUE.

Of all diseases, the remembrance of which has been preserved to us by history, the Black Pestilence of the fourteenth century is that which caused the greatest ravages. From documents furnished by Professor Hecker, it appears that the Black Pestilence was in fact the plague of the east, but with some additional features. Besides the swelling under the arm-pits and groin, and the gangrenous tumours which characterise the plague, numerous black spots were observed over the whole surface of the body: the palate and tongue were black, and, as it were, filled with blood; and the patients were tormented with insatiable thirst. But the most distinguishing and aggravated feature of the Black Pestilence was the thorough alteration experienced by the lungs. These organs were struck with a gangrenous inflammation, which was indicated by acute pains in the chest, spitting of blood, and such an infestation of the breath, that parents even fled from their children. The disorder was communicated not only by contact with infected patients, but also by touching any thing which had belonged to them.

The Black Pestilence, originated in Upper Asia, descended towards the Caucasus and Mediterranean Sea; and, instead of entering Europe by way of Russia, it first spread in the south, and after devastating the rest of Europe, it entered that country. It followed the caravans which came from China across Central Asia, until it reached the shores of the Black Sea: there it was conveyed by ships to Constantinople; the centre of commercial intercourse between Asia, Europe, and Africa. That capital was certainly the focus whence the pestilence darted its poisonous rays in every direction, except towards Muscovy. In the year 1347 it reached Sicily, some of the maritime cities of Italy and Marseilles. In the following year it spread from the European shores of the Mediterranean into the interior of the continent. The northern parts of Italy, France, Germany, and England, were invaded by it in the same year: the northern kingdoms of Europe, in 1349, and finally Russia in 1351, that is to say, four years after it reached Constantinople.

In France the pestilence advanced by way of Avignon, at that time the seat of the Papacy. It broke out there in a frightful manner, many persons fell down suddenly, as if they had been struck by a thunderbolt. The patients rarely reached the third day: as soon as any one found himself afflicted with tumour, either in the groin or beneath the arms, he bade adieu to this world, and sought consolation only in the absolution granted to all the dying by Pope Clement VI.

In England, the disorder was characterised, as it had been at Avignon, by an almost sudden mortality, consequent on the spitting of blood. The patients, who exhibited this symptom, sank under the pestilence in twelve hours, and rarely survived to the second day. The mortality spread rapidly throughout the country, and covered it with the dead. On the north seas, as previously on the Mediterranean, vessels were seen floating at the pleasure of the wind deprived of their crews, and carrying only corpses. The following estimates, which may be relied on as pretty correct, will give an idea of the losses sustained by the population of Europe at that time:—viz, Florence, 60,000 inhabitants; Vienna, 100,000; Marseilles (in one month) 58,000; Paris, 50,000; Avignon, 60,000; Strasburg, 16,000; Basle, 14,000; Erfurth, 16,000; London, 100,000; Norwich, 50,000. About 200,000 country towns or villages were completely depopulated. At Paris, 500 patients died, upon an average every day, at the Hotel Dieu. Italy lost at least one half of her inhabitants. At Cairo, during the height of the pestilence, 10,000 or 12,000 died daily. In Mahomedan countries, in the great roads, and in the caravanserais, nothing was seen but deserted corpses.

The Black Pestilence was attributed to some dreadful commotions in the interior parts of the globe. The following are some of the remarkable circumstances which have been collected from the history of that time: About the year 1333, numerous earthquakes and volcanic eruptions did much mischief in Upper Asia, also, in the year after successively in Greece, Italy, France, and Germany. To these convulsions of the earth were added extraordinary inundations, which drowned the harvests and loaded the atmosphere with moisture. These were succeeded by barren years, scarcity, famine and great mortality. Clouds of locusts invaded the plains of Europe, and covered them with their dead bodies, which poisoned the air with putrid exhalations. And lastly, dense mists, emitting a disagreeable smell, spread over whole countries, in consequence of which the inhabitants were exposed to various accidents.

The faculty of Paris, upon being consulted whether facts like these would account for the deadly malady which shortly after manifested itself, assigned a mist or fog as the cause of the evil, and recommended the lighting of fires with aromatic plants. A learned man of Padua attributed the pest to an occult quality of the atmosphere. A physician at Avignon ascribed it (as some medical men in France in our day have done) to influences arising from the earth. In short, they knew at that time nearly as much as we do now concerning the real causes of the great pestilence, and many doctors endeavoured to account for them by having recourse to astrology.

Nothing is more afflicting than the details which have been transmitted to us of the moral effects produced by the Black Pestilence upon the generation who witnessed it. There doubtless were some happy exceptions: but, amongst the majority, this scourge called forth a manifestation of selfishness, frequently the most revolting, together with superstitious practices and fanatical excesses. Then, as we have since witnessed in France, the people began by ascribing to poison the almost sudden deaths which they witnessed. The fanaticism of that age directed their suspicion against the Jews, who were the objects of general hatred, and whose riches moreover excited the cupidity of their enemies. Europe then presented one of the most frightful spectacles that can be conceived. The hapless Jews were seized, tortured, condemned, and burnt: in most cases the people did not wait for a judicial sentence, but they themselves massacred the Israelites. They were heaped up by thousands in vast funeral piles. At Mayence, after a vain attempt at resistance, they shut themselves up in their quarters, to which they set fire, and twelve thousand perished. Pursued by the people, by the magistrates who ought to have protected them, and by the feudal lords, these miserable strangers found no asylum but in Lithuania, where Casimir the Great granted them protection.

The disease also extended its frightful ravages to Ireland; and the following account of it is taken from the annals of a Franciscan monk of that period:—

"This year, and chiefly in the months of September and October, great numbers of bishops and prelates, ecclesiastical and religious, peers and others, and in general people of both sexes, flocked together by troops, in pilgrimage to the waters of Inchmoling, inasmuch that many thousands of souls might be seen there together for many days: some came on the score of devotion, but the greater part for fear of the pestilence. It had its first beginning, so it is said, in the East, and, passing through the Saracens and Infidels, slew eight thousand legions of them."

The author of this chronicle himself died of the plague. Amongst the manuscripts of Sir Hans Sloane preserved in the British Museum, is one entitled—"Anomysopatia, an Experimental Relation of the Plague, principally as it appeared in 1665, by William Boghurst, Apothecary in St. Giles's in the Fields." Speaking of the tokens of the plague, the writer says,—"Amongst these were spots of different colours, biccoughs, vomiting, carbuncles, shortness of breath, drowsiness, thirstiness, contraction of the jaws, and large and extended tumours. Almost all that caught the disease with fear, died with tokens in two or three days. About the beginning, most men got the disease with surfeiting, over-heating themselves, and drinking strong drinks. Children, who were properly fed, and whose drink was only milk or water, were not visited by the plague. Those that married in the heat of this disease (if they had not had it before) almost all fell into it in a week or a fortnight after both in city and town and country, of which most died, especially the men. Pregnant females fared miserably. Strength of constitution was no safety: death made the strongest assault upon strong bodies. More men died than women; and more of dull complexions than fair. In the summer before the plague, in 1664, there was such a multitude of flies that they lined the insides of the houses. Also the small-pox was so rife in our parish, that betwixt the church and the pond in St. Giles's, which is not above six score paces, above forty families had the small-pox.

"Many persons after drinking some strong drink, presently had the tokens come out; so that every nurse could say that cochineal was a fine thing to bring out the tokens. Those that died of the plague, died a very easy death generally: first, because it was speedy; secondly, because they died without convulsions. One friend growing melancholy for another was one main cause of its going through a family, especially when they were shut up, which bred a sad apprehension and consternation on their spirits. Many women giving suck freed themselves from the plague by their children sucking it from them; but some continued well some days—sometimes weeks—and then fell into the disease after their children were dead. The plague was half a year at the West End before the East End and Stepney were infected, which was about the middle of July. Southwark, being the south suburb, was infected almost as soon as the West End."

The author states himself to have been bold and courageous in the exercise of his profession during the plague. He says he rendered himself familiar with the disease, knowing that to do good he must be neither nice nor fearful. He says he "dressed forty sores a day, and held the pulses of some patients sweating in the bed half an hour together, commonly suffered their breathing in his face several times when they were dying, and ate and drank with them; sat down by their bedside and upon their beds, discoursing with them an hour together when he had time, and staid by them to see them die, and the manner of their death, and closed up their mouths and eyes,—and, then, if people had nobody to help them (for help was scarce at that time and place), he helped to lay them forth out of the bed, and afterwards into the coffin, and last of all accompanied them to the grave."

The cure of the plague was formerly supposed to be a desperate attempt. We now know that though a dangerous disease, it is more often conquered than victorious; nor is there the slightest doubt, but, if it should ever be again introduced into this kingdom, that it would but excite little alarm. There are many epidemics which have been for a time more fatal than plague would probably be in the present state of society with judicious political regulations. The following formula for the cure of the plague is translated from the Arabic language:—

"In the name of the compassionate and merciful God. All good comes from God; and his creatures have no other power than that which was granted them by the Most High. Thanks to his mercy, the children of Adam have found great benefit from the use of oil, not only as a drink, as wherewith to anoint and purify themselves, but, independent of these three uses, God has assigned a fourth property to the same in behalf of those attacked with plague. From the first moment of the setting in of the complaint, the patient should drink a certain quantity of oil, as much as he possibly can, five or six ukhia (ounces) at least. All he drinks above this quantity will but do him good. After having drunk this oil, he is to anoint the whole body with tepid oil: he is then to lie down in bed, where he is to cover himself well up in such a manner as to procure a profuse perspiration, for the perspiration is the sure harbinger of tranquillity. After this treatment, the patient will experience more and more relief, with the help of the most High God. Health and power (in every thing) are in the hands of God; there is no other than he!"

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE FORSAKEN.

By Mrs. S. Miles.

As rapidly the maiden's wheel
With murmuring hum goes round,
Oft languidly her blue eyes steal
A wistful glance around.

"Why tarries he? The poplars cast
Deep shadows o'er the dell:
The promised hour is come, and past—
Fray heav'n, my love is well!"

Dim is her eye—that cheek no more
With healthful current glows—
Can e'er joy's radiant beams restore—
Refresh the faded rose?

Ah! ne'er again upon that heart
Shall hope's sweet balm descend;
A victim to the wiler's art,
Her fairy visions end.

A hurried note—a blotted scroll
The fatal truth conveys;
A dark cloud gathers o'er her soul,
And grief usurps her days.

And he—the false one—heedeth not
The blow so harshly dealt;
His fervent vows are all forgot—
Her silent wrongs unsift!

But yet shall come a torturing hour,
When, conscience-stricken, pale—
Her tears shall fall for that sweet flower,
Which perished in the vale!

STANZAS.

By Mrs. Reynolds.

God has decreed that man shall fall! Alas,
He's born—he's dead! His life's to-day begun,
Tomorrow all his youthful pleasures pass,
And evening marks his fleeting sojourn done.
Others shall use the riches we have won,
Others shall riot in our palaces:
As insects, they shall glitter in the sun,
And each successive age their wealth shall seize,
Until the world shall end, and men relinquish thee!

In peril we were born—in danger die:
We run our course, and revel in our pride!
We seldom glance unto eternity,
But imitate the ways of them that died.
In years before—and thus are we befriended—
As smoking piles give warning of their fire,
So does the opening of our youth decide
What Muse, what talents shall our hearts inspire,
And as our lame increases, so we sour the higher.

Go mark the lordly monuments within
The proudest abbey! There resides the clay
Of those who perish'd in their course of sin:
And oft, with trembling limbs and locks of gray,
Many a pious one will humbly pray
For their repose, and tell the deeds were done
While he himself, ere they had pass'd away—
The deeds that gain'd or that disgrac'd a throne,—
And as each parent tells, admonishes his son:—

"Vice never prospers! Virtue is repaid
In heav'n, if men resent it here below:
The humble by the proud are oft betray'd,
The righteous and the good are oft brought low:—
But God will not desert his chosen so:
For they shall rise triumphant to the skies,
They who can pardon and receive a foe,
They who can heal a neighbour's miseries,
And wipe the sympathetic tear-drop from their eyes!"

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 23rd, 1841.

The necessity of union amongst the Teetotalers of Great Britain becomes every day more apparent. We have before observed, in the columns of The Teetotaler, that a number of disjointed efforts are not calculated to produce the same beneficial and speedy results as "a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether." A considerable portion of the valuable time devoted to Teetotal meetings, is wasted in declamation on the part of the advocates of one Association against the transactions of another; and thus the grand principle of Total Abstinence from all intoxicating liquors is sacrificed to a miserable party-feeling, which paralyses the energies of the really well-intentioned and disinterested disciples of the cause. The Teetotaler, from its commencement, has boldly and unflinchingly exposed abuses where abuses exist; and to its honesty and fearlessness of opinion may be partially attributed the immense circulation which it enjoys. The wickedness of encouraging either by word or deed those dissensions which agitate the Teetotal world, is a subject to which we shall in future pay especial attention; and we now earnestly call upon all the friends of the Teetotal cause to adopt speedy and effectual measures to unite all the Teetotalers in one great Society. By these means the expenses of numerous officers would be greatly diminished; as, instead of having, for instance, a separate Secretary for each Association, as at present constituted, one would suffice for the whole body, if united.

In order to accomplish the great aim of union, one measure is indispensable as a basis to work upon; and that is the admission of all pledges (so long as their principle involve the doctrine of entire abstinence from all alcoholic liquors). Each Association, Auxiliary, and Branch, in and about the metropolis should forthwith appoint Delegates to meet together, for the purpose of considering and digesting a scheme of union; and this preliminary congress of Delegates would prepare the way for a general meeting of Teetotalers of all pledges and societies at Exeter Hall, to confirm and establish one grand United Association. Those journals which are at present exclusive organs would then become advocates of the principle of Teetotalism upon a broad and liberal basis, and sectarian disputes would be avoided.

The word Union implies strength; and most assuredly would the cause of Teetotalism receive considerable accession of strength from the mere circumstance of a junction of those energies which are at present disjointed. It is preposterous to quarrel and dispute about the various pledges—long and short—English and American—now in use: the fundamental principle of Teetotalism is the abstinence from intoxicating liquor; and each new convert should be allowed to consult his own interests, circumstances, and judgment, as to whether he will adopt this principle in a merely personal, or in a general point of view. The details of institutions should never be suffered to occupy the attention to such an extent that the fundamental principle is lost sight of: it should be the object of the advocates of Teetotalism to rescue men from the vortex of intemperance, and then proceed to fresh conversions without losing time on the road in the discussion of the merits of particular pledges.

We have reason to believe that provincial Teetotal societies are managed much better than the metropolitan ones; and that the conduct of some of the latter have greatly disgusted the members of the former. Every real friend to the Teetotal cause, in the country, is fully aware of the necessity of co-operation in all parts and quarters; and in certain districts, grand efforts are progressing in favour of union. A reference to history will teach us the necessity of union—especially ecclesiastical and religious history. The division of the Mahomedan creed into two sects—the Shiis and Sunnis—dealt a more severe blow to the progress of Islamism than all the crusades of the Christians could ever effect; and to that discrepancy of opinion might be traced nearly all the sanguinary wars which for upwards of four centuries have, with short intervals, raged between the Ottomans and Persians. The division of the Christian Church into sects has produced similar results; and the fate of empires has been decided by the consolidation or the disunion of their powers and resources. These facts should be constantly held up to the consideration of all Teetotalers; and simultaneously with the doctrine itself, should be agitated the principle of union.

The cause of Teetotalism has also suffered materially from being encumbered with many forms and qualifications with which, in reality, it ought not to be connected. Teetotalism has been so associated with religion, that it has been rendered almost exclusive on this account. Now, what in the name of common sense has Teetotalism to do with religion, more than any other great doctrine of social and moral reformation? Were a Chinese or a Mussulman to come forward and offer to sign the pledge, should his religious opinions disqualify him to become a member of an Association whose principle should be simply Total Abstinence from all Intoxicating Liquors? We are no friends to the infamous doctrines of Socialism; at the same time, we should be sorry to see the portals of Teetotal temples closed against the Socialists. The objects of the advocates of Teetotalism are to redeem the world from an evil and demoralizing habit; and, in adopting the necessary measures to do so, no questions of sectarian, political, or philosophical opinions should be allowed to interfere. Teetotalism should seek converts amongst the infidels, as well as amongst the felons in Newgate: it will then pave the way towards bringing the former to a sense of religion, and the latter into the paths of rectitude. Teetotalism will lead to the better observance of religious duties; but Teetotalism and Religion should not be considered as inseparable subjects, in the lectures or writings of the advocates of the former cause.

We gave great umbrage to some of our readers because we published a portion of the Address to the Chartists, calling upon this political party to adopt the pledge of Teetotalism. We however took a more enlightened and liberal view of the subject, and hailed the conversion of the Chartists to the doctrine as a new and signal instance of its triumph. What care we whether the disciples of Teetotalism be Whigs, Tories, Radicals, Carlites, or Chartists? Shall we take upon ourselves to judge between political sects, while we are agitating a great moral question, to the furtherance of which we require the co-operation of all sects? Shall we presume to undertake the conversion of one portion of the community, and not of another? And is an individual who comes forward to sign the pledge to be subjected to a cross-examination relative to religious and political opinions? Banish the idea, and act with more liberality! Religion has its specific meaning, attributes, and advocates: Politics have their specific meaning, attributes, and advocates; and Teetotalism is similarly situated. Each man must necessarily entertain some shade of opinion in respect to all three; but the advocates of one have no right to question him relative to his sentiments with respect to the others. Let our readers attentively peruse the following beautiful passage:—

"There are few, we will venture to assert, who have disinterestedly, and with judicious discrimination, investigated the cause, nature, and extent of the privations which prevail among the working classes, but have perceived the pernicious effects of the use of inebriating drinks on their physical, moral, and political well-being. It is, however, but a circumscribed amount of the evils which the intoxicating cup produces that comes under our individual observation, and, therefore, we have felt more indifferent at its ravages on society; but, could we bring vividly before us the ruin it has wrought in our deluded and unhappy country—could we calculate the power that it has given to our oppressors—the imbecility that it has communicated to the people—the mental energies, the virtue, usefulness, and talent that it has withered or annihilated;—the thousands and tens of thousands that it has beggared, and the hospitals and jails that it has peopled with the victims of disease and crime, we would contemplate with intense feelings of horror and vexation its blighting influence, and never rest until we had banished from our own ranks this deadly enemy of our happiness."

Are not these ideas worthy of any journal which issues from the Teetotal press? And yet, will the reader believe whence the paragraph is extracted? We will tell him:—from the Chartist Circular! It is therefore evident that sound Teetotal doctrines can be advocated by papers and by men of all shades of political opinions—and advocated with success.

Our object, in penning this article, is to agitate the question of union, and to impress upon our readers the necessity of advocating the cause of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, in a manner as free from association with other opinions as possible. It is our object to obtain converts to a doctrine calculated to banish the evil of intemperance from the land; and if we wish to extend our philanthropic views to all the inhabitants of the United Kingdom, how can we possibly inculcate the principle under conditions which, in many instances, would amount to exclusiveness?

FRENCH CHARACTERS CARICATURED.

NO. IV.—THE MERCHANT.

"Gold is a Chimera," M. Scribe said so,—and M. Scribe knows all about the matter. This maxim, so entirely new, has made the fortune of a great number of merchants in the good city of Paris; and amongst a considerable portion of these gentry, when any one presents himself in their counting-houses to receive payment of a bill, he is very likely to learn that silver is a chimera also.

While the subject of this memoir was in business, he never refused to pay any bills or promissary notes to which he had affixed his name, or which were drawn upon him; but he had adopted a system of extreme punctuality. The bearer of an order upon him for money was always expected to present it at the counting-house, when the aforesaid counting-house was open: otherwise payment was postponed until another day. The merchant was essentially a man of extremely regular habits, and punctuality formed the basis of all his dealings.

He had pushed this regularity to such an extent, that his counting-house was opened not only at a certain hour, but also on one particular day in the week. This regulation referred to those who came to receive money; for if, by any accident, an individual came to pay any, the merchant was too humane and too kind-hearted to let a poor boy or porter, with a large bag over his shoulder, run about for nothing. The merchant treated bags of money in the same way as the Arabs of the desert treat strangers, he offered them the most cordial hospitality, and invariably detained them as long as possible. We must admit that the merchant was right; for a boy with a large bag of five franc-pieces upon his shoulder is at all events as estimable a character, and deserves as much consideration, as a camel of an Arabian caravan.

The merchant was endowed with the most extraordinary presence of mind; and with this weapon of defence he saw the days of payment come round with the most wonderful calmness imaginable. He would walk up and down his counting-house, on these occasions, with his hands (and nothing else) in his pockets, and sing a song, to which he beat time with his feet as he paced the office.

When the bearer of a bill knocked at the door, the merchant exclaimed "Come in!" in a tone of voice the cadence of which varied according to the song he was singing at the moment, and then he would continue his stave, in imitation of the nightingale that has not the smallest bill to pay, and does not fear protests.

The bearer of the bill waits until the merchant has finished his song, which probably lasts three minutes more, presents his certain little suspicious-looking piece of paper, and the merchant, after having cast a very careless glance over it, exclaims, "What is that you've got there—eh?"

"What is it?" ejaculated the creditor, "why a little bill which has now been overdue for upwards of six months!"

"And you have come to receive your money on a Friday!" ejaculated the merchant. "Well, now, upon my word, my dear sir, you have very little memory,—or rather you have none at all. Your head is certainly turned!"

"Really, sir, I do not see what my head has to do with my bill," says the creditor.

"You don't see—eh? Why—don't you see that our firm never pays anything on a Friday—and that the counting-house is only opened for that purpose on a Saturday?"

"And that is the very reason why I am come now," returns the bearer of the bill: "to day is Saturday! I am really surprised at you! You say that you only pay on a Saturday, and here I have been twenty-six Saturdays running to receive this money—this paltry sum of nine francs ten sous, which I have never succeeded in getting yet."

"You always came too early," returns the merchant, "the counting-house opens at three o'clock."

"Well it is half-past three now; and therefore I could not be here at a more favourable moment!"

"Oh! but the counting-house closes at three precisely!" ejaculated the merchant. "I am really very sorry, sir—but it is not my fault,—you must be exact! Come at the proper time—we can't be at your beck and call at all hours, you know. When in the world should we get through any business at all, if every one came to receive his money just at the time it suited him best!"

"What, for nine francs ten sous—nine miserable francs," remonstrates the creditor, "you will make me come a twenty-eighth time to you? Upon my word, this is very reasonable!"

"My dear sir," says the merchant, "it is not for the sake of the nine francs ten sous that I make you come back again,—it is merely for the principle! The principle of my business is punctuality—punctuality guides all my actions! Be here next Saturday at three o'clock precisely, and you will get your money; and I wish you may get it too! You cannot suppose that I am not possessed of nine francs ten sous;—that is not the reason why I do not pay you to day! No—no;—if you were to ask me for fifty thousand francs, instead of nine, it would be all the same!"

"But you must remember that I live at the extremity of the Faubourg Saint Jacques; and that it is five miles from your office to my house. I have already taken the omnibus several times when I have called here for my money, because I have no other business in this neighbourhood; and those rides in the omnibus already amount to six francs; so that I have spent upwards of half the sum in merely coming to ask for it!"

"Well, then, my dear sir," returns the merchant, "if it is so expensive to you to come for your money—don't come again—that will be the best plan! But if you persist in calling any more, be punctual, on Saturday next, at three o'clock. Remember the counting-house opens at three precisely!"

"And closes also at three precisely, it appears," murmurs the unfortunate creditor, retreating from the office in despair.

NO. V.—THE ARTIST.

We one day made a calculation of all the portraits which are annually painted in Paris, or designed in chalk, pencil, or water-colours; and we reckoned the whole amount to be no less than thirty thousand. Of these about ten thousand bear not the slightest resemblance to the originals whom they pretend to represent. Of these ten thousand physiognomies, sketched after originals more or less known, our artist claims at least a fifth. He is one of the most desperate speculators in this art.

Long before he could even sketch the outline of a nose, he undertook to paint portraits! And portraits constituted the coin which he reckoned upon putting into general circulation. Portraits, in a word, were the alpha and omega of his thoughts and actions.

If he were engaged in striking a bargain, he would say, "My dear fellow, my fortune does not allow me to recompense you in a pecuniary point of view; but my talents permit me to liquidate the debt artistically. In other words, I will perpetuate your countenance upon canvas!"

Instead of giving his washerwoman a Christmas-box, he offered to take the old lady's portrait!

To his tailor he said, "I will put a body of my make in a pair of breeches of yours."

The artist possessed fourteen pallets and as many boxes of colours; all these he scattered about in different places according to the exigencies of his chequered existence.

One day he sent a pallet and a box of colours in a parcel, by the stage-coach, to the address of an old dowager countess, who resided in a mansion at a short distance from the metropolis. On the following day he presented himself at the aforesaid mansion, and inquired if that was the place to which he had been desired by letter to proceed.

"There must be some mistake," said a lady's maid who was blind of one eye; and this remark was echoed by a lame porter.

"Well, I am sorry that I should have mistaken the house," said the artist, with a sigh: "I should have liked to have painted the servant by the side of the mistress,—and, as in the picture of Dido, the servant would have been better-looking than the mistress." Then, turning towards the porter, he added, "My dear friend, I never in all my travels saw a physiognomy so delightfully amiable as yours. You would look admirably upon canvas!"

The lady's maid and the porter hastened to inform the countess that a celebrated artist had arrived at the house by mistake, and advised her to take advantage of the circumstance to exercise his talents. The countess contented, and agreed to have herself painted as Leda, with a swan at her feet, and a cascade upon the head. Orders were immediately sent to a gilder to prepare a frame, thirteen feet wide, and seven high. It was to cost eight hundred francs, and was to be forwarded to the address of the artist in Paris. He in the meantime remained at the countess's mansion to paint a few little pictures; and when he heard that the frame had been delivered at his lodgings in Paris, he began to reflect that he should not be able to complete these said little pictures to any advantage, and accordingly evaded the necessity of any explanation by leaping over the garden-wall in the night. He accidentally carried away with him, at the same time, a gold watch and a cashmere-shawl from the drawing-room.

The artist had contracted a habit which it would have been, and would still be, especially disagreeable for him to renounce. If he were engaged to paint a portrait, he would daub the canvas over during the "sitting;" and he would then carry the frame to some of his brother-artists, one of whom would sketch him a nose, another an ear, a third an eye, and a fourth a mouth, with due regard to the dimensions which he explained to them. On the following morning the portrait was again taken to the house of the original, and another "sitting" took place. When the portrait was finished, the artist introduced a number of particular friends to the house, where the painting was duly displayed.

"The eyes are perfect!" ejaculated one.

"The mouth is speaking!" cried another.

"The hand is striking!" said a third.

And then the friends all embraced the artist, one after another, to congratulate him upon his success.

On one occasion, an accomplice introduced himself into the house of a member of the Jockey-Club, in the capacity of groom. In the course of a few days, the artist himself obtained admission into the stables of the young dandy, who belonged to the Jockey-Club, and arranged his easels and pallets close by a noble race-horse, which he began to imitate upon his canvas. In a few minutes the dandy himself entered the stable, and demanded of his groom who it was that thus took the liberty of transforming the place into a studio?

"He is a first-rate artist," was the groom's reply, "who is in raptures at the beauty of your horse, and who begs to be permitted to paint it."

"Oh! that is all right!" exclaimed the dandy, rejoiced at the compliment thus paid to his judgment in horse-flesh.

"What a beautiful animal!" ejaculated the artist, at this moment; "Oh! what a beautiful animal! Pray allow me to complete my picture by painting you by the side of that magnificent horse. Oh! we shall then have such a magnificent picture!"

A month afterwards the gentleman received a strange daub, varnished and framed, and accompanied with a letter politely requesting the payment of three thousand francs for the picture. The dandy refused to pay for that which he had not commanded; and the artist commenced an action against him. He then liquidated the demand, through fear of scandal; and the artist chose another scene for the prosecution of his labours.

A Russian prince took the artist with him to Moscow, because the aforesaid illustrious artist was very anxious to observe a country covered with snow, and sketch some of the most interesting views. Unfortunately, chilblains and frost bites deprived Russia of those master-pieces which he had been imprudent enough to promise before he left a warmer climate.

He visited the East, with a mission from government to take views of all the most remarkable architectural beauties or remains in Asia Minor; but the powerful light of the sun, reflected from the burning sands, prevented him from exercising his visual organs with the ease necessary to sketching; he accordingly returned, with spectacles on, to his own country, and demanded an indemnification of the Chamber of Deputies for pictures which he had not succeeded in even commencing!

In the meantime, he issued a "Gallery of Grocers;" the work was advertised to consist of as many parts as there were grocers to represent; and the perfect resemblance of those who paid in advance was guaranteed!

NO. VI. THE FRIEND IN NEED.

It is written in the Memorandum-Book of Denny (a Memorandum-Book which, by the by, must be on thick as a tremendous quantity of folio volumes, unless indeed the leaves be made of asses' skin, and destiny takes the trouble to efface from time to time all that it had amused itself in writing during a certain period).—It is written, we say, that a friend who rises in the world will never assist the friend who sinks. Although equality in circumstances and condition may render two men the very representatives of Pylades and Orestes,—once destroy that equality, and the friendship is at an end! Thus was it with two friends of whom we shall now give a short sketch; and ere we do so, it will be as well to observe that, in their outset in life, they had been both committed to prison together, for the same time, the same punishment, and for the same offence. This offence was an application of the rule of subtraction to the contents of a gentleman's pocket, for the benefit of their own.

One day—we know not exactly at the expiration of which political ebullition such an event occurred—one of these friends was promoted to a very lucrative and important situation in one of the eighty-six departments of France. The other friend was occupied, at that time, in regaling himself with a cup of coffee in one of the four thousand eight hundred and fifty-six Coffee-houses of Paris, when his eye suddenly encountered in the daily journals the announcement of his fortunate friend's prosperity.

Allowing himself scarcely any time to swallow his coffee, and none to pay for it, the poor friend, whose mind was filled with the good luck of the rich friend, rushed out of the coffee-house, hastened to the coach-office, and fortunately obtained a place in a vehicle about to start for the very place where the rich friend was installed in his new functions.

Poor friend! it was well worth thy while to hurry thyself thus to seek the presence of the companion of thine adversity! Scarcely had he arrived at the town where his friend resided, than he hastened to his residence; and there his shabby costume drew towards him the immediate attention of the porter. This individual, whose politeness was measured according to the attire of visitors, ejaculated, as the poor friend passed,—“Holloa, you fellow? Where is your plate? and what is your number? I suppose you're a ticket-porter, ain't you?”

“A ticket-porter!” exclaimed the poor friend, deeply incensed at this mode of address, “I should be glad if you would hasten and inform your master that his very best friend is waiting to see him; and you will then find how I shall be treated. A ticket-porter, indeed!”

To do the rich friend justice, we must admit that he did not allow the poor friend to remain very long in the ante-chamber,—merely two hours and a half, which are nothing in such cases. As soon as this period had expired, the poor friend was introduced into the private office of the new functionary.

The poor friend was at first anxious to throw himself into the arms of the rich one, and thereby demonstrate his joy at this interview; but the functionary signified to him, as he retreated a few paces, that this usage was somewhat vulgar, and was by no means practised in the uppermost regions of society. The rich friend then presented his little finger to the poor one.

After these first preliminaries of renovated friendship, the poor friend proceeded straight to the object of his visit, and avowed that he had come to solicit one of those numerous places of which his rich friend could dispose.

“What say you?” cried the latter with a coolness altogether diplomatic.

“I said I should like to have a place, with little to do, and plenty of emolument,” answered the innocent suppliant, who imagined that his friend had not comprehended his first demand.

“Ah! you want a situation!” ejaculated the great man. “Well,—upon my honour, that is most excellent! I really did not expect such a visit, and such a request! There are some people in the world who do not entertain the slightest idea of their real situation in society!”

“I cannot see how there is any thing extraordinary in my asking for a place, since you are my oldest and best friend.”

“I beg you to understand, sir, that the confidence of my fellow-citizens has placed me at the head of this administration; and I must inform you with regret, however I may wish to oblige you, that I dare not compromise my responsibility.”

“How compromise your responsibility?”

“Yes—certainly! you cannot conceal the fact that your entrance upon life, as I may call it, was marked by an indiscretion which drew down upon your head an ignominious punishment. The offices of government can only be held by persons of the most unexceptionable character; and were it not so, what would become of us? what would become of us, I say?”

The unhappy poor friend, overwhelmed by this virtuous discourse, could not find a word to offer as reply; and no one can say how long he would have stood gazing, with vacant stare and open mouth, at his rich friend, had not the latter kicked him out of the study, and ordered two stout lacquies to complete the business by repeating it down the stairs.

By way of preventing any such importunate visits in future, the rich friend sent to inform the poor one that if he did not immediately leave the town, he would have him taken up and committed to prison as a rogue and vagabond!

SCANDAL AND SLANDER.

Or all the cowardly species of vengeance, the fabrication and retail of injurious falsehoods, relative to the character of an individual or a family, is the most prevalent and the most abominable. The retailer of such slander is almost as bad as the original inventor; because it is the incumbent duty of all honest men to sift to the bottom any matters which come within their cognizance, before they establish them as a scale by which they are to judge the merits of their neighbours. Degraded, indeed, must be the mind, and grovelling the soul of that man, or that woman, who will circulate injurious reports relative to a fellow-creature, without being previously convinced, beyond all doubt, that those reports are based upon truth. It is the more necessary thus to sift all scandalous rumours and slanderous reports, inasmuch as the party, against whom they are levelled, is usually the last to hear of them, and consequently unable to adopt the means necessary to expose their falsehood in cases where they are really untrue.

It is a most remarkable fact—but one not the less true—that scandalous reports, based upon falsehood, scarcely ever obtain circulation amongst really upright and honest persons, but merely form the current coin of conversation amongst those who delight in scandal themselves. Those who will not allow themselves to find amusement in the slander propagated with respect to their neighbours, seldom hear the reports in circulation; for it is almost a matter of necessity for a lover of scandal to place himself in certain positions, or absolutely to seek this food of a morbid appetite. The scandal-hearer must meet the scandal-teller half-way—must give him encouragement—must put leading questions—must seem to feel a deep interest in the subject canvassed—and must supply from time to time a few hints and speculative suppositions, to obtain a full insight into the extent of the slander which the teller is anxious to convey to the mind of the hearer. Hence it is evident that the individual who obtains a supply of scandal wholesale, from some infamous fabricator of that article, for the purpose of dealing it out in retail, with all suitable embellishments, additions, alterations, and amplifications, stands in the same light with regard to the aforesaid fabricator as a pickpocket does to a highwayman.

The progress of scandal is like that of a popular book. It is issued at first, and widely circulated: a second edition is called for; and in this latter issue, numerous alterations (all hyperbolic or amplified, however) are to be recognised. Thus is the second edition invariably “revised, corrected, augmented and considerably improved.”

A man who deals in slander and scandal is invariably a coward; but what can we say of a woman who levels her abuse against individuals of her own sex? We must suppose that she herself is so lost to all feelings of decency and delicacy—that she is in heart so utterly depraved, and so really wicked—that she is anxious to bring virtuous women down to her own level. She resembles the fox, who having lost his tail in a trap, endeavoured to persuade his brother and sister foxes to cut off their tails also, under the idea that they were a useless incumbrance. The female, who indulges in slander, is herself of damaged reputation, or else is conscious of failings and faults which have fortunately escaped the eyes of the world. The scandal of such women is seldom, if ever, levelled against their equals; but is directed to those who move in a class above them. The fish-fag at Billingsgate abuses the wife of the small tradesman;—the wife of the small tradesman assails the character of the wife of the rich tradesman; and the wife of the rich tradesman is virulent in her attacks upon the character of the lady.

A most useful and interesting work might be written upon the “Anatomy of Slander;” and amongst the various subjects of such consideration, not the least diverting, and peculiar would be the detail of the miserable shifts and endeavours which the detected scandal-monger is compelled to have recourse to in order to shift the blame to some one else. For instance, a person whose character or family has been made the subject of slander, proceeds to the propagator of the report, and accuses him of having been instrumental in circulating the evil rumour, even if he have not been the absolute inventor of it. The accused scandal-monger immediately finds a justification in the long silence of the object of the rumour—and supposes that the scandal must have reached his ears, that he must have heard it through some friend, and that the said silence was therefore construed into a confirmation of the justice of the rumour. We before observed that the person scandalised is usually the last to hear of the report in circulation; and thus is he, his character, or the character of his family, condemned upon a supposition—only a supposition, that he must have heard of the defamatory report! Of a verity, this is a mode of “doing unto others as you would they should do unto you,” which meets with no parallel in the annals of the injustice of the Inquisition!

We have been severe in our denouncement of the evil practice of gossiping and scandal-retailing, because the habit is a far more dangerous one than many individuals imagine it to be. To the majority of the world, character is bread; and a spotless reputation is valued by even those who by pecuniary circumstances are placed above the necessity of exerting themselves to obtain their livelihood. The Christian maxim, quoted above, does not only apply to deeds, but to words; for to injure a man by means of malicious rumours, is as vile and immoral as to stab him with a dagger in the dark. We shall not however extend our observations upon this subject for the present: those who are not accustomed to deal in scandal, will thank us for this exposure of its infamy; and those “whom the cap fits,” to use a homely but appropriate phrase, will have an opportunity of contemplating their characteristic failing in all its revolting audacity.

SPECIMENS OF GERMAN HUMOUR.

• THE HAVE AND HAVE-NOT CONTROVERSY.—Tieck.

FROM the earliest times, so far back as history affords us any information, mankind have been evermore ruled by prejudices, for which they have been always far more zealous than for reason and true knowledge. Such sectarian notions have in all times been a sore plague to poor humanity. How much evil did the establishment of the ancient division into castes produce; how much the reform of this prejudice, and the adoption and practice of opposite opinions! We find indications to prove that there existed people who venerated women rather excessively perhaps, and others who unduly depreciated and oppressed them. The old and almost extinguished traditions of Semiramis and Sesostris are cases in point. I will not dwell upon the varieties of religious factions: Here flourished a doctrine hallowed and revered by its votaries; there, but a few miles off, the votary of the same doctrine was looked on as a son of perdition, and when either of the two parties caught on his own territory the heretic of the other side, he laid him dead and made a martyr of him. We notice two very distinct sects in the doctrine which we call cleanliness: these live quietly together without mutually persecuting each other. The Southerner and the Slavonian can form no conception of the import of this doctrine, which it must be owned is not easy to define: for, profoundly considered, what is this same cleanliness? The Dutchman, its most orthodox professor, carried it so far as to make it not only wearisome, but offensive, nay at times disgusting to the German. In general, the Protestant is cleaner than most inhabitants of catholic countries; Saxony and Bohemia however constitute striking exceptions, and again Italy. Florence shows a marked leaning towards cleanliness. In Spain, as well as in Sicily and Calabria, with the exception of a few places, the thing seems not to have been yet discovered, and is very likely regarded by those people as a German superstition, for in point of fact this doctrine has acquired most vogue amongst the nations of Teutonic origin.

Again, mankind has from all time been divided into those who believe in property, and those who doubt it, or, if they are ultra orthodox, seek to destroy it. That doctrine, those sentiments, by a lovely conviction of whose truth I am to be deeply penetrated, I must before all things having truly and vividly experienced, otherwise my confession of them will ever remain but a dead letter, and mere imitative service. However, it is a well known fact that in every country there are thousands who roam about without any property, and to whom it must be always a sheer impossibility to compass a lively faith in its existence, though you tell them ever so often that mansions, gardens, equipages, richly furnished tables, &c. are the property of such and such a one. Accordingly these sceptics set their faces against the doctrine of property as a damnable superstition. The possessors of property on the contrary hardly ever have a good word in their mouths for these roaming heretics, and the orthodox amongst them punish them all they can, imposing on them severe tasks, treating them with contumely and abuse, and only allowing the reprobates to enjoy a bare existence. Many of the roaming heretics therefore, with a view to be convinced and converted, seek to acquire a practical acquaintance with property. Sick and helpless they often wander about, accosting the orthodox proprietors with petitions that they would convert them, and enable them if possible to take hold of the faith. Kind-hearted believers, who are fond of making proselytes, clap, according to circumstances, shillings, sixpences, or pence, into the hands of those they wish to convert. “Here, I give thee a share out of my property; so believe like a decent body.” The sceptic contemplates the little gift, amazed that the small bit of metal should possess such a marvellous power to upset his system and his faith; he says, “Heaven bless and reward you for it!” that is, Heaven enlighten you, that you may yourself give up your error, or, if there really be such a thing as property, that you may bestow so much of it on me as to convince my very eyes, and enable me to make myself strong in the faith therewith. Away then goes the rover to the nearest public-house or baker’s, lays out the coin in eatables or drinkables, in order to make trial of its magic virtue, swallows them down, forgets his conversion, and becomes a backslider into his old error.

Others there are of the sect more zealous for instruction, who voluntarily betake themselves to where property is to be found. Quietly and unobserved, without attracting attention by an inopportune display of their creed, they steal on tiptoe, often even in the darkness of night, in storm and rain, at the risk of their lives, into fast-locked and barred houses, to the heaps of gold and silver, in order to convince themselves, and to carry away with them a token that the doctrine of their opponents is not an error. They desire to convince themselves, but not for the moment only; they desire that the truth should enlighten them throughout their lives, and they are most solicitous, as is natural, to possess themselves of the corroborating documents in the utmost bulk and number possible. It is incredible how these poor souls and their laudable efforts are persecuted by the sect of the proprietors. They give them an abundance of imprisonment, pillories, whippings, and whatever else of the sort they can think of, but not a particle of their so-called property. Is it to be wondered at, if numbers revolt against this bigotry and purse-caring disposition of their opponents? and if these enthusiasts conspire by every means, with force and cunning, with secret and open resistance, either to dispel the phantom of property, or to make the faith therein their own; to have and to hold by realization and possession, not in a mere fantastical manner by means of those small insignificant talismans that slip so easily through one's fingers? So, when they come upon one of their most decided opponents in a wood, or in a lovely field, especially if he carries with him in his vehicle a large quantity of his so-called property, a lively discussion instantly ensues, each treats upon his own doctrine, and the vanquished party are even so far transported sometimes by their zeal, that, forgetting the fitness of better instructing themselves, they silence their obstinate opponents with a knock on the head, leave him as dead as a herring, and make off with his spoils. Governments for the most part range themselves on the side of the proprietors, and aid them with all their might, so that the sceptic or unconverted class, who yet would often willingly turn to a better faith, are almost worse persecuted than the Pariah caste in India. And yet we have instances of governments and princes who have striven with all their power to tear from their subjects their so-called property under various pretences, and so to cast their people into the arms of the worse reputed and persecuted sect. REVIEWS.

A Guide to the Recovery of Small Debts, in and within Ten Miles of the City of London. 12mo. pp. 52. London: W. Strange.

The Preface informs us that "the object of this work is to furnish a popular digest of the laws for the recovery of Small Debts, and of the powers, jurisdiction, and costs of the several courts in which those laws are administered, in and around the metropolis." A digest of the powers and rules of practice common to the various courts of Requests,—a description of the several courts in London, Westminster, and Southwark, the Tower Hamlets, Greenwich, and Wandsworth,—accurate tables of the fees payable in the several courts,—an account of the City Courts of Record for the recovery of debts,—and a digest of the laws relative to the recovery of wages due to servants, apprentices, &c.—these form the principal subjects of consideration in the work under notice. The pamphlet is a most useful and necessary one, and no one in business should be without it. The expense and trouble of consulting a lawyer in cases of small debts will be avoided by following the directions laid down in this Guide.

The Railways of Great Britain and Ireland, practically described and illustrated. By FRANCIS WHISHAW, Civil Engineer. London: Simpkin and Marshall. MR. WHISHAW, even for a Civil Engineer, has devoted an unusual degree of pains and attention to the railroads of Great Britain and Ireland. In 1857, when the speculations regarding these gigantic works appeared to sober-minded and calculating people to have exceeded all practical bounds, and to have reached the extremity of railway mania, he published an Analysis of the schemes then adumbrated, both those which had obtained the sanction of the legislature, and those which had not for the session of that year been so fortunate. We remember to have heard times without number, at that period, the predictions of sages about the fall of such vast undertakings, the terrible bankruptcies which they would occasion, and all the usual adages about bubble companies. But what are the facts now as described and testified by Mr. Whishaw, after many of the great lines have been completed, are verging towards completion, or have only actually been begun? Why, that more has been achieved than was contemplated by speculators four years ago; neither the enormous sums of money required, nor the immense difficulties physical and legal that were interposed, staying the works or cooling the ardour of capitalists. Mr. Whishaw is none of your random describers, or a mere retailer of what has been pulled off by interested parties; for he has before publishing his work taken a railway trip in every direction and along the principal lines, fifty-eight in number, his journeyings in this way extending to something like seven thousand miles; informing himself in the fullest manner possible both by observation and inquiries regarding all that was necessary to furnishing a satisfactory account of them.

Let us see what are some of the triumphs which have already been achieved in the mechanical department of the existing system, at the same time reflecting on what every middle-aged person now living would have uttered, had the thing been foretold to him but a few years back:—

The post-office is fitted up in two compartments; the one as the sorting room, and the other chiefly for the letter bags, which are distributed and collected at the different places along the line. The sorting-room is fitted up with mahogany counter and drawers; above the counter are several tiers of shelves with vertical divisions, forming small departments for the proper arrangements of letters and newspapers, each compartment having the name of the place neatly labelled on the outside, for which the letters or newspapers are respectively intended.

The assistant has a small desk or counter in the bags compartment, and also a contrivance of net-work without, for receiving the letters from the different postmasters along the line without stopping the train. The bags are also left at the requisite places while the train is in motion.

We had an opportunity last winter of accompanying one of the Post-Office clerks for some miles on his journey; and he most politely explained to us the whole system of sorting, leaving and collecting the letters, which appeared to us susceptible of very little improvement; but one thing forcibly struck us, viz. the necessity of warming this carriage, which during the winter months is miserably cold.

The length of the post-office is 16 feet, and including buffers 18 feet 9 inches; the width is 7 feet 6 inches; the height of body 6 feet 6 inches, and including under-frame, 7 feet 6 inches. The weight is 4 tons, 1 cwt. 2 qrs. The weight of the clerks, bags, &c. is estimated at 2 tons, 7 cwt. 3 qrs.

The post-office is accompanied by a tender, something similar to a horse-box in size; its weight is 2 tons, 7 cwt. 3 qrs. The gross weight of the post-office establishment is taken at 9 tons, 1 cwt.

Such has been aptly named a Flying Post Office, which, like every other thing or department connected with railways and steam, must put people habitually to their mettle, and beget as it were new human activities. But a per centage of damage and disaster is an inseparable evil.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

TEETOTAL LITERATURE.

THE first Number of Mr. Livesey's new monthly publication, The British Enquirer, was issued on the 1st of January, and was well received by the Teetotal public. This number contains the first portion of an admirable article upon the "wine question," from which it will result that this subject of general discussion will be satisfactorily set at rest. The Border Herald of Temperance, published by Mr. Hudson Scott, of Carlisle, is now enlarged, and the price is accordingly doubled. It is a most excellent publication. The Northern Temperance Journal, issued by Mr. Newcastle, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, is also doubled in size and price. These journals are issued monthly; and with the latter a series of lithographic drawings is commenced, to be given gratis with the publication.

COUNTRY NEWS.

NORTH AND SOUTH SHIELDS.

THE progress of Teetotalism has been here characterised by many interesting circumstances of success. The Catholic Total Abstinence Society is very strong, and equally energetic in its endeavours to further the good cause. The Rev. Dr. RITCHIE is one of the most staunch supporters of the doctrine, which he also advocates with considerable talent and ability. We are always glad to notice the co-operation of any professed ministers of religion in the crusade which has been so successfully commenced against the army devoted to the service of Intemperance.

SUNDERLAND.

THE Rechabites of Sunderland have already effected a great deal towards the furtherance of Teetotalism, and in no part of the United Kingdom has the principle produced results more beneficial, or achieved conquests so honourable to those who are employed in advocating the salutary doctrine. The Teetotalers of Sunderland do not stop to contemplate the work which they have achieved: the moral change introduced amongst the miners is a proof of the efficacy, and indeed the necessity of the pledge of Total Abstinence, which no opponent, however obstinate, can refute. Several grand meetings have been held at the Arcade Hall, at which Messieurs MOWBRAY, PIERCE, CHARLTON, SMITH, and YOUNG, delivered very impressive and effective addresses.

TOWN NEWS.

ADELAIDE-SQUARE, ISLINGTON.

A Temperance-Hall was opened in this locality last week; and a Tea Festival was given to celebrate the event. A few staunch and zealous Teetotalers have nobly supported the whole expenditure of this undertaking. After tea, Mr. CAMPE, the registrar of the United Temperance Association, was called to the chair. This gentleman called the attention of the audience to the well-established fact that intoxicating liquors are not nutritious, and cannot supply that waste which is always taking place in the human frame. On the contrary, they cause emaciation, and lay the foundation for all kinds of maladies.

MR. GOULD said that he had been redeemed from habits of intemperance by the Teetotal pledge, and had derived so much benefit from the latter that he should never relapse to the former.

MR. BIDDLE advocated the cause of Teetotalism with his usual energy and ability.

MR. BLACKWELL said that his experience was worth something, because he had given both intemperance and total abstinence a fair trial. He was at first a strenuous opponent to the cause; but that was when he was interested in supporting a habit in which he himself indulged. He was at length converted (he said) by Mr. Macdonald, of the Clerkenwell Branch, and by Mr. Baylis of the United Temperance Association. He (Mr. Blackwell) was now convinced that nothing but total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors would benefit the working-man. Mr. Blackwell then moved for a vote of thanks to the Committee of this new society, for having opened the Hall, for the purpose of disseminating the principles of Teetotalism and Rechabittism throughout the district. Mr. Biddle seconded this resolution, which was carried unanimously by a most respectable audience.

MR. C. GROOM, the Secretary, gave notice that the Hall would be open every Tuesday evening, at eight o'clock; and that the Good Samaritan Rechabite Tent would be open every alternate Monday evening, at 11, Camden street, Islington Green, commencing with Monday, January 25.

CATHOLIC TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

THE Catholic Teetotalers of London will shortly make a grand display of their numbers and strength. They will meet at the Mechanics' Institute, Southampton Buildings, Holborn, on February 1st. The Rev. Dr. MAONZ will preside; and a considerable portion of the metropolitan Roman Catholic Clergy will attend. Several of the most popular advocates of the Teetotal cause have already accepted invitations to attend this very important meeting.

ROYAL STANDARD TEMPERANCE HALL.

This new place of Teetotal meeting, late the Standard Theatre, was opened on Saturday evening, January 16th, Mr. J. S. BUCKINGHAM in the chair. Amongst the popular advocates of the Teetotal cause, who were present, were MESSIEURS H. W. WESTON, OXLEY, MAC CURDY, J. GILES, COCHRANE, J. H. DONALDSON, J. W. GREEN, OAKLEY, KNIGHT, ATCHERLY, &c. &c. The theatre was crowded to excess; hundreds and hundreds were unable to obtain admittance, and the police were compelled to exert themselves to maintain order in the streets, in consequence of the pressure of the crowd. The meeting was of the most orderly and respectable kind; and Mr. BUCKINGHAM delivered an address which made a most powerful effect upon the audience. The following gentlemen then addressed the meeting; MESSIEURS OXLEY, GAY, COCHRANE, J. H. DONALDSON, ATCHERLY, &c. A more satisfactory meeting has not been held in the metropolis for some time; and the noble-minded individuals who have clubbed their mites together to open this new Temperance Hall, deserve not only the applause but also the support of all those who are devoted to the cause of Teetotalism. The opening of a Temperance Hall in such a neighbourhood as Shoreditch is calculated to produce results the most beneficial; as in no other district of this huge metropolis (St. Giles's probably excepted) is the propagation of the sound principles of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors so much required. There was another meeting on Monday evening last, which was also well attended.

There is also to be a grand meeting of the Hoxton and Finsbury youths (Mr. BUCKINGHAM in the chair,) on the 25th instant, at this place.

HACKNEY.

The cause of Teetotalism prospers well in this suburb of London. The meetings are held every Tuesday evening at the School Room, London-lane, at the back of the excellent Temperance Hotel. By the way, speaking of this hotel, we may as well observe that it is conducted in a manner calculated to reflect considerable credit upon Mr. H. W. Weston, who keeps it. It is decidedly inferior to no other establishment of the kind in the metropolis—or even in England, and combines economy with comfort in a manner suitable to the means and tastes of all classes. Being at an easy distance from town, and in a line of omnibuses, this hotel offers peculiar advantages to those who visit London. We have been induced to make these observations, in order to notice any exceptions to the denunciation we levelled against the generality of temperance hotels and coffee-houses in a recent number of The Teetotaler.

HAGGERSTONE.

The meetings of the Haggerstone Society are well attended. They are held every Wednesday evening, at the Infants' School Room, near the canal-bridge. On a recent occasion, five individuals, who are employed at the large gas-works of the village, came forward to sign the pledge, after having given the principle a fair trial for the last twelve months, declaring that they had been enabled to perform their arduous toils, amidst all the severity of the heat of their occupations, much better upon Teetotal principles than with the use of strong drinks. The masters of these gas-works were so pleased at the introduction of Teetotalism into their establishment, that they immediately gave an increase of wages to the individual who had first propagated the doctrine there. This is a proof that the fact of embracing the principle does not operate to the injury of the working-man in all cases.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Mr. MINGAY SYDEN lectured at the Aldersgate-street Chapel, on Wednesday, January 13th, and on Saturday, the 16th; but in consequence of the inclemency of the weather, the audiences were on neither occasion very numerous. Mr. SYDEN, however, produced a very powerful impression, and eminently sustained his character as a talented advocate of the great cause of Total Abstinence. The length of the ensuing Report, which was read to the members of the United Temperance Association by Mr. POCKNELL, the Secretary, on Wednesday evening, January 20th, precludes the possibility of giving a detailed account of Mr. SYDEN's lectures.

FIRST YEARLY REPORT OF THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

"MR. CHAIRMAN, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—It is now my pleasing duty to lay before you, in as concise a manner as possible, a narrative of the origin, rise, and progress of the United Temperance Association, which, under the Divine blessing, has been enabled to stand against all the malignity and violence of opposition. That opposition has unfortunately been two-fold. It has consisted of opposition where opposition was to have been naturally expected—I mean amongst those who may be denominated Anti-Teetotalers; and of opposition on the parts of those who belong to or form other societies instituted upon a similar basis. The United Temperance Association was founded on the 20th of January, 1840, with a view to propagate the principle of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, without reference to particular pledges or parties. It was consequently enacted that all persons who had then signed, or who should subsequently sign any pledge of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, should be admitted as members of this association, on signing their names in the Registry-Book, and agreeing to contribute each one shilling quarterly, or one penny weekly, towards the funds of the Society. It will hence be understood that the object of the United Temperance Association was to reconcile the various conflicting parties formed by the disunion existing amongst the other societies, and to collect, if possible, beneath one banner all the real friends of the Teetotal reformation. By means of this principle, it was hoped that an union of forces would favour the progressive interests of the cause, and remove those prejudices which the intestine dissensions of Teetotal societies had up to that period encouraged in the public mind. The idea seemed to give general satisfaction; and the United Temperance Association received such encouragement that its members and friends entertained the most sanguine hopes of seeing their objects eventually realised. The Aldersgate-street Chapel was taken for the purpose of holding public meetings every Wednesday evening; and these were so well attended, that the doors were thrown open with a similar view on the Saturday evenings also. In order to supply an increase of funds for the use of the society, each person was charged one penny for his admission to the chapel on Saturday evenings; and thus a system was established, upon a basis of prudence and economy, which gave general satisfaction.

An Executive Committee was appointed by the General Committee, and assembled for the first time at the chapel on the 31st of March, 1840; and on this occasion it was determined to hold a meeting at the Mechanics' Institute, Holborn, on the evening of the 9th of April. An address of the committee was drawn up, and approved of; and five thousand were ordered to be printed for general distribution. The meeting was accordingly held at the Mechanics' Institute; and Mr. Hart, of the Temperance Hotel, was presented with a medal for the services he had rendered the Association at its commencement. The meeting was one of the most brilliant ever held in the metropolis, and gave the members of the Association additional hopes of success in working out the principles of Union.

On Whitmonday, 1840, the United Temperance Association joined the Grand Procession of the Teetotal Societies of the metropolis and its suburbs; and formed an important section of the vast line of cavalcade. The President, John Bilton, Esq., and his family, occupied a carriage drawn by four horses; eleven carriages followed; and two vans brought up the rear. The splendid banner of the Association, and numberless silk Union Jacks, ornamented the ranks of the Society.

Towards the end of the month of May, a public discussion took place, at the Aldersgate-street Chapel, between Mr. J. H. Donaldson and Mr. G. W. M. Reynolds, the latter of whom came forward to oppose the doctrine of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors. The discussion was continued for three consecutive Saturdays; and at the expiration of that period, Mr. Reynolds confessed that the arguments of his opponents had succeeded in converting him to the principles of Teetotalism. This gentleman accordingly signed the pledge, and became a member of the United Temperance Association.

At the commencement of August, the Kensington and Bayswater Branch of the United Temperance Association was formed; and from period until the present time, this Branch has developed the most praiseworthy energies in forwarding the interests both of the parent Society, and of the cause.

On the 27th of June, The Teetotaler journal was established, and placed under the direction of Mr. G. W. M. Reynolds. The object of this weekly periodical was to supply the Teetotal community in general with a good family journal of literature, science, and amusement, as well as to advocate the cause from which it borrowed its name.

On Wednesday, the 2nd of September, the Saint Marylebone Branch of the United Temperance Association was established. This Branch was however shortly deprived of its place of meeting, in consequence of the intrigues of a rival society; but it is at present using every exertion to procure another locality for holding its assemblies. In the meantime much good has been done in private by the exertions of several of the members of the Branch.

About the same time a Depot for the sale of Teetotal tracts and publications was opened at No. 13, Aldersgate-street; but in consequence of the little encouragement it experienced, it was shortly after closed.

It was also at this period, that the Chelsea Auxiliary to the United Temperance Association was founded; and a grand meeting was held at the Bath Garden's Theatre for the purpose, Mr. G. W. M. Reynolds in the chair.

The Chelsea Auxiliary has since opened, entirely at its own expense, an excellent and commodious Temperance Hall, at No. 56, George-street, Chelsea; and its members are rapidly increasing.

I now arrive at an important transaction in the proceedings of the United Temperance Association. Faithful to the proposed plan of Union, on which the Society is based, the Executive Committee resolved upon making overtures to the British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, with a view to form a junction between the two bodies. A deputation of the Executive Committee of the United Temperance Association accordingly waited upon the Executive Committee of the Suppression Society; but, in consequence of the latter being desirous of the former's becoming a simple Auxiliary, and changing its title, the project of union was immediately abandoned in this instance, as prejudicial to the interests and views of the United Temperance Association, which has the power, the inclination, and the means of remaining an independent society.

At the commencement of November, the Oxford Teetotal Society was established as an Auxiliary to the United Temperance Association, through the laudable exertions of Mr. Edward Hudson, the travelling agent of the latter.

On the 21st of December, the Lambeth Auxiliary to the United Temperance Association was formed, and Hatfield House was taken by the Committee of that Auxiliary as a place of meeting. I have much pleasure in stating that this Auxiliary progresses most favourably, and produces the most beneficial effects in that district to which its operations are confined.

I must now request your attention to the financial department of the United Temperance Association. You must be perfectly well aware that in the infancy of all Associations the funds are but slender; and, for this reason, we have not been as yet enabled to employ any considerable number of agents to advocate the cause in the country. Several gentlemen have however travelled for and at the expense of the Association during the last year; and the principles of Union seemed to be well received and much admired in the districts which they visited. The receipts for admission on Saturday evenings have not amounted to sufficient to defray the rent and expenses of the chapel; and I regret to be compelled to state that many of the members have neglected to renew their quarterly cards. Several gentlemen of the Committee of Management have however subscribed weekly sums towards defraying the expenses of the Association; and, if our means have been limited, our expenditure has been prudent. The Society is under but few pecuniary obligations; and those will easily be defrayed by the sums which remain to be paid to the treasurer. I must also solicit your attention to the fact, that no officer of this Association receives any salary as a remuneration for his services, which are gratuitously devoted to the good of the cause.

With regard to Festivals and Excursions, the United Temperance Association has been characterised, as well as other Societies, by these pleasing relaxations from business and the important circumstances of life. On the 20th of July, the members were entertained by an excursion to Richmond in a steam-boat. The company dined in the park, and returned to the Vauxhall Gardens to tea in the evening. On the 10th of August, some of the members of the United Temperance Associations, availed themselves of the kindness of Captain Trotter of Dyrham Park, to visit that place together with the other metropolitan Societies. The Saint Marylebone Branch and the Chelsea Auxiliary to the United Temperance Association have held several highly respectable Tea-Meetings, which have been well attended.

During the year 1840, the United Temperance Association has held nearly a hundred meetings at the Aldersgate-street Chapel; and during that period has received between three and four thousand pledges in the Registry-Book. This statement does not apply to the meetings held or pledges received by any of the Auxiliaries or Branches."

STYLE.—A young gentleman, having occasion to ask a lady for the snuffers across the table, addressed her in the following emphatic and enamoured strain:—"Most beautiful, accomplished, and charming madam, wilt your ladyship, by an unmerited and undeserved condescension of your infinite goodness, please to extend to your most obsequious, devoted and very humble servant, that pair of ignipotent digestors, that I may exasperate the excrecences of the nocturnal cylindric luminary, in order that the refulgent brightness of its resplendent brilliancy may dazzle the vision of our ocular optics more potently."

PICKWICK MARRIED.

CHAPTER II.

MR. PICKWICK IS INTRODUCED TO A VERY AGREEABLE FAMILY, WHICH IS ALSO SLIGHTLY INTRODUCED TO THE READER.—MR. SAMUEL WELLER APPEARS UPON THE STAGE OF THIS MOST TRUE HISTORY.

WHEN Mr. Pickwick and Mr. Francis Sago arrived in the street, the former surveyed the latter with the most admiring gratitude, and the latter bestowed upon the former a glance of the most grateful admiration.

"Is it indeed the immortal Mr. Pickwick to whom my sister is under so deep an obligation?" exclaimed Mr. Francis Sago, after a long pause.

"It is indeed," replied the truly illustrious man, putting his body into a graceful attitude, and his right foot into a deep puddle.

"Oh! do come along with me to our house," cried the delighted young man: "we shall be so pleased to make your acquaintance; and Teresina will be so happy to thank you in person."

"The truth is, my dear sir," answered Mr. Pickwick, with a benignant smile, "that I am staying with my friend Snodgrass for a few days, in Halfmoon Street, Piccadilly; and my absence I doubtless have occasioned some alarm."

"You can write a note to Mr. Snodgrass," suggested Mr. Francis Sago; "and one of our men shall take it down to his residence."

"In that case I will accompany you," said Mr. Pickwick, whose imagination retained a faint but pleasing reminiscence of the countenance of the young lady whom he had assisted on the preceding evening.

The two gentlemen accordingly proceeded to the nearest cab-stand, and entered a vehicle which shortly deposited them at the private door of Mr. Sago's house in Wood-street, Cheapside. But before we introduce Mr. Pickwick to the Sago family, let us introduce the Sago family to the reader.

By the fire in a very handsome drawing-room was seated Mr. Sago, senior. The worthy grocer was a most upright man in his dealings, and a very downright one in his conversation. What he said he meant; what he meant he said; and what he said and meant he did. His hair was as white as silver: his snuff-box was silver; he wore silver buckles in his shoes; and every day after dinner he smoked a Silva cigar. In person he was about the middle size, somewhat inclined to corpulency, and of a florid complexion. His countenance denoted good-nature; and the nature of his disposition was good. In fact, he was a most respectable and respected man, and was famous for the execution which he did to the turtle and venison at the annual dinner of the Grocers' Company.

On the other side of the fire-place sat Mrs. Sago—a good humoured, good looking, fat lady, who, according to her own account, had been on the right side of fifty for the last five years—a statement which she made so often, that people could not for a moment believe that she was mistaken. She was the niece of the late Alderman Fitzbeggins, of Portsoken Ward, and never forgot to mention that fact also. She had been induced at the age of twenty to accompany Mr. Sago on a little speculative expedition to the hymeneal altar; and three younger Sagos had in due times and at certain intervals sprung from the parent roots. These animated perpetuations of the name of Sago were one son and two daughters, whose respective denominations were Francis (after the late Alderman)—Amelia Sophia (after the princesses)—and Teresina Hippolyta (after an old aunt, from whom great expectations had been calculated upon, but who had most provokingly died insolvent).

At the moment when Mr. Pickwick entered the room, Amelia who was a handsome young woman of about four and twenty, was drawing in water-colours, and Teresina, who was a pretty girl of about twenty, was eating a bason of gruel—not because she liked it, but because Dr. Henbane, the family physician, had persuaded her that she was ill in consequence of the adventure of the preceding evening.

As a cloud suddenly passes away from the face of heaven, and admits the refulgent rays of the sun to the inhabitants of a hemisphere,—as a maid-servant's entering a cellar with a farthing rushlight in her hand is the cause of brightness being suddenly introduced into that before dark place,—so did the opening of the drawing-room door admit an unusual effulgence to the presence of the inmates in the person of Mr. Samuel Pickwick.

"My dear father," exclaimed the overjoyed Francis, "such an adventure! The gentleman who so kindly interfered in favour of Teresina is no other than one of whom you have all read and heard so much!"

"Mr. Pickwick!" ejaculated the old lady, bounding from her chair with the agility of a young elephant: "how I wish my uncle Fitzbeggins was alive to see you!"

"Well! did you ever?" said the elder sister to the younger.

"No, I never!" replied the younger sister to the elder.

"I assure you that my name is Pickwick, ladies," observed our hero, smiling in a most amiable manner, and treading on the tail of a large tortoise-shell cat, which immediately stuck its claws into Mr. Pickwick's legs—a proceeding that made the illustrious gentleman perform an involuntary fandango.

"No one doubts that you're Mr. Pickwick," cried the elder Mr. Sago; "and I'm very glad to see you. You'll find us very homely kind of people, Mr. Pickwick—all in the domestic way, you perceive; but you'll be heartily welcome—and that's the principal."

Mr. Pickwick bowed again, and this time he was particularly cautious where he trod. In a few minutes he was seated, and already on excellent terms with the Sago family. And now Miss Teresina forgot her illness, and chatted with exceeding liveliness: and Miss Amelia shewed Mr. Pickwick her drawings; and then the young ladies' Albums were fetched; and every one present insisted upon Mr. Pickwick's writing some verses in one of those scrap-books. Our hero first despatched a note to his friend Mr. Snodgrass, stating that he was detained to dinner with his new acquaintances; and he then entered into conversation with the ladies with all the spirit and vivacity of a young man of two and twenty.

"I really hope you will not forget to write some verses in my Album, Mr. Pickwick?" said Miss Teresina.

"And to draw me a picture in mine," added Miss Amelia.

"I am quite incapable of doing either, I can assure you," commenced Mr. Pickwick: "but my friend Mr. Snodgrass is a most accomplished poet, and will no doubt have great pleasure in transferring a specimen of his talents to your books."

"Pray, sir, what has Mr. Snodgrass ever written?" enquired the elder Mr. Sago, taking a pinch of snuff.

"Oh! nothing that was ever published," answered our hero, "but he is nevertheless a very great poet."

"If you say so, I'm convinced he must be a poet," observed Mrs. Sago. "We always used to look upon the Alderman as a very clever draughtsman; and how do you think he obtained the reputation?"

"I'm sure I can't say, ma'am," returned Mr. Pickwick.

"Oh! merely because he sketched the plan of a new pump on one occasion," said Mrs. Sago.

"Ah! renown is not easily purchased nowadays," observed Mr. Pickwick, with a solemn shake of the head, at which his audience were greatly edified. "You are doubtless aware that to establish my reputation on a solid foundation I have had to pass through a great deal—sometimes ducked in a horse-pond, at others the lion of a party; on one occasion applauded as if I were a god, on another abused like a pickpocket—subject to the caprices of an everchanging tide of public opinion; yesterday riding in a carriage and four, to day not even a donkey sent to receive me—and so forth!"

"Alas! is that the picture of human greatness?" said Miss Teresina Hippolyta, who was most sentimentally disposed.

"It is, indeed," answered Mr. Pickwick, mournfully. "But let us change the subject of conversation. What very unpleasant weather it has been lately!"

A suitable reply was given; and in such pleasant little chit-chat as this, the time passed away. Luncheon made its appearance at two; and Miss Teresina suffered herself to be persuaded to partake of it; and after luncheon the chit-chat was resumed. And then Mr. Pickwick was made acquainted with all the news and scandal of the neighbourhood,—how the Manchester warehouseman over the way had had a bill protested two days back,—how a common councillor's eldest daughter had run away with her father's footman,—how the Lord Mayor gave the worst turtle soup that had ever been tasted at the Mansion-House,—how the steeple of Bow Church was expected to tumble down some morning before breakfast,—how the Common Council had determined to pass a law that no beggars should be allowed in future to solicit alms in the City, without obtaining brass-plates with numbers on them,—and a thousand other howes of an equally interesting nature.

Suddenly the door opened; and in rushed a tall thin gentleman, clad in a most mysterious cloak with a fur collar, and with a countenance which might not strike every one to be very replete with animation. This gentleman, who was not more than five or six and twenty, darted upon Mr. Pickwick, seized him round the neck, and began hugging him with the pertinacity of a young bear.

"Heaven be thanked, you are not lost!" ejaculated the new-comer, in a pathetic tone of voice.

"Ah! my dear fellow, Snodgrass," cried Mr. Pickwick, struggling to extricate himself from his friend's embraces, "is this you?"

"It is indeed," replied Mr. Augustus Snodgrass, as if there could be any doubt relative to the fact of his identity.

"Well, so here you air, arter all, I see! Blowed if it ain't a wery excitin' an' interestin' proceedin' to keep won's friends in suspense for a whole night. Wot's right is right, as Jack Ketch said ven he claimed the clothes o' the gen'leman as wos hanged."

All eyes were turned towards the door, from which direction this extraordinary speech had emanated; and the visual rays of those optics were all collected in the focus formed by an individual dressed in livery, and who, with his hat perched gracefully over his left ear, was leaning against the door-posts, with arms crossed, and coolly surveying the little piece of domestic tragedy which had just been enacted by Mr. Snodgrass in respect to Mr. Pickwick.

"Holloa, Sam! Is that you?" cried Mr. Pickwick.

"My own wery identical self," answered Mr. Samuel Weller, "which has come in consequence o' the note o' explanation as you sent just now to Mr. Snodgrass there. I don't know vether I'm intrudin', but I des say I wasn't expected, as the sveep said ven he tumbled down the chimbley into a strange house."

"This is my servant, ladies," said Mr. Pickwick, pointing to Mr. Weller.

"An' your'n too—an' a wery humble one, into the bargain," observed Sam, touching his hat.

"Sam," said Mr. Pickwick.

"Sir," answered Mr. Weller.

"You may go and wait at any house of entertainment you like in the neighbourhood, until nine this evening, when—"

"No such thing! no such thing!" ejaculated Mr. Sago. "Your domestic may find his way into the kitchen, where he will be made very comfortable, I have no doubt."

"Thankee, kindly, sir," returned Sam; "any company's better than none: an' so, with your leave, I'll just go and visit them wery amiable beings as embellishes your kitchen."

"And tell them to give you anything you choose," said Mrs. Sago, with a gracious smile. "There's an excellent veal pie, made according to the taste of my uncle, the late Alderman Fitzboggins, of Portsoken."

"Ah! then I des say it is a out-an'-outer," said Sam, with a grave shake of the head. "Howsomever, I'll go an' pay my respects to it, along vith the diwinities o' the kitchen. Nothin' like a good appetite, as the master o' the workus says ven he gives the paupers their water-gruel."

With this observation Mr. Weller withdrew himself from the precincts of the drawing-room, and proceeded to astonish the natives of the lower regions of the grocer's establishment.

"A very facetious fellow, that, Mr. Pickwick?" observed Francis Sago, as soon as Sam had retired.

"Oh! very," said our hero. "But I really must apologise for the arrival of himself and my friend here at your house: it is a liberty—"

"Don't mention it, my dear sir," ejaculated Mr. Sago; "and if Mr. Snodgrass will but do us the honour to stay and dine with us—"

Mr. Snodgrass bowed an acknowledgment of the invitation; and the young ladies, who had never seen a poet before, were quite astonished to think that he could at all resemble the rest of the human species. They however now began to suspect that poets and prose-writers—indeed all kinds of authors—were not, after all, so very different from their fellow-men as they had hitherto supposed them to be.

Dinner was announced in due time, and in due time dismissed; and a very pleasant evening did Mr. Pickwick and Mr. Snodgrass pass with their new acquaintances. Mr. Pickwick challenged Miss Teresina Sago to a game of chess, of which she was particularly fond; and, as the young lady was a very long time in deciding upon each move, her illustrious antagonist prudently took a nap during each interval.

"Now then, Mr. Pickwick, it's your move," would Miss Teresina exclaim.

"Ah!—oh!—what!" ejaculated our hero. "What am I saying?—I'm sure I forget."

"You weren't saying anything that I know of."

"Ah! I was thinking, then."

"Does Mr. Pickwick often think with his eyes shut?" inquired Mrs. Sago of Mr. Snodgrass, as she naturally felt anxious to make herself acquainted with all the peculiarities in so illustrious a man's character: the demand was, however, put in a whisper.

"Oh! very often indeed," replied Mr. Snodgrass, also in a low tone; "particularly after dinner."

"How very singular!" remarked Mrs. Sago, treating the subject with the solemnity it naturally deserved.

Mr. Snodgrass then entered into an interesting discussion with Miss Amelia Sophia relative to poetry and drawing; and, as before said, in this exceedingly pleasant manner was the evening passed away. At half-past nine Mr. Pickwick, who had just been check-mated, declared that it was time to depart; and Sam having been summoned from the kitchen, the farewells were said, and the hero of these memoirs, accompanied by his friend and followed by his domestic, took his departure—not, however, before a promise had been elicited from him to the effect that he would soon call in Wood-street again.

"Vell, sir," said Sam, as they walked along Cheapside, in their way towards St. Paul's Churchyard, where they intended to take a coach to the West End,—"vell, sir, that there was a wery pretty little tidy adventur' o' your'n, last night—gettin' yourself locked up in a police station, an' frightenin' all your friends out o' their vits. Blowed if I ever heerd o' such a go; an' yet we've bin in a many queer larks afore now. Practice makes perfect, as the young thief said ven he picked his own pocket."

"And yet, I by no means regret having behaved in such a manner for the sake of a very amiable young person," said Mr. Pickwick, boldly and distinctly alluding to Miss Teresina Hippolyta Sago.

"An' so it's wery genteel, is it," continued Sam, doggedly, "to go and make a Don Quixote o' von's self for the sake of a young gal vith a rayther pretty face?"

"Charity is the soul of poetry, Sam," said Mr. Snodgrass.

"Wery likely it is, sir," returned Mr. Weller; "but it's wery unfornit that the police doesn't think so: an' though it's a wery fine thing to fly to the aid of a young 'oman in distress, it ain't wery respectable for a aged gen'lman to get bundled off to a station-house. All things has places and seasons, sir, vich was the observation made by the nobleman ven a dun came in the middle of his breakfast."

"Sam," said Mr. Pickwick, "you may confine your observations to yourself, if you please."

"Wery good, sir," returned Sam. "Now then, Jarvey!"

This latter exclamation was addressed to the driver of a hackney-coach; and in a few minutes the vehicle was rattling leisurely along Fleet-street, Messrs. Pickwick and Snodgrass reposing in the interior, and Mr. Samuel Weller adorning the seat on the dickey next to the coachman.

Fleet-street is probably one of the most remarkable thoroughfares of this mighty metropolis. It is, however, little indebted to its component parts for any especial notice: its individual members, meaning thereby its several tenements, interest us but little—odd assemblages, though they be, of various ages and styles. These do not attract us in Fleet-street; nor do they stir the heart in its cell, while we are there. The influence is in the crowd, the press of men; and, more than this, the crush of conveyances, the mass of the symbols of commerce, the increasing march and whirl of horse and carriage. If for one moment the din of wheels be stilled, a tramp as of a battalion of men may be heard rising above every other sound, from the busy plodders on either pavement. But this pause is of rare occurrence. We meet every body in Fleet-street, but who has not lost himself in vain speculations relative to what this "every body" may be? We do not know a great man till we see him in his book, in his place in Parliament, behind his fiddle, or, though last not least, seated at the head of his table. The man on his way to buy stock to the tune of fifty thousand pounds is undistinguishable from him who is returning from selling out his last hundred. These several and differently situated parties comport themselves alike, and cannot be told the one from the other: there is a certain nonchalance—a certain ease of countenance, as common to men moving in society, as a well-timed and unaffected style of dress. Being out at elbows and out of countenance are all but the same thing. A man's heart and a man's tailor may both turn bankrupt, but he himself must show no tokens of the failure.

"Them 'osses o' your'n is precious queer uns," observed Mr. Weller to the Jarvey, as the vehicle passed Temple Bar and entered the Strand.

"Vy, I tell'ee how it be," answered the individual to whom this observation was addressed; "these osses is new uns, and this is the fust time they've run in this here coach."

"That's the wery reason vy they ought to suffer themselves to be persvaded into a rayther sharp trot," cried Sam, impatiently.

"No, it ain't," said the coachman, very quietly; "they von't do that for these next six weeks."

"Out vith the reason, old touch-and-go."

"Cos," added the driver, in a solemn and most mysterious tone, "I hain't established a bit o' raw yet, vere I can touch 'em up. Ven once the raw's made, von't they go then, though?"

"I never thought o' that," said Sam, profoundly admiring the wisdom of this coachman.

"Ah! there's a many things o' vich you never thought, young man," returned the coachman. "Do you know wot it is that has the peculiar property o' making every cab an' coach fly off a stand, vithout any one on 'em having a single fare?"

"Not knowin' can't say," was the laconic but expressive answer.

"Then I'll tell'ee," continued the Jarvey, who never once turned his head as he was speaking, but kept looking straight down at his horses—a habit peculiar to all drivers of public vehicles; "ain't you never heerd o' the old eightpenny fare, as the cabmen calls him?"

"Never," replied Sam.

"Vell, I'll tell'ee who he is, then. It's old Adolphus, the Old Bailey barrister, as is the sworn enemy o' the race of Jarveys of all kinds. Vy—that man, sir, knows the distance betwixt any two places in London, even to a yard. He never takes a vehicle for more than a mile at a time; but he always will have his full mile; an' if it's a cab he gives eightpence; an' if it's a coach he chucks down a bob. Ven ve disputes vith him he pulls us up afore the beak, an' has the ground measured; an' he never yet vos known to be wrong. All the expenses then falls on us: an' this is the vay in vich he sarves us out. So now ve all knows him; an' the moment he's twigg'd coming up to a stand, off splits cab an' coach, an' the old eightpenny fare's obleeged to jump into a buss."

"Live an' learn," exclaimed Sam. "Wot I've just heerd is a precious run go, as the dog said ven he found the tin-kettle tied to his tail."

By the time this dialogue was disposed of, the hackney-coach stopped at the house of Mr. Augustus Snodgrass, in Halfmoon-street, Piccadilly; and two or three little specimens of the Snodgrass tribe hastened to the door to welcome Mr. Pickwick's safe return, they having been allowed to sit up for the purpose. Mr. Pickwick speedily retired to his bedchamber; and, while his nose sent forth its characteristic sounds of harmony, his imagination conjured up, amid his slumbers, the graceful form and fascinating countenance of Miss Teresina Hippolyta Sago.

(To be continued in our next.)

HINTS FOR THE DRUNKARD.

"It is not drinklog spirituons liquors to the length of intoxication," says Dr. Trotter, in his Essay on Drunkenness, "that alone constitutes intemperance. A man may drink a great deal—pass a large portion of his time at the bottle, and yet be able to fill most of the avocations of life. There are certainly many men of this description, who have never been so transformed with liquor as to be unknown to their own house-dog, or so foolish in their appearance, as to be hooted by school-boys, that ace yet to be considered as intemperate livers. These sober drunkards, if I may be allowed the expression, deceive themselves as well as others; and though they pace slowly along the road to ruin, their journey terminates at the goal—bad health." Mr. Grindrod, who quotes this paragraph in his admirable work—Bacchus, appends the following lucid observations of his own thereto:—"Part of the community, in general termed temperate, consumes a larger proportion of intoxicating liquor than those individuals who are commonly denominated drunkards." Mr. Grindrod would imply that the moderate drinkers (as they term themselves) partake habitually and regularly of large quantities of intoxicating liquor; whereas the drunkard generally takes his quantity by fits and starts, and often at long intervals. The person who indulges daily in three glasses of ardent spirits, or in half a bottle of wine, consumes nearly a hundred gallons of pure alcohol, or spirits of wine, in ten years. When we make ourselves acquainted with the structure of the stomach, the operations of the organs of digestion and the peculiar uses of the various passages through which this torrent of alcohol has to flow, we must be well aware that every glass is indeed "a nail in our coffins." Dr. Cheyne, the late Physician General of Ireland, has placed upon record the ensuing observations with regard to Dublin:—"The observation of twenty years in this city has convinced me, that were tea young men, on their twenty-first birth-day, to begin to drink one glass (equal to two ounces) of ardent spirits, or a pint of port-wine or sherry, and were they to drink this supposed moderate quantity of strong liquor daily, the lives of eight out of the ten would be abridged by twelve or fifteen years. They represent themselves as temperate, very temperate."

Dr. Pratt, in his Treatise on Mineral Waters, declares that many diseases, such as tremblings, palsies, apoplexies, giddiness, pains in the head, gout, stone, dropsy, rheumatism, and such like, would be avoided. The Rev. Mr. Parsons, in his essay entitled Anti-Bacchus, observes that "drinking water strengthens the stomach, causes an appetite, preserves the sight, makes the senses lively, and cleanses all the passages of the body, especially those of the kidneys and bladder." Peter Martyn has put the following statement upon record: "The liver is inflamed by too much drink, the head aches, the members are made weak and do tremble, the senses are corrupted, the natural heat is overcome by over much wine; the stomach is annoyed with crudities and intolerable griefs, whilst it is stuffed and pushed above measure: the whole body is in a manner inflamed, and thirst is augmented." Mr. Higginbotham, a very eminent surgeon, who has been a Teetotaler for upwards of thirty years, says that children often drop into the grave at an early age, and mothers die an untimely death, in consequence of the use of alcoholic drinks during the time of nursing their offspring. "It is allowed by all," says Mr. Parsons, "that oxygen is employed by nature to keep the blood pure; and therefore water must be the most wholesome drink; for not only is there pure atmospheric air in water, but the components of water are hydrogen and oxygen; and hence we see how adapted this primitive beverage is to preserve the blood in a living, vigorous, and healthy state."

"Most persons," says Dr. Garnett, "have so indulged themselves in this pernicious habit of drinking wine, that they imagine they cannot live without a little every day; they think that their very existence depends upon it, and that their stomachs require it to enable them to perform the necessary functions of digestion. Similar arguments may be brought in favour of every other bad habit, though at first the violence we do nature makes her revolt: in a little time she submits, and is not only reconciled, but grows fond of the habit; and we think it necessary to our existence. Neither the flavour of wine, of opium, of snuff, nor that of tobacco, is naturally agreeable to us: on the contrary, these articles are highly unpleasant at first; but by the force of habit they become pleasant. It is however the business of rational beings to distinguish carefully between the real wants of nature, and the artificial calls of habit; and when we find that the latter begin to injure us, we ought to use the most persevering efforts to break the enchantment of bad customs; and though it may cost us some uneasy sensations at first, we must learn to bear them patiently: a little time will reward us for our forbearance by a re-establishment of health and spirits."

Mr. Grindrod relates a remarkable instance of the inveteracy of the habit of intemperance. A gentleman, very amiable in his disposition, and justly popular among the circle of his acquaintance, contracted habits of intemperance: his friend argued, implored, and remonstrated—but in vain! At last, he thus put an end to all importunity. A friend addressed him in the following strain:—"Dear Sir George, your family are in the utmost distress on account of this unfortunate habit; they perceive that your business is neglected, your moral influence is gone, your health is ruined, and depend upon it, the coats of your stomach will soon give way and then a change will come too late." The poor victim, deeply convinced of the hopelessness of his case, replied thus:—"My good friend, your remarks are indeed too true; but I can no longer resist temptation. If a bottle of brandy stood at one hand, and the pit of hell yawned on the other, and if I were convinced that I should be pushed in as surely as I took one glass more, I should not be able to refrain. You are all very kind; I ought to be very grateful for so many kind good friends; but you may spare yourselves the trouble of trying to reform me,—the thing is now utterly impossible!"

BLINDNESS.

THE loss of the noblest sense, by means of which man receives an idea of the world that surrounds him, clothed in light and colour, is an event as melancholy as it is frequent. Blindness is different in its degrees, some persons being partially blind, retaining only a slight perception of light, with the power of distinguishing very brilliant colours, and the general outline of bodies; others being entirely deprived of the faculty of seeing. Some men are blind from their birth; others have become blind from local diseases of the eyes, such as inflammation, cancer of the eye-ball, spots, films, tumours on the cornea (by which its transparency is destroyed), also by closure of the pupil, by a turbid state of the humours, by a debility of the optic nerve, or by general diseases of the body. Excessive exertions of the eyes also destroy the sight; and for this reason, some classes of mechanics and artists, as blacksmiths, labourers in glass and smelting-houses, watch-makers, &c., not unfrequently become blind. In northern countries, which are covered with snow for a long time, and which dazzle the eyes by the reflection of the sun-beams, as well as in the sandy deserts of Africa, blindness is a frequent complaint. Old age is sometimes accompanied with blindness, occasioned by the drying up of the humours of the eye, &c. There are several causes which produce blindness from the birth. Sometimes the eye-lids adhere to each other, or to the eye-ball itself; or a membrane covers the eyes: sometimes the pupil of the eye is closed, or is not situated in the right place, &c. Those who are born blind have no idea of vision, and are extremely destitute of all ideas derived from the sense of sight. Experience has shown that those who acquire the power of seeing after being born blind, or having lost their sight in their childhood, form very different ideas of visible objects from other persons.

A young man, whom Chelendon couched for a cataract, at the moment he received sight imagined that all the objects which he saw absolutely touched his eyes: he could not distinguish objects, although of very different forms. Those, with which he was familiar already by the touch, he examined with great attention, in order to recognise them another time; but having too many things to notice at once, he soon forgot all that he had observed. He wondered that those persons whom he loved the most were not handsomer than others. Before he had received his sight, he had expressed a great desire to obtain this sense. The other senses of persons, who have been blind for a long time, become more exquisite, perhaps, because they are not subject to the distraction produced by the sight of so many objects. The blind, therefore, are often distinguished for a remarkable mental activity, and a wonderful development of the intellectual powers. Their touch and hearing, particularly, become very acute. Thus it is related of a blind man, who lived at Puisaux, in France, and was a chemist and musician, that he could accurately estimate the proportions of objects, could judge of the distance of fire by the degree of heat, determine the quantity of fluid in vessels by the sound it produced while running from one vessel into another, and the proximity of objects by the effects of the air upon his face. He determined very accurately the weights of bodies and the capacities of vessels. The celebrated Saunderston, Professor of Mathematics at Cambridge, lost his sight in his early youth. He invented several processes to facilitate his studies in arithmetic and geometry. His sense of touch was so acute, that he distinguished spurious coins merely by letting them pass through his fingers, though they were so well executed that even skilful judges were deceived by them.

In the case of persons destitute of sight, it is necessary to have recourse to the other senses to supply the want of the eye. If, for instance, we wish to teach them the art of reading and writing, letters must be prepared which will be palpable to the touch, and the hand guided until they are able to copy them. If we wish to communicate to them a knowledge of the surface of the earth, globes and maps must be prepared, with the divisions, &c., in relief. Knowledge obtained in this way must of course be acquired much more slowly than that received by sight. The senses of touch and of sight differ in this respect, that the former ascends by degrees from the perception of parts to the perception of the whole, whilst the latter views the whole at a single glance. It is therefore evident that the blind cannot be instructed in the common schools destined for those who see; in the first place, because the means of instruction by the touch are wanting; and secondly, because the progress of the other children would be retarded by the slow apprehension of the blind pupils. For these reasons, and as the blind form no small part of the population of every country, particular institutions have, in many places, been established for their instruction. In Prussia the blind amount to more than thirteen thousand souls. The proportion of blind persons decreases from the equator towards the poles: in Egypt the proportion is as 1 to 100, while in Norway the proportion is as 1 to 1000.

In the year 1260, a grand institution for the blind was founded in France by Saint Louis, after his crusade to Egypt, whence so many of his soldiers returned home afflicted with the ophthalmia prevailing in that country. In 1784 another institution of the kind was opened; and at this one the blind were instructed not only in appropriate mechanical employments, as spinning, knitting, making ropes or fringes, and working in paste-board, but also in music, in reading, writing, ciphering, geography, and the sciences. For this purpose he invented particular means of instruction. For reading, he procured raised letters of metal, from which also impressions may be taken on paper: for writing, he used particular writing-cases, in which a frame, with wires to separate the lines, could be fastened upon the paper; for ciphering, there were moveable figures of metal, and ciphering-boards in which the figures could be fixed; for teaching geography, maps were prepared, upon which mountains, rivers, cities, and the boundaries of countries, were embroidered in various ways, &c. These splendid institutions in France are supported by the state. The hospital founded by Saint Louis, only receives three hundred members, and is denominated Les Quinze-Vingt: the other is for an indefinite number of persons.

Next to France, the first institutions for the blind were established in Great Britain, where however they are supported only by the contributions of private individuals, the meaning of the word charity being totally unknown to the English government. In 1790, an institution of this sort was established at Liverpool, in which both males and females are instructed in manual labours, in singing hymns, and playing on the organ. In 1791, a second one was established in Edinburgh, in which the making of baskets and ropes is the principal occupation. Similar institutions have since arisen in other places; one at London, in 1800; also at Dublin, Bristol, and Norwich. In Germany, the first public institution for the blind was established by the King of Prussia at Berlin, in 1806. Similar establishments were founded at Vienna and Prague, in 1808; and in the same year, that of Amsterdam was instituted by Freemasons. In 1808, the institution at Dresden sprang up—a branch of that in Berlin. The number of the blind at Jeddo, the capital of Japan, is thirty-six thousand. Institutions for the blind are principally confined to Europe: the states of the improvement to which the several nations, in which they exist, have brought them, in comparison one with another, are as follows:—France, Germany, Denmark, Holland, England, Switzerland, and Russia.

OBSERVATIONS AND GLEANINGS;

BY THE LATE E. H. BARKER, ESQ.

Editor of "Lempriere's Classical Dictionary," &c. &c.

I. REMEDY FOR THE BITE OF A MAD DOG.—The following curious, but certain method of cure, was communicated to me by my friend, the late Dr. Parr:—Let the bitten part be cut out immediately, if possible; but surgeons are not always in the way, and people of business are afraid of the flesh being cut out: then proceed thus. From a pump—if possible,—and if not, from a jug lifted up two feet at least from the ground, lose not a moment in pouring upon the wound a perpetual stream of cold water for a quarter of an hour; but touch it not with the hands. While the cold water is pouring on, prepare three quarts of warm water, strongly impregnated with soap. The water must on no account be hotter than the heat of warm milk. Put these soap-suds in a jug, raise the jug two feet above the wound; and pour these soap-suds upon the wound for ten minutes, so as to search the wound. Then get about a pint of ink-water, if you can, and pour it upon the wound for about five minutes: then resume cold water from a jug or pump, at the distance of two feet, and take care to continue to pour it for a quarter of an hour at least, and more than twenty minutes is not necessary. But if there be no ink at hand, then, after the washing of the wound with warm soap-suds, it must be washed with cold water a second time, for not less than twenty-five minutes. All the while the wound must not be touched with the hand. Almost everything depends upon this first washing; and it should be continued in different forms for three quarters of an hour at least. When this washing is over, put upon the wound a poultice of radish pretty strong, or a poultice of mustard, and take care that the poultice is not more than the warmth of milk. Continue this poultice for two or three days—but not more; and let three poultices be put on every day, one in the morning, one at mid-day, and one at night. Upon the second or third day, let the patient take the Ormskirk medicine, if at hand. This medicine is useful, but not of itself sufficient to cure. Upon the third day, leave off the poultices, and put upon the wound a very mild mercurial plaister. The mercurial plaister should be put on, morning and evening, for six weeks; and on each occasion the wound should be cleansed with milk and water nearly tepid, but never hot, and generally dried with soft lint before the plaister is put on. It is of the utmost consequence for the wound not to be suffered to close for ten weeks; and for the three or four last weeks after the mercurial plaister has ceased to be used, a very mild plaister should be used to keep the wound open. Care should be taken for this plaister not to be of an inflammable kind; and it should be put on twice in twenty-four hours. For these ten weeks, the wound must never be squeezed nor touched with the hand; nor should any weight lie upon it for the ten weeks, by night or by day. During the whole of the ten weeks, the patient must most carefully abstain from all fermented liquors, and all sauce-meat and roast-meat whatsoever. For the first three weeks or a month, he must live upon very mild broth, and tea, and barley-water; after a month, he may for the first six weeks take a very small quantity of boiled chicken, or boiled mutton without fat. This low diet is of the greatest necessity. The patient must take aperient medicine very frequently, and, if he can afford it, a musk medicine, of which latter he should take half a pint every day. This musk medicine, though very useful, is not absolutely necessary.

The foregoing directions are necessary for ten weeks; and, after the ten weeks, some very fine lint should be laid upon the wound till it heals up; but, by all means, let the wound be kept open for the ten weeks, during which time the patient must have no exertion of the body or mind; and all conversation about the misfortune should be discouraged. He must avoid all extremes of heat and cold; he must not be exposed to easterly winds, or to rain; he must not sit near a fire; every day he ought to lie down two or three times, for half an hour at a time. If any body will read lively stories to him, so much the better; but he should not himself be fatigued by reading. He should walk out once or twice a day, for half an hour at a time, but very gently. When ten weeks have elapsed, he may resume his usual employment in a moderate degree; but he must avoid all excessive labour for three months after the bite. The chief dependance is upon the first washing before the poison has spread: and no dependance is to be placed upon combustible materials. Let heated tobacco pipe, and all other heated or heating medicines, be avoided most carefully. By all means be particular in respect to the first washing, as above described.

II. AN ANECDOTE.—In the remote village of Hol-lym, in Yorkshire, there lived a man of the name of Marshall—a small farmer. One day he was applied to for relief by a poor inhabitant of the village:—"You should learn to be independent," said he; "eat muck, drink water, and live out of doors."

III. ANOTHER ANECDOTE.—When Robert Hall, the celebrated preacher, first of Leicester, and next of Briatol, was much pressed by a minister, who had been holding forth before him, and who had accompanied him into the vestry, to say what particular passage he most admired (in the discourse), the wit at length but reluctantly, disposed of the importunate vanity by saying, "The passage from the pulpit to the vestry."

IV. AMBER.—Most eminent authors considered amber to be an exudation from poplars; and many modern naturalists account for its origin by supposing that it once proceeded from certain trees. Theophrastus and Lucian, however, seem to have held it to be a native fossil. Almost all the writers of antiquity speak of its being produced on the banks of the Po; and to account for this mistake, it has been supposed that their earlier authors applied the term Eridanus to the Rhine as well as to the Po.

V. PROTOCOL.—The word Protocol comes from two Greek words, meaning the "first sheets" of a work. It was first introduced into the English language from the Russian tongue, by the late Marquis of London-derry, during the diplomatic discussions after the down-fall of Bonaparte, in the metaphorical sense of "a first draught" or "minute of proceedings."

VI. BOROUGHMONGER.—This word was first intro-duced by Sir Francis Burdett, about the year 1812. He was speaking of his first appearance in the House of Com-mons; his guardians had made a bargain for a seat with the Duke of Newcastle, who liked to do what he willed with his own property in boroughs; and, after having spoken of this disgracefully corrupt traffic in boroughs, by way of greater emphasis, called the vendors of them Borough-mongers, and thus fixed their title among the friends of free election.

VIII. GLASS.—Aristophanes is the earliest writer who makes mention of glass. The glass of the ancients was made of sand, soda, and flint. It must have been in very general use about the Christian era, and after-wards, as we find Dioscorides giving directions to keep certain medicines in glass-vessels. It also appears from Lactantius, that glass was likewise used in windows; and accordingly glass has been found in the windows of many houses in Pompeii.

VIII. AN ANECDOTE.—When William Godwin, the celebrated writer, was in early life preaching to a con-gregation of dissenters, his audience dwindled off by degrees till he was standing a fair chance of being left alone with the clerk. Alarmed at the occurrence, but fearful (oh, the vanity of the human heart!) that the matter of his discourse had excited some disgust, he sent the clerk to see if anything had happened in the vicinity to cause the dispersion. The clerk soon re-turned with a rueful countenance, announcing the existence of a fire. "Oh!" said the imperturbable Godwin, "you have quite relieved me!" The lurking vanity of the man was thus made apparent.

[The late talented scholar, Mr. Edmund Henry Bar-ker, of Thetford, was an intimate friend of the Editor of The Teetotaler, who possesses many very curious manuscripts by that gentleman. These papers he will from time to time lay before his readers. Mr. Barker was deservedly considered to be one of the first classi-cal scholars of the age.—Ed. Teetotaler.]

ORIGINAL POETRY. THE ALPINE ECHOES.

By W. T. Moncrieff.

When wakes the light at early dawn,
Then, from his distant mountain-home,
I list to hear my lover's horn,
Which seems to say, "I come!"
And as from Alp to Alp the sound,
By echo waited, speeds to cheer,
Nearer and nearer each rebound
I hail, and joy to hear!

When sunset tints our glaciers bright
With rosy hues, then forth I rove,
And whisper, in the waning light,
The name of names I love!
And still as to the vales around,
Farther and farther, less and less,
Echo to Echo wafts the sound,
Then Echo's aid I bless!

SONG.

Oh! no, 'tis not in festive halls alone
That hearts are glad, and bliss is in the eye;
'Tis not where mirth assumes its loudest tone
That bosoms are ne'er heard to heave a sigh.
No—let me seek the shady grove
With her for whom I languish—
And there apart from anguish,
We'll breathe our vows of constant love.
Appealing to the powers above.

For in the eye of Beauty there's a bliss
Which far exceeds the effects of madd'ning wine;
And he whose heart can melt at charms like this,
Will shun the dissipated libertine.
Oh! see a maiden's beaming eye,
Upon your glance stealing,
With rays of tender feeling,
Sweeter than planets in the skies,
Will leave a trace that never dies.

But while our lips may press the brimming bowl,
Where is the lasting sense of bliss convey'd
By magic powers into the ignom soul?
Where is the deep impression to be made?
Not on the brain—not in the heart
Can Bacchus' rosy finger
Trace aught that e'er will linger:—
'Tis Love alone who has the art
To stamp that which will ne'er depart!

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We beg to inform numerous correspondents, who have favoured us with specimens of their poetical talents, that we cannot find room for even a hundredth part of the best of them. We do not court communications of the kind. For good prose articles we feel grateful.

P. S. Y. must know that he is asking a most absurd question. No individual of the name of Reedy, is employed as an Agent of the United Temperance Association. We caution all Teetotal Societies and Hotels against the representations of an impostor of this name, who has just been levying contributions at Manchester upon pretensions the most false and disgraceful.

We wish the secretaries of provincial societies would take the trouble to forward us occasional accounts of their proceedings.

The letter containing a posting-bill headed "Temperance Commemoration," never reached us until a few days ago. We shall always be glad to insert anything connected with the Mariner's Church. All communications for the Editor should be forwarded to the care of Mr. HENDERSON, PUBLISHER, 2, OLD BAILEY.

We shall have much pleasure in complying with the request of A Young Teetotaler, and will write the letter for him if he will forward his address.

We shall always be glad to hear from J. A. (Sbrowsbury).

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 30, 1841.

THE late and lamented Mr. HUSKISSON, in a prophetic spirit—and he was a far-sighted man—observed, when the Manchester and Liverpool railroad was first opened, "A new power has been introduced among men; and no individual living can tell to what extent that power will be carried." By the united principles of railroads and steam, the distant parts of the British empire seem to be themselves united, giving and receiving, from the rapidity of traffic and intercourse, the most important advantages; and to Ireland in particular we look, as likely to derive, in the march of civilization, much greater proportionate improvement in the Irish character and disposition.

The same may be said of the new doctrine of Teetotalism. "A new principle of moral reformation has been introduced into society; and no individual living can tell to what extent the beneficial effects of this reformation will be carried." The whole aspect of society must shortly wear a new face; and the appearance of the public streets will also undergo a proportionately progressive change. Health, and industry, and virtue will be recognised in the moral world; and in cities, towns, and villages, Mechanics' Institu-tutes, Libraries, Museums, and Lecture-rooms will occupy the former sites of gin-palaces, beer-shops, and other places of infamous resort.

In one respect alone should Teetotalism be looked upon with a favourable eye by those who really have their country's welfare at heart: we allude to the impulse given by this new doctrine, as one of its necessary results, to the diffusion of the benefits of education amongst the people. When we consider the important fact stated by the DUKE OF WELLINGTON a short time ago, in the House of Lords, that he had made particular inquiry about the number of persons committed to several criminal gaols, and who were able to read and write, and that he had discovered that very few indeed were able to read, and still less to write,—when this fact is duly weighed, the grave necessity of advocating all measures which are calculated to diffuse the benefits of education becomes apparent. Ignorance is a most fertile cause of crime; and the public mind should be enlightened, disabused of its grosser prejudices, and disenchanted of its more seductive superstitions. These desirable ends will be brought about by means of education; and education will receive its principal impulse from the beneficial effects of the doctrines of Teetotalism.

When the intellect is not clouded by the vapours of alcoholic liquor, and when the time of the working man is not wasted in the tap-room of a public-house, due attention will be paid to the means of mental cultivation; and the BIBLE will not only be read, but understood. The work-ing man will then be enabled to decide which possesses the greater, the more real, and the more permanent attractions—the drunken orgie, or the intellectual evening. The song "We won't go home till morning—till daylight doth ap-pear," shall yield to the truths of that one which sings the praises of "Home, sweet home—there's no place like home;" and the smiles of happy children and an affectionate wife shall supersede the vulgar familiarity of a pot-house landlord, and the obscene discourse of dissolute companions.

The attention of the Teetotal world is at this moment directed towards a gentleman whose strenuous efforts in the good cause are recognised and duly appreciated on all sides. We allude to JAMES SILK BUCKINGHAM, ESQ., who, when a member of Parliament, first drew the notice of the House of Commons to the causes, condi-tion, and effects of intemperance in the United Kingdom. MR. BUCKINGHAM is now zealously engaged in advocating the cause of Total Ab-stinence from all Intoxicating Liquors, and in encouraging the Teetotalers of England to pur-sue their labours with renewed zeal, in imita-tion of the example nobly set them by the in-habitants of the United States of America. Teetotalism has taken so deep and firm a root in America, that no power can now possibly disturb it with any probability of success; and it will be the fault of the Teetotalers themselves if the same may not be said of the condition of the principle in England. When we find men of rank and importance in society coming for-ward and generously espousing the principle which can alone regenerate the working and la-bouring classes of the country, we should indeed feel encouraged to prosecute our philanthropic aims with increasing vigour; and, at the same time, we should mention with pride, with respect, and gratitude, the names of EARL STANHOPE, MR. BUCKINGHAM, MR. WALKDEN (of Pinner Park), MR. TROTTER (of Dyrham Park), SIR CULLING EARDLEY SMITH, BART., &c. &c. The reformation, which has originated with the working classes, is rapidly obtaining the support of the wealthy and aristocratic portion of the commu-nity; and those who will not yield to the force of conviction, will eventually succumb beneath the pressure of an efficient moral agitation.

The more we consider the necessity of Union amongst the Teetotal Societies of the metropo-lis, the more we are determined to advocate this principle with unabating zeal. Anti-Teetotalers are daily exclaiming, "How can a principle be so good, when it has succeeded in dividing you into sects and parties?" and it must be remem-bered that a principle or a doctrine is very fre-quently judged by its collateral, as well as by its direct results. We again call upon the various Total Abstinence Associations of the English metropolis to take into their immediate considera-tion the necessity of appointing delegates to meet at some fixed place, for the purpose of debating upon the means of uniting all Teetotal sects and parties in London and its suburbs beneath one banner—with one name—subject to the same laws, and moved by a common interest. This is not a matter for the consideration of committees of societies; but for the discussion of the mem-bers of the societies themselves. If a few ac-tive individuals will only agitate this principle—the principle of Union—the object can be effected speedily, and with facility. Let those members of each Auxiliary, Branch, or independent so-ciety in the metropolis, who really wish well to the progress of the cause, at once appoint their delegates to carry out the object in view. Com-mittees must yield to the wishes of members; and the Teetotal world would no longer be agi-tated with party disputes and party jealousies.

We appeal to the real friends of the Teetotal reformation,—we call upon those who are anxious to save themselves from the stigma of selfishness and personal interest,—we address ourselves to those independent and truly zealous supporters of the cause, who will sacrifice all private animosity to a great public good,—and we implore them to lose no time in adopting those measures which will lead to the fulfilment of a general wish, and an universal benefit. Wherefore should there be a dozen different societies in London to advocate the same principle? Wherefore should the slender means of all the Teetotal Associa-tions—slender when considered in reference to the work that remains to be done—be rendered more slender still, by the necessity of paying for numerous officers? Let all the Societies unite, and the expenditure of management and govern-ment will be reduced in a ratio which alone ren-ders such union a most eligible measure. We trust that this appeal to the true friends of the cause of Teetotalism will not be made in vain: we know that the disunion amongst the metropo-litan Societies is viewed with regret both in London and in the country; and we shall feel proud to record the names of those individuals who will now come forward to take into consideration the best means of effecting A GENERAL UNION OF THE TEETOTAL SOCIETIES OF THE METROPOLIS AND ITS SUBURBS.

FRENCH CHARACTERS CARICATURED.

NO. VII.—THE ACCUSED.

WHEN called upon for his defence, the accused commenced as follows:—

"Gentlemen, I might here question the competence of this tribunal to try my case; but all technical subtleties are repugnant to my character and my morality. I will consent that you shall be my judges on earth—with this reservation, that I may appeal to the tribunal of Heaven. I shall, however, enter upon my defence with the full conviction that I possess the ear of the court.

"Gentlemen," continued the accused, "on a former occasion I was brought up for trial before other judges, on a charge of ignorance of the laws of mine and thine."

"Say an accusation of robbery," exclaimed the president.

"Well, I will not dispute relative to the meaning of words: I will say, if you like, that I was arrested for a robbery committed by means of a false key. You will now see, by the straightforward and manly history I am about to give you, to what an extent the judges who then tried me must be now tormented by the tape worm of remorse. I was living in a receptacle for travellers—"

"Say an inn," cried the president.

"If it be a system resolved upon to stop me in the midst of my defence," shouted the accused, "I shall shut myself up in the silence of a satisfied and calm conscience, and shall hold my tongue."

"Go on; but be brief," said a judge.

"I thank the court for its kindness," proceeded the accused; "and after my acquittal, which cannot fail to take place, I shall proceed to each judge's house to thank them all individually and separately."

"The court only requires your answers to its questions," said the president.

"The court requires talking but not visiting," pursued the accused: "very well—I shall endeavour to satisfy the tribunal! I therefore continue my defence. I was saying that I was accused of robbery by means of a false key: now this is the real history of the case. In a room in the inn, or hotel, or tavern, in which I was residing,—in a certain room, I say, the door of which was open, I saw a closet, of which I mechanically took the key. I put the said key into my pocket, quite abstractedly—just as I should have taken another trifle, or toy, or the innocent plaything of a child. You will understand, gentlemen, that the closet was empty, and the room was itself at that period unoccupied. A few days afterwards, a traveller arrived at the inn. He was very well dressed—his coat was green—his trousers grey—his—"

"You can omit those details," said the president.

"In a word, he was attired like an honest man," proceeded the accused; "like a man who is respectable, and who desires to be respected; in fine, he was dressed as you and I should be dressed, gentlemen, on such an occasion. That man travelled, they said, with property of a considerable amount about him;—I use the words they said as a corrective to the idea; because I have always denied most strenuously that that individual travelled with any property at all. He was a great deal too well dressed for that. A physiological system of observation has invariably convinced me that there is more to steal in an old coat than in a new one: I should be sorry if any one were to entertain an evil impression of my character in consequence of this avowal; but what is said is said. Well, to return to this traveller. He placed, or fancied that he placed, or it was thought that he placed a considerable sum of money in the closet; and—"

"But since you had taken away the key," interrupted the president, "how could the traveller have put his money into the closet?"

"It is precisely this point upon which the interest of the whole trial hinges," answered the accused. "The landlord of the inn, not finding the real key of the closet, went to a locksmith, tumbled about all his old rusty keys, and at length selected one which seemed to him to resemble that which he had lost. By aid of a file, this key was made to open the identical closet of which we are speaking. This was the key which the landlord gave to the traveller, and which the traveller put into his pocket. All this was of immense importance to the case."

The accused paused, took a pinch of snuff, and proceeded thus:—

"One day, in a fit of abstraction peculiar to those who devote themselves to intellectual pursuits, I mistook the traveller's room for my own, entered it, and, thinking all the while that I was at my own cupboard, I took out the key which I had for some time in my pocket, and opened the said closet. I introduced my hand and was just fingering a few pieces of gold, which, in that moment of mental abstraction, I fancied to be my own, when I suddenly perceived my error. But in a moment I was astounded by the demoralising, degrading, and unfashionable cry 'Police! police!' and 'Thieves! thieves!' I contented myself with smiling. Ten minutes afterwards, by a strange chain of circumstances, I was myself in chains. When I was tried at the court of assize, I put the judges quite at their ease, and confessed an intention to plunder, in order not to mystify the question; but I strenuously denied having made use of a false key. I had opened the closet with the real key—the legitimate key—the original key—the key which I myself had taken out of the cupboard-lock. If any one in that transaction had made use of a false key, it was the traveller; inasmuch as his key was not the proper one, but merely an old rusty one used for the purpose. Consequently, it was this traveller who should have been at least reprimanded, if not punished, for having made an illegal use of an instrument which opens locks. Would you believe it, gentlemen?—I failed in convincing the jury of my innocence! My friends, however, sympathized with and consoled me. It is therefore true, perfectly true, gentlemen, that I have been unfortunate in a court of justice on a former occasion; but misfortunes are always to be deplored and respected. Besides, if it be true, as the counsel for the prosecution has declared, that I am in the habit of thieving, I am to be pitied, and not blamed, because it is evident that I cannot resist the force of my inclinations. I should accordingly be treated as a monomaniac, and not as a rogue. However, in this instance, I am accused of having sold lead for gold: and twenty witnesses sustain the indictment. All I can say is, that I deny the imputation forty times; and as two negatives are as good as one affirmative, it is evident that you must direct my acquittal."

The judges seemed, however, to think differently; and the jury having declared a verdict of Guilty, the accused was sentenced to the full extent of the punishment required by the code for his offence.

SIR WALTER SCOTT.

AMONG the different high and illustrious names that distinguish our literary history, during the first part of the nineteenth century, none stands higher than that of Walter Scott;—and yet, if we analyse the nature of his claims to so glorious a reputation, we shall find some difficulty in establishing them on the ground of just and impartial criticism. None of his works exhibit the traces of profound thought, or indicate his possession of the power to investigate the moral and intellectual workings of the human individual or of society:—in fact, he was totally deficient in that mental element which is essential to the philosophical historian; and hence we may account for his wretched failure, when he attempted his ponderous abortion of Napoleon's life. Neither was the more practical portion of his mind—that which Dugald Stewart would denominate "its active and moral feelings," of more solid structure than his speculative faculty. His political notions, if indeed he may be said to have had any of his own, were little better than pure prejudices imbibed from his parents, and from his own peculiar studies;—he had not a mind that could entertain a great question in all its length and breadth, with a view to the good of society in general. He lived amongst "barons and mighty men of old," not in his imagination only; but he carried their proud bearing and aristocratic contempt of the lower classes into his consideration of present times. His political biases are very obvious and often unpleasantly prominent throughout his writings; and whenever an opportunity occurred for the public expression of his feelings, we have always found him the zealous advocate of principles which are now deemed untenable. Of his vanity we need only the proof furnished by his own favourable review of one of his own books in the "Quarterly Review," and of his lamentable infirmity of moral purpose, the chain of events that first embarked him in trade, and at last involved him in ruin;—but delicacy requires that we should throw a veil over so painful a subject.

Scott began by being a poet; and a very popular poet he was; but whether his stores were exhausted, and the freshness of his imagination faded, or whether the public taste had changed, his latter poems met not with that encouragement which his former productions easily commanded. The true reason of this failure we suspect to be the structure of the author's mind. He had many of the accidental qualities that aid in the constitution of a real poet; but he was deficient in the essential feature—a practically creative imagination. We have said practically creative—because, if we denied his possession of imagination altogether, we should at once convict ourselves of folly. He could create, and did create, resemblances to living characters; he endued with life, and breathed emotions into them, and he made them act on the scene in harmony with their own character and their own times. He had, besides, a fresh and lively fancy, by which he was enabled to adorn his works with fragrant beauties, charming both to the eye and ear; but still he possessed not the poetic imagination—the power, as we would define it, of not only producing a striking resemblance to living nature, but of giving to it a certain spirituality and etheriality that is rather a beau ideal than a reality of human nature, and an intensity of feeling that extraordinary circumstances alone can elicit; and he had no idea whatever of that grandeur of conception, both in scenery and in character that is essentially requisite to form the genuine poet. Had not Scott abandoned the profession of poet, and become the prolific parent of some twenty or thirty highly popular romances, his name would long ere this have been consigned to the tomb "of all the Capulets," and his memory would be preserved only in the pages of the old "Edinburgh" and "Quarterly" Reviews. But Scott has lived, and will live; and the sun of his glory, as a writer of fiction, has reflected its rays upon his poems—the less brilliant and less successful labours of his youth. Some of our readers may be inclined to dissent from the opinions we have just advanced, and to charge us with illiberality in thus criticising the illustrious dead:—but truth must be told; and we fearlessly appeal to the candid and competent for the confirmation of our allegations. The more pleasing task of speaking of his excellencies as the first of modern romancers—the father of a school peculiar and distinct in its character—remains.

The paths of Fielding, Smollett, Le Sage, and Richardson had been so often trodden, and with such success, that Scott very wisely struck out a new path for himself, and resolved, if possible, to be the sun of a new system. The result has been the most triumphant success. In the earlier years of his life, he gave up much of his time to the study of the national character in all its various phases; and in the subsequent and more fully occupied periods of his career, he omitted no opportunity, afforded by a temporary repose, for increasing the accumulated stores which his wonderfully retentive memory placed fully at his command. He understood the Scottish character thoroughly, and acquired a profound knowledge of all the workings of the human feelings; and his retentive memory was so deeply impressed with them that he was enabled to transfer them to paper with a vivacity and a power that give the characters in which he embodies these borrowed conceptions the stamp of the highest genius and originality. He moreover possessed a fund of humour, which enabled him, at will, to diffuse drollery amongst some of his representations of character. He was, moreover, peculiarly fortunate in his designation of scenery; and he was not the mere describer of inanimate nature. He could infuse life into his scenery and fill it with bustle and agitation:—in short, he was well acquainted with what may be called the melo dramatic department of romance.

In addition to his other abilities, he possessed one which heightened the charm of all the rest: we mean his admirable skill in interweaving and disentangling the plots of his stories. In his best productions we cannot but admire the masterly facility with which he blends and harmonises the lighter and more sombre parts of his pictures—the gayer and graver scenes in his bustling dramas, and the thorough command of his resources, evinced by the style in which he conducts all the actors, both of the plot and the by plot to their proper place in the catastrophe.

The antiquarian research of Sir Walter Scott was by no means superficial; it was profound. His observation of national character and individual peculiarities was not the employment of his leisure hours only, but a habit of which he could not divest himself; the dry and facetious humour which gives piquancy to his comic characters was essentially his own, and adorned his private fire-side at Abbotsford, as well as the books issued to the public. His graphic powers as a painter of scenery and animated nature were so great as to raise a general impression that he was the first in rank since the days of Froissart; and his talent in the composition of his various materials—perhaps the most astonishing of all his excellencies—was without its match in the previous history of romance, and has not yet met with its equal. In conceding thus much of praise to the memory of Sir Walter Scott, we have cheerfully done an act of justice. We must, however, record his universal failure in all his attempts to dramatize the intense passions of the human soul, and to represent the nobler part of our moral composition. In a word, the essence of tragedy had no existence in Sir Walter Scott. He who wrote the poems might have written the Waverley Novels; but had they been written by different persons, we may fairly infer that neither could have written tragedy. Scott shewed his wisdom in not attempting it. His heroines and heroes themselves are usually uninteresting, and act only secondary parts in his novels, the important position being usually assigned to another order of personages, such as witches, spirits, or gipsy impostors. These characters are sketched with great power; and although we should be unable to discover their prototypes in real life, they give such an intenseness of interest to the events which they seemed to control, that—however much in strict justice we might object to them—we should, under existing circumstances, regret their removal. His best characters, it must be acknowledged after all, are those historical personages for whose portraiture we have the best authority from old documents.

The opinions we have here given very freely, and in the face of a nation who blindly adore Sir Walter Scott as the most splendid genius of the nineteenth century, have not been advanced without much consideration; and as these observations are written only for the purpose of exciting a spirit of enquiry into the sterling excellences of this great man, we are not anxious that our readers should fall in with our own opinions on a question which may be viewed in so many different ways, and which, after all discussion, will finally be resolved into a question of taste.

THE OLD CLUB-ROOM.

SOME thirty years ago I was a young man just entering upon "Life," and prone, as most young men are, to partake largely of its enjoyments. In the same way was I equally unable, in my noviciate, to discriminate between those pleasures which are lasting and productive of peace, and those which bring dishonour and unhappiness in their train.

My name soon became associated with all kinds of gaiety. The first at the festive board, and the last to leave it, I was looked upon by my companions as the life of the fraternity—as one whose proper atmosphere was in the precincts of a tavern.

One evening my companions, who were at all times bent upon practical jokes, drugged my liquor freely with opium; and when the compound began to produce its natural effects, they locked me in the club-room and sallied forth for the night.

I know not rightly when the liquor I had taken first produced forgetfulness, for the glass, the song, the jest, and the loud laugh might have continued present to my imagination long after they had ceased in reality. Suffice it that I relate my visions thus:—

Methought I was far away, and in a pleasant land. I had become a sojourner in a little village which pain and sorrow seldom visited. Sheltered from the rude winds by green hills of gentle declivity, the low white cottages were clustered in a quiet valley, and wore the aspect of rustic simplicity and peace. Health and industry walked hand in hand together along the fruitful fields; and virtue listened with a pleased ear to the sound of the Sabbath-bells, and infused her gentlest influence into the hearts of all. Here I was accepted the affianced lover of a sweet maiden—a fair-haired and blue-eyed girl, of soul as pure as if it had never come in contact with the shadow of earth. With her by my side the hours passed in an ecstasy of delight, and I scarce could say 'twas noon ere the low sweet song of evening fell gently upon my ear from the half-closed casements of the village-church.

Amidst all this happiness, there were moments when I reverted to the past, and drew a pleasing comparison between the rite in which I had indulged and the peaceful sobriety of my present state.

Time rolled on swiftly, and I stood beside the altar with my chosen one. The sun looked brightly on us; the venerable minister officiated with a pleased air; and then came the congratulations of those around—the warm pressure of the friendly hand—the smiles and tears of the bride and her fond mother,—and then the scene with all its happiness closed upon me for ever!

Tired of a peaceful life and weary of being happy, I was again among the number of those who revel idly and laugh loudly while the pleasant things of earth are around them, and who shrink into dishonoured graves when the winter of their life arrives. Once more a frequenter of the old club-room, my visits were oftener repeated and of longer duration, and each evening's carousal rendered my step more and more unsteady. Strange to say, my wife, who I always thought loved me dearly, made no attempt to save me: she regarded me with undisguised scorn, and, holding her pale child closer to her bosom, paid but little heed to the hours of my going out or returning home. I knew that I was doing wrong, and could have often knelt to her and prayed for forgiveness; but her cold look often appalled me, and I shrunk from her like a beaten hound.

Meanwhile my pecuniary resources were failing fast, and I was rapidly destroying my constitution and my character. My days were spent in a tavern; and my nights sometimes at home, but more frequently in wandering about—I scarcely know where.

One evening, when I had not been home for some days, I was passing my little dwelling when I saw my wife, with hair dishevelled, and wringing her hands wildly and running to and fro, as if in search of help. I had a strange foreboding that something had happened to the child; and, pressing forward, I rushed up stairs, and in a moment stood by her side.

Poor child! how dreadfully she had changed since I saw her last;—her eyes had grown hollow; her little cheek was hot and sunken; and her whole frame had wasted rapidly. I feared that she was dying, and raising her little head gently in my arms begged of her to forgive me. At this juncture my wife returned with a medical man, who administered some medicines which revived the child. But he looked hard at me, as he felt her pulse, and said that nourishing diet was immediately necessary. My eyes were now opened to a state of things of which I had not even dreamed. But my resolve was soon taken; and, telling them I should return immediately, I emerged once again into the dark streets.

It was not long before I met with a well-dressed passenger; and, watching my opportunity, when none else was near, I demanded alms. He bade me in a surly tone begone; but I kept close to him and wept, and told him of my dying child and her pale mother. He turned away and said there were hundreds worse off than I. I sprang at his throat and swore he should relieve me. He uttered loud cries for help; and I knew that his loud voice would be heard. Exasperated beyond measure, I grasped him tighter and still tighter, until I knew that he was dead. I threw him from me, and bounded forward. Attracted by his cries a mob was already gathering at my heels; but I flew with the speed and the strength of a madman. On came the pursuers in full cry; and I could see the flashing of their torches, and hear the trampling of horses mingling with their shouts. Taking advantage of a sudden turn in the road, I entered a house; and, gliding upstairs, took shelter in the first room I saw. Strange to say, it was the Old Club-Room with all the paraphernalia placed ready for one of those evenings' amusements which had been so destructive to me. I had scarcely time to observe this much ere I heard the shouts of my pursuers below. They had tracked me; and, with the eagerness of blood-hounds, they rushed upstairs, and burst into the room. I struggled fiercely with them; but they grasped my wrists tightly, and the pain—awoke me!

It was morning—and I found myself in the hands of my young companions, who had returned to wake me and enjoy their jest.

Somewhat too subdued to be angry with them, I pleaded illness and gained the quiet of my own home. I there fell into a raging fever, from the effects of which I did not recover for many months.

I am now verging towards old age, and have been married many happy years; but I have never seen the Old Club-room since that night of a dread and appalling vision; for the reminiscence of that warning dream has never left me,—and I have not dared to re-visit the haunts of dissipation and intemperance!

REVIEWS.

Every Family's Book of Health and Domestic Economy. 16mo. pp. 86. London: W. Strange.

THIS work promises on the title-page to show its reader how to preserve health and keep house with cheerfulness, frugality, and comfort. It also comprises a number of valuable receipts, including several peculiarly interesting to Teetotalers. The contents of the book amply and faithfully fulfil the preliminary promises of the author; and in respect to the observations which are connected with the doctrine of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, we quote the following extract:—

"Fermented liquors are the well-known source of wide-spreading mischief; and it is gratifying to think that the Teetotal societies are doing so much to set aside the use of them. * * * Ardent spirits of all description are poisons, and should never be taken unless diluted with water, and then only for medicinal purposes."

When an individual has determined upon signing the pledge of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, he should also resolve to enter upon a system of healthy and economical domestic arrangement. In order to do this efficiently, he should commence by dispensing one shilling upon the purchase of this little work; and that immediate outlay of a small sum will save him the subsequent expenditure of many large ones. The contents of the work are devoted to the following subjects:—Health and its Constituents, The Nursing and Treatment of Children, The Education of Children, Bodily Health in General, Receipts for Domestic Use, Diet and Domestic Economy, The Economics of Housekeeping, Receipts for Domestic Use, &c. The following receipt for making coffee may be taken as a good specimen of the general correctness of the information given in this book:—

"In making coffee, much care is requisite to extract the whole strength and flavour of the berry; and moreover, it is very erroneous and most expensive to sweeten it with raw or moist sugar. Many persons imagine that the moist sugar tends more to sweeten; but if experiment be made, it will be found that half the quantity in weight of refined or white sugar will add more sweetness, and the flavour of the coffee will be much more pure and delicate. In Holland, where coffee is the universal beverage of the lower classes, the sugar cannot be too refined, and the boatmen on the canals may be seen mixing the most beautiful refined sugar with their coffee; and on such their custom and taste they pride themselves highly. It requires but little thought to acquiesce on this departure from our custom; and when economy is blended with such judgment, it is only necessary to call the attention of those whose means naturally excite them to seek for facts combining what is cheap and what is best."

Sandell's Mechanical System of Teaching Penmanship. Book No. I. London: W. Brittain.

THIS is a new and excellent system of teaching children the rudiments of penmanship. The strokes, pen-hooks, hangers, and letters are all traced in a pale red ink upon the several pages, and the business of the pupil is to mark over them with a pen full of black ink. By this method the hand is practised, and the correct form and fashion of letters are acquired. This is decidedly a system which only requires to be known to become popular. An individual may by these means teach himself to write without the aid of a master or instructor.

The Dictionary of Arts and Sciences. Published in Monthly Parts. Part I. pp. 32. London: W. Brittain.

The Magazine of Science, and School of Arts. Published in Monthly Parts. Part XXI. pp. 32. London: W. Brittain.

THESE excellent publications are eminently deserving the attention of those who are anxious to make themselves acquainted, for a small sum, with all that is useful, ornamental, or necessary, in respect to the arts and sciences. The first of these publications is chiefly devoted to an explanation of scientific and technical terms, instruments, materials, and processes. Those who are accustomed to attend philosophical lectures, or to read scientific books, will find the Dictionary of Arts and Sciences to be a most invaluable companion to their studies. The work is embellished with numerous and beautiful wood-cuts, and will form a handsome volume, when complete. How it can be published at the cheap rate at which it is issued, is a matter of astonishment to us, skilled as we are in all the wonders of the press, both from observation and experience. The Magazine of Science must be spoken of in similarly plauditory language. The wood-cuts in this monthly publication, which is issued at the ridiculously cheap price of sevenpence each number, are executed in the first style of the art, and impart great value to the book. Both these publications reflect the highest credit upon Mr. Brittain, whose enterprising spirit in such works should be well rewarded. We should like to see a good general biographical work, for the people, issued in a similar style: at present the poorer classes have no means of obtaining an insight into the lives of many great and eminent men, dead and living, whose biographies are confined to expensive "lives" or encyclopædias.

The Cook; or The Ladies' Kitchen Directory. Edited by a Lady. Published in Monthly Parts. Part IV. pp. 32. London: W. Brittain.

THIS work, which is "devoted to the use of the fair sex," contains receipts sufficient to make the mouth of an Apicius water. The English must really understand more of the art of the kitchen, than their Gallic neighbours suppose, when we contemplate the immense numbers of Culinary guides that are published. Of all the works we have yet seen upon the subject, this is decidedly the best, Murray's edition of a similar publication alone excepted.

The Ladies' Cabinet of Fashion, Music, and Romance. Number for February. London: G. Henderson.

THE January and February numbers of this elegant little bijou are unusually good. We copy out the following amusing tale:—

THE HAUNTED BRIG.

It was on a beautiful moonlight night when we were in the tropics, as I was hard and fast in the lee of the launch, very busy sleeping, that my person was saluted and my nap cut short from a kick from old Harry Wilson, one of our quarter-masters. "Haul your wind out of this," said he "you've watched the cable about long enough; heave and weigh. I don't care if I come to an anchor;" and so saying, he took possession of my moorings; but as he carried too many guns for me, there was nothing to be said, and I quietly submitted, and prevailed on him to spin a yarn.

The scene was in complete keeping with the subject: the full, beautiful, tropical moon, shone in unclouded splendour, and old Ocean lay outstretched basking in her effulgence, lulling himself to sleep with his own eternal anthem, "the moonlight music of the waves."

Our ship was quietly ploughing her way through the almost unruffled surface of the deep. The wind was fair, though light, and our immense folds of spotless canvass were spread before it, glistening in the moonbeams, and ever and anon, crimsoned with the phosphoretic illumination of the ocean, so common in the tropics.

Our decks were nearly silent; the sailors lay around in groups, dreaming, either sleeping or waking, of that happy home and all its endearments, to which we were rapidly hastening; for, delightful truth, the sloop-of-war was "homeward bound." Those "who live at home at ease," can form no estimate of the delicious sensations caused by those two words, in the bosom of the poor sailor, far away on the deep. In cold or heat, in storm and tempest, "homeward bound" is the saviour of all afflictions, the watchword of joy. The man at the wheel, when relieved, would say, "her course is north, Jack; homeward bound." Such was the state of things on our decks, when old Wilson began his yarn.

"It's now going on thirty odd years since I one day drifted along to Blackwall, and saw there a brig, called the 'Rising Sun.' She was as neat and pretty a craft as an old tar would wish to clap eyes on—clinker built, black hull and painted ports, with long, heavy, raking masts and black yards. Thinka I, that is the stuff for trowsers, so I shipped aboard of her, and the next day we were at sea.

"For the first week we had had fair winds, and everything went on regular, but after that, there began to be the devil to pay, and no pitch hot. One night when we were sailing along with just wind enough to give her steerage-way, crash went something aloft, and a man in the top hailed the first-mate; 'main-yard's carried away in the slings, sir.' 'Mainyard carried away?' growled the mate, 'why, there is not a capfull of wind aloft.' 'Main-yard carried away?' said the old man, sticking his head up the companionway; 'why, the devil's in the brig!' He was right the devil was in the brig, as we found to our sorrow.

"We turned to and slung the yard again and got everything snug, and went on our course, but we didn't feel easy; and one fellow began to tell how he had heard of a brig called the Rising Sun, which was haunted; but he didn't think, in England, that this was the one, and so had said nothing. Well, we were talking and guessing about it, when this same fellow, Starboard Tom, sung out so sudden, that we all jumped up as if the brig was afire. 'I say, shipmates,' says he, 'I'll tell you how we'll know, if this is the same craft. The haunted brig had a red spot on the deck of her fo'castle, as big as a man's head, close by the stanchion, amidships. We all run down into the fo'castle, and here, sure enough, at the foot of the amidships-stanchion, was a dark-red spot—a spot of blood! 'Tom,' says we, 'how came that there?' 'Why,' says he, 'I was told that the crew mutinized at sea, two or three years ago, and when the captain came down into the fo'castle to see a sick man, one of the ringleaders killed him with an axe, and that spot is where his head struck when he fell. The crew robbed the brig and left her, and she was picked up by a man-of-war and taken into Dover, and lay a long time, and nobody would ship in her. And, I 'spose, when the owners found they couldn't get any hands for her there, they sent her round to London, to man her, and so we're all sucked in; I shall never forget how I felt that night. I ain't afraid of anything as long as I can see it; but to be aboard a vessel that's haunted! I can't stand that.

"We went on for two or three days, expecting that something more would happen, when one day, about dusk, Carpenter went down into the fo'castle, to get something out of his chest. He was a big, brave fellow, who didn't care for anything, and had said all along, that he did not believe the brig was haunted at all. He had not been down there but five minutes, when we heard a little noise, as if a man was strangling, and trying to call for help; and the next thing, we hear a yell of agony, and Carpenter burst up the hatch; his face all black, his throat black-and-blue, his mouth wide open, and his eyes starting out of his head; and looking back, as if something was chasing him, he screamed out—'Oh, he's choking me!' and fell senseless on deck. Well, some run for one thing, and some for another, and after working at him a long time, he came to. When he was a little better, we asked him what was the matter. 'Why,' says he, trembling all over, 'when I had got what I wanted, out of my chest, I turned into my berth, and, as I rolled over, I thought I heard something moving in the fo'castle, so I turned round to see who it was, when I was knocked back into my bunk, and I felt two hands choking me, though I could not see anything, and I tried to get away, but I could not stir; but, just as I begun to give up, I felt something on my cheek, like a man's cold breath, and then the hands let go, and I sung out, and run on deck.' That was enough for us; we all felt as if we were doomed. That night no one went into the fo'castle, but we all lay on deck, in the lee of the long boat. Starboard Tom had the first wheel, in the mid-watch, and all the rest of us lay asleep, forra'd. The second-mate had the deck, and was leaning over the weather-rail asleep and the captain was below in the cabin. About three bells, Tom thought he saw something moving on the weather-gangway, walking fore and aft, like a man on watch; but as it was dark, he could not make out what it was; so he stood watching it, and as it grew plainer, it looked like a man dressed in white, and he was so scared, that when it was four bells, he did not dare to call his relief, but stood looking to see what would happen. About five bells, it disappeared, and Tom was getting ready to hail for his relief, when up came a man out of the cabin, dressed in white flannel drawers and shirt, and a white nightcap, and Tom thought it was the skipper. It went to the weather-rail, and looked into the face of the second-mate, who was leaning there asleep, and stood so for five minutes.

"Now," thought Tom, 'stand by for squalls; the old man is going to blow up the second-dickey, for being asleep on watch.'

"Just as he thought so, the figure turned round, and walked forra'd, and Tom stood looking after it, when suddenly the real captain stuck his head up the companionway, and sung out.

"Tom, how do you head, there?"

"Oh! the ghost!" cried Tom, and fell down in a fit; and we had to work at him a long time to bring him to. But things got quiet again, and the night passed off without any more disturbance.

"The next day, about four bells in the forenoon watch, the captain called for Carpenter to bring a small chisel into the cabin, and ordered him to make two little holes in the pannels over the head of his berth. Now, I believe, he had spoken to the ghost, and he had told him there was money hid there, and that was what he haunted the brig for. At any rate, we had no more trouble with the ghost; and as the captain was for carrying sail, he cracked away on her, so that we made Cadiz in a fortnight. We discharged our cargo, and loaded again and the fore-hold was stowed with horns.

"We had been at Cadiz about six weeks, and were to sail in a day or two, when one day, towards dusk, I was down in the fo'castle and as I lay in my bunk, I heard the horns in the hold rattle as if some one was toasting them about at a great rate. Now we had stowed them as tight as they would wedge, and I thought the devil himself could not make them fetch away; so I determined to see what the matter was. The next morning, when the hatches were taken off, I looked into the fore-hold, and there the horns were wedged just as we left them!

"That was enough for me, and I run away that day, and went aboard a ship bound for London. Two days after, the Rising Sun sailed, and in a week we followed her. We had been out to sea about a week, when, one morning, a lookout aloft sung out, 'Sail, ho! We bore down on the craft, and about noon we got within speaking distance. She was a brig, standing the same way we were, with all sail set, stunsails on both sides, and yet she did not make much way.

"We hailed her, but she said nothing; we hailed again, but still she said not a word; and we then saw that there were no men on her decks. So our captain spoke, says he, 'They are all fast, keeping watch below; we'll turn them out, before the brig falls overboard.' And he sent a boat to board her, and I was one of her crew. As soon as I got on her deck, I knew her. She was the Rising Sun! Everything on deck looked right, and she was going regular enough before the wind, but there was no living thing to be seen. Jackets and shoes lay knocking about decks, as they always do. The people's chests were all in the fo'castle; and the captain's dunnage was in the cabin, as if he had just been writing. Nothing was taken away, nor anything left adrift; every rope was belayed right, and coiled up regular, and the decks were clear. The log-book lay open in the first-mate's state-room, and a pen, with ink in it, lay athwart it, and at the end of the last day's work (about a week before) was this—'A strange man seen on the fore-castle'—and then a mark, as if he had begun to write something else.

"That was enough for us. We hauled off as quick as we could, and got aboard our own ship, and made sail to get away; when suddenly, a tall, black man appeared on the fo'castle of the Rising Sun, walked slowly aft, and then went down into the cabin. The brig gave a heavy lurch to port, and went down head-fo'most; and so ended the voyages of the Haunted Brig. What became of her men nobody knew? they were never heard of to this day."

ORIENTAL FRAGMENTS.

BY JAMES SILK BUCKINGHAM.

THE interest that has recently been excited throughout all Europe, by the efforts for renewing the ancient communication between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, on the one hand, and the opening of the route to India, by the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf, on the other, has directed public attention to whatever could elucidate the question, as to whether the Red Sea and the Mediterranean could be advantageously united, by means of a canal, from the one to the other, so as to shorten the communication between western Europe and eastern Asia, and thus avoid the long and generally stormy voyage round the great continent of Africa, by the passage of the Cape of Good Hope.

Having taken an early and a prominent part in the inquiries which were instituted on this subject, during my travels in Egypt, I was specially solicited by its present ruler, Mohammed Ali Pasha, to undertake a journey across the Isthmus of Suez, for the double purpose, first, of examining the capacity of that port to receive vessels of a considerable burthen, and inspecting its anchorages; and secondly, of traversing the desert lying between the Red Sea and the Mediterranean, with the view of ascertaining whether any vestiges could still be traced of the ancient canal, said to have been begun by one of the Pharaohs, completed by Darius, and continued open up to the time of the Ptolemies. The object of these inquiries was not the mere gratification of a geographical or antiquarian curiosity, though that would have been motive sufficient to induce me to undertake the task; but it was intended as a prelude to the re-opening of the ancient commerce, which, before the circumnavigation of the Cape of Good Hope, by Vasco Da Gama, was carried on extensively and profitably by this route, between Europe and India, by which indeed Alexandria had been enriched, and by which Genoa and Venice acquired such opulence and power, as to reign sole arbiters of the dominion along the shores of these two seas.

I accordingly entered into the project with zeal, believing that whatever might be the privations of the desert journey, I should be gratified by its novelty; and hoping, that beside my own personal gratification, some public good would result from the investigation on which I was about to enter.

It was on the evening of the 14th of February, that I took my leave of the Pasha, and of the numerous friends with whom I had enjoyed so many agreeable days in Cairo, and adopting their advice, to make the journey as privately as possible, so as to avoid the danger of being followed and plundered by the way, I prepared for travelling in the garb of an Arab of the humblest class, being now sufficiently qualified for this, by my knowledge of the Arabic tongue.

DEPARTURE FROM CAIRO.—TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 15th.—I had slept but little, from the diversified thoughts by which I was agitated during the night; and stirring with the earliest dawn, we were dressed and equipped before sunrise. After receiving a letter of credit on Damietta, in case of our visiting that place, as well as the firman of the Pasha, to be shown only in case of need, we repaired to the okella, or stablea, where our camels and their driver lodged. This individual, whose name was Phanoose (literally a lantern, or a light for the path), was a Bedouin Arab, from the mountains near Horeb and Sinai; he had been long known among the merchants of Egypt for his tried fidelity, and was constantly entrusted by them to be the bearer of large sums in gold and silver between Sinai, Tor, Suez, and Cairo. He was thus charged for a journey at present, and to his care and protection I entirely committed myself. The great caravan of four thousand camels had departed from Cairo for Suez on the preceding evening, and coinciding with him in his opinion that it was best to avoid their track, and journey by the less frequented road, to the northward of their course, we left Cairo by the Bab-el Nasr, or Gate of Victory, about nine o'clock.

Our dresses were those of the Arab Fellahs, or Egyptian peasants, consisting of a simple shirt of blue cotton, over one of coarse calico next the skin, a coarse muslin turban for the head, and a woollen sash for the waist, with red slippers, and a blue cotton melyah, a kind of shawl thrown loosely across the shoulders in the day, and serving for a slight covering at night. We had each long full beards, and wore sandals on our feet. Our provisions consisted of a small supply of bread, rice, butter, dates, a few hard boiled eggs and salt, some coffee, tobacco, and a goat's skin of water; our cooking utensils comprised only an iron kettle for boiling rice, and a small coffee pot with two coffee cups. Our arms were a sabre, musket, and pistols each, all of the most ordinary quality, to prevent their exciting envy, or a desire in others to possess them; and these, with a straw mat for sleeping on, and a Bedouin cloak, or Burnoose, for a night covering, with the indispensable requisites of a pipe and tobacco-bag, completed our simple travelling equipage.

Taking a course almost due east from the gate we had left, we passed on through a narrow defile, or valley, formed by the near approach of two small but steep hills, projecting against each other like bluff capes in miniature, leaving the 'Birket-el-Hadji,' or the Lake of the Pilgrims, the general point of rendezvous for caravans, to the north of us. The pace of our camels appeared to me light and easy, and as they bore only the few small sacks of money confided to the care of the Bedouin, beside our own baggage, their rate of progress was never less than a league in the hour. The weather was favourable for our journey; and Phanoose occasionally broke the silence of the desert by the songs, with which he cheered his camels, so that I felt my spirits growing lighter with every step we took.

We halted for an hour about noon, and made a hearty, though a hasty meal, when overtaking a small caravan of Arabs bound to Tor, we joined their humble camp, for mutual protection, about two hours before sunset. Our salutations at meeting were rather like those of long absent friends than that of perfect strangers, and their rude hospitality had in it a sincerity which enhanced its worth. The camels were unladen, and suffered to feed upon the few dry herbs scattered among the sands, which, in addition to their want of moisture, had the bitterest taste that could be endured. The sacks of grain which formed the lading of those bound to Tor, were ranged on each side of us, as a shelter from the wind; our arms were mustered and examined, and we felt ourselves in a state of security.

The party we had joined were named Moosa, or Moses, a deaf grey-bearded old Bedouin, Abdallah, a negro from the mountains beyond Habesh, or Abyssinia, and Suliman, and Hassan, two Arab boys, which was now increased by Phanoose, our guide, and myself. The boys being immediately despatched to collect sufficient fuel for the night, Abdallah served us with coffee, prepared over a fire of dried camel's dung, collected on the spot. Our pipes were filled from each other's sacks, as a usual interchange of compliment, and my ready acceptance of a pinch from Moosa's snuff-box (for the Arabs who frequent Cairo have learnt this habit of the Europeans there), brought us at once upon a footing of intimacy.

As conversation became general, it was soon discovered that my language as well as colour, was not exactly that of the Bedonins; the Arabic spoken in Egypt, though pure, differing materially from that of the desert; and to pass for a Turk, though perfectly easy in the present instance, would have been of no advantage, their whole race being hated and despised by the Bedonins. I therefore confessed myself to be a traveller from the west, wandering over the eastern world in search of knowledge and of good men; and as this elicited an expression of applause, mingled with surprise, and my protector, Phanoose, honestly avowed that my life was upon his head, all things seemed likely to be turned to our advantage. Interesting as the task would have been, I found it impossible to remember the whole of the conversation which arose upon this single topic: namely, the avowed rarity of finding wisdom or honesty among men, and the grounds on which I hoped to meet with it in my travels through the world, for such appeared to them to be the state of the argument implied by my confession. But though this discussion was long, it was ingenious, and entertaining even to the end.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

TEETOTALISM IN THE ARMY.

A SERGEANT in the 86th regiment, now in Ireland, has formed a Teetotal Society in that corps. From a letter written by this individual to a Teetotal comrade in the Guards, we extract the following sentences:—"I am rejoiced to hear that your members are increasing in your Battalion. Surely the blessing of God has attended our several endeavours to redeem our country from intemperance; and this conviction should give an impulse to renewed exertions. The persecutions I endure will only make me the more zealous in advocating the cause of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors. The spread of the Gospel will avail nothing, so long as with our missionaries we send forth a stream of liquid fire to destroy the morals of the heathen. I often carry my thoughts to our deeds in the Peninsular War, and blush for our fellow-countrymen when I read of the atrocities committed by our troops in Spain, in the moments of intoxication. Rape—murder—plunder, were the characteristics of that warfare! On this account, I am particularly anxious to see our army purged, in respect to the dreadful habit of intemperance."

COUNTRY NEWS.

CUMBERLAND.

We have been favoured with the following interesting intelligence, by MR. GOWLAND, the well-known Temperance Advocate:—

"I have the pleasure to inform you, that the glorious cause of Teetotalism is rapidly advancing in Cumberland. I have just completed a tour through the country; and have lectured in Carlisle, Wigton, Aspatria, Allonby, Maryport, Workington, Whitehaven, Cockermouth, Keswick, and Penrith. The doctrine is spreading among all classes of the community, and the good already accomplished is a matter of delightful contemplation. The festival at Workington was celebrated the week before last, and upwards of two hundred signatures to the pledge were obtained. Men are beginning to think for themselves instead of treading in the beaten paths of our forefathers, or entrusting their highest interests to the protection of others;—and while it is a cause of rejoicing to hear of the success of our southern brethren, be assured we are not idle in the 'North country.'"

SHREWSBURY.

Our correspondent at Shrewsbury informs us, that he attended the first Teetotal meeting ever held at Hofton, which is a place on the Holyhead Road, near Shrewsbury. This meeting, which was held on the 12th instant, produced the most beneficial results. At the commencement of a lecture delivered by Mr. BLACKWOOD, the audience showed a disposition to receive the doctrine most favourably; and twenty-five converts were made at the conclusion of the address. It appears that up to this period the inhabitants of Hofton had been very much opposed to the mere name of Teetotalism; but our correspondent felicitates the cause upon the success which its advocates experienced there, as elsewhere. He enquires, "Why should not the peasantry of our country be aroused from their lethargic state of ignorance to a sense of the value of intellectual pursuits, through the medium of Teetotalism?" Our correspondent, who was himself once a spirit-dealer, is now a staunch disciple of the principle he so nobly advocates.

On Wednesday evening, January 20th, a meeting was held in the Welsh Chapel, Mr. DRAYTON in the chair. Two reclaimed drunkards addressed the audience with considerable effect: and they were followed by Mr. BROWN and Mr. DRAYTON.

MANCHESTER.

The Teetotalers of Manchester are about to make a grand display of their numbers and importance, and to convince their opponents that they are not to be intimidated by the wealth and influence brought to bear against them. They are determined to break the drunkard's chains, and prevent the moderate-drinker from ever wearing them. The festival meetings are admirably attended in this town. On the 17th instant, the Northern District Teetotal Society held a grand Tea-Meeting. A Mutual Improvement Society has also been established at Manchester. The Anniversary meeting of the Manchester Society took place on January 8th; and several important changes occurred in the election of officers for the present year. Crowded meetings have been held by the Peter-street and Fairfield-street Branches.

On Monday, 18th, there was a crowded meeting in a large room beneath the Saint Michael's Sunday School. On the evening of the 20th, the members of the Teetotal Mutual Improvement Class held a meeting in the Temperance Assembly-rooms, George Leigh-street, and proposed the following question for discussion at the next meeting:—"What influence has the sober man over the moderate-drinker?"

BARNESLEY.

A CROWDED meeting of Teetotalers took place at the Catholic Chapel, on Sunday evening, January 17th. On Monday, January 18th, a meeting was held at the village of Ardsley, and MESSIEURS T. LISTER and SMITH delivered effective addresses. A crowded meeting was also lately held at Smithy Mills, where Mr. Lister lectured. Many of the villages near Barnsley are very anxious to form Teetotal societies.

TOWN NEWS.

SOUTH LONDON CATHOLIC TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

ON Tuesday evening last, Mr. Fitzgerald delivered a lecture in the Temperance Hall, near London Road, to a numerous and respectable auditory. Mr. F. took a rapid view of the various objections urged against Total Abstinence, which he combated to the satisfaction of the meeting. The lecturer then drew an interesting picture of the advantages, domestic and social, which must result to Ireland from the national adoption of Total Abstinence principles, and appended to his countrymen for the sake of their father-land to strain every nerve in promotion of the good cause. This branch has been very successful in its warfare against the baneful practice of intoxication.

VIRGINIA STREET CATHOLIC TOTAL ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

ON Sunday evening, according to announcement, MR. KELSEY delivered a lecture in the Glass House, opposite the entrance to the London Docks, East Smithfield, on "the evils of Intemperance as manifested in the physical and moral degradation of its victims." The lecturer, in a most eloquent address, established the fact that the yearly increase or decrease of crime and death was in the same ratio as the increase or decrease of the use of alcoholic liquors.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

THE anniversary of this Society was celebrated by a splendid meeting at the Aldersgate-street Chapel, on Wednesday, January 20th. At eight o'clock the chapel was crowded to excess; and many elegantly-dressed ladies were present.

At eight o'clock precisely, the President of the Association, JOHN BILTON, Esq., entered the chapel, attended by the Members of the Executive Committee, and proceeded to take the chair, amidst the most rapturous applause. The platform then presented a most interesting appearance, being crowded by the most influential advocates of Teetotalism in London. At a quarter past eight, the Executive Committee of the Chelsea Auxiliary entered the chapel, with its banners and Union Jacks. The great banner of the Association was suspended between the two windows over the platform.

MR. BILTON addressed the audience in terms of congratulation on the flourishing condition of the United Temperance Association, and expressed the deep interest which he felt in the cause.

MR. POCKNELL (the Secretary) then read the First Yearly Report, a considerable portion of which appeared in our journal of last week.

MR. JOHNSON proposed the first Resolution, which was that "The Report be adopted." Mr. Johnson made a most able speech upon the necessity of Union amongst Teetotalers, and denounced in severe terms the malignity of the opponents to the United Temperance Association. MR. CRUMP (the Registrar) seconded the Resolution, and also spoke upon the necessity of Union.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS proposed the second Resolution, which was "That the United Temperance Association pledges itself to exert its most unremitting energies in furtherance of the cause of Teetotalism, and to effect the objects of Union, upon which principles this Society has been formed." Mr. Reynolds said that he took that opportunity of announcing the circulation of The Teetotaler as a proof of the progressive nature of the doctrine of Teetotalism. The Teetotaler enjoyed a circulation of ten thousand copies weekly; and he had no doubt but that in six months this immense amount would be doubled. MR. BAYLIS seconded the above Resolution, and gave an interesting account of a late tour which he made to Bath and Brighton, where Teetotalism was rapidly progressing.

MR. FARMILLO (of the Chelsea Auxiliary) moved the third Resolution, "That MR. BILTON (the President), MR. POCKNELL (the Secretary), MR. EMBERSON (the Treasurer), and MR. CRUMP (the Registrar), be continued in their respective offices for the year 1841." This Resolution was seconded by MR. GRIMSHAW, and supported by MR. CURRIE (of Chelsea). Mr. Currie made a most able speech in favour of the principle of Union, which is advocated by the United Temperance Association.

All the above Resolutions were carried unanimously. When the business of the evening was over, MR. PHILLIPS (of Northampton) made a most impressive speech upon the doctrine of Teetotalism. A vote of thanks to the President was then proposed by MR. BIDDLE; and, after three cheers for the United Temperance Association, the meeting separated at eleven o'clock. This was one of the most brilliant Teetotal Assemblies ever held in the metropolis.

WORKING MAN'S TEETOTAL SOCIETY.

We have just been informed that a society under this title has been recently established, and that a public meeting for its recognition will be held at Aldersgate-street Chapel, on Thursday, the 4th of February, when the Rules, which are of the most liberal character, and an address from the Committee, will be submitted to general attention. A working man will preside. Weekly Committee Meetings, which are open to all members, are to be held every Tuesday evening, at Dennis's Coffee House, Jerusalem Passage, Clerkenwell.

CLERKENWELL AND PENTONVILLE YOUTHS' TEETOTAL SOCIETY.

THIS society, we are happy to hear, has greatly increased latterly in the number of its members. The committee labour most energetically, and their exertions continue to receive every species of encouragement. On the 7th of the present month they opened a new place of meeting at Eagle-court Chapel, St. John's-lane, Smithfield, and here their meetings continue to be held regularly every Thursday evening. This association has also established a Mutual Instruction Society, which is to commence its operations in April next. On Monday evening, the 15th of February, the Anniversary Meeting of the Society will take place at the Parochial School-rooms, Amwell-street, Pentonville. Sir Culling Eardley Smith, Bart., will preside, and many eminent ministers and other favourites are expected to attend.

CHELSEA AUXILIARY TO THE UNITED TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS has promised to deliver a lecture, upon the nature and effects of alcoholic liquors, to the members of this auxiliary, on Friday, February 5th, at the Temperance Hall, 56, George-street, Chelsea.

TEMPERANCE HALL, SHOREDITCH.

THIS place of meeting (late the Standard Theatre) was crowded to excess, on Monday evening last, by the members and friends of the Huxton and Finsbury Youths' Teetotal Association. The audience was composed of most respectable persons; and the whole scene was exhilarating and encouraging in the extreme. The following gentlemen addressed the meeting:—MESSIEURS T. W. GREEN, (the chairman), G. W. M. REYNOLDS, BIDDLE, PHILLIPS, BUTTE (a liberal-minded French gentleman, who gave a handsome donation in aid of the funds of the Association), J. PALMER, MINGATE SYDER, and BROWN. MR. WILLIAMS (the secretary) read a most interesting address to the audience.

MATRIMONY.—The following beautiful extract is from "Family Lectures":—"A great portion of the wretchedness which has often embittered married life, I am persuaded, has originated in the neglect of trifles. Connubial happiness is a thing of too fine a texture to be handled roughly. It is a plant which will not even bear the touch of unkindness; a delicate flower, which indifference will chill, and suspicion blast. It must be watered with a shower of affection, expanded with the glow of attention, and guarded with the impregnable barrier of unshaken confidence. Thus nurtured, it will bloom with fragrance in every season of life, and sweeten even the loneliness of declining years."

We beg to call the attention of the Reader to the 2nd Number of a second Series of Illustrations, which is given gratis with "THE TEETOTALER" of this day. The Series will be complete in Twelve Illustrations, and will be continued for as many consecutive weeks.

Published by GEORGE HENDERSON, 2, Old Bailey, Ludgate-Hill; and sold by W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row; D. Campbell Glasgow; Machen & Co., Dublin; and all Booksellers.

PICKWICK MARRIED.

CHAPTER III.

THE READER IS HERE RENDERED FAMILIAR WITH THE MORNING'S OCCUPATIONS OF MR. PICKWICK; AND IS ONCE MORE INTRODUCED TO THE FAMILY OF THE WHOLESALE GROCER IN WOOD-STREET, CHEAPSIDE.

Mr. Pickwick passed as tranquil and comfortable a night as a man might be expected to do, after having spent the previous one in a station-house with no other companion than one of the largest of the rat-species. It was about half-past eight o'clock when Mr. Pickwick started from his slumbers, and in another moment started from his bed also. His white cotton night-cap was uppermost on his head, and Miss Teresina Sago uppermost in his mind; and as the idea of this interesting young lady danced through his imagination, he himself danced with joy.

The morning was a beautiful one; and although the snow lay thick upon the ground, it was by no means cold. Carried away by the enthusiasm of his imagination, Mr. Pickwick bethought himself of calling upon the grocer's family in the course of the day: and his next impulse was to rush to the window, in order to see what kind of weather it was likely to be. The window looked upon a yard at the back of the house; and Mr. Pickwick did not therefore for one moment hesitate to open the casement, and protrude his illustrious head, with the cotton night-cap upon it, forth into the open air, that he might gaze around him.

"What a lovely morning!" said Mr. Pickwick, soliloquising aloud: "and how happy does all nature appear around!" (The immortal gentleman could see nothing beyond the backs of a few houses, and the exquisite proportions of two or three stacks of chimneys.) "The breeze, instead of imparting a chillness to the air, is absolutely refreshing! Behold that noble cat—how joyously she walks along the wall! Alas! that some scoundrel of a boy should have this moment knocked her off with a brick-bat! And now I catch a partial glimpse of a happy domestic, cleaning his master's boots and shoes in the next yard! There—now he has knocked over the blacking-bottle; and, oh! how he does swear! Still it is a lovely morning—a very lovely morning! The busy hum of this great city is commencing; and everything reminds us that myriads of industrious inhabitants have already commenced their daily avocations! How sweet must be the toil which earns the daily bread! The sound of martial music playing in the park, and the cry of the muffin-boy, break upon the silence of the morning. The sun looks forth from the azure canopy above, and the sweep from the summit of yonder chimney—"

"Sweep!" exclaimed the shrill tone of this last object of Mr. Pickwick's sublime musings.

"Alas! poor boy—thine is indeed a hard fate!" said Mr. Pickwick, still musing aloud, while emotions of the purest philanthropy were awakened in his mind by the contemplation of the soot-begrimed urchin, who sat between two chimney-pots on an adjacent house-top: "thine is indeed a hard fate! All toil, and no pleasure for thee, poor boy! Even thine innocent sports—thine harmless pastimes—thy childish tricks, more amusing than annoying, are all denied thee! At this moment, suffering child do, I behold—"

It is impossible to say what Mr. Pickwick beheld at that precise instant; because, scarcely had he reached this truly affecting portion of his soliloquy, when a hard and somewhat ponderous snow-ball, aimed at his cotton night-cap by the unfortunate boy on the top of the chimney, hit him upon the right eye, and compelled him to withdraw his head from the window, as if he were suddenly shot. It was thus that another striking example was afforded of the ingratitude which invariably awaits upon sympathy and kindness in this world.

Mr. Pickwick had looked out of the window, in a good humour with himself and all the world; and he returned to his dressing-table in an equal degree of ill-humour with himself and all the world. From this circumstance another great moral may be deduced—showing upon occasions how easily the wind of circumstances might blow round the vane of the human feelings. Mr. Pickwick fully comprehended the force of this reflection: he could not, however, understand why the blow should light direct upon the eye.

In the midst of these meditations, and just as Mr. Pickwick's legs entered the little black gaiters, Mr. Samuel Weller's person entered the room.

"Mornin', sir," said that functionary.

"Good morning, Sam," returned Mr. Pickwick, whose equanimity of temper was restored when he saw the florid and healthy countenance of his faithful valet: "nice weather this."

"I've seen wusser, sir," replied Mr. Weller. "It's exceedin' fresh, fine, an' healthy; an' so I've been out just to exercise these wery elastic paytent ever-movin' limbs o' mine."

"Ah! it's a fine morning for a run, Sam," said Mr. Pickwick, enveloping his chin in a coat of lather, which set off the remainder of his expressive countenance to great advantage: "and it is on such a day as this that a man feels his own importance—that he enjoys health and spirits—that he is proud of being a free-born Englishman—"

"Oh! wery proud o' that there indeed, sir," interrupted Sam: "an' them pleasant little feelings o' pride is wery powerfully excited ven a great hulking feller, with a bagginet in his hand, tells you with a impudent voice that you can't enter the park gates, 'cos you've got your undress veskitt on."

"What do you mean, Sam?" demanded his master, whose ideas of the glorious freedom of Englishmen were somewhat disturbed by this observation.

"Wot I means is this here," said Sam, "that no von as isn't vell dressed can't go into the parks; an' so the workin' man stands no chance o' walkin' in them pleasure grounds for vich he helps to pay, if so be he ain't got a precious good coat on his back. Poverty's a wery great crime in this country, as the overseer said to the pauper."

"Any news this morning, Sam?" enquired Mr. Pickwick, after a considerable pause.

"Why, sir," returned Mr. Weller, "I ain't heerd o' nothin' very new, that I know of. I did get up early to go an' see a feller cut a caper in the air."

"A tight rope dancer, I suppose," said Mr. Pickwick complacently.

"Ah! a precious tight rope indeed, sir," replied Sam, shaking his head.

"You don't mean to say that there was a man hanged this morning, Sam?" exclaimed Mr. Pickwick, in whose mind there rose a scintillation of the proceeding to which his valet alluded.

"Never was more serious in my life, sir."

"Who was the criminal that suffered, Sam?" demanded Mr. Pickwick.

"A man, sir, askilled his wife in a fit of intoxication," was the answer. "A wery peaceable, an' quiet man he was too ven he was sober—a inoffensive, say-nothing-to-nobody kind of a feller. But ven he was in liquor, my eyes—sir, what a owdacious feller he were to be sure. You see, sir, that since the government took the hextra duty off spirits, them kind o' cases has greatly increased. Laws makes drunkards, sir, and laws punishes 'em."

"That never struck me before, Sam," exclaimed Mr. Pickwick, "I really think the government ought to forbid the use of strong drinks."

"An' if so be they was to do it, sir, wot 'ud become o' the revenue?" asked Mr. Weller hastily. "Did you ever see a costermonger, sir, as felt any pity ven he wolopped his donkey, if so be that wery self-same identical donkey was the cause o' putting more money in its master's pocket by running a little bit faster. Vell, sir, so it is with the government: they doesn't care wot becomes o' the people, so long as they drains the money out on 'em somehow or another."

"There is a great deal of truth in your observations, Sam," remarked Mr. Pickwick, as he completed his toilet.

"Hooray for breakfast then," ejaculated Mr. Weller. "Mr. Snodgrass is already at work."

"What, with his pen, Sam?"

"No, sir—with his jaws. Muffins an' eggs is all a gettin' cold; but Mr. Snodgrass always keeps a strong cup o' tea for you. The childreu has all been a askin' arter you too. What wery nice quiet, well-behaved young creatura they is: young lions is nothing to 'em."

"So full of life and spirits, eh—Sam?" said Mr. Pickwick as he descended the stairs.

"Oh! wery, sir," was the answer; "an' so wery amiable too. I caught the eldest boy filling your best hat with snow-balls this mornin', when I come down, and puttin' coals into your great-coat pocket. They ain't by no means particular to a shade or two what they do. They're jist like young bears, sir; all their sorrows is to come. It's lucky that they don't know all as is in store for 'em, as the nobleman said ven he set the man-traps to catch the poachers."

The moment Mr. Pickwick made his appearance in the parlour, all the little Snodgrasses rushed around him; and welcomed him with the most unfeigned delight. Mr. Snodgrass and his wife, who were discussing muffins and domestic economy, abandoned the latter to help their friend to the former; and the breakfast passed away without any incident worthy of record. After breakfast came the newspaper, and Mr. Snodgrass prepared to read it to Mr. Pickwick, while the children withdrew to make a noise in the nursery, and Mrs. Snodgrass a pudding in the kitchen.

"Any news?" said Mr. Pickwick.

"We'll see in a minute," replied Mr. Snodgrass, turning and folding the paper in such a way as to get at the most interesting columns. "Ah! here seems to be something which will interest the world:—'REPEAL OF THE CORN LAWS. At a moment when the dearness of bread is calling the attention of all classes of society in England to the present universally execrated system of the Corn Laws, we should be wanting in our duty to the public, as honest journalists, did we not mention any source of comfort, with which we are acquainted, and which may serve as a partial consolation for the tyranny of oppressive political systems. The world will doubtless be anxious to be made aware of such an indemnification for hours of suffering and musing; and it is with a purely philanthropic and humane view that we allude to Rowland's Macassar Oil?'"

"Pshaw!" ejaculated Mr. Pickwick, who had been sitting on the tenter-hooks of expectation and suspense during the reading of this paragraph, and in a pleasing state of wonder and uncertainty at the nature of the blessing which was to recompense Englishmen for the tyranny of a political system.

"Bless me, what do I see now?" cried Mr. Snodgrass, starting as if he had trodden upon a snake, and writhing very much like one upon his chair.

"What is it?" demanded Mr. Pickwick impatiently.

"I cannot—no I cannot find courage to read it!" cried Mr. Snodgrass, a prey to violent emotions.

"Then I must," said Mr. Pickwick; and snatching the paper out of the hands of his friend, he in a very short time found his visual organs attracted, as if by magnetic influence, to the following astounding statement:—

"PICKWICK IN TROUBLE. A short and rather stout gentleman was placed at the bar, charged with being drunk and disorderly in the streets on the previous evening. It appeared, from the evidence of Policeman Bludgin, of the K division, number six thousand nine hundred and ninety five, that the prisoner came dancing along the Strand at about three o'clock in the morning, in a state which plainly indicated that his legs were as unsettled as his ideas. The prisoner was howling a stanza of some Bacchanalian song at the top of his voice, and imitating the crowing of cocks, and performing other vocal variations in a manner calculated to alarm her majesty's liege subjects. Policeman Bludgin kindly and politely remonstrated with the prisoner upon the impropriety of breaking the peace. The prisoner replied that he'd see the peace at the devil before he'd break it, and then set up a more appalling shout than ever. Policeman Bludgin again remonstrated with the prisoner, who very quietly began to take off his coat, and then laid himself down upon the steps of a door, requesting the policeman to tuck him up and call him at nine, when he should want hot water to shave with. The constable, it appears, was himself leaning against the shutters of a house-window, as he remonstrated with the prisoner upon the indecency of his conduct; when the prisoner suddenly started up, swore that the policeman was a pump, and took the policeman's arm, which he worked forcibly up and down under the agreeable impression that it was the pump-handle. The policeman now called for assistance; and by the aid of six other constables of the K division, the prisoner was conveyed to the police-station in Bow-street, after a most desperate resistance. Upon being placed at the bar, he was asked who he was; and to the astonishment of all present, he gave his name as SAMUEL PICKWICK. His identity with that celebrated traveller and philanthropist was then immediately recognised; and Mr. Pickwick was allowed to depart, after having been fined five shillings for his night's sport."

"It is an abominable tissue of falsehoods!" cried Mr. Pickwick, throwing the journal indignantly upon the floor.

Mr. Snodgrass took up the newspaper, and read the whole report over again for his own especial behoof. When he had terminated the perusal thereof, he recommended his illustrious friend to write a letter to the Editor of the journal in question, and furnish a correct version of the whole proceeding. To this advice Mr. Pickwick assented, and despatched the history of the adventure to the office of the paper which had published the misrepresentation.

As soon as this matter was disposed of, Mr. Pickwick continued his perusal of the newspaper, in order to wile away an hour until the arrival of the happy moment when he was to proceed to the city to call in Wood-street, Cheapside. The journal was unusually full of that miscellaneous kind of information which is denominated "Chit-chat;" and several paragraphs struck Mr. Pickwick's capacious imagination with the importance of their subjects. First he read of how the Queen had sat down to dinner at precisely seven minutes and a half past eight on the preceding evening; and then he came to the case of a poor man who had not had any dinner at all for the last three days. Next his eye caught sight of a paragraph which stated that the Queen had expended a hundred thousand pounds upon building suitable stables; and then he arrived at the distressing announcement that thousands and thousands of weavers in Spitalfields were unable to procure bread for their starving families. This paragraph was followed by another to the effect that the silk weavers of France were in a most flourishing condition, in consequence of the large orders their employers had received from several great houses in London, especially from the English establishments which supplied the ladies of the court and the Royal family. In another part of the journal was a statement that a man had just killed his own children and attempted suicide himself, in order to avoid the workhouse; and the very next paragraph to this was the pleasing intelligence that her Most Gracious Majesty had just purchased a very handsome monkey for a hundred guineas. These and other equally amusing and diverting pieces of information—all tending to show the prosperous state of the country, and to support the often repeated assertion that England is the happiest and the freest country in the world—were perused and conned by Mr. Pickwick, in the various cells of whose fertile memory they were duly distributed. The reader will of course understand that they have merely been detailed by us, in these Memoirs, in order to convey an idea of the miscellaneous contents of newspapers to those who never read them.

As the clock struck one, Mr. Pickwick summoned Mr. Weller, and these two gentlemen proceeded to the city together, the former inside of an omnibus and the latter on the outside. After having stopped precisely seven and twenty times between the Gloucester Coffee-house and Cheapside, the omnibus deposited our hero and his follower within a few minutes' walk of their destination.

"Well, Mr. Pickwick," exclaimed the wholesale grocer, as soon as our hero made his appearance in the drawing-room; "we were just that moment talking of you."

"Indeed," said Mr. Pickwick, bowing most politely to the young ladies and to Mrs. Sago; "there's an adage, you know, which says—'Talk of the old gentleman, and he will appear.'"

"So there is!" ejaculated the grocer, poking the fire—not because it wanted poking, but because he wanted something to do.

"My uncle the Alderman always used to quote proverbs," said Mrs. Sago; "and one day he got himself into a dreadful scrape by doing so. Did you ever hear of it, Mr. Pickwick?"

"No, ma'am, I did not," was the answer delivered by our hero, who had one optic fixed upon Miss Teresina, the other upon her mamma, and his spectacles upon both.

"Ah! well—I'll tell it to you another time," said Mrs. Sago. "Teresina, dear, shew Mr. Pickwick what you have been doing this morning."

"What! that foolish thing, ma?" ejaculated the young lady, colouring up to the eyes.

"Yes, dear—you know you needn't be ashamed of it," returned the mother. "The truth is, Mr. Pickwick," continued this lady, "that my daughter Teresina Hippolyta has begun a beautiful bead-purse, which she intends to present to you, as a small acknowledgment of her gratitude for your kindness the other night. We should not have mentioned it now, only Teresina intended to embroider your name upon one side of the purse, and she wants to know whether you have any other Christian name than Samuel."

"None, ma'am," said Mr. Pickwick, with a smile; "and I really cannot sufficiently express my thanks to your charming daughter for her kind attentions."

"And now I have something to say," observed Mr. Sago, with a complacent air. "We are going, Mr. Pickwick, to have a ball in the city—at the London Tavern—for the benefit of the distressed Cannibals of the Society Islands; and I am sure that for so philanthropic a purpose I shall not ask for your co-operation in vain."

"Oh! dear no," said Mr. Pickwick; "but don't you think that the funds would be much better disposed of if they were to be devoted to our own distressed countrymen?"

"Wouldn't do, Mr. Pickwick," was the immediate reply vouchsafed by the grocer;—"wouldn't do, sir,—never should get up a ball for such a purpose—has been tried a thousand times and failed. The fact is, Mr. Pickwick, that the rich families in London will patronise anything the extraordinary nature of which will insure publicity, because their names stand a chance of getting into the newspapers. For instance, last year we had a ball for the benefit of the distressed Cherokee Indians, without knowing whether there really was any distress amongst them or not; and the year before that we had one for the purpose of supplying the Bedouin Arabs with flannel-jackets, flannel being very useful in hot climates. But here's the prospectus of the ball for next week."

"Oh! that's it—is it?" said Mr. Pickwick, to whose eyes Mr. Sago displayed a beautiful pink-coloured paper.

"Just hear how we open our prospectus," continued Mr. Sago. "We say,—'The appalling condition of the inhabitants of the Society Islands, in consequence of an almost total want of wholesome provisions, must awaken the deepest sympathy in the minds of all true philanthropists. To such a pitch has the starving condition of these poor creatures reached, that they are compelled to feed upon each other; and instead of existing upon good roast beef and plum-pudding (old English fare) they are under the necessity of devouring man-cutlets and man-chops.'"

"Very pathetic!" ejaculated Mr. Pickwick, wiping away a tear. "Still, I cannot help thinking—"

"I know what you would say," interrupted Mr. Sago; "but it won't do! We should not get a soul to take a ticket, if we published a prospectus advocating a ball for the benefit of the poor Irish—the starving weavers—or the unfortunate coal-whippers! It would never do, sir: people's hearts will only melt at the distress of foreigners, and not at the miseries of Englishmen; and that's the reason why we pitch upon foreigners at such a great distance. The farther off they are, the more sympathy they will excite."

"I shall be happy to take four tickets," said Mr. Pickwick. "My friends Tupman, Winkle, and Snodgrass will accompany me."

"And you will dance, Mr. Pickwick?" ejaculated Mrs. Sago. "Oh! yes—you must dance! I'm sure such a good cause will make you dance! Alderman Fitzbuggins, of Portsoken, danced when he was seventy-seven, and died next morning."

"That was the 'Dance of Death' with a vengeance!" cried Mr. Sago.

"Oh! as for me, I shall certainly dance," said Mr. Pickwick, looking down very complacently at his tights and gaiters; "and I shall beg to dance first with Miss Teresina Hippolyta."

Miss Teresina simpered an assent and giggled with her sister; and the conversation turned upon other topics. Mr. Pickwick was easily prevailed upon to stay to lunch, at which Mr. Francis Sago made his appearance from the counting-house down-stairs; and after a tolerably long visit of about two hours, he summoned Sam Weller from the kitchen, and arrived in Half Moon-street, accompanied by his faithful valet, as the clock struck four.

FACTS FOR WINE-DRINKERS.

PLINY declared that wine could not possibly be a harmless drink, since it was mixed with so many destructive ingredients. When we consider the extent to which all liquids, that bear the denomination of wine, are adulterated or doctored, we do not despair of undermining the evil habits of the wealthy in respect to intemperance, as well as those of the poor. Addison, in The Tatler, placed the following observations upon record:—"There is in the city a certain fraternity of chemical operators, who work under ground in holes, caverns, and dark retirements, to conceal their mysteries from the eyes and observations of mankind. These subterraneous philosophers are daily employed in the transmutation of liquors, and, by the power of magical drugs and incantations, raising under the streets of London the choicest products of the hills and valleys of France. They can squeeze Bordeaux out of the sloe, and can extract Champagne from an apple." Dr. Lee, of America, observes that "the annual importation of what is called Port Wine, into the United States, far exceeds the whole annual produce of the Alto Douro." Morewood says that "one half of the Port, and five-sixths of the white wines, consumed in London, are the produce of the home presses." It is a well-known fact that the worst kinds of French red wines are procured to make the Claret for the English market; and that large quantities of brandy are mixed with those inferior sorts, to render them fit for exportation to this country. Jacob, in his work upon Spain, says that all the Sherry wine which is sent to England is largely mixed with brandy. "Most of the wine-merchants in Xeres have distilleries to make brandy, to add to the wine, but do not export any." Dr. Henderson, the famous writer upon wines, says that "the number of hands through which wine usually passes before it reaches the consumer, the great difference of price between the first rate and the inferior sorts, and the prevailing ignorance with respect to their distinguishing characters, afford so many facilities and temptations to fraud and imposition in this branch of trade, that no buyer, however great his caution, however just his taste, is wholly secure against them."

Mr. Grindrod, in Bacchus, quotes the following receipt for making Port Wine, from one of the numerous publications and vintners' Wine-Guides which are annually published:—"Take of good cider 4 gallons, of the juice of red beet-root 2 quarts, of brandy 2 quarts, of logwood 4 ounces, of bruised rhatany root $\frac{1}{2}$ a pound; first infuse the logwood and rhatany root in brandy and a gallon of cider for one week, then strain off the liquor, and mix the other ingredients: keep it all in a cask for a month, when it will be fit to bottle." Some time ago The Mechanics' Magazine gave the following Chemical Analysis of a bottle of cheap Port-Wine:—"Spirits of wine 3 ozs., cider 14 ozs., sugar 1½ ozs., alum 2 scruples, tartaric acid 1 scruple, strong decoction of logwood 4 ozs. The Vintners and Licensed Victuallers' Wine-Guide contains the following receipt:—"If a butt of Sherry is too high in colour, take a quart of warm sheep or lamb's blood, mix it with the wine, and, when thoroughly fine, draw it off, when you will find the colour as pale as necessary." The same work tells us that, in order to colour claret suitably to English taste, we must make a decoction of black sloes, stewed in Port-Wine, and made into a syrup with a large quantity of sugar. A pint of this decoction—or rather syrup, will colour a hoghead of claret. Mr. Grindrod informs us that "the Cape-Wine generally sold to the public is composed of the drippings of the cocks from the various casks in the adulterator's cellars, the filtering of the lees of the different wines in their cellars, any description of bad or spoiled white wines, with the addition of brandy or rum-cow, and spoiled cider." The work, entitled Deadly Adulteration, says, "The delicately pale Cape Sherry, or Cape Madeira, at astonishingly low prices, and of course for ready money, is composed of the same delicious ingredients, with the addition of extract of almond-cake, and a little of that delectable liquor, lamb's blood, to decompose its colour, or, in the cant phraseology, to give it complexion."

With regard to Champagne, Mr. Grindrod assures us that "most of the second-rate Champagne sold in this country is prepared from the juice of acid fruits, such as the gooseberry." In the year 1829, a company of French wine merchants contracted with the farmers of Herefordshire for the supply of the juice of the pears of that county; and from which juice the Company intended to concoct a "Champagne wine" for the English market. We may also here observe that all the Champagne manufactured in the French wine-countries which produce the grape from which it is made, in one year does not amount to the quantity of liquid consumed in London under the denomination of Champagne, during the same period.

Lead and litharge have been used by foreign wine-merchants to correct the acidity of their white-wines; and even arsenic has been introduced into wines made in England. Graham, in his Treatise on the Preparation of Wines, says that wine will be prevented from turning by putting a pound of molten lead "in pure water in your cask, pretty warm," and that cask must be stopped close. The Vintners' Guide recommends sugar of lead (a deadly poison) for clearing muddy wines. By these means white wines are rendered transparent; and there is no other method known of recovering rumpy wines. Orfila, the celebrated French chemist, describes the effects of lead adulterations to be fœtid eructations, hicoughs, difficulty of respiration, cramp, thirst, coldness of limbs, convulsions, and delirium. The Rev. Mr. Parsons, in Anti Bacchus, informs us that he heard a medical man very lately recommend Port-Wine to a sick lady, under the impression that the arsenic in the wine would be useful to her complaint: "he did not however cure her by the poison," continues this author; "although I am happy to say that, in her case, total abstinence has effected a perfect cure, and therefore succeeded in a disease in which all the doctors failed." From the same work just now quoted, we extract the following remarks:—"Bitter almonds are used to give a nutty flavour to wine; sweet-briar, orris-root, clary, cherry, laurel water and elder-flowers, form the bouquet of high-flavoured wines; alum renders meagre wine bright; braxil-wood, cake of pressed elder-berries, and bilberries, render faint-coloured Port a deep purple; oak saw-dust and hunks of alberts give astringency to unripe red wines; and the crust of Port-Wines, which is supposed to be an unquestionable evidence of age, is often produced by a saturated solution of cream of tartar, coloured with brazil-wood or cochineal." In the year 1826, thirty-eight pipes of wine were exported from Oporto to the Channel Islands; and two hundred and thirty-three pipes were in the same year imported from the Channel Islands to London. The wine-merchants of the Channel Islands thus convert thirty-eight pipes of wine into two hundred and ninety-three.

Dr. Lee, of America, says, "Wine-dealers doubtless suppose that the quantity of lead used to adulterate their liquids is too small to produce any bad effects; but the numerous instances on record of poisoning by this article prove the incorrectness of this doctrine. More than fifty cases have fallen within my own observation where persons have suffered severely from the use of cheap wines, and two or three cases of death, most probably owing to the same cause." Speaking of the large quantities of brandy which are mixed with those foreign wines that are intended for English consumption, Dr. Henderson says, "The vitiated taste of the English market is the only excuse for the merchants; for the wine itself cannot require the admixture." The clever author of Bacchus informs us that the deleterious system of adulteration has two objects in view; viz., 1st. To substitute an artificial compound at a cheaper rate in the place of the genuine article. This is effected by various means adapted to imitate the colour, taste and intoxicating quality of the liquors professed to be prepared; and, 2ndly. To prevent these liquors from going into peculiar states or conditions, termed by some diseases, and thence popularly denominated the art of doctoring. The Rev. Mr. Parsons, in Anti-Bacchus, has the following admirable observations upon the subject of adulterating wines:—"The reader must surely blush for those Christians who dare insinuate that the deadly wines of modern times are the same as those referred to in the Sacred Volume. The wine that cheereth the heart of man, that our Lord made at the marriage of Cana, or that he used at the first sacrament, could not have been charged with twenty-four per cent. of alcohol, because distilled spirits were then unknown; nor can we believe that it was made out of cider, logwood, or lead; and from the wines being different, the argument from Scripture have no weight with any reflecting mind. Thus, on whatever side or aspect we look at this question, we see the reasonableness, propriety, advantage, and duty of total abstinence."

Dr. Rush, the celebrated American writer, says, "The solitary instances of longevity which are now and then met with in hard-drinkers, no more disprove the deadly effects of alcoholic liquor, than the solitary instances of recoveries from apparent death by drowning, prove that there is no danger to life from a human body lying an hour under water."

The statements made in this article—the proofs of the universality of the system of adulteration in respect to wines—the fact that poisons of the most deadly nature form parts of that adulteration—the filthy devices to which adulterators have recourse to colour or cleanse their wines—the infamous compounds which are sold under the denomination of "Cheap Wines"—and the ignorance as to the amount of deleterious stuff imbibed, under which the wine-drinker labours,—these circumstances should alone be sufficient to induce the thinking portion of the community to banish from the table all that vile trash which is called Wine. The excitement wine produces is unnatural and prejudicial to health, and the spirits invariably suffer a greater amount of depression by means of the re-action. If an individual trust to the wine-bottle to evoke the bright sallies of his wit and encourage conversational powers, he must indeed have but a very miserable opinion of his sterling abilities. Since he trusts to artificial measures to bring them into action. One single glass of wine produces this artificial effect; and it is seldom that the individual, whose conversational powers are evoked by wine, is not himself a liar, a bully, a boaster, and a mass of conceit and impudence. He becomes a nuisance to his companions, and is amusing only to himself. The very habit, to which he trusts for the sources of his wit and anecdote, bears incontrovertible evidence to his egotism.

PHRENOLOGY.

PHRENOLOGY, or the science of the mind, does not, as generally supposed, simply mean an acquaintance with the mechanical structure or relative proportions of the brain; but it is a system entering deeply into the philosophy of man, and embracing the consideration of his moral and intellectual faculties. Phrenologists attempt not to inquire into the nature or essence of mind itself: their only object is to ascertain the circumstances under which it manifests its powers; and they do so by observing facts submitted by the author of nature to the cognizance of our faculties. Hence their system cannot be said to be founded upon empiricism, as it has science and philosophy for its basis. Phrenologists only state the conclusions to which they are led by a careful examination of the phenomena which the mind exhibits; and they avow themselves as ignorant as their opponents concerning the nature, essence or substance of the mind.

A minute study of the form of heads will enable the observer to recognise one constant shape in the head of every great painter, of every great musician, of every great mechanic, severally devoting a decided predilection in the individual to one or other of these arts. We had heard speak from time immemorial of the functions of the muscles; but not a word about the functions of the brain. Phrenology however teaches us that the form of the skull is entirely due to the form of the viscus which is contained in it. Hence may we determine the moral and intellectual faculties of man, by means of his cerebral organization; and hence is the physiology of the brain established.

It is well known that all ideas come into the mind by means of the external senses: but the senses themselves do not form the ideas. When an impression is made upon the hand, it is not the organs of the touch which form the conception of the object making the impression; but the nerves of feeling, the hand receive the impression, and a faculty of the mind perceives the object. Hence previous to every perception, there must be an antecedent impression on the organs of sense; and the whole functions of these organs consist in receiving and transmitting this impression to the internal faculties. Hence it is evident that Phrenology is not refuted, but is rather confirmed by the doctrine relative to the sensations taught by Aristotle, and revived by Locke.

Phrenologists divide the faculties into two orders—feelings and intellect. The former are subdivided into propensities and sentiments; the latter into knowing faculties and reflecting faculties. In studying the faculties of the mind, we must keep the following points in view:—Firstly, that each faculty is a specific power of feeling in a certain way, or of forming ideas of a certain kind, and that each is distinct from the feelings which it produces and the ideas which it forms. Secondly, that each faculty has received its constitution from nature, and that its functions depend on that constitution alone, and not on the human will. Thirdly, that the same functions cannot be performed by different faculties. For example, the faculty of tone is a specific power to perceive melody, and it is distinct from the impressions of melody which it perceives. This faculty perceives melody in virtue of its constitution, and not in consequence of the will; and it does not trace the relation of cause and effect, feel benevolence, or perform any other function besides that of perceiving melody. Fourthly, the faculties stand in a determinate relation in regard to the object of external nature, which relation cannot be changed by the will. For example, the feelings of comparison cannot be readily excited by the perception of an object indelicate and obscene; nor can the faculty of amiableness be excited by the perception of an object in distress. Fifthly, each faculty may be excited to activity by presentation of the objects naturally related to it; and it may become active also from internal excitement. In every case, the functions performed are conformable to the constitution of the faculty, by whatever cause it is excited. And, sixthly, the intensity of the power of feeling in any way, or of forming ideas of any kind, is always in proportion to the energy and activity of the special faculty whose function it is to produce such feelings, or to form such kind of ideas.

Having thus ascertained the precise nature and use of the various faculties, the phrenologists proceeded to consider the mode of distributing them in accordance with their organs in the brain. And first, as the English language presented very few single words which expressed their conception of the peculiar faculties of the mind, they were obliged to speak either by circumlocution or by means of new names. Having established different propensities as peculiar faculties of the mind, in order to designate propensity they took the termination ness as indicating the quality of producing, and ness as indicating the abstract state; and iveness has therefore been joined to different roots amongst which preference has been given to English words generally admitted. The following is the last list of names of organs:—1. Philoprogenitiveness. 2. Amativeness. 3. Destructiveness. 4. Constructiveness. 5. Concentrativeness. 6. Attachment. 7. Combativeness. 8. Ideality. 9. Self-Esteem. 10. Approbation. 11. Cautiousness. 12. Faith. 13. Firmness. 14. Conscientiousness. 15. Secretiveness. 16. Imitation. 17. Veneration. 18. Hope. 19. Acquisitiveness. 20. Benevolence. 21. Comparison. 22. Eventuality. 23. Causality. 24. Congruity. 25. Individuality. 26. Locality. 27. Time. 28. Order. 29. Form. 30. Size. 31. Weight. 32. Colour. 33. Natural language. 34. Artificial language. 35. Number. 36. Time. 37. Motion. 38. Touch. 39. Scent. 40. Aliment. Each of the faculties is supposed to have its own peculiar organic apparatus in each hemisphere of the brain; so that there are two organs to each faculty. In the science of Phrenology, it is however absolutely necessary to distinguish between the two elements, size and activity; and probably the greatest errors committed by many who pretend to a knowledge of the science, arise from their confounding them together.

Many well intentioned persons have argued against phrenology, under the impression "that it virtually charges nature with the guilt of man, inasmuch as it charges her with having implanted the faculties which impel him to action." But of what system may not the same thing be said? There are such acts as thefts, murders, frauds, done by men. From what do these acts proceed? Do they proceed from reason, from corrupted desires, from any source in the mind itself; or do they proceed directly, or, de plano, from the instigation of the devil? Such actions are manifested; and they must flow from some source. If they flow from perverted reason, then nature gave reason: if from corrupted desires, then nature gave desires; if from the instigation of the devil, then nature made us liable to be thus instigated. Still nature is as much to blame in one case as in another. Oh! let man remember that truth, which proclaims so loudly the power and wisdom of the ALMIGHTY, that, if nature have implanted faculties, giving a desire to destroy, to acquire property, or to fight, yet this same nature has also given a power to restrain or indulge in these outward acts at pleasure, and implanted an innate faculty, called Conscience, which perceives the qualities of right and wrong, to direct these propensities in their outward manifestations. Thus nature is not responsible for vice; but man is responsible himself, in proportion to the amount of the restraining power, and of the distinguishing faculties which he possesses!

FRENCH CHARACTERS CARICATURED.

NO. VIII.—THE SUB-EDITOR.

THE office of the principal Editor of a Paris journal is a most remarkable locality. But little ornamented, and, on the other hand, especially dirty, it is furnished with a table covered with a green cloth (the said green cloth is enamelled with a dozen journals of different colours, and a hundred black spots of ink all of the same colour)—six chairs, purchased at the price of a puff in the journal itself—and a number of pigeon-holes in a desk, embellished with articles upon the custom-question, articles on the sugar-question, articles on the codfishery-question, articles on the herring-fishery question, and articles on all other questions, to which the said articles might be considered the answers. The Chief Editor, whose countenance wears a most important aspect, and whose wig increases the awe-inspiring nature of his demeanour, is deeply occupied in fulfilling the ponderous duties of his office; that is to say, he plays with a tooth-pick, or cuts his nails with a penknife, while the Sub-Editor is preparing the articles for his inspection.

The Sub-Editor, wearing a hat such as is never seen elsewhere, and a coat which defies all imitation, and holding in his hand a cane with which no one's back has any wish to form an acquaintance, enters the Chief-Editor's office with that importance which is not always conferred by real talent. He presents an article to the Chief-Editor, who looks up in his face enquiringly.

"Here, my dear sir," says the Sub-Editor, "here is an article upon the new law, which I show up in a desperate manner, I can promise you."

"What are you thinking of?" cries the Chief-Editor, whose wig actually stands on end, while he thinks of the bribe lately sent to his journal by the ministry then in power, and which bribe is to be continued quarterly; "what are you thinking of? It is not for us to attack the new law: we should defend it."

"Oh! well—well," says the Sub-Editor: "I will just go and touch it up over again; and I will make you a glorious article in favour of the said law. I was labouring under the impression that we were one of the opposition journals still."

"Ah! last week it was very different," returns the Chief-Editor: "the interests of the country required that kind of language; but the country has been satisfied."

"I perceive the meaning of your words,—days and numbers follows each other, but are not alike. As for the matter of the bribe, that is a matter entirely between ourselves. I hope you will now pay me for my articles at the rate of seventy-two francs each: that is what I used to receive in the offices of all journals, of all shades of opinion, in which I have frequently been employed."

"Sir, I beg you will not think that the money which I receive from the prime minister will be used in any illegitimate way. It will be expended in giving encouragement—"

"Well, in that case, I desire to be encouraged also," interrupts the Sub-Editor: "and, if I do not receive an increase of salary, I shall turn my talents to the opposition journal again. By the bye, while I think of it, do not forget to let me see the proof of the Theatrical Review which I delivered in just now: I show up the new actress at the Comic-Opera in fine style."

"Ah! but you should not have done that," exclaims the Editor in Chief: "that young lady is under the protection of the prime minister; and she must therefore necessarily be a very talented woman."

"Well, I am glad you have mentioned this fact," returns the Sub-Editor; "because, in correcting the proofs, it is easy to put Applause for Hisses. We can also say that, when the curtain fell, she was desired to come forward, and that flowers were showered upon her. Although this did not happen, it still might have done so; and therefore I do not see why we may not publish a probability, seeing that we so often propagate an impossibility."

"We will take care that the prime minister shall be well pleased with us to-morrow morning," says the Chief-Editor. "He will like the way in which we speak of the Eastern question and the success of the young actress."

"And by the bye, who is the reporter that gives an account of the pieces performed at the Vaudeville theatre?" demands the Sub-Editor. "He always signs his articles O. Z."

"Ah! he is a very clever young fellow. His name is Jules Lamerluche," says the Chief-Editor. "He says that all plays are execrable. He is a young man full of promise, and has a piece received at the Pantheon theatre."

"Well, then," continues the Sub-Editor, "have the kindness to tell the aforesaid Jules Lamerluche not to abuse any of the pieces written by Derval—I dined with him yesterday; nor those of Derville—I dine with him to-day; nor those of Dervoir—I dine with him to-morrow. He may say what he likes about all the famous dramatic authors, because they never invite me to dinner."

"I will not forget what you wish," says the Chief-Editor; "but, in the meantime, go and alter the physiognomy of your article. The compositors are waiting for it in the printing-office."

"I am going in a minute," says the Sub-Editor. "But, before I go, just let me leave you a few puffs to put into to-morrow's paper. Here is one in which I mention 'that a man had his leg broken yesterday by a cabriolet, but that he was immediately conveyed to the abode of that celebrated and well-known physician, Doctor Brindavoine, No 25, Rue de Richelieu.'—Brindavoine is a friend of mine, and might very well set a man's leg for him, although he really has never yet had a single patient even to consult him about a cold. He can't therefore be a celebrated doctor; but he will soon, thanks to my puffs; and therefore the whole article is prophetically true."

"Anything else?"

"Yes—here is another puff, just to say 'that the celebrated perfumer Jasminou has been devoured by a bear which was sent to him alive from the mountains in Switzerland to make bears' grease.'"

"To-morrow I suppose we will rectify the error," adds the Chief-Editor, with a smile, "and we can say that the bear only devoured the curling-tongs of Jasminou the perfumer; so that he can have two puffs instead of one."

"That is exactly what I mean," returns the Sub-Editor. "Whenever you want any perfumes, go to him; he will supply you with them for nothing."

"I shall not forget. But pray go and alter your article without delay; and do not let it be supposed that because the journal has changed its political opinions within the last few days, I am altogether a weathercock—a mountebank—a juggler—a charlatan."

"Oh! no—no!" ejaculates the Sub-Editor. "Every day a person modifies his political opinions, and is not the worse for that. A mountebank, indeed! No—no, I repeat! This is nothing more nor less than a famous comedy."

ORIGINAL POETRY.

MY MARY.

By Matt. Micah.

My Mary's looks—my Mary's love—
They make this earth a heav'n to me;
I know how they lure above,
But here my bliss'd I mayna be.
I seek no better world than this,
Wi' sic an angel for mine ain;
I couldna dream o' dearer bliss
Than love, an' be belov'd again!
Her blushing cheeks and balmy lips
With Eden's richest rose may vie;
Her blue ees' lustrous rays eclipse
The brightest star that beams on high.
How could I feel—how could I say
This world is waste, this life is vain,
With aye like Mary right and day
To love, an' be belov'd again.

SYLPHIDE SONG.

By Edward Stirling, Author of "Blue Jackets," &c.

Oh! 'tis sweet a Sylph to be,
Immortal, joyous, roving free;
Yet to mix with joys above
The cares and sweets of mortal love.
Come, then, lady—room with me,
Enjoy the earth, the air, the sea;
Love and pleasure both are ours,
Immortal joys in mortal bowers.
Yes—we'll bask through sunny days,
And revel to the moon's soft rays,
Dwell on each alluring grace
That beams in Nature's charming face.
All her pleasures shall be thine;
And when thou'rt called to realms divine,
Lady, then my love for thee
Will, like thyself, immortal be!

TO MY CHILD.

By Mrs. Reynolds.

Frail plant, condemn'd to crouch beneath the storm
Of earthly ills, and shiver to the blast
That rules in this cold world,
Th' ungenial atmosphere!
May thy dimlusive and fragile frame
Survive the shocks of ev'ry latent pang,
And live to smile at that
Which once had startled thee!
Sweet babe, were all as innocent as thou,
Then might we deem the glorious times called back
When our first parents roved
Sinless in Eden's realms.
Alas! the tainted elements of earth,
That form the compact being which we call
Man, is a living mass
Of sorrow and of sin!
Yet live thou on, sweet child—and like the brave
And dauntless sailor toss'd on lawless seas,
Mayst thou thus meet the ill
That wait thy future days!

We shall be happy to receive a prose article from J. R. W. D. We repeat, that we do not court poetical contributions.

The suggestions of Aquilaris (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) shall be attended to. We thank him for his letter; but regret that he should have written in so angry a tone.

We regret that W. P.'s communication should be much too long for insertion. It is very well written.

Several poems, which it is unnecessary to detail, are declined with thanks.

We have received, during the past week, upwards of fifty letters from various eminent supporters and advocates of the doctrine of Teetotalism, encouraging us to continue to impress upon the public mind the necessity of Union amongst the Teetotalers. Of those letters, seventeen are from the Secretaries of provincial Societies—five from dissenting ministers, who have embraced the pledge—and the remainder from individuals well-known in the Teetotal world. It is evident that the articles, which have already appeared in The Teetotaler upon the subject, have produced an extraordinary sensation. We shall not suffer this feeling to subside.

F. B. (Wandsworth) is informed that we will insert the Reports of all Teetotal Societies or Associations, without reference to parties, pledges, or other distinctions. The Teetotaler is entirely an independent journal.

The rumours circulated in the country, by the individual alluded to in the letters of S. J. (Chipping-Norton) and M. W., are entirely false. We wait for the promised communication, before we publicly notice this person's conduct. It is perfectly true that he acted as a minister of the Gospel in London for a short period. We are acquainted with his previous history.

We beg to call the attention of the Reader to the Third Number of a 2nd Series of Illustrations, which is given gratis with "THE TEETOTALER" of this day.

The Series will be complete in Twelve Illustrations, and will be continued for as many consecutive weeks.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6th, 1841.

AN absurd supposition frequently discloses a grand and important truth. We will imagine, for a moment, that there is to be found a certain sensation of pleasure in the process of stabbing the breast with a sharp instrument; and that each time this taste is to be gratified, the weapon is to be impelled more profoundly into the flesh, so that at length it must reach the heart, when it will produce a fatal result. If such a process were really capable of procuring for him who practised it a sensation of pleasure, and if no immediate pain accompanied the wounding the flesh with often-repeated stabs, still would there be found, throughout the universe, an individual insane enough to obtain enjoyment at such a price? Aware that each time the dagger was to be applied, its point would penetrate the deeper, and in the presence of the constant conviction that the heart must be eventually reached, when certain death will ensue, there breathes not a man who would not recoil from him who should propose so perilous a method of indulgence. The mere fact of lifting the murderous weapon against one's own life would be the first argument against the plan; and another preventive would be found in the conviction that it would be wicked to abridge existence for the mere sake of an unnatural enjoyment. But if an individual were found, who—despising these arguments—would lift the suicidal weapon, and apply it to his own breast, well knowing that he was thereby attacking his very vitals, and clearing the path before the approach of death, the whole world would exclaim against such a depraved practice, and would either pity its victim as a maniac, or spurn him as a wretch unfitted to exist in civilized society. The laws of God would be quoted, and the statutes of man would be called into force, to compel the wretch to abandon his horrible practice of slow murder: the voice of nature and the appeals of the wise and the good would prompt him to desist from a crime offensive to morality, to religion, and to decency. In a word, such an individual would be either incarcerated as a madman, or punished as an enemy to the welfare, the peace, the virtue of the community at large; and no one would raise his voice to complain of the treatment that such an offender might experience either at the hands of society or the government.

The foregoing supposition may be applied to the use of alcoholic liquors; and from an impossible case may be deduced a truth highly serviceable to the cause of Teetotalism. The same condemnatory language may be applied to the individual who imbibes alcoholic poisons, as we used in reference to him who was imagined to gratify himself with the stabs of the dagger. The drunkard knows that he is pursuing that course which will fearfully abridge his existence; and the moderate drinker is aware that the same liquor that cuts off the drunkard prematurely, must curtail his own life in a proportionate degree. The certainty that the vitals will be undermined is as great in respect to the individual who daily partakes of large quantities of strong drink, as with regard to him who is diurnally drawing more nearly to his heart by means of the dagger. There is, however, this difference: in the former case, death advances more silently, and gives less warning outwardly, shedding no blood, and making no wounds which are instantaneously apparent;—but the career will nevertheless terminate at the same goal, and will be brought to a close through a not less wilful means of suicide. The very drunkard himself would join in the general execration against the individual who would assassinate himself by gradient measures with the dagger, and would turn disgusted from the gaping wound which each day was made deeper. But does this same drunkard contemplate his own conduct? Is not his behaviour equally deserving of execration and scorn? Does he not set an equally immoral and pernicious example? Is he not also adopting those means which curtail his existence, simply because he derives a transient pleasure from the gratification of the habit? Do not the laws of God, the voice of nature, and the appeal of all good feelings and kind sympathies exclaim against the indulgence of the drunkard! and is not his internal system in a condition calculated, if seen, to fill him with as much disgust and horror as the gaping wound produced by the dagger? The white and enlarged liver—the cancerous stomach—the inflamed membranes of the bowels—the ossified heart—the red brain—and the diseased lungs, are surely as revolting to think of as that gaping wound is to contemplate. And then the red and bleared eyes—the emaciated frame—the trembling limbs—the pestiferous breath—the carious teeth—the livid lips—the carbuncled nose—the feverish flesh—and the heated brow, are outward and palpable signs which characterise the drunkard!

Where then is the difference between the wretch who kills himself by inches with a dagger, and the one who abridges his existence by means of the cup of alcoholic poison? Speak—degraded, trembling, demoralized drunkard,—speak, thou foe to morality, virtue, and peace,—speak, self-destroyer who darest to fly in the face of thy Maker and number the days which He alone may count,—speak, thou who takest the bread from the lips of the starving wife and little ones,—speak, thou man of many and fearful crimes, and say to what extent and how thou differest from the wilful and cold-blooded suicide? Is it because thou treadest in the ways of thousands of predecessors and companions that thou wilt find an apology for thy guilt? No—there is no justification for thee in the facts which ought to have served thee as an example to warn thee from the road of destruction? Say, then, where is thine apology? where thine excuse? where thy justification? The drunkard may survey society from the Indus to the pole,—he may contemplate animated nature in all its phases, its species, and its distinctions,—he may search the records of history, and the annals of the past,—he may look far, or he may look near; but nowhere will he find the slightest shadow of an excuse for his habits of intemperance. His poverty cannot suggest to him a means of consolation which will impoverish him the more; his riches cannot urge him into a path where the dispensation of his wealth will benefit not the needy and distressed; his domestic afflictions will not be alleviated by a system which can only add gall to bitterness; his public career cannot be benefited by a habit that mars the proudest soarings of ambition, talent, and power; his private life will not derive advantage from the contact with the effectual destroyer of self-respect and the esteem of friends; health will not be preserved by an indulgence in a deleterious poison; sickness will not find a balm in that which is one of its direct causes; happiness cannot be brightened by intervals of rabid artificial excitement; misery will not be consoled by that unnatural elevation of spirits which leaves a deeper state of despondency behind, after evaporation;—in a word, there is no state—no condition—no time—no necessity of existence that is benefited by the habit of intemperance.

The drunkard, then, has no excuse for the practice to which he is the victim; and the moderate drinker has no plea for entering upon that path which will soon lead him to tread upon the heels of the drunkard. The crime of intemperance is one which offends against God and man: but, from habitual contemplation, the generality of the world ceases to regard it with any extraordinary degree of disgust. The beholder of the vice becomes as much accustomed to it as the victim. Hence the difficulty which Teetotalism encounters on all sides. Teetotalism has first to arouse and excite that disgust which now lies dormant; and many fail to respond to a chord which will vibrate only to the touch in cases where this feeling of disgust is not entirely overcome. Once let us succeed in creating a loathing for that which is indeed a loathsome vice, and half of the work of Teetotalism is accomplished. The case of the slow suicide by means of the dagger would be viewed with a general feeling of the deepest disgust, simply because we are not accustomed to contemplate it; and yet we have shown that the gradual accomplishment of suicide by the dagger, and that by alcohol, are equally criminal!

The drunkard has much to answer for, both in this world and hereafter. The affliction he heaps upon his unfortunate wife,—the evil, and probably fatal example, he sets his children,—the neglect of all social and moral duties of which he is guilty, and the crime of depriving his existence of many of its best years, are deeds for which he will be despised below, and judged above! When the intemperate man is upon that death-bed, to which sad close he himself has hurried his career,—when he stands trembling upon the confines of two worlds,—and when his oppressed spirit, in that supreme hour of his anguish and remorse, shall dread to take wing from the earth which he disgraced to those regions the glories of which are reserved for the just, and the pains for the wicked like himself,—in that dread hour, how deeply will the drunkard regret those mispent years which he cannot recal! How will he writhe in agony upon that couch which mortal sleep never more may visit, but which will shortly be approached by the eternal slumber that will herald the departure of the guilty soul to the realms where it will join the throng to which those awful words are to be addressed at the day of judgment,—“Go, ye cursed of the devil, unto the punishment prepared for ye from the beginning of the world!”

We have before stated in the columns of The Teetotaler that a few enterprising and praise-worthy individuals, belonging to the Hackney and Haggerston Teetotal Associations, have subscribed amongst themselves the necessary sum to hire that edifice which was lately denominated THE STANDARD THEATRE, and to convert it into a TEMPERANCE HALL. The importance of this undertaking deserves the especial attention of all Teetotal publications; and we hasten, with that impartiality which has characterised this journal from its commencement, to make known to the whole Teetotal world an action which reflects so much credit upon the individuals alluded to. The vice of intemperance exists in all its most hideous circumstances of deformity in the vicinity of Shoreditch Church; and great will be the satisfaction—ample the reward—of those enterprising and noble-hearted individuals, who, at their own cost, have thrown open the gates of the Shoreditch Temperance Hall (as it must now be called), when the grand principle of the Teetotal reformation shall be firmly established in the district which so much requires its application. We hope that none of that envy and malignity, which unfortunately prevail amongst so many of the metropolitan Teetotal Associations, will intervene to mar the efforts of these zealous supporters of the good cause; and that all party distinctions and disputes may be forgotten, at least, at this new Temperance Hall. If ever the principles of UNION amongst the Teetotalers of London stood a chance of being advocated with success, this is the time; and, if ever a few individuals had at their disposal a place of assembly where delegates could meet definitely to settle this important plan, the Shoreditch Temperance Hall is that place! Nearly a hundred thousand Teetotalers in London are protesting against the divisions which agitate their spheres—nearly a hundred thousand tongues demand an immediate union,—and now is the opportunity present, and now is the hour at hand, to gratify a wish that is all but universal.

To those individuals who have opened the Shoreditch Temperance Hall, we would address a few observations. We would advise them to allow no developments of ill feeling between the advocates of rival societies to take place at their establishment,—to mistrust those individuals who, under the cloak of hypocrisy, encourage and foster that ill feeling,—to ascertain who are the true friends of the Teetotal cause, and to distinguish between these and the individuals who affect great sanctity, but who are full of “envy, hatred, and malice, and all uncharitableness,”—to act with the noble independence which should accompany the generosity of the undertaking in which they have embarked for the good of their fellow-creatures,—to assemble often in committee and discuss all measures which are calculated to forward the progress of the cause in the district to which their operations are confined,—and to adopt all plans, with regard to the invitation of advocates and the admission of speakers, which become their characters as Teetotal champions, and as Englishmen. Attempts will be made by a few interested and narrow-minded individuals, and especially by those who, in unseasonable zeal, or through hypocritical motives, have mixed up Teetotalism with Religion, as if the efforts of the former were to be exclusive in respect to the Mussulman, the Chinese, and the Hindoo,—attempts will be made, we say, to control the method of management which should be adopted by the committee of this new Hall: but we implore the members of that committee not to suffer themselves to be unduly influenced in this respect. Let Teetotalism be advocated in Temperance Halls, and Religion be proclaimed in Churches; and be it remembered that he who finds his way to the former, will soon strike into the path which leads to the latter. This certainty will convince all rightly-thinking individuals of the impropriety of connecting the doctrine of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors with the themes of religious injunction; and, with the hope that these suggestions will be received in the spirit in which they are offered, we wish all possible success to the new lessees of the late Standard Theatre.

PAUL DE WALBERG.

..... Truth is strange,
Stranger than fiction.—BYRON.

It was in the early part of the Autumn of 1832, that I arrived a stranger at P—. Business, not necessary to my narrative, had obliged me to pay it a visit, though it was not of a nature likely to detain me long at that particular spot in Germany. P— lay out of the way of all my connexions; and, destitute of introductory letters to the residents, my time, for the most part, lay at my own disposal. When the occupations of the day were over, I was fain to wander about in a melancholy manner, eyeing the dingy streets, and forming one of the crowd, without the benefit of their daily communion.

In this stagnation of hospitable intercourse it was by mere accident that I fell into the company of an individual whom I shall call Paul de Walberg. To a prepossessing exterior, he united the most gentlemanly manners; and after a few commonplace civilities had passed, at the table d'hôte where we met, he seemed to think no formal introduction was necessary for our better acquaintance. We seldom met until the approach of evening, as business detained us abroad during the day. Our friendship however ripened daily; and time now no longer hanged heavily upon my hands.

One evening he invited me to his house, which was in P—, he only being an occasional visitor at the table d'hôte of the hotel where I was staying. I was surprised at the good appearance of his house. I had certainly looked upon Walberg as a person of consideration, but I was not prepared for the very great superiority of his abode. It was evening; lights were about the house—and we were received by servants in substantial-looking liveries. I had not much time for observation; for my conductor led the way quickly to the upper storey, and, throwing open a door, ushered me into an apartment richly furnished.

The room was illuminated, as if for company; and, advancing to a lady seated on a sofa at the farther end of the room, Walberg introduced me to his sister. His easy and polished address soon made the conversation general; and my host, his sister, and myself, were in a short time on excellent terms with each other. I found her a person of much information—evidently one who had mixed with the world, and possessed of the same prepossessing manners as her brother. Her age I took to be about two and twenty; and to a beautiful face and slender figure she added the graces of an amiable disposition. Without affectation, her appearance was calculated to make a decided impression; and had I not at that time been travelling fast on towards forty, might have stood some risk from her fascinations.

As I had anticipated, company was expected. This I learnt, was the case nearly every evening. While resident in P—, the Walbergs were accustomed to mix much in society; but, on retiring to a country-house, some forty or fifty miles distant from that town, and to which residence their visits were frequent and long, they were in the habit of living, by choice, an tirely secluded. The number of those expected on this occasion was very limited: conversation, cards, and music, supplied amusement; and a small, though splendid banquet wound up the entertainments.

Short as I had anticipated my stay was doomed to be at P—, that of Walberg at his town residence was still shorter. His removals were frequently capricious; but on this occasion, business of some importance required his presence in the country. I was soon informed of his journey, and received a most pressing invitation to pay my new friends a visit at their country-residence. I gladly accepted the proposal; and having terminated my business at P—, debated in my own mind whether to take the diligence or hire a horse for the journey. I decided in favour of the latter, and provided myself with an excellent roadster, well calculated to bear the fatigues of a long and cross-country journey. Having settled all preliminaries to my satisfaction, I set out from P—, my portmanteau (one made for the purpose) tightly strapped upon the back of my steed. I slept at the village of S— the first night, and rose early on the following morning to accomplish the remainder of my journey, with the hope of reaching Walberg's house in the evening.

I found that I now had to cross a wide tract of secluded country; and it was with feelings of regret that I turned out of the main road into a narrow path which seemed to go winding down amongst a mass of woods, and threatened, as I advanced, to become very rough. This part of the country seemed to be very thinly inhabited; and it was only here and there that I could perceive in the distance the brown roof of a low and ruinous-looking cottage. To add to my vexation, I found that I was making little progress, in consequence of the increasing difficulties of the path, and that the afternoon was waning fast into obscurity. The woods had moreover a very unpleasant banditti-air, and it was with some alarm that I made my horse increase his speed.

The sun had set some time when I perceived, through a sudden break in the forest, the gate and walls of an ancient building some distance in advance. On a nearer approach, I found it had the same air of neglect, silence, and desolation which characterized the country around it. It seemed as if those, who had been its inhabitants, were in their tombs. Its ancient gate way was crumbling into ruin; the few windows were mere loop-holes, and darkened with heavy wood mouldings; its walls were fantastically edged out with old red bricks; and its gables abounding in eccentric zig-zags, corners, and parapets, over-grown with moss.

"Can this," I said to myself, "be the residence of Paul de Walberg?"

Not more astonished was I at the appearance of the antique building, than at the sound of the sullen gate-bell, which I pulled with a hesitating hand. That bell produced an uncomfortable effect upon the nerves, as if it had no business to disturb the general solemnity. Suddenly I caught a glimpse of a suspicious-looking face, eyeing me from a slit in the wall. It was immediately withdrawn; and, after a tedious interval, the gate was unbarred, and cautiously unlocked. A domestic stood before me; and, when my business was made known, I was conducted across a small court, sadly neglected, into the interior of the building.

Having ushered me into a spacious oak-chamber, the servant left me, promising to make his master acquainted with my arrival. My reflections were by no means exhilarating. The neglected state of the house, and the secluded place in which it lay, much surprised me. At length Walberg entered the room; and I eagerly advanced to greet him. He received me kindly, though I thought there was something strangely wayward in his address. He offered to conduct me to the room where his sister was sitting; and we passed along a dimly-lighted gallery, at the end of which was an old-fashioned chamber, scantily furnished, and looking not over comfortable, where Agatha Walberg was seated. She rose as I entered, and expressed her pleasure at my presence. My diffidence of the sincerity of their welcome gradually evaporated; and the same confidential hilarity worked itself into our conversation which had so agreeably characterised our intercourse in town. There was something so peculiarly easy and good-natured in the disposition of Walberg's sister, that I was inclined to envy him the enjoyment her society afforded. Walberg insisted that I must needs be in want of refreshment, and proposed that I should visit my apartment while supper was being prepared. I acquiesced in the proposition, and was conducted by a domestic to an old-fashioned sleeping-room that looked upon a half-ruined terrace.

Having completed my ablutions, I descended to the lower storey; but, must, amongst the dimly-lighted passages and pushing corners, have lost my direct way; for apparently I had approached the sitting-chamber in which I had found Agatha Walberg, by a disused means of communication. I did not even perceive my mistake, till I was stopped by a creak door, the glass of which was veiled on the other side by curtains. I was then startled by hearing voices near me. I was immediately about to retire, when my attention was arrested by the mention of my own name—curiosity made me linger. The speakers were Walberg and his sister; and they spoke almost in whispers. I heard Agatha enquire if I had come with the intention of remaining long.

"He has not," said Walberg; "and, even if he had, that is little to the purpose. I have no doubt, close as he is, that the fellow's rich. At all events, I am pretty sure he has now with him considerable sums of money belonging to those for whom he travels. Our game has lately been very scanty; my men are beginning to murmur; and I know that if something is not soon done, they will break out into open insubordination. His coming is opportune; for I scarcely expected him. We need debate no longer—the die is cast; and this night —" here his voice became inaudible.

The reader can better imagine than I can describe my feelings at this moment. I was astounded. I was, for the moment, incapable of either thinking or retreating. I saw that my death was decreed by the very man whom I had looked upon as my friend. The very hopelessness of my situation smote me with a terror that incapacitated me for even debating on the means or chance of extrication. I however soon recovered presence of mind sufficient to know that I must look and act entirely as if nothing had happened. I thought of escaping at the moment; but reason desired me to await a better opportunity. The forest extended, without a habitation, for many miles around; I was enclosed by high walls; and my escape must be almost immediately detected. Dreading that my presence might be missed, I hurried back, and took the direct way to Walberg's apartment.

Neither he nor his sister was in the slightest degree discomposed at my entrance. They were precisely the same as I had left them; and I asked myself how such consummate dissimulation could be acquired. Their behaviour was extremely friendly; and I was determined to keep as strong a guard over myself as possible. Convinced that my only chance of escape lay in letting them imagine that I had not the slightest suspicion, I forced myself to appear gay and at my ease. At twelve o'clock, a domestic (as he was called, but whom I set down to be one of the gang) conducted me to my apartment, at the door of which the fellow handed me a lamp, and wished me a good night's rest.

Having closed and locked the door, I flew to my portmanteau, and grasped my pistols, which were doubly-locked. A sensation of relief now stole over me. I took my money from my portmanteau, and putting it into a small leathern case, disposed of it about my person. I then examined the window to see if I could manage an escape through it; but this I found to be extremely problematical, owing to its height. The terrace, however, extended below me; and I determined, if no other means presented itself, to have recourse to this. For the present, the door of the room itself afforded the most eligible mode of egress, as I could remain in the dark passages undiscovered, until some good chance might favour my escape from the dwelling.

Having extinguished the lamp, I cautiously unlocked the door, locking it again on the outside, that no pursuer from my bed-room—which would be, of course, the first object of the assassin's visit—might be able to follow. I did not doubt that there must be some secret means of obtaining access to it; but what those means might be, I could not say. Taking my shoes off, I groped my way forwards, in almost total darkness. I pursued, as nearly as I was able to guess, the contrary way to that by which I had arrived at my apartment; and, at the end of the passage, had the satisfaction of finding a narrow winding staircase, that led me to the lower storey. My heart was now cheered by seeing a watery glimpse of moonlight streaming from an old sash-window, which, to my great joy, entered upon the extremity of the before-mentioned terrace.

I paused for a moment, in the most intense and painful anxiety, to listen if I could bear any footstep or noise behind me. All was still, except a rush of the wind, which I could distinguish sweeping through the ancient galleries of the mansion. I turned quickly to the terrace-window. The fastenings were sufficiently unserviceable to yield to a moderate degree of force, only; and it was with a beating heart that I succeeded in unclosing the latticed leaves. The creak which they sent forth went to my very soul; but it was with no ordinary speed that I darted across the terrace, and sought means of descending to the ground beneath. I was now in the open air, and seemed to feel that half of my escape was accomplished. A large tree, the branches of which partly swept the place on which I stood—fortunately by no means elevated—enabled me to swing securely down; and I now could pursue my way through the darkness without material interruption.

I darted forward, knowing that if immediately pursued, the thickets would sufficiently conceal me. The wind had been rising, and brought the clouds over the horizon. The rain fell in torrents, pattering amongst the leaves with a noise that sufficiently convinced me that my route could not be traced by the ear; the wind thundered loudly through the forest, in alternations so capricious that any pursuer would be misled; and the lightning, that quivered generally at long intervals, served only to disclose the beating hail and the waving foliage. Meantime I ran onwards as fast as was practicable, quite in a random direction, thinking to get sooner into the open country than by the deserted way I came. The storm, after continuing with its pristine vigour for about an hour, gradually subsided; and, when morning broke, I had, as nearly as I could guess, advanced about five or six miles.

I soon discovered a wretched hovel, which I entered, with the intention of seeking some refreshment. I was received by the landlord and his wife, whom I speedily satisfied with a tale invented at the moment, and as circumstances required. I requested the loan of a horse, engaging to leave it at the next post-town, and offering to place in their hands its value as a deposit. This argument was an effectual one; and, having instituted proper enquiries respecting the roads, &c. I mounted the animal which was placed at my disposal. To shorten my story, I travelled with great expedition, and reached B— before night-fall. I had friends there, and made known all the casualties to which I had been subjected. My story made a considerable stir in the district; and the police received immediate orders to take all the parties criminated into custody. When, however, the Gendarmes proceeded to Walberg's country residence, they found the house empty; and all the readily portable effects of its late inmates removed. A search was commenced throughout the premises; but no clue was found to their place of concealment. They had conducted their operations so ingeniously, that, although many instances of mysterious disappearances were recollected, no decisive proof could be adduced of their deep acts of guilt.

I returned to England in the spring of 1833, and, although I frequently mentioned the adventure, obtained no trace of those whose profound dissimulation so much astonished me. A few weeks ago, however, I recognised Agatha walking with an elderly gentleman in the suburbs of London. I followed them at a distance; and subsequent inquiry enabled me to ascertain that she had been married to him for upwards of three years. Their acquaintance was formed, and the union took place in Paris. Of her brother I have succeeded in discovering no tidings; and now that the danger is past, and the reminiscence of it alone remains, I will not disturb the tranquillity of him whom she has espoused. I have accordingly substituted the name of De Walberg for that by which I knew her and her brother in Germany. Should this publication of the facts meet her eye, she may calm herself with the conviction that through no indiscretion of mine shall any one be able to fix the identity of the heroine of the foregoing narrative with herself. May her present and future mode of life atone for the deeds in which there is too much reason to dread that she was the willing accomplice!

WOOLLEN MANUFACTURE, WEAVING, &c.

THIS is a branch of trade which, since the introduction of machinery, may truly be called the peculiar property of our own island. The woollen manufacture of this country have been gradually extended and improved for the last two centuries; but from the commencement of the reign of George III. their advance has proceeded with a rapidity that has no parallel in past times. Till within the last fifty or sixty years, the wool, when shorn and washed, was scrubbed, combed, or carded by hand. It was then distributed among various persons at scattered residences to be spun; and most of the manufacturers had houses for receiving periodically the yarn from the several spinners. In many cases the spinning was performed in distant counties, and much time sacrificed and heavy expenses incurred in the transmission of the material. The warping was slowly performed by hand, and the abhor shoot placed on the quills also by the same tiresome process. The parts of the work which followed the weaving—such as shearing, dressing and finishing, were likewise all prepared by manual labour. By regular and gradual steps, machinery has been invented for the whole of these operations; and, though human labour has been thus abridged, the manufacture has lately given employment to a greater number of hands than at any past period; and, whilst the very lowest description of labourers are now as well paid as the majority of them formerly were, new and superior classes of workmen have been created, who, without the introduction of machinery, would have been left in the general low condition of the cloth-makers in former times. By machine-spinning, a great evenness is given to the threads; and, in shearing and dressing by mechanism less injury is sustained by the cloths, and, with equal durability, more beauty in the appearance is obtained. The whole work is under the eye of the master: he can have the several divisions of it prepared in quantities to suit each other: he knows exactly when the goods can be ready for the market; and a degree of despatch is given to the whole proceeding, which enables the capital employed in it to circulate with a rapidity heretofore deemed impossible.

Of the rapidity of the manufacture a singular specimen was given a few years ago, when the late Sir John Throgmorton sat down to dinner dressed in a coat which on the same morning had been wool on the back of the sheep! The animals were sheared—the wool washed—carded—spun and woven; the cloth was scoured, fulled, sheared, dyed, and dressed; and then, by the tailor's aid made into a coat, between sun-rising and the hour of seven, when the party sat down to dinner with their chairman dressed in the product of this active day.

Although the machinery invented in England, or applied first in England to this branch of industry, has been copied by the manufacturers on the continent of Europe, and naturalized in the United States of America, the exportation of our cloth has gone on increasing. We have not only worked up all the wool shorn from our gradually augmented flocks, but have found the supply from Spain so inadequate to our demand that we have drawn prodigious quantities from Prussia, Saxony, and many parts of the continent of Europe, from which little or none was formerly imported into this country.

Wool resembles hair in a great many particulars; but besides its fineness, which constitutes an obvious difference, there are other particulars which may serve also to distinguish them from one another. Wool, like the hair of horses, cattle, and most other animals, completes its growth in a year, and then falls off as hair does, and is succeeded by a fresh crop. It differs from hair, however, in the uniformity of its growth and the regularity of its shedding. Every filament of wool seems to keep exact pace with another in the same part of the body of the animal: the whole crop springs up at once,—the whole advances uniformly together,—the whole loosens from the skin nearly at the same period, and thus falls off if not previously shorn, leaving the animal covered with a short coat of young wool, which, in its turn, undergoes the same regular mutations.

Hairs are commonly of the same thickness in every part; but wool constantly varies in thickness in different parts, being generally thicker at the point than at the roots. That part of the fleece of the sheep which grows during the winter is finer than what grows in summer.

While the wool remains in the state in which it was first shorn off the sheep's back, and not sorted into its different kinds, it is called fleece. Each fleece consists of wool of divers qualities and degrees of fineness, which the dealers therein take care to separate. The French and English usually separate each fleece into three sorts,—viz. I. Mother wool, which is that of the back and neck; II. The wool of the tails and legs; III. The wool of the breast and under the belly. The Spaniards make the like division into three sorts, which they call prime, second, and third, and denote each bale or pack with a capital letter intimating the sort. Of late a great deal of attention has been paid to wool in this country; and several very spirited attempts have been made to improve it by introducing superior breeds of sheep and better modes of managing them. The British Wool Society was formed for the purpose of obtaining the best breeds of fine-woolled sheep, with a view of ascertaining by actual experiment how far each species or variety is calculated for the climate of Great Britain,—the qualities of their wool respectively,—the uses to which each kind of wool would be most profitably employed in different manufactures, and the comparative value of each species of sheep, so far as the same can be determined.

The process for dyeing woollen cloths differs considerably from that employed in the preparation of silk or cotton. It is first, however, necessary to remove the oil. To effect this, the yarn or manufactured goods are taken to the fulling mill, where they are beaten with large beetles, in troughs of water mixed with fuller's earth: the clay renders the oil soluble in water, the plentiful addition and change of which leave the goods completely scoured. The only colouring matters used in dyeing wool blue are woad and indigo, which are both substantive colours—that is, they are permanent without requiring a mordant. The dye called Saxon blue is made with the solution of indigo in sulphuric acid. Reds are formed by a great number of substances, and all depend, either for their fineness or beauty upon the use of mordants: the principal of them are Kermes, cochineal, archil, madder, carthamus, and Brazil-wood. The shades of red are usually distinguished into three classes—the madder red, crimson, and scarlet. When sulphate of copper is employed as the mordant, madder dyes a clear brown, inclining to yellow.

The following increase of the exports of sheep and lamb's wool, and woollen and worsted yarn, and the declared value of woollen manufactures, from the year 1820 to 1832, will doubtless astonish the readers:—

	Wool.	Yarn.	Woollen Manu.
	£.	£.	£.
1820	35,242	3,924	5,386,138.
1832	4,499,825	2,204,464	5,244,479.

The art of weaving is of great antiquity, and may be said, in its application, to furnish one of the main distinctions between savage and social life; for though we find finery and external adornment common to every people, yet comfortable clothing is almost exclusively confined to the inhabitants of those portions of the globe which are far advanced in civilization. The progress of mechanical invention in this country has tended most materially towards the improvement in the art of weaving. This is not, however, so apparent in the perfection, as in the diminution in the price of woven fabrics. It is now well known that the Revd. Edmund Cartwright had applied his mind to the construction of a loom to be worked by machinery as early as the year 1784. In March, 1785, he took out a patent for his machine; then brought to some degree of excellence; and, in the years 1786, 1787, 1788, and 1790, he also obtained patents for successive improvements therein. He had in the meantime established at Doncaster, in Yorkshire, a considerable manufactory worked by a steam engine, where muslins, calicoes, &c. were fabricated by the machine, very little, if at all, inferior to those wove by hand. In the year 1791 or 1792, a person of the name of Grimshaw made an attempt to introduce Mr. Cartwright's looms at Manchester. He built a manufactory on a large scale; and several of the looms were actually erected, ready for working, when the whole establishment was destroyed by fire. As there was reason to suspect that this was not done by accident, no other manufacturer chose, at that time, to render himself obnoxious by introducing the use of machinery; and Mr. Cartwright's attention being directed to other inventions, from which he expected to derive greater advantage, his machine for weaving remained for some years nearly as much disregarded by himself as it appeared to be neglected by the public.

The great advantage necessarily resulting from this species of loom ultimately induced several manufacturers to attempt modifications of the apparatus, so that its use has now become one of the chief features in our largest manufacturing establishments.

An ingenious artist at Lyons has invented an admirable machine, by which a single workman can conduct six rotatory looms, and weave silk, cotton, flax, hemp, and wool, into plain or figured stuffs, with a celerity and perfection hitherto unknown. This skillful mechanic has conceived the idea of two looms, which, by their combination and the adaptation of two pieces, form a third. The first has already been used in the fabrication of crape, of seven-eighths taffetas, of three-quarters calicoes; the second in making figured stuffs; and the third, set up as a fine fourth machine, two pieces of half-ell wide, each divided by a separate shuttle. All the accessories are applicable to these looms, and are set in motion by the hand, by alternately pushing the clapper, which is on wheels, and works horizontally. It receives its motion from a pulley, with a twisted leather strap, and two springs placed at each side of the loom. It is capable of being applied to an infinite number of purposes. When it is wished to make a strong stuff, such as ticking or thick-grained cloth, the clapper strikes the wool thrice each time it passes. In proportion as it is wished that the stuff should be open or close, slight or strong, the clapper strikes slightly or heavily, slowly or quickly, and the precise strength is controlled by a regulator. A hand-screw and a small mallet suffice to operate these changes. The shuttle, placed on a box which it does not quit except by the impulse of the workman, passes from eighty to a hundred and ten times in a minute, from the time the machine is set in motion. Another advantage is, that the shuttle has a two-fold operation, of a nature hitherto totally unknown, so that it can be varied without trouble or delay, according to the unequal strength of the zones and the stuff; and, notwithstanding the extreme velocity of both clapper and shuttle, the loom can be stopped at will without injury. While the parts stop which serve to fabricate one of the pieces in a loom arranged for 6—4, those of the second stop also. This is an inconvenience which the artist thinks he shall be enabled to obviate, by making each piece of mechanism of a texture independent of the other; but these short intervals are compensated by the rapidity of the simultaneous execution of two pieces. This is nothing compared to the time lost by the workmen in common looms in disentangling and tying the threads.

It is impossible to close an article of this kind, in a journal like The Teetotaler, which is devoted to the interests of the working classes, without deploring the destitute condition in which the weavers, of all denominations, are now existing in England. These really industrious and deserving men are pining in distress and misery, because the higher classes give the preference to the manufactures of a foreign country! It was to have been hoped that, while a lady occupied the throne, some encouragement would have been given to the silk-weavers of Spitalfields especially; but the condition of this impoverished district is more deplorable at present than it ever yet has been.

The Self Instructing Latin Classics. By W. JACOBS. Part I. 12mo pp. 48. London: W. Brittain.

The Mysteries of the Latin Language Revealed. By W. JACOBS. 12mo. pp. 102. London: W. Brittain.

IMPRESSED with the idea that considerable obstacles are thrown in the way of the student in the classics, by the mystifications of grammar, and still aware that as a grammar can only propose general notions and is therefore always imperfect,—considering also the aversion entertained by all really clever teachers to the mere fact of acting as masters in the first rudiments of a language,—the author of "The Self Instructing Latin Classics" has commenced the work with the design of teaching the sense of standard Latin authors solely in their own constructions, so that the student may at once perceive the nature and the force of Latin composition. The work is designed to supersede the instrumentality of teachers in the study of the Latin language; and most admirably has Mr. Jacobs accomplished his aim, so far as we can judge by the portion of his undertaking now under our notice. "The Mysteries of the Latin Language Revealed" proves that Mr. Jacobs is a profound classical scholar, and that he has not taken upon himself to teach before he was well instructed. By the aid of these two works, a person of even a very dull comprehension may soon acquire a knowledge of the rudiments of the Latin tongue. It must be remembered that the first gentlemen in the land, some few centuries ago, could neither read nor write; but if such facilities as the works now before us be presented to the public, we shall soon have the sons of the working-man studying Latin.

An Address to Christian Ministers of all Denominations, and the Religious Public generally. By A. GLENNIE. London: J. Pasco.

THIS pamphlet has been published with the hope of inducing the clergy of all sects and denominations to abstain from either direct or indirect opposition to the doctrine of Teetotalism. The aim is a laudable one; but the task difficult. The dissenting ministers, in general, have shown themselves well disposed if not absolutely favourable, to the principle; but the Clergy of the Church of England have, with only a few honourable exceptions, manifested the most decided opposition to the cause of Teetotalism. It has been ridiculously asserted that Teetotalism renders the fraternity which embraces it forgetful of religion. This allegation is as absurd as it is defamatory of a good doctrine. Teetotalism, as observed in our second leading article in this week's Number, prepares the path from the Temperance Hall to the Church; and surely every clergyman must be convinced of the fact that he stands a far greater chance of finding morality established amongst a flock of Teetotalers than a flock of drunkards. Teetotalism and morality are almost synonymous, because nearly all crimes emanate from intemperance; and the abolition of intemperance is the removal of some nine-tenths of the turpitude which now sullies the land. It is therefore absurd to oppose the doctrine of Teetotalism on the score that it is calculated to interfere with religion; and we should remind those clergymen who do adopt that mode of opposition, that Teetotalism, in the course of seven years, has reclaimed more drunkards than the preaching of the Gospel has done in seven hundred. And wherefore? Because drunkards do not visit the church where they can hear the inimitable doctrines of the Christian Church; but those self-same drunkards are induced to repair to the Temperance Hall, and there they are purified and prepared for a course of religious duties. We therefore again repeat, that he who frequents the place of Teetotal Assembly, will speedily be induced to become a constant visitor to the House of God.

The clergymen of the church of England are wrong if they think that the advocates of Teetotalism will be swindled out of the Book which contains the precepts of the Almighty. The Sacred Volume is a book of facts, as well authenticated as any heathen history; a book of miracles incontestably avouched; a book of prophecy confirmed by past as well as present fulfilment; a book of poetry, pure and natural, and elevated even to inspiration; a book of morals, such as human wisdom never framed for the protection of human happiness. Teetotalers will abide by the precepts, admire the beauty, revere the mysteries, and, as far as in them lies, practise the mandates of the sacred volume. In the goodly fellowship of the saints, in the noble army of the martyrs, in the society of the great—the good and the wise of every nation, if the selfishness of the Teetotaler be not cleansed, and his darkness illumined, at least his pretensionless submission will be excused. If the Christian err, he errs with the disciples of philosophy and of virtue—with men who have drunk deep at the fountain of human knowledge, but who dissolved not the pearl of their salvation in the draught—he errs with Milton, who, rising on an angel's wing to heaven, like the bird of morn, soared out of sight amid the music of his own grateful piety!

The work now before us is a very unpretending admonition to "Christian ministers of all denominations," relative to the opposition above alluded to; and we are not sorry to have received it, inasmuch as it has enabled us to record the foregoing observations in fitting time and place. Mr. Glennie says, "If example be better than precept—and it most undoubtedly is so—it becomes the bounden duty of the ministers of religion to throw all the weight of their influence and example into that scale which conduces most to the glory of God and the good of their fellow-men." This is a powerful sentence, and should be well weighed by those for whose behoof it is written. Mr. Glennie speaks of the "splendid talents, mighty mind, and gigantic genius, of a Burder, a Cox, or a Newstead." Who these gentlemen may be, we are at a loss to imagine: these names are not however recorded in the pages of our Literary Club books, and the zephyr of Fame has never as yet wafted the appellations to our ears. What, therefore, they have to do with the subject of the present pamphlet, we cannot determine. In conclusion we will observe, that the intention of this little work is very praise-worthy; and, as it is written in a calm and unpretending manner, its contents can of course do no harm.

ORIENTAL FRAGMENTS.—No II.

BY JAMES SILK BUCKINGHAM.

As it grew dark, the camels were collected together, and kneeling on the sand near us, their fore-legs were lashed in their bent position, which, rendering them unable to rise, was the only precaution necessary for their safety. A small quantity of gunpowder, bruised in oil, was given to them in form of a bulus, and a bag of beans tied to their mouths, for their evening meal. Hassan and Suliman were returned with fuel for the night, and Abdallah, having in the short space of half an hour ground sufficient wheat for the party, mixed it, chaff and all, in the water of their own skin, baked cakes of it on the fire of dung, and made them, while warm, again into a paste, by breaking them into pieces, and kneading them into a wooden bowl, with oil and honey. Each of the party washed his hands in the sand, before commencing their meal, as water is too precious in the desert to be so used; and all dipping their fingers in the same dish, regaled themselves as at a feast of delicacies.

I could not refuse to join them, but it was a painful tribute to their hospitality; and keen as my appetite had been at alighting, it was more than satisfied by witnessing the preparation of our food, so that I was compelled at last to plead fatigue, and afterwards to sup unseen from my own stock; feeling in this instance, the truth of Solomon's expression, that, 'stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant.' We remained awake, and were engaged in rude yet interesting festivity, until midnight, having a large fire, and one of the party always on watch, so that we rolled ourselves in our cloaks, and sunk to rest without apprehensions of evil.

DESERT OF SUZ.—WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 16TH.—The shades of night had scarcely given place to the earliest gleams of morning, before we were again stirring. Coffee and the hasty cakes of yesterday were served with equal expedition, and an hour before sunrise, our little caravan was on the march. The appearance of the country was everywhere the same; dull sandy plains, unbroken and without variety; a wide horizon, almost like the sea, and the elevation or depression of the road seldom exceeding an angle of three degrees. In some few parts, where the sand appeared more loose and deep, were tufts of bitter herbs, and a sort of dry heath, on which the camels fed as they passed along; but by far the greater part of the track was a firm, gravelly soil, covered with white and yellow pebbles, of common flint, forming an excellent road, either for wheel carriages, cavalry, or infantry, and even for laden waggons, if necessary.

In the course of the morning, we had passed several spots strewed with logs, resembling petrifications of trees, or at least portions of their trunks, with the bark on; but remembering the discussion of that question by Volney, and his aspersions on the veracity of Père Sicard, followed by an assurance of his having examined those logs, and found them to be really stones, I passed them by, contented with admiring their close resemblance to timber, yet still wondering at the cause of their singular shape and situation, remote from rocks or quarries of any kind; my confidence in his better judgment setting the question at rest in my own mind as to their real nature, for the present. At noon, however, we passed another spot on which several of these lay, and among them were some so remarkable, that I could not resist the temptation of alighting to examine them more closely; the result of which was, a conviction of their being petrifications. I had selected one of the smallest of the trunks that I could find, among those exhibiting unequivocal characteristics, such as the bark, the circular layers, the knots, &c., intending to load it on our camels alternately, and send it back from Suz to Cairo; but the very proposition was resisted with warmth, and persevered against with obstinacy. I offered an increased sum for its conveyance, and even consented to walk myself, for the rest of the way, while my own camel carried it, as it did not exceed my own weight; but neither entreaties, threats, nor rewards, could prevail on our guide to comply with our wishes; and the silliness of the objections which he urged, only added vexation to disappointment. He knew, he said, that I was 'one of God's wandering children,' that is, an idiot or madman; and as I understood how to read books, that my search was after hidden treasures; but these, he said, were not the 'monied stones'—for so they consider all blocks with inscriptions—as there was no writing on them. He added, that as he was himself a connoisseur of those 'receptacles of hidden wealth,' meaning blocks with hieroglyphics and inscriptions, though he was ignorant how to enrich himself by them, he would not suffer one under his protection to be imposed on by such an error of judgment, as the taking away these stones, in the hope of their being of any value. There was no replying to this mode of reasoning; and the disappointment, like all other evils, was better to be forgotten than to be pondered over, so that I affected at last to make light of the matter, and passed on to overtake the rest of our party, who during this dispute about the petrified trunks, had gained some distance ahead of us.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

FOREIGN NEWS.

HAMBURG.

A TEETOTAL SOCIETY has lately been established at Hamburg; and a grand meeting was to take place at the Assembly-Rooms, on the evening of January 18th. The place of meeting was the Lecture-Hall of a seminary, which had not been used for some time; and the way to it lay by a public-house, the owner of which illuminated his house and invited all passengers to enter. In the front of his house, and in the open space before the school-house, a dense crowd was collected, whose turbulent conduct, as well as the furious cries uttered by some, sufficiently manifested the effects of the invitation of the tavern-keeper. The members of the Total Abstinence Society, and the friends of the plan, had great difficulty in making their way through the crowd. Seven o'clock was the time fixed for the meeting, into which a number of persons found their way with the disgraceful intention of creating a disturbance. Scarcely had the secretary begun to read the rules of the Association, when several of the persons alluded to commenced a most infamous system of clamouring and yelling. This gave the signal to the crowd collected at the door for acts of greater violence. The doors were forced open, and the members of the society had scarcely time to retreat by the back door, from the clubs and sticks with which the adherents of the publican were armed. The mob penetrated to the Assembly Room, broke the windows, tables, and chairs, threw the pieces into the adjacent canal, and did as much damage as they could. They remained masters of the field until the civic guard arrived; and when this was called in, the building was speedily cleared of the rioters. Several persons were arrested, and lodged in the town-gaol, on an accusation of disturbing the meeting; and it appears that the authorities are determined to punish them with severity. As soon as the police had thus effectually interfered, the members of the Association returned to the Assembly-Rooms, and the business of the evening proceeded without farther interruption.

COUNTRY NEWS.

IRELAND.

In consequence of the Temperance movement now in progress in Ireland, and the consequent improved state of the country, hundreds of the natives now in England are daily returning to a land of which they may at length be proud. Opportunities of obtaining work upon advantageous terms in Ireland, now present themselves to many classes of operatives and artisans, as one of the results of the altered condition of the country through the exertions of FATHER MATHEW and his disciples. This excellent man will visit Carrigaholt in the course of the ensuing summer, and in the spring of 1842, he intends to visit London. FATHER MATHEW administered the pledge to an immense number of persons at Tipperary, a few days ago. MR. HOWLEY, the Assistant Barrister for Tipperary, in his charge to the Grand Jury at the opening of the Nenagh Quarter Sessions on January 23rd, made the following highly interesting observations:—

"The Temperance movement has gone back to a chief source of crime, restoring reason to that supremacy which drunkenness deposed. In the madness of intoxication, crimes were planned and perpetrated; and in a great proportion of the murders and violences which were once so frequent in this country, has it not appeared upon the trials that the leading accomplice was whisky? Let no man underrate this great element of social order; let no ingenious fears detract from the value of so wholesome an institution. If men have associated in furtherance of it, why should exception be made to such association? It is but hedging round a great virtue with additional guards; for virtue itself requires outward forms and defences to strengthen it against the inroads of assailing passions. If it have grown up under the auspices of a humble priest, the medium, though humble, cannot take from the value of the precious gift, although it may dignify and exalt the instrument of its transmission. I regret to observe that a writer in a recent periodical of some pretension has stated its chief agent to be superstition, and its ultimate object to be murder. It is hard to account for the visions of men, or why the imagination will sometimes play the traitor to the judgment. It would be unprofitable, and perhaps not becoming to pursue from this place any controversy on the subject; but it is quite within our legitimate jurisdiction to vindicate, so far as a simple denial can go, this great measure of police from any charge that may tend to detract from its usefulness or weaken its powers. In this country there is abundant evidence to silence every evil where public order, and individual comfort, and good conduct are the peaceful triumphs of the Temperance movement."

Comment upon this able and valuable speech, is unnecessary.

At a meeting of the Wigan Branch of the Cork Temperance Society, on Sunday evening, January 24th, a splendid silver medal, set in a silver case, with glasses at the sides, and appended to a handsome silver chain, was presented to Mr. WILLIAM DIXON, for his indefatigable exertions as principal Secretary to the Association. The ceremony of presentation was superintended by the Rev. E. MORRIS, one of the Vice-Presidents of the Society. Mr. Dixon returned thanks in a most eloquent and affecting speech. The following is the inscription on the medal:—"Presented to William Dixon by a few friends of the Wigan Branch of the Cork Society, January 24th, 1841." On the reverse side, are emblazoned the Temperance Arms.

BIRMINGHAM.

THE Teetotalers of Birmingham are energetic in their endeavours to add to the numbers of their Association; and, in spite of the opposition which they experience at the hands of the brewers, distillers, and publicans, the prospects of the cause at that place are exhilarating and encouraging. There is not at this moment one half the number of gin-palaces open in Birmingham that there was four years ago; and several of those, which still maintain themselves against the tide of Teetotal opinion, are in a weak and tottering condition.

ARBROATH.

THE Rechabites of this place have lately been engaged in processions and Temperance Festivals, which have produced a demonstration of the rapid progress and good results of Teetotalism at Arbroath and its vicinity. Upwards of five hundred members on one occasion sat down to tea at the Trade's Hall, the Chief Roler in the chair, with about forty of his brethren on the platform around him. The audience was most effectually addressed by the Rev. Mr. MITCHELL (from Dundee), the Rev. Mr. MOIR, and MESSIEURS MENMUIR, SMART, GARRIK, and WHYTE. On another occasion, during the past month, the Rechabites of Arbroath, headed by the Total Abstinence Society's admirable band of musicians, proceeded in grand cavalcade to the Arbroath and Forfar Railway Depot, and thence to the village of Freockham; where they held a grand meeting in a Hall prepared for their reception by that kind-hearted gentleman, Mr. J. ANDERSON, of that place. In a word, Teetotalism has taken a permanent root at Arbroath and in its vicinity.

MANCHESTER.

THE Teetotal Society of this place has determined to separate the principle from all matters of religious discussion, and to open the portals of its temple to drunkards and moderate-drinkers of all sects, and creeds, and parties. The Rev. Mr. BEARDSALL is no longer one of the officers of the Association. On Monday evening, January, 25th, there was a crowded meeting in the Assembly-Room, Pump-street, London Road, Mr. GRINDROD, the President of the Society, in the chair. Mr. GRIMSHAW, Corresponding Secretary to the Independent Order of Rechabites, delivered an impressive address, and he was followed by Mr. J. LEES, junior. The latter gentleman, who is one of the most eminent merchants of Manchester, called earnestly upon the higher classes to assist in the great Teetotal movement. On the evening of the 26th of January, the Trial of Sir John Barleycorn was enacted, with considerable effect, in the rooms lately occupied as a Beer Shop, in New Blakely-street. There are now twenty-five Teetotal meetings weekly in Manchester, and one of our esteemed correspondents, Mr. JOHN WILLIAMS, very properly observes that "the time is not far distant when the nobles of the land will be compelled to adopt the glorious example set them by the working classes."

TOWN NEWS.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

THE meetings at the Aldersgate-street Chapel, on Wednesday, January, 27th, and Saturday, January, 30th, were well attended. On Wednesday evening, addresses were delivered by MESSIEURS G. W. M. REYNOLDS, BAYLIS, BATTIS, PRICE, and CRUMP. Mr. Crump gave notice that the Executive Committee had passed a resolution to abolish the charge for admission to the Chapel on Saturday evenings.

CHELSEA AUXILIARY TO THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

At a late meeting of this flourishing Society, an individual of the name of DAVIS stated that in an establishment of Lead-Works at Rotherhithe, the workmen had to labour sometimes for nearly thirty-six hours at a time, and that those of them who were Teetotalers invariably performed their labours more rapidly, better, and with greater ease to themselves than those who were accustomed to use alcoholic liquors. The principal speakers lately at the Hall, 36, George-street, Chelsea, have been MESSIEURS FARMILLO, CURRIE, BLAIR, SPARKS, LUCAS, DOWLING, ARMON, and DOBBSING.

Published by GEORGE HENDERSON, 2, Old Bailey, Ludgate Hill; and sold by W. STRANGE, Paternoster Row; D. Campbell; Glasgow; Macdonald & Co., Dublin; and all booksellers in Town and Country.

CHAPTER IV.

THE CIVILITY OF THE ENGLISH PRESS.—MR. PICKWICK RECEIVES AN INSIGHT INTO COMMERCIAL SPECULATIONS.—MASTER SNODGRASS.—DISCUSSION AND FINAL ARRANGEMENT OF A SENTIMENTAL DIVERSION.

WHEN Mr. Pickwick rose on the following morning, the first thing he did was to ring the bell for his valet, and inquire for the newspaper. His wish was complied with; the newspaper was brought, and Mr. Pickwick desired Sam to give him his spectacles which were lying upon the toilette-table.

"We shall now see what amends the Editor has made for the false report of my case that appeared in this journal of yesterday," said Mr. Pickwick, putting on his glasses, as he sat up in his bed. "I dare say he will make a very handsome apology for the misrepresentation."

"Ah! 'ansome is wot 'ansome does, sir, as the lady said ven the black gen'lman give her a diamond ring," observed Mr. Samuel Weller.

"There is one thing, Sam," continued Mr. Pickwick, turning the newspaper in the most convenient way to get a glimpse of that part where he expected to find his letter in a bold type, with probably the Editor's or Reporter's excuses appended to it,—"there is one thing, Sam, which makes me proud of being an Englishman; and that is the freedom of the press, in all its details. If a man's character be here impugned, all he has to do is to write a letter to the offending journal, and his reputation is immediately vindicated. The peace of families is never violated by the English press, without every readiness being manifested to repair the injury."

"Ah! 'tis indeed a verry great blessin', sir, wot you says there, partickler ven the contradiction comes too late to repair the aggravation," said Mr. Weller. "Got at the letter, yet, sir?"

"Well—upon my word, this is very singular—very remarkable," said Mr. Pickwick, looking up one column, and down another, and then in this corner, and then in that—and lastly fixing his intelligent eyes upon a paragraph headed "THIMBLE-RIOING," as if he expected to find his letter there.

"Wot's so verry extraordinary?" demanded Sam. "Has them Editors done the thing so verry 'ansome that a tip of fifty pounds ain't nothin' to it?" and, as Mr. Weller asked this question, he surveyed with considerable interest the tassel of Mr. Pickwick's white cotton night-cap, which bobbed up and down over the top of the newspaper.

"I really can't see my letter anywhere," continued Mr. Pickwick, in a tone of peculiar annoyance. "Here's a long account about a gentleman who refused to pay a church-rate of half-a-crown, because he was a dissenter and used another chapel which he helped to support with his purse; and the Ecclesiastical Court has run the half-crown up to a hundred and thirty nine pounds ten shillings and eleven-pence halfpenny, for which sum the gentleman is sent to prison; and there's also an account of how some noble Earl and a Captain of the Guards nearly killed a policeman a long time ago, and how the matter has been hushed up, and no trial is to take place. A poor man would have been transported for half the offence, Sam. Bot—after all—I don't see anything about my letter."

"Wot a shame to blow you up sky-high von day, an' refuse you any kind o' justification the next," said Mr. Weller. "That is coming it rayther too strong, as the poor vidder said ven three hulking grenadiers was billeted at her house."

"It really is too bad," said Mr. Pickwick.

"Look at the Notices to Correspondents, sir," exclaimed Mr. Weller, a bright thought suddenly flashing across his brain.

"So I will," cried Mr. Pickwick; and casting his eyes towards the place where those interesting paragraphs are usually inserted, he read to his horror and astonishment the following words:—"Mr. Pickwick's Letter is an Advertisement."

"Vell, that's addin' insult to injury, as the poor donkey said ven the costermonger swore at it after having thrashed it with the leather thong. Blowed if that ain't the rummest go I ever see. They tells lies about a man fust, an' then vants him to pay for windicatin' his character."

"Then I'll not gratify their rapacity, Sam," cried Mr. Pickwick sternly: "I'll not pay for the letter!"

"The fact is, sir," answered Mr. Weller solemnly, "that that there newspaper has so long defended the liberties o' the nation, that it thinks it may take a few vith the characters o' private individuals. But who d'ye think is down stairs?"

"I really can't say," replied Mr. Pickwick. "A gen'lman as wishes verry much to see you, but who von't give his name cos he says it's no use as you don't know him," returned Sam.

"I shall be down in ten minutes," cried Mr. Pickwick; and, banishing from his thoughts the disagreeable adventure connected with the newspaper, the great man proceeded to dress himself.

When he descended the stairs, he hastened to the private study of his friend Mr. Snodgrass, into which sanctuary the visitor had been admitted; and, upon entering that abode of learning (where half the walls had been filled up in a manner to imitate an immense library of books, in the same way as a backgammon board is frequently made to represent two large folio volumes of a History of England), Mr. Pickwick found himself in the presence of a gentleman whom we shall describe.

The individual alluded to was about eight-and-forty years of age, of middle height, rather stout, and somewhat ruddy in complexion. He was dressed in a black surtout coat, a yellow waistcoat, an immense blue satin stock, grey trousers, and polished boots. In his hand he carried an immense yellow bamboo cane: and if his stock of blue satin was very capacious, his stock of impudence was not the less extensive. With such qualifications, it may be supposed that, in the present state of society, such a man might present himself anywhere—as indeed the person in question did.

"Mr. Pickwick, I presume?" said the stranger rising from the arm-chair in which the poetic Mr. Snodgrass was wont to recline his illustrious limbs, when in the agonies of composition.

"My name is Pickwick," returned our hero.

"Ah! I thought so," said the stranger, shaking his head mysteriously. "Excellent name. Pickwick—would look uncommonly well across a bill for a few hundreds,—and better still at the bottom of a cheque for a cool thousand. No fear of you turning out a lame duck!"

"Sir," ejaculated Mr. Pickwick, in deep indignation, "I am as far from being anything resembling a lame duck, or a lame goose, as you are, sir. I can walk, sir, as well as when I was twenty, sir;"—and to convince this extraordinary visitor of the fact, Mr. Pickwick walked straight up to him, and viewed him with a threatening aspect.

"My dear sir," cried the stranger, bursting out into an immoderate fit of laughter, "I meant no offence—you have misunderstood me. I merely used an expression which we gentlemen of the City frequently apply upon 'Change to those who do not pay up on settling day. Pray, Mr. Pickwick, do you ever speculate on 'Change?"

"I have done such a thing in my life-time," was the answer.

"And pray, sir, were you a bull or a bear?" enquired the visitor very seriously.

"One thing is very certain," exclaimed Mr. Pickwick, who was now worked up to a pitch of the most indignant excitement,—"one thing is very certain—and that is, you shall not bully me, for I won't bear it. I am not to be insulted in this house, which is my friend's, a bit more than I would be in my own!"

"Upon my word, Mr. Pickwick, I meant no offence,—upon my word, I did not," said the stranger, with difficulty suppressing his inclination to laugh again. "Bulls and bears are also names used upon 'Change, and very familiar to us City men. I hope you are not offended?"

"By no means," said Mr. Pickwick, "if you did not intend to insult me."

"I would sooner die than insult you, Mr. Pickwick," ejaculated the stranger. "But let me explain the object of my present visit—and for which I have to apologize, as it is made at so early an hour. We City men, however, think nothing of early hours."

"Might I inquire the object of your visit, sir?" said Mr. Pickwick mildly, as he took a seat and a long stare at the stranger.

"I must tell you, my dear sir, in the first place," began the visitor, with true English familiarity, "that I am an individual who, like yourself, has devoted the greater portion of my life to philanthropic pursuits."

"Ah!" said Mr. Pickwick, beginning to entertain a favourable opinion of the gentleman then present.

"Yes, my dear sir, philanthropy has been my ruin, I may say!" continued the stranger. "I established The One-Legged Man's Friend Society—an institution where all individuals who had the misfortune to lose a leg, might obtain a wooden one gratis. But would you believe it sir, the world would not support that valuable institution by its voluntary contributions?"

"Monstrous!" exclaimed Mr. Pickwick.

"I then founded an establishment for the blind who had any chance of recovering their sight, but who could not afford to pay for a doctor: but, such is the ingratitude of the world, that the whole scheme was ruined by the villany of one man, who declared that, after having been there for six months, he could see nothing but the humbug of the institution!"

"Well—at all events he began to see a little," observed the ingenuous Mr. Pickwick.

"The failure of these philanthropic establishments," continued the stranger, "induced me to turn my attention to commercial and mercantile affairs. I have lately taken a splendid establishment in Moorgate-street, and am founding one of the largest banks ever known. It is called the Bank of New Holland, and offers peculiar advantages to those who wish to remit money to the flourishing colonies in that country."

"A very ingenious undertaking, I dare say," remarked Mr. Pickwick.

"Must succeed—nothing can prevent it, my dear sir!" ejaculated the stranger. "This is the way in which we intend to do business:—For instance, if you want to remit a hundred pounds to New Holland, all you will have to do will be to pay fifty pounds into our bank here, and we furnish you with a letter of credit or draft upon our agent in the colony for double this sum."

"But how can you afford to do this?" inquired Mr. Pickwick, quite amazed at this novel and truly original financial enterprise.

"Oh! we can do it with the greatest facility!" cried the stranger. "Nothing is more easy, my dear sir, than to receive the fifty pounds, and give the order for the hundred. I have calculated all the advantages to be derived from the system, and feel convinced that I am on the right side of the hedge."

"If you can but carry out such a glorious scheme," said Mr. Pickwick, "you will be conferring a great benefit upon emigrants. This is truly a philanthropic institution. But do you really think that you will ever realize even a part of this gigantic undertaking?"

"Ever realize it!" cried the stranger: "why, I have already realized a considerable portion of the enterprise."

"Indeed!" said Mr. Pickwick.

"Certainly, I have! I have realized upwards of fifty thousand pounds already; and that is something, I should hope!" exclaimed the speculator. "My dear sir," he continued, lowering his tone of voice, "if people wish to succeed now-a-days, they must strike out of all beaten paths: they must enter upon tracts never previously explored. You do not understand the nature of these vast speculations, I am afraid; but I will explain somewhat of their character to you. In the present age you must do things by millions, or you will not succeed. Moreover, there is no danger to be incurred if an establishment should fail for an enormous amount. If a poor devil fails for a hundred pounds, and unfortunately loses monies entrusted to him by friends, he must apply to the Insolvents' Court, and gets remanded to prison for two years for fraud. His character is blasted, and his name can never afterwards divest itself of the stigma attached to it. But if a man fails for a million, half of which, or the whole, is money entrusted to him by clients or friends to lay out for them to the best advantage, he goes boldly forward to the Bankruptcy Court, demands its protection, never goes to prison at all, is allowed an income for six weeks, obtains a general release from all his debts, and holds up his head higher than ever when it is all over. That is the difference, Mr. Pickwick, between doing things on a grand scale and on a small one. In the former instance, starvation, beggary, and disgrace follow the poor wretch who fails for a hundred pounds; and, in the latter case, indulgence, income, and an entire discharge from all pecuniary liability, or imputation against character, attend the man who breaks for a million."

"And yet," observed Mr. Pickwick, "the poor man could not have ruined a soul, whereas the rich man may have involved thousands in his own downfall."

"Very true, Mr. Pickwick; but such is the blessed state of society and law in this country at the present day. That is the reason why it is much more easy to build up an establishment upon a grand scale than a small one. With all its experience, Mr. Pickwick, the world is easily duped, and will run with its money to those places that offer large advantages, while establishments whose principles of safety and equity are incompatible with vast interest and premium remain unsupported. These observations are, however, only generally applied: they do not for a moment relate to the Bank of New Holland which I have just formed, and which holds out such brilliant prospects of success to its projectors. The object of my present visit is to ascertain two things:—first, whether you will take any shares in my enterprise; and, secondly, whether you will allow me to publish your name as one of the Directors of the Company. Your patronage, as a philanthropist and a public man, will tend greatly to increase the respectability of the institution."

As he uttered these words, the stranger extracted from his pocket a bundle of Circulars which he put into Mr. Pickwick's hands: and then, for the first time, did Mr. Pickwick ascertain that the name of the speculator was Joseph Swindlehem.

"Well, my dear sir," said Mr. Pickwick, whose appetite began to remind him that he had not as yet come in contact with the breakfast table, "I will think of the matter."

"I must have your answer at once," cried Mr. Swindlehem: "there are but two shares of a hundred pounds each remaining in the Treasurer's hands, and upwards of fifty applications have been made for them."

"I really can give no answer to day," said Mr. Pickwick.

"Well, I will send for your reply to-morrow morning at this hour," said Mr. Swindlehem, taking up his hat preparatory to taking himself off.

"I will then let you know all about the matter," returned Mr. Pickwick; and with this assurance the commercial gentleman took his leave.

Mr. Pickwick discussed his breakfast with that appetite which usually attends upon health and contentment; and, when the meal was despatched, to his great delight, and that of Mr. Snodgrass, the house was embellished by the arrival of Mr. Tracy Tupman and Mr. Nathaniel Winkle. Mr. Tupman had become more stout and sleek than when he was last introduced to the readers of the adventures of Mr. Pickwick, in the work so well known by the title of Pickwick Abroad; and Mr. Winkle had also considerably improved in appearance. Mr. Tupman was attired in a full suit of black, with white neckerchief and lemon-coloured gloves (although it was in the middle of winter); and Mr. Winkle imparted lustre to a green coat with brass buttons, a French silk waistcoat, brown unutterables, and a striped stock which circumvented his neck.

"More visitors," said Sam, as he admitted these gentlemen into the parlour where Mr. Pickwick and the Snodgrass family were seated: "it never rains but it pours, as the blind beggar said ven he seated his-self under the water-spout."

"How are you, Sam?" demanded Mr. Winkle.

"Wery well, sir, thank'ee," was the cheerful reply; "an' wery much obleeged for the compliment. I don't think that you stands any chance o' spilin' by keepin', sir, as the nobleman said to the Stilton cheese."

"Well, what do you think of Mr. Tupman then?" asked Mr. Winkle in a whisper.

"Surprisin' fat, sir," returned Sam, with a solemn shake of the head. "It ain't wery difficult to see that he don't take his breakfast at the town-pump, with a penny roll an' no butter. I rayther think he must be somehow or another related to Daniel Lambert."

Mr. Winkle laughed heartily at this sally, and then sallied into the presence of Mr. Pickwick.

"I am very glad you have come, my dear friends," said our hero, when all the usual salutations, compliments, inquiries, and answers, were over; "for I wished to see you for many reasons. In the first place, I want you both to accompany me and Snodgrass to a ball—a city-ball, got up for a very philanthropic purpose."

"A ball!" exclaimed Mr. Tupman joyfully; and, in the delight occasioned by the announcement, he attempted to cut a fling in the air, but flung himself with all his weight upon Mr. Pickwick's toes instead.

"Pray, my dear Tupman, be more cautious how you practise your steps beforehand," cried Mr. Pickwick, whose expressive countenance was screwed up in a most extraordinary manner by the pain he experienced in his pedal extremities.

Due attention was now paid to the elder son of Mr. Snodgrass. That beautiful specimen of the Snodgrass race was lugged forward by an admiring father, to be presented to admiring friends; and a most astonishing boy he was too—that is, according to his parent's account. He was only eight years old—was already conversant with the Latin grammar—and could eat at one meal more than his father did at three collectively. These were certainly grand qualifications; and Mr. Snodgrass had a right to be proud of his boy.

"He's a fine healthy fellow," said Mr. Tupman.

"I'm sure you wouldn't like to board him," cried the delighted Mr. Snodgrass.

"Why not?" demanded his friend.

"Because he eats a great deal," was the reply conveyed in a punning sense. "They call him Time at school."

"What for?" again asked Mr. Tupman.

"Because they say that he is the Devourer of all things," replied Mr. Snodgrass. "Tempus edax rerum, you know."

"Does he get on with his grammar?" enquired Mr. Winkle, by way of saying something.

"With his Eton grammar prodigiously."

"Can he decline a substantive?"

"He'll decline anything in the school-room, but nothing at the dinner-table."

"So he has a great thirst for knowledge—eh?" said Mr. Tupman, patting the boy's head.

"Ah! and such an appetite too," cried Mrs. Snodgrass.

"What profession do you intend to bring him up to?" asked Mr. Tupman.

"I was thinking of having him educated for a public—a parliamentary career," returned Mr. Snodgrass.

"Von't never do, sir," cried Mr. Weller, who entered the room at this moment.

"Why not, Sam?" demanded Mr. Pickwick.

"'Cos by the time that there youngster grows up," answered Sam, "all people will be sure to have wery liberal ideas. That bein' the case, he'll have to advocate annual parliaments; an' I feel wery sure that anything like short commons will be partickler disagreeable to him. You'd better aend him to study in the Temple for a barrister."

"Why, Sam?" again asked Mr. Pickwick, who sate in deep admiration of his lacquey's system of reasoning.

"'Cos, sir, the study's a wery pleasant 'un, an' all he'll have to do will be to eat his terms."

"I am afraid, Sam," observed Mr. Snodgrass, "that a barrister who has only eaten his terms, gets very little to eat afterwards out of his practice."

"Vell, sir," cried Mr. Weller, "all I can say is that I've always heerd up to this time that, in all great cases, the clients fee'd the lawyers wery 'ansomely."

But as little Master Snodgrass was not of an age when it was necessary to adopt plans relative to his future career in life,—and as his mother had at that moment nearly knocked him down for not looking up when he was spoken to,—the subject was dropped for the time being; and the conversation took a turn of a far more interesting nature to Mr. Pickwick.

"We have made the acquaintance of such a nice family in the city," said this gentleman mildly.

"Yes—the Sagos are very nice people indeed," cried Mr. Snodgrass; "and, between ourselves, our friend Pickwick is regularly smitten with the youngest daughter, Teresina Hippolyta."

"Indeed!" cried Mr. Tupman. "Is she pretty?"

"Very," answered Mr. Snodgrass.

"You old rogue," said Mr. Tupman, addressing the very friendly and flattering appellation to Mr. Pickwick, and shaking his head and his forefinger simultaneously.

"You don't mean to say that you are smitten in that quarter?" ejaculated Mr. Winkle.

"Pooh! pooh! nonsense," said Mr. Pickwick, smiling. "But I should like to introduce Tupman to Amelia Sophia."

"Let us hit upon some novel scheme of demonstrating our respect towards them," cried Mr. Tupman, although he was totally unacquainted with the family alluded to. "In Spain, when a noble cavalier wishes to introduce himself especially to the notice of some fair lady, he serenades her beneath her window, by the light of the silvery moon."

"And we can serenade the Miss Sagos by the light of the gas-lamp," suggested Mr. Pickwick, who was very sentimentally inclined at that moment. "What say you to a serenade?"

Mr. Snodgrass glanced furtively towards his wife, and perceiving that her countenance offered no encouragement to the idea of her husband forming one of the serenading party, he immediately made a merit of necessity, and ejaculated, "I for one shall not go!"

"I will though!" cried Mr. Tupman; "and I will take a triangle with me, which I can borrow of the blind man who plays me a tune beneath my window every morning at breakfast time."

"And I shall decline being of the party too," said Mr. Winkle. "A married man has no business with a midnight serenade."

"Quite right," exclaimed Mr. Pickwick. "I and Tupman will carry the plan into effect to-morrow evening. Snodgrass can write us a song, at all events, if he cannot accompany us."

"Oh! with pleasure," returned the poet-laureat of the Pickwickians; "and it shall contain some pretty compliments too, I can tell you. I'm sure I don't see why a serenade should not be got up as effectually and sentimentally in London as Madrid."

"It is a pity that their house does not overlook the Thames," said Mr. Pickwick. "If it did, we might go in a wherry, and that would be a beautiful imitation of the gondola beneath the window of some lovely Italian lady in Venice."

"Vy, p'rhaps it's jist as vell as it is, sir," said Mr. Samuel Weller, who had been a mute but not an uninterested hearer of this admirable plan; "cos you might happen to get hold of a drunken boatman, an' he wouldn't help out the truth o' the pickler by actin' the character of a very sentimental gondolier."

"Sam is quite right," exclaimed Mr. Pickwick; "it is much better as it is. What night shall it take place?"

"The sooner the better," answered Mr. Tupman, who was anxious to carry the scheme into execution with that promptitude and decision which marked all the actions of these truly illustrious men.

"To-morrow evening, then," said Mr. Pickwick; "and that will allow Snodgrass time to write the poem. But, by the bye, when I think of it—I can't sing."

"Well," said Mr. Tupman, whose fertile brain so happily provided against all difficulties, "we can hire a couple of singers, and they can stand a little way down the street—under a gate-way, or behind a pump, if there's one near; and no one will know that they are not our own voices."

"No—I think we will confine the amusement to ourselves," observed Mr. Pickwick. "We will do the best we can in the singing way. You shall play a triangle, Tupman: Sam shall go with us, and play something; and I will beat a drum."

"It is settled then for to-morrow night," said Mr. Tupman, surveying himself in a looking-glass: "I am sure we shall acquit ourselves respectably."

"Ah! I des say you vill indeed," cried Mr. Weller, with a serio-comic air. "The Lord Mayor's show von't be nothin' to it; nor Punch an' Judy neither."

(To be continued in our next.)

PORCELAIN.

This is a peculiar species of earthenware, and is principally manufactured in China. All earthenwares, which are white and semi-transparent, are generally called porcelains; but amongst these such great differences may be observed that, notwithstanding the similarity of their external appearance, they cannot be considered as matters of the same kind. These differences are so evident, that even persons, who are not connoisseurs in this respect, prefer much the porcelain of some countries to that of others.

The art of making porcelain is one of those in which Europe has been excelled by oriental nations. The first porcelain that was seen in Europe was brought from Japan and China. The whiteness, transparency, fineness, neatness, elegance, and even the magnificence of this pottery, which soon became the ornament of sumptuous tables, did not fail to excite the admiration and industry of Europeans; and their attempts have succeeded so well, that in different parts of Europe earthenwares have been made so like the oriental that they have acquired the name of porcelain. The first European porcelains were made in Saxony and France, and afterwards in England, Germany, and Italy; but, as all these were different from the Japanese, so each of them had its peculiar character.

The following is the manner in which porcelain is made in China. The principal ingredients of the fine porcelain are pe-tun-tse and kaolin—two kinds of earth from the mixture of which the paste is produced. The kaolin is intermixed with small shining particles: the other is purely white, and very fine to the touch. These first materials are carried to the manufactories in the shape of bricks. The pe-tun-tse, which is so fine, is nothing else but fragments of rock broken from certain quarries and reduced to powder. Every kind of stone is not fit for this purpose. The colour of that which is good, say the Chinese, ought to incline a little towards green. A large iron club is used for breaking these pieces of hard stone: they are afterwards put into mortars, and by means of levers headed with stone bound round with iron, they are reduced to a very fine powder. These levers are put in action either by the labour of men, or by water, in the same manner as the hammers of our paper-mills. The pulverised mass being afterwards collected, is thrown into a large vessel full of water, which is rapidly stirred with an iron shovel. When it has been left to settle for some time, a kind of cream rises upon the top about four inches in thickness: this is skimmed off, and poured into another vessel filled with water. The water in the first vessel is stirred repeatedly, and the half-fluid material collected, until nothing remains but the coarse dregs, which, by their own weight, precipitate to the bottom. These dregs are carefully collected, and pounded anew.

With regard to what is taken from the first vessel, it is suffered to remain in the second until it is formed into a kind of crust at the bottom. When the water above it seems quite clear, it is poured off by gently inclining the vessel, that the sediment may not be disturbed; and the paste is thrown into large moulds proper for drying it. Before it is entirely hard, it is divided into small square cakes, which are sold by the hundred. The colour of this paste, and its form, have occasioned it to receive the name of pe-tun-tse. The kaolin, which is used in the composition of porcelain, requires less labour than the pe-tun-tse. Nature has a greater share in the preparation of it. There are large mines of it in certain mountains, the exterior strata of which consist of a kind of red earth. These mines are very deep, and the kaolin is found in small lumps, that are formed into bricks after having gone through the same process as the pe-tun-tse. The Chinese have, however, lately discovered a new substance, proper to be employed in the composition of porcelain. It is a stone, or rather species of chalk, called hoa-che, from which the physicians prepare a kind of draught that is said to be detersive, aperient, and cooling. The manufacturers of porcelain have thought proper to employ this stone instead of kaolin. It is called hoa, because it is glutinous, and has a great resemblance to soap. Porcelain made with hoa-che is very rare, and much clearer than any other.

To the elementary earths thus described, as the component parts of porcelain, must be added the varnish from which it derives its splendour and whiteness. This is of a whitish colour, and is procured from the same kind of stone which produces the pe-tun-tse; but the whitest is always chosen, and that which has the greenest spots. The stone is first washed and pulverised: it is then thrown into water; and, after it has been purified, it throws up a kind of cream. To a hundred parts of this cream is added one part of chekao (a mineral something like alum), which is put into the fire, till it becomes red-hot and is then pounded. This mineral gives a degree of consistence to the varnish, which is however carefully preserved in its state of fluidity.

The next process consists in again purifying the pe-tun-tse and kaolin. The workmen then proceed to mix these two substances together. For fine porcelain they put an equal quantity of the kaolin and the pe-tun-tse; for the middling sort they use four parts of the kaolin and six of the pe-tun-tse. When this mixture is finished, the mass is thrown into a large pit, well-paved and cemented in every part: it is then trod upon, and kneaded until it becomes hard. This labour is so much the more fatiguing, as it must be continued without intermission; were it interrupted, all the other labourers would remain unemployed. From this mass, thus prepared, the workmen detach different pieces, which they spread out upon large slates, where they knead and roll them in every direction, carefully preserving them in a solid state, and taking care to keep them free from the mixture of any extraneous body. When this paste has not been properly prepared, the porcelain cracks, and melts, or becomes warped.

After a piece of porcelain has been properly formed, it passes into the hands of the painters. The hoapei, or painters in porcelain, follow no certain plan in their art, nor are they acquainted with any of the rules of drawing: all their knowledge is the effect of practice; assisted frequently by a whimsical imagination. Some of them, however, show no inconsiderable share of taste in painting flowers, animals, and landscapes, on porcelain, as well as upon the paper of fans, and the silk used for filling up the squares of lanterns. The labour of painting in the manufactories of which we have spoken is divided among a great number of hands. The business of one is entirely confined to tracing out the first coloured circle which ornaments the brims of the vessels: another designs the flowers, and a third paints them; one delineates waters and mountains, and another birds and other animals; human figures are generally the worst executed.

After the porcelain has received its proper form, its colours, and all the intended ornaments, it is transported from the manufactory to the furnace. The various pieces of porcelain are enclosed in cases, and thus baked.

The Chinese divide their porcelain into several classes, according to its different degrees of fineness and beauty. The whole of the first is reserved for the Emperor. None of the largest and finest porcelain of China has ever been brought to Europe. The Chinese set some value upon Dresden porcelain, and still more upon that which emanates from the manufactories of France.

Manufactories for the fabrication of porcelain are now established in almost all the states of Europe. But in no country in Europe have such attempts been made to discover porcelain, or so many manufactories of it established, as in France. Porcelain had long been made at Saint Cloud, and in the Faubourg Saint Antoine at Paris; and this was very beautiful. Since that time, considerable manufactories of it have been established at Chantilly, Villerot, and Orleans. But the porcelain produced in the manufactory at Sevres holds at present the first rank, from its shining white, its beautiful glazing, and its coloured grounds. In the magnificence of its gilding, and the regularity and elegance of its forms, it surpasses every other kind of china.

RICHARD SAVAGE.

THE life of this unfortunate, but talented individual affords a striking example of the ruinous consequences of intemperance, and presents us with a convincing proof that nothing can supply the want of prudence, and that negligence and irregularity long continued will make knowledge useless, wit ridiculous, and genius contemptible. Indeed, genius and knowledge are utterly useless, without good moral principles and rectitude of conduct.

Richard Savage was born in 1698, and was the son of Anne Countess of Macclesfield, by the earl of Rivers, and might have been considered as the lawful child of the Earl of Macclesfield; but his mother, in order to procure a separation from her husband, made a public confession of her shameful conduct. As soon as he was born, the Countess treated him with every kind of unnatural cruelty. She committed him to the care of a poor woman, to educate as her own; and she prevented the Earl of Rivers from making him a bequest in his will of six thousand pounds, by declaring him to be dead. She endeavoured to send him secretly to the American plantations; and, at last, to bury him in poverty and obscurity for ever, she placed him as an apprentice to a shoemaker in Holborn. About this time his nurse died; and, in searching her effects, which he imagined to be his right, he found some letters informing him of his birth, and the reasons for which it was concealed. He now left his humble occupation, and tried every method to awaken the tenderness and attract the regard of his mother: but all his assiduity was without effect, for he could neither soften her heart nor open her purse; and he was reduced to the miseries of want. By the care of Lady Mason, mother to the Countess, he had been placed at the grammar-school at Saint Alban's, where he had acquired all the learning which his situation allowed; and necessity now obliged him to become an author. The first effort of his uncultivated genius was a poem against Bishop Hoadley of Bangor, of which the author was afterwards ashamed. He then attempted to write for the stage, but with little success. He however became an assiduous frequenter of the theatres, and imbibed the habit of drinking in consequence of associating with the actors. He formed the acquaintance of Sir Richard Steele and Mr. Wilks, and in 1723, by the patronage of the former, he brought a tragedy upon the stage, in which he himself performed a part, the subject of which was "Sir Thomas Overbury." If we consider the circumstances under which it was written, it will afford a proof of strength of genius, and an evenness of mind not to be ruffled. Whilst he was employed upon this work, he was without lodging, and often without food; nor had he any other convenience for study than the fields or the street. The habits of Savage were at this period intemperate in the extreme; and his dissipated conduct and drunken practices speedily alienated from him the affection of all his friends. The profits of the play amounted to two hundred pounds, and procured him the notice of many people of distinction; and he might have now risen to importance, had not his predilection in favour of drink plunged him into a misfortune by which not only his reputation, but also his life was endangered. In a night ramble he entered a low ale-house, near Charing-Cross, became intoxicated, engaged in a quarrel with a Mr. Sinclair, and killed his antagonist in the fray. Savage was tried for murder, and condemned to death. His mother, at this juncture, used all possible means to prejudice the queen against him, and to intercept all the hopes he had of life from the royal mercy: but, at last, the Countess of Hereford, out of pure compassion, laid a true account of the extraordinary story and sufferings of poor Savage before her Majesty, and obtained his pardon.

He now recovered his liberty, but had no means of subsistence; and the little money he obtained from the casual charity of friends he expended in liquor, to which he was now the slave. It suddenly struck him that he might compel his mother to do something for him, and extort that from her by satire which she had denied to natural affection. The expedient proved successful; and Lord Tyrconnel, on his promise to lay aside his design, received him into his family, treated him as his equal, and engaged to allow him a pension of two hundred a-year. In this gay period of life, when he was surrounded by affluence and pleasure, he published "The Wanderer, a Moral Poem," which was approved by Pope, and which the author himself considered as a masterpiece. It was addressed to the Earl of Tyrconnel, with the highest strains of panegyric. These praises, however, he in a short time found himself inclined to retract, being discarded by that nobleman on account of his licentious conduct and intemperate habits. He now thought himself again at liberty to expose the cruelty of his mother, and accordingly published "The Bastard, a Poem." This had an extraordinary sale; and, as it appeared at a time when the Countess was at Bath, shame obliged her to quit the place.

Some time after this, Savage formed a resolution of applying to the queen. She had given him his life, and he hoped her goodness might enable him to support it. He published a poem upon her birth-day, which he entitled "The Volunteer Laureat." She graciously sent him fifty pounds, with an intimation that he might annually expect the same bounty. The moment he received this pension, he immediately retired to an obscure lodging, where he passed his time in drinking and licentious conduct. At length he made his appearance again amongst his friends, penniless as before; and this line of conduct he pursued every time he received his stipend. His wit and politeness always retained a few friends about him; and Sir Robert Walpole, the prime minister, was warmly solicited in his favour. Promises were given, but ended in a disappointment; upon which he published a poem in "The Gentleman's Magazine," entitled "The Poet's Dependence on a Statesman."

This wretched life was rendered more unhappy, in 1738, by the death of the queen, and the loss of his pension. His distress was now publicly known; and his friends proposed that he should retire into Wales, with an allowance of fifty pounds per annum, which they offered to raise by subscription. The proposal was accepted with joy; and he set out on his journey with fifteen guineas in his purse. He however stopped at a tavern upon the road, and there dissipated all his money in riotous living. A fresh remittance was sent to him, and he reached Bristol, where he also remained for some time, pursuing the same vicious courses. At length he arrived at Swansea, where he resided for a year, and wrote a tragedy which he was determined to bring out on the London stage. Contrary to the wishes of his friends he returned to Bristol, where he speedily disgusted all the acquaintances he had formed there on his first visit, by his intemperate habits. His clothes were worn out, his money was spent, and his appearance made it difficult for him to obtain even a dinner. Here, however, he stayed in the midst of poverty, hunger, and contempt, till the mistress of a tavern, to whom he owed eight pounds, arrested him for the debt. He could find no bail, and was committed to prison, where he commenced a satire entitled "London and Bristol Delineated." In that gaol, also, did he heave his last sigh. He was seized with a disorder which at first was not supposed to be dangerous; but in a few days it took a fatal turn, and he died on the 1st of August, 1748, in his fiftieth year—one of the myriads of victims whose present and eternal welfare has been sacrificed to the demon INTemperance!

FRENCH CHARACTERS CARICATURED.

NO. IX.—THE VICTIMIZER.

It is an art to know how to dine without money; and this art is practised in Paris as well as in London. Amongst the Parisian population there are numerous men about town who turn pale at the presentation of the bill at a tavern or coffee-house.

At that hour when the multitudes of hungry persons of all kinds flock to the coffee-houses and dining-places of all classes to partake of repasts at all prices, many an appetite is condemned to the ignoble necessity of playing the part of a mere observer: numerous individuals consult their purses before they enter the temples where hunger is assuaged; and others, more advanced in social logic and economy, say to themselves, "Well! a man must eat. Now, eating takes place in some establishment for the purpose. Consequently a man, be he who he may, has the right to enter that establishment." By dint of arguments of this kind, they summons the waiter, order up dishes more or less succulent, and endeavour to drown in intoxicating liquors the thought of the moment which is approaching, when the Commissary of Police will arrive to ascertain the reason wherefore no money is forthcoming for the payment of the expenses of the festival.

The Victimizer makes it a rule never to suffer the hour of dinner to pass without paying the debt due to his appetite, even though he should not be able to pay that which is due to the landlord. When the Victimizer has done his day's business, he loves to recline upon a chair near a well-covered table, and in the presence of a friend; and when the friend does not pay, then nobody pays. This species of behaviour was however incomprehensible to the waiter of a coffee-house on one particular occasion.

"Sir," said the waiter, one day presenting the bill to the Victimizer, who had just risen from the table and was taking up his hat and cane with the greatest coolness in the world,—"Sir, here is the bill."

"And what am I to do with this bill?" demanded the Victimizer.

"Sir, I hope that either you or your friend intend to pay it," said the waiter.

"My friend does not pay; and when my friend does not pay, nobody pays. Tell your master that: he will understand you; and you will come back and apologise to me."

The waiter hurried to the bar, to report verbatim the words of the extraordinary guest to his master; and the landlord hastened to receive an explanation of the enigma. The Victimizer had however departed by the window; and his friend, who was accustomed to follow him, had imitated his example.

On another occasion, the waiter of a coffee-house presented the bill to the Victimizer. The amount was fifteen francs.

"Waiter," said the Victimizer, "go and tell them at the bar to give you five francs for me, and let them put down twenty francs to my account."

"But, sir—"

"I am desirous of giving you five francs: that is, I am desirous that five francs should be given to you for your civility to me. I am perhaps justified in doing so, if I choose."

"Yes, sir—but they don't know you," said the waiter.

"It is not necessary to know me in order to give you five francs. All that is required is that you should be known, since it is to you that the remuneration is to be given."

The waiter left the room, astonished by this system of reasoning; and the Victimizer again converted the window into the purposes of a door.

On a third occasion the Victimizer had made a famous dinner with a friend whom he had invited. The moment approached when the fatal bill was to be presented. The Victimizer suddenly dropt a custard which he was eating, and uttered an exclamation of horror and disgust, crying at the same time, "Waiter! waiter!"

"The gentleman has asked for the bill," cried the waiter. "The bill! the bill!"

"It is no use to talk of the bill," exclaimed the Victimizer. "Summon the cook!"

The cook presented himself, as desired, and was followed by the master of the establishment.

"Do you know—can you guess what I have found in this custard?" demanded the Victimizer.

"Perhaps the pip of a lemon," said the landlord, submissively.

"No such a thing, sir!" cried the Victimizer: "I found two teeth!"

"Two teeth!" ejaculated the cook.

"Two teeth!" repeated the landlord.

"Two teeth!" added the Victimizer,—"two enormous teeth! What an abomination! But here are the proofs;"—and he threw the two teeth upon the table.

"Silence! Say not a word," exclaimed the landlord.

"But I nearly choked myself; and my friend here might have perforated the windpipe and lost his vocal instrument."

"What does he mean?" said the friend, aside, as he did not understand the motive of the farce.

"I must ascertain to whom these teeth belong," persisted the Victimizer: "you must not expose your customers to these species of danger. If these projectiles have fallen from the mouth of your bar-maid, the thing is less repugnant, but still dangerous; and, perhaps, you are going to add them to the bill—to put them down as an item of the account?"

"No one says a word about accounts," murmured the landlord. "All I ask of you is one thing—and that is to forget that you have been here to-day. Do not insist upon paying—you would only annoy me."

"Well, I will consent not to annoy you," said the Victimizer.

The two friends issued from the dining-house, escorted to the door by the landlord.

"My dear friend," said the Victimizer to his companion, "I invite you to dine with me to-morrow at the house of that excellent hearted individual. After dinner I will put my handkerchief into the cream cheese."

On the following day, the waiter watched the two friends very narrowly; and the bill was presented before the scheme was executed.

"Well—upon my word," exclaimed the Victimizer, "this is very unfortunate! By the greatest of all possible hazards, my friend and myself have not brought out any money with us this morning. As you have not the honour of being acquainted with us, I beg you to accept as security these six shares in a new joint-stock company which I have just founded; or else, you may take my friend's hat—"

"I should even prefer your friend's hat," interrupted the waiter; and thus the matter was settled: but, as the hat was only worth a couple of sous, it was never redeemed.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Sketches of Character" will be inserted. We thank Mr. James Ardery for his letter, the contents of which are highly creditable to him.

We have received the letter from Mr. T. B. (of Nottingham), and referred it to the proprietor of this journal, Mr. GEORGE HENDERSON, who returns his thanks for the proposal, but does not wish to establish agencies upon the principle of "sale or return."

The rebuke of W. T. (Kendal) is just. The Editor of this journal has no prejudices of the kind to which he alludes; but, on the contrary, endeavours to conduct the paper on the most fair, liberal, and impartial principle.

We will comply with the desire of our correspondent at Barnsley in a few days.

To S. W. L. we repeat, that we insert the Reports of all Teetotal-meetings, without reference to Societies or parties.

We thank our correspondents at Chipping Norton for the letters relative to C. We shall see the information most probably next week.

We beg to call the attention of the Reader to the 4th Number of a second Series of Illustrations, which is given gratis with "THE TEETOTALER" of this day. The Series will be complete in Twelve Illustrations, and will be continued for as many consecutive weeks.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1841.

WHEN the Saviour of the World came upon earth to proclaim the divine precept of the Gospel, he chose not his followers amongst the high and the mighty of Judea, but selected a few humble fishermen as the fittest instruments for his important purpose. Thus was it, also, in our times that the light of Teetotalism dawned first upon the heads of individuals moving in the humbler walks of life; and the peer became destined to receive lessons of morality from the peasant. It was in the summer of 1834 that Mr. JOHN LIVESY first delivered his celebrated Lectures upon Malt Liquors in London, and that the principles of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors were first broached in the English metropolis. MR. LIVESY had commenced at the right point, in respect to the line of argument to be adopted in the foundation of the system; he did not merely appeal to the sympathies of his audience, he reasoned in a manner calculated to exercise their common sense. The result was that an immediate impression was made by this Lecture. A year however elapsed ere any apparent good was effected in London; and then the first metropolitan Teetotal Committee was formed at Mr. GROSJEAN's residence, in the Quadrant. On the 10th of August, 1835, a seed was thus planted in the ground; and the seed rapidly burst forth—grew into a goodly sapling—expanded into a noble tree—and now covers three kingdoms with its grateful foliage.

Towards the end of the same month, the Committee just now alluded to founded the British Teetotal Association; and the first public meeting was held at a Lecture-room in Theobald's-road. In spite of strenuous opposition, the founders of this Society pursued their praiseworthy aims with indomitable courage: numerous places of meeting were opened in all directions; and each day seemed pregnant with fresh circumstances of encouragement. In 1836, the name of the Association was changed into the following denomination: "The British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance;" and, on this occasion, the two pledges, called the long and the short, were recognised as the principles of the institution. The prospects of the Association and the enterprise now began to wear a more encouraging aspect than ever; donations were received from all quarters; and the principle of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors attracted considerable attention amongst all classes.

Towards the close of the month of October, 1836, The Temperance Intelligencer was first published; and Mr. Pasco's Temperance Publication Warehouse was opened in Bartholomew-close. These were fresh evidences of the growing importance of the cause, and new instances of triumph. About the same time, a medal was presented to Mr. GROSJEAN, for his unwearied exertions in aid of the new principle; and a few months afterwards, a present was made, for similar reasons, to Mr. J. TEARE, of Preston. In the spring of 1837, EARL STANHOPE openly patronised the Teetotal cause; and about the same time the denomination of the Society was changed to "The New British and Foreign Temperance Society." Just before the Christmas of 1838, Mr. GRINDROB, the eminent surgeon of Manchester, received one hundred guineas for his admirable work entitled Bacchus.

At the commencement of January, 1839, the dissensions, which had for some time previously agitated the Teetotal world, menaced the principle with the most disastrous consequences; and a disunion ensued in the Society. One moiety continued to be represented by The Intelligencer, and advocated the short pledge; and the other, whose head quarters were fixed at an office in Tokenhouse-yard, near the Bank of England, adopted the long pledge, and established a paper, entitled The Journal of the New British and Foreign Temperance Society. It was thus that a most absurd quarrel about pledges was made the ground of dissension, and the rock upon which the whole cause might have been irretrievably wrecked. In the month of May, of the same year, the annual assemblage was held at Exeter Hall, EARL STANHOPE in the chair. A strong discussion ensued, relative to the two pledges; and the Association was eventually split into two parts as effectually as if it had been so organised from the commencement. One portion was called "The British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance," retained EARL STANHOPE as its President, was represented by The Intelligencer, and advocated the short pledge: the other portion was denominated "The New British and Foreign Temperance Society," was presided over by Mr. W. JANSON, kept The Journal as its organ, and based itself upon the long pledge.

At the commencement of January, 1840, "The United Temperance Association" was established by MESSIEURS H. W. WESTON, LEIGHS, J. H. DONALDSON, &c. &c. Grieved at the divided state of the Teetotal world, and anxious to propagate the principle of Union amongst the real friends to the cause, these gentlemen determined upon adopting both pledges, and thus placing aside the subject of dispute. The idea of leaving to all members the option of embracing a pledge in its individuality or generality was certainly a meritorious and an encouraging one; and the object would have been fully worked out, had not a few—perhaps not a dozen together—interested individuals, belonging to the other Societies, strenuously opposed the plan. The Teetotaler was established, and immediately advocated the plan, and inculcated the necessity of Union; and during the last few weeks, the articles, which have appeared in its columns upon the subject, have produced an extraordinary sensation in the Teetotal world.

From this slight sketch of the origin and rise of these principal metropolitan Teetotal Associations,—and when we consider that the Roman Catholics, under circumstances of a separate organization, also form a most important section of the Teetotal sphere in London and its vicinity,—the expediency of the principle of Union will become apparent to all our readers. It is preposterous to dispute about pledges, when the principle is the same; and, under that impression, The Teetotaler has, from its commencement, studiously avoided any discussion of the merits of either the long pledge, or the short pledge—the American pledge, or the Birmingham pledge. The Teetotaler, however, advocates the necessity of Union, with all its zeal, and with the utmost sincerity of purpose; and the great mass of Teetotalers are anxious to behold so happy a consummation. The Societies should no more suffer themselves to remain disunited on account of discrepancies in pledges, than they should from varying points of religious credence. The Roman Catholics should be united under the same banner with the Protestants—the Dissenters with the votaries of the Church of England—and the Christian with the Jew, the Turk, or the worshipper of Bramah. The grand aim to which all efforts ought to tend, is to preach the doctrine of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors; and let each new convert adopt the pledge which he chooses. Each pledge will suit the circumstances and conditions of some better than others; and on no account let us suffer religious principles or party-feelings to interfere with the good work. To those who would connect Teetotalism with the Protestant creed, we should say, "Wherefore shackle a measure of independent morality with circumstances which will exclude the Catholic?" and to him who would unite Teetotalism with Catholicism, we should say, "Why plan your institution upon a basis that will exclude the Protestant?" To both of these we should say, did they wish to connect the principle with their creed, "Is this salutary measure only for Christian countries? Will you not admit its application to Jews and Mahometans? Can such a glorious measure of social reformation be made exclusive in favour of a few?"

In the same way should we speak to the advocates of the long pledge. "Will you not allow an individual, who wishes, in himself, to abstain from all intoxicating liquors, but who will not at the commencement so far change the economy of his habits, as to refuse to his friends that which they unfortunately continue to indulge in,—will you not admit such an individual amongst you? Will you refuse to receive his pledge, and allow him to relapse into those habits which will ruin him, and from which he really wishes to escape?" And to the votaries of the short pledge we should say, "You certainly must admire the principle of the long pledge, although, as a matter of convenience, in the infancy of Teetotalism, you admit the short one."

In this manner do we address ourselves to the Teetotal world in respect to Religion, and in respect to Pledges. We demonstrate the impropriety of mixing up Teetotalism with religion, one atom more than with politics; and we prove the folly of disputing about pledges. We say more—no one has a right to interfere with another's religious opinions, either in or out of the Teetotal world. In what state would society be, if QUEEN VICTORIA were to refuse to receive the Turkish ambassador, because he is not a Christian; or if English merchants were to refuse to trade with the Indians and Chinese, because they differ in religious opinions? and again—would any clergyman of the Church of England have refused a legacy, had it been left him by Rothschild, because the donor was a Jew? Oh! Prejudice, where is thy reason? Oh! Liberality of Sentiment, where is thy blush?

The dissensions existing amongst the societies give rise to many unpleasant occurrences at public meetings, where popular advocates belonging to all necessarily congregate. One says he will not speak if another be allowed to do so; and much valuable time is frequently occupied in recrimination and personal attack. Much malignity is thus encouraged; and much spite exists against individuals with whom the venom-breathers are probably unacquainted. Jealousy and envy are also fomented by these bickerings and divisions. When an individual who, by his rank in the social world, as well as in the literary world, is entitled to respect, joins the Teetotal cause, instead of being hailed as a brother on all sides, he is viewed with distrust and hatred. Of course, as a man of sense, he scorns such conduct, and smiles at it within himself;—but the feeling does not the less exist: and these are the motives which induce us to advocate so frequently, and so zealously, the necessity of Union.

The Teetotaler enjoys the confidence of the whole Teetotal world (speaking generally), in consequence of the liberality with which it is conducted. It never refuses to record the meetings of Societies, from the paltry motive of being unwilling to mention particular names. It shows no favour to a particular sect or party:—its praise and its castigation are impartially directed to the points which deserve either. Coming from a well-known publishing establishment, conducted by an individual whose numerous literary productions have received an extensive amount of public patronage, and issued in a manner which almost defies competition, The Teetotaler offers guarantees of respectability, impartiality, and sterling worth, which render its opinions authoritative and command attention. This power it however exercises with discretion, and with a constant reference to the good of the cause it is proud to advocate. In its straight-forward course, it will not hesitate to proclaim those measures which are absolutely necessary to the welfare of Teetotalism; and it will unsparingly expose those parties or individuals whom it knows to be acting from selfish and interested motives. The Union of the Teetotalers in London shall take place; and that Union is near at hand. In every Association and Society there are members who are devoted to the cause, who know that the Union is necessary. These members will not suffer themselves to be controlled by half a dozen individuals sitting in Committee;—they will not suffer the cause to languish to serve the purposes of a few men who make Teetotalism a trade;—nor will that mighty mass, whose intellects have been enlightened by the doctrine, permit their organized armies to skirmish amongst themselves in civil discord, instead of uniting in one grand and serried phalanx to march with connected and overwhelming forces against the enemy.

THE SOLILOQUY OF A GIN-GLASS.

HALF-PAST eleven o'clock at night! I am very glad that the business of the day is over, and that I shall at all events obtain a few hours' repose. The landlord, my master, has just washed me, and placed me upon this shelf at the back of his bar, where I shall remain quiet till about six o'clock in the morning, when he will come down to put his vitriol into the gin, and his coppers and alum into the beer, before any one else is up; and then he'll make use of me for his first dram. Ah! little do his customers think that he would not for the world drink one drop of the spirits which he dispenses to them, but that he has his own private bottle of unadulterated gin in a snug corner! But I find that I am speaking in rather a singular tone of voice. Oh! I remember—I have sustained a slight crack by being put down upon the leaden part of the bar a little too heavily by a drunken coalheaver this afternoon. Be that as it may, nothing shall prevent me from telling the secrets of this den; and even if I were dashed to pieces, each morsel should become armed with a tongue to raise a cry against the infamies I see practised around me.

I have been here hardly five years; and the only wonder is that I have existed so long, when I consider the dangers which I have incurred. I remember that I entered the house the same day as the present landlord; and the same night I heard him say these words to his wife:—"Well, we've at all events managed to get into a public-house at last. The only thing to know how to stay in it. We haven't a single farthing in the world: all the money I could raise has gone to purchase the goodwill and the stock; and I understood when it was too late, that no one yet had ever made this house pay."—"And yet," said his wife, "every one has always praised it for selling the best liquors in London."—"That remark of yours has let me into the secret," cried the landlord, joyfully clapping his thigh with the palm of his hand. "I see how it is!"—"How?" demanded his wife.—"Why, the liquors were too good, my dear," answered the landlord; "and that is the reason why no one could ever make the house pay. But I will!"

And there ended the conversation; but sure enough he put his threat into execution; for he got a Publican's Guide, and he turned his cellar almost into a chemist's shop. He made three butts of beer out of one; and each gallon of gin which he got from the distiller's, he converted into two and a half. His customers began to murmur; but he soon got up a "Benefit Society," which produced no benefit to any one but himself; and then he was called a fine, spirited, disinterested fellow. But the women complained that the gin was bad; and so he established a "Females' Benefit Society;" and then all the women praised him for sticking up for their prerogatives. All this was very comfortable for him; because, being treasurer to both Societies, he had the capital to play with; and he so arranged matters that two of his cousins, who belonged to the Men's Society, were taken ill the moment it was formed, and have received weekly assistance ever since.

These plans have succeeded wonderfully; and the landlord is now worth a large sum of money. The richer he grows the more he adulterates his liquors, because the less he fears detection. But now let me say a word with regard to the people who come to the house, and with whose faces I am familiar.

The moment the door opens of a morning, a young woman comes in for a dram. She was married to the poor shoemaker opposite, about four years ago. I recollect the wedding-day; and I have observed that family ever since. If ever a man were amiable, he was the man. If ever a husband were amiable, he was the husband. His hope, his joy, his ambition were domestic. His toils were forgotten in the affections of his house; and amid every adverse variety of fortune, hope pointed to his two children, and he was comforted. But his wife learnt to sip out of the jug when she went to fetch the beer at the public-house; and now and then a friend would treat her to a drop of spirits. In a word, she became a drunkard, and, by that act, all her poor—her loving—her unfortunate husband's hopes were blasted: that house is a desert; those children are penniless. In vain do they look to their father—his heart is broken—his mind is in ruins—his very form is fading from the earth. He had one consolation—an old mother, on whom the protection of his children seemed to rest. Even that is now over. She could not survive the shame which had crept into her son's household: she never raised her head—she became hoarse in his misfortunes; he has followed her funeral. If this be not the climax of human misery, tell me in what does human misery consist? Wife, parent, future prospects, happiness—all gone for ever! The mother to the tomb—the wife to the gin-shop—the children to the workhouse—and the husband to the suicide's grave!

Who is the next customer that I recognise amidst the crowd now conjured up to my imagination? A gentleman of about six or seven and thirty—a merchant, who lives in a street near Aldermanbury. He was lately a good looking man, with florid complexion, and sufficiently engaging in his manners. He has now frequented this house for nearly a year, and already is his utter ruin consummated. His business has left him, and his friends have deserted him. He is encumbered with debts; and he skulks about as if the Middlesex side of London were too small for his large fears of the Sheriff. His face is disfigured with scars received in drunken broils, or by tumbling off an omnibus when intoxicated. A wife and two or three children are almost starving at home, while he passes his time at this bar or in our parlour. His intellects are failing; he gazes upon his acquaintances with a vacant stare; he cannot open his mouth without uttering a lie or a vain boast; and he will assuredly end his days in St. Luke's, unless an accident intervene to kill him shortly!

The ruin of a fine man by drink reminds me of that of a splendid city by the hands of an enemy. Let me only recal to memory the downfall of Moscow. A few years ago Moscow stood, splendid and secure. Fair rose the morn on the patriarchal city—the empress of her nation, the queen of commerce, the sanctuary of strangers, her thousand spires piercing the very heavens, and her domes of gold reflecting back the sunbeams. The spoiler came: he marked her for his victim; and, as if his very glance were destiny, she was before the nightfall, with all her pomp, and wealth, and happiness, withered from the world! A heap of ashes told where once stood Moscow. Alas! the splendid panorama of the armies of France could not produce upon a city, or upon a nation, effects more terrible, than those which spring from the presence of that single enemy—Alcohol!

Every afternoon there hobbles up to the bar an old man, leaning upon crutches, clothed almost in rags—emaciated—blear-eyed—toothless—haggard in countenance, trembling in limbs, shaking in his head, and stammering in his voice. He is but sixty years old, and might be still walking erect—happy—lively—robust and hale, had not his whole life been devoted to intemperance. And yet this besotted idiot persists in declaring that drink has never injured him! Not injured him!—It has robbed his old age, which it has made premature, of all its comforts,—it has heaped loathsome diseases of all kinds upon him,—it has given him that crutch,—and it has pulled out his teeth,—it has digged his grave at the age of sixty-one; instead of leaving him to complete the natural term of human life—ninety years!

And every evening—sometimes twice or thrice—young female enters this den, to seek in stimulants that artificial gaiety and excitement which are denied by nature and by conscience to her almost-broken heart. Alas! poor girl—she is but seventeen; but the woes of fifty winters are upon her mind! The cold blast of poverty—the searching mists of shame—the storm of an agitated existence—the torrent of reckless passions—the whirlwind of ever-varying emotions—and the eddies of heart-rending feelings, have all vented their rage upon the frame, the intellect, the soul, and the life of that hopeless girl! Oh! is it in the zenith of an enlightened age that woman will go astray, if she be not watched with more than Spanish vigilance, and harassed with more than eastern severity! Must woman sin because she is allowed the dignity of a human soul, and man does not degrade himself into a human monster? Does so young a girl parade the streets in a land of courage and chivalry, where the female form has been held as a patent direct from the Divinity, hearing in its chaste and charmed helplessness the assurance of its strength, and the amulet of its protection? Alas—the demon Alcohol will undermine the purity of woman, and remove her by means of moral debasement beyond the exercise of the chivalrous feelings of man,—this will alcohol accomplish, if she do but lend an ear to the wiles of the tempter!

Alas! alas! while I am thus moralizing I should remember that I am part and parcel of the horrible temptations of this den. It is from my lips that the fatal poison is sucked,—that poison which destroys domestic peace, ruins female virtue, conducts the merchant to ruin, opens the gates of the madhouse, throws chains around the criminal, inspires the wicked with courage to execute his meditated crime, establishes workhouses, gilds the sign of the pawnbroker's shop, and places a bar across the portals of the house of God! It is I who am the accessory to the evil of intemperance,—who am the medium of a vicious enjoyment,—who am as culpable in conveying the dread poison to the lips of the victim as the landlord whose servant I am. Oh! myriads have drunk damnation from my lips. I am the cause of blows, of strife, of domestic misery, of disease, of death! The agonies of wives whom hope has deserted—the piteous screams of children who famish for want of food—the last prayer of the malefactor upon the gibbet—the anathema of the convict toiling in chains in a foreign land—the woes of an existence lingered out in the workhouse—the howls of lunatics—the dying murmur of the suicide—the remorseful whisperings of the lost girl's conscience—the wounds, the tears, the oaths, the shrieks, the screams, the wails,—all, all the tokens of human misery which exist abundantly around, and which have converted a lovely and fertile earth into a charnel-house of horrors, may be traced to me!

And oh! I am afraid—I am afraid, in the darkness of the night; for there—in that corner—is the spot where the man sat when he imbibed from my lips the liquor under the influence of which he went home and assassinated his unoffending wife; and there is the spot where stood the young and half-famished girl, who drank, through my medium, the draught that drove her, in a maddened state, to the bridge whence she cast herself into the river; and on that seat sat two men, a few days ago, who plotted and arranged between themselves a terrible crime, with all its fearful details of burglary and murder; and——But I can say no more! This place is fraught with appalling reminiscences for me!

ORIENTAL FRAGMENTS. No. III.

BY JAMES SILK BUCKINGHAM.

IN the course of the afternoon, we met several small caravans, on their way from Suez to Cairo, laden with charcoal from Sinai and Tor, and saw also straggling parties of Bedouins on foot, their arms and clothing as wretched as the imagination could possibly paint them, one in each party carrying the water-skin slung across his shoulders, and every one else apparently bearing his own provisions.

After having passed a small building, and a single tree, considerably on our left, lying nearly in the centre road, and continuing our route easterly across the same tiresome and unvarying scenery, we halted about four o'clock in a sort of loose sand, it having been pitched on for the convenience of our camels rather than ourselves, as it afforded a few shrubs for them to feed on, and soft ground for their knees.

The same duties as those of the preceding evening were again gone through; the dish of meal, oil, and honey, were again served up; but as I felt no more reconciled to it than before, I joined in appearance only, supping on the boiled rice which I had separately prepared for my own use.

DESERT OF SUEZ.—THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 17TH.

—The conversation of the last evening surpassing that of the preceding, both in length and variety, kept us all awake until past midnight; and in the course of it, I had often reason to be convinced that when the mind is active, and the heart at ease, even the solitude of a desert can be rendered cheerful, and have, as well as more polished circles, its gay and social parties. For myself, I had a thousand questions to ask of my Bedouin companions, as to the modes of living, feeling, and thinking, among a race so little known, whose manners, like the wilds they inhabit, have suffered scarcely any change since the age of the patriarchs, and who have, among their reputed vices, a candour, fidelity, truth, and independence, worthy the imitation of nations and people the most refined. In fact, so powerful was my desire of correct information on those subjects, that but for its incompatibility with the object of duty in pursuit, I would willingly have returned with them into the depth of their retreats, and have borne all the inconveniences of living among them, for a few months at least. I regretted even the small portion of time which was necessary to recruit the fatigues of the day by sleep, and thought every hour thus passed, so much lost of an opportunity not to be recalled.

When we started, therefore, which was by the faint light of the morning moon, I found myself as tired as when we had first broken up our conference to retire to rest; though a cup of coffee, the motion of the camel, and the renewed chain of inquiries which sleep had interrupted, very gradually restored me.

Our route to-day lay through a more broken country, but neither hilly nor rocky; the ascents and descents were in general more sudden, but there was still a tiresome want of variety, nor had the country yet changed its character of an irregular sandy plain. About noon, the high mountains of Adaga interposed their blue bulk in the south-east, and were interesting from mere contrast; dead camels were seen occasionally upon the sands, and the bleached skeletons of those whose bones had long been bared by the sun and wind, were visible at a distance of many miles, on the edge of the horizon. We saw neither jackalls, hyenas, nor antelopes, in this part of the desert. A few solitary ravens, of a large size, and the finest glossy jet, appeared to enjoy undisturbed the empire of the plain; for beside these, we saw no other living creatures, except some flocks of quails, a few gray swallows, hardly distinguishable in colour from the surface of the sands they skimmed, and a beautifully delicate lizard, of about three inches only in extreme length, whose form and colours might vie with the most exquisite of nature's animated productions; its topaz eyes, and silky, spotted skin, were the richest combinations of variety that could be seen; and its panting timidity, when held in the hand, gave an additional glow to every tint. When suffered to escape, the rapidity of its pace, and resemblance of general hue to the sand itself, rendered it difficult to be distinguished: nor could the eye follow it, but for the serpentine track left by the print of its feet and tail upon the surface of the smooth sand, forming a wavy chain, of a delicacy and regularity as surprising as it was perfect.

It was not before the usual hour of the evening halt, that we gained sight of the Castle of Adjerood, a caravanserai, a short march from Suez; and it was then some miles distant. I had already suffered so much in my eyes, which were by no means recovered from the effects of the ophthalmia when we left Cairo, and the back part of my neck was now also so blistered by exposure to the sun, that I was anxious to reach some shelter for the night, especially as the wind had risen very high, and annoyed us by the clouds of sand with which it filled the air. I therefore desired that we might continue our march until we gained the caravanserai, where we might regale at leisure, and sleep in comfort and security. Neither of the Arabs urged the slightest objection to the prolongation of our march: but all refused to enter the walls of Adjerood, and preferred to sleep unsheltered in the open air. This contempt of enclosed dwellings had been deeply rooted in their minds by early impressions, and was confirmed by habit: and to this they added another reason. 'Are you not now with friends and honest men,' said they, 'with whom you may trust your gold uncounted, and will you enter among thieves and robbers, where one eye must be waking while the other sleeps?' It was impossible to change their opinion of men in civilized life, whom they characterized as treacherous and deceitful, from the Sultan to the Fellah; or to persuade them of there being many bright exceptions to the general wickedness of mankind. 'Mahommed Ali Basha,' said they, 'is he not a robber of the highest class, living on the plunder of the people (for so they consider taxes of every description), and obliging them to be dishonest, that they may be able to answer his never-ceasing demands? And has he not carried the war into Arabia, rather to gain the riches of the Wahabees, than to change their religion? These questions were unanswerable; and when I endeavoured to explain to them the necessity of individual sacrifices for the public good, and of general contributions towards the maintenance of national security, they replied in terms as expressive as they were laconic: 'Let every man's industry be his provider; his vigilance his protector; and his courage his defender.' As there was no sophistry in their arguments, so they were not easily to be refuted; and a consciousness of its truth in their own minds, as forming the real principles of their general conduct occasioned them to be firmly adhered to.

It was only in consideration, therefore, of my eyes suffering from exposure to the night air, that my request was complied with, and our conference on this subject continued even until we reached the walls themselves. It was by that time past sun-set, and as the evening was cloudy, it had grown extremely dark; the gates of the castle were shut, and not a voice was to be heard from within. Phanoose, however, by loud knocking, brought a porter to the wicket, whom, instead of entreating for our admission as a favour, he loaded with manly reproof for closing his gate against the weary stranger. 'What is your castle built for?' said he; 'to maintain a lazy governor and his train?—or did not Sultan Selim, and the holy Sheick, both found a caravanserai, which you have converted into a fort?' The man replied as loudly, and with equal warmth, until the dispute grew so serious, that I was afraid at last shelter would be absolutely refused us. Phanoose entered, however, by force, unbarred the large gate, and with great difficulty drew his camels after him, the animals seeming to be as averse to enter enclosed buildings as their master.

Phanoose, the Bedouin Arab, refused, however, to remain in the castle, among 'thieves and tyrants,' as he invariably called the Turks who occupied it; and though he left our camels within the walls, he took his sacks of money with him, and joined the camp of his companions on the outside, in the open plain. After he left us, I was soon surrounded by the attendants of the place, and our evening was passed in obtaining from them some information as to the age and nature of this establishment.

Adjerood is a square enclosure of stone walls, about a hundred feet in length on each of its sides, and flanked at the angles with round towers, not exceeding the height of the walls themselves, which may be about twenty-five feet. It has one large gate only, with a wicket entrance, and the interior is merely an open court, with a range of low and mean chambers running round the whole square of the walls. Near it is an enclosed well, upward of two hundred feet in depth, but yielding only foul and brackish water, though shaded by the tomb of a venerated saint.

The Arabs say it was built by Sultan Selim, but know not the date of its erection, though all agree that it was founded as a caravanserai for passengers, on account of the adjacent well. Its architecture is plain and solid, resembling the style so prevalent in the Arabian buildings of the last and preceding century, that is, of the Saracenic order, but of inferior execution to the works of the Caliphs. At the present moment, it is called a fort, and maintains a Turkish governor and twenty Arabs, with four rusty cannon, badly mounted, and all of different calibre and construction, the largest not exceeding an English 4-pounder. Its professed object is the securing of deserters, Albanians, Greeks, &c., from the public service, as it lies near the junction of the three roads to Cairo, and as far as the apprehension of straggling individuals is intended, may be effectual. Officers, soldiers, and messengers of government, also halt here in their way, but other passengers, except by favour of the governor, never.

ARGUMENTS FOR TEETOTALERS.

DR. FANE has observed that it is a law of our constitution, that the circulation falls off in a greater degree than it is forced. "By placing our thumb upon the bulb of a thermometer," writes the author of Anti-Bacchus, "we may raise it eight or ten degrees, as the case may be; but if we remove it, the mercury will sink to the point of temperature at which it stood before. Not so on animal spirits; if we raise them ten degrees, they will sink, as soon as the unnatural stimulus is gone, twelve or fifteen. He who, after the toils of the week, dooms his stomach, his nerves, his brain, and consequently his already-jaded body and mind, to the excitement of stimulating liquors, imposes upon his constitution a task which it is ill able to bear, and which must eventually break it down." We know that a perpetual wear and tear of the human frame is going on through natural means,—we know that even the exercise of the intellect, which is never still, produces a constant state of irritability,—and that the circulation of the blood is also, of itself, a principle of this unceasing excitement: wherefore, then, should we add an artificial means of excitement to those which nature has already established? It is this perpetual excitement which conducts the animated being to that catastrophe which is denominated death; and, by augmenting the temperature of that irritability—to use an expressive phrase—is to hasten the period of dissolution. And who wishes to hurry the advance of death? Whose life is so long, whose years so numerous, that he can afford to abbreviate his existence even by a single day?

The sensible answer to the question, "Wherefore do we drink?" is this one—"Because we are thirsty." If then drinking be merely required for allaying thirst and dryness and diminishing the tenacity and acrimony of the fluids, then is cold water, when limpid, light, and without smell and taste, and obtained from a clear running stream, the best drink for a robust man. Food, not too fat, or gross; and water as a drink, render our bodies the most firm and strong. The Disertatio Physica Medica says that water is a remedy suited to all persons at all times; that it is the best preservative from distempers, and is assuredly serviceable both in acute and chronic diseases. "Those who drink water are observed to have whiter and sounder teeth than others," says the same work. "Drinkers of water are more brisk and alert, in all the actions both of mind and body, than such as use malt liquors."

In Bacchus, Mr. Grindrod writes as follows:—"In the first Epistle of St. Paul to Timothy, certain pernicious heresies are adverted to; and the inefficiency of any plan of salvation exposed, which was not founded on the word of God. Allusions are made to some who in the latter times shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils. 'Forbidding to marry and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth. For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving; for it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer.' In this Epistle, St. Paul merely refers to a superstitious reliance on bodily abstinences, as calculated to procure divine favour; and does not in any way impugn his former declarations of the inexpediency of many things under certain circumstances, or the propriety and necessity of Christians abstaining from such indulgencies as might prove a stumbling-block to their weaker brethren." Those opponents to Teetotalism who assert that alcohol is a good creature of God, and fitted for our use, should remember that alcohol does not itself exist in nature—that it is the product of the decay of vegetable matter—and that even if it did exist already formed in fruits or vegetables, it is no more fitted for use than the Prussic acid which may be extracted from the kernels of peach-stones. Many poisons exist in a natural state; and yet no one will assert that they are the good creatures of God, and fitted for our use. Let not, then, the opponents of this great doctrine, which The Teetotaler so strenuously advocates, have recourse to the Bible to discover weapons wherewith to attack the disciples of that moral principle which is second only to the Christian religion itself.

REVIEWS.

The Modern Literature of France. By G. W. M. REYNOLDS, Member of the French Statistical and Agricultural Societies, Author of "Pickwick Abroad," &c. Second Edition. 2 vols. 8vo. London: G. Henderson.

THE second edition of this popular work is now published at a price which places it within reach of many readers who could not afford the purchase-money of the first; and for those who are desirous of obtaining an insight into French Literature, these volumes will be found very useful. The Preface and a song, which appeared in the first edition, and which excited the anger of the press, are omitted in this reprint. We must, however, observe, that in introducing the song alluded to, the author expressly reminded the reader that, as it was merely a translation, he was not answerable for the sentiments it contained, and that indeed he by no means agreed with those sentiments. The volumes contain critical notices of the principal works of the most eminent living French authors, and copious translations from their best productions. The critical notices are interspersed with Parisian literary chit-chat, anecdote, and useful information, and are written with impartiality. Relative to the pecuniary position of authors in France, it would appear that they are much better paid than English writers, and that a more liberal line of conduct is adopted by the world generally to them than in this country. Speaking of Eugene Sue, the naval novelist in France, who may be placed alongside of Captain Marryat in England, the work before us says—

"The scenery of Eugene Sue's novels shifts and varies as often as that of a theatre; and each chapter is a new act, commencing with new characters, whose range of action is transferred to a new sphere. From the deck of the gallant vessel, magician-like—or rather dramatist-like, he will transport the reader to the regal halls of a monarch's abode: from the raft floating at the mercy of the wild waves and winds, does he carry his audience to the burning regions of Africa; and thence, again, to the gloomy walls of a noisome prison. His imagination travels faster than those splendid vessels which he describes so well; but the reader is never wearied with keeping pace with him."

And a little farther on, speaking of the same author, we find this passage:—

"In M. Sue's novels the reader must not expect to find a revolting account of a sailor's flogging; because that terrible and degrading penalty has long been abolished in the French navy,—and, would to God! it were in ours;—nor should he hope, when once introduced to the quarter-deck of M. Sue's vessels, to be surrounded by nought but tobacco-smoke, the odours of pitch, and the smell of grog. No:—M. Sue entertains his audience with love tales whispered in a cabin, and with incidents which might as well have occurred in a suite of apartments at Paris, as on board the Sylphide or the Salmandre."

Speaking of Victor Hugo, the author of the volumes under notice does great justice to him both in his capacity of a poet and a novelist:—

"If Hugo smile, we must smile with him: If he weep we must share his sorrow. With him we are ready to mathematize Deutz, who betrayed the Duchess of Berri; and with him we are prepared to curse Lovel, the murderer of that noble lady's husband! We enter into the spirit of his grief at the downfall of Charles the Tenth; and we gladly walk hand-in-hand with him to the foot of that shrine where he offers up the incense of his praise and admiration to Napoleon and his son."

After having noticed the contradictions which exist in the world's institutions, and which are alluded to by M. Hugo in the preface to one of his works, Mr. Reynolds observes:—

"And yet all is exquisitely connected together by a grand invisible chain, the links of which are numberless and imperceptible—a chain that circumvents space, passes by thousands of glittering worlds, traverses the realms of millions of suns—of planets—and of moons, and stops only at the footstool of the Divinity!"

Mr. Reynolds has translated a considerable portion of Victor Hugo's Chants du Crépuscule (or "Songs of Twilight") into English verse. Of this a specimen is annexed:—

"Henceforth to the priest be all splendour unknown,
Let his cross be of wood, and his cushion of stone;
The church is his refuge—the church is his rest—
In her arms he is safe—in her care he is blest:
For when the volcanic eruption is red,
Like the froth of the wine-press that Burgundy fed;
When the sides of Vesuvius are glowing and bright,
When Naples re-echoes with cries of affright—
'Tis then that the groans of the children resound,
And mothers despairingly fall to the ground—
'Tis then that in vain they expose to the air
The half uttered words which are meant for a prayer,
While black lines of mist from the crater ascend,
And seem to foretell that the world's at an end.
Those lines have divided—a fire, that broke
From the bowels of the mount, superseded the smoke:—
Then, Naples, adieu to the grots in thy vales—
Adieu to thy ships—the flame spreads to their sails;
The lava has fallen on the sides of the hill,
As the locks of a maiden float wild at will!
And farther—Oh! farther the lava rolls on—
O'er meadows, o'er streams—to the Gulf it has gone:
The smoke forms a canopy sombre and drear,
Though the waves of the torrent be glowing and red,
And the homes of the great—and the paupers' hall
Were doomed in that deluge to totter and fall!
'Twas a chaos of ruin! The chimneys were strewn
O'er a town late so lovely—now shapeless and rude:
From dwelling to dwelling proceeded the assail—
The houses were burning in city and vale;
The earth was naked—the waves of the sea
Boiled white on the shore—and the tocsin rang free,
Though no human hand were the cause of the sound—
'Twas raised by the steeples that tottered around!
'Twas a chaos immense! But the arm of the Lord,
That scattered such ruin and havoc abroad—
The arm of the Deity, powerful to kill,
And pour out the wrath of his thunder at will—
That arm, on the brink of the crater, can spare
The hermit who kneels to his Maker in prayer!"

As another specimen of the poetic genius of Victor Hugo, we quote the following singular lines, which comprise the whole life of Napoleon in a few words:—

"To-morrow foaming steeds to battle wend,
To-morrow Moscow's flames to heaven ascend,
To-morrow martial hosts flock o'er the plain,
To-morrow Waterloo is fought in vain,
To-morrow exile marks the hero's doom,
To-morrow—see! they bear him to the tomb!"

In the critical notice on the writings of De Tocqueville and Michel Chevalier, both of whom have produced excellent works upon America, Mr. Reynolds gives the following description of the foundation of the United States:—

"In those stormy times when religious discord lacerated the bosom of the Old World, numberless individuals of upright character—according to the ideas of their contemporaries—and austere morals, traversed the ocean, to practise in a foreign and fruitful clime those virtues which their own countries could neither appreciate nor endure. To the sacred equality prevalent amongst those votaries of the reformation was immediately associated the equality of the desert, and the pioneer was formed from the puritan. The members of that little circle of society—the only one of the kind, perhaps, at that time existing in the world—asserted no superiority over another, they all deemed themselves martyrs in a common cause, and were devoted to the same end. In leaving their ancient land—the territory of their forefathers—they forgot the distinctions they left behind them, and debarked on a shore where their wants, their necessities, and their mutual interests consecrated the equality that prevailed amongst them. They were strangers to luxury; but they lived in comfort and tranquil ease. They all partook of a common banquet; and the trees of the forest succumbed to him whose able arm could best wield the axe and use the saw. All were landholders to the extent of their physical means or capacities; and all were equal on account of circumstances, and of that creed which raiseth the humble and abaseth the proud. Thus intellectual superiority was unknown amongst them, save in their rustic arguments, or evening tales, the uniformity of that life, which alone consisted in daily labour and the exercise of religious duties, could not do otherwise than efface all reminiscences of former grade and distinction."

Of Charles Nodier, one of the most celebrated French novelists, Mr. Reynolds writes thus:—

"Charles Nodier is also a poet; and the charms of nature delight his impassioned mind. He loves to contemplate the wide world, with its sea, its fertile lands, its crowded cities, and its naked deserts. He admires the ocean and the earth as the poet only can admire them; and he suffers his imagination to wander from one to the other in all the enthusiasm of surprise and delight—to sport with the waves, those billows of the ocean, and the hills, those waves of the earth!"

The last chapter of the volumes now before us is devoted to French National Songs, Airs, Poems, &c. We extract the Song entitled "The Nightingale," and translated from the French of Florian:—

"Charming, charming Nightingale,
Happy, free, and all alone—
From the myrtle in the vale
Echoes forth your dulcet tone.
Tremble lest peevish hand
Snatch you from your soft retreat:
In the foliage where you stand
Meshes may ensnare your feet!
Yes—though thickly round you spread,
Waves the ever-verdant screen,
Danger hovers o'er your head:
Hope is typified by green!
Klail! the warning that I give—Charming Nightingale, beware!
In the world in which we live
Hope itself is but a snare!"

In taking leave of these volumes, we can only observe that for the small outlay of five shillings the reader may possess himself of a complete key to the modern literature of the French, and obtain a work originally published at sixteen shillings.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

IRELAND.

THE REV. MR. MATHEW, the true philanthropist, who has regenerated Ireland and diffused such blessings amongst the great and generous Irish nation, visited Kilkee last Sunday week, and preached a charity sermon. MR. MATHEW's language was as usual plain, nervous, and abounding in touches of the deepest pathos that carried his auditory with him; and the collection, exclusive of private contributions, amounted to upwards of a hundred and twenty pounds. After the sermon, the rush into the building of those anxious to take the pledge was tremendous. At six o'clock, more than forty persons sat down to dinner at Lewis's hotel, at which repast the REV. MR. MATHEW was present. Early next day this worthy and estimable gentleman proceeded to Donbeg, four miles from Kilkee, where he administered the pledge to nearly four thousand postulants.

We are enabled to state, upon the best authority, that his Majesty the KING OF THE FRENCH has addressed an autograph letter to the Rev. Mr. MATHEW, congratulating the apostle of temperance upon the benefits he has conferred upon the Irish nation, and inviting him to the capital of France as soon as his glorious work shall be accomplished in his own country.

BARNSELY.

THE Catholic Society and the original Teetotal Association of this place have done wonders, and quite changed the aspect of the town. Mr. LEICHS has been lately expected to lecture there. On Friday week, a meeting was held in the school-room at Ardsley, Mr. GEORGE SMITH in the chair. It appears that there is such a demand for lecturers in the surrounding villages that the wants are not nearly adequately supplied.

BURY SAINT EDMUND'S.

THE Teetotal cause has taken firm root in this town, and indeed throughout the county of Suffolk, thanks to the fostering care of that respected philanthropist, Mr. R. D. ALEXANDER (of Ipswich). A Rechabite Tent, in connexion with the Independent Order of Rechabites, has been opened at Bury Saint Edmund's, under the denomination of The Philanthropic, No. 326. A female Tent is about to be opened there. A very popular dissenting minister, the Rev. CORNELIUS ELVEN, has signed the pledge and warmly espoused the cause. At Mildenhall a small society has just been formed, and bids fair to prove a powerful one. At Thetford the cause is also progressing favourably. On February, 29th, a grand meeting will take place at the Baptist Chapel, Garland-street, Bury, when Mr. J. INWARDS will deliver an Address upon the "Signs of the Times." We shall always be glad to hear from our correspondent at Bury Saint Edmund's.

LEICESTER.

THE South Midland Association has lately done wonders in favour of the cause; and that enterprising and praiseworthy advocate, Mr. TREAR, has exerted himself nobly during the busy time when the bazaar was opened. Speaking of this Teetotal arrangement, the Temperance Messenger for February says:—"Upon the whole, we do rejoice, and will rejoice, that ever this Bazaar scheme was adopted. It has presented the subject of teetotalism in a new and lovely garb; it has awakened the zeal of many of our brethren, and has especially brought out the energies of our fair friends. We paid our way at Leicester, and have sent between £40. and £50. worth of goods to Rugby, where a room can be had free of expense, and our friends have engaged to print Bills, &c., at their own cost; and we doubt not parties will be found to arrange the matter, who can afford to devote time to its interests."

SCOTLAND.

THAT excellent monthly publication, the Scottish Temperance Journal, contains the following paragraph:—"In December last, a meeting of Highlanders was held at Glasgow in Rev. Dr. Bates's church, Mr. DONALD MACINTYRE in the chair; when, after addresses had been delivered in Gaelic by Mr. FRASER, agent of the Western Union, and others, it was resolved to form a Highlanders' Total Abstinence Society, in connection with the Glasgow Society. A committee was chosen, but office-bearers have not yet been appointed. Several meetings of the Society have been held since, and the number of members is daily increasing. This society has a fine field to work upon, and we trust it will flourish, and do much good to our Celtic brethren in Glasgow." It appears, from the columns of the same journal, that the cause of Teetotalism is progressing well at Crunnoch, Kilparnack, Catrine, Troon, Kilwinning, Tarbolton, and Dalmeilston. An excellent advocate, of the name of SAMSON, has been lately engaged with considerable success in the cause, at New Lanark, Lanark, Carstairs, Stratham, and elsewhere. Favourable accounts have also been received from the various Teetotal Associations established at Cowdaddens, Vale of Leven, Buchlyvie, Kilpen, Stonehaven, Donaghadee, Danoon, Moffat, and Mothenvell. The Glasgow University Total Abstinence Society has effected immense good amongst the students.

TOWN NEWS.

SUNDAY MEETINGS OF THE WORKING-CLASSES.

LAST Sunday evening, the Working-Man's Chapel, Dockhead, was opened for the purpose of communicating moral and religious instruction, and for promoting social and kindly feelings amongst all sects and parties. These meetings will in future be held every Sunday evening at half-past-six. We shall not lose sight of this excellent institution.

WORKING-MAN'S TEETOTAL SOCIETY.

A MEETING for the public recognition of this Society was held on Thursday evening the 4th instant, at Aldersgate-street Chapel, Mr. BLACKWELL in the chair. Mr. R. P. BATON, the Secretary, read the Rules, and an Address from the Committee, showing the great necessity of a society of this kind; after which the meeting was addressed by Mr. BATEW, who was followed by Mr. WILLIAMS. He was succeeded by Mr. CURRIE of Chelsea, who spoke in his usual interesting and convincing manner, and promised any assistance he could give at all times. Mr. NEXSON requested permission to say a few words, and stated that he had paid very particular attention to the entire business of the evening, that he was highly gratified with everything that had been said by the various speakers, but more particularly with the Address, which did great honour both to the heads and hearts of the Committee who had prepared it. On the following evening the first weekly meeting of the same society was held at the British School Rooms, Honduras-street, Old-alreet, when Mr. STARKS presided, and addresses were delivered by MESSIEURS BAYLISS, BETTE, BOOTH, BOYLES, and ANDERSON. Both meetings were well attended, and at the close, many names were entered as members. We shall always be happy to insert the Reports of the transactions of this Society.

CLERKENWELL AND PENTONVILLE YOUTHS' TEETOTAL SOCIETY.

WE mentioned a week or two since that the Anniversary Meeting of this Society would take place next Monday evening, the 15th instant, at the Parochial School Room, Anwell-street, Pentonville, when Sir C. E. SMITH, Bart., will preside, and we have now the pleasure to state that the following gentlemen have also promised to attend:—MR. BROTHERTON, M. P., Rev. D. ANDREWS, Rev. J. F. WILLY, M. A., Rev. W. TYLER, Mr. MINGAY SYDER, Mr. R. HICKS, Surgeon, Mr. WALKDEN, M. C. TAYLOR, High Chief Ruler of the Rechabites, and Mr. CURRIE; Mr. JOSEPH PHASE, M. P. is also expected.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

THE meeting at the Aldersgate-street Chapel, on Wednesday evening, February 3rd, was addressed by MESSIEURS KNIGHT (of Cambridge), DEXTER, EALES, BAYLISS, and DRAPER.

On Saturday evening, February 6th, Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS took the chair; and MESSIEURS CRUMP and BENSTEAD addressed the audience in their usual impressive manner. Mr. Reynolds then said that he had much pleasure in introducing to the meeting a gentleman who would be received with enthusiasm. This gentleman was the Rev. JOSEPH BURKE, a Catholic minister of Connanght, and one of the Secretaries to the Rev. THEOBALD MATHEW.

THE REV. MR. BURKE said that having been compelled to visit London on business of an important nature, he had deemed it to be his duty, and had been expressly requested by the Rev. Mr. MATHEW, to call upon Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, in order to express to this gentleman the gratitude of the Irish Teetotalers towards him for the manner in which he conducted The Teetotaler generally, and the attention he paid to the progress of Teetotalism in Ireland especially. Mr. Burke then gave an interesting account of the labours of Father Mathew. He himself (Mr. Burke) had administered no less than 17000 pledges in his own country, and was the President of a society consisting of 7000 staunch and sincere Teetotalers. The number of Teetotalers altogether in Ireland at this moment are 3,750,000, all of whom had received the impulse to sign the bond of their salvation from one man! Ireland had been a prey to the greatest misery, distress, and ignorance; but, thanks to Mr. Mathew, it was now elevated to its proper rank in the category of nations. The Rev. Mr. Mathew had devoted his life to deeds of philanthropy and charity. He had commenced his humane career by building a cemetery, and orphan's asylum, and founding other charitable institutions for the poor. He then cast his eyes around him, and seeing that his native land was a prey to the vice of intemperance, he commenced his Temperance career, encouraged at first by only five individuals, viz. three members of the Society of Friends, one Methodist, and one Protestant minister. At the end of four months he had administered the pledge to 400,000 postulants. The Rev. Mr. Mathew then travelled to all parts of the country, administering the pledge. He had frequently administered it to 20,000 individuals before breakfast; 40,000 between breakfast and dinner; and 30,000 between this meal and supper. Mr. Mathew never touched upon political subjects, and paid no attention, in reference to the Temperance movement, to the sectarian opinions of individuals. Teetotalism, thought Father Mathew, is totally distinct from religion and politics. All Christians are brethren; bear they what denomination they may. No one must be rejected from the sphere of Teetotal salvation (said Mr. Burke) in consequence of religious or political opinion. The doctrine of Teetotalism is universal, and not exclusive. On one occasion he (Mr. Burke) accompanied Mr. Mathew on a journey of forty miles before breakfast, and saw 20,000 souls receive the pledge before the great Apostle of Temperance had even broken his fast! Teetotalism is now so well established in Ireland, that all the powers of hell cannot shake the colossus. But the grand principle of safety on which Irish Teetotalism is based, is the principle which is so strenuously advocated by The Teetotaler journal—UNION! Without this principle, English Teetotalism would never progress effectually and well. All present knew the fable of the bundle of sticks, and that alone would convince them of the absolute necessity of UNION. It was distressing to find that the English Teetotal sphere was agitated by intestine disturbances; and Mr. Mathew himself was anxious to extend the hand of friendship, to fix the bond of Union between Irish and English Teetotalers. Mr. Burke understood that Union was the principle advocated by the United Temperance Association; and he was glad of it. The religion of Christ was not the religion of dissension; neither should Teetotalism be the cause of disunion. Mr. Burke concluded a most able, eloquent, and interesting oration with an earnest appeal to all present to exert themselves in favour of the good cause; and, when the reverend gentleman sat down, the chapel echoed with the enthusiasm of applause. We may also observe that at every portion of his speech in which he alluded to the Rev. Mr. MATHEW, the more mention of the name was received with the most unfeigned delight. Altogether, this was one of the most interesting meetings and one of the most effective speeches, that have as yet characterised the history of the United Temperance Association.

MR. REYNOLDS begged to express, in the name of the audience, the gratitude which was experienced by all present for the visit of the Rev. Mr. Burke to that chapel; and he hoped that the Rev. gentleman, on his return to Ireland, would not forget to express the high admiration entertained by all English Teetotalers of the humane, philanthropic, and noble character of the regenerator of Ireland, the Rev. THEOBALD MATHEW.

CHelsea AUXILIARY TO THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS lectured on Friday evening, February, 5th, at the Temperance Hall, 56 George-street, Chelsea, to a crowded and most respectable audience. This Auxiliary is producing the most beneficial results in the district: the Hall is invariably well attended; and there is an excellent Temperance Coffee-House in the same street, the proprietors of which are remarkable for the civility of their manners and their peculiar tact in administering satisfactorily to all the comforts of those who visit the establishment.

CATHOLIC TEETOTAL ASSOCIATIONS.

ON Sunday, January 24th, a Catholic Total Abstinence Association was formed at the School Rooms, No. 1, Henrietta-street, Manchester Square. Mr. JOHN GILES was in the chair. Speeches were delivered by this gentleman, and by MESSIEURS SULLIVAN, KETTER, BUCKMAN, FAIRBROTHER, O'LEARY, and WADDICK. Mr. M. P. HAYNES also addressed the audience in a most eloquent and impressive manner. This new Society is calculated to produce the most beneficial results in the district in which it has been established.

A general meeting of the Metropolitan Catholic Total Abstinence Association took place, as announced, on Monday, February, 1st, at the Mechanics' Institute, Southampton Buildings, Holborn. The Rev. DR. MAGEE, the General President, was in the chair.

HACKNEY.

THE Ladies' Teetotal Association of this metropolitan suburb held a grand Tea Festival, on Monday evening last, in the School-Room attached to the Temperance Hotel. The tea was provided by Mr. Weston, the proprietor of this hotel, and was served up in a manner highly creditable to his establishment.

CATS.—These animals have met with very different receptions among various nations. By the Egyptians they were worshipped as deities, and at death were embalmed, and interred in catacombs. If the statement of Herodotus is correct, when the house of an Egyptian took fire, he first hastened to convey his cats to a place of security, and afterwards looked about for his wife and children. In some cities of Europe, on the contrary, it was the custom, on St. John's day, to burn a cat, with all the honours of an auto da fe. Buffon was of opinion that the cat was "a selfish and faithless servant." Rousseau preferred the cat to the dog, because the one has preserved its freedom and independence, while the other has willingly entered into bondage. Petrarch entertained the most lively affection for a cat; Mahomet preferred cutting off the sleeve of his robe, to disturbing the repose of his favourite grimaldin, that had fallen asleep on it. Poets have sung their praises, and artists devoted their talents to them; amongst the latter, Godfrey Kneller, of Switzerland, is distinguished; he painted them in every situation and attitude.

CHAPTER V.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE EARLY HISTORY OF MR. BENJAMIN WOTTLE.—THE TRULY POETIC AND HIGHLY SENTIMENTAL EFFUSION COMPOSED BY MR. AUGUSTUS SNODGRASS.—THE SERENADE AND ITS PARTICULARS.

THE scheme of the serenade having been well digested and settled, Mr. Samuel Weller procured the various instruments to be used by these amateur-musicians, and it was arranged that the party should proceed to Wood-street, Cheap-side, at the hour of eleven on the night of the day following the one on which the subject was first broached. It however struck Mr. Pickwick that, as the weather was inconveniently cold, it would be more prudent to obtain, if possible, an entrance into the warehouse of Mr. Sago's establishment, and there practise the vocal and instrumental harmony which was intended to revive the days of the troubadours. In order to effect this desirable aim, some one in the grocer's dwelling must be made acquainted with the intended diversion; and the difficulty was to find the right individual to enlist in their service at that moment. With his usual sagacity, Mr. Pickwick appealed, in his dilemma, to Mr. Weller; and Mr. Weller immediately came to his aid by announcing that all possible trust and confidence might be reposed in the porter of Mr. Sago's establishment. Mr. Pickwick accordingly despatched Sam into the city to arrange matters with the porter; and it was not very long before the faithful valet and the aforesaid porter were talking over the business in a coffee-house, in the neighbourhood of Wood-street.

Mr. Benjamin Wottle, the porter here spoken of, deserves especial notice. He was a man of considerable talent and observation, and had risen from a comparatively obscure and humble situation in life to the respectable and onerous post of confidential porter in Mr. Sago's establishment. There is no task more pleasurable to the faithful historian than that of tracing the career of great men. Mr. Wottle had no one to thank for the fabrication of his fortunes but himself. The acuteness of his perception was at once the origin of all his happiness as well as of his occasional sorrows in life. Educated at a charity-school, he had noticed that a great intimacy existed between the master and a pious old lady who paid a quarterly subscription for the benefit of the establishment, and gave away coals, and candles, and pea-soup, in winter, to the poor. This lady was the patroness of the school; and her own gardener had been raised to the rank of village pedagogue. The undue friendship existing between the master and his former mistress was duly observed by Master Benjamin Wottle and buzzed abroad; and Master Benjamin Wottle was thereupon soundly scourged for having made public the effects of his profound observation.

From the charity-school Master Wottle was admitted into a cobbler's shop, where his range of observation was for some time circumscribed to the soles of shoes. But here his great talent was his besetting enemy; for having observed that the cobbler always made a hole in the upper leathers of a pair of boots when he had to mend the under, and vice versa, in order that the said hole might, in process of time, furnish him with fresh work, he took the liberty to suggest the impropriety of this mode of behaviour to his master, and a short time after to his master's customers. Thus the cobbler lost his work, and Master Wottle his place; and so he came up to London from the village which had the honour of witnessing his birth.

It is a sad thing when the head of a talented youth is full of brains, and his pockets full of emptiness. Master Benjamin Wottle felt this, and was determined to strike into some path that would eventually lead to fortune. He accordingly attached himself to the person and interests of a gentleman who earned his livelihood by rectifying public abuses through the straightforward and simple means of laying informations at the various police-offices against delinquents, and thus obtaining, as a well-earned recompense, a moiety of the fine imposed. As a witness to this gentleman, Mr. Benjamin Wottle had found not only the means of subsistence, but also of indulging his peculiar talent of observation to the utmost of his desires. The great public benefactor (called by malicious and evil-disposed persons a common informer) who employed Mr. Benjamin Wottle, praised him very highly for the clear way in which he gave his evidence concerning things which he did see: and at length, in the fulness of the confidence which the gentleman knew he could repose in the aspiring youth, he requested him to be equally explicit and unembarrassed in speaking of certain things which he did not see; but Mr. Wottle, who was by this time twenty years of age, and well able to work for himself, manfully threw off the yoke of his employer, and declined to observe on any one's account but his own. The gentleman, however, pretended to notice a handkerchief in Mr. Wottle's pocket, which said handkerchief had only a few hours previously emanated from that of an individual walking down the Strand in a glorious state of intoxication, and whom Mr. Wottle had kindly conducted to his own house. Upon this frivolous pretence, Mr. Wottle had been ignominiously conducted before a magistrate at Guildhall. Now this magistrate was no other than Mr. Alderman Fitzbuggins, of Portoken; and knowing the accuser to be a common informer, he dismissed the case. Mr. Wottle made a very eloquent speech by way of thanking the alderman for his decision; and this circumstance so operated upon the worthy magistrate's heart, that he recommended the youth to Mr. Sago, who was in want of a porter at the time. In this manner did Mr. Benjamin Wottle obtain an introduction into Mr. Sago's house; and there had he been for upwards of fifteen years when he formed the acquaintance of Mr. Samuel Weller, on the first occasion of the latter individual's visit to the grocer's abode.

Now Mr. Benjamin Wottle, being an observing man, perceived that Mr. Samuel Weller was an excellent fellow, and readily fell into the scheme. It would be useless to describe the manner in which Mr. Samuel Weller broached the delicate subject, or how Mr. Benjamin Wottle hastened to meet him half-way in his views. Suffice it to say that the porter suddenly found Sam slipping half a guinea into his hand—a sum supplied by Mr. Pickwick for the purpose,—and that he agreed to admit the serenading party into the warehouse on the ground floor, with all due caution, at eleven o'clock precisely on the following evening. Charmed with the success of his mission, Mr. Weller was hastening up Wood-street to take the omnibus in Cheap-side, when he nearly knocked a rather stout gentleman down in the hurry of his pace.

"Now then, blind'un," ejaculated the stout gentleman thus assailed; "don't you come that there again, or else I'll let you know who's who, and wot's wot. Holloa!" he added, as he surveyed the countenance of him whom he was thus addressing: "Is this you, Samivel?"

"Me, indeed!" returned Sam, very coolly taking the hand that was now proffered to him; "vy, you wouldn't go for to wollop your own son, would you?"

"How should I know who it was a-runnin' up agin' me like a locomotive without a driver?" demanded Mr. Weller senior, for the stout gentleman was no other than Sam's venerable and venerated father, in all the glory of a broad brimmed hat, shawl covering up half his purple countenance, immense striped waistcoat, brown breeches, tops, and olive-brown coat; "you wouldn't never do for a coachman, you wouldn't, Samivel; cos you never looks to see vich way you're a-goin'. But wot are you doin' here?"

"Guv'nor's up in town," replied Sam, "and is a stayin' with Mr. Snodgrass. To-morrow evenin' they gives a serenade in this here street."

"A wot?" demanded old Weller, putting on his most solemn expression of countenance, and stepping back a few paces.

"A serenade," said Sam.

"A serry-nade!" repeated his father. "Wot's that—something to eat?"

"What a old curiosity you air!" cried Sam.

"A serenade is a vocal and instrumental concert, given out in the public street, or down a area, or in a warehus."

"Who gives this here concert, Sam?"

"Guv'nor, Tupman, and myself."

"An' wot's your master a-goin' to make a image and a specktle of his self for at his time o' life?" demanded old Mr. Weller. "He's too far advanced in years to drive them ere kind o' vehicles. Short stages is his look out."

"Some o' them old fellers gets exceedin' rum notions into their heads at times," returned Sam. "But you must let 'em have their own way, as the man said to the Turk ven he married his four wives."

"Wery true, Samivel," said old Weller. "I'm a goin' to stay a day or two in this here part o' the city, afore I goes back to my cot on Shooter's Hill: think your guv'nor 'ud care if I was to come an' peep at that there little serry-nade? I think I could come the bass uncommon well: I've jist got the rekvisite quantity of hoarseness about my voice at this moment."

"Vell—come, then, if you like, old feller," said Sam, after a moment's consideration. "The more fools there is the more we laughs, as the Speaker says ven he takes the cheer in the House o' Commons."

"Adoo, Sammy," exclaimed Mr. Weller, senior; "I'll be punctual. Wot time is it, though?"

"You be jist half vay down this here street to-morrow night at eleven," returned Sam; "and you'll find us."

The father and son here bade each other adieu, and Mr. Samuel Weller returned to Half-moon-street, Piccadilly, where he communicated the two pleasing facts that the porter had met his wishes relative to the warehouse, and that his own respected father would make an interesting addition to the sentimental party.

The remainder of that day was passed by the great and learned Mr. Pickwick in the philosophic occupation of fixing tails on to the kites of the little Snodgrasses, in anticipation of the summer, which was, however, a long way off; while Mr. Snodgrass locked himself up in his study, and began the composition of a song to be sung by the serenading party. After having dashed his hand a hundred times against his forehead, and wasted a quire of paper, this illustrious poet produced the following beautiful effusion, which he hastened to submit to the consideration of his friends:—

SONG.

While pitiless the cold wind blows,—
While torrents fall, or winter's snows
Freeze the poor traveller's luckless toes,
Or frosts vindictive nip his nose,—
Still to his post the lover goes,
In ardent verse to sing the woes
That every tender bosom knows,
When smarting with love's anxious throes!

Yes, lady—while your flick'ring lamp
Burns dimly with its thick wick,
Beneath your window still must tramp
Your own devoted Pickwick.

Lady, while echoing from the street,
Haply this song thine ears may meet,
Believe that though the torments beat,
And drench your swain from head to feet,
The bitter tempest still is sweet;
And the cold night appears a treat
To him who now is come to greet
Thee, lady, in thy soft retreat!

Yes, lady—while you slumb'ring lie,
And no one says, "Come up, man!"
Beneath your window here am I,
With Weller and with Tupman!

"Beautiful!" exclaimed Mr. Pickwick, when this effusion was brought to an end.

"Nothing could be better!" cried Mr. Tupman.

"But don't you think," asked Mr. Winkle, submissively, "that it is improper to say who the serenaders are?"

"Oh! no one can distinguish the words of a song!" said Mr. Tupman. "All I am thinking of is, that I have my doubts whether a serenade means merely music or singing, or both."

"Never mind what it means," ejaculated Mr. Pickwick; "we will have the whole thing managed just as we have laid down the plan. I am sure nothing could be better than the song!"

"Be it as you say," returned Mr. Tupman, surveying his great leader with the most profound veneration and respect; and yet without a single sentiment of envy or jealousy with regard to that master-mind.

We shall occupy the attention of the reader with no details of the events which occurred during the interval that elapsed until the important moment for departure upon the ever-memorable expedition arrived. A hackney-coach was summoned to the door at ten o'clock precisely; and Mr. Pickwick, muffled up in his great coat, with a large white comforter coming up to his nose, and looking uncommonly like a sentimental lover, was bundled into the vehicle by his faithful valet. Then followed the illustrious Tracy Tupman, whose exploits in love would require a Homer to describe, and a nation of Greeks to read them. After these gentlemen, an immense drum was tumbled into the coach; and Mr. Samuel Weller ascended to the dickey.

The vehicle departed; and the only thing that in any way annoyed our heroes inside was, that it did not snow at that precise moment, and that therefore the allusion in the song was somewhat infelicitous. But to make amends for this disappointment, it rained in perfect torrents; and from this circumstance Mr. Pickwick and Mr. Tupman derived considerable consolation. The song dwelt in their capacious memories; but in order to acquit themselves properly, they repeated it over again to each other; and in this way they beguiled the time till the coach stopped at the entrance to Wood-street.

The two gentlemen alighted; and the vehicle was ordered to wait for their return. Followed by Mr. Weller, and attended by a shower of rain, which highly delighted them, as it imparted a species of chivalrous daring to the adventure, they walked down the street, Mr. Weller carrying the drum. But scarcely had they got a little way down the street, when some one rushed out of a door-way in so suspicious a manner that the two chivalrous adventurers began to take to their heels, exclaiming, "Thieves! Help! Fire!" as loud as they could. It was with the greatest trouble that Mr. Samuel Weller could re-assure them, and fortunately the neighbourhood had not been alarmed.

"It's on'y my father, sir, as persents his self in that there very unceremonious manner, or rather without no manners at all," said Sam. "I never see such a old bear as it is: a sweep tumbling out of a chimbley-pot into a apple woman's lap in the street ain't nothin' to him."

"Wot's up now, Sammy?" cried the old gentleman: "no offence, sir?" he added, turning towards Mr. Pickwick.

"None, Mr. Weller," said our hero. "I am glad you have come to take a part in this little amusement."

"I promised Samivel I'd jine you, sir," returned old Mr. Weller; "but I couldn't get no wery slap-up musical hinstument; an' so I've brought a preshus big bell with me in my pocket."

"That'll do," said Mr. Pickwick; and the party proceeded along the street as far as the dwelling of Mr. Sago, where the porter was waiting for them with the door of the warehouse ajar.

The moment they entered the spacious warehouse, Mr. Benjamin Wottle closed the street-door; and the serenaders proceeded to wipe the rain off their faces, and then to examine their musical instruments. The warehouse was an immense room, filled with chests, boxes, and barrels, full of all kinds of articles used in the grocery line; and the munificence of Mr. Wottle had supplied four candles to illuminate the interesting scene.

"I shall stand upon this barrel," said Mr. Tupman, pointing to an immense vessel near a computer; and, scarcely were the words out of his mouth, when he clambered first upon the computer, and thence on the top of the barrel. "The music," he added, "is always much better near the ceiling."

"Is it?" said Mr. Pickwick; and glancing towards another barrel nearly as high as himself, he exclaimed, "Sam, help me up here."

Mr. Samuel Weller, who was in an excellent humour, thought that the amusement would be enhanced by this arrangement, and accordingly complied with his master's desire. As for himself and his father, they seated themselves upon a couple of chairs; and, matters being thus arranged, the preparations for the concert began. Mr. Pickwick had his drum hoisted up to him by Mr. Benjamin Wottle, and nearly fell off the butt as he fixed it to his person: Mr. Tupman took a triangle from his pocket: Mr. Samuel Weller stuck a set of pandean pipes just beneath his chin; and old Mr. Weller lugged a capacious front door bell from his coat-pocket. As Mr. Wottle was determined not to be behindhand nor idle on this memorable occasion, he procured a poker and shovel from the kitchen, by way of completing the assortment of instruments.

And now began one of the most terrible and appalling combinations of sounds that ever fell upon mortal ears, or was made by mortal men. Mr. Pickwick beat his drum; Mr. Tupman played his triangle; Sam vented all the exhalation of his powerful lungs upon the pandean pipes; Mr. Wottle imitated marrow-bones and cleavers to perfection; and old Weller agitated his bell with astounding fury. And in the midst of this awful dinrose the voices of Mr. Pickwick and Mr. Tupman, shouting the song as loudly as they could bawl; but as Mr. Tupman had forgotten the first stanza, he commenced with the second; and as Mr. Pickwick had forgotten all but the first line, he, on his part, stuck manfully to that only. The greatest harmony seemed to prevail amongst the party in every thing except in the music; and the longer they proceeded, the greater became the noise.

It was at that very interesting moment,—while the din was at its loudest,—while Mr. Tupman was shouting the chorus of the second stanza, which contained his own name, with all his might and main, for the behoof of Miss Amelia Sophia,—and while old Mr. Weller was absolutely black in the face with the violence of his exertions in ringing the bell,—it was, we say, at this interesting and memorable moment, that Mr. Pickwick suddenly disappeared from the view of his companions. The fact is, he had mounted upon a cask of treacle; and, forgetful that the top of it might give way, he had begun to cut a few capers in the enthusiasm of the entertainment. The top did give way, as suddenly as the drop falls on the scaffold at the Old Bailey; and down plumped Mr. Pickwick into the midst of the treacle. The drum rested over the side, and his head alone appeared above the cask.

The music stopped in a moment; and the unfortunate gentleman's companions surveyed the accident with countenances expressive of the most ludicrous astonishment. At that moment, the inner door of the warehouse opened, and in rushed Mr. Sago senior, and Mr. Francis Sago, in their dressing-gowns, trousers, and slippers, which they had huddled on as soon as they had tumbled out of their respective beds.

"What is the meaning of this disturbance?" demanded Mr. Sago, senior, in a tone of desperate anger.

"I tell'ee wot it is, sir," said old Mr. Weller, rising from his chair, and advancing towards the master of the house, who surveyed the portly figure of the old coachman in profound surprise: "it's on'y Mr. Pickwick as took it into his wery sagacious head to give a—wot d'ye call it, Samivel?"

"Mr. Pickwick!" ejaculated the elder Mr. Sago: "and where is he then?"

"Here I am, my dear sir," cried the immortal gentleman, protruding his animated and philanthropic countenance over the sides of the treacle-barrel.

"Where?" said Mr. Sago.

"Here!" exclaimed Mr. Pickwick; and, guided by the sound of the voice, Mr. Sago succeeded in discerning the position of his friend.

Mr. Sago senior and Mr. Francis burst out into a violent fit of laughter, as they caught sight of the strange predicament of our hero; and, after having indulged their mirth for upwards of five minutes, it was impossible to be angry with him or his companions for the disturbance they had created.

"You see wot comes o' them there serry-nades, gen'lemen," said old Mr. Weller, who was himself nearly suffocated with laughing. "Who'd ever think o' goin' to make love to a young gal with a drum, a mouth-organ, an' a triangle. Blowed if this don't beat cockfighting all to shivers, or else nothin' does."

"You hold your tongue, old image!" ejaculated Sam, pulling his father back by the tails of his capacious coat: "every one has his own peculiar way o' courtin'; an' all ways is good as succeeds. There ain't no harm in a little good music as the gen'lman said ven he played the key-bugle over the sick lodger's head."

"But had you not better help your master out of that unpleasant predicament, Sam?" said Francis, still laughing as he spoke.

By the aid of Mr. Samuel Weller and Mr. Benjamin Wottle, Mr. Pickwick was extricated from the barrel of treacle; and a most piteous spectacle did he present to the gaze of those who beheld his plight. About fifty pounds of treacle hung about his person; and, when he attempted to walk, streams of the syrup fell upon the floor. Mr. Wottle obtained some water and towels from the kitchen; and by dint of scrubbing and washing, Mr. Pickwick was somewhat eased of the load he carried about with him.

In the mean time Mr. Tupman had descended very cautiously from the barrel on which he was mounted, for the fearful accident which had befallen his great leader filled him with the most painful apprehensions of experiencing a similar fate. He took the liberty of introducing himself to the Messieurs Sago, as Mr. Pickwick was too much occupied with his own misfortune to think of others; and he made a very neat and appropriate speech (as the newspapers would have said) by way of explanation and apology for this memorable serenade. The apology was cheerfully received; and the Messieurs Sago again enjoyed a hearty laugh at the expense of Mr. Pickwick. Francis, however, procured him a thick cloak to wrap himself up in; and the serenading party bade adieu to the grocer and his son.

Thus was it that the noble and daring attempt of Mr. Samuel Pickwick to revive the habits and customs of ancient times, and recal to England's shores a chivalrous practice which has lately been sustained only in the southern states of Europe, proved abortive, simply from the distressing failure of the lid of a barrel of treacle. It however seems to be the destiny of great men to raise up a host of imitators; and amongst the various attempts to revive the customs of the days of chivalry, to which this exploit of the Pickwickians gave rise, must be included that wretched complication of ostentatious foolery—the Eglington Tournament!

(To be continued in our next.)

THE PROGRESS OF INEBRIETY.

DEVELOPED IN THE LIFE OF A GENTLEMAN.

ALTHOUGH every one of our readers will comprehend the meaning which is here attached to the word Gentleman, there is really no word in the English language of less definite signification than this. The word gives no idea of the qualities of the person, nor of his abilities and virtues. The Marquis of Waterford and the Earl of Waldegrave may be called "gentlemanly men;" but if their usual conduct were to be taken as the standard qualifications of a Gentleman, the sensible individual would, in this case, rather be a sweep than a Gentleman. When some fellow is taken before the police-magistrate, charged with having been drunk and disorderly, and having insulted decent females, in reply to one of the first questions put to him, he says, "I am a Gentleman." It is also a singular fact that attorneys are Gentlemen by Act of Parliament; and yet some of the pettifoggers of this fraternity would be a disgrace to a society of street-sweepers. The word Gentleman is no explanatory medium of particular station. If Rothschild himself gave a waiter at a tavern only a few halfpence, the waiter would say, "He is no Gentleman;" and yet, if a shilling or eighteen pence had been the donation, the waiter would have said, "There is a regular Gentleman for you!" A person, although of humble birth, is said to be "quite the Gentleman," if he be polite and engaging in his manners; and the son of a Duke, when his manners are alluded to, may be set down as "anything but a Gentleman." A clerk in a counting-house is frequently declared to be "a perfect Gentleman in his dress;" and one of the aristocracy, with respect to attire, may be taken for "anything but a Gentleman." We often say that some particular action "is very ungentlemanly;" and yet we say "that Gentleman was guilty of it!" Who, then, are gentlemen? and what are the qualifications of a Gentleman?

In a worldly point of view, a man who is born of parents who are not tradesmen, or do not belong to any working class, is a Gentleman. A man may therefore be a Gentleman by birth, or may acquire the title by his riches, and yet he uncouth in manners and appearance. But in a moral, and consequently in a correct point of view, the Gentleman is one who conducts himself properly, and whose actions are characterised by honesty, probity, and scrupulous honour.

It is, however, in another acceptation that the word Gentleman is used in reference to the Series of Illustrations now presented to the readers of The Teetotaler. The Gentleman is here the son of rich and well-born parents, and has received his education at one of the public schools or universities. He is genteel in appearance and engaging in his manners, possessed of many mental and good personal qualifications, and enters upon life with all the bright prospects which, in an aristocratic country, usually form the perspective of the Gentleman's destiny. Let us see how far his conduct will justify his right to the denomination which by courtesy and conventional privilege he assumes.

PLATE I.—We are first introduced to our hero in a Ball-Room. We may suppose that he has just commenced his career of dissipation and pleasure,—or that, in the language of fashionable life, he has just "come upon town." Now the qualifications of a "Gentleman about town" are numerous and peculiar. He must study all opportunities to encourage in his acquaintances a belief that he is "an excellent fellow." He must be enabled to drink his bottle of wine every day after dinner,—to wrench knockers off doors,—to assault the police,—to insult respectable females in the streets,—to fight with hackney-coachmen,—to get rid of a dun,—to defeat the sagacity of the sheriff's officer,—to pass six weeks from time to time in the Queen's Bench Prison, in order to qualify himself on each occasion for the Insolvents' Court,—to seduce any respectable man's daughter,—and to associate with horse-jockeys, black-legs, and gamblers. He must frequent Hell's and "flash cribs," and must be an excellent judge of horse-flesh. He must be a Tory in politics, and bribe The Satirist not to notice his proceedings. He must look upon the working-classes with the utmost contempt, and be a great supporter of all aristocratic institutions. In a word, he must imbibe all possible kinds of bad habits—commit all kinds of excesses—and indulge in all species of debauchery. He will then be a "Gentleman about town." Such is the course of education through which the hero of these pictures has past; and he relates his feats in love and police-frays with the pride of a Soult or a Wellington narrating their campaigns. Of all species of dissipation, in which the Gentleman about Town indulges, intemperance necessarily forms a large section; indeed, dissipation and intemperance are almost synonymous, because none of the pranks of the Gentleman about Town are ever entered upon until the perpetrators be well primed with wine. We now find our hero in a Ball-room, where he is feeding his evil habits with deep libations from the wine-bottle—or rather the poison-bottle. Probably he will not return home until, urged on by the effects of the fire-liquid, he has committed some excess alike disgraceful to his reputation and rank, and prejudicial to the tranquillity of the community at large.

PLATE II.—We here find the Gentleman returning home from his Club-House in a dreadful state of intoxication, and supported by two of his friends (Heaven protect us from such friends!) who are only one degree less inebriated than himself. The Clubs at the West-End of the Town are the sinks of every kind of infamy, amongst which Gambling and Drinking are the principal features. The Clubs take married men away from their families, and encourage them in intrigues by affording them a convenient place of address for their letters; and young unmarried men are ruined—ay, irretrievably ruined by the "hoary old sinners" who frequent these Pandemonia. While the Gentleman exclaims against pot-house vulgarity, he forgets Club-House infamy; and while the senators of this land compel the resort of the poor to close their doors at eleven, they themselves may drink all night at their own clubs. The stock of wine that is kept in some of these Club-Houses will afford an idea of the immense consumption of that article which takes place amongst the members; and as the quantity consumed is perpetually renewed, the amount seldom varies from the following average proportions:—The value of the stock of wine at the Carlton Club is about £16,000; that of the United University, £2000; the Athenæum, £4000; the Union, £8000; the Junior United Service Club, £4000; the Senior United Service Club, £8000; and Crookford's, £70,000. Start not, gentle reader—the average value of the wine in the cellar at Crookford's Club-House, or rather Hell, (for it is nothing but a Pandemonium of Gamblers) amounts to seventy thousand pounds sterling! The Gentleman of our narrative has been to Crookford's, where some of the experienced members have plied him well with the most costly wines, and have plundered him of all his ready money, a considerable per centage upon which loss has found its way into the pocket of the proprietor of the establishment. When the Gentleman was fleeced of all he had about him, he played upon credit, and gave cheques for the morrow upon his banker. His good-natured friends, who had thus condescended to initiate him a little into London life, laughed at him in their sleeves, and two of them agreed to see the "poor young fellow" home.

PLATE III.—To what particular vice does not intemperance lead? When the Gentleman is wearied of his Club, and is anxious for a change in his diversions (if diversions his deeds can be called), he proceeds to one of the most infamous neighbourhoods, and seeks the society of the daughters of crime, whose ruin was originally effected through the same medium as his own rapid progress towards his downfall. Intemperance has sent more unfortunate girls to earn a precarious livelihood by a dreadful traffic, than Poverty ever condemned to the same course; and, much—much as we are bound to pity those degraded beings, we must not allow our sympathies to interpose themselves between our mental eyes and the fact that the objects of our pity have chiefly fallen in consequence of their early predilection to strong drinks. The Gentleman, after having partaken of a luxurious repast at some house of entertainment in the fashionable quarters of London, and having indulged to excess that craving after wine which is rapidly becoming more insatiable and less easy to overcome, is totally unfitted for the society of ladies; and this conviction breaks upon his mind notwithstanding the clouded state of his brain. He, accordingly, seeks the company of those poor degraded females for whom his own habits of dissipation have qualified him as a companion; and all the delicate feelings, all the chivalrous sentiments which should fill the mind of man when his ideas are occupied with the loveliness and accomplishments of the chaste portion of the female sex, are undermined and destroyed by this contiguity with the frail and demoralized daughters of iniquity. He learns to judge the generality of the sex by the specimens now thrown in his way; and his ideas of female virtue consequently become loose and derogatory to the noble mind. "Wine and lewd woman," says Mahomet, "are two deadly poisons;" and, all impostor as he was, the founder of Islamism said much that was true and is worth recording.

SOCIALISM;

OR MR. OWEN'S NEW MORAL WORLD.

No one doubts the sincerity of Mr. Owen. We believe he would waste all his substance, and spend, nay, lose his life, were these sacrifices to create a world of happiness. But still, we are equally confident, that no man who is not an enthusiastic theorist—that no man who takes for his guides common observation, and common sense—much more, that no person who has studied and who confides in the doctrines of the Bible, can ever become a convert to his views, or consider him other than an eccentric and strong-headed theorist, who deals far more in strenuous assertions and unsupportable dicta, than in calm, plain, and convincing argument. Many years ago, before the author's opinions were so well matured as it is reasonable to suppose they are now, he put forth a pamphlet, (the title of it we do not recollect,) which contained many of his favourite fancies. Their import amounted to the following doctrines:—"That vice and misery existed in this world—that vice and misery might be driven out of it—that this would be accomplished by one whose soul like a mirror was to receive and reflect the whole truth and light which concerned the happiness of the world—and that I, Robert Owen, am that mirror!" We think we are not in error as to the general meaning of the resolutions, and the arguments in support of them which the pamphlet in question set forth. Now, however bold, unauthorised, unsupported, or ridiculous they may have been, or however incredible our report of them may appear to those totally unacquainted with the author's system, yet, let our readers peruse the title of another publication, which modestly declares the work to be "The Book of the New Moral World; containing the Rational System of Society, founded on Demonstrable Facts, developing the Constitution and Laws of Human Nature of Society." We might quarrel with the phraseology of this announcement, and object to the words "demonstrable facts," inasmuch as it would have been more philosophically correct and clear had the author used the term truth instead of facts; truth being the result of an induction of facts, while facts stand as individual and separate propositions, which all can judge of justly in their isolated capacity the moment they are perceived. We do not need new facts, nor a demonstration of any of those that happen to be before us; but we require a manipulator who can compare and adjust them, and when they are thus properly arranged, can draw the truth from them. However, this amendment would not be material with such a metaphysician as Mr. Owen, who is well known to indulge in a curious jumble of philosophy, popular truths, and unauthorised conclusions. If he be technically correct in one place, or a disciple of the schools, he flies off in the next to pounce upon some current aphorism, strange guess, or ridiculous assertion; but when you have him, or when you have him not, is quite uncertain. To be able to argue with him, it would be necessary to have some well-defined and common ground to start from; and even then, every inch of the way would have to be cleared, on account of his preconceived notions, unauthorised habits of thinking, and peculiar phraseology, before any good could result from the labour of love.

As already stated, no one who takes the Holy Scriptures for the rule of his faith, will treat Mr. Owen's opinions as better than the dreams of an enthusiast or the speculations of a sceptic. A Christian will at once exclaim, on hearing the words "this volume professes to be the Book of the New Moral World," "I thought that the New Testament was that book; I thought that he whom I believe to be the Redeemer of the world was its hero." We admit that it is the right and the duty of every man to inquire after truth for himself; and that, so long as he is honest in his search, whatever conclusions he arrives at, these ought to be candidly considered and not ridiculed till refuted, however much they may stand in the way of preconceived notions and opinions. To this respectful dealing we consider Mr. Owen to be entitled. Let us for a moment try him by this rule. We are not going to attempt a metaphysical or regular argument with him; for, as already said, this would require, ere he or we were convinced of error, a common starting point and a labour greater than was likely to be rewarded in full. But let us take a plainer and shorter method with him. It is this:—he is fond of facts—demonstrable truths. Now, is there any truth better founded and more generally known in this country, concerning a merely philosophical question, than that Robert Owen's doctrines and creed have never found acceptance with the mass of sober intelligent thinkers; nay, that few or none, whose opinions in the ordinary affairs of life are worth consulting, have ever become and remained his disciples? We deny not, that, at the first, novelty lent a transient attraction to his fancies; but that charm has passed away, and the Owenites are almost extinct. Whence is this?—Can it be that his system is founded on demonstration, that is, on self-evident truths; and yet that the great body of respectable, intelligent, and inquiring people remain unconvinced, or unmoved if convinced, when their happiness is at stake? Impossible! The truth must therefore be, that Mr. Owen's system is incapable of furnishing materials or doctrines which can ever renovate the world—ever create it anew in all its moral phenomena; because it is not demonstrably true.

After this general method of speaking of the New Moral System according to Owen, we shall do little more with the present exposition of it, than select a few passages from its details.

Mr. Owen recommends to all Governments and People, "that the old prejudices of the world, for or against class, sect, party, country, sex, and colour, derived solely from ignorance, should be now allowed, by the common consent of all, to die their natural death; that standing armies of all nations should be disbanded, in order that the men be employed in producing instead of destroying wealth; that the rising generation should be educated from birth to become superior, in character and conduct, to all past generations; that all should be trained to have as much enjoyment, in producing as in using or consuming wealth, which, through the progress of science, can be easily effected; that all should freely partake of it; and that, thus, the reign of peace, intelligence, and universal sympathy, or affection, may, for ever, supersede the reign of ignorance and oppression."

All very fair offers, and promises, and requests; but there are two parties at the making of every bargain, and the how and the when check our hopes. Mr. Owen then addresses himself "to those who prefer a System of Society which will ensure the Happiness of the Human Race throughout all future Ages, to a System which, so long as it shall be maintained, must produce misery to all." Show us this ensured happiness, and then see why will turn his back upon it. Notwithstanding this tempting promise, we see that the system which is said by the author to ensure such entire happiness is felt by himself not to be ensured, or founded upon easily demonstrated truths; for he says that the perusal of his works "will be appealing to those who are incapable of viewing the subject, or comprehending an entirely new system to re-form and to re-constitute society. For a more limited conception of this all-important subject will only perplex the intellect, between old prejudices and new truths; and, therefore, make it less competent to understand arrangements designed to constitute a new state of human existence, one founded on the laws of nature, in direct opposition to the erroneous notions on which the arrangements of the world have been, hitherto, conceived, based and constructed."

Mr. Owen would endeavour to persuade us, that man is no longer to be endowed with passions, and that he is to be put beyond the influence of motives. "Ignorance and poverty," the author says, "and the fear of poverty, will no longer disunite man, and be the hane of his happiness." Again, "money, which has hitherto been the root, if not of all evil, of great injustice, &c., will be no longer required to carry on the business of life." But this is to be demonstrated; and how? Chiefly by taking Mr. Owen's word for it, and for all he says, merely because his system is the result of extraordinary reading, intercourse, observation, and reflection. We question not his labours and ardour; but we think it far more likely that these exertions and this enthusiasm have rendered him an incompetent and partial theorist, an erring zealot rather than a true apostle of truth, wisdom, and moral amelioration.

In conclusion, let us observe that if Mr. Owen's principles were followed the state of society would be most insipid, to say nothing worse of it. It would be all sugar, without any admixtures as in our present world are necessary to render life exquisite. We wonder if all natural evil will cease under this new system of moral good. If not, surely the first thunder-storm that destroys human life will cause unhappiness, unless, with man's motives for activity and emulation, he be bereft of his sensibilities; and what a happy condition will that be! It will be that of sloth and of sleepers.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO A PORTRAIT.

By B. Simmons.

I left thy side, pale-plect'd girl,
In early erring youth;
I wash'd away in passion's whirl
The memory of thy truth.
Yet in her ivy-curtain'd bowers,
Thou'rt crept hush'd my head on flowers,
She could not hide, in sooth,
The vision'd eyes, whose mournful blue
Like summer-ought still glist'n'd through
I dash'd deliciousness away,
And mingled in the world;
I wrought where commerce day by day
His giant dag unfur'd;—
Yet still I labour lost and health—
Lost all but the remember'd wealth
Of thy dear ringlets curl'd,
That round me once their lustrous gold
In coils of bright profusion roll'd!
The sky's now sad—nor sunny scenes
Chequer the fountain fair;
The marble nymph that o'er it leans
Is glass'd for ever there!
Thou, Mary, through the calm or strife,
Or gloom, or gladness of my life,
Pale Angel of Despair,
I see thy form, bright, silent, chill,
But fix'd for ever near me still!

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Sketch of Christ's Hospital is declined with thanks. Mr. MYNOXE SYDRA is decidedly the most popular medical Lecturer within the Teetotal sphere. We cannot inform P. Z. of the amount of the charge made by this gentleman for a course of three Lectures in a provincial town. His address is, 162, Fleet-Street. It would be invidious to attempt to answer the fourth query in our correspondent's letter.

O. M. is informed that the principles of Teetotalism have been discussed in all their bearings, relations, and modes of application, in the columns of The Teetotaler.

It is impossible for O. P. Q. to be correct in the information he has sent us. The date alluded to, fell upon a Sunday, when the public-houses are closed till one. How can he reconcile this with his assertion?

Z. S. is assured that no Report has ever been refused admittance into our columns. We again repeat, that The Teetotaler is an independent journal.

How can we reply to the queries of Britannicus relative to a man with whom we are totally unacquainted.

Mr. H. W. Weston, who is now the proprietor of the Temperance Hotel, Hackney, is the same who was the Secretary of the United Temperance Association.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20th, 1841.

IRELAND has set her Sister Island a great moral example which should exercise all the emulative spirit of the inhabitants of the latter. The Irish Teetotalers are ornaments to the country to which they belong, and should be mentioned with gratitude and respect by all the supporters of the great principle of Total Abstinence from all Intoxicating Liquors. Out of a population of little more than eight millions it was calculated that there were three millions and a half of souls who were liable to habits of frequent intoxication; and this appalling fact naturally accounted for an immense proportion of the misery and the crime which existed in a land so favoured by Nature. There seemed to have been a spell upon the character of the Irish. Time, which carried forward other men, left them stationary. In the midst of modern civilisation, they remained, in many respects, monuments of ancient barbarism. Fierce passions—mad desires—dreadful combinations of violence and mischief—reckless indifference under suffering alternating with appalling murmurs and desperate retribution—a consciousness of degradation without a feeling of self-reproach—a proud and sullen conviction that their conduct was baser than it should be, but charging the dishonour upon external causes instead of seeking for its cause in their own domestic habits,—these were the darker elements of Irish character; and it was in allusion to these that BISHOP BERKELEY exclaimed, in his Querist, "Whose fault is it if poor Ireland still continue poor?" The philanthropist deplored the pitiful ignorance of the Irish, and was astonished at their stupid miscalculation of the means whereby to extinguish their sufferings and their wrongs. All their complaints of misgovernment and oppression would not account for their miseries and their ignorance. Their pride, during a century and a half, may have been mortified by certain symbols of subjection; the ambition of a few gifted minds may have been chafed and irritated at being excluded from a career of honour which they would otherwise have pursued; and the humanising efforts of civilisation may have been partially restricted by a perpetual collision between two religions;—these facts will only explain the why the Irish may have been less happy than they ought, but will not account for why they should have been so little happy and prosperous as they lately were.

Ireland was steeped in blood—torn by frantic dissensions—and in the lowest stage of barbarism. Civilisation had departed from her soil without leaving a foot-print. Even admitting that a particular line of policy will cramp the energies of a nation, and materially check her social development, it will not produce such terrible results as many imagined it to have done in Ireland. We will not measure the respective excellence of creeds: we have no desire to rob Saint Peter of the keys to give them to Saint Paul. The gates of salvation may be in the custody of one saint or of all: but one thing is certain—that against no form of Christianity will they be closed! For all purposes of heaven, Protestantism and Roman Catholicism may be of equal efficacy: on earth they only represent the different-coloured glasses through which the sublime truths of Christianity are surveyed. Let not, then, the late miseries of Ireland be attributed to either political or religious dissensions only: but let a considerable amount be set down to the true, the fertile, and the palpable cause—INTEMPERANCE!

There sprang up a man, a great philanthropist at heart, and one who felt deeply for the degraded condition of his country, and who was determined to exert himself to elevate it to its proper eminence amongst civilised nations. This philanthropist was FATHER MATHEW, whose name is now become a subject for the history of his native land, and whose generous deeds will never die. MR. MATHEW is an acute observer of human nature, and he saw that all the evil which was considered to be native in Ireland was merely artificial, and that it would cease when its cause was removed. The sick man frequently labours under the influence of a terrible incubus in the form of an appalling visitor or night-mare; but the sagacious physician knows how to remove the subject of terror by restoring the stomach to a healthy tone. Ireland was thus oppressed with an incubus; and FATHER MATHEW was the sapient physician who immediately detected, and undertook to remove, the evil by attacking the cause. He preached against intemperance, and he soon collected myriads and myriads of disciples beneath his banner. He came not with the circumstance of a statesman, nor with the pomp of a ruler, nor with the solemn grandeur of a political innovator:—he came in his simplicity, he raised his voice in his humility, and he propagated the doctrine of reformation in his meekness. Ireland was astonished; and the efficacy of the principle thus introduced to her was immediately recognised. The three millions and a half of individuals liable to intoxication from the nature of their habits, enrolled themselves in the ranks of MR. MATHEW'S disciples; and the effects became apparent throughout the country. These effects justify our previous reasoning, and now convince the most stubborn and obstinate that the noble energies, the generous disposition, and the estimable qualities of the Irish, had been long obscured and thrown backwards in the march of civilisation by the hand of Intemperance.

The Irish are a noble race—a great and powerful nation, and one whose character has only just begun to be understood. Hitherto it has been seen "through a glass darkly:" now it is developed in all its unclouded glory. England may now be indeed proud of the alliance with her sister island; and English Teetotalers will do well to imitate, in sincerity and zeal, the Teetotalers of Ireland. But one of the great elements of success and of permanent efficacy in Teetotalism in Ireland, is the UNION which exists amongst the disciples of the same doctrine. In Ireland, Teetotalism is kept apart from religion and politics; and although the ministers of the church in Ireland have taken a noble and active part in furtherance of the Teetotal reformation, they are still aware of the necessity of confining their sermons to their Chapels, and their Teetotal addresses to their Temperance Halls. Hence is Teetotalism prospering in Ireland in a manner calculated to produce the most lasting benefits to that country, and to excite the emulation of the friends of the good cause in England. The Teetotaler is the only English Temperance journal which has obtained any footing in Ireland, and which has succeeded in pleasing the whole Teetotal fraternity in that country; and such has been the favour with which this publication is received in the Sister Isle, that an attempt was made by a few unprincipled men in Dublin to establish a periodical upon the same plan, but the whole of the matter in which was copied verbatim from the columns of The Teetotaler. The reason wherefore The Teetotaler has become so popular in Ireland is because it strenuously and unceasingly advocates the principles of Union amongst all those who have signed the pledge of Total Abstinence; because it will not allow Teetotalism to be mixed up with religion; and because it is conducted upon a liberal, an impartial, and a bold plan, which suits all really independent minds.

FATHER MATHEW must be considered the saviour and regenerator of his country; and never—never will the Irish nation be enabled sufficiently to demonstrate its gratitude to one who has conferred such lasting benefits upon that land. Instead of the Irish character being naturally impregnated with the seeds of disorder and turbulence, it is now found that there is no disposition more really noble and generous than that of the Irish. The Catholics have been termed intolerant and prejudiced: the Catholics of Ireland are neither. The Irish peasantry has been characterised by ignorance, and therefore deemed naturally averse to education: the effects of Teetotalism have developed a love of information and reading which will shortly elevate Ireland to a high rank in the sphere of intellectual accomplishment. Ireland was degraded by one vice, from which all others emanated: that vice is uprooted, and its concomitant evils have disappeared. And this sudden change—a change effected with the rapidity of an enchantment brought about by a magician's wand—has been accomplished by the REV. THEOBALD MATHEW!

MY FIRST GUINEA.

By A. L. GORDON, B.A.

It was my first and my last! How I worshipped that piece of gold! My dear mother gave it to me as a reward for having gained a prize at school—a prize for a copy of Latin verses. You may think perhaps that the Latin was not worth a guinea; or that if it were worth anything, it was worth more than a guinea. Perhaps it was so; but in the pride of her heart, my dear mother robbed that day more than one poor family of its expected soup of charity. Who dares blame her? None: for she stinted the widow and the orphan to reward and encourage her only son.

My poor mother, thou wast not rich: yet thy generous heart opened at the attempts of thy beloved son, the only hope of thy venerable age! Thou gavest into his hands thy little—little savings!

How did he requite thee? Woe, woe to him who gives a trembling answer to that awful question! Yet, trembling, he replies, "Mother, my more than mother—I squandered away thy money, and by my follies hurried thee prematurely to thy grave!" Silence, reader: hast thou no sins wherewith to reproach thyself?

But my first and my last guinea—one of my poor mother's last bright remnants of happy and prosperous days! What did I do with thee? I looked at it long before I would change it; but love of gold on the one hand was no match for love of cakes and fireworks on the other, and the bright piece was changed at last. I did not hesitate from avarice: it is not often that a boy at seventeen entertains feelings of avarice; yet I grudged to change it, because the sight of it recalled my victory over my competitors to my recollection; and when I looked on it, I thought of the pleasure that beamed in my dear mother's eyes as she gave it into my hand as the reward of my success.

But before I changed my guinea, I determined to mark it, with a faint hope that in happier days it might come again into my hands. I took my penknife and engraved my initials on the coin, under them I scratched as well as I could those of my beloved mother.

Four and twenty hours afterwards I had forgotten my guinea, and spent all the change I had received out of it.

I went to college, but my mother was not rich, as I had said before: she fell lower and lower in the scale of pecuniary respectability—she could no longer maintain me at the University. I was therefore obliged to quit it, abandon all hopes of distinguishing myself there, and take a situation as a merchant's clerk.

I soon found one, for, owing to my knowledge of accounts and my handwriting, I easily obtained a place at a pound a week.

A pound a week was not much; but I gave all I received to my mother; and we lived.

I had not been long in my situation when, one day, as I was settling the account of money due to me from my employer, I perceived among the pieces, which he counted out to me, my guinea—that guinea which I had welcomed with so much joy, which I had let out of my hands with so much regret, and on which I had imprinted a mark not to be mistaken.

I kissed the coin—I could not help doing so: it brought consolation to my thoughts, when it was really welcome, for my master, as he paid it to me, told me that he had no farther need of my services.

I left his house, thinking how I should break these distressing tidings to my mother. As I walked along with my guinea in one hand, keeping it apart from my other money as a talisman, I passed a lottery-office. The devil prompted me, I believe, to risk my beloved piece of gold. I entered. "There is the price of a sixteenth," said I, telling down my money on the counter; "but, do me the favour to put that guinea on one side, because, whether I win or lose, I will come back and redeem that guinea to-morrow." The office-keeper laughed at the singularity of the request, but promised to attend to it. I went home, but said nothing to my mother.

The next morning I returned to the lottery-office, and found myself the gainer of a sixteenth of £20,000! I received back my guinea with joy indescribable: I was so foolishly attached to it that I had a small morocco case made for it, in which I enclosed it; and I swore, that it and I should never part again.

With my gains in the lottery, I embarked in sundry commercial speculations. I was lucky, and at the end of two or three years was worth twenty thousand pounds.

My mother—my ever kind provident mother, begged me to invest this sum, and live upon the interest of it, with her and a wife of my own choosing. But, no! all her advice was useless: fortune had turned my brain—I thought myself doomed to be lucky—I entered into larger speculations; they failed—and I was ruined!

On the receipt of this intelligence, my dear mother was seized with an apoplectic stroke: her life was saved by her medical attendants, but she remained a paralytic—living only in mind and sensibility. Her body was dead.

All my household goods were sold by my creditors: I had not a sou left. As I could no longer support my poor mother, I used the little remaining influence I had with my friends, and got her admitted as a patient in a hospital. The ticket of admission arrived; but how to get her conveyed thither—there was the difficulty! I had not a farthing! I had nothing left me in the world but my mother's love—a sorry coin to give to those sordid beings who knew not its value. In this agony of despair, I tore open drawer after drawer in an old desk which the mercy of my creditors had left me; and on opening the last, I saw my cherished guinea, which had escaped their Argus-eyes.

I descended the staircase three stairs at a time: I do not know how I got to the bottom;—but when I was there, I sent for a hackney-coach. I assisted my poor mother—my revered mother, into it: my last guinea, that guinea which she had given me in her pride and in her joy, served to convey her to her death-bed in a hospital, in her humiliation, in her sorrow!

My poor mother!

STEAM AND GAS.

AMONG the physical agents which, by stimulating our curiosity in the examination of their qualities and habits, are wisely appointed to minister to our necessities and our enjoyments, there are none, perhaps, which have exercised the ingenuity or tested the patience of man with happier results than water and coal.

Steam and gas furnish decisive and beautiful illustrations of what untiring perseverance is capable of accomplishing. They exhibit some of the elements of nature brought into a state of combination that fits them, if left uncontrolled, to spread terror and death; but, when under proper management, we behold them in such a state of subjection, that it may be literally said, "A little child may lead them." So intimately associated are steam and gas with our own age and country, their properties and capabilities occupy so large a portion of public attention in almost every part of the civilised world, that we think we cannot introduce more interesting subjects for contemplation than are suggested by some of the modes of employing the one and of preparing the other. All that we intend at present is a few general remarks: let these be viewed as introductory to more elaborate accounts.

The active properties exhibited by steam; and by which it is so eminently adapted for a motive power in machinery, are due entirely to heat. It is not worth while to attempt a solution of the question, "What is heat?" because we believe the endeavour would only be a waste of time. Heat may be an elementary substance, existing, in some cases, independently of matter; or it may be a condition of matter, and inseparable from it, yet influencing its forms, and producing in its changes, with a degree of certainty that is equalled only by its extraordinary energies. From what we know of heat, by its effects, we may affirm that it is a highly refined—an all pervading—and an irresistible agent. It is known to us only as it is combined with the diversified forms of matter; and we know nothing of matter unassociated with heat. With this ignorance respecting the nature of heat, it seems we must at present be contented.

Steam is water in a very minutely divided state, by which division it is capable of containing, and of carrying along with it, under particular circumstances, to any required distance, a greater quantity of heat than when in its ordinary state as a liquid. But whilst this capacity for heat, as manifested by water in a state of vapour, is one cause of its great utility, it possesses another peculiarity not less important—viz., the facility with which a certain portion of the heat may be separated from the water with which it had been temporarily combined; the steam, by a very simple expedient, instantaneously assuming the liquid form, and the heat as quickly disappearing and taking up its abode in some other material.

Heat and water, then, are the primary sources of motion in those wonderful combinations of machinery, denominated the steam-engine. At no very distant period, it will be our business to show how these powerful agents co-operate in producing these results which, while they excite our admiration, should also awaken our gratitude.

Turn we now, for a few moments to gas, which, like the steam, owes its existence to heat. In a general sense, gas implies those substances which retain their æriform state under ordinary circumstances of temperature and pressure. We shall limit our observations at present to coal gas, that being the material to which we alluded in a former part of this article, and which is now so extensively employed as a medium of artificial light.

We mentioned above, as a valuable property of steam, that a part of the heat it contained could be so easily separated from it, entering into some other material, and leaving the water as it found it—that is, in a liquid state. A property the very reverse of this, is possessed by coal gas. The inflammable and luminous elements which enter into combination with heat, in the formation of this curious substance, retain so firm a grasp of each other, if we may be allowed the expression, that neither cold nor pressure of any ordinary kind, will separate them. Hence is it, that gas may be stored and kept ready for use, and transmitted with certainty, both as respects time and quantity, to any distance from the place where it is produced. To those who have never thought much upon this subject, it may appear strange that a part of the heat, and consequently of the light emanating from gas, burning several miles distant from the manufactory, is the very same heat and light which, a few hours before, had been produced by the combustion of coal and coke. Such, however, is the fact. The heat arising from the ignited fuel, passing through the retort, and combining with certain elements in the coal, constitutes gas, whether stored for use, or immediately passed into the mains,—finds its way, in a little time, to the burner, whether in a street-lamp, a shop, or a theatre; but wherever it makes its appearance in a stage of ignition, it there yields up a part of the heat received at the manufactory;—its elements are transformed, scattered hither and thither, and are thus prepared for new combinations in the economy of the universe.

FRENCH CHARACTERS CARICATURED.

NO. X.—THE AGENT FOR STOLEN GOODS.

"PRAY take a seat, Madam! What is it that procures me the honour of this visit? I am not conceited enough to suppose that your call is based upon any other motive than a mere matter of business; you will therefore excuse me for receiving you in my public-office, and at a desk covered with a heap of papers, calculated to alarm the Graces. Do you come, Madam, to obtain information relative to a pannie? We call a burglary by that name."

"I am aware of all the slang terms, sir," replies the lady: "the Gazette des Tribunaux gives us all the information we require in that respect."

"Probably you have been the victim of a smasher," says the Agent; "and that is an individual who obtains his livelihood by—"

"I am perfectly well acquainted with the fact, that a smasher is a person who passes base coin," cries the lady.

"Probably you have been plundered by a morning lark, madam?" continues the Agent. "That is a person—"

"I know who he is, sir, also, thanks to the journal to which I alluded just now. He is the robber who introduces himself into hotels and inns, under pretence of having an appointment with a friend whom he is to arouse early, and who runs off with anything on which he can lay his hands."

"Upon my word, madam, I must compliment you upon your profound knowledge of the flash language. Such a knowledge is highly creditable to a lady, and proves the excellent taste of the present age with respect to literature. Talking of the morning lark, however, reminds me that a most remarkable piece of information has been communicated to me. A robber introduced himself into the house of one of the popular actresses of the day. He knew not to whose dwelling accident had thus directed him; but he soon relieved himself of his ignorance, for he perceived the name of the lady written upon a note which lay as yet unopened upon her table. Close to the note, lay a beautiful watch set with diamonds; and in the middle of the table a magnificent nosegay of flowers. Which of all those things do you suppose he took?"

"The watch most probably," says the lady.

"No such thing, madam!" ejaculates the Agent: "he took a simple flower—one single flower from that nosegay which stood upon the table."

"Who then could have known that he visited the house?" demands the lady.

"The indiscreet young man carried his joke to such an extent as to return to the same house on the following morning. The actress met him upon the stairs, and cried out, 'Thieves! thieves!' The young man was too proud to deny his real profession; but the magistrates would not believe that his conduct could have been so disinterested—that he had only taken the flower on the previous day, and that he had only returned to take another. The family of the young man have accordingly given me instructions to find out whether the prisoner has ever acted in a similar manner on any other occasion; and one of our best barristers is engaged to defend the prisoner, on the ground that he is afflicted with the monomania of going to people's houses to steal flowers. Probably it is relative to a similar thing that you have called upon me, madam?"

"No, sir," replies the lady; "I am not sufficiently fortunate to have any young man call at my house the first thing in the morning. The object of my visit to you is to inform you that I have been the victim of a common cut-purse."

"The most common—the most vulgar—the most disgraceful of all robbers!" ejaculates the Agent, in deep indignation. "The cut purse possesses not the slightest elevation of ideas—the slightest feeling of delicacy in his soul! That is the system of robbery in all its nudity, without embellishment or ornament. I am possessed of all the names of those practitioners: they are despised by the more elevated class of thieves."

"Well, sir," says the lady, "to come to the point—I have been robbed of a Bank-note for a thousand francs, which was taken out of my reticule."

"I can arrange this affair for you, madam: the thief is one of my friends."

"Can I have back my Bank-note, and ascertain who took it from me?" demands the lady.

"Nothing is more easy!" answers the Agent; "give me fifteen hundred francs for my trouble, and to-morrow morning the thief shall return you the Bank-note, and leave his card at your house."

"Fifteen hundred francs! Why—your terms are exorbitant!" ejaculates the lady.

"I really ask you little more than my absolute expenses in this affair," says the Agent. "No one can tell the tremendous outlay which it is necessary to make in these kind of affairs. If we do not come to an understanding together, I shall lose my consultation fees. A hundred persons a-day come to my office, and I make them all the same advantageous offers which I have just submitted to your consideration, these people hesitate—reflect—and abandon the matter—and all that time, the expenses of my office are going on. Would you believe, that I am compelled to keep upwards of ten thousand thieves? When they have no occupation, I am obliged to provide them all with food, and money, and clothing?"

"What? do you keep an ordinary for the robbers of Paris, then?" asks the lady.

"Ordinary is not exactly the word!" ejaculates the Agent; "but I am constrained to provide for all those gentlemen some-how or other. When they transact any business, they are compelled, upon a principle of honour, to let me know the nature of it; and I in my turn, give the necessary information to the person plundered. If the person cares anything about the article stolen, he must first pay its value to the thief;—this is but right, possession being nine points of the law,—and it is the law that says so. Then I must have fifty per cent. for my trouble; and this mode of doing business will explain to you, madam, wherefore I demand of you the sum of fifteen hundred francs in this instance."

"But I shall be better off to put up with my first loss of a thousand francs!" says the lady.

"Better off, indeed!" cries the Agent; "why—only think of the humiliation to which you will be subject in your own mind, by not obtaining possession of your note again; whereas, should you recover it, the robber will be the person humiliated, and you can boast of your success wherever you go. You are not obliged to tell people upon what terms you recovered this note: I will even allow you to invent and circulate the most pathetic tale you choose, with respect to the matter. You may say, for example's sake, that you met the robber upon the New-Bridge, that he endeavoured to avoid you by plunging into the river, but that you, who can swim as well as a sprat, threw yourself in after him, and that as you dived together you fished the Bank-note out of his pocket. I swear to you by my gray hairs (I have none, but I might have) or by anything else of any other colour, that I will not contradict your statement in the public journals—not even in those in which I am accustomed to advertise, and which will therefore say anything for me."

"I am delighted with your disinterestedness," says the lady, "but must beg to decline the arrangement proposed. The first loss is the best!"

WATER VERSUS ALCOHOL.

THE testimony of the Right Honourable Earl Stanhope to the good effects of Total Abstinence from all Intoxicating Liquors, is as follows. "I adopted the practice of total abstinence towards the close of the year 1831, when I suffered, as I had done occasionally, from a weakness of the stomach and a want of appetite. Since that time I have steadily adhered to that habit; and I find that my general health has in consequence been very much improved, and that it has very rarely been requisite for me to take any medicine, and then only such as is mild in its nature and moderate in its quantity. The powers of my digestion are vigorous, as well as my appetite; and I never feel heavy or heated after dinner, but am as fit for bodily and mental exertion in the evening as in the morning. Although I often expose myself to all varieties of weather, I hardly ever catch cold, and the complaints to which I am sometimes, though very seldom, subject, never assume an inflammatory character. My bodily strength is increased, instead of being diminished, by drinking only water, and I consider that my mental faculties are far less liable to be disturbed than was formerly the case. From the numerous advantages I have received, notwithstanding my advancing years, I cannot too much recommend water-drinking for the health and strength both of the mind and of the body, and consequently for the enjoyment of life, and for the performance of its duties. I am aware that spirituous liquors may seem to give a temporary stimulus to the strength and to the appetite; but in both these respects they are very injurious, for the body is thus urged to exertions which are beyond its powers, and which are followed by exhaustion and debility; and the stomach may thus receive more than it is well able to digest. It is a very salutary, and, as I have found, a very important precept, not to eat to the full extent of the natural and usual appetite: and of course, then, more caution is necessary when the appetite is factitious and exceeds the powers of digestion. The stimulus which such liquors may, for a time, give to the spirits, is also prejudicial, and is followed by corresponding depression; but I have derived very great benefit by taking an effervescent powder, like that of lemon and kali, when in a state of lassitude, or when the spirits require to be revived."

Mr. Fox, of Argyle-street, London, speaking of the effects of spirituous liquors upon the teeth, says—"The teeth acquire a very stained and foul appearance; the gums being more or less inflamed, are covered with a slimy mucus, and are often liable to bleed; the breath also becomes very offensive; and as the regular passage of the spirituous liquors over the tender skin of the mouth creates a constant degree of inflammation, the heat of the mouth is greatly increased. Thus by the baneful influence of intemperance, similar mischief to the teeth is induced, as might only be expected from a malady which threatens life."

The learned Dr. Lee, of New York, says that he has tried alcohol in most of the forms in which it is used, and under the circumstances in which it has been supposed to be innocent, if not useful; and he now conscientiously declares that he has never received any benefit from it. "As a restorative, in cases of fatigue," he observes, "it was truly a mocker—appearing, for a short time, to give strength, but always inducing greater lassitude and debility, when its first effect had subsided and placing the system in that condition in which it could not sustain extra exertion, without great exhaustion. After abandoning the use of alcoholic drinks, I found my general health improved." The whole system of using intoxicating liquors has been raised and supported by a monstrous delusion, which the good advocacy of Teetotalism tends to dissipate. Ignorance of the real effects of intoxicating drinks has encouraged their use as much as the love of them; and, therefore, when the disciples of Teetotalism, upon the authority of thousands of medical and learned men, shall have proven that alcoholic liquor is neither useful, necessary, nor beneficial—but, on the contrary, noxious, demoralizing, and unhealthy, the reasonable portion of the community will be induced to adopt the principle of total abstinence. Rostan, a celebrated French writer, has recorded the following sentiments:—"Water is, beyond all question, the most rational drink—that of which man made use in times of primeval manners. Abstemious persons are not pale and weak, as supposed: this effect only occurs when water is drunk to excess. Those who take it in moderation enjoy, to a very high degree, all the faculties, as well moral as intellectual, and often attain advanced age." Van Swieten, physician to Maria Theresa, Empress of Austria, and author of Commentaries upon Boerhave, says, "Miserable is the condition of those who daily indulge themselves in the use of wine and spirits, for a fatal necessity of repeating them then follows; and at length, almost the whole system of the vital and animal actions depends upon a continuance of them." Dr. Oliver, Professor of the Theory and Practice of Medicine at Dartmouth College, America, says, "Who has not observed the extreme satisfaction which children derive from quenching their thirst with pure water; and who that has perverted his appetite for drink by stimulating his palate with bitter beer and sour cider, rum and water, and other beverages of human invention, but would be a gainer even on the score of animal gratification, without any reference to health, if he would bring back his vitiated taste to the simple relish of nature? Children drink because they are dry; grown people drink whether dry or not, because they have discovered a way of making drinking pleasant. Children drink water because this is a beverage of nature's own brewing, which she has made for the purpose of quenching a natural thirst. Grown people drink anything but water, because this fluid is intended to quench only a natural thirst, and natural thirst is a thing which they seldom feel."

ORIENTAL FRAGMENTS.—No IV.

BY JAMES SILK BUCKINGHAM.

ARRIVAL AT SUEZ.—FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18TH.—We were roused before sunrise, and taking our breakfast on the sands, without the walls, loaded our little caravan and departed, taking leave of the venerable old Moosa Abdallah, and the Bedouin boys, who continued their route easterly, to pass round the arm of the Red Sea above Suez, while we branched off more southerly towards the town.

An hour after setting out, we reached another enclosed building, but of a much ruder kind, the interior of which I did not see, although we alighted for that purpose, as the occupants of it refused to open the doors without a positive order from the Aga himself. Without the walls was a large trough, out of which our camels drank, though the water was blacker, and of a stronger smell, than the foulest bilge-water I had ever seen. The bitter, dry, and thorny herbs on which these creatures fed in the desert, and their capability of swallowing water like this, surprised me even more than the fatigues and privations they have the power of sustaining in their desert marches.

On leaving this building or watering-place, the scenery gradually improved. The high mountains of the Adaga on our right were grand and picturesque; the sea opened to our view; and the town, the harbour, and part of Suez, with the few vessels at anchor there, were all interesting objects, after so monotonous a journey in point of scenery as ours had been.

We reached Suez about ten o'clock, and alighted at the Okella of the Greeks, but finding there neither accommodation for ourselves or camels, we waited immediately on Hassan Aga, the governor, to whom I presented my letter from the Kiah Bey, the Pasha's representative at Cairo. My reception was extremely favourable, and I was offered a seat beside him on the same sofa, an explanation as to the motive of my disguise having removed the prejudicial impression created by the appearance of my Bedouin dress.

After an hour's conversation on the affairs of Europe, the state of the war in Arabia, and other topics of mutual inquiry, an officer was directed to show me a room in an adjoining house, where I took up my quarters for a short stay, and had reason to be pleased with its situation, as it received the cool breezes of the north-east, and overlooked the small harbour for boats abreast of the town. It was soon furnished with our own mat and cooking-utensils, neither chairs nor tables being known here; and the luxuries of undressing and enjoying a clean change of linen were of the highest kind.

After dining on a rice pilau at noon, I passed three or four hours agreeably in rambling through the town; and the evening was spent with the governor, whose divan was filled with visitors of all classes: soldiers, merchants, traders from Yemen, and Arabs from all parts of the surrounding country. Even Phannose paid his respects to the governor in person, filled his pipe, and was served with coffee by the men in waiting; but he persisted in his motive being rather to take care of me, than to gratify himself. Upon the whole, indeed, I had much reason to be pleased with my reception and entertainment by the governor, Hassan Aga, who was more polite and intelligent than the generality of Turks in corresponding situations.

TOWN OF SUEZ.—FEBRUARY 19TH.—I was visited, very early in the morning, by an old Arab, of Suez, who spoke a few words in English, and who showed me some Grammatical Exercises in that language, with corresponding phrases in Turkish and Arabic, written by a Mr. John Jones, supercargo at this port, for the house of Forbes and Company, at Bombay, some few years since; as well as by a Greek captain of a vessel, who had been in London, and who spoke Italian very intelligibly; and obtaining from Hassan Aga, the governor, one of his soldiers as a guide, I was accompanied by those three in my walks through the town, to which I devoted most of the day, examining its interior, as well as making the circuit of its walls.

As a station for transporting the merchandise of the Red Sea to Cairo, and shipping off supplies of grain from Egypt to Arabia, considering the limited extent of the trade at the present moment, Suez answers the purpose most effectually; but as a town, scarcely any assemblage of houses, to which that name is given, can be imagined less deserving it. Situated on a point of land, faced by shallows toward the sea, and having a wide desert behind it, not a tree, a bush, or a blade of verdure, is anywhere to be seen. It has been recently enclosed with miserable walls, formed of stones loosely piled together, without cement, and having a range of loop-holes for musketry; though one need only be within ten paces of them, to be convinced that they would fall before the first discharge of half a dozen field-pieces. This wall surrounds it on three sides, leaving it open toward the north-east, where are the wharves for loading, and the scale for the boat harbour. The whole circuit of the town is, however, less than two British miles, its greatest length being north-west and south-east, and its shape irregular.

The many open spaces within the walls of Suez, unoccupied by buildings, leave little more than five hundred separate houses, among which are a great number ruined by the French, during the campaign in Egypt; others forming the temporary operations of strangers, and others again used only as magazines for merchandise. Like the majority of their dwellings at Cairo, the basements are built of hewn free-stone, above which wooden balconies project into the street, resting on the ends of stone beams, and the upper parts of the walls are built either of unbaked brick, or wood, with latticed windows, in the Arabic style. The lower door-ways, too, are generally surmounted with the carving and pointed arch of the Saracenic age, and appear to have been originally well finished. There are, proportioned to its size, an equal number of starving dogs, ragged Arabs, ugly women, and filthy children, as in this metropolis of Egypt itself; and its general resemblance of aspect proves its close affinity to the capital, as no colony could preserve the features of its great original in a more unadulterated manner than they are displayed here.

Although there is nothing at Suez which can deserve the name of a fortification, a company of forty or fifty soldiers are stationed here, and eight or ten pieces of cannon are mounted in different directions; but, like all the Turkish artillery I have yet seen, they are little calculated for show, and still less for service. Three mosques, and one small Greek chapel, are all the places of worship in the town; and these offer the best guide as to the proportion of numbers between the Mahomedan and Christian worshippers who visit them for devotion.

The fixed resident population, I have been assured from various quarters, does not exceed one thousand persons, employed as tradesmen, merchants, mechanics, porters, &c., while there are frequently in the town from two to ten thousand strangers, arriving either in caravans from Egypt, or in vessels from Arabia, and consisting of persons as varied as the quarters from whence they come; but as these are almost invariably the bearers of their own provisions, neither scarcity, nor an increased circulation of money, attend their arrival or departure, more particularly as their stay seldom exceeds a few days.

The first great necessity of life, and one for which so few substitutes can be found, is as deficient in quantity as it is disagreeable in taste. Every drop of water consumed here, except that used by camels, is brought in skins from wells in the neighbouring deserts, and from the opposite coast of Arabia; the summer price being about threepence per skin, though by strangers it can only be drunk either in coffee, wine, or spirits; the two last of which are articles scarcely ever to be found here, at any price. Although their supplies of the best Egyptian wheat are always regular, they make worse bread here than in any part of the East; and nothing but extreme hunger could make it palatable. No other meat than mutton is sold, and this is coarse, tough, lean, and exorbitantly dear; fowls, five piastres, or a dollar each; eggs ten paras, or threepence each; milk and butter, brought only to the governor and his officers; and fish, though said to abound in this sea, of bad quality, and extremely scarce. Under such circumstances, it is rather to be wondered at that its stationary inhabitants are not still less in number: but what are the privations to which the pursuit of gain will not reconcile men?—or the severer dictates of necessity enable them to bear?

Our evening was passed again at the governor's, in as large a company, and as agreeably as the preceding one. By turning the conversation on localities, the inhabitants were flattered, and at the same time, furnished me with many interesting particulars, with which I could only have become acquainted by indirect inquiry.

REVIEWS.

John Chinaman. Number 1. Svo. pp. 32. London: W. Brittain.

THIS is a very singular publication, and one which will doubtless attract a considerable share of public notice. It contains a lucid description of the opium trade; and proves that both English and Chinese are wrong in the manner in which they have conducted this affair. The publication is a species of Magazine, or Miscellany devoted to Chinese subjects, and contains two or three papers which are excellently written. We have both prose and verse; and of the latter we shall lay a specimen before our readers:—

"In his Lon-lon* chair Commissioner Lin
Leaned back, but not to repose;
For he switched his tail,
Like a thresher's flail,
And he twitched his rubicund nose:
And his foot he stamped on the porcelain floor,
As never a foot had been stamped before.
"If you call'th's words be true," he said,
"I stand a chance of losing my head."
So, after giving his nose a wipe,
He took seven puffs at his opium pipe.

"The Commissioner rose with an ominous start,
And his voice he raised on high:
Then the dong he smote till every part
Of the porcelain dome was shook thereby.
And again, and again, he called aloud,
Till around him gathered his menial crowd,
Who never before had seen such a grin
As adorned the cheeks of Commissioner Lin.
By each the Ko-row† was then deftly performed,
As the burly Commissioner raved and stormed;
At length he brake
The silence, and spake,
And his voice was as hollow and loud as a drum:
"Fe!—Fo!—Fi!—Fum!
I smell the breath of an Englishman:
Whether he be 'live, or whether he be dead,
I'll grind his bones to make my bread!"
This oath he swore—and then toddled to bed."

This—if intended as such—is an excellent burlesque upon Ingoldsby's Legends, which are themselves burlesques upon ancient chronicles. There is in this number, the first portion of "The Pirate, a Tale of Chinese justice;" and from this we extract the following description of a shipwreck:—

"And, in obedience to the haul, the main-yard sprung round, the straining ropes yielded through their sheaves, and as the vessel veered upon a weather tack, the mainsail filled again, and she dipped her chains into the whitened foam beneath. So far all was safe, and the hands were immediately employed to clear the fragments which encumbered the rigging aloft. The setting sun now became obscured with dark and lurid clouds, the gusts in the weather beam pealed louder and louder, while to the leeward the dark and rugged mountain land became more fearfully apparent. The captain saw immediately the dangers which awaited him, and was on the point of giving orders for another tack, when a vivid flash of lightning struck the main-mast and shivered the iron-bound spar, which, reeling, fell overboard into the yawning gulf beneath. A dozen hatchets in a few seconds cleared it from the rattlins, and once more the vessel righted on the waves. At this instant, a shout was raised on the fore-castle, breakers a-head, to which it was evident the ship, now almost unmanageable, was drifting with the current and the tide; and as it neared the roaring reef, inevitable destruction appeared the only alternative. 'Then shrieked the timid, and stood still the brave.' It was now that the fearful reality of their danger burst upon them, as they perceived the vessel drifting mid-channel of a current which poured and rushed in gushing foam between the dark and mountainous reef; in a few moments they were passed, only to encounter a danger more appalling. The sudden gusts of wind gave no steady power to her canvass, and in passing the shoal the rudder was unshipped. Thus there was no chance of escape, except in the merciful dispensation of that Providence, which directs even the fall of a sparrow. Dismantled and disabled, The Lady Anne, 'mid darkness and breakers, on a strange coast, was borne towards land, and before anything more could be done, a heavy swell of the tide dashed the vessel on the beach, and the next moment retiring, left her high and dry on shore. The tempest raged fearfully during the night, but when the morning dawned all was peace and calm, and but for the wreck before them, the poor mariners might have been unconscious of the events of the evening. At an early hour the beach was crowded with a troop of Chinese from a neighbouring village, whose kindly offices were proffered and gladly accepted by the sufferers. Every comfort, such as China hospitality can provide, was lavishly expended; and when these were afforded, arrangements were entered into for the sale of the vessel and its stores, which has effected; and the bargain being concluded, a junk was hired to convey the crew to Macao."

An Address to the Working Classes on the Advantages of Total Abstinence. By JOHN BEATON. 12mo. pp. 23. London: Shaw and Sons.

THIS is a very clever, though perfect unpretending little pamphlet, and will doubtless effect much good in the Teetotal world. We shall select a few paragraphs for extract, and thus afford specimens to justify our favourable opinion of the work:—

"Teetotalism will make you a more temperate, a more enlightened, and a more moral class of men, and in proportion as you become temperate, enlightened, and moral, so will you be respected. It is the only ground upon which you can reasonably demand political power, and it is the only ground upon which no government can refuse your demands."

No one can resist the force of the following very excellent argument:—

"The principle of life is the same in a horse as a man. Is not that animal capable of the severest labour? Are not the muscles finely developed? And what does it live upon? Solid food and water. Can any argument be more convincing than this, that the more simple the fluids taken into the stomach, the better for health and vigour. We all know and admit that if men gorge enormously, they require a stimulating drink to force the action of the stomach—but avoid the first evil, and there will be no necessity for the second."

We conclude this notice of a very excellent Address to the working classes with the following judicious observations:—

"You are all aware that the drinker's loss does not end with his money; there is his time, his health, his independence, his character, his domestic comfort. Now, if the man who is in the habit of drinking freely intoxicating liquors, at once discontinues the practice, he will in the first place save his money, and employ his time in earning more, thus producing a double advantage; he will find his health improved, his character respected, the real comforts of life at his command, and his labour always in demand as a man to be relied upon. The blessings that flow to the wife and family of a temperate man are inconceivable to those who have never experienced them; in such families you generally meet with peace and contentment, and, however moderate their income, a portion is frequently saved, which gives a humble independence to the character of the individuals, and protects them against the tyranny of arbitrary employers."

Sacramental Wines. BY ANDREW GILMOUR. Minister of the Reformed Presbyterian Congregation of Grenock. 12mo. pp. 64. Glasgow: G. Gallie; London: J. Pasco.

THE "Wine Question" (as the subject of the fermented or unfermented wines of the Hebrews is generally denominated in the Teetotal world) has so long agitated the disciples of and opponents to the doctrine of entire abstinence from all inebriating liquors, that the profound and learned disquisition now before us will prove most welcome to the friends of Teetotalism, as being calculated to settle the dispute. Whether the generality of the Hebrew wines were intoxicating or not, we care but little; being well convinced that the Saviour neither countenanced nor created such deleterious moral and physical poisons. The reasoning in this work is ingenious. The author begins by showing that many Hebrew substantives are direct derivatives from verbs expressing some characteristic or quality belonging to those substantives: thus lion is derived from a verb expressing "to snatch, or seize suddenly;" eagle comes from a verb meaning "to lacerate, or tear;" and wine emanates from a verb signifying "to squeeze." From this fact, it is fair to presume that the Hebrew word wine means only "the expressed juice of the grape;" and this supposition is borne out by many paragraphs quoted from Scripture by the Rev. Mr. Gilmour. Wine, in the Bible, is often alluded to as a blessing; but, were it that wine which intoxicates, it would have been spoken of as a curse. And indeed, in several instances it is thus alluded to, especially in the Book of Proverbs. "It brought disgrace upon Noah," says our author; "and stained the fair fame of Lot. It has proved, in the most emphatic sense of the expression, that, whatever those who indulge in it may think of it at the moment, 'at the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder.'" That there were two kinds of wines existing amongst the Hebrews, is therefore evident; and hence it is fair to conclude that the sacramental wine used by the Saviour was the unfermented wine, that is the unintoxicating juice of the grape, which is either drunk before fermentation has taken place, or in which that fermentation is prevented by due precaution. Altogether, this is a most excellent publication, and one for which the Teetotal world should sincerely thank Mr. Gilmour. Especially were we struck by the truly unpretending and christian feeling in which it is written—the calmness of the reasoning, and yet the clearness and precision with which all the arguments are advanced. The style of the work is perspicuous and correct,—chaste where ornament is proper,—harmonious in the structure of sentences, and mellifluous in the flow of periods,—animated and dignified where the topics admit of animation and dignity,—and never descending below the horizon of good sense, right taste, and sound judgment. The subject is illustrated by all the labours of diligence, and by all the resources of learning.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

SHREWSBURY.

A GENTLEMAN of this town, whose initials are J. M., has addressed to us a most feeling letter, in which he describes his conversion to the doctrines of Teetotalism through the agency of a lady. It appears that the sermon upon Teetotalism, lately preached at the Surrey Chapel by the Rev. Mr. SHERMAN, was the principal system of reasoning made use of by the lady; and its effects were almost immediate. J. M. deeply regrets "that he has not before given the moral aid of his example to so good a cause, which has been the means of rescuing thousands from wretchedness and woe." An extract from a letter written by the lady to J. M. before his conversion, is now given, as a specimen of the zeal with which the fair sex are advocating the principles of Teetotalism:—"By partaking of intoxicating liquors, you more or less sanction drunkenness. By abstaining, you may reclaim the drunkard,—nay, farther, you may be the means of saving a soul from death. Will you dare drink any more, when you compare the worth of an immortal soul with a glass of intoxicating drink?"

We before alluded to the first Teetotal meeting ever held at Hopton, a place upon the Holyhead-road, and a few miles distant from Shrewsbury. During the last few weeks, several more meetings have taken place there; and Mr. DRAYTON has on all occasions proved the most zealous and effective advocate. Due praise must also be accorded to MESSIEURS BROWN, GRANT, EDWARDS, and JONES. The second Teetotal meeting at Hopton was held on Monday, the 8th instant. The Chapel was literally crammed to excess. The audience was most impressively addressed by the Rev. H. TURNER (a clergyman of the Established Church), and by MESSIEURS CORFIELD, DRAYTON, &c. Mr. Drayton in particular seemed to rivet the attention of this rural audience: he is very justly termed the "Father Mathew of Shrewsbury." Altogether, the cause progresses most favourably at Shrewsbury, Hopton, and the vicinity.

MANCHESTER.

A NEW place of meeting has been opened in Wilmott-street, Hulme. On the initiative night, Mr. BOUTON, the respected Treasurer to the Manchester District Temperance Society, presided; and MESSIEURS LOMAX, POLLARD, GARRILL, &c., addressed the audience. On Sunday evening the 7th instant, Mr. LOMAX commenced a course of lectures in the meeting-room of the New Blakely-street Branch, upon his "twenty-one reasons for becoming a Teetotaler." Upwards of three hundred signatures have been obtained within a few weeks at this place of reunion. Mr. BIRCH lately delivered a lecture in the assembly-room of the Every-street Branch. The new Executive Committee of the Manchester Society are determined to burst the chains of party-spirit, and to keep Teetotalism distinct, as it should be, from Religion and Politics.

BRADFORD (YORKSHIRE).

ON Monday, February 8th, an excellent meeting took place at Undercliffe, in this district, Mr. BOOTH in the chair. MR. WOOLER (a reformed drunkard) stated that since he had emancipated himself from the chains of intemperance, his fears of the Sheriff and his officers were removed also. The alcohol was extracted from half a pint of beer, and burnt. The landlord of a public-house then came forward and honestly declared that he knew that Teetotalism was good, and that if he could obtain any other decent employment, he would abandon the sale of intoxicating liquors. Such a statement did honour to this man; and we are proud to record it in the columns of The Teetotaler. Another meeting took place at the Centenary Chapel, Bolling, on February 9th, on which occasion another reformed drunkard addressed the audience, and explained the details of his experience as a "drinker" and as a Teetotaler. He declared that when he now took an inventory of his cupboard, he found beef instead of red herrings, and comforts in addition to bare necessities. He beheld smiles upon the countenances of his wife and children. We hope that our correspondent, Mr. BULMER, will often favour us with a letter.

GREAT MARLOW.

A public meeting was held in the Mission-house, Dean-street, on Tuesday, February 9th, which was crowded to excess. The Rev. J. W. BURNHAM was called to the chair. The meeting was addressed by MESSIEURS DAVIS, ROBERTS, COOPER, WILKS, &c.,

* Bamboo chair.

PICKWICK MARRIED.

CHAPTER VI.

A SHORT CHAPTER, IN WHICH VARIOUS LETTERS AND COMMUNICATIONS OF IMPORTANCE PASS BETWEEN SEVERAL HIGHLY INFLUENTIAL INDIVIDUALS.

SEVERAL days passed away, after the evening on which the luckless serenade took place; and Mr. Pickwick was finely laughed at by the Sago family when he called for the first time after that event. But as he had shown particular attention to Miss Teresina Hippolyta,—as he was reputed to be well off,—and as all prudent mammas are anxious to secure a good match for their daughters in these times of commercial embarrassment and agricultural distress,—and, lastly, as the minds of bachelors were generally supposed to be in an unsettled state, in consequence of the dreary aspect of the political horizon,—all these things being considered, I say, it is not to be wondered at if Mr. Pickwick were welcomed as cordially as ever in Wood-street, in spite of the disturbance of which he had been the author.

It was on the day of the ball, which Mr. Pickwick had promised to attend, that Mr. Samuel Weller presented his revered master with two letters which had arrived by the twopenny post. The contents of the first ran as follows:—

"My dear sir,—I have not sent for your reply to my proposals ere this, because I was determined to give you due time to reflect upon the immense advantages you will reap from embarking your money in the Bank of New Holland, and allowing your name to appear as a Director upon the prospectus of this establishment.

"Anxiously awaiting your reply,

"I remain, my dear sir,

"Yours most truly,

"JOSEPH SWINDLEHEM."

Mr. Pickwick read this letter aloud; and explained to his faithful attendant Sam, the nature of Mr. Swindlehem's propositions.

"Ay, I daresay he would be very well pleased to have both your name and your money," exclaimed Mr. Weller very seriously; "and rayther the money than the name too, may be. But jist let me answer this here little note: I know how to tackle them kind o' fellers, as the bandle said ven the charity-school boys broke out in rebellion."

Mr. Pickwick abandoned the letter to his valet, who forthwith indited the ensuing reply:—

"sir, i hain't no manner o' doubt in my mind but that you has the interest of me and pickwick and all on us wery much at art, and consekvently is exceedin' anxious to show us how to lay out money to advantage: there's a many wery philanthropic gen'lemen like you now existin' in the city, but I'm wery much afeard your admirayble views isn't dooly appreciated. This must be wery galling, as the jocky said ven the horse kicked cos o' the crupper. it would howsomever be wastly encroachin' of us as is strangers to you to okkipy your attention with our affares; and this needn't offend you, cos it's the wery same observation as the gen'leman made to Bloody Mary ven she asked him whether he'd rayther be hanged, beheaded, or burnt. so no more at present from your wery dewoted servant,

"SAMUEL VELLER."

While Sam was busily engaged in composing this note at a table in Mr. Pickwick's dressing room at the house of Mr. Snodgrass, the learned gentleman himself was conning the contents of the other letter he had received. Those contents were as follows:—

"Sir,—I have been fated during my scientific career to encounter many of those stumbling blocks with which ignorance so frequently bestrews the path of genius; but the keenest insult I have ever experienced was that which was offered to me at a time when I was about to give to the world, through the medium of the Mudfog Association, the results of my discoveries in Entomological Science. That insult, I received from Professor Grime, with whose unprofessional and ungentlemanly conduct I hasten to acquaint you, as you are yourself one of the corresponding members of that Association. The paper, which I have the honour to transmit to you, was read over to several gentlemen of profound information on the science to which it relates, and at the time I was not aware of the presence of Professor Grime: indeed, he was up to that moment unknown to me. I was interrupted—rudely interrupted by a strange chuckling noise resembling the gurgling of a choaking frog; and, looking round, I beheld the professor, his mouth hideously elongated, his cheeks puckered up like a dried Normandy pippin, his eyes starting from their sockets, and his whole visage distorted in a remarkable manner. Surprised and disgusted, I ceased reading, and cast on the Professor a look which might have checked any man not entirely dead to the finer feelings of our nature;—but, unabashed, he continued his hideous grimace. 'Sir,' cried I, my naturally harmonious voice rendered hoarse by resentment, 'sir, are you disposed to insult me?'—'Not at all,' was his reply, uttered with provoking coolness; but he smiled more hideously than before.—'What is there to provoke your derision, sir?' I cried: 'is there anything of a ludicrous nature in my paper?'—'Nothing,' replied he;—'but I was thinking that he who could write so lucidly on such a subject must be intimately acquainted with that animal which the immortal Shakspeare tells us is a familiar beast to man, and that indeed your very head must be a store-house for Entomological curiosities.'—My good genius interposed at the moment, or I should have annihilated the Professor,—or at all events have so far abridged his existence as to have knocked him into the middle of the next week. I however reined in my wrath and turned to my auditors, whom, to my horror, I found convulsed with laughter, two or three of them being literally black in the face. I saw that the Professor had his triumph: philosophy yielded to the cap and bells; I thrust my treatise into my pocket with something approaching to an oath, and vowed that the Mudfog Association should not be irradiated by any effort of mine. To be brief, I have determined upon submitting it to your judgment, sir, and hope that it will obtain for me an introduction to your especial notice.

"Your obedient and admiring servant,

"DIONYSIUS GRUBB,

"Professor of Entomology; Corresponding Member of the F. U. D. G. E. Society, &c. &c."

In the same envelope, which contained this epistle, was the invaluable treatise that had been so scurvily treated by Professor Grime. Mr. Pickwick hastened to place it before his eyes and spectacles; and we hasten to place it before our readers:—

"ENTYMOLOGICAL DISCOVERIES.

"I.—SCARABÆUS LONDINENSIS, Cuvier:
COAL-PORTER, Neumann.

"The most interesting specimens of this genus are found in great numbers near Whitefriars Docks. Their heads are characterised by a peculiar covering, which extends over the back, completely hiding and protecting the neck. The legs are party-coloured, and have a dusky white appearance towards the feet. This the insect sheds and renews hebdomadally. They live principally by absorption of liquids, having an apparatus peculiarly adapted to the purpose of suction. Cuvier was right in adopting the name given to these insects by Schamenberghen—hofsensedenigger, the only legitimate specimens of the creature being found in the metropolis.

"II.—SCARABÆUS PAROCHIALIS, Cuvier:
PARISH BEADLE, Neumann.

"The Scarabæus Parochialis is a dull heavy insect, but easily provoked, and, when irritated, becomes spiteful. Its prevailing colour is blue, and the edge of the wings are beautifully tipped with gold fringe, which on the older scarabæi of this genus is however less brilliant. Its head has two lateral projections terminating in points and ornamented by a gold border similar to that which appears on the wings. Its disposition, as we before remarked, is at times extremely irritable; and on a fine morning it may be seen flying at the boys across the churchyards, which it constantly haunts, especially on Sundays. Its dislike to paupers is a remarkable characteristic of this instinct, while it is equally notorious that it will plume itself, and express by animated flutterings its great delight at the approach of an over-aer or churchwarden. There is a species of this race of insect to be seen on some of the metropolitan bridges, or in Covent-Garden Market, &c. &c. This latter species resembles the former in all its respects save the lateral projections of the head, and is generally furnished with a dusky brown proboscis, the extremity of which is of a brilliant red. Like the legitimate species, it has a great antipathy to boys, and often attacks horses upon the bridges, and old women in the markets, with the ferocity of the gad-fly. A fine specimen of this insect may be seen on either London or Blackfriar's Bridge.

"III.—TIPULÆ, Cuvier:
TIPLERS, Neumann.

"Tipulæ are characterised by their lengthened and attenuated forms. They may be seen swarming round the Thomas and Jeremiah Shops on a fine summer's evening. The varieties are numerous. Specimens of various kinds may be found in the workhouses, the lunatic-asylums, the hospitals, the gaols, the hulks, the debtors' prisons, &c. They die off very rapidly, and are liable to a thousand terrible diseases.

"IV.—TEETOTALERÆ, Cuvier:
TEETOTALERS, Neumann.

"A fine insect, whose principal drink is water. These insects are quite distinct from the Tipulæ, and are never to be found near the haunts of the latter. They are active and laborious, like the bee, and gather provisions in summer against the winter. Their utility is great, and their length of life extraordinary.

"V.—HUMBUGÆ, Cuvier:
HUMBUGS, Neumann.

"A species of insect which has greatly increased within the last half century. They are a bold and obstinate insect, and are particularly fond of associating with the timid and the unwary. Their voracity is great; and whenever they make an inroad into the habitations of other insects, they never leave until they have consumed everything. A great many of them flock round the court of the sovereign, and some hundreds frequent the Houses of Parliament. Others have found their way into the offices of the journals, and the houses of the publishers, in the metropolis. They are not less attached to many banking-houses, insurance companies, and divers joint-stock companies, which have been lately started in London. Fine specimens of the genus of Humbugs may be seen in some of the government offices at the present time, particularly at the Treasury and the Horse-Guards."

Mr. Pickwick concluded the perusal of this entertaining paper with regret. There seemed to his capacious mind to be a great deal of sound judgment necessary to distinguish the various characteristics even of insects; and he felt anxious to form the acquaintance of Mr. Dionysius Grubb. He accordingly wrote a letter to that gentleman, to invite him to dinner on the following Sunday, as he was enabled to do just as he liked at the house of his friend Mr. Snodgrass.

(To be continued in our next.)

THE UNCERTAINTY OF THE EXISTENCE OF THE INTEMPERATE.

In Prout's Bridgewater Treatise we read the following excellent observations:—"Providence has gifted man with reason: to his reason therefore is left the choice of his food and drink, and not to instinct, as among the lower animals. It thus becomes his duty to apply his reason to the regulations of his diet, to shun excess in quantity, and all that is noxious in quality, to adhere in short to the simple and the natural, amongst which the bounty of his Maker has afforded him an ample selection; and beyond which if he deviates, sooner or later he will suffer the penalty." Actuated by these impressions, we select that substantial food which pleases our palates and benefits our frames; but we do not obey the same wise regulation with regard to drink. Mankind has long degraded his character, and destroyed his health by not using his discrimination in choosing wholesome liquors and eschewing poisons. Man will not eat arsenic; but he will drink alcohol! Arsenic produces an almost instantaneous effect upon the human frame; but alcohol is more slow, though not less fatal in the end; and hence does short-sighted man neglect a peril which is at a distance, while he avoids with horror the danger that is near.

"Intemperance," observes the author of Bacchus, "diminishes and finally destroys the vital powers—that property possessed by the human frame which may be denominated the self-preserving power of nature. The vital power is that mysterious influence which pervades all living matter, imparting life, vigour, and animation, in addition to the power of sustaining existence for a limited period." Having explained the principles and conditions of life, Mr. Grindrod continues thus:—"Intemperance thus shortens the duration of human life. Each act of indulgence decreases the energy and strength of the vital power, until at last the unhappy victim of strong drink falls an unavoidable and premature victim to his unnatural career." For man to have recourse to alcoholic liquors, is to fly in the face of his Maker, and wantonly abridge that existence which the Deity intended to extend to a certain period, if properly cared for.

In every twenty-four hours, the skin, upon an average, parts with twenty ounces of useless matter. This waste must be constantly supplied; and in addition to this medium of waste, there are other channels, which also demand restoration. The use of alcoholic liquor effectually prevents the organs of restoration from executing their duties in a healthy and suitable manner. Mr. Grindrod, speaking upon this subject, says,—"Intemperance in two ways injures the human system,—1st. in preventing the effectual separation of old and useless matter; and 2nd. in the new matter not being possessed of the healthy nature essential to proper restoration. In the one case, the system becomes laden with matter not possessing vitality, which consequently diminishes from its self-preserving powers: in the other, particles of crude matter are lodged in the system, and are injurious in their consequences in proportion to their unfitness to supply nutrition."

We cannot refrain from transferring to our columns the following appalling statements given in Bacchus:—"Medical men of experience in the metropolis are familiar with the fact that confirmed beer-drinkers in London cannot scratch their fingers without risk of their lives. A copious London beer-drinker is all one vital part. He wears his heart upon his sleeve, bare to a death-wound, even from a rusty nail or the claw of a cat. The worst patients brought into the metropolitan hospitals are those apparently fine models of health, strength, and soundness, the London dray-men. It appears that when one of these men receives a serious injury, it is always necessary to amputate, in order to give the patient the most distant chance of life." The dray-men have the unlimited privilege of the brewer's cellar. Sir Astley Cooper, on one occasion, was called to a dray-man—a powerful, fresh-coloured, healthy-looking man, who had suffered an injury in his finger from a small splinter of a stove. Suppuration had taken place in the wound, which appeared but of a trifling description. This distinguished surgeon, as usual, opened the small abscess with a lancet. Upon retiring, however, he ascertained that he had forgotten his lancet-case. Returning to recover it, he found his patient in a dying state. In a few hours the unfortunate man was a corpse. Every medical man in London above all things dreads a beer-drinker for his patient in a surgical case."

Some forty years ago there flourished a London dray-man of large proportions, a regular beer-bibber, and known by the name of Big Ben. Ben was reckoned one of the strongest men within the bills of mortality; and he was occasionally seen showing off as second in these prize-boxing matches which used to delight our moral and intelligent ancestors—those same ancestors who have handed down to us their drinking customs. When stripped of his upper garments, and engaged in the attitudes of this brutalizing sport, seldom or never had there been exhibited a frame so robust, or one which promised better to endure the shocks which might assail it. "There stands," you would have said, "an invulnerable giant: death will certainly find it no very easy matter to level him." Yet for all this apparent hearty strength, Ben was brought down by an injury which would not have seathed a child. One day his hand received a slight graze from the wheel of a passing carriage in the crowded street:—the skin was only ruffled! Ben wiped away the starting blood, and thought no more of the matter: in one week afterwards Big Ben was in his grave!

A clergyman in Leicestershire, some years ago, who was accustomed to drink his bottle of wine every day after dinner, and who at the age of sixty-three boasted that he had never had a day's illness of any kind in his life, shortly after this assertion trod upon a nail protruding from the floor of his bed-room. He merely grazed his heel the slightest thing in the world, and of course paid but little attention to that which appeared so trivial an incident. When he awoke in the morning, his leg was swollen, and his foot much inflamed. Poultries were applied to the wounded part. A medical attendant was summoned in the evening, and the wound was washed with a preparation of caustic. On the following evening amputation of the limb was declared necessary; and on the fourth morning after the occurrence of the accident, the patient died. A relative commented upon the uncertainty of human life when a nail would take it away. "You do not sufficiently extend your view of the causes of your friend's death," said the medical man; "the wound inflicted by the nail would have been harmless, had it not been for the bottle of Port wine which the patient drank every day after dinner. His life hung upon a thread; and although that thread remained unbroken for so many years, the slightest touch that was given to it, instantly snapped it. There are thousands—nay, millions of men, whose lives depend upon a no more certain tenure. And this horrible condition of existence is brought about by their own folly!" These observations produced such an effect upon the gentleman to whom they were addressed, that he instantly determined to abandon all intoxicating liquor: he has signed no pledge; but he has kept his word most faithfully since the period of his vow.

ON SUICIDE

POLONIUS.—Will you walk out of the air, my lord?
HAMLET.—Into my grave!

HAMLET.

I HAVE often observed how ambitious we weak mortals are to throw an air of grandeur over our designs, our thoughts, and our actions,—how desirous we are that the most insignificant of them should appear in public under an imposing exterior. And perhaps it is not to be wondered at, that we should do so: we naturally regard our thoughts and our actions as a sensitive parent does his children. We are partial to them as emanating from ourselves, and are ambitious that they should appear to advantage in the eyes of others. Yet as the fond father, who ostentatiously introduces his lubberly boy to his friend, as a prodigy, with the proud exclamation of "My son, sir!" is often cruelly mortified at seeing the said son turn out half an idiot; so a man is sometimes annoyed at seeing the contemptible nothingness of his favourite ideas, and his most studied actions, peeping out visibly from beneath the approved garb in which he has carefully endeavoured to clothe them. We often, however, succeed in dazzling the eyes of many; the éclat of an action will frequently prevent its cruelty or its injustice from being seen; the bold daring of a crime will in many cases eclipse its turpitude, as the beautiful colours of the rainbow will sometimes divert our attention from the shower which is wetting us to the skin. In all ages this desire has prevailed;—in all ages it has succeeded more or less. Who is more celebrated than Alexander the Great? Yet he was an unprincipled monarch! The victorious career of Sylla, and the apparent magnanimity of his resignation, cast a gloss over his crimes. Both he and Caius Marius are more often thought of as noble conquerors than as base assassins, as they were. In reading the triumphs of Cæsar and Pompey, we, even at this distant period, forget, as we read, that they deluged Rome with the blood of her best and bravest citizens. Cæsar in particular is regarded as a hero, while his victim, Cato, a far better man, is scarcely remembered, because he was vanquished; or, if he be remembered at all, it is with a feeling of contempt for his suicide—for that death which we regard in a far different light from the poet, who lauds the noble bellum of that last of the Romans! And to come down to our own times, how few, as they reflect upon the brilliant career of Napoleon, ever think of the waste of life which his conquests occasioned!

The love of fame has in many instances prompted a man to commit suicide, as it urged Erostratus to fire Diana's temple, although he knew that death would follow his exploit. What! is this longing after notoriety so deeply implanted in the human breast, that even if we cannot render ourselves conspicuous by the terror of our lives, we seek to make ourselves notorious by our manner of dying? There is a certain charm about this posthumous fame; and though these imitators cannot hope to rival the celebrity of Sappho or of Cato, yet there appears to be a certain degree of romance attached to suicide, which an acts upon certain persons as to induce them to commit a great crime for the sake of being talked of after they are dead, although they can never enjoy the fruits of their bold deed, even if it bear any.

The coroner who presided at the inquest on Lord Castlereagh was right, when he asserted it as his belief that every man who committed suicide was more or less under the influence of insanity. It must be so—even though the insanity be but momentary. Mere distress of mind cannot induce a man to give up all hopes in this world, and to rush unbidden, and reeking hot with crime, into the presence of his Maker:—his distress must first unbinge the mind upon which it acts, before a man can be reconciled to the idea of laying violent hands upon himself. Some men, it is true, commit suicide from apparently trivial causes; others will endure the most cruel misfortunes and deprivations, yet never think of committing suicide at all. This is the natural result of the different degrees of mental sensibility in different individuals, in consequence of which some people are as deeply affected by the death of a pet dog, as others are by the loss of a wife or a fortune.

Some people deny that there is any insanity in the matter, and maintain that it is a mark of courage to cut short our existence when we are overwhelmed with misfortune. What a miserable self-deception is this! There is far more real courage in breasting bravely the flood of misfortune, than is required to commit an act of self-destruction. If, again, the desire of making a noise in the world have some influence over the diseased mind of the suicide, how miserably is he deceived in his expectations! If the suicide could but dream in his grave, to which he has hurried himself, of the ill-natured remarks to which his crime gives rise, he would be ready to rise from his blood-stained tomb with indignation!

Many individuals imagine that when a sensitive and high-wrought spirit has received some irreparable wound, it is a deed of noble daring to seek a speedy relief from intolerable sufferings in the forgetfulness of the tomb. Weak, unfortunate man! Does the suicide hope to find in death the oblivion which he seeks? How dearly will he purchase one little moment of forgetfulness when the day of judgment shall arouse him from his tomb and reveal his condemnation to eternal woes! Empidocles in ancient times, and a young English nobleman a few years ago, plunged into the crater of Vesuvius: the flames of that mount were but a small foretaste of the fires of hereafter!

I do not mean to offer an excuse for suicide on the ground of insanity: far from it. I look upon it as a crime—a great, a crying crime. The high, the noble, and the good, have destroyed themselves, it is true—and a lamentable fact it is, that by so doing they have encouraged others to follow their example. Even granting that the suicide be insane at the very moment of committing the dreadful act, he is still criminal in not having resisted feelings, often criminal in themselves, which have brought him to such a state. Napoleon Bonaparte issued an ordinance in respect to suicide, and declared that to "fly from a misfortune without resisting it is the same as abandoning the field of battle without having conquered."

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE PAST.

By Robert Styles.

Ere chaos into order rose,
And matter from its dark repose,
Roused by the voice of God,
Form'd sea and continent, and Isle,
And light and beauty, from His smile,
Their glories spread abroad:

Ere Time began his measured flight,
The Past appear'd in mystic light,
A boundless, trackless sea:
And man is lost in deep profound,—
For who that awful gulf can sound—
A past Eternity!

The finite never was designed,
To pass the boundary defined,
That ceaseless link to trace,
Which binds all living worlds to Him
Before whose throne the Seraphim
Low bow with wing-veil'd face!

But e'en the history of Time
Presents to man a height sublime—
To which he cannot soar:
Where wonders follow wonders, till
The more he thinks, the mystery still Bewilders him the more.

The history of the world is fraught
With subject deep for serious thought,
But our own lives present
A scene which memory can recal,
Where truth is found; if found at all—
Our living monument!

On which inscribed our hopes and fears,
Our struggles, sorrows, smiles, and tears,
And failings truly drawn—
A lesson gives which makes us wise,
And trains us for those happier skies
Where perfect light shall dawn;

Where the eternal Present reigns,
Nor sun e'er sets, nor moon e'er wanes,
Nor heard or sigh or groan—
Where Time nor Death can ever blight,
But all shall dwell in love and light,
And know, as they are known.

THE SCULPTOR OF FLORENCE.

A TALE.

OUR tale commences upon one of those delicious evenings when the splendour of an Italian sunset, and the beauties of an Italian sky, seem purposely adapted by nature to imbue with tenderness and joy the hearts of those lovers who seek the shady groves, or wander on the banks of the Arno, to breathe in each other's ears renewed vows of affection and fidelity. The balmy breeze was laden with the perfume of sweet flowers; the feathered choristers of the woods were closing their daily harmony with a few plaintive and touching notes of melody; and already were the lamps bright and numerous in many of the gay cassinos which adorned the vale of Arno. The towers and spires of the city of Florence were for a moment gilded with the departing rays of the setting sun; the mighty dome, which at that period adorned the ducal palace, shone as if it were covered with a sheet of the most precious of metals; and then a soft and delicious twilight succeeded the evanescent effulgence of that splendid sunset.

The period to which we allude was the middle of the sixteenth century: and on the evening in question, and at about the hour of sunset, two forms might have been distinguished in a secluded spot on the banks of the Arno. They walked slowly up and down the place, which they had evidently selected as one of rendezvous; and, from the melancholy which pervaded their countenances, and the earnestness of their conversation, an imaginative mind might gather all their history of hopeless and unchangeable love—of passion which some stern command or unkind fate refused to render happy—of vows which were probably never to be fulfilled—and of promises which young hearts so long, so tenaciously, and so faithfully cling to.

By what we have ere now said, the reader will have no difficulty in perceiving that the individuals to whom we have partially introduced him were a lover and his fond mistress—a youth and a beautiful girl, on both of whom nature had been prodigal in the distribution of her embellishments. The former was tall and handsome, with a countenance cast in a Grecian mould, and had a slender though sinewy form, which the vesture of the age set off to peculiar advantage. His companion was nearly as tall as he: and her graceful figure, with her long robe dragging upon the ground, resembled the Madonnas whom the artists of those times loved to trace upon their canvases. Her large black eyes were suffused in tears—her vermilion lips, apart, disclosed a set of the whitest teeth—and her scarf falling from her shoulders, revealed short glimpses of a bust of which the low corsage then in fashion could not conceal the snowy beauties.

"Wherefore thus distress yourself, Leonora?" said the youth, in a soothing tone of voice. "Destiny cannot have so sad a fate in store for us."

"Oh, Manuel!" exclaimed the weeping girl; "my father is inflexible; and, as he himself declared, the laws of the Persians and the Medes were not more unalterable than his will. The Marquis of Appiani is rich and powerful; he is the favourite of the Grand Duke—and through his influence my father hopes to re-establish his fallen fortunes."

"True—alas! it is too true, Leonora," said the young man, striking his forehead with his hand. "Appiani is wealthy and great—and I a poor sculptor and artist, without a name—a wretch whose daily toils are scarcely sufficient to procure him his daily bread! Oh! Leonora—Leonora!"

"Do not give way to despair, Manuel."

"And yet you dare not bid me hope, Leonora!"

There was a bitterness of woe in the words of each, which went to the hearts of the disconsolate lovers.

"And yet," said Manuel, hastily, and after a long pause—"and yet I have one chance of acquiring fortune, fame, and the consent of your sire, Leonora; but it is madness—it is childish to entertain so ambitious a design."

"Speak! speak!" cried Leonora, a ray of hope animating her pale countenance. "Speak: in situations like ours, I could fain see flowers of hope growing on the verge of impossibility itself."

"Leonora," said the youth, in a solemn and impressive tone of voice; "in ten days the exhibition of the prize statues takes place. The Grand Duke awards a laurel crown, a princely fortune, and a title to him who produces the best statue of St. Cecilia. Michael Angelo—the pride of Italy, and the wonder of the whole world—Michael Angelo is the judge; and he is as impartial as he is just in his perception of real merit."

"All this I know, Manuel," cried Leonora, somewhat impatiently. "But what reference has it to our position? You are aware that my father has fixed the wedding to take place on the day succeeding the one which marks the election of the happy artist, who shall please the great Michael Angelo by his talent and his labour."

"I know that you will laugh at me, Leonora—that you will fancy my words to be the ravings of an idiot, or a conceited fool," continued Manuel, impetuously; "but all may not be so vain and futile as you think. I have prepared my statue also; I have worked night and day for months past."

"Hence those hollow eyes—that pale countenance!" interrupted Leonora, glancing tenderly at her lover.

"Ah! I have toiled as never yet man toiled," proceeded the enthusiastic youth; "and my work is complete, save the arm which supports the lyre. Three strokes of the chisel and it is finished! And my St. Cecilia is the counterpart of my Leonora; else had not the statue stood the slightest chance of success!"

"Manuel, you have not been guilty of this impudence!" said Leonora, in a melancholy tone of voice, which went like a dagger to the heart of her lover.

"Oh! it is too true," returned the sculptor, after a moment's pause. "But do not laugh at my folly. I cling to that statue, not as an artist—Oh! no—as a lover. The Greeks concealed the most sublime truths in their fables; that of Pygmalion is my history. When I am with my statue I am not alone; and now that it is almost complete—now that it has the appearance of a lovely living object, I tremble before it as before you. It seems to me that the statue palpitates as I approach it; and then I kneel to it; and I imagine that sweet music issues from its lyre. Oh! that statue is now my only hope and joy!"

Leonora threw herself into the arms of her lover and wept bitterly. Her voice was lost in sobs; he kissed her chaste forehead, besought her to be calm, and when she had again recovered her presence of mind he resumed his discourse.

"When the Grand Duke had filled all Italy with the news of his proclamation relative to the intended competition, of which Michael Angelo was invited to be the judge and arbiter, a sudden idea struck me that I would hew from a shapeless block of marble the image of the most faultless of God's creatures. And I have succeeded, Leonora; and oh! I know not what urges me thus to hope; but I feel that if my statue be exhibited on the day appointed, the prize will be awarded to him who sculptured it."

The hope that thus illuminated the mind of the enthusiastic Manuel speedily communicated its invigorating influence to the bosom of his Leonora; and she smiled through her tears at her lover, as she poured forth her sanguine anticipations and heartfelt wishes that the laurel crown should encircle his brow.

"And, oh!" said the beautiful girl, as she leant upon the arm of Manuel, "how dear in after life will be this spot to us both. It was here," she continued, in a more playful tone, "that we first met, Manuel—here that you first told me that you loved me—here that your first statue of the Virgin was placed, for pilgrims to kneel to—and here that you first disclosed the existence of your St. Cecilia."

Scarcely had Leonora ceased speaking, when the lovers drew near to a remarkable image of the mother of our Saviour, which ornamented the spot. It had been placed there agreeably to the will of a miser, who had died a few years previously; and the moderate pecuniary tender of Manuel to the executors of the bequest had procured for him the sculpture of that monument of a miser's penitence and charity in the hour of death. The lovers drew near the statue and gazed upon it in silence.

"The hand that moulded this form will one day produce works which shall be the glory of Italy," said a solemn voice; and in a moment an old man, whom the shades of evening had hitherto concealed from the view of the lovers, stood before them; but even in the dubious light of that hour, they could not fail to mark his keen dark eyes, his venerable grey hair, and his modest attire, which gave him the appearance of a patriarch-shepherd of the olden time.

"And yet so splendid a production is suffered to remain in the public road," continued the old man, surveying the outlines of the statue as he spake. "I examined it this morning when it was light, and it is faultless."

"You are then a judge in these matters, old man," said Manuel, hastily.

"A little," returned the venerable stranger, carelessly. "I once made them my study."

"And do you attach much importance to a work which scarcely occupied the sculptor a month to complete?" resumed Manuel.

"Even in a rough design the germinations of great talent may be discernible," was the reply. "But how know you that only a month—"

"Because it is the poor fruit of my toil," said Manuel, anticipating the stranger's question.

"Ah! this is a strange coincidence, then," observed the old man; and with a chuckling laugh he added, "But may I be informed if you have prepared a St. Cecilia for the election that is to take place a week or ten days hence?"

"What artist in Florence has not?" demanded Manuel, impatiently; for there was something in the manner of his interrogator he liked not. He accordingly bade the inquisitive stranger farewell, and having conducted his beautiful Leonora to the gate of her father's cassino, he hastened back to the modest apartments which he occupied in a humble dwelling, situate in one of the most obscure streets of the city of Florence.

Manuel was met at the door of his apartments by a laughing, fair-haired, bright-eyed, intelligent youth, of sixteen, who ran to him and embraced him fervently, crying at the same time, "Good news, dear brother Manuel; we have gold enough now for many days!" and he displayed a well-filled purse as he repeated his ejaculations.

"Whence came that money, Stephano?" demanded Manuel.

"From the sale of the statue of St. Peter you gave me to take to Solomon the Jew, this morning," was the immediate reply.

"And Solomon gave you thirty ducats?" said Manuel, in a tone of unaffected surprise.

"No, no—not he!" answered Stephano, with an arch smile. "But I will not keep you in suspense, dear Manuel; I was hastening to old Solomon's shop, with the little statue in my hands; when, as I passed the grand exhibition hall, I just stepped in to see the statues that are already sent thither. An old man dressed like a countryman, with white hair—"

"And a cap without a plume?" said Manuel, hastily.

"Exactly," replied Stephano. "Do you know him?"

"I have seen him this evening," said Manuel. "Proceed!"

"Well, this identical old man, then, was busily examining the statues with a most critical eye, and peering at each as if he were the best judge of all their respective merits in Christendom, when he suddenly exclaimed, 'What a splendid production!' I turned round, and saw that he was gazing at your little statue of St. Peter, which I held in my hands. 'Is that yours, young man?' said he. I replied that it was my brother's; he asked your name and place of residence, and I could not help telling him the truth. 'Manuel Ascanio?' cried he, repeating the name several times. 'What! he who was employed to sculpture the statue of the Madonna on the banks of the Arno? I only arrived here yesterday,' continued he, 'and I have already heard much about it.' I replied in the affirmative. He asked me to sell him the little statue I had with me; and when he offered me that purse, containing thirty ducats, for it, I was only too glad to make him close the bargain. Old Solomon would not have given us more than six ducats at the outside."

"This is a fortunate presage," said Manuel, "and argues well for the St. Cecilia."

"O my dear brother," cried Stephano, "I am so rejoiced that I have at last met some one who knows how to appreciate your works! I feel certain that you will succeed at the approaching exhibition."

"To supper and to bed, Stephano," exclaimed Manuel, without noticing his brother's observations. "I must arise betimes to visit the gallery and inspect the statues of my rivals. My own performance shall not be placed there before the grand day of trial."

Manuel slept soundly that night, for hope beat high in his breast; and in his dreams he saw Leonora smiling upon him. He fancied that all obstacles would be speedily removed, and that he should shortly lead the beautiful girl to the altar, where his most sanguine anticipations were to be fulfilled. But when he awoke in the morning he recollected that he had still the Marquis of Appiani as his rival; and he hastened to the gallery, where the exhibition was to take place, to distract his mind for an hour or two from dwelling upon aught that was disagreeable to him.

Manuel had not left his modest dwelling half an hour when a loud knock summoned Stephano to the door; and in the visitor, who walked unceremoniously into the front room, the youth recognized the old man who had purchased the statue of St. Peter of him the day before. Stephano accordingly received him with all possible politeness, and desired him to be seated.

"Good morning," said the old man, sinking into a chair. "Is your brother within?"

"He is gone to inspect the statues," was the answer delivered in a respectful tone.

"Perhaps he intends to send one himself to the exhibition?" continued the stranger.

Stephano nodded an affirmative in a certain mysterious and arch manner, which implied that the matter was more than half a secret.

"I must see it," said the old man, abruptly.

"Impossible!" cried Stephano. "My brother has given me the most positive orders never to admit any one into his private studio."

"Did I not proffer you a good price for your little statue yesterday?" demanded the old man.

"You did; and I thank you," answered Stephano; "for never was money more welcome. We had not an ohole in the house."

"And in case your brother's statue does not obtain the prize," continued the stranger, "which is very probable, especially as some of the first artists have forwarded their works to the exhibition,—what would become of St. Cecilia then?"

Stephano's countenance became suddenly clouded, as he calculated the chances and consequences of his brother's failure. The stranger saw the advantage he had gained, and hastened to follow it up.

"In case your brother's statue should be rejected," said the old man, "I will purchase it."

"You!" exclaimed Stephano, starting from his seat.

"Yes—I!" calmly rejoined the stranger. "Although an humble individual, I fancy that I have some taste and discrimination in the fine arts; and I pledge myself to purchase the statue if it be rejected at the exhibition."

Stephano did not hesitate another moment.

"Follow me, then," said the youth; and he led the way to an inner apartment, in which the statue of St. Cecilia was standing upon its pedestal. That was the room in which Manuel had toiled "as never before man had toiled"—in which he had devoted hours and days to the contemplation only of his magnificent work—in which a faithful lover had hewn from a shapeless block of marble an all but speaking counterpart of her he adored—in which he had reiterated in private all the vows and protestations he had ever made to Leonora during their evening walks. That was the room, in fine, where had been passed some of the most felicitous as well as some of the most wretched hours of Manuel's life! And that room contained the statue on which rested all his hopes—the symmetrical, the beautiful statue which was full of life, and meaning, and love, and tenderness to him—the statue which, although bearing the name of the patroness of music, might immortalize the transcendent beauties of her whom he loved so sincerely and so well.

"This is the statue!" said Stephano.

"A master-piece!" exclaimed the old man.

Stephano clapped his hands together in delight.

"It is no wonder that your brother kept this delicious image concealed from every eye!" cried the old man, with a smile of the most unfeigned rapture. "The very air—the very breath of mortals would almost seem to be capable of spoiling that fragile marble, and tainting that most exquisite flower of beauty—ah!" And the old man started as if he were suddenly bitten by a venomous reptile.

"Is anything the matter! Are you ill?" enquired Stephano, anxiously gazing upon the changed countenance of the stranger.

"No, boy, no," said the old man, in an agitated tone of voice. "But there is a fault—a greivous fault—or rather negligence in that statue. The arm which supports the lyre is incomplete."

"A fault! Oh no!" cried Stephano, "it cannot be!"

"A fault, I say," cried the stranger. "Three strokes of the chisel—three blows of the hammer, and that statue is complete."

And as he uttered these words, the old man seized the chisel and a hammer which lay upon the table near him, and approached the statue.

"Consider, signor!—what are you about?" cried Stephano, rushing forward, and catching the stranger by the skirt of his doublet.

"Boy, did I not say I would purchase that statue if it failed to please at the exhibition?" said the old man, calmly pushing Stephano aside. "I will forfeit a thousand ducats if I should spoil it," and he advanced towards the statue.

"And my brother!" cried Stephano.

"He will rejoice at what I'm about to do," was the reply.

Stephano urged no further objection, but stood trembling in the middle of the room, while the old man slowly and cautiously applied the chisel three times to the defective part of the statue, and then surveyed his work with admiration and delight. At that moment a knock was heard at the door. Stephano recognized his brother's signal, hurried the stranger into the front room, closed the studio, and hastened to admit Manuel, who started when he recognized in his visitor the individual he had spoken to the evening before on the banks of the Arno, at the statue of the Madonna.

"This is the gentleman who purchased the statue of St. Peter," said Stephano, presenting the stranger to his brother. "He has called to ascertain if you intend to exhibit a specimen of your abilities."

"Oh, no!" cried Manuel, in a sorrowful tone of voice; "I have just now inspected the statues already placed in the gallery, and see so much perfection there, that I dare not expose myself to the certainty of defeat and consequent disgrace."

"Be not discouraged, young man," exclaimed the stranger. "I am not vain, but I flatter myself I am able to discern merit where it exists; and by the specimens of your capabilities I have already seen—the Madonna and the St. Peter—I augur well in your favour."

The old man waited not for a reply; but having wished the brothers a hasty "good morning," he abruptly withdrew.

"Be not discouraged, dear brother," said Stephano, when the visitor had departed. "That individual is apparently a judge, and his opinion must not be lightly valued."

"Oh, Stephano! I have this day seen some splendid productions of art," exclaimed Manuel. "Let me contemplate my own statue once more, and thus acquire fresh hopes and fresh courage."

"One moment," said Stephano.

"No; come with me," cried Manuel; and he led his brother into the adjacent room.

Manuel cast one look at his statue, and gave a sudden start. He ran up to it, examined the arm, passed his hand over his eyes, and convinced himself that it was no delusion.

"Stephano!" said he, in a voice of thunder, as he turned hastily round to his terrified brother; "that individual who has just left the house—"

"Pardon me—and I will tell you all," cried Stephano, falling upon his knees.

"He applied the chisel to my statue!" ejaculated Manuel; "and there is only one man living who could touch it as he has touched it."

"Oh! my dear brother—pardon me!" cried Stephano, still trembling at Manuel's feet.

"And that old man—" continued the sculptor.

"Who is he?" said Stephano.

"Michael Angelo himself!" was the answer.

"Michael Angelo!" cried Stephano, leaping upon his feet. "Manuel, he will award you the crown, and we shall be rich and happy evermore."

"Michael Angelo is my friend!" exclaimed Manuel, in a paroxysm of the wildest joy. "Michael Angelo has seen my statue—Michael Angelo has been in my house! Oh! this mean dwelling will henceforth appear to me a palace! For Michael Angelo has been here—the pride of Italy—the wonder of Europe—and he has bade me hope! Stephano, I suffocate with joy! I fain would weep, and cannot! Oh that such unexpected happiness should have been in store for me!"

"He said your St. Cecilia was a chef d'œuvre, Manuel," cried Stephano. "The opinion of Michael Angelo is the opinion of Italy: a prophecy of Michael Angelo is an order of destiny. O what a great man has deigned to visit us! And what bounty on the part of Heaven is this!"

"What will happen to me during the next ten days I know not," said Manuel, solemnly; "but this I feel that I have just experienced the most profound emotion which a man can support. Another such a shock, of happiness or misery, would kill me on the spot, or send me a raving madman to a receptacle for the insane. But, O God! my prayers are pure, and thou canst change my crown of thorns into one of laurels!"

Ten days passed tediously away; and during that period Manuel had not a single opportunity of conversing with Leonora Vivaldi. Her father, who was well aware of her passion for the obscure sculptor, and who was desirous of accomplishing the union between her and the Marquis Appiani, ordered her to be so narrowly watched that she could not once repair to the usual place of rendezvous during the time that elapsed between the evening on which our tale opens and the day that was fixed for the exhibition of the statues, and the final judgment of Michael Angelo. A note from Manuel had, however, informed her of all that had occurred in reference to his statue, and the great man who had spoken so highly in his favour.

The morning of the eventful day dawned; and many an artist rose from a sleepless couch with a brow rendered feverish, and a heart aching with uncertainty, hope, and fear. Florence was all confusion, mirth, bustle, and joy; the streets leading to the gallery in which the statues were exhibited were crowded to excess. Every one was anxious to catch a glimpse of the ducal cortège; but all were more impatient still to see the arbiter of the competition, Michael Angelo—the mighty artist who had been invited from Rome to preside at the ceremony.

It had been ordered by proclamation that all the statues should be conveyed to the gallery by mid-day; the decision was to be made at about three in the afternoon. Manuel and Stephano rose early, and were anxiously waiting for the arrival of the vehicle which had been ordered to convey the St. Cecilia to the gallery, when a letter was brought by a page bearing the livery of the Count Vivaldi. The missive was addressed to the elder brother, and its contents were as follows:—

"MANUEL.—I have long been aware of your attachment for my daughter; and were I alone with her on earth, if I had not a son whom I should leave poor and miserable, I would gladly consent to your union. But this cannot be. If the Marquis Appiani espouse my daughter, my fallen fortunes will be established once more, and my son will be placed in a condition worthy of his family and his ancestors. Ought not Leonora, then, to sacrifice herself for her parents and her brother? If thou thinkest she ought, I pray thee show thy love for her, and do not dishonour her. Recollect that Lisa del Giscando was disgraced when Leonardo de Vinci published her portrait. Renounce, then, the exhibition of your statue—consider my old age, my grey hairs—respect the honour of Leonora—and we will both bless you together."

"VIVALDI."

The letter dropped from Manuel's hand—Stephano picked it up and perused it hastily.

"I wait your reply, signor," said the page.

"Lisa del Giscando was disgraced," mused Manuel, audibly, "and she awarded not stolen interviews to her lover, and she was not promised to a Marquis Appiani. Tell the Count, your master," he added, in a firm tone of voice, turning to the page, "that I obey his wishes, and that if he order me to break my statue to pieces, I am ready to fulfil his orders."

The boy was about to depart, when Manuel, recollecting a question which he was desirous of asking, called him back.

"You are acquainted with the contents of this letter?" inquired Manuel.

"I am in my master's confidence," was the reply.

"Tell me, then," resumed Manuel, "how came the Count Vivaldi to ascertain that my statue was the image of his daughter?"

"Michael Angelo was presented to the Count, last evening, by the Marquis Appiani; and when he was introduced to Signora Leonora he discovered the likeness."

"You may go," said Manuel; and the page withdrew to bear the sculptor's message to his master. So soon as he was despatched Manuel shut himself up in his studio, and Stephano gave way to his grief in the front chamber.

It was about one o'clock when the Marquis Appiani, who was ignorant that Manuel was his rival in Leonora's affections, called at the humble dwelling of the two brothers. Manuel was summoned by Stephano from his studio, and the Marquis hastened to unfold the object of his visit.

"Your name, I believe, is Manuel Ascanio?" said the Marquis.

"It is, my lord," was the reply.

"You have accomplished a chef d'œuvre, signor," continued the Marquis; "and the Grand Duke has sent me to fetch it. My followers wait outside. You are to accompany me; his highness is desirous of seeing you."

"Accident, my lord," said Manuel, with a deep sigh, "or rather the indiscretion of my brother, discovered that statue of which you are speaking, to a great man—"

"Despatch—I am anxious to see it," interrupted the Marquis. "Michael Angelo has already spoken so highly of its merits."

"I dare not show it to a soul," said Manuel, with difficulty suppressing his tears.

"But I," urged the Marquis, smiling, "am ordered by the Grand Duke to carry it to his presence, and I dare not disobey."

"My word is pledged," said Manuel.

"So is mine," returned the Marquis, taking a heavy purse from his pocket and throwing it upon the table. "If the statue be sold, there is the money. I re-purchase it; but mine it must be;—and the Marquis summoned his followers from the passage where they were waiting without.

"You dare not take it by force," cried Manuel, fiercely confronting the Marquis Appiani.

"I dare execute the Duke's orders," was the calm reply, as the Marquis beckoned his followers to attend upon him whithersoever he might lead.

"This tyranny—this injustice is insupportable!" exclaimed Manuel, wildly.

"O brother! give them the statue," cried Stephano; "your fame—your fortune depend upon it!"

"Wait one moment—one moment only," said Manuel, after an instant's consideration, "and the statue shall be yours."

The Marquis nodded an affirmative, and Manuel rushed into his studio, and closed the door.

"He wishes to take one last fond view of it alone," said Stephano, as his brother disappeared.

But a loud and long laugh, and then a cry of rage echoed from the adjacent apartment; and these were followed by the din of a chisel and a hammer upon the marble; and then succeeded a crash which shook the house to its foundation. Stephano, the Marquis, and his followers ran into the studio; and as they entered, they stumbled over shapeless pieces of broken marble, which Manuel had scattered upon the floor. The statue had disappeared; but the remnants were before them!

"Oh, Manuel! what have you done?" exclaimed Stephano, bursting into an agony of tears.

"Let them take the statue now—the face is all disfigured, and the limbs are scattered over the room!" said the sculptor, with an ironical laugh.

"What can I say to his Highness?" cried the Marquis, as he turned to leave the spot. "It is as much as my head is worth to have been the cause of the destruction of that statue!"

With these words the Marquis Appiani departed, followed by his attendants, and leaving behind them two hearts so full of sorrow that a misanthrope would have wept at the sight of the despair which was depicted upon their countenances.

"Fame and fortune for ever gone!" cried Stephano, after a long silence.

"And her honour preserved from calumniating surmise," added Manuel, firmly; and he felt a momentary glow of pride and of happiness, for he knew that he had done a noble and a generous deed: but these sentiments soon passed away, and gave place to others of a more gloomy character still. "And yet, Stephano—I can weep—I can gnash my teeth with rage. I have destroyed a statue which Michael Angelo had perfected—I have effaced the most lovely lineaments that ever represented a living thing! Oh! it is a crime, that which I have done—a great crime!"

"Yes, weep, brother,—weep! Oh! you have good cause for sorrow," said Stephano. "But—hark! numerous footsteps approach our door: the Grand Duke has sent his sbires to take us to the Inquisition for the deed you have done."

And as Stephano spoke, the outer room, the door of which had been left open by the Marquis and his followers, was filled with visitors, at the head of whom were Michael Angelo and Count Vivaldi.

"Rash youth!" cried Michael Angelo, addressing himself to Manuel; "you destroy the masterpiece of the age, at the moment when I obtain the consent of Count Vivaldi to your union with his daughter."

"Impossible!" cried Manuel, scarcely daring to believe his ears: "and the Marquis Appiani?"

"The Duke has pardoned him," said Michael Angelo; "and here is the golden crown for you. His Highness, moreover, awards you a year to perfect another statue of St. Cecilia!"

"And Leonora anxiously waits to greet the champion of the exhibition," said Count Vivaldi. "You made a noble sacrifice, Manuel—and you are well worthy of my daughter. Let us hasten to the casino in the Vale of Aruo, and there celebrate the happy termination of this eventful day!"

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The MS relative to Christ's Hospital is left at the publisher's, 2, Old Bailey.

The Lines sent from Sleaford are perfectly inadmissible, in consequence of the great length of the poem.

A Juvenile is thanked for his hint, which shall be attended to. A Teetotal Epigram is declined with thanks. We repeat for the tenth time that we do not count poetic contributions of any kind. We shall be glad to receive J. R.'s promised prose article.

Mr. E. Perry's letter has been referred to the proper quarter; but the offer is declined with thanks.

To our Correspondent at Rivington.—We are much obliged for your communication. The donation of Two Shillings and Sixpence to the Coal-Whippers' Fund shall be devoted to the purpose desired. We regret to state that Mr. Robert Parry is indeed the backslider alluded to in the journals, and who obtained so much celebrity in Wales.

The verses upon Pottinger are good. The rhymes are not however complete, because the first syllable in Pottinger is hard, and the second soft.

We thank Mr. G. J.—n. of Glasgow, for his letter, and shall be glad to receive communications from him relative to the progress of Teetotalism in that city. The work he enquires about, can be obtained at Mr. Strange's, Paternoster Row.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1841.

It is our pleasing duty to inform our readers in the country, that an establishment, entitled THE UNITED KINGDOM TOTAL-ABSTINENCE LIFE-ASSOCIATION, has been founded in Moorgate-street, for Mutual Assurance on Lives, Annuities, Endowments, and Deposits.

Of all the many institutions civilised society has devised to ameliorate and guard against the thousand and one casualties to which we are liable, as weak and mortal beings, none would appear to be more beneficial and praiseworthy than the various establishments for the Assurance of Life. Comprising in their purpose the first duty of man—that of ultimately providing for those near and dear relations naturally looking to him for support—the practice of Life Assurance becomes, through its effects, a sacred obligation, as well as a wise and prudential provision. Without it all the sweet charities of life are incomplete. If we would have "our memories smell sweet and blossom in the dust," we cannot too soon secure to those we may leave behind, a refuge from the storms of the world—a shield from the chilling blasts of poverty, and the gnawing pangs of want. A more noble and useful investment than that of Life Assurance can scarcely be conceived. The scruples of some Roman Catholic countries long forbade the introduction of Life Assurance Companies amongst them, on the pretext that it was contrary to morality, and an offence against public decency, to set a price upon the life of a freeman, which is above all valuation. This prejudice has at length disappeared before the spread of public opinion. The association of individuals, to secure to the husband and father the means of providing for his wife and children, when by his death they shall become the widow and orphans, is one in which all may well join. To increase the sphere of the benefits of these associations is the duty of all who understand their principles; and, with this impression, we have penned this article to recommend to public notice the first Life Assurance Company ever yet established upon the salutary and glorious principles of Teetotalism.

But Life Insurance is not only valuable as a provision for families after death: it is also infinitely useful in various commercial and legal transactions. Among many others, the following may be enumerated:—

Capital, laid out in the purchase of annuities depending on a life, will acquire permanence by assuring such a life.

Securities on life interests may, by insurance, be rendered eligible for the purpose of raising loans.

The Guardians of a person who, at a certain age, will come into the possession of property, may obtain a security for advances made in the meantime, by assuring his life until he shall be at the given age.

Dependants on the lives of others may, by assuring such lives, be relieved from the anxiety natural to their situation.

Debtors, who are unable to satisfy the demands of their creditors immediately, but who may have the means of liquidating the amount in a certain time, should they live so long, may, by the aid of a temporary assurance on their lives, offer a satisfactory arrangement; or, should their views fail in discharging their debts in the given time, and they or their creditors continue the assurance, the amount will be by that means realised at their decease. The ruinous consequences of insolvency may in this way frequently be averted.

Marriage settlements may be effected advantageously through the means of Life Assurance, particularly where the husband is engaged in trade. For instance,—suppose the lady's fortune be £2000, one half may be placed at the gentleman's disposal, and the remaining half be invested in the funds, in the names of trustees, on behalf of the lady. The interest on this investment, in an assurance on the gentleman's life (his age being twenty-five, say), will realise £2000, the whole amount of the lady's fortune, at his decease, which, with the principal money in the funds added, will make £3000. Thus the lady's original fortune is here increased by one half, and entirely independent of the gains of her husband.

To Military and Naval Men the utility of Life Assurance must be so apparent, that it is almost supererogatory to offer any argument in its support.

Merchants, and indeed all who are engaged in precarious pursuits, from the highest to the lowest—they, whose vessels interchange the productions of distant climates with those whose more humble occupations consist in retailing them—are alike interested in Life Assurance, and are imperatively called on, by the voice of prudence and duty, to avail themselves of its benefits.

These are some of the leading examples; and it is presumed they will suffice as illustrative of the excellence of Life Assurance. Indeed, it is almost impossible to detail the various ramifications of the system, or to limit the extent to which it may be carried in a country of such extensive commercial relations as Great Britain;—but certain it is that the more widely it be spread, and the more comprehensive it be made, the more stable will it become.

We must here remark that, in effecting Life Insurances, the interest must be a pecuniary one; and that a parent (for instance) cannot legally assure the life of his child in order to be reimbursed (in the event of the child's death) the expense he has been at for his education, &c. But this objection does not extend to the case of a wife assuring the life of her husband, who need not prove that she is interested therein; nor to a creditor assuring the life of a debtor. An assurance effected to provide for payment of a sum of money won at play, would not be held legal.

Turn we now to the Prospectus of the UNITED KINGDOM TOTAL ABSTINENCE LIFE ASSOCIATION. In the first place, it is ushered to our notice beneath the auspices of a number of most respectable and influential individuals, in the capacity of the PATRONS of the undertaking. The Trustees are MESSIEURS JAMES DAY, R. WALKDEN, and R. WARNER: the Physician is DR. DUNDAS THOMPSON; and the Chairman of the London Board is MR. WALKDEN. The Prospectus enters upon a few observations on the advantages of Life Insurance, and affords the following satisfactory information:—

"The present Association has been formed with a view to the promotion of a great moral reformation, and the securing to persons of temperate habits the pecuniary advantages resulting from their increased longevity, together with the ordinary benefits of mutual assurance. The Association being strictly mutual, and confined to persons abstaining entirely from the use of intoxicating beverages, the surplus payments will not contribute to the benefit of the intemperate and careless, as is the case in societies composed of all classes indiscriminately; but whatever the profits may be, they will be divided exclusively amongst those who have contributed towards them,—the assurers being the only proprietors."

This is as it should be; and the plan will doubtless be as successfully carried out as it has been well digested. The Prospectus goes on to inform us, that disputes will be settled by arbitration—that no assurer is individually liable for any loss the Society may sustain—that premiums may be paid annually, half-yearly, or quarterly—that no charge, except for the stamp, will be made on the policies, &c. &c. There is only one point in these arrangements which might be altered with a view to its amelioration; viz., the payments of the premiums might be made weekly, if required. This modification would allow thousands of working men to avail themselves of an institution which is established principally for a class whose condition has been so much improved through the medium of Teetotalism.

We will now quote from the Prospectus before us a few striking observations, the truth of which will be apparent to the meanest capacity:—

"The average consumption of intoxicating liquors in the United Kingdom is estimated at £2. 10s. per annum, or nearly 1s. per week, for every individual, man, woman, and child. If every one at the age of 21 years applied the money thus spent in injuring himself and his fellow-creatures, to effect an assurance in this Association, he would leave to his family at his decease, whenver it might occur, no less than £135, besides all the profits of the Association which fell to his share. Or if he preferred assuring a sum to be paid on his attaining the age of 60 years, the same weekly saving would secure him about £300. Or he might secure £115, to be paid to his family at his death, whenever it might happen, or to himself, if he lived to be 60 years old. Or, again, the same weekly saving would purchase an annuity of £26, to commence at the age of 60, and be paid every year during the life of the annuitant.

"If a man, instead of spending three pence per day in intoxicating drink, were to lay it by, at the end of four weeks he would have saved 7s. (to say nothing of time, and health, and character, &c.); and if he put this 7s. every month into the Deposit Department, it would amount in five years to £24. 2s.; in ten years to £52. 2s. 6d.; in twenty years to £122. 5s.; and in fifty years to £513! Thus a man who takes a pint of ale every day loses in fifty years from three to five hundred pounds in DRINK!"

We sincerely hope that all the readers of The Teetotaler will give their earnest consideration to the subject now brought before them. We care nothing as to which Teetotal Association established the institution we have been praising: it is sufficient for us, as an impartial journalist, to know that the aforesaid institution is highly respectable with regard to its founders, and highly praiseworthy in respect to its principles. To every working man, who will feel inclined, after a perusal of this article, to lay aside a shilling or eighteen pence per week, in order to secure a provision for his family at his death, we say, "Go to the UNITED KINGDOM TOTAL ABSTINENCE LIFE ASSOCIATION."

THE SHIPS OF THE ANCIENTS.

As no human device is more worthy of admiration than the ship, so no investigation can be more curious than to trace, step by step, the slow progress of improvement, from the first rude attempt of incipient navigation, down to the perfection of modern times. And here, at the very threshold of the enquiry, our attention is arrested by a singular fact—the uniformity, with which the human mind, prompted by the same desires, and aided by the same faculties, arrives at the same results. How small indeed is the difference with respect to principle between the canoe of the Esquimaux, framed of the bones of beasts and fishes, and covered with the skins of seals, and those in which the poets show us Dardanus fleeing before the deluge, or Charon conducting his trembling charge to the shades below!—between those said to have been used in primitive times by the Egyptian, the Ethiopian, and the Arab, and the light barks of the early Britons, made of osiers and hides, which Cæsar imitated in Spain to extricate himself from the perilous situation in which he was held by the lieutenants of Pompey! In what does the canoe of the islander of the South Seas and of the native African differ from those which the savage Germans hollowed from a single tree in the days of Pliny.

It is an old tradition that the first idea of the canoe was suggested by a split reed, seen by some ingenious savage floating safely upon the billows. Be this as it may, there can be little doubt that the raft, as it is the most easy and obvious means of crossing the water, was likewise of most early invention. The savage who first ventured forth upon a solitary tree that the river had brought within his reach, must have found his situation unsteady and precarious: his ingenuity suggested the idea of fastening several together, and the conveyance became at once a safe one. The earliest records which history affords on this subject show the Egyptians traversing the Nile upon rafts. The Phœnicians also availed themselves of the invention; and we are told that many islands, even the remote ones of Sicily and Corsica, were colonised with no better assistance. This will seem less improbable if we remember that the Peruvians still make sea voyages on their raft, called balsa, from the spongy tree of which it is made. It consists of a number of logs tightly bound together, and strengthened transversely by beams. They are tapered at the prow, to facilitate the division of the water, whilst vertical planks, descending below the surface, prevent drift, and enable it to sail towards the wind. These balsas are occasionally met in the open ocean, laden with ten or twelve tons of merchandise, and contending effectually with the trade wind which prevails along the coast of Peru. This form of ship is not, however, always safe: lifted as the logs are unequally upon the waves, the thongs which bind them together, if old or neglected, sometimes break or disengage; the bark of the mariner disappears treacherously beneath him, or the logs washing rudely together, serve for his destruction. Yet the attempts of the uncivilized navigator do not always shun comparison with those of a maturer age. We find the native of North-western America, in his little skin-covered bark of admirable symmetry, venturing forth amid the most boisterous waves, which pass harmless over him, and outstripping the fleetest barge in his rapid course. The flying proa of the Ladrone islands sails towards the wind with unequalled nearness, and with a velocity far greater than civilised man has ever attained, with all the aids of philosophy.

It were a vain task to record the various fables connected with the origin and improvement of ships, though the inventors were esteemed worthy to take rank among the gods, and even the ships to be translated to the heavens, where they still shine amongst the constellations; how Dædalus invented the art of flying, to escape from the labyrinth of Crete—an allusion to the sails with which he eluded the pursuit of Minos; how Hercules sailed with the hide of a lion, which was only his well-known garment hung up for the purpose; or how the first idea of the sail was taken from the poetic voyages of the nautilus; how Atlas contends for the invention of the oar, and how many heroes claim the honour of the rudder. These inventions all, doubtless, originated in the earliest dawns of civilisation, before there were any means of recording them; and the ascription of them to individuals may have formed the pastime of succeeding poets. It may not however be equally vain to enquire what was the nature of ships among those nations which made the first advances towards civilisation.

We find that the Egyptians, in improving upon the rafts and canoes which they first used, built vessels of stout joists of Acanthus wood, which were made to lap over like tiles, and were fastened with wooden pins. The stoutness of the joists precluded the necessity of a frame, except what was formed by the benches of the rowers. The seams were tightened by introducing the leaves of the papyrus. It would not have been long before ingenuity suggested the application of a natural agent for the relief of human toil; a mast of acanthus was raised, a papyrus sail suspended from it, and the rower rested on his oar, or only used it for the direction of his bark. In ascending the Nile, when the wind was either unfavourable or too light, the vessel was drawn against the current by men on shore. In descending, a hurdle of wood was often let down from the prow, which taking a deep hold of the stream, neutralised the efforts of the strong north-east wind. The early Egyptians did not however greatly improve upon this noble invention: their peculiar prejudices, by confining them for many centuries to the navigation of the Nile, checked the progress of improvement. The Phœnicians were not allowed by the Egyptians to enter the Nile, and were thus compelled to adapt their ships to the necessities of a more precarious navigation.

Coeval with the Phœnicians, in the use of ships, were the inhabitants of China. But situated as they are, in the neighbourhood of a circumscribed sea, surrounded by islands, and, moreover, possessing in their own resources a supply for every want, discovery and improvement have long lain dormant there. It is believed, and the fact is wonderful, that the Chinese have floated down through thirty centuries in the same junk which now excites the ridicule of our seamen, and which they are yet unwilling to exchange for the improved models that daily pass them in their own seas, and continually force upon them the most humiliating comparisons.

In the Chinese junk of our day we may, perhaps, see the counterpart of what the ship was in the days of the Phœnicians and of incipient navigation. Among the Phœnicians, Carthaginians, and Greeks, the earlier ships used in commerce were flat floored, broad, and of small draught of water; the floor-timbers were continuous at first, and they were without a keel, having instead a streak of wood on either side to take the ground when stranding. Next, the keel was introduced, in order to diminish the drift with a side wind; and, to increase the strength, a keelson was soon added, overlying the floor-timbers and confining them to the keel; beams were also placed aloft, to hold the sides together, and sustain the deck. The planking, which took its name, among the Greeks, from the garment which covers the human body, was very firmly attached to the frame by means of iron nails, some of which passed through and were clinched within. When, however, the ancients discovered the tendency of iron to rot the wood, they substituted copper. To obviate the danger of starting the plank ends (a danger still sometimes fatal to the mariner), a piece of wood was let into both in the form of a dove-tail. Oak and pine, then as now, were the woods most in favour. To stop the leaking at the joints, lime and pounded shells were first applied: these being found soon to fall off, wax, resin, and pitch were advantageously substituted;—flax was also driven into the seams, and leather occasionally used as a sheathing.

The general form and size of the ancient ships varied with the progress of improvement, and with the warlike or commercial purposes for which they were constructed. The war-ships of the Greeks were at first but row-boats, with which they rushed upon the enemy, and decided the battle by superior force and valour. In the course of time the row-boat grew into a galley, which being moved chiefly by oars, was of an entirely different form from the merchant-ship. The size of the earlier ships was necessarily inconsiderable, as they were drawn on shore at the termination of every voyage, and had but a single mast and sail of cloth. When, however, the keel was added and the size of the ship increased, stranding became no longer practicable, and the anchor and cable were invented to confine the ship at a due distance from the land. At first this useful machine was but a large stone; it was afterwards of wood and stone combined, and lastly of iron, having teeth. In the progress of enlarging their ships, the ancients attained, about the Christian æra, a size quite equal to the most monstrous of modern times. In the time of the Emperor Constantius, a Roman ship was built, which carried 2600 tons: the Santissima Trinidad could have carried no more.

We shall next week give an account of the Ships of the Moderns.

REVIEWS.

The Temperance Messenger. Number for February. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

This excellent little periodical contains some very useful articles. "The Physiological Question" is well discussed by Mr. G. Wilson, whom we should conclude to be a medical man. The following observations are important:—

"Persons who have read accounts of shipwrecks and of the sufferings of survivors, in some cases for days or weeks with scarcely sufficient food and water to preserve life, may have observed how GREATLY RELIEVED, on obtaining a small supply of cold water, or some simple food, such persons have been, though at the time when this scanty refreshment was obtained perhaps some of them appeared to be sinking from exhaustion. But when these same individuals shortly afterwards have been taken up by some ship, or have obtained access to dwellings of civilized and hospitable people, when they have been treated with mistaken kindness, provided with warm beds, in warm rooms, with warm food, and wines, cordials, &c.,—HAVE THEY THEN BEEN suddenly GREATLY RELIEVED as they were when they obtained the sparing refreshment in the former instance? No! new and alarming symptoms have seized them, and their ultimate recovery is rendered extremely doubtful. This is not a mere imaginary picture,—there have been many such instances. Even in cases of exhaustion from disease stimulants have no doubt in many instances done much harm. Many cases of violent Asiatic cholera, where there is extreme exhaustion, have been successfully treated under the COLD WATER system. The thirst is great, and the patient is plentifully supplied with cold water and kept in a cool room. No stimulants are given, nor is any attempt made to keep up the animal heat. The patient sinks almost into a state of torpor, the disease spends itself, and the system gradually resumes its functions."

Speaking of the advantage of establishing Teetotal reading-rooms and literary institutions, the periodical now before us says:—

"Moreover, when we consider the multitude of questions which the Temperance movement has caused to be mooted, the extensive and untrodden field it lays bare for scientific inquiry, the deep mine it opens for philosophical research, and the vast arena it displays for controversy of all kinds,—when we consider also the numbers of our opponents, the variety of objections raised by well-meaning friends, and the numerous quarters from which assailants rush upon us, it gives us reason to wonder that something of the kind has not been attempted before this time, to suppose that we have suffered much disadvantage in consequence. Our cause is yet in its childhood. But few understand it in all its bearings; and fewer still wisely anticipate what unspeakable blessings awaits its ripened age. Its destinies, in our estimation, are glorious. But how shall we expect to see them attained in our day while we neglect opportunities of furthering the cause, and making it more strong and vigorous by not providing every one of its members with a mass of knowledge which shall so empower him that he can either sustain an attack of an enemy unhurt, or vanquish him by reason of the superiority of his skill and goodness of his weapons? We do not fear being charged with exaggeration when we say that nine-tenths of our present number are unacquainted with the true and sound principle of Total Abstinence. This, we imagine, is one chief cause of the many apostasies we experience. Their faith is not well grounded. No sooner does the influence which led them to sign the pledge begin to weaken, than their faith begins to stagger, and no very great temptation is then required to induce them to return to their former practices. We could point out many instances corroborative of this. And what else can we expect? Does it not seem irrational to suppose that a man who is ignorant of the principles of his faith will continue steadfast in practice?—Is it not akin to folly to expect a man to abide by his creed; to live up to it and attest its truth, while he is unacquainted with its doctrines? We should like every member of our body to be able to state distinctly and explicitly his reason for giving in his adherence to the belief that Total Abstinence from alcoholic drinks is best for man, and to be so far conversant with the various sciences that he could logically prove the truth of his belief."

In dismissing the February number of The Temperance Magazine, we again record our approval of the manner in which it is conducted.

Comic Scraps. By JOHN PHILLIPS. London: W. Brittain.

THIS is a collection of humorous lithographic drawings and steel engravings, by Mr. Phillips, who is well known in the world of artists for his peculiarly facetious vein, and his readiness in "hitting off" the various odd physiognomies he encounters in his rambles. To any one who, for the sum of two shillings, is desirous of possessing himself of twenty-four laughable drawings, we can safely recommend these. The design of some of these pictures is excellent. A girl, in one, is offering an iron to a pawnbroker, enquiring, "Do you take in irons, sir?"—"We take in flats," is the answer. In another of these drawings, a poor mendicant solicits charity of a very stout gentleman, whose protuberant stomach bears evidence to the succulency of his diurnal meals. "What!" ejaculates this gentleman, in a fit of most virtuous indignation, "you complain of hunger, the greatest blessing that can befall you? How can you enjoy a dinner without being hungry? I'd give the world to be hungry!"

A Series of Subjects for Drawings. By MR. J. C. DELLY. London: W. Brittain.

THESE are excellent copies for students. There are drawings of flowers, butterflies, shells, roses, insects, dogs, landscapes, ruins, animals' heads, hares, and an excellent view of Windsor. This publication will prove eminently useful to the tyro in the art of drawing. Copies may be had coloured, if required.

Sacramental Wines. By ANDREW GILMOUR. Glasgow: George Gallie. [SECOND NOTICE.]

WE again refer to this excellent work, as our notice of it last week was too concise to afford the reader an adequate idea of the style in which it is written. We now proceed to lay a few extracts before our readers:—

"Nor must the pious reader of the word of God be startled by the objections of men who display more zeal than knowledge in opposing this view of the matter. They will tell him that, as the Hebrew word is applied to wine, whether it is spoken of with approbation or with disapprobation, therefore the wine must also be the very same in both cases—as there is no difference in the words, there can be no difference in the nature of the wine spoken of. Now, this is abundantly flimsy and superficial. Apply this reasoning to man as a holy being, and as a fallen creature, and to what conclusion would it bring us? We should be compelled to conclude, according to this reasoning, that because the same name is given to Adam before and after the fall, therefore, his nature must be the same! We know to the contrary, not from mere verbal criticism, however; for this can tell us as little about the sad change in Adam's character as it can tell us about the sad change that has taken place in the nature of wine; but we know this from the history of man, as given in the divine word. The Bible tells us that Adam was made upright, but that he sought out many inventions—that he was created in the image of God, in knowledge, in righteousness, and in true holiness; but he disobeyed God; he fell into a state of spiritual darkness and distance from his Maker, into a state of condemnation and wrath, into a state of moral pollution, into a state of legal and spiritual death. But the same Bible that tells us of Adam, the child of God, the heir of glory, becoming an apostate, a rebel, and a child of the devil, that same Bible tells us also of wine, a great temporal mercy, and an emblem of every spiritual blessing, becoming a curse 'a mocker,' the 'poison of dragons,' &c."

From this reasoning the author infers the inefficiency of mere verbal criticism. In another part of this work, the author quotes the following admirable opinion expressed by a Frenchman upon the Port-wine used in this country:—

"There is a liquor sold in this country, which they call wine, of what ingredients it is composed, I cannot tell; but you are not to suppose, as the word seems to import, that this is a translation of our word vin, a liquor made of the juice of the grape; for I am well assured there is not a drop of any such juice in it.—There must be many ingredients in this liquor, from its many different tastes, some of which are sweet, others sour, and others bitter; but though it appeared so nauseous to me and my friends, the English swallow it with avidity."

SLANDER.—Look on slanderers as direct enemies to civil society; as persons without honour, honesty, or humanity. Whoever entertains you with the faults of others, designs to serve you in a similar manner.

ORIENTAL FRAGMENTS. No. V.

BY JAMES SILK BUCKINGHAM.

PORT OF SUEZ.—FEBRUARY 20.—Hassan Aga, the governor, had engaged to take me over the harbour, and on board the vessels in port, in his own boat, this morning; but intelligence reaching him of the arrival of the grand caravan, from Cairo, which had set out the day before we left that city, he was prevented from accompanying me, and politely begged my acceptance of his boat and eight men for the day. We left the wharf at an early hour, and taking with me the Greek captain and our attendant of yesterday, we steered out into the deep channel, the banks being dry at low water, and the wind from the southward. We first visited a ship of four hundred tons, and a brig of about three hundred, the former ready to depart for Jeddah, laden with grain, brought across the desert from Egypt; the latter recently arrived from thence in ballast. Both of these were vessels belonging to the Pasha; they were nearly new, and had been built in the yard at Suez; nor were they, either in their construction or equipment, inferior to the ships of the Adriatic. Each of them was armed with fourteen guns, manned with a very motley crew of fifty men, and commanded by Greeks of the Archipelago, under Turkish flags.

After obtaining from their commanders all the local information they could afford me, relative to the prevailing winds, weather, and navigation of the Red Sea, we procured from them a hand-lead and line, and with the chart and compass I possessed, we proceeded to survey the harbour, and take the soundings and bearings of the best anchorage-berths. It was a long and tedious duty, with so bad a boat's crew; but as the weather was extremely favourable, I succeeded in executing it much to my own satisfaction; and had the whole of the best anchorages marked with their accurate bearings, and their depths in fathoms, upon the chart.

Mr. Browne, the African traveller, in his work, says: "At Suez, I observed, in the shallow parts of the adjacent sea, a species of weed, which was of a hue between scarlet and crimson, and of a spongy nature. Perhaps this, if found in abundance, may have given the recent name to this sea; for this was the Arabian Gulf of the ancients, whose 'Mare Erythraum,' or Red Sea, was the Indian Ocean. This weed was perhaps the Suph of the Hebrews, whence again Suph, their name for this sea." I sought personally, and by inquiries among them, after such a weed, but neither saw nor heard of any other than the common brown weed of the English channel, approaching nearer in colour to those floating fields which are carried northward by the Gulf of Florida stream, and having rather a yellowish than a reddish hue. Even this, however, was by no means abundant, any more than the beautiful shells of which he speaks, and which are found only to the southward.

We returned in the evening with a light southerly breeze against the ebb tide, and had scarcely landed, before the wind flew round to the north-west, and blew with great violence, increasing with the night.

As a port, Suez is infinitely superior to Cosseir, farther down the Red Sea; and the difficulty of access to it from the southward on account of the prevailing northerly winds, may be considered as its greatest if not its only disadvantage. When the port is gained, however, the shelter from those winds, under the high land of Mount Adaga, is secure; the depth of water, from two-and-a-half to ten fathoms, is convenient; and the holding ground, being firm sand, is good. The prevalence of fine weather will generally allow good anchorages to be deliberately chosen; and for the same reason, berths may be shifted at pleasure. The tides, having not more than five or six feet rise and fall, are not violent in their rate of ebb and flow, and are but little influenced by winds. The time of high water, at full and change, is about twelve o'clock at noon, the new moon of to-day affording me an opportunity of actual observation; and from the testimonies of others, those tides are extremely regular in their courses and returns.

Vessels lightened of their cargoes, and laden boats, pass from the outer harbour to the town, through the deep channel, at all times of tide; and for small boats, there is water through the shallow channel at about quarter flood. Cargoes may be therefore shipped and landed in the large barks of the country, with perfect safety; the distance of the anchorage to the wharfs being at least three miles, would render the use of ship's boats unnecessary, unless to tow against the wind or tide.

Of the vessels now actually employed in the trade of the Red Sea, from Suez only, there are upwards of a hundred sail, including the dows, or boats of forty to sixty tons each. These bring from Mocha, Jeddah, Yambu, and the ports of the south, coffee, gums, spices, drugs, Indian pepper, etc., and return thence with Egyptian corn. Their passages to the southward are in general short and favourable; but in beating up the Red Sea, their practice is to turn to windward during the day, and anchor on the coast until morning, as the northerly winds die away at sun set, and make night anchorages safe. For this purpose, they are provided with light anchors and grass cables, and these in more than usual abundance, from their liability to loss by the chafing of the coral rocks. Fresh water is bad and scarce through every part of the Red Sea; it is therefore an article of expense, and one that requires rigid economy in its use. The fountains of Ayoon, on the Asiatic coast, supply ships at Suez for their voyage to the southward, and at Tor they generally touch to replenish, after a long passage up.

The wages of sailors are low, and their provisions cheap, being chiefly rice, coffee, ghee or butter, and corn, etc.; but they are so unskilful in their profession, that a double crew is almost indispensable to insure the safety of the voyage. The pilots of the port are also extremely ignorant of their duty, and everything combines to render capacity and vigilance the more necessary on the part of those who may be entrusted with the direction of vessels in this sea. The magazines for the reception of goods are cheap, and sufficiently secure for a climate in which it seldom rains. Camels for their conveyance to Cairo can always be depended on, and the slight escort of a field-piece and twenty or thirty cavalry, may be considered ample protection against the plundering wanderers of the desert.

The want of docks at Suez, the necessity of having every material either for building or repairs brought by the caravans from Egypt, the difficulty of heaving a vessel down, from the existence of a tide, and of leaving her dry on the beach, from the insufficiency of its rise and fall, are all serious obstacles to the making it a naval arsenal, or to the giving ships even a temporary refit in its harbour. Vessels trading from India hence should therefore be invariably coppered, and so complete in their equipments, as to have on board everything necessary for their own repairs: the simple articles of a needle or a skein of twine to repair a bread-bag, a bung for a water-cask, or a broom to sweep the decks with, being as difficult to be found here as a mast, an anchor, or a cable.

In visiting the small yard for building, where two vessels were on the stocks, I could not but remember the very curious observations of Mr. Browne on the subject during his visit here. He says: "The Arab mode of building is singular, for they use no art to bend the timbers, none of which are crooked, unless naturally so, and where the upper and lower ribs join, they do not pass over one another, but by the side of each other!" There are few subjects perhaps on which literary men are more liable to error, than on that of maritime affairs. When those errors are of a trifling kind, they are very pardonable; but when they display a total ignorance of the matter on which they treat, one cannot but regret that they should so commit themselves, by a misapplication of talents, or by venturing remarks on affairs with which they are not conversant. In the present instance, more particularly, had Mr. Browne been in the slightest degree acquainted with the principles of ship-building, or known only the outlines of marine architecture, he would have found that those very characteristics of the Arabian mode, were also the leading features of our own; and that from a first-rate line-of-battle ship, down to a frigate's launch, it is the universal practice of the British yards; first, because artificially-bent wood for knees and floor timbers, would be inferior in strength to those preserving the natural form of their growth; and secondly, that the side-joining of the ribs gives double strength to their immediate point of union, and admits a smooth surface for planking; whereas, to obtain this, the timbers, or the upper and lower ribs, as he terms them, were joined by passing over each other, it would be necessary to taper off the extremities of each, to form a smooth surface for the reception of the outer plank, when the point of union between the timbers, where most strength is required, would, by such a method, be made the weakest.

The artisans of this naval yard are all Greeks of the Archipelago, chiefly from Idera, Ipsera, and Mitylene, and are not inferior in the knowledge of their art to the shipwrights of the Mediterranean. Their supplies of building-timber are chiefly from the coast of Caramania, in Asia Minor, transported by way of Cairo and the Nile; their spars, cordage, sails, pitch, tar, anchors, guns, &c., are drawn either from Constantinople or the Black Sea; and all this renders the building of a vessel and her outfit extremely expensive here.

Lord Valentia remarks, that Suez labours under considerable disadvantages from its situation at the extremity of a narrow and difficult gulf, down which the wind blows nine months in the year. "In early times," says he, "it was some counterbalance, that a canal communicated with the most fertile part of Egypt, by which they could be supplied with grain for exportation to Arabia. Yet with all this, the Ptolemies, who were good judges of what was for the best, thought it advisable to establish a new emporium at Berenice (lower down the Red Sea), though it obliged them to convey the goods upward of two hundred miles over land to Coptos, before they could be embarked on the Nile. From all this disadvantage of situation, even if the canal again existed, Berenice would be preferable to Suez."

On the fact of Suez having, in many respects, a disadvantageous situation, and on the propriety of the reasons assigned, no one would differ from his lordship, any more than they would doubt the historical truth of the Ptolemaean establishment at Berenice. Under so wealthy, so powerful, and so well regulated a government, as that by which Egypt then flourished, when the dominion of the desert was maintained by the intervening posts between the Red Sea and the Nile, and when the transportation of merchandise both by land caravans, and river fleets, were both attended with security of property to all concerned, such a route as that of Berenice and Coptos was preferable; because the imperfect state of navigation in those days rendered the perils of the upper part of the Red Sea more dreadful than the present, and the shortening of a vessel's voyage of more importance.

At this moment, however, the case is very different. Grain forming the chief, and one might almost say the only, staple article of exportation from Egypt to Arabia, can be had no where in such abundance, and with such facility of transportation, as at Suez; because of its being nearer to the most fertile provinces of Lower Egypt, the grain of which is firmer, and better fitted for exportation, than that of the Said, or Upper Egypt; and because the road thence is not one-third the distance of the Coptos route, is less mountainous, and more clear from the attacks of freebooters; thus, affording a facility of transportation across its firm gravelly plains, which renders the loss of the ancient canal of less importance than is imagined. The conveyance of the grain down the Red Sea, when once embarked, is performed in one-fourth of the time that it could be, if sent from the Delta in boats, to be conveyed to Berenice, by ascending the Nile to Keneh. Thus far as regards the exportation; and to the mode of importation, many of the same remarks would apply. Supposing, then, the ports of Berenice and Suez to be equally good and safe, it remains for us to judge, whether the additional distance by sea—at a period like the present, when that sea is so much better known, navigation so much more perfect, and ships themselves so much better constructed, both for safety and despatch, with only one discharge of cargo, and its transportation immediately to the capital, by a securer and a shorter route—is not more advantageous than the landing of merchandise at Berenice, farther south: having it conveyed a triple distance, across a mountainous track of desert to the Nile, where its remoteness from the metropolis would render all caravans more liable to attack and plunder. No man can hesitate in deciding for the preference of Suez over Berenice, who weighs well the reason assigned.

APHORISMS.

DELICACY.—Fastidiousness has committed so many forgeries on the firm of delicacy, that this poor virtue is nearly reduced to a state of bankruptcy. Familiarity inevitably destroys delicacy. Perhaps this is the reason why the society of strangers is sometimes more agreeable than that of our most intimate relatives. Delicacy respects the feelings of every body. It not only abstains from wounding the sensibilities of a modest woman, but even from trifling with the fancies of a nervous hypochondriac. Human life is full of so many grossnesses, each of which gives a fresh wound to delicacy, that at length she expires under repeated blows. At fifteen, our feelings are in their most sensitive state; at thirty, we regard with indifference things which, in younger and purer years, would have annoyed us exceedingly; at fifty, our beauty and our delicacy are both withering together—it is but paint for the former, and affectation for the latter; and, in old age, to find those emotions of the soul, would be as wonderful as to meet a smooth and rosy complexion. To a certain degree, delicacy is a virtue; let it get a step beyond, and it becomes the most childish imbecility.

DEATH.—They who have experienced a very severe and alarming illness, can, in some measure, realize what their feelings will be on the approach of the king of terrors. They found the things of this world, one after another, deserting them:—first, their common amusements, their interest in the bustle of life; then a thousand long-cherished but foolish hopes; and lastly, even then, (what to a creature standing on the borders of eternity becomes tasteless, wearisome,) then the consolations of friendship. What remained? A frightful void! or the love of God! and in that, all which cheers an angel's heart! Here is a sublime sight—a creature hovering between earth and heaven, unfit for the one, unacquainted with the other; incapable of holding any intercourse with the inhabitants of either world: hanging on the Supreme Governor of the universe alone for comfort, as a child holds with implicit confidence the hand of its tender parent.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

STOWMARKET.

THE Teetotal cause has taken a fresh stir here. A Tea Party was held at the Temperance Hall, on Thursday, the 11th instant, for the express purpose of establishing unity among the Teetotalers of the place. An able and zealous friend, Mr. SERVICK, was called to the chair. Mr. SOREWELL ably proved that Knowledge is Power, and Drunkenness a Curse, by detailing an account of the rise and fall of states and nations. Mr. STIFF, from Ipswich, explained the benefits of the institution of the Rechabites, and proposed the establishment of a tent in this town. Mr. C. CUTNAR and Mr. BARRY then addressed the audience. About seventy persons sat down to tea, and highly delighted with their evening's entertainment. One of the Christian ministers of Stowmarket has at length signed the pledge—a circumstance calculated to produce the most beneficial results amongst his flock.

DAVENTRY.

THE Teetotalers of this town have had much opposition to contend against. They have, however, exerted themselves nobly and well in the good cause, which is now prospering amongst them. The principles of Teetotalism have already defaced many of the prejudices of the inhabitants, and prepared the way for more rational customs and enjoyments than those connected with the use of intoxicating liquors. A series of lectures has been lately delivered at Daventry by MESSIEURS BEGGS, (of Nottingham), BENDOW, (of Birmingham), and MANNING, (of Leamington). A Temperance Tract Loan-Society has been established at this place: this is an idea which might be successfully carried out elsewhere. The Association of Total Abstinents at Daventry now consists of nearly two hundred and fifty staunch members: the appearance of the town has therefore undergone a complete change since the establishment of this admirable Society. We shall always be glad to hear from the Secretary.

KENDAL.

TEETOTALISM progresses here in a manner highly encouraging to the friends of the cause. The principle of Union, as advocated by The Teetotaler, is favourably received by the Society at Kendal. A clever correspondent from this place observes,—"I compare Teetotalism, when properly understood, to a good father whose benevolence and tender care engender numerous virtues in the bosoms of his offspring. That such a kind parent should possess children who are occasionally unruly, is to be deplored; but Teetotalism is a new principle, and has yet to triumph over vitiated feelings, uncharitable sentiments, and rude notions. Unity is decidedly strength; impartiality is a strong feature of improvement in the judgment of men; and benevolence is a foundation upon which a colossal pyramid of good deeds may be raised. Welcome the Teetotaler, be he Turk, Jew, or Infidel; and, if a man sin in many things, do not overlook that virtue which may serve as a redeeming quality." We regret that we cannot lay the whole of this very clever letter before our readers.

SHREWSBURY.

ON the 15th instant, a grand meeting was held at the Sunday School belonging to the Trinity Church, Coleham. The REV. J. COLLEY, M.A., took the chair. The reverend gentleman said, that many generations had been deluded for ages past, by the use, and what has been considered the necessity, of strong drink. But it remained for our generation to explode this ancient fallacy. He was desirous that the community should be set right by giving things their proper names. It was admitted that strong drink was a stimulant. Now what was a stimulant? It might be called a spur, and a spur was only necessary for a jaded horse; a fleet horse needed no spur; therefore the more the horse is spurred, the more jaded he becomes. The more we are ourselves excited by stimulants, the more we need their repetition, and the weaker we shall become, mentally and bodily. He feared that the statement that we have in Great Britain, 600,000 drunkards; and that from 40,000 to 50,000 die annually, was awfully true, and could not be too well known in this country. MR. WAKLEY, the Coroner for Middlesex, has stated that drunkenness produces him 1000 inquests annually, and that from 10,000 to 15,000 persons die every year in London and its vicinity, from their propensity to Gin-drinking! We sympathize for the heathens in distant regions. We abhor the cruelties of the horrible Slave-trade; but until very recently, we have not been aroused to the slavery of drunkenness, in the precincts of our very houses. The heathens subject themselves to various tortures, with a view of some reward in a future state. The slave was in bondage to the tyranny of his master; but the drunkard is the voluntary slave, not only inflicting disease and misery on himself, but rubbing his family of bread by his filthy habits. Was is not then surely time something should be done to reclaim the slaves of our own nation from this debasing propensity, this demoralising habit? He trusted that these facts and arguments would be seriously considered by all present, for he was certain that Teetotalism was a doctrine of truth, and in spite of all opposition it must prevail.

The reverend gentleman was listened to with great attention. He was followed by MESSIEURS W. BROWN, T. CORFIELD, and PARLOW, who delivered most admirable addresses, which produced a great effect.

BOLTON.

WE have received the Seventh Annual Report of the Bolton Temperance Society, extracts from which we hasten to lay before our readers:—

"The Committee, at the beginning of the year 1839, passed a resolution at one of their weekly meetings to make an effort to build a Temperance Hall. As the Teetotalers, as a body, mostly belong to the working classes, it could not be expected that they could accomplish task of themselves; it was, therefore, determined to wait upon a number of wealthy individuals, who, though not members of our Society, were known to be favourable to it; and the result exceeded the most sanguine expectations. Receiving encouragement from nearly all sects and classes of the community, the Committee were induced to take immediate steps for the accomplishment of the, to them, gigantic undertaking; and the first stone was laid on Friday, May 24, 1839, by James Spence, Esq., of Liverpool, to whom a silver trowel was presented on the occasion. While the building was in the course of erection, that portion of the public who are opposed to our principles indulged in various speculations, and gave utterance to numberless predictions as to the final completion of the work; and there is no doubt, if wishes could realize anything, that their prophecies would have received a fulfilment. A happier destiny, however, awaited us; under the blessing and care of a gracious Providence, the work went on in the most satisfactory manner; and on New Year's Day, 1840, our Temple of Freedom was opened to the public. The cost of the building, including its furniture, amounts to two thousand one hundred pounds, towards which about seven hundreds has been collected, leaving a debt on the premises, at present, of fourteen hundred pounds; and although your Committee did not, at one time, venture to anticipate such liberal aid, they feel assured that the gloomy state of the commercial horizon, during the two last years, has prevented them from receiving several hundred pounds more.

"That the subject is making steady advances, they can have no doubt; and that it must and will continue to advance, until the drinking of intoxicating drink, as a common beverage, is deemed a violation of moral and religious propriety, they feel equally certain; and considering the fearful amount of moral and physical evil which must inevitably afflict the human family so long as its use is sanctioned and perpetuated, they cannot but fervently pray that God's fair world may speedily be delivered from 'the abominable thing.'"

We earnestly call the attention of all our readers to the noble exertions made by the Teetotalers of Bolton in the foundation of a Temperance Hall.

THAME.

MR. MINGAYE SYDER, delighted the inhabitants of this town with two physiological lectures upon the question of true temperance, in the British School-room, Feb. 18th and 19th. We understand that the cause is likely to lose the assistance of this gentleman, owing to the individual sacrifice being more than he can consistently continue to make. We hope the friends to true temperance will make one great effort to secure such a giant of medical learning yet a little while; or that if he be determined upon resuming his professional duties, the Teetotalers will mark their sense of his exclusive devotion to the cause for above three years, by some public testimonial.

TOWN NEWS.

TEMPERANCE HALL, SHOREDITCH.

THE Metropolitan Roman Catholic Total Abstinence Association has engaged this place of meeting for every Thursday evening. This Society is progressing at a wonderful rate, and effecting worlds of benefit, thanks to the exertions of MR. JOHN GILES, MR. HAYNES, DR. MAGEX, and other strenuous advocates.

CHELSEA AUXILIARY TO THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

DR. LOVE, M.D., has accepted the Presidency of this Society. A course of lectures will be given at the Temperance Hall, 56, George-street, Chelsea, on the under-mentioned subjects, and by the following gentlemen:—February 22nd, Astronomy, MR. MEE. March 1, Astronomy (continued) MR. MEE. March 8, The Effects of Intemperance, MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS. March 15, Geology, MR. G. H. WHEELER. March 22nd, Geology (continued) MR. M. H. WHEELER. March 29, Education, MR. STALWOOD. April 5, Education (continued) MR. STALWOOD. The above lectures will be illustrated by globes, diagrams, &c. &c. Public meetings are held every Tuesday and Friday for the advocacy of the principles of Teetotalism.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

ON Saturday evening, February 20th, the meeting at the Aldersgate-street Chapel was crowded, in order to hear a discussion between MR. CRUMP, and a MR. BALLARD.

MR. BALLARD said that he was not opposed to persons, but to principles; that he objected to drunkenness as much as any man; but that he certainly thought no one ought to object to the moderate use of those things which God had provided. He said that alcohol was contained in almost everything, bread, sugar, fruits, &c. He moreover said that wine was nutritious.

MR. CRUMP expatiated at considerable length upon the evils of intemperance, and showed the good effects, moral and physical, resulting from Teetotalism. The majority of the audience expressed itself in favour of this lecturer.

We believe that MR. JOHNSON will continue the discussion with MR. BALLARD on Saturday night, February 27.

[We are surprised that any man should display such extraordinary ignorance relative to the nature and properties of alcohol, as this MR. BALLARD. Alcohol exists, in its native state, in nothing. Its principles are disseminated in various matters; and when these matters run into decay, and fermentation takes place, then—and not till then—is alcohol engendered. There is no alcohol in the grape in its natural state; but the principles of alcohol are there, only in a disseminated state. When the juice of the grape is expressed, the sugar, the ferment, and the fermentable matter are amalgamated together: fermentation then takes place; and alcohol is then formed. It is as absurd to say that alcohol exists in nature, as to say that ginger-beer exists in nature, in a natural state. The elements, of which ginger beer is composed, exist in nature; and the amalgamation forms the drink. The artificial aid of man is required to make this compound; and the aid of nature, in the process of decay, is required to produce the alcohol. MR. BALLARD then said that wine was nutritious. It is only so far nutritious in proportion to the amount of substantial matter to which it can be reduced; and we know that a quart of wine, when reduced to substantial matter, is not equivalent in nutritious powers to one ounce of bread. —EDITOR OF "THE TEETOTALER,"]

CLERKENWELL AND PENTONVILLE YOUTHS' TEETOTAL SOCIETY.

THIS admirable association held its anniversary meeting at the Parochial School, Amwell-street, Pentonville, on February 15th, when, in the absence of their respected President, the REV. J. WEBB, of Harefield, took the chair. Addresses were delivered by the REV. W. TYLER, MR. MINGAYE SYDER, MR. CURRIE and MR. CHARLES TAYLOR, Treasurer of the Clerkenwell (adults) Society, and H. C. R. I. C. B. Rechabites. In the course of the evening a splendid gold medal and chain, and pearl pen, were presented by MASTER BROOKS, in the name of the Society, to MR. R. P. BATGER, the Secretary, "as a trifling testimonial for his valuable services." The meeting was crowded throughout the evening; upwards of two thousand persons, including the parish authorities, being present. We were gratified in noticing, among many other distinguished individuals on the platform, MR. R. HICKS, surgeon, and MR. EMBERSON, the esteemed Treasurer of the United Temperance Association. A grand vocal and instrumental concert in aid of the funds of the same Society will take place at Aldersgate-street chapel, on Monday evening next, when upwards of forty talented performers will attend.

MR. MINGAYE SYDER.

THE following is a portion of the petition presented to Parliament by this gentleman, through MR. BROTHERTON, M.P. for Salford:—

"The respectful Petition of Mingaye Syder, of No. 74, Blackman-street, Southwark, Licentiate and Teacher of Medicine, Sheweth,

"That your Petitioner has attended meetings, examined individuals, and delivered lectures in above two hundred of the larger towns in England, to numerous and highly respectable audiences, and has used every exertion to ascertain the effects of an entire and sudden abandonment of alcoholic fluids upon the human constitution, in all its varieties, and under all possible contingencies.

"That the results of your Petitioner's diligent inquiries are, first, a thorough conviction that the use of fluids containing alcohol habitually, in any proportion, tends to disturb the animal economy and nature's several balances, upon a maintenance of which perfect health depends. Secondly, that, being productive of functional derangements and organic disease, intoxicating fluids disqualify persons as progenitors of healthy offspring, and hence an immense proportion of those peculiarities of constitution, nervous affections, hereditary predispositions to disease, &c. &c., terms quite familiar to your honourable House. Thirdly, that your Petitioner, during the last three years, has done greater service to fellow man in the shape of preventing, by influencing persons to abandon the chief cause of disease, than during twenty years' extensive practice by his efforts to cure disease.

"Your Petitioner most respectfully begs to remind your honourable House that it is computed that one drunkard dies every ten minutes; and if to this be added the probable amount of the premature deaths by a more slow but certain system, enough will be presented to rivet the attention and strike with awe every man who admits his responsibility.

"And your Petitioner will ever pray, &c.

"MINGAYE SYDER.

PICKWICK MARRIED.

CHAPTER VII.

THIS IS ONE OF THE MOST REMARKABLE AND IMPORTANT CHAPTERS OF OUR NARRATIVE, AND WILL BE FOUND TO BE INTIMATELY CONNECTED WITH THE TITLE THEREOF.

THE sympathy excited in favour of the distressed Cannibals was very great at the epoch of which this memorable history is now treating; and although a great number of the city folks did not precisely comprehend in what manner the hopes of the philanthropists, who had taken up their cause with so much ardour, were to be carried out, the ball-room at the London Tavern was thronged with all the beauty and fashion east of Temple Bar. Indeed, it had struck the erudite Mr. Pickwick himself that the messengers, who would be doubtless despatched to the Society Islands with provisions purchased by the proceeds of the ball, would stand a very good chance of becoming food themselves for the famished Cannibals. Be all this, however, as it may or might, it is not the less a fact that the ball took place; that there was the usual amount of music, dancing, light, mirth, and noise; that the Sago family was there in all the bloom of respectability and costly garments; and that the countenances of Mr. Pickwick, Mr. Tupman, Mr. Winkle, and Mr. Snodgrass gave additional animation to the joyous scene.

When the first quadrilles were over, refreshments of all elegant kinds were handed about by the obsequious waiters; but many persons who were present have since declared that nothing was more refreshing both for the imagination and the spirits than the manner in which Mr. Pickwick suddenly darted away from his companions, tripped airily across the room, nearly knocked down one of the aforesaid waiters in his way, and hastened up to Miss Teresina Sago, whom, with the boldness and manly decision natural to his character, he challenged to be his partner in the next dance. The eyes of this extraordinary man twinkled, like stars, behind his spectacles; one of his feet, both of which were embellished, or rather themselves embellished black silk stockings, was slightly raised from the ground, and pointed downwards in a manner calculated to menace rivalry to the science of Taglioni; and while his right arm was partly extended, his left hand played negligently with the eye-glass that was suspended by a black riband to his neck. Never was seen a more graceful attitude; and so cheering was the scene, that many who beheld it could not conceal their mirth, but laughed outright.

At the farther end of the room did Mr. Tupman, Mr. Snodgrass, and Mr. Winkle stand to admire the proceedings of their great leader; and, as if the spirit which had animated him were suddenly transfused to them, they all abruptly burst into animation and motion, and hurried to different parts of the room to select partners for the ensuing dance. Mr. Tupman was introduced by the master of the ceremonies to a middle-aged lady, with an immense yellow turban, who had never hoped to dance again;—Mr. Winkle recognised the niece of an acquaintance in one direction; and Mr. Snodgrass the daughter of a common councilman in another;—and thus, in far less time than the details have occupied to relate, did Mr. Pickwick and his three friends accomplish four triumphs well worthy of being recorded in this narrative of important events.

The ladies and gentlemen now began to take their places for the next quadrille; and the Pickwickians with their partners did the same. Mr. Tupman and the lady in the yellow turban became the vis-à-vis to Mr. Pickwick and Miss Sago; and then, when she was thus standing up, Mr. Tupman found reason to felicitate himself in having fallen in with a partner who could not have weighed much less than sixteen or eighteen stone. He was just thinking how very unpleasant it would be were she to happen to tread upon his toes, when the symphony bade him prepare for an exhibition of his skill in the Terpsichorean art.

The dance began; and—either through an unusual springiness in the boards, or in consequence of his body having suddenly partaken of the lightness of his heart,—Mr. Pickwick began to cut some of the most extraordinary flings that ever were seen in or out of a ball-room, or off a gibbet. Certain it is that he was not now dancing upon nothing; for the floor creaked beneath his weight; and the elasticity of the boards only served to increase the height of his capers. His three friends evidently felt proud of this splendid display of agility on the part of our hero, and did all they could to imitate it.

"Pray who is that stout gentleman whom you recognised just now, as we passed our vis-à-vis?" enquired the lady in the yellow turban of Mr. Tupman.

"Oh! that is Mr. Pickwick," was the ready answer.

"Indeed!" said the lady. "He seems very fond of dancing."

"And yet it is a very long time since I saw him exhibit his powers," observed Mr. Tupman.

"The philanthropy of the cause for which this ball is given," said the lady, "is probably the inducement to a little additional gaiety on this occasion."

"It certainly is a most humane purpose," remarked Mr. Tupman.

"Pray, sir, do you know how far off the people live for whom the charity is intended?" enquired the lady.

"I really cannot say," answered Mr. Tupman; "but I should think some thousands of miles."

"Oh!" cried the lady, with an air of delight; "then I suppose it will be all salt provisions which will be sent to them?"

"Certainly," said Mr. Tupman.

"Ah! I'm glad of that!" cried the lady.

"Are you any way interested as to the nature of the food to be forwarded to the suffering Cannibals?" demanded Mr. Tupman, in a gentle tone.

"Oh! to be sure I am," ejaculated the lady. "I'm in hopes of having the contract. I'm in the ham and boiled beef line myself!"

Mr. Tupman surveyed with astonishment the lady whom he had taken for a substantial widow with about fifteen hundred to two thousand a year, and probably three or four nice little freeholds within the bills of mortality; and he screwed up his nose in a highly edifying manner, as if his olfactory nerves were suddenly assailed with the odours of boiled beef and greens.

In the meantime Mr. Snodgrass had "done the amiable" as well as he could to his partner, and as well as a man usually does who has left his wife at home to take care of the children: in other words, he was wonderfully well pleased at being emancipated from the thralldom of the domestic circle for a few hours.

"How highly poetic is this scene," said he to his partner, with a sigh such as a votary of the Muses alone could be expected to heave.

"Yes—only the candles do smell so horrid," answered the young lady thus appealed to.

"What would Byron have said had he seen so much youth and beauty assembled together in one spot?" asked Mr. Snodgrass, with another sentimental sigh.

"He would have wondered, as I do, that the old lady who is dancing with your friend should have thought of making such a fool of herself," returned the partner of the poetic Mr. Snodgrass.

"And what think you of this divine melody?"

enquired Mr. Snodgrass. "Is not the music enough to transport the soul, with enthusiasm, to other spheres, and plunge the imagination in a delicious dream—?"

"There's another false note, I declare!" exclaimed the young lady. "I wonder that the Committee should have hired such a band. But it is a Charity-Ball in all respects, I should say."

Mr. Winkle, on his side, was also taking advantage of the intervals between the figures to indulge in a little pleasant chit-chat with his partner, with whom he was well acquainted, and with all her family.

"Why is your father not here to-night?" he enquired.

"Why didn't Mrs. Winkle accompany you?" asked the lady.

"What a beautiful day it has been!"

"How crowded the room is!"

"Have you seen the new melo-drama at the Adelphi?"

"I wonder who mamma is talking to over there."

"They tell me it is a capital piece."

"I can't think who it can be."

"The author is unknown."

"Oh! quite unknown—I never saw him before."

"The costumes are elegant."

"Well—I can't say that I think he is well dressed."

"To whom do you allude?"

"To the gentleman talking to mamma."

All this colloquy was very pleasant and agreeable; and at balls few people are entertained upon any more substantial or satisfactory grounds. Indeed, it frequently happens that a gentleman and lady will converse together for ten minutes, while the music is playing with all the might and main of the performers, and smile, and look intelligent, and nod, and shake their heads, and exclaim, "Indeed!" "You don't say so!" "Well—I couldn't have believed it!"—and all the while neither of them hears a syllable the other utters.

But what passed all this time between Mr. Pickwick and Miss Teresina Sago? It is not without a purpose that we deferred a reference to him and his partner until we had satisfied the curiosity of the reader with regard to the conversation which took place between his friends and their partners. We reserve the greatest treat to the last, as a prudent cook places her most succulent dishes upon the table when the more gross food is disposed of.

"It is a very long time since I danced," observed Mr. Pickwick, down whose countenance the perspiration was pouring.

"You have not forgotten your steps, Mr. Pickwick, at all events," returned Teresina.

"I should not have thought of dancing had it not been for—a particular circumstance," added Mr. Pickwick, with a fond glance towards his partner.

"Oh! I fully comprehend you," said Teresina, who imagined that the philanthropic nature of the ball had thus induced Mr. Pickwick to exhibit his acquirements.

"Indeed!" exclaimed Mr. Pickwick; "well—I am glad you comprehend me! On such an occasion I feel that I could dance for hours!" he added enthusiastically.

"All the best feelings of human nature are excited by the occasion," remarked Miss Teresina Sago.

"Devoid of feeling—worse than rock—more passionless than stone, should I be," ejaculated Mr. Pickwick, "did I not acknowledge the truth of your observation?"

"The heart is soon melted, Mr. Pickwick," said Teresina, in a plaintive tone that fell like the notes of a silver bell upon the ears of him to whom the remark was addressed.

"Yes—the heart is conquered by such feelings, and becomes the slave to such sentiments," said he rapturously.

"It is to be desired that all our hopes in this instance will be realised," pursued Teresina.

"I think it depends entirely upon ourselves," returned Mr. Pickwick slyly.

"Oh! not entirely," cried Teresina.

"No—certainly not," said Mr. Pickwick, hastily. "There are parents to be consulted—"

"No parents will refuse to aid their children in so virtuous a design," remarked Teresina.

"Oh! how delighted am I to hear this assurance from your lips!" cried Mr. Pickwick, in an impassioned tone.

"And how happy the poor Cannibals will be when they hear of it!" returned Teresina, with an equally joyous accent.

Mr. Pickwick stared at his partner in the most unfeigned astonishment. He now perceived that a most singular misunderstanding had existed between him and Teresina relative to the topic of their conversation, and that their colloquy had consisted of a most provoking series of equivokes. In a word, he had been delicately and—as he thought—adroitly describing the state of his feelings with respect to Teresina; and she had been alluding all the time to the charitable object for which the ball was given. This misunderstanding was particularly provoking; but Mr. Pickwick was compelled to conduct his partner through the mazes of the next figure; and he, therefore, determined to postpone any further conversation upon the state of his heart—or rather any further attempts to turn the conversation upon that subject—until the termination of the quadrille should afford him a better opportunity.

The quadrille did terminate at length; and, according to prescribed custom, Mr. Pickwick promenaded with his partner two or three times round the room, preceded and followed by the other ladies and gentlemen who had been engaged in the last quadrilles. He then led Miss Teresina to a seat; and this sent happened to be in a secluded part of the room—at a distance from those occupied by any other persons.

"Shall I procure you some lemonade?" enquired Mr. Pickwick, as his companion complained of the heat of the room.

"I will not give you that trouble, Mr. Pickwick," returned Teresina: "I am afraid of drinking anything cold after dancing."

"You are right," said our hero. "I admire such prudence in young ladies: it is not always met with."

"Oh! I only follow mamma's advice," returned Teresina, with bewitching naïveté.

"And you do right to follow your excellent parent's counsel," continued Mr. Pickwick. "A dutiful daughter always makes a good wife."

Teresina started slightly.

"Yes—I have always noticed that a good daughter becomes a good wife," said Mr. Pickwick. "Alas! how happy should I be if I had some one to be my constant companion—some one to whom I could impart all my thoughts and sentiments—some one, in a word—"

"I thought that you were in the habit of putting great confidence in your valet," said Miss Sago.

"Oh! Sam is an excellent fellow," returned Mr. Pickwick; "but that is not the exact companion to whom I was alluding. I mean a companion of a more intimate and more endearing kind—a companion, Miss Sago, who is your equal, and who becomes your friend by legal and religious ties, as well as by those of the heart—a companion—"

"Let us join mamma, Mr. Pickwick," said Teresina, in a tremulous tone.

"I will never rise from this seat till I hear your decision," answered Mr. Pickwick boldly, "unless indeed it is to fall at your feet—or—to fetch you a glass of lemonade—"

"Mr. Pickwick—"

"Never—never," repeated our hero, who had now wound his courage up to the necessary point to make the disclosure, and who saw that it would be useless and cowardly to retreat.

"Mr. Pickwick," again murmured Teresina, who was in reality both bewildered and alarmed by this announcement, which she could not affect to misunderstand, in a public ball-room.

"I await your decision," said Mr. Pickwick, who, with his usual sagacity and prudence, had selected for his declaration of love a time and a place when the slightest peculiarity of manner or variation of countenance would have been remarked:—"I await your decision, Miss Sago! I have not known you long—scarcely a month, I believe; but I have learned to appreciate your good qualities. I am not a young man; but I can be kind and affectionate to one who will be the same to me. I am possessed of a competency—and—and—I love you, Miss Sago!"

This eloquent avowal called up a deep blush to the cheeks of the young lady to whom it was made; and for some time she sat motionless and speechless—uncertain how to act, or how to reply. She had certainly noticed that during his recent visits to her father's house, Mr. Pickwick had paid her a considerable amount of attention; and, when he had taken his departure on those occasions, her mother and sister had certainly joked her relative to the impression she had made upon the "old gentleman;" but she did not anticipate so speedy an avowal of his passion, even if she had ever expected it at all; and as she was a very prudent and well-behaved young lady, she was bound to demonstrate, on such an occasion, a considerable degree of trepidation and embarrassment.

"I hope I have not offended you, my dear Miss Sago?" at length murmured Mr. Pickwick; and then he endeavoured to recal to mind all the tender things which lovers were made to say to their mistress in the novels and romances which he had read; but he could not bethink himself of one single sentence applicable to the present occasion. He looked upwards—but there were no stars to compare her eyes to; he looked to the right, and he saw his friend Tupman's late partner with the yellow turban; he looked to the left, and he saw a waiter poking the fire;—he looked down, and he saw his own kerseymer tights and black silk stockings. None of these objects afforded him a simile to interweave into the language of love.

"No—Mr. Pickwick," said Teresina, after a long pause; "you have not offended me. But let us return to my mamma and sister."

"And may I hope?" asked Mr. Pickwick, as he escorted the fair one to her relatives.

"I beg you will not press the subject with me," returned Teresina. "My papa will—"

And here she stopped; but Mr. Pickwick was a man of the world enough to know that he was accepted by the daughter, and referred to the father. He bestowed a tender squeeze upon the hand of the young lady as he conducted her to a chair next to her mother, and then hastened to rejoin his three friends, who were once more assembled together at the farther extremity of the room.

"How smiling Pickwick is!" said Mr. Tupman to Messieurs Snodgrass and Winkle.

"I think he meditates a conquest in a certain quarter," observed Mr. Winkle.

"All great minds are accessible to love," said the poetic Mr. Snodgrass.

"Thank you for the compliment, Snodgrass," cried Mr. Pickwick. "I am not an exception to the general rule."

The three friends surveyed their leader with mingled admiration and respect; and those master-minds immediately comprehended the state of the great man's feelings.

In the course of the evening Mr. Tupman was introduced to Miss Amelia Sophia Sago; and they danced a quadrille together. To be brief, the ball passed off amazingly well; and so the papers said on the following morning.

On the return of the friends to Half Moon Street, Mr. Pickwick hurried up stairs to his own bedroom, to indulge in the luxury of his private reflections. But to his momentary annoyance he found Mr. Weller reading a book by the fire which was blazing cheerfully in the grate.

"Well, Sam," said Mr. Pickwick, as he took off his coat, and slipped on his dressing-gown by the aid of his servant, "I have done it at last."

"Done wot, sir?" demanded Sam. "Discovered the perpetual motion?"

"No, Sam," answered Mr. Pickwick; "I have done something much more calculated to ensure my happiness."

"So the gen'lman said ven he threw his wife out o' the four wheeled shay an' broke her neck," observed Mr. Weller.

"Sam, I am serious!" cried Mr. Pickwick.

"So am I, sir—wery," was the rejoinder.

"Well, then, Sam—this is what I have done," continued Mr. Pickwick, seating himself by the fire, and poking it fiercely as he spoke, in order that he need not be compelled to look his valet in the face;—"I have decided upon a step which I ought to have taken twenty years ago."

"Ah! sir," said Sam very seriously, "many's the feller, that if he'd on'y taken a step on the tread-wheel twenty year ago, wouldn't ha' been transported now: he'd a profited by the example."

"You don't by any means comprehend my meaning, Sam," continued Mr. Pickwick mildly. "I shall, sir, ven you'll give me a chance," cried Sam.

"I have long thought that when a man arrives at the evening of existence, he requires some bright constellation to cheer the gloom of his waning existence," observed Mr. Pickwick, by way of rendering himself intelligible to his domestic, while he shook his head most mysteriously.

"Ah! I des say its all wery right, sir," said Mr. Weller: "I von't dispute it—I'll take your word for it; your head's crammed wery full o' good things, sir; on'y I can't get to see wot's in it, and I can't tell by the shaking, as the nobleman said ven he bought the cocoa-nut."

"I mean, Sam, that I wish for a companion for my declining years; and that—"

A long, loud, and shrilly whistle now emanated from the lips of Mr. Samuel Weller, upon whose brain a ray of intelligence had suddenly darted.

"I see wot you're a drivin' at now," he exclaimed; "an' if so be as the young gal isn't a wixen, and won't go pitchin' into you, and clawin' out your eyes, and writing her name on your face with her nails, and none o' them anticks, I can't see why you shouldn't go to the himminal haltar as well as any von else."

"You speak like a very rational young man, Sam," said Mr. Pickwick, considerably delighted with this observation.

"My father used to say that I had a great deal o' good nat'ral ability ven I was a boy, sir," returned Sam: "I remember how he praised me, and gived me a half-crown 'cos I invented a thing to entice the neighbours' chickens over the wall—"

"I didn't mean abilities of that kind, Sam," hastily interrupted Mr. Pickwick. "But—as I was saying—I intend to unite myself with Miss Teresina Sago, whom you have seen."

"A wery nice gal, sir," observed Sam.

"And so you approve of this change in my condition—do you, Sam?" enquired our hero, with a smile of satisfaction and complacency.

"In course I do, sir," answered Sam. "Ven's the veddin' to take place?"

"Oh! all that will be settled by-and-bye, Sam," said Mr. Pickwick with a smile. "Rome wasn't built in a day: we must get on by degrees."

"So the insolvent said, sir, ven he offered to pay off the thousand pounds vich he'd borrowed of a friend, at a penny a week," observed Mr. Weller.

"Well, Sam, we will converse upon the matter to-morrow morning. Good night."

"Good night, sir," cried the faithful valet; and in half an hour master and servant were snoring and dreaming comfortably, each on his respective couch.

(To be continued in our next.)

In Paris there are 1414 boot and shoe makers; 1079 jewellers and silversmiths; 319 hosiers; 1713 grocers; 300 coffee-house keepers; 1350 medical and surgical practitioners; 1058 tailors; 2790 wine-merchants; 960 hair-dressers; and 601 bakers.

The hundred thousandth part of a grain of gold may be seen by the naked eye; and a cube of gold, whose side is but the hundredth part of an inch, has 2433 millions of visible parts. A cylinder of silver, covered with gold leaf, may be drawn out 350 miles long, and yet the gold will cover it. Gold leaf can be reduced to the three hundred thousandth part of an inch, and gilding to the millionth. Silver leaf can be reduced to the hundred and seventy thousandth.

The Inquisition, since its foundation in the fourteenth century, has burnt at the stake above 100,000 persons of both sexes, besides destroying twice that number by imprisonment. Religious wars amongst Christians, for differences of opinion on points of doctrine, have cost the lives of about three millions in direct slaughters; and the wars to establish Christianity, and those waged against the Mussulmans in respect to the Holy Land, have cost fifty millions of lives. The wars of Charlemagne to christianize the Saxons, and of the Spaniards to christianize the Moors and Americans, cost fifteen millions of lives.

A dozen English words end with a, and two dozen with o: nearly five thousand with y. Ough has seven sounds,—up, o, off, us, ov, ow, and au. The Irish Alphabet is the Phœnician. Johnson's Dictionary contains 30,000 words; the Scapular 44,000 Greek words; and Ainsworth's Dictionary, 45,000 Latin words.

There were published in Paris, during the year 1840, no less than 9,700 works in French, German, English, Spanish, Italian, Portuguese, Latin, and Greek; 1349 engravings and lithographs; and 1250 works on music.

France contains 5412 founderies; 39,030 manufactories; and 10,996,785 landowners.

In Germany, from October to April last, 3941 works were published by 530 publishers. Four hundred and six of these were printed at Berlin.

In the year 1821, the population of England was 20,874,158 souls. In 1831, it was 24,099,850, showing an increase of 3,225,692 in ten years.

About 1,800,000 letters are annually thrown into the Unclaimed Letter Office at the French post-office in Paris. During the last six years, the sums of money sent in unclaimed letters have amounted every year to about 25,000 francs, or £1000 sterling.

The advantages of taming wild beasts may be thus demonstrated. The owner of an ambulating menagerie lately calculated that if all the ferocious animals which are now confined in Europe were let loose in an immense forest, it would contain 225 lions, 289 tigers, 302 leopards, 270 panthers, 67 elephants, 10 rhinoceros, 2700 wolves, 78 rattle-snakes, 216 boa-constrictors, 1040 hyenas, and 96 crocodiles.

Since the year 1558, the number of gold pieces coined in England amount to 164,702,335, which, if formed into a cubic metallic mass, would measure more than fourteen square feet.

Speaking on the law of imprisonment for debt, Lord Eldon is reported to have said, some years ago, that the system allows a license to act in a manner more infamous and inhuman than was ever done towards slaves.

In the event of the death of the Emperor of China, the intelligence is announced by despatches to the several provinces, written with blue ink, the mourning colour. All persons of rank are required to take the red silk ornaments from their caps, with the ball or button of rank: all subjects of China, without exception, are called upon to forbear from shaving their heads for a hundred days, within which period none may marry, play on musical instruments, or perform any sacrifice.

France grows 7,000,000 of mulberry trees, which give 3,000,000 lbs. of raw silk annually. The united value of her silks and wines reaches £25,016,220 sterling, on the yearly average. The wines of France produce half as much to the state as her land tax, and from a twenty-sixth of her entire soil, supply one tenth of her revenue. The vines of France cover 4,265,000 acres (English), and the average produce is nearly 250 gallons an acre. About 115,067,360 gallons of brandy are produced by the distillation of wine. The wine-sellers in France are 240,000; and the annual consumption in every mode is equal to 18 gallons for each individual. In Champagne, the land is worth £800 per acre in many parts. Four acres of land, in the Romanée district, were lately sold for £3,300. The Clos de Vougeot estate, which consists of a hundred and twelve acres, sold for £42,000.

Lace gilding is the millionth of an inch thick: gold leaf of the two hundred thousandth of an inch: 500 inches of gold wire have been drawn from a grain. Tin-foil is the one thousandth of an inch; that is, 200 gold leaves are only equal in thickness to one of tin-foil. One grain of gold will cover $7\frac{1}{2}$ inches each way, or 52 square inches, or can be 1500 times thicker than writing paper; that is, a sheet of writing paper would be 1500 leaves. A cubic inch of mercury, at 620.301, weighs 3425.35 grains.

The average length of human life in France is 33 years, 8 months, and 11 days.

Malthus and others, who propose to forbid marriage unless the parties can give security for providing for their children, forget the lottery of life, and that the most auspicious outset often ends in pauperism, and the most unpromising in affluence.

THE PROGRESS OF INEBRIETY:

DEVELOPED IN THE LIFE OF A GENTLEMAN.

PLATE IV.—We now continue the narrative of the Gentleman who is the hero of the illustrations presented with The Teetotaler. In the Fourth Plate, the Gentleman is represented in the magnificent saloon of his Club-House, sitting at a card-table. With regard to the gambling that is carried on to a frightful extent at the Club-Houses at the West End, Mr. Grant, the well-known author of the Great Metropolis, puts the following observations upon record:—

"Respecting all those who enter the hazard-room, I saw at once the policy of plying them with the choicest wines, and with a sufficient quantity of them, because 'when the wine is in, the wit is out,' according to the proverb; and men are then, of course, in the best of all possible conditions to risk their money and play too in such a way as is most likely to result in their losing it." A little further on, Mr. Grant says,—"A superb supper, with a liberal supply of the choicest wines which London can afford, often inspires a disposition to gamble, when nothing else will. Nightly observation teaches the proprietors of these establishments that the transition from the supper-room to the hazard table is as natural as the transition from the latter to utter ruin." There are men about town whose whole time is occupied in what they call picking up flats; and the conduct of some of these gentlemen is heartless in the extreme. They will lay plans to plunder officers in the army or navy, and threaten to expose them to their clubs if they do not pay the amount lost upon credit on the previous evening. A Major in the army was a short time ago compelled to sell his commission to pay a gambling debt contracted to one of these harpies. And yet the aforesaid harpies walk about the West End with head erect, and are ever ready to challenge or to chastise those who dare to question their honour, or tell them that "they are not gentlemen." Into the hands of such wretches as these has our young hero now fallen; and, while his head is turning with the effects of wine, his money passes rapidly over to the gambler who sits opposite to him. Could the professed gambler once stand by and forget the proceedings of the game, so as to contemplate only the various emotions betrayed by the countenances of those who are occupied in it, he might receive a lesson that would probably tend essentially to his benefit. There is an agony in the very gaze of the sharper, when he marks with anxiety the different chances of the cards, or the varied throws of the dice. Whether he be successful or unfortunate, the contingencies of loss, and perhaps of consequent ruin, or at all events of material embarrassment, are perpetually before him; nor are the pleasures of taking up the plunder of an antagonist ample enough to recompense him for the dreadful moments that passed ere the event was decided. The constitution of man suffers by an over excitement of spirits, that in a moment may verge into despondency, and then again be as suddenly elevated to joy by the return of fortune. Frequent potations are necessary to support the tings of loss, and are deemed equally indispensable even when the gambler touches his winnings. In either case he requires liquor. This, with the late hours, the anxious watchings, the periods of varying grief, bliss, despair, exultation,—in fine, dissipation, and an irregular flow of spirits, rob him of many good years of his existence. We have said before a hundred times,—and we now repeat the assertion, and with an equal conviction of its truth as heretofore, that Intemperance is the parent of all vices—and of none more generally than gambling. The Club-Houses at the West End of the Town are plague spots in the metropolis; and the laws which tolerate them, and which forbid gambling in public-houses, only prove the inequality of those statutes which relate to the rich and the poor. The former may indulge in all the vices which their wealth can procure; but the petty failings of the latter are punished with vindictive ferocity.

PLATE V.—The Gentleman and the two friends, with whom he is seen in Plate II, have now found their way into the City, to commence a crusade against the bell-pulls and knockers of the worthy burghers east of Temple-Bar. The Police-Officers are alarmed at the astounding peals of laughter which emanate from the corner of a street, leading out of Cheapside into Ladlane or Cateaton-street, and hurry to the spot. A number of knockers are immediately thrown upon the ground, and the Gentleman raises his fist—proud of the aristocratic accomplishment which he has derived from the initiative kindness of some of the ruffians who are denominated "prize-fighters." The Policeman draws forth a bludgeon, and calls for assistance. A struggle ensues: the three gentlemen are heated with wine, and they offer a desperate resistance. They are however overpowered and carried to the station-house! We must however observe that the wealth of the rich man, especially if he bear a title, will enable him to escape any punishment, even should he so barbarously maltreat a police-man as to render the man an idiot for the remainder of his days. That such aristocratic scoundrels as Earl Waldegrave and Captain Duff should have found favour in the eyes of the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, is calculated to encourage notions of a somewhat extraordinary nature in the minds of those who hitherto imagined that justice was certainly still distributed with an impartial hand by the Judges of the realm. But here we have had an instance of a Lord Chief Justice quietly and coolly assenting to an arrangement being made by means of pecuniary recompense for an injury the infliction of which would have ensured the transportation of a poor man. Yes—boldly and fearlessly do we assert that a poor man would have been transported for that diabolical outrage which is now to be hushed up in respect to its aristocratic perpetrators, for a sum of money! Merciful heavens, is this a land of justice? Is this a country in which the same law exists for both rich and poor? In the first place, the wealth of Earl Waldegrave enabled him to remove the adjudication of the matter from a court where the poor man would be tried at once, to another where not only delay is acquired, but also additional facilities of arrangement are secured, and consequently a court which the poor man could not appeal to. Yes—the rich man may drink on Sunday morning at his Club, and gamble all day there,—he may wrench off knockers, and nearly murder the police, and then escape with a small fine or a pecuniary disbursement of some nature; all this may he do,—but tread-mills, correctional prisons, and severe penalties of various kinds await the delinquent who is neither possessed of wealth nor influence! For the present we must bid adieu to our hero—the Gentleman; leaving him in the safe custody of the City-Police.

BEAUTY.

THE thousand different ideas of beauty which nations and individuals entertain, and which differ so essentially one from the other, exist entirely in the imagination. That which one race of men esteems, another hates. Ideas of general beauty are founded upon utility and convenience. A person, therefore, unacquainted with those purposes of utility and convenience would be unable to judge of the degrees of beauty: hence the idea of beauty is not innate. What is reckoned a beauty in one thing, is thought a blemish in another. A thin neck is reckoned a beauty in a horse, and a blemish in a bull, because it denotes tractableness and docility. A thick neck is reckoned a beauty in a bull, and a blemish in a horse, because it denotes strength and stubbornness. If a savage were shown the old and new buildings of the British Museum, he would (being ignorant of the knowledge of utility and convenience) probably hesitate to which he should give the preference. The commonest rules of architecture are founded upon convenience. Thus, when a person weakens the building by making a window below, it is necessary he should lighten the weight in that part by making a window over it, which adds as much to the beauty of the structure as to the convenience of it. If a child were shown a picture, the finest that could be painted, and a paper daubed over with different tinsel colours, he would immediately fix his eyes on the lustre of the colours, and possibly pronounce the daubing the more beautiful. All this shows that ideas of beauty are not innate.

With regard to beauty in women, the discrepancy in taste is remarkable. In some parts of the world, long hair is considered an ornament; in other regions it is deemed disgusting and filthy. There is a tribe on the eastern coast of Africa which totally reverses the fashion prevalent amongst us with regard to the hair. With the members of that tribe the men wear their hair long, and the females crop theirs close. The Moor points out a woman excessively fat and coarse as a specimen of beauty: the Europeans give the preference to the sylph-like form, and reject that of the over-grown Hebe. The Cherokee Indian sees more loveliness in his squaw than in the finest of America's white daughters; and that squaw would not quit her grim-looking chieftain to become the bride of a fair-haired son of Albion. There are islands in the vast southern seas where the countenances of the women are disfigured with scars made by hot irons; and these are supposed, by the male sex, to enhance the charms of the female.

The poet of Europe has also his standard of female beauty. He admires the regular features, eyes flashing fire, vermilion lips disclosing white teeth, hair clustering in a thousand ringlets—parted over a forehead fair as snow and broad with intelligence—and then falling down on ivory shoulders; the finely-moulded form, the attitude of grace, the air of retiring modesty and virgin bashfulness, the amiability and the look of innocence;—all this is attractive indeed; and yet this combination of charms is only the standard of beauty for a certain portion of the population of the world. And even this standard is varied in its details, to suit especial tastes. Some men prefer light hair and blue eyes: others dark hair and black eyes. Thus, one delights in a brunette; and a second in a fair complexion, composed of delicately blended white and red. This amateur follows in the train of a tall woman; that amateur follows a beauty of short stature. So capricious are the effects of phantasy—so volatile the choice of imagination, that volumes might be filled in detailing the various matters wherein nations or individuals differ.

In one of the Arabian Tales there is a history of a country where age is considered beauty: with us, youth is said to be so. It even appears that Helen of Troy was sixty years of age when she ran away with Alexander, or Paris; it must therefore have been the reputation of her beauty only that won the seducer's heart. The beauty of Florinda in Cava ruined Spain, and was the cause of the admission of the Moors. Agnes Sorel kept Charles of France in the silken chain of love a long while ere his energies were aroused to combat for his country. The only being who had power to soothe Alonzo the Third of Spain was the once beautiful Isabella, daughter of the Duke of Savoy; and two Ottoman Sultans, Emperors as they were, trembled beneath the sway of Roxelana, the Russian, and Baffa, the Venetian.

How just are the following lines from the Bride of Abydos :—

"Who hath not proved how feebly words essay
To fix one spark of Beauty's heavenly ray!
Who doth not feel, until his fading sight
Falls into dimness with its own delight,
His changing cheek, his sinking heart confess
The might—the majesty of loveliness!"

This is perfectly true. I am certain that the greatest misanthrope in the world would relax his stern determinations of unexceptionable seclusion, when the entreaties, the voice, the appeals of Beauty desired him. Let us see what Moore, our favourite poet, says in Lalla Rookh. The tale entitled the Light of the Harem contains the passage to be quoted :—

"There's a beauty for ever unchangingly bright,
Like the long sunny lapse of a summer's day's night,
Shining on—shining on, by no shadow made tender,
Till love falls asleep in its sameness of splendour!
This was not the Beauty—Oh! nothing like this,
That to young Noormahal gave such magic of bliss;
But the loveliness, ever in motion, which plays,
Like the light upon autumn's soft shadowy days,
Now here, and now there, giving warmth as it flies
From the lips to the cheeks, from the cheeks to the eyes,
Now melting in mists, and now breaking in gleams,
Like the glimpses a saint has of heav'n in his dreams."

This is a rich and delicious picture—and yet unsatisfactory at the end. It is a general description, and affords no correct notion by detail. We have before spoken of the power of beauty. Is it to be wondered at, then, if Rolando, the woman-hater in the play of the Honeymoon, uttered these words?—

"..... How is her absence irksome!
There is such magic in her graceful form,
Such sweet persuasion on her gentle tongue,
As thaws my firm resolves, and brings me back
To that same soft and pliant thing I was Ere yet I knew a laughing woman's scorn!"

But, alas! the power of mere beauty is insignificant if it be not supported by the charms of wit and eloquence, indeed, if beauty alone do make a conquest, it is after the manner of those generals who possess themselves of a province by a sudden attack, but who do not know how to retain it. The empire of lovely woman over the heart of man is as much preserved by the attractions of the mind, as by the loveliness of form and feature. Beauty and wit are two graces requiring the aid of each other, and capable of mutual good service. The conversation of many would disgust, did not the charms of the speaker give a certain brilliancy to the insipid language of her mouth. In like manner would the beauties of the exterior frequently fail to delight, unless wit first created an impression. Still, as brilliancy of wit is generally the chief means of retaining conquests, and even occasionally of making them, we may look upon it as the most essential assistant to the support of the throne of beauty. But, after all, if reputation be the best figure in rhetoric, as Napoleon observed at Saint Helena, that figure has never been better nor more frequently employed than in the praise of lovely woman!

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A letter, from our esteemed correspondent, J. W., at Manchester, although dated January 30th, did not reach us until a few days ago. In The Teetotaler of the 30th of January, we represented the Northern District Teetotal Society of Manchester to have held a meeting on January 17th (Sunday), whereas it took place on the 16th (Saturday).

We thank Mr. Moon for his suggestion, and shall endeavour to attend to it.

Mr. Mingaye Syder's letter shall appear shortly.

To F. W. P.—Luclio Vannoli was the victim who was burnt for an imputation of atheism. Benedict Spinoza died a natural death.

O. L. must be mad to offer us such verses, and then write us an insolent letter under the impression that he will induce us to insert them. We have much discrimination to use in catering for the public, and do not insert articles from motives of favour, but of merit.

We have answered privately A Constant Reader, Juvenis, A. B. C., A Young Teetotaler, Home, X. Y. Z., A Parent, A Reader from the Commencement and A Medical Practitioner.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, MARCH 6th, 1841.

WHEN we contemplate the numbers of Teetotal halls and places of meeting now established in every town and village throughout the British dominions, we are lost in astonishment at the popularity already acquired by a principle which proclaimed, at the outset, such uncompromising warfare against favourite habits and deeply-rooted prejudices. Is it possible that Teetotalism would have succeeded in collecting beneath its banners so many millions of men, had it not presented to the world benefits which were immediately appreciated, and enjoyments far more real than the evanescent excitement obtained by means of artificial stimulants? Teetotalism is one of those reformatory principles which may be denominated human, inasmuch as it can be applied to all climes, to all classes, all creeds, and all conditions: it is exclusive nowhere, and is universal in essence as well as in result. It resembles that tree whose branches extend to the earth and renew themselves again in myriads of fresh stems and trunks, and which covers immense districts with its umbrageous foliage. Beneath that grateful shade thousands of travellers may seek repose with comfort and ease; and did not some local circumstances check the progress of that perpetual increase of new stems shooting from the branches to the earth, and then themselves yielding forth fresh boughs, that tree would spread itself to an extent which no one can determine. Thus is it with Teetotalism. The sapling was planted at Preston; and the boughs and the branches, renewing their energies and their extent by means of a thousand new stems, have spread their luxuriant foliage over two islands and millions of their inhabitants. Denizens of all climes may seek refuge beneath the shade; and the feelings, which discrepancy of political or religious opinions may have severed and disunited, may there be renewed and blended again in the language of thanksgiving and ineffable joy.

If it be true that the works of an author represent (as more or less we think it a matter of necessity that they must) his heart as well as his mind, then few writers have ever taken more pains to exhibit the foulness of their own spirits than those who have taken up the pen to attack the doctrines of Teetotalism. Such a talent delights in rioting in noisome places; and, like the unclean beast in the parable, the malignant and unprincipled assailants of Teetotalism return again and again to their "own vomit," and to their "wallowing in the mire" with an appetite as insatiable as it is unwholesome. The unhalloed exhalations of spite and hatred, scurrility and deceit, pervade the writings of the champions of the brewers and the vintners, and shed an atmosphere about their perpetrations which the most polluted can scarcely like to breathe. It is impossible for a healthy spirit to linger amid their miasma, and not come out the worse for their evil influence. How different are the characteristics of the few publications of any note which have as yet emanated from the Teetotal press. If we peruse the Bacchus of GRINDROD, the Anti-Bacchus of PARSONS, the Curse of Britain, by BAKER, and others of the standard works upon the subject, we find them written with the calmness of a conviction which requires no extravagant hyperboles to make up for a deficiency of argument.

Thus is it that the state of the Teetotal world presents on all sides evidences of the rapid progress made by the principle, and which progress is only checked for a moment, but never entirely overcome, by the absence of Union amongst the disciples of the doctrine. The Working Man's Association has now been formed, upon principles exclusive in respect to those who do not exhibit titles to the denomination of a Working-Man; and this Society promises to achieve an immense proportion of good in the English metropolis. But wherefore should the Working Men have thus been driven to establish a society independent of those which admit members of all grades and classes? The reason is obvious: undue pride has been manifested by some who have acquired or usurped elsewhere undue influence. The Working Men are therefore right in separating themselves from societies ruled by individuals who have done this;—but still the necessity which compelled the Working Men thus to isolate themselves, is not the less to be deplored. Nor shall we for one moment cease to proclaim the principle of Union; and the isolation here referred to appears to render such a measure more necessary than ever. It grieved us to behold the following paragraph in the Temperance Messenger, the representative of the South Midland Temperance Association, for the present month :—

"'Tis true but little notice is taken of our proceedings by the organs of the two parties into which the London Teetotalers are divided; but this need not excite surprise, so long as we maintain an independency as an association. The object of those periodicals is to report the proceedings of their own agents and auxiliaries. The Teetotaler, which stands on neutral ground, and is laudably endeavouring to effect a general union, has done more justice to our efforts."

We do not quote this passage because it contains a compliment to our own impartiality: we are too independent to be compelled to publish testimonials to our own merit, and too sincere to be actuated by any sinister motives of pride. We merely extract the paragraph in order to afford an additional proof of the necessity of Union amongst the Teetotalers. Wherefore should not all journals, embarked in the same cause, record the triumphs of Teetotalism in all directions and quarters? Surely all sensible and impartial men will perceive the necessity of forming one Grand Metropolitan Society, with which all the provincial Associations will be glad to correspond. A mutual interchange of benefits will then ensue; the expenses of general management will be diminished; and the name of Teetotalism will represent one grand fraternity, whose united efforts will avail ten thousand times more than all the disjointed endeavours of various societies and sections.

Our articles upon the subject of Union have produced an immense sensation in the country; and each day brings its communications from influential societies and friends, urging us to continue our advocacy of that principle. We shall not lose sight of the subject; for we feel convinced that the progressive march of Teetotalism will be accelerated or impeded in proportion to the amount of disunion existing amongst its disciples. And who will not exert himself in so good a cause, and endeavour to remove all obstacles in its way? There are thousands—nay, millions, who are so devotedly attached to the principle which has restored happiness to their houses, that they would deem no sacrifice too great to ensure its prosperity. How many wounds has not Teetotalism healed—wounds in the heart, long, deep, and obstinate;—how many eyes has it not dried, eyes that long had been accustomed to shed scalding tears from morning until "dewy eve;"—how many sinners has it not redeemed, sinners whom friends deemed lost beyond all redemption;—how many diseases has it not cured, diseases which had long baffled all the skill of medical science;—how many souls has it not redeemed from the paths which lead to the realms of Satan, and placed them in the road which terminates at the footstool of the divinity! All this has Teetotalism done: it promised much, but it performed more; and the amount and extent of its blessings have exceeded the most sanguine expectations of even its most enthusiastic admirers. Teetotalism has now resisted the opposition of the prejudiced, and the malignity of the perverse: it has withstood the scoffs of the aristocratic, and the power of the press; it has made converts even in the very hearts of the manufactories of alcoholic liquors themselves;—and it is not to be now destroyed by the opposition of the few who still venture to raise their feeble voices against its progress. A disciple of the cause is no longer ashamed of the fraternity to which he belongs; nor is he to be laughed out of the principles which he professes. He knows that Teetotalism is the safe side,—that prevention is better than cure,—and that it is better not to become a drunkard, than to stand the chance of being one and then admitting the access of conversion again. He despises while he fears the Moderation doctrine, well-knowing that it is an indefinite term, capable of being described by no line of demarcation, and to be considered only as the preparatory rudiments for an elaborate initiation in the mysteries of the bottle. He turns to his happy home, and points to a smiling wife and joyous children; and he reflects that their felicity would be changed to woe were he to frequent the tap-room or the tavern. He dreads not the arrival of the Saturday evening, because he is well aware that he has no creditors who will seek his door and leave it without having obtained satisfaction for their demands. In a word, he knows that Teetotalism retains him in bodily health, supplies him and his family with good clothes and provisions, renders him an honourable and respectable member of society, educates his children, banishes poverty from his dwelling, places a few pounds each year in the Savings' Bank, and adds from time to time a variety of comforts to his domestic hearth. All this does Teetotalism do:—can the opponents of the doctrine convince us that the Moderate Use of Intoxicating Liquors will do one quarter as much? If they cannot, let them be silent!

Let them not come forward to swindle us out of that which is beneficial to us, and the place of which they cannot supply with something one hundredth part so good! Let them prove that the Teetotalers is not ranked upon the right side, the safe side—and we will throw down our pen and remain for ever silent upon the subject!

YES AND NO;

OR THE POST-HASTE WOOLER.*

If the English are distinguished above all other nations for their keen sense of the humorous, they are not less remarkable for exhibiting in their own persons, sayings and doings, the richest specimens of that quality. "They are not only" humorous themselves "but the cause of" humour "in others." We shall lay before the reader a prose version of a Danish comic poem, founded on some of John Bull's eccentricities, in which we have incorporated the notes with the text.

Of all the adventures I have ever heard of, says Baggesen, the Danish poet, none ever so delighted me as those whose history reaches us from the western side of the German Ocean. In no other country do so many occur. In a thousand other parts of the world no doubt people make the best of the good things of this life, as far as they can: they chat, sing, marry and laugh, fall in love, remain bachelors and weep, now and then they produce a book, and so on; they are born, eat, drink, sleep, dream, and die. All this is done by Russians, Danes, Germans, and many others in a passive sort of way, as if there were no art in the matter; the Englishman alone acts. Like the rest of us mortals he does many a silly thing in his day, but then he is sure to do it in an original manner: like us he does many wise, and good, and amiable things, but then in doing them he often soars to a sublimity of excellence far above our flight. In short, he does everything the rest of us mortals do, but everything with a more original energy.

One Englishman shoots himself.—Well, there is nothing new in that, when capricious fortune bears a man too hard; but to shoot oneself just because one has brought one's pigs to the best possible market, that is undeniably a sin exclusively English. Philip Mordaunt was seven-and-twenty, handsome, rich, of good family, of sprightly and agreeable manners, and to crown all, fondly loved by the amiable object of his affections; all this gave him such a disgust of life that he grew desperate, took to writing verses, and shot himself.

All over the world mankind bows beneath the sceptre of love. The lover laments, sighs, burns and blazes, hears a strain or so of the harmony of the spheres, thunders out odes, or snivels elegies, and occasionally loses his reason, though that, to be sure, is generally a trifle. Sometimes, if the lady is inexorably cruel, he gets at last into such a towering passion (that is, if her beauty is worth the trouble) that oft he goes and makes away with his life, which also is for the most part a trifle. Does the ill-fated swain fancy his foot is too big, and fear lest it cause him to lose favour in his lady's eyes, chop at a wink from Cupid, goes the great toe off each foot. All this is plain and simple enough; but for a man to rid himself of the whole leg in order to soften the obduracy of a wood-legged beauty, that, you may see with half an eye, is a job for none but an Englishman. Sir Thomas Dolsey had till his forty-fourth year bid defiance to all the charms of the fairest dames of London. The crafty little archer had his revenge; Sir Thomas in process of time fell over head-and-ears in love with a country beauty. Miss Lucy long said him nay, and at last exhibited to him that inseparable obstacle to all wedlock, her wooden leg. "If that be all that stands in my way," he exclaimed, "I shall soon be the happiest of men!" He sent for a surgeon. "Here, sir, cut off my leg, and be quick!" The surgeon thought him mad. "Look ye, sir, here are three hundred guineas, and here is a loaded pistol. Take your choice." The poor surgeon was forced to comply, and provided his patient with the wooden leg he wished for. Such a proof of heroic devotedness could not fail to touch the heart of Miss Lucy: she became Lady Dolsey.

It is surely a most desperate run of ill luck with the dice when a man throws incessantly crabs, and nothing but crabs; in such cases, it is by all means customary to yell, gnash the teeth, tear the hair, stamp, and run frantically up and down the room, cursing all the while the gambler's whole litany through. But to stand quietly during the play, with the hand in the bosom, and slowly to claw one's heart out from beneath the ribs, this is one of those happy strokes of genius that never could occur to any one but a desperate Englishman; and tradition tells this has been done by a gambler of that nation.

Want of money is a prolific source of notable stratagems, and none but a hungry Englishman could hit on the device of playing chess with heaven, to give him a pretext for genteelly squeezing the pockets of one of its stewards on earth, an archbishop. A broken London merchant betook himself to a lonely roadside, where sitting himself down in hermit fashion, he took to playing chess incessantly—with God as he said. The Archbishop of Canterbury happening to pass that way, on a journey for the purpose of receiving a large sum of money, cast his eyes on this extraordinary player, who with the utmost deliberation alternately moved his own piece and his antagonist's. While the archbishop was looking on, the human player lost a game for rather high stakes, which he immediately paid to God's servant. His grace found this very reasonable and quite as it ought to be; but just as he came up again to the spot on his way back, another game was decided in the hermit's favour for thirty times the amount of the former stakes, of which the victor upon the most obvious principles of equity claimed payment at the hands of Heaven's treasurer. The archbishop paid the demand, perhaps, because he was convinced of its justice: perhaps, because they were alone, and the hermit was the stronger of the two. See, says the Danish author, all the French and English newspapers of the day. But for this last observation we should have been inclined to regard the tale as a mystic fable, true, perhaps, in the poetic and transcendental, though not in the literal sense; but since the story appeared for the first time in the "newspapers, whose truth all know and feel," we surrender our doubts. The fact must be historical.

I could go on thus till sunrise without stopping, continues our author, to tell the humours of the English, and every word would confirm my assertion that the English are above all others men to act. But, courteous reader, let these specimens content you for the present, and now listen to a little trait of English originality.

Some time ago there was in London amongst many other things a merchant, whom, in all haste we shall call King, not to waste our precious time in turning over old papers for another name.

When I shall have said something more of my hero, the judicious reader will perceive that his name was the least important circumstance about him. A name we know is a mere nothing, every commonplace fellow has got one; but a certain thing called sound sense, and another still more important, a mass of metal, which our prosaic merchant called four tons of gold, were much more distinguishing marks of his individuality. Furthermore, he was active in his calling, cheerful, witty, good-looking, and gentlemanly, but in all his proceedings as restless, hasty, and impetuous as the bell of an alarm clock in full play.

A thousand pardons, my dear madam! Brevity is my choicest hobby, and so I had nearly passed over an important circumstance respecting our King, viz, that though he had now some thirty years waked, eat, drank, and slept, he was still neither married nor engaged. Unpardonable! you exclaim. Certainly he would have been inexcusable had he ever seen such a charmer as you. Be that as it may, it is no business of mine to inquire why he was not married; all I know is, he was incessantly bored by his friends and relations with entreaties that he would take a wife.

Gently though! I am running on too fast. In obedience to truth, and to the honour of the King family, I must admit, that no member of it had ever said a word to him on the subject. Relations certainly must be mad who could tease the proprietor of four tons of gold with such proposals. No, the thing is against nature, and let who will contend against her, I prefer retracting my words. It was only his friends then that urged him, and not all these even, for then he would have had half England on his shoulders, whoever had but a stomach, (and where is the Briton that wants one,) being his most cordial friend. The simple truth then is, that some dozen or so of his good friends incessantly pressed him to make still more beings happy, and with the help of an amiable partner to live again after his death in an interesting little posterity.

"Done!" said he one evening. "I'll see about it. But the question is, where can I put my hand at once with all speed upon a pretty amiable girl?"

"That you can soon do," replied his friend. "Mount your horse early in the morning, and ride out to the country-house I shall give you the address of, belonging to the father of three charming and well-educated girls. I cannot lead you to expect any fortune with them, but excepting that they want nothing that can contribute to the happiness of wedded life."

"Done!" cried King. "I'm off there in the morning."

"Is that settled?"

"Poz! Good bye for so long."

The following morning saw King galloping towards the country-house. Arrived there, a lad received from him his panting horse, and he bounced in like a rocket at the kitchen-door; a little servant-girl stopped him short in his blind career—for a man going a-wooing or to hang himself is next door to out of his wits—"If you please, sir, the hall-door is the other way. I will show you, sir." King followed her, and was ushered into the breakfast-parlour. There he saw five persons, three of whom dressed in rural negligée coloured bashfully, bowed, and glided away. The lady and gentleman of the house remained. "Sir," said King, "I have not the honour of your acquaintance, but I am very desirous to make it. It struck me it would be a capital thing to breakfast with you this morning; and, to tell you the truth, I have a very good reason for this, that you will hardly guess at. You must know then.—But no! I must not take you so by storm. First of all I will beg leave to ask you for breakfast. There are some things that never slip pleasantly off the tongue till one has breakfasted."

After breakfast our hasty wooer delivered himself nearly in the following terms:—

"I am pretty well off as to the gifts both of Nature and Fortune. I have got three or four tons of gold, sound health and strength, and a very good temper: but one treasure I want, the very greatest treasure of this earth, an affectionate wife to share all these good things with me. Perhaps one of your three daughters may make up her mind to do so. If it is agreeable to you, do me the favour to let me see them at once in negligée as they are; for should it so happen that none of them has a mind to take me, I have too much to do to spend my time here to no purpose."

"Immediately! With great pleasure!" exclaimed the father and mother, and the good lady called in her three daughters.

In simple morning dresses, with clean white caps, from beneath which their hair streamed down in brown waves upon their shoulders; their bosoms half-concealed, and adorned each with a rosebud, that eagerly opened its little red lips at the charms beside it, as if it would kiss them in spite of the tucker; with aprons that, like summer clouds floating before the moon, fell in light folds over the round knees almost to the little fairy feet; so stood the three Graces side by side, with bashful smiles and blushes. King was enchanted, and looked, and looked, he could do nothing but look, and looked himself almost blind and senseless; for in such cases the soul flies out through the eyes towards the fascinating object till it is wholly overcome. Only ask the Shepherd Paris if I am not right.

Long did he stand gazing on the magic charms before him, and wishing to himself that he was all eyes from the crown of his head to his toes. "Ay!" he said at last, "I could stand here for ever: but I have something to do besides. I must choose one, for I suppose I cannot take all the three, though that would be the most comfortable arrangement. What say you? I do not exactly remember how the law runs; this has put law and everything else out of my head."

Mr. King must by all means content himself with one, and there are men who think one even rather too many. I do not pity those gentlemen however; it is usually their own fault; for women, as every one very well knows, are just what we make them. Well, the choice was not an easy one for our poor wooer, especially as he now saw so badly, and had stared himself quite out of his wits. His thoughts danced a complete gallopade in his head, and chased each other about like the pictures of a magic lantern. "The devil take all this bother of choosing," thought he, "I like them all, and the one that I get will I warrant be the right one."

Having made up his mind to this very sensible view of the case, he turned to the parents. "Choose which of the three I may," he said, "I am sure to choose well. If you please then let us say, without any more fuss, it shall be that one who—attend young ladies—who first says Yes!"

The father and mother nodded their assent; the mother only adding in a low voice, "You must judge for yourselves, my dears; so consider what is best for your own happiness." But all the three were silent, and a bashful look was the only answer they gave. Our swain stood and stared three whole minutes, watching with all his eyes and ears whence the first sound should come; still no "yes" stole through the closed portals of those coral lips.

"Ha!" said King, "I see you wish to reflect upon the matter. Be it so; I wait with the utmost possible patience a quarter of an hour for the elder, but not a minute longer."

"That is a very short time for reflection, Mr. King," interposed the mamma.

"Can't wait a moment longer on any account. It is just now turned ten."

"Well, then, we shall see. Come with me, Mary."

This was the name of the eldest, whom, between you and me, Mr. King had most particularly taken a fancy to, though he had not had time to make this out to his own satisfaction. For, during the scene we have just described, it is certain that, without being himself aware of it, he cast a special sheep's eye upon her. But all this while I am afraid the reader will think my narrative rather prolix: on condition of her gracious pardon I promise to get to the end of my story with the speed of my hero.

The quarter of an hour passed; mamma came out from the adjoining room, and our wooer flew into it like the wind.

"Well, if you will have me, tell me so quickly!"

"No."

"In earnest?"

"In earnest."

"You will not have me?"

"Sir."

"Well?"

"Sir."

"You will?"

"No."

"Hum! Then I may mount horse, and be off again."

He ran back into the parlour to take leave of the young lady's parents; but they were of opinion, notwithstanding his whimsical hastiness, that Mr. King was a match not so easily to be parted with. They therefore begged him earnestly to stop a little longer. "You see," they said, "the weather is fine and the roads are in good order. Try another quarter of an hour."

"Very well then; I will try once more."

"Come with me, Sophia," said the mother to her second daughter. The quarter elapsed, as it had done before, and the gentleman rushed in and presented himself to the young lady.

"Yes or no?" he said, and thrice he received a very distant "No" for an answer.

Our hero returned to the parlour, and, to own the truth, rather abashed. To be rejected once is bad enough; but twice, lord help me! I think I should go crazy. King did nothing of the kind; he seemed to take his refusal very calmly; but what really vexed him was the irreparable loss of his precious time, and therefore he said he would have no more to do with the matter, though the parents pressed him strongly to try the last quarter of an hour. But, alas! Father Wessel says,—

Against three powers, my honest friend,
'Tis vain to bluster, and contend;
And these three powers, in spite of cavil,
I say are love, fate, and—the devil."

To these lines, especially the first two, no man can bid defiance. It was written that King should have a wife; and—mark, attentive reader!

Henrietta, the youngest daughter, still remained. Hardly was the last quarter over, when our wooer sprang into the room with truly heroic courage to brave a third rejection. He half fancied he had already received it, "I suppose you will not be my wife either. Be quick, and let me be off with all my refusals. Will you?"

"Yes."

"Be my wife?"

"Your wife? Yes!"

"Do you mean that in earnest from your heart? Well then, God bless you and me, and our union." With that they skipped, arm in arm, into the parlour. The father and mother were not a little delighted.

"It is all right!" cried King; "there is nothing wanting now but the parson and the licence. I shall have the honour to call to-morrow morning with both. I am not fond of many words. I thank you in all haste for my breakfast, and I leave the two willows behind me. Good bye for awhile."

He flung himself into the saddle, and shot off towards town like an arrow. Papa, mamma, Sophia, and Henrietta stood at the hall-door, looking after him as long as he could be seen. Mary, on the contrary—Can you guess, reader, whither she had slipped away in the meantime? No. Well, you shall hear.

Not far from the villa, close by the road side, was a shrubbery on a little hill. During the bustle of leaving-taking, whilst every one was engaged with curtsying, and bowing, and scraping, and shaking hands, and kissing, Mary had stolen away, and flown to the hill. Why, I am sure I do not know; who can account for all the caprices of a young girl? All I know is she sat unseen on the top of this hill, where she had a prospect of the road, along which King now galloped, and on which she watched him till he seemed no bigger than a fly, and at last disappeared. When she could see no more of him she walked down the hill, sat down in the grass, and cried with all her heart.

How love bewilders the brain every one has heard, and King experienced it. He had travelled two miles, when he bethought himself that he did not know the bride's christian name, which it was indispensable to insert in the licence. He therefore turned back with the speed of a whirlwind. When he reached the foot of the hill, he fortunately found the eldest daughter walking there.

"Upon my life," he exclaimed, "it will save me a quarter of an hour to have found you here. I have forgotten the name of my bride. Will you tell it me, quick?"

"Sir, the name of the young lady that loves you, that is willing to become yours?"

"Yes, yes."

"Mary."

"That is her name, is it? I may rely on that?"

"You may."

"Mary! Now then, I shall not forget it again. Mary! Mary! My compliments at home." And away he went again.

At home they chatted the whole day long of the wooer, of his eccentric hastiness, his manners, appearance, disposition, and property. Papa petted his horse, and with reason; mamma thought him good looking: Sophia remarked that he was too little, Henrietta that he was too old, and both agreed that he was the least wee wee bit cracked. Mary alone held her peace, and let them talk on as they pleased.

In the evening the sisters resumed the conversation by themselves:

Sophia. "What is the matter with you Mary? You look so pale."

Hen. "I should have thought I had more reason to be pale: for to tell the truth, I made a mistake when I said yes. Heigho!"

Mary. "Then it was just the same with you as with me: when I said no I meant—"

Hen. "To say yes? Ha, ha, ha!"

Soph. "Ha, ha, ha!"

Henrietta. "But it is not too late. You may recover your colour sister. Do you be married to-morrow instead of me, if indeed the name does not prevent it."

This difficulty Mary removed, by recounting what had occurred at the hill, and the secret resolve was taken amidst abundant jests and laughter, to dress sister Mary in the morning as the bride.

The next morning, King arrived with the licence and the parson, and everything was ready for the ceremony except the very person who was to crown it all. One quarter of an hour passed after the other. "What in the world keeps the bride so long?" At last the blushing Mary entered in bridal white between Henrietta and Sophia. The parents, who knew nothing of the well-planned comedy between the sisters, started, and so did all the guests. King alone who saw the right bride in the lady who was dressed as one, went up to her, and wished the ceremony to begin at once.

"No, King, that is not Henrietta."

"Of course not: I know that very well."

"This is Mary, sir."

"Aye, to be sure it is."

"But you mean to marry the young lady that accepted you."

"The very one. Now is not this lady's name actually Mary?"

"Certainly it is Mary. But—"

"But? What do you mean by but? Would you have me begin the courtship all over again? What is the use of waiting longer when the bride and bridegroom and the clergyman are ready?"

The licence was inspected, and behold, there stood Mary's name. Every one was astonished except the bridegroom, who tired of their wondering began to grow impatient: and as Mary was named in the licence, and as Mary was dressed for the occasion, and as Henrietta had no objection to wait, nor Sophia either, and as Mr. King never could wait for anything, Mary became Mrs. King, and Mr. King was the happiest of men.

THE RECHABITES.

THE following are a few of the laws and regulations of the Southern Counties Brotherhood of the Honourable and Independent Order of Rechabites.

This Order consists of persons of good moral character, of any religious persuasion, free from bodily disease, between the ages of eighteen and sixty.

No Candidate can be admitted into this Honourable Order until he has signed the pledge of Total Abstinence, and has been a consistent Member of a Society on that principle upwards of three months.

A Candidate, whether Expectant or Honorary, can be proposed only on a regular Tent Night. He must be proposed by a Brother, who is to furnish the fullest particulars possible as to his age, habits, morals, occupation, health, and every other circumstance within his knowledge.

His Proposition must be seconded in like manner by another Brother, who is to furnish similar information.

Every Brother present is expected to detail such knowledge as he may possess relative to the Candidate.

Payments according to age to be made by Brethren on their entering this Honourable Order:—

	s.	d.
Under 35 years of age (as above) to be paid on proposition	2	6
35 years, and under 40 years	5	0
40 years and under 45 years, one shilling per year extra, making at 45 years	10	0
45 years and under 50 years, two shillings per year extra, making at 50 years	20	0
50 years and under 55 years, four shillings per year extra, making at 55 years	40	0
55 years and under 60 years, ten shillings per year extra, making at 60 years	90	0
If any Candidate of a higher age than Sixty years wishes to be admitted, it must be by Special Agreement, and by vote of the Tent.

The Candidate, if required, shall furnish such documents in proof of his Age as the Brethren in Tent may deem satisfactory.

The Guardian, on receiving the Pass-word, is to inform the worthy Brother who may enter, of the presence of a stranger.

A Rechabite Brother belonging to any Brotherhood, Division, Union, District, or Tent, not in complete union with the Tent in question, comes under the description of a Stranger.

Each Brother on his entrance into Tent, after it has been duly opened, shall give the Countersign to the Chief Ruler, and to the Deputy Ruler, before taking his seat. He shall behave with uniform sedateness, propriety, and decorum; he shall show respect to all the Officers of the Tent, and implicitly obey their directions. He shall obey all Past or Acting Officers, or their Deputies, by the titles due to their official stations. He shall prefix no title except that of "Worthy Brother" to the name of the party to whom he speaks. He shall not introduce any religious discussion or political allusion. He shall not enter into conversation with a Brother, even so far as to ask or answer a question. He shall not partake of any refreshments during the holding of the Tent. In speaking on any subject, he is to direct both his observations and his regards to the Chief Ruler, and is on no account to address his remarks or his looks to the Brother whose conduct he is alluding to, or whose opinion he is either supporting or controverting. He shall always address the Chief Ruler standing. He is not to interrupt another while speaking. He is not to quit the Tent without having first obtained permission for so doing from the Chief Ruler, which permission will be asked for and transmitted through the Levite. Every time that a Brother enters or quits the Tent, he shall give the Countersign, except when a Stranger is in the Tent, when no sign, countersign, or signal is to be given by any officer or Brother on any account.

In case of any serious personal accident or illness occurring to a Brother at a distance from his own Tent, he shall apply to the officers of the nearest Tent in full union with this Honourable Brotherhood. The officers of such Tent shall, on his giving satisfactory proof of his being an efficient Brother, immediately act towards him as if he were a Brother of their own Tent, paying him equal attention, visitation, and assistance, and will forthwith inform the Tent to which he immediately belongs, of the circumstances of the case; and two officers of such Tent are empowered to forward such pecuniary supplies on the receipt of such letter as the exigencies of the case have required, reporting the same to the next Tent Meeting, whether regular or special.

When a Brother removes to a distance from his own Tent, but chooses to continue his name in that Tent, and defrays regularly all gifts, &c., he is at liberty to apply for all benefits which may accrue from his connection with such Tent, by sending up a certificate from a medical practitioner as to illness, accident, &c., stating the circumstances of his case, accompanied by a testimonial, signed by some clergyman, minister, or parochial officer.

THE NEWTONIAN THEORY OF MOTION REFUTED.

THE cause of the continuance of motion is the greatest desideratum in physics; and when perfectly ascertained, must alter the entire of the modern modes of philosophizing. The question to decide is this:—What does the sensible impulse effect on a body so as to cause the body to proceed through the air after that impulse has ceased? It is maintained that force and motion are put into the body which carry it forward; but as these are not of a communicable nature, the force and motion of the body having never been the force and motion of the impelling body, to such causes the continuance of the motion of a projectile cannot be attributed. Besides, the force and motion of a projectile are but effects of impulse; therefore neither can be considered the impelling cause. Neither is it any reason that the body moves onwards, because it cannot stop itself. It cannot move itself; neither can it be in motion without an equal of cause foreign to the body. To move longer than it is impelled is effect greater than cause. A planet in its orbit may be said to move in every direction; and as every novel direction requires a distinct impulse in that direction, it is obvious that a temporary projectile force applied to a planet must cease of effect, as the planet, by any other means, is made to quit the direction of the original momentary impulse. Therefore nothing but constant impulse can effect orbicular motion; and nothing but the planets being involved in a medium of pressure can maintain these bodies in endless motion of ever changing direction. All bodies in motion are under unequal pressure in front and rear: the rear is necessarily under the greater pressure, which is manifestly the state of a planet; and while so pressed, if the planet be under less pressure on the side facing the sun or solar regions than on the opposite side, by means of these unequal pressures the planet would be moved round the sun and kept in motion as long as ever these contingent circumstances continued. By such means is orbicular motion maintained.

Bodies being formed of spherical atoms, contain within their interstices free elementary matter, galvanic and electric, which is removable without derangement of bodily texture. This elementary matter is displaced by fire to admit the medium of space, which latter effects expansion. As then this matter excludes the medium of expansion and presents expansion, it is a minus pressure means.

If, besides containing minus-pressure matter, a body be covered superficially with the like, as an electric atmosphere, it will be under some certain degree of external pressure; and if this superficial covering be removed, the body will be under an increased degree of pressure. So, if the covering be removed from the side only, the body will be under unequal pressure on opposite sides, and so circumstanced must be pressed into motion, which must continue until these dissimilar states become equal; which equalization does take place during motion by electric matter returning to the deficient side of the body, by which the equilibrium of pressure obtains, gradually, its way; and proceeding motion and eventually the state of rest.

A stone thrown from the hand proceeds beyond the hand; something must impel it the whole of the way; the cause must be physical, and must exist everywhere. It cannot be less in force than the effect, nor act on the stone shorter than the duration of effect, or as long as the stone is being moved. The hand impels the stone in the first instance: it puts nothing of its force and motion into the stone; but it leaves it under unequal pressure on opposite sides, or it would not proceed beyond the hand; and to promote this unequal pressure, there is nothing conceivable or inferable but that by the force and velocity of the previous impulse by the hand, the stone is made to part with minus-pressure matter from its rear; while from the front it cannot do so, but may acquire from the air minus-pressure matter. It is the production of this unequal electric state of the projectile the first impulse effects, and according to the force of the impulse so is the body de-electrified more or less in its rear; and in proportion to de-electrification so is the moving pressure by the medium of space greater on the rear than front, and so is the degree of velocity of the body. It is the greater pressure of the medium of space on the vacated rear than front—promoted by the velocity of the previous impulse which de-electrifies the rear—that impels the stone beyond the hand. No matter what is the first impelling cause, whether muscular or explosive force, the body by it is rendered under unequal pressure on opposite sides, and in consequence of it leaving minus-pressure matter, like dust or loose thread, behind.

This theory being admitted, that Space is a plenum (or that all is full) must be granted: and its contents the cause of motion universally, atomic as well as planetary and atmosphere projectile motion, two causes of motion in the system being unnecessary. This scheme must eventually establish pressure as the only and common power of nature, and prove the fallacy of the long-admitted theory of inert matter attracting, repelling, and gravitating. The Newtonian system is moreover derogatory to the omnipotence and omniscience of the Great Cause of all. No theory of Nature, nor system of Philosophy can be true which assumes, in any instance whatever, as CAUSE, the like of the perceptions of the mind, and that does not maintain for universal cause the general pressure, which latter is deducible from the inertia of matter. Nor can any experiment be accounted for correctly but on these simplest of principles, INERTIA and PRESSURE!

REVIEWS.

The Temperance Messenger. Number for March. Market Harborough: T. Cook. London: Houlston and Stoneman.

WHEN many, many years shall have passed away, and the hand which traces these lines shall be mouldering in the dust, a generation as yet unborn will refer to the pages of The Teetotaler and mark with admiration and pleasure the rapid, but sure and certain progress of the new principle of moral, social, and political regeneration. With this impression, we are particularly careful in recording our opinions of those publications now embarked in the same cause; so that, when in the course of years there shall be hundreds of temperance periodicals, the readers of those days may be enabled to record the triumphs of the cause by comparing the teeming press to which we thus allude in anticipation, with the infant one of the present time. Amongst the most meritorious and respectable candidates for public favour at present, we must especially notice the Temperance Messenger, as a clever, a staunch, and a bold advocate of the doctrines of Teetotalism. From the first article in the current Number we extract the following interesting passage:—

"There are a few institutions, in different parts of the world, where a study of science and literature are combined with healthful bodily exercise and productive industry. In a large Anti-slavery and Teetotal College, or Seminary, in the United States—the Oberlin Institute—the students are engaged three hours per day in manual labour. This Institute was established by forty young students who set to work to clear a tract of land in the north-east part of Ohio. They had no endowments, and little pecuniary help. The fame of their virtue spread. Learned and accomplished men, whose hearts were as cultivated as their intellects, volunteered for the honour of being instructors of such disciples, repaired to Oberlin, flung off their coats, felled trees for some hours of the day, and delivered lectures for the rest. Young men and women flocked to this spot in the forest, to beg such instruction as should fit them to be teachers to the coloured people; and when told that there were no funds, and seeing that there was not accommodation for the increasing numbers, the unfailing reply was, 'I will provide for myself if you will let me stay.' Building went on rapidly; a substantial building, with brick, containing ninety-two rooms, besides the wooden dwellings, which were the first work of their hands. A practical farmer superintended the labour of the young men. The young women, whose number is about one-fourth of the whole, keep the house, the dairy, and the clothes, and have yet found time to learn whatever fits them to be school teachers in their turn; and some are sound Greek and Hebrew scholars." Judge Law (Judge of the Supreme Court of Ohio), conceiving it to be his duty to make himself acquainted with public educational institutions in his state, visited and examined the Oberlin, and gave it as the result of his investigation, that he had never known the same amount of mind more substantially and happily improved in the same space of time. The number of students at this institution some time back was above 400. They have enjoyed a remarkable state of health, the general result of temperance and exercise."

The Temperance Messenger deserves the support of all the Teetotalers both in London and the provinces; and we sincerely hope that our frequent recommendations of it will not be disregarded by our readers. In the present Number, the editor expresses his surprise that The Teetotaler should be enabled to "present to its readers so much paper, letter-press, and engravings besides, for twopence!" The question is answered thus,—"By the immense circulation which The Teetotaler enjoys!" And this circulation has been obtained by the integrity of its principles, its fearlessness, the determination of the proprietor to merit encouragement by an adequate expenditure upon its pictorial companions, and the zeal of the editor to present the reader with literary matter as varied in amusement, information, and instruction as possible.

With another extract from the Messenger we shall take leave of it for this month;—it is taken from a letter addressed to the editor of the periodical, by a correspondent at Coventry:—

"But the life of our society, and the zeal of the members, has been sustained through dull seasons, when the cause has been at a low ebb, generally speaking, most of all, by frequent social meetings amongst the members of the society on a limited scale; for instance, twenty or thirty of us meet at a friend's house towards evening; our object is recreation, not the realisation of a surplus; accordingly, tea, the 'beverage which cheers but not inebriates,' is provided, and a good meal is enjoyed at a very low rate, or trifling expense; the subsequent part of the evening is devoted to temperance songs, recitations, lively but sober conversation, &c. &c.; in a word, there you meet with what may be truly termed 'the feast of reason, and the flow of soul;' and one of the most interesting features in the amusements is the circumstance of meeting there your wives, daughters, sisters, or sweethearts. Your correspondent being a teetotaler will not object to these things. I am aware that the entertainments sought by tipplers exclude females, but with such individuals and such entertainments I have no dealings. I, as a thorough teetotaler, can neither admire nor countenance any scheme of diversion which is not perfectly consistent with female modesty and discretion, and that in which they may fully participate. I have but a poor opinion of those scenes which are not illumined by, and beautified with, the presence of the fair one."

The Death and Funeral of Alcohol, and other Poems. By J. T. SPARKE. 12mo. pp. 17. London: J. Pasco.

THE Preface to this little work informs us that the poems "express the opinion of the author, who has tried the total abstinence principle nearly four years, and is satisfied with it; still, while he thinks and acts for himself, he allows others the same liberty. There is abundant information now on the subject, and total abstinence, like all other systems, may be known by its fruits. There is reason to fear that as long as intoxicating drinks are used as a beverage, drunkenness will to a greater or less degree exist; and all must admit, that as some die from the ranks of the drunkards, their places will be supplied, if supplied at all, from the moderation company, not from the members of Total Abstinence Societies." The author thus speaks of Moderation in a poem bearing this denomination:—

"Many must have a 'little drop,'
It meets their approbation;
Because they think 'tis nature's prop,
Delusive moderation.
"Teetotalism is very well,"
(Says one in disputation,)
'For those who in strong drink excel,
But I'm for moderation.'
"But many thousands in our land,
When under strong temptation,
Give way, and lose their self-command,
Then where is moderation?"

The following stanzas include a capital hit at the old Moderation Societies:—

"Now, ardent spirits laid aside,
Some thought that alcohol had died,
Or practised emigration;

But soon he let the people see
They were mistaken quite, for he Sprang up in moderation."

"To spirits he was not confined,
But having friends of other kind,
His influence was wider:
Since ardent spirits would not do,
He came to them in something new,
As wine, and beer, and cider."

These poems possess considerable merit; and although a little more care might have been devoted to the rhymes, as a whole, the work is creditable to its author. "Saw—more," for instance, are not correct. We, however, repeat our assertion, that the poems reflect considerable credit upon their author.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

FOREIGN NEWS.

SYDNEY.

A TEMPERANCE Society has been established at Sydney, under the patronage of the most influential inhabitants and the authorities.

COUNTRY NEWS.

IRELAND.

A GRAND meeting of the Teetotalers of Cork was held a few days ago, when Mr. KENNAGH, the secretary, read the following statement, showing the results of the philanthropic and unwearied exertions of the Rev. Mr. MATHEW. The subjoined numbers were respectively added to those previously reported:—Tipperary, 60,000; Limerick, 10,000; Tharles, 75,000; Ballyshannon, 60,000; Newtonbarry, 33,000; Ballygarrett, 20,000; Mountmellick, 25,000; Gorey, 9000; Ennismore, 15,000; Mallow, 7000; Cork, 6000; Castle Dermott, 30,000; Dunlavin, 25,000; Templemore, 70,000; Carlow, 100,000; Maryborough, 100,000; and Kells, 100,000. The Report, moreover, stated that amongst the Irish Teetotalers there are eight Roman Catholic prelates, and 700 of the Catholic clergy. The Rev. Mr. MATHEW's late tour has produced 1,147,000 new converts. Altogether, there are now four millions six hundred and forty-seven thousand Teetotalers in Ireland! Of a surety, the reformation effected by FATHER MATHEW is the most remarkable moral improvement ever achieved since the establishment of the Christian religion.

A correspondent who signs himself SENTINEL, has addressed an admirable letter to the Editor of the Limerick Chronicle, relative to Teetotalism in the army. We subjoin a portion of this excellent communication:—

"It is well known to you, that various plans have been tried to promote good conduct amongst the soldiery by a system of rewards, and by the establishment of Libraries in Barracks, no doubt intended by the legislature to encourage morality and sobriety. But while these may, in a certain degree, do some good to attain the object in view, they will ultimately fall without the aid of Temperance Societies. Permit me, sir, to observe, that however uncouth Teetotalism may sound in the ears of the lovers of strong drinks, or in the ears of those who plead for moderation, yet it has done more good in the short time it has existed than any other principle yet adopted to reform the lower grades of society; and all who have enlisted under its banner, and kept the pledge consistently, find themselves happy, and in the full enjoyment of the faculties with which their Maker has endowed them. Now, sir, as a soldier, warmly attached to my profession, I would ask you what good has the canteen, which is tolerated in each barracks, done for the soldier? Has it ever afforded him anything at a fair price? Has it ever given him an article of a superior description? Or has it, in short, realized one blessing of any kind to the soldier? No, sir; it is a curse—a barrier to morality—in fact, it is a plague-stain to the discipline of the army; and hundreds of lacerated backs, and ruined constitutions could attest the truth of this assertion."

"If we had only to contend with the humble in rank, their prejudices would be easily overcome; but there are some in command to whom the soldier naturally looks for protection, and who regard our cause with apathy and indifference, although they know the only thing that renders duty any way irksome to them is drunkenness. It has hardly ever fallen to my lot, during a long experience in the various departments of the service, to record any punishment against the soldier, save that which resulted, directly or indirectly, from intemperance;—and in this I am fully borne out by the experience of all officers of known ability and candour, that in every situation in which the British soldier has been placed, where drink was easily obtained (may I not instance the losses sustained at Chusan—the Chinese expedition), the most fatal consequences have ensued; and, on the other hand, where none could be had or withheld, alacrity and obedience to all commands have been the result; and health established in a tenfold degree."

We regret that an immense press of matter this week prevents us from transferring the whole of this letter to our columns.

MANCHESTER.

THERE are now two great Societies at Manchester. One is denominated The Manchester and Salford Institution for Propagating Teetotalism on Christian principles; and the other is styled the Manchester District Temperance Society. Of the former Messrs. HAYNE and LEWIS are the secretaries, and the Rev. F. BEARDSALL one of its most influential patrons; and of the latter, Mr. GRINDROP is the president, Mr. BOULTON the treasurer, and Messrs. J. LEESE (jun) and GRIMSHAW the secretaries.

The committee of the Manchester and Salford Institution for Propagating Teetotalism on Christian Principles has published its address, which the Rev. F. BEARDSALL has signed on its behalf. This address contains the Rules of this new Association; and the following clause seems especially to refer to the name of the Society:—"No person who will not unequivocally acknowledge the Divine origin of the Old and New Testaments, shall be deemed eligible to fill any office connected with the Institution; but any individual making such avowal, and who has been a consistent abstainer for the previous six months, shall be eligible for election into any office connected with the branches; and any person being a member of the Parent Society making the acknowledgement aforesaid, shall be considered eligible to fill any office in the Society."

Turn we now our attention to the Manchester District Temperance Society. On Sunday evening, February 21st, Mr. LOMAX continued his lectures to a crowded audience. On Monday evening, February 22nd, the New Blackley-street Branch held a grand meeting, and MESSIEURS HALDRED and BAILEY addressed the audience with considerable effect. Excellent meetings have also been held during the past week in the assembly-rooms of the Pump street Branch, and at the Rechabite Hotel, George Leigh-street, at which latter place a tea meeting was held on Tuesday evening, February 23rd. A concert of vocal and instrumental music followed the festival. The principal speakers on these occasions were MESSIEURS WRAG, COOPER, and WILLIAMS. The principle of Union is well received by this society.

It is well known that the Rev. F. BEARDSALL has succeeded in inventing an unfermented wine, which consequently contains not the slightest particle of alcohol. The demand upon Mr. Beardsall for his wine is becoming so great, that he cannot manage the business alone. He has accordingly determined upon establishing a wine company, the capital to be made up of shares, and to be presided by twelve confidential individuals, to whom the secret is to be alone entrusted. A meeting for this purpose is to be held at Manchester on the 18th of May, at the Temperance Institution, Oldham-street. Mr. Beardsall has already disposed of about 5000 bottles of the unfermented wine, and has some which he has kept unworked for upwards of three months in a fermenting temperature; and yet not a particle of alcohol develops itself. This is the species of wine—and this alone—which should be used at the administration of the Holy Sacrament.

BARNESLEY.

ON Shrove-Tuesday evening the Temperance meeting-room at this place was quite inadequate to supply sufficient accommodation to those who were desirous to gain admittance. The audience was addressed by MESSIEURS TAYLOR and LISTER. On Sunday evening, February 21st, the Catholics held an excellent meeting. On this occasion a letter was read from Mr. ISAAC LISTER, who has emigrated to Canada, and who writes from that colony to state that there is no lack of employment or victuals. Mr. Lister is a well-known Teetotaler; and many of the inhabitants of Barnesley have determined to follow their much esteemed townsman to North America.

KENDAL.

THE numbers of Total Abstainers at Kendal are rapidly augmenting; and weekly meetings are held at different parts of the town. Our correspondent observes, that "the Bacchanalian fabric is tottering, and the grand and majestic edifice of Teetotalism is fast being erected." Mr. CROUCH has lately been lecturing at Kendal, on the physiological and moral effects of Teetotalism—subjects which he elucidated with clearness and perspicuity. Other societies in the same neighbourhood would do well to avail themselves of the services of this gentleman. Mr. G. GOWLAND, from Newcastle, has also visited Kendal, and lectured with considerable effect. Our Kendal correspondent very justly observes that Teetotalism and Religion should be kept apart. We shall always be glad to hear from this correspondent.

BURY SAINT EDMUND'S.

A MEETING was held at this place on Friday evening, February 26th, at the Guildhall. Mr. JAMES TEARE, from Preston, addressed the meeting at considerable length, and, as he was the first advocate who ever travelled for the promotion of the Temperance cause, and having passed through nearly every county in England with that object, he detailed some most interesting facts relative to the origin and progress of the cause. Mr. TEARE is to deliver a lecture on Wednesday evening, March 3rd, at the Baptist Chapel, Garland-street.

BERMONDSEY.

THE members of the Bermondsey Teetotal Improvement Society lately passed a vote of thanks to Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS for "his manly conduct in giving good advice, through the columns of The Teetotaler, to the Teetotal world generally." This excellent Association meets every Thursday evening at the Pestalozzian Academy, Abbey-street, and effects much good in Bermondsey and its vicinity.

UXBRIDGE.

THE Temperance Messenger, for March, informs us that the Uxbridge Temperance Union includes Uxbridge, Drayton, Mile-end, with Rickmansworth, Pinner, Harrow, Windsor, Maidenhead, Marlow, Wooburn, Wycombe, Hanwell, Ealing, Isleworth, Staines, Chertsey, Beaconsfield, the Chalfonts, and intervening Villages. There are about a 1000 members, including 100 reformed drunkards, in the District. An address "to the Nobility, Gentry, Clergy, Magistrates, and Members of the Medical Profession," states the object of the Union, and gives a variety of interesting testimonies and statistical information. It is in contemplation to publish a monthly periodical. The constitution of the Union resembles the Midland Association; and the Delegates' Meetings are held Quarterly. We fervently pray for the prosperity of this Union.

LEAMINGTON.

"Many persons of influence and wealth are espousing the cause, and have liberally responded to an appeal which has been recently made in aid of the funds of the society. The expenses of the society have been heavy, owing to the high rent of the room in which the meetings are held; but our friends prove the truth of the principle which we always advocate,—that if the work is done, the money will not be wanting."—Temperance Messenger.

COTTINGHAM.

THE publication just quoted gives us the following interesting intelligence:—"That distinguished philanthropist, SIR ARTHUR DE CAPELL BAOKE, Bart. is having an immense tract of forest cleared for the purpose of encouraging habits of industry among the poor inhabitants of Cottingham, Middleton, and neighbouring villages. The land will be appropriated in small allotments, and the occupiers will have it the first year for the trouble of clearing, &c.; and afterwards a small rent will be affixed. A gentleman of the name of SMITH, of Southam, has long been anxious to promote objects of this kind, and from what we have heard of him, we believe his aid might be secured, in that locality. We shall be glad to receive other communications on this interesting subject."

CARLISLE.

WE perceive by that excellent provincial monthly journal, The Border Herald of Temperance, that Teetotalism progresses most favourably at Carlisle and its vicinity.

ARBROATH.

ON February 20th, a Rechabite Tent for females was opened in this town; and a grand procession and Teetotal festival took place to celebrate the event. Addresses were delivered by MESSIEURS MENMUE and ROSS. Teetotalism is making rapid strides at Arbroath and the vicinity.

SHREWSBURY.

THE REV. Mr. COLLEY, of this place, has taken up the cause of Teetotalism very warmly; and, being a gentleman of very considerable ability and influence, will no doubt effect much good.

TOWN NEWS.

CHELSEA AUXILIARY TO THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

PURSUANT to notice, Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS will deliver a lecture at the Temperance Hall, 56, George-street, Chelsea, on Monday evening, March 8th; upon the Moral, Physical, and National Effects of Intemperance. Several influential members of the parent society will be present.

WORKING-MAN'S TEETOTAL SOCIETY.

ON and after Monday, the 8th of March, weekly meetings of the Working Man's Teetotal Society, will be held every Monday evening, at the Temperance Rooms, Bull's Head Yard, 51½, Gray's Inn Lane, Holborn. Weekly meetings are also held at the British School Room, Honduras-street, Old-street, on Friday evenings. Working men preside and address the audience.

MARYLEBONE AND ST. JAMES' AUXILIARY.

A MEETING was held at 15, George-street, Oxford-street, by this Auxiliary, on Tuesday, February 9th, Mr. GROSJEAN in the chair, for the purpose of establishing the Society. Mr. GROSJEAN addressed the audience in a most effective manner, and was followed by Mr. LAMBERT, who spoke at great length upon the principle of total abstinence. Powerful addresses were then delivered by MESSIEURS CURRIE, TWADLING, BRENS, and MEE. Meetings will be held every Tuesday and Friday evening at the above address.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

SINCE the weather has become a little more propitious, the meetings on the Wednesday and Saturday evenings at the Aldergate-street Chapel, have been literally crowded. The audience is highly respectable; and on Saturday evening last we recognised a liberal Member of Parliament and the attaché to a foreign embassy in one of the pews.

On Wednesday evening, February 24th, the meeting was addressed by MESSIEURS BENSTEAD, W. DONALDSON, HETHERINGTON (a gentleman who signed the pledge upon this occasion), and CUNNEEN. On Saturday evening, February 27th, Mr. CRUMP took the chair, and called the attention of the audience to the deceits practised by landlords of public houses in the retail of what they term "genuine spirits," but which are really compounds of alcohol and deleterious poisons.

Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS explained the nature and properties of alcohol, and showed that not a particle of alcohol was to be found in nature, in a native state. He then observed, that even if alcohol did exist in nature, this would only be another reason why we should avoid the use of it in the shape of gin, rum, beer, &c.; as in that case, we should imbibe quite enough of a deleterious poison from necessity, without doing so spontaneously. Mr. Reynolds, moreover, observed that one thing was certain,—alcoholic liquor intoxicated; and under the influence of intoxication man committed the most heinous crimes. This argument was alone sufficient basis upon which to erect the fabric of Teetotalism.

Mr. MRE addressed the meeting in a most eloquent speech, in which he refuted several of the usual objections adduced against Teetotalism by its opponents, and defended the principle upon moral, physiological, and domestic grounds in a manner that made a deep impression upon the audience.

Mr. JOHNSON closed the meeting with one of the most excellent speeches that ever emanated from the lips of this speaker. He portrayed in a most feeling manner the horrible effects, domestic and physical, of alcoholic liquors; and called upon those present, who had not yet tried the principle, to come forward and only test it by a few weeks—or even a few days' experience. He said that he felt convinced few, who did so, would ever relapse to the drinking usages; and those backsliders would be convinced of their folly while they erred again.

The chairman then gave notice that Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. BALLARD would hold a discussion, on Saturday evening, March 6th, at the Chapel, upon the following question:—"Whether total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks or the moderate use of them be most in accordance with Reason, Common Sense, and Revelation." The friends on both sides of the question were particularly requested to attend.

METROPOLITAN ROMAN CATHOLIC TOTAL ABSTINENCE ASSOCIATION.

AN excellent meeting of this flourishing society took place on the 28th of February, at the Temperance Hall, Prince's-square, Ratchliffe. The audience was addressed by MESSIEURS A. PÉTRIÉ (the chairman), LUCAS, JOHNSTON, ADAMS, and PALMER (of Hackney), with very great effect.

GUN MAKING.—Every best-finished gun usually passes through fifteen or sixteen hands, each of which constitutes almost a distinct trade; although two or three branches are often combined or subdivided, according to the extent of business. They may be arranged in the following order:—1. Barrel-forger; 2. lock and furniture forger; 3. barrel-borer and filer; 4. lock-filer; 5. furniture-filer; 6. ribber and breecher; 7. stocker; 8. screw-together; 9. detonator; 10. maker-off; 11. attripper and finisher; 12. lock-finisher; 13. polisher and hardener; 14. engraver; 15. browner; 16. stock-polisher. The barrel-making being also divided into several branches.

We beg to call the attention of the Reader to the 7th Number of a 2nd Series of Illustrations, which is given gratis with "THE TEETOTALER" of this day.

The Series will be complete in Eighteen Illustrations, and will be continued for as many consecutive weeks.

PICKWICK MARRIED.

CHAPTER VIII.

IN WHICH, ALTHOUGH IN SEARCH OF SOMETHING ELSE, MR. PICKWICK MEETS WITH A SERIES OF HIGHLY INTERESTING ADVENTURES, AND FORMS A NEW ACQUAINTANCE.

It is not our intention to weary the patience of our readers by detailing how Mr. Pickwick rose very early on the morning after the ball,—how he performed the duties of the toilette with additional care,—how he hastened to Wood-street, Cheapside, at as decent an hour as possible,—how he sought and obtained an interview with Mr. Sago, who affected to be entirely ignorant of the purport of Mr. Pickwick's visit, but who was well aware of the interesting proposal about to be made,—and how Mr. Pickwick succeeded in eliciting the consent of the old gentleman to the match. The pecuniary arrangements were just glanced at by the prudent Mr. Sago; and on this point Mr. Pickwick's proposals were highly satisfactory. He declared that although a husband was supposed to be the sovereign lord and master, yet he should not exercise any undue despotism in his household, inasmuch as he expected that Miss Teresina would crown all his happiness; and that, as a proof of his good intentions, he would settle a handsome sum upon the future Mrs. Pickwick. Mr. Sago then suggested that as he and Mrs. S. were particularly attached to Teresina, and would not like to be altogether separated from her, he hoped Mr. Pickwick would reflect upon the propriety of giving up his villa at Dulwich, and taking a house within two miles of the Bank, and in a line of omnibuses. To this condition, also, did Mr. Pickwick assent; and thereupon, when he rose from his chair, he stood the accepted lover of Miss Teresina Hippolyta Sago.

It was arranged that the wedding should take place in about a month, and that the happy couple should proceed in the first instance to the City of London, and that, when the honeymoon was over, they should return to a residence in London or its suburbs, which residence Mr. Pickwick should forthwith discover and fit up. These preliminaries being thus satisfactorily arranged, Mr. Pickwick, attended by Mr. Samuel Weller, set out in quest of a house "within two miles of the Bank, and in a line of omnibuses."

"Which way shall we go, Sam?" enquired Mr. Pickwick, as they walked along Cheapside together.

"'Spose we trots up as far as the Kingsland or the Hackney Road, sir," said Sam; "or may be you'd prefer the City or the New Road?"

"Let us walk up the City Road, Sam," observed Mr. Pickwick; "there are some nice houses there."

"Take care o' that there fly-blow, sir," said Sam, at the expiration of a few minutes.

"Where?" demanded Mr. Pickwick, looking around to see if he could discover a butcher's shop in which the article might be, whereunto this warning alluded.

"There! he's gone by now," said Sam; and, perceiving that his master was still involved in a deep and dense mystery relative to the observation, he added, "A fly-blow is a feller as passes all night in a public-house, and turns out preshussedy an' lushy in the mornin' or artemnoon. Ten to von but what he's been all night in a tidly-vink."

"A tidly-vink!" ejaculated Mr. Pickwick; "what can that mean, Sam?"

"A place where they sells illicit sperets, sir," was the satisfactory reply. "The people as keeps them shops, sir, doesn't care about cheatin' the revenue."

Mr. Pickwick and Sam pursued their way by the Bank of England, and entered Moorgate-street, up which they proceeded at a tolerably rapid pace. The morning was fine and frosty; and Mr. Pickwick felt quite juvenile in consequence of his intended matrimonial speculation.

"Wery nice hair-dresser's shop, that there, sir," said Sam, pointing to one on the right hand side of the way.

"Very," assented Mr. Pickwick.

"Wery sin'glar thing connected with the feller as keeps that shop, sir," continued Mr. Weller.

"Is there, Sam," said Mr. Pickwick. "What is it?"

"Vy, sir," returned Mr. Weller, "wot I'm about to re-late to you vill prove in the most saytisfatory knock-me-down argiment-kind of a manner the old sayin' vich says that him as undertakes his own cause in the court o' justice has a fool for a client. That there barber, sir, was a-summoned by another barber to the Court o' Rekvests, for the sum of twelve bob. A bob's a shillin', sir. Ven he was called upon for his defence, sir, he made this here wery eloquent an' convincin' address:—'Gen'lemen, ven I gits up an' looks around me, an' sees sich a wery good-lookin' jury and that 'ere excellent justice a sittin' on that 'ere bench,—I ses, gen'lemen, ven I gits up an' looks at all here,—I feels indignant, an' wery naterally thinks o' that 'ere—how, vy am I summonsed up here, haye? What is the hanimus on it, haye? Vy—this 'ere: I'm a hunkimmon quick shaver, nobody karn't beat me; an' so von wery hot day last July as I was a-shavin' a fat feller as had got a beard wusser than anything I ever seed, a man shoves agin me an' cuts him on the chin. Wery good, as the fly said ven he tasted the treacle; and so acause I cuts this 'ere man, he says he'd cut me. Vell, sir,—gen'lemen, I mean,—this man, ven he gits up to go, says, says he, 'I don't owe you nothin'.—'Don't you?' ses I.—'No,' ses he; and so I up and told him he was 'nt a-goin' to gammon me; and then he made use o' some wery smart words, and told me he'd have it out o' me; 'spose is the reason vy he summons me. I don't owe nothin' to nobody. I always pays my vay, and never goes arter trust for nothin'; an' I tells you so. Vy, now look here: 'spose I had to shave all them 'ere gen'lemen, and while I'm a-shavin' a one on 'em, another on 'em comes and goes for to shuv right slap agin my elber, 'spose I cuts him, 'spose ve has a row, and 'spose I throws up my razor and resins—vy, is that a hanser to my debt? an' ven I wants him to pay my bill and do the thing as is right, am I for to go and pay his'n? Not a bit on it! And if so be you sees anything in the same perdikament as I does, vy, your virgid vill just be sich a von as I shud give, if so be I was a-sittin' where you now squats.—'Vell, sir," continued Mr. Weller, "arter this wery beautiful display o' genivine eloquence, the case was dismissed. So now that there feller bears the wery honourable distingvishing title o' the Barbarous Orator."

"Well, it was a very clever speech, Sam," said Mr. Pickwick; "and I dare say produced an admirable effect."

Conversing in this manner, the master and man continued their way towards the City Road, upon reaching which, they began to look around them for the object of their search.

"There's a bill up in a vinder!" suddenly exclaimed Mr. Weller. "This house to let, and the furniture to be had at a wallyation."

"Probably that will suit us," said Mr. Pickwick; and to the house did they accordingly repair.

Sam gave a thundering knock at the front door; and in a few minutes it was opened by an especially dirty servant, who was wiping her hands, which she had just extracted from the soap-suds, with her apron.

"This house is to let, I believe?" said Mr.

Pickwick, with his usual affability and mildness.

"Yes," replied the girl.

"What is the rent?" demanded Mr. Pickwick.

"Don't know."

"Can I ascertain all particulars?"

"Missis 'll tell you," said the girl.

The parlour door opened at that moment, and out rushed a child with a large piece of bread and butter in his hands; and he was followed by a little girl with a doll, from which the arms and legs had been torn off, in her arms; and then a short, thin, wizened-faced lady, in a mourning-gown and a false front over curl-papers, made her appearance.

Mr. Pickwick's queries were repeated.

"Forty pounds a-year rent," said the lady; "and twelve the taxes."

"Can I be allowed to see the house?"

"Certainly: pray walk in."

And Mr. Pickwick and Sam were introduced first into the parlour, where the lord and master of the establishment was feeding the cat with the remnants of that which he declared to be a "little lunch," but which Mr. Pickwick shrewdly suspected to be "an early dinner."

"This, you see, is the parlour," said the lady.

Mr. Pickwick did see that it was the parlour, and a very dirty one it was too. The lady then requested Mr. Pickwick to walk up-stairs; and he and Sam were now shown into a drawing-room very tolerably furnished. On the mantelpiece there was a singular old family watch in a case; and this for a moment attracted Mr. Pickwick's attention.

"The furniture, ma'am, you say is to be taken at a valuation?" observed Mr. Pickwick, after a pause.

"And the fixtures," answered the lady. "The house belongs to us; but we are going to move into the country; and—"

"Then you will not let the house without disposing of the furniture at the same time?"

"I don't know what Mr. B. might be induced to do—if he got a respectable tenant," said the lady, with peculiar emphasis upon the adjective.

"Probably you would enquire," said Mr. Pickwick; "and we will wait here while you consult your husband."

"There, I thought as much!" ejaculated the lady, her countenance suddenly becoming very much flushed; "I knew it—I suspected it the moment I saw you! No respectable man goes about looking after houses with a livery servant behind him!"

And, as she uttered these words in a shrill and querulous tone, the lady ran to the door of the drawing-room, exclaiming, "Mr. B., Mr. B., here—I want you!"

Mr. B. hurried up stairs as quickly as a pair of slippers, with the heels trodden down, would allow him.

"Well, my dear," said he, "what is the matter?"

"Oh! Mr. B.," ejaculated the lady, "do turn these men out of the house: I know what they are, now! They wanted me to come down stairs and ask you a question, and then they would have walked off with your great grandfather's watch!"

"Do you mean to say that you suspect we are thieves?" cried Mr. Pickwick, indignantly.

"I know you are," returned the lady, shrouding herself behind her husband.

"And so do I!" cried Mr. Biggs (for such was the aristocratic and euphonious appellation of the gentleman).

Mr. Pickwick made no other reply to the assertion than by putting his right fist in immediate communication with Mr. Biggs's nose, and planting the left almost simultaneously in Mr. Biggs's dexter optic. Mr. Biggs fell upon the carpet,

Mrs. Biggs screamed and cried out "Murder," the dirty servant girl rushed up stairs, and the two children set up a most appalling yell in the hall below. Mr. Pickwick would have continued his attack upon Mr. Biggs, had not Mr. Weller suddenly pinioned him from behind, and held him as it were in a vice.

"What do you mean by coming to my house to knock me down?" cried Mr. Biggs.

"I am a respectable man," continued our hero; "and you have grossly insulted me. Sam, let me go: I will not inflict the chastisement which is so justly merited. And now," he added, when Mr. Weller had released his arms, "I will give you my card, sir—and if you want to hear any more of me, you will know where to apply."

With these words, Mr. Pickwick took his card from his pocket, threw it upon the carpet, and strode majestically out of the room, followed by Mr. Samuel Weller, who could not restrain certain cackinnations at the adventure.

Mr. Pickwick continued his walk in gloomy silence; and Mr. Weller did not think it worth while to interrupt his master's reverie. In a few minutes, the visual rays of Mr. Pickwick were concentrated in another announcement indicating a house to let, and that enquiries might be made within. Again did Mr. Weller make a vigorous use of a large brass knocker; and after a considerable delay, the door was opened to a distance of about a foot and a half, beyond which a chain inside prevented any farther motion.

"What do you want?" demanded a head that was thrust through the opening, and which seemed to belong to a specimen of the male sex.

"I am come about this house," said Mr. Pickwick. "The rent—"

"Ah! I thought you were," cried the head; "but I'm up to all your confounded dogdles; and so you may just walk off again as quick as you came."

"Well, upon my honour, this is the most extraordinary treatment I ever experienced!" exclaimed Mr. Pickwick. "I really don't know what to make of it!"

"I dare say you don't," cried the head, now expanding into a grin of ineffable delight; "but I do, though!"

"Why—what do you know of me?" demanded Mr. Pickwick.

"That you ought to be ducked in a horse-pond for persecuting poor people in this kind of way," was the immediate answer.

"What do you take me for, in the name of common sense?" cried the bewildered hero, of this most veracious narrative.

"Why—for what you are," was the reply, delivered in a tone of intense disgust.

"And what's that?" asked Mr. Pickwick.

"An execution, to be sure!"

This announcement threw Mr. Samuel Weller into convulsions of laughter, and Mr. Pickwick into a rage; and the head itself permitted its countenance to relapse once more into a grin of triumph.

"There is some mistake here," said Mr. Pickwick, after a pause: "my object is merely to enquire about the rent of this house, and for how long it is to be let!"

"And you are quite certain you ain't a trap?" exclaimed the head. "Don't tell any lies now."

"Lies!" cried Mr. Pickwick: "why do you insult me in this manner, sir?"

"Oh! I beg pardon,—I see how it is," said the man whose head up to this moment had alone been visible; "but make haste and pop in! I really thought you were the execution."

Thus speaking, the man loosened the chain of the door, and admitted Mr. Pickwick and Mr. Weller into the house.

"I really beg your pardon for my rudeness," said the individual to whom the head belonged, and who was a tall, thin, young man, with very long hair, and dressed in a very shabby dressing-gown, an old pair of Oxford-mixture trousers, and slippers; "but pray walk in. You see, the truth is—I am afraid of an execution: my landlord is the worst fellow in the world, and I know that he has ordered his broker to walk into my castle. But he shan't though, till I choose. The broker has tried all kinds of schemes to get in; yesterday he came as a chimney-sweep, and the day before as a twopenny post-man."

"But if your affairs be in this condition, how could I take the house with safety?" enquired Mr. Pickwick.

"I have got the lease for seven years," answered the young gentleman, lighting a clay-pipe as he spoke, "and if you take the house, I should ask a quarter's rent in advance. With that I would pay the landlord, and all would be right as the mail."

"I rather, think it would be as well not to disturb this here gen'lman in the very tranquil possession of his castle, sir," whispered Mr. Weller, while the gentleman himself knocked the ashes out of his pipe, and filled it with tobacco.

"So I think, Sam," returned Mr. Pickwick; and having observed that he did not think, from the appearance of the house, its size or arrangements would be calculated to suit, our hero rose to take his departure.

Now it happened that the broker and his man had been waiting in the neighbourhood to watch some opportunity of effecting an entrance into the house: and when they saw Mr. Pickwick and his domestic pass the portal thereof, they knew full well that these visitors would speedily take their departure again. They accordingly hastened up to the front-door, against which they posted themselves, ready to rush in the moment it was opened. This was espied by the tenant of the besieged castle; and he coolly and quietly communicated to Mr. Pickwick and Mr. Weller the impossibility of their departure until the coast was clear.

"This is very provoking," said Mr. Pickwick;—"at the same time, I should not wish to do you an injury."

"That's what I call talking like a brick!" ejaculated the gentleman in the dressing-gown. "And now I'll tell you what we'll do. I'm all alone in this house, in respect to living creatures—the rats and mice excepted—but I've got a good stock of provisions, which I got in last Saturday night, after twelve; and so we'll make ourselves comfortable, and tire those fellows out. They won't wait above an hour or two, I can tell you."

"And 'sposin' they waits till next Saturday night at twelve?" said Mr. Weller.

"Then you must get out of the window when it's dark this evening," returned the gentleman.

"So we can," coincided the philanthropic Mr. Pickwick.

"And now let's know each other better," exclaimed the gentleman. "My name is Ferguson—Mr. Walter Ferguson, at your service."

"A very nice name too," observed Mr. Weller; "and one as the little boys is partickler fond of in the streets."

Mr. Pickwick then detailed his own denominations and those of his domestic; and Mr. Ferguson expressed himself highly delighted at having formed the acquaintance of such illustrious individuals.

"Well, it was rather good, that I should have taken you for a broker's man," said Mr. Ferguson, addressing himself to Mr. Pickwick.

"I was not aware," observed our hero, "that such devices were practised, in order to obtain an entrance into houses?"

"Oh! you don't know what it is then," cried Mr. Ferguson: "but I do!"

"So it appears," said Sam, laconically.

"I just tell you what I will do," exclaimed Mr. Ferguson, after a pause; "if this young man—" pointing to Sam,—"will have the kindness to go downstairs and just give a look to the knives and forks and get ready the dinner—it's close upon three o'clock now—I'll tell you the adventures of my life in the meantime."

"I shall be very happy to hear them," answered Mr. Pickwick. "Sam, will you have the kindness to do what this gentleman suggests?"

"Certainly, sir," answered Mr. Weller; and, in a most excellent humour—for this adventure was one which highly diverted him—did the faithful valet repair to the lower regions to perform the avocations thus confidentially entrusted to him.

"They're not gone yet," said Mr. Ferguson, after reconnoitring the vicinity of the front door from the window: "we'll tire them out, I lay."

He then proceeded to put some coals upon the fire; and, having thus made the room, which was not very indifferently furnished, as comfortable as possible, he drew his chair close to the hearth, and commenced his narrative in the following manner.

To be continued in our next.)

TEETOTAL ANECDOTES.

THE advocates of Teetotalism frequently introduce into their speeches sprightly anecdotes illustrative of the arguments which they advance in favour of the doctrine. Some of these anecdotes are worth preserving, and from time to time we shall record a few of those which, by their piquancy or originality, have retained places in our memory. The first we shall now introduce to our readers is truly graphic and in strict accordance with real life:—A woman, the wife of an industrious mechanic, went to the butcher's shop to purchase a steak for her husband's dinner. The butcher demanded eight-pence for a pound, and would not allow himself to be beaten down in his price. The woman complained of the "horrible dearthness" of meat, and refused to purchase the steak. She, however, proceeded to the adjacent public-house, ordered a glass of rum, and began detailing her grievance to the landlady. The landlady sympathised with her, and observed that it was a shame for butchers to sell their meat at such a price. The conversation waxed interesting upon the subject; and the mechanic's wife took another glass of rum. Fourpence of her money thus disappeared. The landlady continued to declaim most bitterly against the dearthness of provisions, and comprehended the butcher, the baker, and the grocer in her sweeping denunciations against the dishonesty of tradesmen "who made everything so dear that poor people couldn't live." The mechanic's wife entered fully into the spirit of the landlady's discourse, and admired it amazingly. "Well," said she at last, "I must just have one more glass of rum;" and thus sixpence disappeared. The landlady continued in the same strain,—the mechanic's wife drank her rum; and then she found that she had but just two-pence left. "Well," she exclaimed, as she prepared to depart, "I suppose my husband must put up with a red herring for his dinner!" And thus, she who refused to give the butcher eight-pence for a wholesome and nutritious beef-steak, did not hesitate to squander sixpence away upon something that was worse than useless!

In this anecdote the moralizing of the landlady would be diverting, were not the heart sickened at the idea that the little incident is one of too frequent occurrence, and that thousands will haggle with the butcher for the price of a joint of meat, who never think of attempting to beat down the landlord of the public-house. And many consider it a point of honour to keep their public-house score paid up, whereas they do not hesitate to cheat the butcher, the baker, or the grocer of his bill.

Another anecdote which we have heard related with considerable humour and effect, is the following:—An unfortunate mouse fell into a vat filled with beer in a state of fermentation, in a brewery; and after swimming about for some time vainly endeavouring to effect an escape, he suddenly espied a cat watching him upon the edge of the vat. The mouse begged hard of the cat to release him; and the cat promised to extricate him from the vat, on condition that he might eat him up when he was safely out. The mouse consented; and the cat assisted him out of the vat. The moment the mouse was free, he ran to a hole in a corner of the building, and thanked the cat for her politeness. The cat upbraided him for having broken his promise, and insisted upon his fulfilling the bargain. The mouse remonstrated; but the cat appealed to his honour in a manner which quite wounded the pride of the mouse, who cut the matter very short by exclaiming, "I am perfectly aware of the nature of our convention; but who ever expects a person to perform any promise which he may make when he is in liquor?"

This epigrammatic anecdote affords a bitter satire upon those individuals who are most liberal in their promises when the wine is in, and the wit is out. The following instance of an extraordinary cure of almost inveterate intemperance will doubtless amuse our readers:—A very rich manufacturer, in one of the great towns in the north, had been for years addicted to drinking; and his family was inconsolable at this prostration of a fine intellect, and the ruin of a robust constitution. The manufacturer knew his failing, endeavoured to conquer it, but could not. He vowed he would limit himself to a certain number of glasses of wine every day; but the mere taste of the fascinating liquor led him invariably on to a debauch. His health was nearly destroyed; and his medical advisers proclaimed this to be a desperate case. In a short time he became an object of disgust and alarm to even his own children; and relatives interfered to remove his three beautiful daughters from the vicinity of such a parent. One day, the manufacturer entered his establishment at an unusual hour, and heard some of his men laughing very heartily in one of the rooms. Curious to ascertain the cause of their mirth, he crept gently up to the door, which was ajar. He immediately perceived one of the men imitating him when he was under the influence of liquor. The man reeled backwards and forwards, hiccupped, looked vacantly around him, spoke in a stammering and half unintelligible tone, and, in fine, enacted to perfection all the disgusting attitudes and ways of a drunken man. The other operatives enjoyed the scene to excess;—but the manufacturer himself received a lesson which he never forgot. He did not discover himself to his dependants, but withdrew cautiously, and made a vow of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors. And he was never known to break that solemn asseveration.

The Spartans were in the habit of making their slaves drunk, in order to warn their children against so filthy a habit; and the above incident in modern times seems to confirm the efficacy of the ancient example. There is much Attic salt in the following anecdote:—One of the aides-de-camp of Murat, King of Naples, was dreadfully addicted to intemperance. In other respects he was an excellent officer; and Murat deeply deplored this failing which rendered a faithful servant totally unworthy of all trust. On one occasion Murat remonstrated with his aide-de-camp in most serious terms, strenuously advising him to abandon a habit which rendered him almost unfit for service. "Well," said the aide-de-camp, "I will follow your Majesty's advice; but I can only consent to leave off by degrees." "By degrees!" ejaculated Murat; "if you fall into the fire would you wish your friends only to drag you out of it by degrees?"

With regard to this anecdote, we will quote the following extract from a speech made by Dr. Scott at a Temperance meeting at Buffalo, in America:—"It is idle to pretend that a man is going to be killed by leaving off drinking. I should as soon think of killing a horse by leaving off the whip and the spur, as to kill a man by leaving off rum. I know more than forty cases in my own practice, where great drinkers have quitted it suddenly, and not one has been injured. And I never knew any other way. When men leave it off they are at first feeble, and their appetite fails; then their appetite becomes ravenous, and then they get well."

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

THE extent to which circumstantial evidence should be accredited, has never been properly defined by any of the numerous writers upon law and jurisprudence; and thousands of instances upon record prove the impropriety, if not the absolute wickedness of judging by evidence which certainly may appear to conduct opinion to one point, but which still may be based upon a wrong foundation. The following anecdote will prove interesting to our readers:—

About five o'clock one morning, the head of a man was found under an arch of the Houchette bridge in Paris: the trunk of the body was afterwards discovered in a sink in the Rue de la Houchette, and the two lower extremities near the Pont Neuf. Subsequent enquiries led to the knowledge that the deceased was a man of the name of Ramus, and that he had been a soldier, lately employed as a messenger in the office of a receiver of the taxes. The head and body being deposited at the Morgue, or the Dead House, the medical examination commenced; and, at the very greatest length was the subject investigated. It will be impossible to enter deeply into this scrutiny. Suffice it to say that from the careful and judicious mode of procedure, the medical men in this country would derive great advantage from its perusal. The exterior appearance showed the deceased to be thirty, or thereabouts;—the countenance exhibited not the slightest mark of suffering or anxiety;—the features were calm, the eyes half open, the mouth wide open, and the skin pale and livid. There was a slight wound upon the forehead, and there were two or three slight bruises upon the face; but no other indication whatever of violence upon any part of the body. The medical men, from all the circumstances which presented themselves, on examining the manner in which decapitation and amputation had been performed, came to the conclusion that Ramus was killed during sleep, and that sleep must have been produced by artificial means; that it was either the result of drunkenness, or the effect of some narcotic; that the throat must have been cut, and an immense quantity of blood lost: that the decapitation and the cutting off the limbs must have been immediately performed by a person accustomed to such operations either on man or on animals; that the instrument must have been sharply edged and long, either such as is used for amputation or the kitchen; that he must have been a vigorous person; that all the incisions were made by the same hand; and that the murderer became nervous as he concluded his horrid act. The surgeons then proceeded to the examination of the internal parts of the body, which led them to pronounce that the unfortunate man had laboured under no disease which had a tendency to terminate life suddenly; that death was solely produced by the cutting of the throat; that the contusions on the face were the results of the endeavours made, during the amputation, to perform it quickly; and that death must have taken place about three hours after the deceased had had a meal. The contents of the stomach were subjected to analysis, and pronounced to contain a small quantity of alcohol and of hydrocyanic or prussic acid, but its precise quantity could not be determined. About three weeks afterwards the murderer was arrested; or rather, he delivered himself up to justice; for, learning that his son, who had been just apprenticed to an apothecary at Paris, had been taken up on suspicion, he returned to Paris, having previously left that city for some distant place. He confessed to the Prefect of Police, after some hesitation, his crime; and it is most satisfactory to all those who were interested in the subject, to find how completely the opinions given by the medical men were borne out by the narrative of the person who committed the deed. Just previous to the death of Ramus, he had given him a mixture of brandy and prussic acid, and had murdered his victim exactly in the manner in which the documents delivered in by the medical examiners of the body had led the public to expect.

In this case the medical men arrived at the satisfactory conclusion that death was solely produced by cutting the throat; but in the case of Greenacre and Hannah Brown, the English medical men could not state whether death was produced by the blow of the cudgel or by the incision of the knife. Monster as Greenacre certainly was, there was no evidence to prove that he wilfully murdered Hannah Brown. All that the evidence went to prove was that he had been the means of her death; but whether accidentally or intentionally did not appear. In our humble opinion, circumstantial evidence seemed to speak thus much in his favour, that he killed her in a fit of passion. He had no motive to kill her; he had discovered that she was a literal pauper, and that she had been contracting debts at a tally-shop by false representations, in his name. He flew into a passion, and reproached her: she retorted;—his passion became ungovernable; he took up the first object near—a log—and hurled it at her head, in one of those moments in which man has no control over himself, and therefore no power of thinking whether he intends to kill, or not—or what he intends. The log struck her upon a vital part, and killed her. Had he rushed out of the house, summoned assistance, and declared that he had slain her accidentally, a verdict of Manslaughter would have been returned against him, as in a hundred similar cases. Medhurst was only sentenced to three years' imprisonment for killing his fellow-student in a passion. But Greenacre did not adopt that plan: he remained quiet;—he cut up the body, and disposed of it in ponds and ditches. He was tried, and found guilty of Murder. Why was this verdict returned against him. Because he had concealed the deed, and thus disposed of the corpse. But these circumstances did not prove that he had committed a wilful murder: they only showed that he had been deficient in that moral courage which would have prompted another person, perhaps, to have rushed from the house and called for assistance. Then, for what was Greenacre put to death? Simply for hiding a death, which might have been accidental, and disposing of the body? Of a surety, circumstantial evidence was not strong enough to convict this man of murder.

About a year and a half previous to the death of Hannah Brown, a priest, named Dellacollonge, was tried in France for the murder of a young woman, with whom he had cohabited. He disposed of the body in the same way as Greenacre did;—but he declared that he caused the death of the girl by an accident, and not intentionally. He said that the anxiety and horrible fear of the moment when he found himself with a dead body thus thrown upon his hands, paralyzed all his reasoning powers, and induced him to adopt the means which would naturally first suggest themselves to a man in such a situation, of concealing the body. The French jury acquitted him of the charge of wilful murder, and punished him with imprisonment for concealing and cutting up the corpse.

We must remember that when justice charges an individual with a crime, the task of proving the accusation lies with justice; and no verdict of Guilty should be returned because the accused will not disprove the charge, should justice fail to make out a case. What case was made out against Greenacre? No one could prove that he murdered the woman intentionally; and there was no evidence to render the crime probable, because there was an absence of all premeditated motive. Even if he had made no defence, there was no just ground to find him guilty. But he did make a defence; and he told a story which was probable, because it was borne out by the facts that men's passions are violent, and that he had no motive to commit a wilful crime. Should not then justice have leant to the probable side; because circumstantial evidence was here actually in favour of Greenacre's defence.

Every body will recollect the extraordinary murder of Millie at Newcastle, and the trial of Archibald Bolam for the deed. Bolam volunteered no explanation, and did not admit that he killed Millie in a fit of passion. And yet it was proved that all his story about having been attacked himself by a burglar or assassin was a pure fiction. He had even inflicted wounds upon himself to make out his case. Probably, had he had the opportunity, he would have disposed of the body as Greenacre did. At all events, the cases were nearly parallel, save that circumstantial evidence was more in favour of Greenacre than of Bolam, because it is possible to see a motive which would have induced the latter to commit the crime. But Bolam was only found guilty of Manslaughter, and was transported.

Ambrose Gwinett was hanged at Deal for the murder of a man who merely disappeared, and whose body was not found. Circumstantial evidence certainly pointed strongly to Gwinett as a murderer; but still it was not proved in the first instance that a murder had been really committed. Gwinett and another man, of the name of Collins, arrived together at an inn in Deal. Gwinett borrowed Collins's clasp-knife during supper-time, in the presence of the waiter. On the following morning Collins was missing; and Gwinett had been met on the stairs, in the middle of the night, coming up from the garden. Blood was found in the garden, and in the midst of the blood was the clasp-knife, open. The traces of blood were continued down to the sea-side, and there they ceased. Gwinett was moreover found to have Collins's purse, which the waiter had seen over night in Collins's possession, in his pocket. Gwinett's defence was that he had received the purse, after the waiter left the room on the preceding evening, in consequence of an arrangement that he (Gwinett) should be pay-master for them both; that he had gone down stairs in the night, for a certain purpose, to the garden; that his nose had bled dreadfully; that he had used the clasp-knife to raise the latch of the door, and had dropped it in the dark; and that he had walked down to the sea-side close by, to wash his face and hands, and stop the bleeding at the nose with the cold salt-water. This tale was not believed; Gwinett was found guilty of Murder, and hanged. But a shepherd, passing by the gibbet a few hours after the execution, and while the victim was hanging in chains, perceived signs of life in him, and cut him down. Gwinett was recovered; and the kind-hearted shepherd sent him abroad. In a distant colony, Gwinett met Mr. Collins, the very man for whose murder he had been hanged! An explanation immediately ensued. On the night in question, Collins had also gone down stairs to the garden, and had been carried off by a press-gang who passed along the sea-shore at the time. He was conveyed to a boat, and in that transported to the tender-vessel lying in the Downs: the vessel sailed next morning, and Collins had heard nothing of the dilemma of his friend until they met as just described.

This anecdote, more powerfully than any other, bears strong testimony to the truth of our assertions that circumstantial evidence can very seldom be relied upon. It is, however, argued that no one ever does see another commit a murder; and therefore no conviction ever can take place. This is a foolish argument; because there are many cases in which the guilt is made clear by evidence which cannot be termed circumstantial in the sense in which we are now using the word. There are many cases in which a dozen circumstances, all insignificant when considered separately, form a damning mass of evidence when taken collectively, and compose a chain which enables us to recognize and trace, step by step, the progress of the culprit from his starting point of premeditation up to the very execution of the crime itself. There was no evidence to convict Hubbard of the murder of Elisa Grimwood; nor was there any evidence to convict Gould of the murder of Mr. Templeman. But there was evidence sufficient to convict Marchant of the murder of the female servant, and Courvoisier of that of Lord William Russell.

In an article of this kind, it may be supposed that we should naturally refer to the trial of Madame Laffarge, in France, for poisoning her husband. There are two points in this case to be discussed and considered:—the arsenic, eliminated by M. Orfila, may have been the result of the combinations of the various tests; and, in this case, Monsieur Laffarge would not have been poisoned at all. Or, again, if he were poisoned, some one else might have done it; and a very singular chain of coincidences and circumstances may have aroused all the suspicions against Madame Laffarge. Certainly, no trial was ever conducted with more patience; and, although its details were revolting, they were nevertheless necessary, and prove that if justice on the one hand had every chance afforded it of reaching its aggressor, the accused, on the other hand, had also every chance, from the same process, of seeing her innocence triumphantly developed. This remark applies to the manner in which the trial was conducted; we, however, do not admire the result, and think that the verdict should have been one of Acquittal.

It was only lately that M. Orfila, the celebrated French chemist, discovered that there was arsenic in the bones. Who can tell that a deeper research will not enable him to discover arsenic in the flesh—in the blood? And then, what would become of the verdict of the jury who found Madame Laffarge guilty upon the ground that arsenic was discovered in the stomach of her husband?

Human knowledge is not complete enough to enable us to put faith in circumstantial evidence. A man might be seen coming away from a hay-stack near which he had been loitering all day. Shortly afterwards this hay-stack may blaze forth. Some years ago, and probably at the present day, this man would be taken, and hanged for Arson. And yet the hay-stack may have been burnt without the intervention of any human agency, but in consequence of a physical phenomenon now well understood—Spontaneous Combustion! A Frenchman was once tried upon a charge of murdering his wife by burning her; and the charge seemed to be supported by the fact that the accused was known to be in love with a beautiful girl, who was his servant. Medical examination, however, after a considerable amount of patience and trouble, succeeded in proving that the woman had fallen a victim to spontaneous combustion.

Many—many individuals have been executed, protesting their innocence with the apparent fervour which alone belongs to innocence, until the drop was ready to glide away from beneath their feet, and they were trembling on the confines of another world. It is to be feared that these asseverations of innocence have too frequently been based upon truth; and what mortal pangs can equal those which must be experienced by a jury whose verdict has deprived an innocent man of his existence? Oh! rather lean towards the safe side and consider that it is better to stand the chance of allowing a guilty monster to escape punishment than to send an innocent man to the gibbet.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE CAPTIVE BIRD.

By Edwin P. Hood.

How plaintive is thy song, sweet bird,
Thou' thrilling in its tone;—
'Tis true the notes are beautiful,
But half their charm is gone;
For in thy lay appears to float
The captive's mournful strain;
And even thy most melodious tone
Is quivering with pain.
'Tis even so—it must be so—
For once thy wings were free;
Thy heart was erst untouch'd by grief,
Thine home the forest tree;—
And now thy plaintive melody
Mourns for the happy times,
When thou wast free to rove at will
In sweet Arcadian climes!
'Tis strange that happiness should seem
The brighter when 'tis dead—
Strange that it wears the hues of life,
When life itself has fled!
Strange that we do not know our bliss,
Until its dream be done;
Nor feel the warmth of Phœbus' ray
Ere his career is run.
The floating fields of azure light,
The evening's saffron skies,
The sun declining o'er the hills,
Array'd in dolphin dyes;
The long—long day of pleasure past,
The dreams which all have known—
Seem still more bright and beautiful
When bound in Memory's zone!

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ERRATUM.—In our last, page 292, third column, three lines from the bottom, for Teetotallers read Teetotaler.

We are pleased to find that the UNITED KINGDOM TOTAL ABSTINENCE LIFE ASSOCIATION does receive weekly and monthly payments, and that it is connected exclusively with no particular Teetotal Society. The plan originated with the Secretary, Mr. Compton, and Mr. R. Warner.

We should be glad if our numerous correspondents would not delay their communications. However rude the garb in which they may be sent to us, through haste or other causes, they shall be revised and corrected for publication with all possible care. Why has our friend at Birmingham been so long silent? We wish for a regular correspondent in that town, and also at Leeds and Sheffield.

B. S. is declined with thanks.
To An Enquirer.—We did not review the pamphlet alluded to, because we should only have given an immense publicity to statements calculated to excite ill-feeling, and which were harmless in the form in which they were issued to the public, as the pamphlet dropped still-born from the press. The circulation of The Teetotaler is ten thousand weekly.

Mr. H. Freeman's admirable pamphlet shall be reviewed in our next.

J. W. (Shrewsbury).—We believe there are about two millions two hundred thousand Teetotalers in England, Scotland, and Wales. For the number of Teetotalers in Ireland, see our Report of last week. J. W.'s letter shall receive due attention next week.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, MARCH 13, 1841.

SINCE the propagation of the doctrine of Teetotalism, the thirst for knowledge amongst those whom the salutary effects of that principle has reached, has increased in an extraordinary degree; and this statement is borne out by the fact that on every side the eye surveys the quick rise, the steady progress, and the increasing number of Literary and Scientific Institutions, Mechanics' Institutions, and Mutual Instruction Societies. All the obstacles in the ways of knowledge,—“whose ways are those of pleasantness, and all whose paths are peace,”—will be removed by the advocacy of Teetotalism. The understanding will be thereby released from that constant liability to attenuation and increasing weakness which is the invariable attendant upon the use of intoxicating liquors;—the memory will not be prematurely impaired, and thus rendered incompetent to impart its knowledge to children or friends;—the distaste for serious pursuits, which is felt by all those whose habitual resort is the tap-room or public-house parlour, will be removed;—and a thousand facilities will be thrown in the way of the progress of education, and consequently of knowledge, through the benignant influence of Teetotalism.

Numerous Mutual Instruction Societies are, as we before observed, springing up amongst the Teetotalers; and various laudable devices are pursued to work out the plan of spreading and imparting knowledge in the sphere of those who have been reclaimed from intemperance or the moderate indulgence in a pernicious habit. Lectures are delivered upon numerous subjects, by men who qualify themselves for the task by study and reading; and subscriptions are entered into for the purpose of purchasing books of instruction and amusement. Hundreds—aye, thousands of individuals, whose reading was once circumscribed to the police-reports and prize-fights in the weekly journals, now read wholesome literature, and reflect upon that which they read. The drunken disputes of the tap-room are exchanged for rational discussion and sober argument in Temperance coffee-houses or literary institutions; and these are rational and civilised means of pastime, instructing while they amuse, encouraging a transfusion of information from one individual to another, and calculated to enlarge those minds which before were narrow, prejudiced, and rude.

Teetotalism must not be therefore considered merely in respect to its first principle,—the suppression of intemperance: it must be contemplated in all its bearings, and judged by its most remote as well as by its immediate effects. Teetotalism is a great national blessing, in the most comprehensive signification of the phrase; inasmuch as it is the best friend to civilisation, education, and moral improvement. The wisdom of assembled senators never conceived a measure calculated to achieve such mighty results. The enactments of legislative bodies usually apply to individual abuses, or aim at affording an impulse to particular means of improvement. But Teetotalism is a general and an universal remedy. It advances the interests of religion, by placing men in a fit condition to visit the altar of their God. It benefits the agricultural and commercial interests of the country, by increasing the industry of labour, by creating a larger demand for the comforts and even luxuries of life, and by turning the produce of the land into legitimate and proper channels—urging the farmer to sow wheat to make bread, instead of barley to make malt. It diminishes the amount of poverty, and thus lessens the burthen of rates and the calls of charity upon the purses of the laborious. It lightens the calendars of crime, and thus diminishes the expenses of prosecutions and legal process. It softens the ferocity of the rugged disposition, and thus prevents the disasters which arise from sudden and ungovernable outbreaks of passion. It facilitates the application of good and wholesome laws, and enables the nation to watch its interests with judgment and discrimination. It is moreover calculated to ensure the election of honest representations in the senate-house, by at once overturning the degrading and demoralizing system of working out a scheme of bribery by means of deluging those who are entitled to suffrage with strong drink.

But it would be impossible to detail all the happy results in progress through the agency of Teetotalism. Truly delightful is it to know that thousands now pass their evenings in rational occupations, instead of in the vile dens of drunkenness and debauchery;—delightful is it to listen to the outpourings of those intellects which have been released from the shackles of intemperance;—delightful is it to look around and behold Temperance coffee-houses and literary institutions springing up in all directions, both in town and country. And far—far more delightful is it to know that myriads of wives and children now welcome with smiles those husbands and fathers whose return home was once marked with apprehension and sorrow. Oh! that Teetotalism could but recal back to earth those proud spirits of genius which have fallen victims to the hideous vice which has so long reigned like a pestilence in civilised England,—Oh! that they could be called back from those tombs to which they were prematurely hurried, and be allowed to glance upon the aspect of that society which is now so changed by means of the chastening hand of Teetotalism!

We often survey with pleasure that compartment of The Teetotaler in which we present to our readers every week a concise report of the progress of Teetotalism in the metropolis and the provinces. We survey that Report with pleasure, because it affords us a competent idea of the triumphant progress of Teetotalism throughout the British islands. That report enables us to view, as it were by a magic lantern, the struggle between the new principle and the old habit in city, town, village, and hamlet, and to echo back the shout of victory which emanates from each. Everywhere is Teetotalism triumphant. Some places have received the doctrine with avidity; and all places have received it well. Public-houses are closing in every direction; and the custom of the brewers is experiencing a rapid diminution. The Teetotalers pursue their career with enthusiasm:—they are proud of their Associations, and consider it a point of honour, as well as a moral duty, to swell the ranks of their converts to the utmost of their power. They subscribe large sums to build Temperance Halls, to distribute tracts, and to procure banners and medals. They give frequent festivals, many of which are conducted upon a scale of unbounded liberality, and even elegance. Some of the provincial Societies will send for a popular Lecturer, such as Mr. MINGAYE SYDER, from London, pay his expenses, and present him with ten or fifteen guineas for his services. All these circumstances bear striking testimony to the triumphant, rapid, and beneficial march of Teetotalism.

Teetotalism is an extreme measure, because it is a radical means of cure; and it is applied to an extreme case of disease. Hence the enthusiasm with which its advocates and disciples cling to it; and, if from time to time we hear of backsliders, as in the case of that unmitigated hypocrite of a Welshman a few weeks ago, we can only say that such men never embraced the cause from purely honourable and disinterested motives at the commencement. Besides, amongst large fraternities and sects, these relapses will and must sometimes occur. “To err is the failing of human nature;” and no one will venture to attack the excellence and efficacy of the Christian religion, because upwards of four hundred thousand Christians have abjured their creed and embraced Islamism at the same time they entered the corps of the Ottoman Janizaries. If a system, of divine origin, have lost its members from time to time, surely a scheme of human invention is not to be reproached because its disciples will occasionally fall away. No;—the exceptions prove the rule in this case as in all others; for where one man breaks his pledge, ninety-nine faithfully adhere to it.

The prudent man prefers enlisting himself upon the safer side. Now—even if the benefits of Teetotalism be exaggerated by their disciples (and they are not)—it is nevertheless the safe side. Water costs comparatively nothing; and thus in a pecuniary point of view Teetotalism is preferable to Moderation. Water is healthy; and strong drink must produce, in small quantities, an injury proportionate in amount to that which even the Anti-Teetotaler admits that it effects in large quantities. Here again is Teetotalism triumphant. The Teetotaler stands no chance of being beguiled into excess; the moderate drinker does. The very first time that Noah drank wine, he became intoxicated:—the application of this example to the present time will show the necessity of signing a pledge of total abstinence. Consider the question in all its lights and bearings, and the impartial man must concede to us the point that Teetotalism is the safe side.

THE DEATH OF OLEG.

TRANSLATED FROM THE RUSSIAN.

I.

Ho! whither away rides Prince Oleg so fast?

Knowest thou not that he speeds to the land of the grape, and the fig, and the citron,—the land of purple cloths—and pearls—and gold and silver—the land of silk and gems—the city of spires and turrets!

And who are they that follow him? Their dark locks wave in the wind—their fierce brows lower in wrath—the mains and tails of their fleet coursers are streaming in the blast,—and hark to their wild hurrah! Who are they that leave their snow-clad plains for the vales of the south?

Knowest thou not the wild Varangians of Novogorod—how they came like robbers, and seized upon the kingdom of the north—how they have swam over rivers—and torn away our wives and children—how they have scorched up our homes and our harvests, and drawn the life-blood of the princes of Kiev?

And whither go they now?

To the city of Constantinople—the holy city!—hark to the shout that the breeze wafts hither—their yells of savage fury;—and see—and see him on a milk-white steed, who towers above the rest, and urges them on to deeds of plunder and perfidy! Hither he comes—'tis Oleg—Oleg, the destroyer—anathema!—the blood of Ascol and Dir be upon his head!

II.

Prince Oleg, on his milk-white steed, sped forward fast on his career of blood—accompanied by his band of Cossacks, whose loud hurrahs aroused both the prayer of the victim and the wails of the bereaved. Away over the dreary plains of the north—naught could oppose his victorious career! At length, a mighty river, and a tangled forest up the hill-side beyond, arrested his progress; and, for an instant, Oleg and his troops halted upon the brink. It was but for an instant: at the example of their lord, in they plunged—men and horses—to dare their death in the rapid whirlpool. The arms of Oleg were seen raised—his voice was heard encouraging them on—the clang of their harness responded to his call, as the cavalcade rushed into the water. Some reached the opposite shore—the rest were swept away down the stream, and were lost for ever!

"They are gone to join Rurwick in the halls of the brave!" cried Oleg; and, collecting his brave followers around him again, he pursued his way.

But the tangled forest on the hill-side next impeded them; and they were obliged to separate. It was moonlight; and their polished helmets, studding the dark wood, shone in the pale beams as they scaled the height, like a terrestrial firmament of stars emulating those that glittered above. "Hurrah! on—on!" shouted Oleg, as they gained the summit: "yonder is a light; we shall meet with brave reception there!"

Away over the desolate heath—away they sped, towards the light that twinkled afar. It was from a solitary monastery: the passing bell tolled for a departed brother as the long and solemn train of Monks emerged from the hollow-sounding portal, bearing the body to its last resting-place. With eyes fixed upon the ground, and solemn chant, they glided slowly along, as Oleg and his fierce horde, with clattering hoofs rode up swift as the wind amongst them. With the Cossacks everything was legitimate object of rapine; and, like a troop of demons, they rushed upon the defenceless Monks—slew many on the spot—pursued the rest who fled; and victors and vanquished together rushed in at the open gates, which were stained with the purple carnage. Unaccustomed to the worship of any God, save that of war, and without remorse for the religious panoply of the Christians, Oleg and his Varangians burst into the sanctuary, and proceeded to despoil the shrine.

"Hold, sacrilegious, hold!" exclaimed the Superior. "Holy Virgin and saints, will ye suffer this? Rash men, what seek ye? Gold?—We have it—we will yield it; but spare the altar of the Most High! Pardon them, just Heaven!—they know not what they do!"

His adjurations were unheeded. Seizing a crucifix, he stood before the shrine, endeavouring to repress, by his single voice, the crowd of savages who pressed onward in a turbulent stream. With the sacred emblem elevated in his hand, he thus addressed them:—

"See—see—this is the God whom ye despise, whose temple ye are now violating by this sacrilege. Ye will surely perish! See—believe—and tremble!"

A laugh of insult only burst forth in answer, as the barbarians turned again to pursue their hateful work; and the faces of the Superior's slain brethren, as they lay stiff and stark, their sable garments bathed in blood, their eyes staring as they had died in their agony, gazed on him as in mockery, illumined by the ghastly moonlight.

"Now by my milk-white steed," said Oleg—

"Hold, impious!" exclaimed the Abbot; "that milk-white steed shall cause thy death!"

Oleg started, for the first time alive to terror. With a trembling and wavering voice, he called off his fierce tribe; and, in spite of their discontent and mutterings, he led them away from the scene of their guilt and carnage. Rapid as had been his journey before, now was it as slow and fearful; and careful was he of every step, lest his horse should stumble, and the fatal prophecy should be fulfilled!

Not long did Oleg rest without consulting the priest of his own land. The mystic fires blazed within the huge circle of gigantic stones, that formed the chief temple of the Pagan Russians of Kief. The father of the mysteries, with his assistants, long robed as the Druids in Britain of old, met Oleg at the entrance as he came alone to ask of them how he should avert the threatened evil, and the hidden import of the fearful words.

"Fear not the prophecy of the Christian, warrior!" said the priests: "has not thy red right arm full often conquered and despoiled them? Pursue thy victories—still conquer and destroy—and yet use not thy favourite horse!"

"What, then—can ye give me no more security than what my own reason would prompt me to?" demanded Oleg. "Where, then, is your boasted knowledge? Of what use are your vaunted powers?"

"We can make thee invulnerable," said the father, "in every part but one; and over one part we may have no control;—choose thee which part that shall be."

"The heel, then, since that is never towards my enemies," cried Oleg.

"Be it so," said the father; "and thine heel shall be the only part that can be harmed."

Pouring out a blood-red liquid upon the ground, from a goblet which he held in his hand, the priest muttered an indistinctly-heard charm over the altar, whose lament flame was suddenly lit up with a livid glare.

"Stay," said he to Oleg, "and watch this sacred spot for seven days and seven nights: breathe not a word, nor stir from this spot—and the mighty gift is thine."

And they left him.

Seven days and seven nights, Prince Oleg watched the mystic fire in a solitary silence, broken only by the moans of the sighing blast that swept thro' the ruined pile and the thick groves around, the wings of the owl, and the harsh scream of the vulture wheeling aloft expectant of its prey.

At the end of that period the sages returned.

"Toll," said they; "now thou art free—invaluable to all, save in thy right heel! Go forth and conquer!"

III.

Who is it that rides on so fast and so fiercely, but no longer on a milk-white steed? Still is he with his wild Radnichthes, his Morinians, and his Cossacks, whose shouts make the affrighted welkin ring.

It is Oleg—Oleg the terrible! War and destruction are in his front—desolation and despair mark his footsteps. Anathema! the blood of Ascold and Dir be upon his head!

Oleg again led his horde to the south. In the thick-est of the conflict he was seen towering above the rest like a destroying angel: no sword clave his helmet—every arrow glanced from him, for he bore a charmed life! In the midst of carnage and destruction, while all around him were falling to rise no more, still Oleg fought unhurt and victorious. He ransacked the empire of the east—he triumphed over Constantinople—he vanquished the degenerate Byzantines—and hung his buckler at their gates in token of his triumph. Flushed with success and pride, laden with treasures, dragging myriads of Greek youths and lovely virgins into slavery, he returned homeward once more, ravaging the fertile provinces of Wallachia and Moldavia in his way. As before he had been received with scowls and derision for his retreat from the monastery, so now was he met with smiles and songs of joy, while fate lay hidden, to poison all, concealed beneath the brightest flowers!

The feast of welcome went on merrily. Oleg pledged his followers often in deep draughts of maddening wine, and was as often pledged by them in return. Suddenly the sounds of minstrels' voices fell upon his ears; and this was the chant of Oleg's two favourite bards:—

FIRST MINSTREL.

How frightful the grave! how deserted and drear!
With the howls of the storm-wind, the creaks of the bier,

And the white bones all clattering together!

SECOND MINSTREL.

How peaceful the grave—its quiet how deep!
Its zephyrs breathe calmly, and soft is its sleep;
And flowerets perfume it with ether!

FIRST MINSTREL.

There riots the blood-created worm on the dead,
And the yellow skul serves the foul toad for a bed,
And snakes in its nettle-weeds hiss.

SECOND MINSTREL.

How lovely, how lone the repose of the tomb!
No tempests are there; but the nightingales come
And sing their sweet chorus of bliss!

FIRST MINSTREL.

The ravens of night flap their wings o'er the grave;
'Tis the vulture's abode—'tis the wolf's dreary cave,
Where they tear up the earth with their fangs.

SECOND MINSTREL.

There the cony at evening disports with its love,
Or rests on the sod; while the turtles above
Repose on the bough that o'erhangs!

FIRST MINSTREL.

There darkness and dampness, with poisonous breath,
And loathsome decay, fill the dwelling of death;—
The trees are all barren and bare!

SECOND MINSTREL.

Oh! soft are the breezes that play round the tomb,
And sweet with the violet's wafted perfume,
With lilies and jessamines fair!

FIRST MINSTREL.

The pilgrim who reaches this valley of tears,
Would fain hurry by; and, with tremblings and fears,
He is launch'd in the wreck-covered river!

SECOND MINSTREL.

The traveller, outworn with life's pilgrimage dreary,
Lays down his rude staff, like one who is weary,
And sweetly reposes for ever!

"Meseems that the words which the second bard utters are more welcome to the ear," said Oleg, when this antithetical strain was concluded. "But I reck not for the grave, be its turf the bed of scorpions or the garden of violets! What have I now to fear?" Then turning suddenly round to one of his attendants, he asked, "Where is the milk-white steed I used so much to dread?"

"Great prince," was the answer, "the milk-white steed has long been dead!"

"Ha—sayest thou so?" ejaculated Oleg. "I thank thee. Lead me instantly to the spot where its bones wither!"

Oleg was conducted thither; and, placing his foot upon the skull of his deceased favourite, he said in a tone of exultation,—"This, then, is the terrible animal whom I have so much dreaded! this is that which was to cause my death! Fool—poor idiot fool," laughed Oleg, in scorn;—"thus I stamp on thee, in token of my triumph over thee, and over death, and over the prophecy of the Christians."

Oleg hastened to withdraw his foot; but, strange to tell, it hung in the jaw of the animal; and he was thrown prostrate on the ground. At the same instant, a poisonous serpent, that had lain concealed within the skull, and now disturbed from its repose, suddenly flew out and inflicted a mortal wound in the heel of Oleg.

The prince groaned out, as he writhed there in agony, "Wretch! I have courted my own fate—I have insulted my fallen enemy; and I meet my reward!"

Before sunset, Oleg was a corpse; and thus, despite of Pagan charms, the Christians triumphed; and the fatal prophecy was fulfilled, that the milk-white steed of Oleg should be the cause of his death!

THE SHIPS OF THE MODERNS.

SHIP-BUILDING made but a snail-paced progress until the introduction of the compass; and the application of astronomy to nautical pursuits at once set the mariner free from dependence on the land. The discovery of America resulted from these improvements and the inspirations of a single man. Thenceforward the mariner, thrown upon the wide ocean, was brought into contact with unknown perils, and to obviate them was led to untried experiments. The art has since strode forward with giant steps. To the Italians, Catalans, and Portuguese, belong most of the advances in the earliest days of its revival: the Spaniards followed up the discovery of the new world with a rapid improvement in the form and size of their ships; and in the United States of America ship-building has made unprecedented progress, with however little aid from theoretical principles and abstract science. Experiment, guided by theory, forms, when united, the only infallible guide.

In order to appreciate the extent and value of modern improvements, we have only to refer to the figure of the old ships, several of which may be found engraved in Charnock's work upon naval architecture. There we see the Great Harry, the wonder of the sixteenth century! Her bow and poop are of prodigious height, the signal lantern on the taffrail of the latter being nearly level with the round tops. She has an immense beak, with bow and stern balconies, six round towers at the angles of the poop, gangway, and fore-castle, like the turrets of a castle; four masts with tops literally round, like inverted cones, and abundance of streamers from every spar. It is true that very shortly after the time of the Great Harry, a ship was launched in this country, called the Royal Prince, and was very little different from those of the present day. Sir Walter Raleigh says, "It is not long since striking the top-masts has been devised, together with the chain-pumps, which take twice up as much water as the old ones: we have now studding sails, and the weighing of anchors with the capstan;—moreover, we have fallen into consideration of the length of cables, and by it we resist the malice of the greatest winds; for true it is that the length of cable is the life of the ship." The improvements we have made during the last century, have consisted rather in taking away than in adding: we have nearly abolished the high poop and inflated topside; and we find that the more unbroken be the level of the deck, the better will the ship perform its vertical motions, and the easier will it pitch. The ships of the present day are as denuded of all excrescences and inequalities as possible; and thus they are less liable to camber, or become broken-backed.

We shall now state what are the essential qualities of a good ship, and how they may be best attained. In a ship-of-war the great object is speed, connected as far as may be with ease of movements, and capacity to accommodate her crew and carry a large supply of water and provisions. One point moreover is especially to be looked to;—this is that the ship float sufficiently high above water to run no risk of receiving seas in her lower ports in time of action. In order to be secure of this, the constructor must make an estimate of the whole weight of the ship, including body, spars, armament, men, and ammunition, and must so model the bottom that it will have displaced an equal weight of water when arrived at the desired depth. In respect to the merchantmen, the primary consideration is to attain the greatest capacity to carry cargo; and in order to do this, and combine this quality with safe and easy movements and rapid sailing, the builder imitates a form which has stood successfully the test of experience. In this way the modern ship-builder has succeeded in uniting these conflicting desiderata in a degree heretofore deemed impossible.

Among the admitted and well-established principles of construction, is the leading one that the greatest breadth must always be before the centre, and consequently the bow be more blunt than the stern. Some of our best builders place this point only one-third of the length from the stern. A log tows infinitely easier by its largest end; and a concurrent testimony is found in the forms of the finny tribe, which an unerring nature has adopted to divide the element they move in, by a shape gradually diminishing from head to tail. As it is then less essential that a ship should be sharp forward than aft, there is a farther advantage in having the bow full towards the edge, that it may check her in descending into the waves, not abruptly, but gently, pitching being the most dangerous to hull and spars of all a vessel's movements.

Though sharpness towards the stern-post is vitally essentially to fast sailing, care must be taken to leave the ship full towards the surface, in order to check the stern gently in descending, and, when scudding before a gale, to lift it in timely season, on the arrival of a sea. The French schooner is the model of perfection in naval architecture. She is of the simplest form, carrying the greatest breadth before the centre; the bow is very sharp, and the draught forward inconsiderable, but increasing towards the stern, where it becomes double. With great length and breadth, furnishing stability to bear a large surface of sail, and great depth to take hold of the water and prevent drifting, the burden and consequent displacement of the schooner are inconsiderable, a large part of the bottom consisting of mere dead wood. Above water her form is straight, low, and unbroken, offering no obstacle to the wind: the masts are long and tapered, and the sails like the body, adapted to approach the wind, which this species of schooner can do twenty degrees nearer than the best-equipped frigate. In dreadfully stormy weather, the writer of this article has seen the French sailors leave Dunkirk, Calais, Dieppe, or Havre, in these schooners, at a period when not even the famous Deal or Dover boatmen would venture to put off in their own renowned vessels. By the aid of a cutter built upon the same plan, the French mail is frequently conveyed from Calais to Dover by the French sailors, while the English mail remains at the latter town until a less stormy period.

And are we not justified in expressing our admiration at the Ship—that great achievement of man—the most complicated, the most perfect, of all the works of art? If it be well said that man is the noblest work of God, it may with equal truth be asserted that the ship is the noblest work of man. It were a vain task to attempt the enumeration of the various geometrical problems involved in her design, or the multiplied mechanical principles combined in her construction. Let us only, forgetting all we know, endeavour for a moment to realize the immeasurable distance and difficulties between the trees growing in the forest, the iron and copper buried deep in the bowels of the earth, the hemp waving in the fields, the tar sealed up in its timber, and the actual achievement of the sailing ship! Yet a very short time—a few months suffice to transform these rude productions into the magnificent machine, which, notwithstanding its mountain form, obeys each command of the mariner—goes from the wind, towards it, halts, or redoubles its velocity, obedient to his voice,—in which he launches boldly forth amid the horrors of a troubled ocean, braves them successfully, conducted by the inspiration of a sublime philosophy, attains the most distant shores, accomplishes his purpose, and returns, enriched, enlightened, and triumphant to his home!

THE BRIDGES OF LONDON.

LONDON has no one feature of architectural magnificence by which she is so conspicuously distinguished from all the cities of Europe as her bridges. Nearly destitute, as she is, of fine public buildings, and wholly wanting in great sites, her continental rivals have, nevertheless, no structures to compare with the gigantic arms which she stretches across the great river, to link together those portions of her mighty whole which its fierce and turbid waters have divided in vain. Here alone the eye gets point of vision which assemble the great and salient features of the vast metropolis in anything like multitude and union before it. The ceaseless hum of the huge city, which has known no moment of silence for a thousand years, mingles its morals with the low murmur of the queenly river; and the overflowing tide of human existence is checked, though never for a moment overcome, by the scarcely more mysterious and irresistible action of the natural and yet more ancient tide.

The splendid views of the multitudinous metropolis, which are obtained from the bridges, will give the spectator a notion of the striking prospects which would be opened up if a line of broad and stately quays, like those of Paris, were pushed along the two shores of her magnificent river. No city in the world has a grander site than would be thus obtained. There is no one period in the four-and-twenty hours when London, seen from her bridges, does not take a character of interest peculiar to the locality, and put on an aspect which she wears at no other point;—at dark midnight, when the profile of her shores is traced by its own stream of glancing lights, her recesses revealed by the long lines of lamps that pass away into her depths, linking them together as with golden chains, and her vastness indicated by the red glow flung upwards through the murky air, and spread along the face of the colourless sky;—amid the pomps of a northern night, when the stars that seem so still in heaven are rocked to and fro in the dark cradle of the river's restless tide;—by moonlight, when the vast dome of her cathedral is plated with silver, and each of all her thousand pinnacles tipped as with a star;—by day, when the stream is swarming with life, and the crowded civilisation of a great city is seen, subjected to new influences and clothed in new forms!—But it is in the still hour of the morning that London presents her most striking aspect to him who looks upon her from her bridges. The mighty metropolis seems to wear the beauty of the morning like a garment; the very houses seem asleep, and that mighty heart is lying in tranquillity and stillness!

Amid all the fine bridges of the metropolis Waterloo Bridge is conspicuous—not only for its own superior beauty, but because it offers to the thoughtful individual certain morals of its own. In itself, perhaps the finest piece of masonry in the world, it justifies the strong expression of Canova, that to look upon it would amply repay a journey from Rome to London. We will not number amid its distinctions its commemoration of the great political event from which it takes its name; because conventional attributes like these (with which, for ourselves, we have little sympathy at any time) sink always into silence, in the presence of moral considerations. There is, however, a circumstance in its history, to which it owes some peculiar features, and which, in its production of those features, exhibits a striking example of the apparently feeble influences by which the strong wills of the associated multitude are controlled. The small toll, by which it was hoped to get back for the shareholders the immense expenditure incurred in the erection of this structure, has not yet been lifted from the bridge; and (such, in all human action, is the powerful agency of money) that the crowded and ceaseless stream of population which London pours over her other bridges (Southwark excepted)—and which neither laws nor mandates, nor the force of armies, nor the dread march of pestilence might avail to arrest—is held in check by the halfpenny demanded at the gate! To this circumstance—of its comparative solitude—it owes a characteristic population of its own—or at least a population whose characters are more clearly defined. No doubt, all mortal passions and all mortal interests mingle in the tide which daily pours its human waves along the pathways of London, Westminster, and Blackfriars Bridges; but, confounded as they are, in one great and ever agitated current, they are not to be separated, and singled out, and studied in detail. To Waterloo Bridge, however,—where the passenger may at once escape from one of the great and tumultuous arteries of London, into a comparative calm, men of a marked physiognomy come singly, or in pairs; many a private history may there be readily perused by the meditative eye. Linking, as it does, two counties, and having an undisturbed view of all who enter at its lodges, in each direction, hither comes the debtor, for whose large fears of the sheriff one county is too small. Leading directly upon the theatrical centre, evening sees the frail daughters of infamy pass over its pavements to their usual haunts; and the same bridge is the one which the suicide selects, whence to precipitate himself into the waters beneath. Oh! many a sigh, no doubt, wanders over all the bridges, as over all the thoroughfares of the world; but Waterloo Bridge, amidst its rivals of our metropolis, is emphatically the "Bridge of sighs!"

The following curious particulars relative to old London Bridge may not prove uninteresting to our readers. According to Stowe, who follows the annals of Waverly, the building of this bridge was begun about the year 1176, by Peter of Colechurch, who, dying about four years before its completion, left the same to be finished by several merchants of London, named Serle, Mercer, William Almaine, and Benedict Boterite. The bridge was accordingly terminated in 1209. Peter of Colechurch, says Stow, was buried in the chapel on the bridge, in the year 1205. But Stowe, though he mentions King John having contributed to this useful work by certain gifts and grants of ground, &c., does not allude to a fact elicited by letters patent, that King John not only evinced a deep interest in bringing the bridge to perfection, but took upon himself to recommend to the citizens of London for that purpose, a particular person named Lambert, whom he describes as master of the school at Saintes, and a man of worth and learning, by whose diligence the bridges of Saintes and Rochelle had of late been speedily constructed.

Blackfriars Bridge now nearly resembles the ship of Theseus;—it has been so thoroughly repaired, that scarcely any portion of the old edifice remains. We shrewdly suspect that a new bridge might have been erected at almost the same cost which has attended those repairs; but wherefore the open defences on each side should have been removed to make room for a common parapet of solid masonry, we are at a loss to determine. Southwark Bridge is built of iron; upon a plan originally conceived by no other person than Thomas Paine, the author of the "Rights of Man," &c.; the same may be said of Vauxhall Bridge. We believe that Westminster Bridge is to undergo repairs similar to those lately terminated in respect to Blackfriars Bridge. We hope that in this case the handsome range of stone pillars on each side, which forms the parapet, will be allowed to remain.

A company has now existed some years, with the object of building a bridge for foot passengers from Hungerford Market to the opposite side of the river; but the contemplated undertaking has experienced so little encouragement, that the enterprise has been abandoned, and the company—or rather the few shareholders who have associated themselves for the purpose—is about to be dissolved.

ORIENTAL FRAGMENTS.—No VI.

BY JAMES SILK BUCKINGHAM.

TOWN OF SUEZ.—MONDAY, FEBRUARY 21ST.—The entry into Suez of the grand caravan, which had commenced early on the morning of yesterday, and promised not to finish in less than two days more, had already filled the town with bustle and variety. The arrival of two vessels from Jeddah, and one from Yambo, had also increased the number of strangers, and by this mixture of visitors from Arabia and Egypt, we had every shade of colour, in countenance and costume.

My own Arab dress enabling me to mix in the crowd without fear of being detected as a Christian, or of even attracting notice at all, I was agreeably occupied throughout the day in that sort of strolling observation which makes even lounging both delightful and instructive. The number of camels composing this caravan exceeded four thousand, with at least half that number of Bedouin guides. There was also an escort of Turkish cavalry, and a company of infantry, beside a number of traders, agents, etc., accompanying their own property, forming, with the arrivals, by sea, an additional population of five or six thousand strangers. The goods brought by this caravan were chiefly grain for Arabia, Egyptian cotton, manufactured for sail-cloth, timber, planks, and oars for boats, of which several were ordered to be built for the Pasha, and a few articles of private speculation for the southern markets, such as gay-coloured clothes, articles of dress, and common fire-arms.

In such a motley multitude as were thus brought together from opposite quarters of the globe, infinite as their varieties of dress and features were, there still existed those marked distinctions by which they could be classed. The Bedouin was as easily recognised by the poverty of his dress, and air of independence, as was the Turk by the gaudy colours of his apparel, and the look of contemptuous disdain with which he eyed every one around him. The Yambo mariner, black and half naked, with bushy, uncombed hair, that almost concealed his face; the sable-turbaned Greek; the bearded sanctity of the returning Hadji from the holy city of Mecca; the green-capped descendant of the prophet; the cunning trader of Jeddah, and the richer merchants of Yemen, were all to be recognised by distinct peculiarities. There was one feature, however, in which they all agreed, and which, to the native of a country where the practice is unnecessary and forbidden, cannot fail to be observed; that is, their passion for wearing arms, in the use of which, perhaps, few people could be found more unskilful, or to the practice of which, as far as actual warfare is implied, there are certainly none more naturally averse. Yet from the Aga, who sacrifices even domestic comforts to the useless splendour of a kanjar or dagger, down to the naked negro, who with a ragged waist-cloth only, and without a sufficiency of either bread or water, will yet pride himself on his heavy sabre, or a crooked knife braced to his arm, not an individual is to be seen, who enjoys that privilege from his faith, without weapons, the weight of which literally incommodes him in his walk.

On our return from the stroll of the day, we passed the evening in a crowded Divan, at the governor's, and remained with him to supper, in which we were joined only by his principal officers; the rest having retired after sunset prayers, and joined us again to smoke their evening pipes. The governor's attentions to me were more than usually polite; and his communications, in answer to all the questions I asked him, were given with great freedom and intelligence.

TOWN OF SUEZ, TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 22.—I had fixed our departure on my desert journey in search of the remains of the ancient canal, for this morning, but, as is usual on most occasions of setting out, whether by land or by water, new difficulties arose, and obstacles were now for the first time supposed to exist. The route I had marked out for our journey across the desert, was to follow the track of the ancient canal, by the salt marshes to the northward of Suez, pass by the spot marked in Arrowsmith's chart, as the ruins of Serapeum and Aboukerchid, and entering the cultivated plain of Egypt at the ancient Thaubastus, turn by Heröopolis to Balbeis. Every one whom we consulted on the subject, declared this journey to be impracticable, without great personal risk. This part of the desert, it was said, was traversed by the Syrian Bedouins, who are enemies to those of Tor, and our being robbed and stripped was a matter of certainty in the opinion of Phanoose; but, as he observed, "Allah! kerem!" "God is merciful." The governor very kindly offered me an escort of his own soldiers, but I was too well aware of its expense, to except it; and as my desire of accomplishing the journey was unconquerable, I prepared to depart alone, hoping to find security in the smallness of our party, and in the appearance of poverty we should assume. Our guide at length refused to depart without an additional sum of fifty piastres for the journey, a demand which I as strenuously resisted, and as both parties were obstinate, bade fair to detain us for the day.

Neen came without a change of determination on either side, and I passed the latter part of the day most agreeably in a walk along the south beach of the town of Suez, from whence the main body of the grand and interesting. On the right, the high and rocky summits of Adaga are boldly picturesque, and the plain leading to Tor and Sinai, which is terminated by a broken range of Asiatic mountains on the left, with the unintercepted horizon of the sea in the southern offing, form altogether a subject worthy of the pencil of a Claude. The air was beautifully calm, and the serenity of that unbroken silence which every where reigned around, was like a momentary slumber of animated nature. I was perfectly alone; and nothing could have been more favourable than the present moment as it regarded the state of things, or of my own disposition to receive it, for an interview with that hoary sage from whom Cleombrotus learned the doctrine of a plurality of worlds; but I was not so highly favoured, though I remembered here, with all that superior pleasure which local interest can add even to the most beautiful productions, the poetic and ingenious fragment of Moore's, which he calls 'A Vision of Philosophy,' the subject or hero of which he thus describes.

From this spot I extended my ramble round the southern beach, where vestiges of ancient buildings are seen in several places distinguishable along the edge of the present town of Suez, among the heaps of pottery and brick, which invariably accompany the wreck of settlements annihilated or destroyed. Over a sheik's tomb here is reared the fragment of a granite pillar, and upon the wharfs are still lying portions of white marble columns.

After making the circuit of the walls, I ascended the mound which retains the name of Kolzoum, the very base of which is washed by the sea, as it is not more than one hundred yards from the gate of Suez. Among all this heap, however, not a vestige remains of any kind of building, not even the fragment of a wall, a pillar, or a foundation: nor could I find, after diligent search, anything like the remains of the stone pipes which Mr. Brown saw, for the purpose, as it appeared to him, of conveying water to the site of Kolzoum, from Bir Naha, or the well of Naha. Major Rennel very correctly remarks, that this is a well, situated some miles to the east of Suez, and on the opposite side of the inlet of the sea that passes before it. 'One may conclude,' he adds, 'that this work was unnecessary during the existence of a canal from the Nile;' and he might have said, too, that it must have been carried underneath a broad though shallow arm of the sea, to the opposite coast; a work of labour and expense, which, compared with its object, is not at all probable, since water could always be conveyed with facility and despatch in boats, in the small quantities which all the wells of the neighbourhood produce, and which at different seasons of the year are dry. Nothing, in short, remains of the ancient Kolzoum, but one continued heap of rubbish; its destruction is complete; and by a collection of stones within an entrenchment at the top, it would seem to have been recently used as a post of defence.

In the very learned and masterly discussion of Major Rennel, on the Isthmus of Suez and its canals, where endeavouring to establish the distance between Serapeum and Pelusium, he says: 'The position of the former is unknown, but by circumstances, it ought to be near the head of the Gulf of Suez, and to Arsinoë of course; but this latter must have been more to the north than Suez, as the sea has retreated, and is constantly retreating to the south, and has even left Kolzoum, which was a port in the time of the Caliphs, three quarters of a mile inland; therefore Arsinoë may have been full a mile to the northward of Suez.' (p. 454.) Having this memorandum among my extracts for observation, I was the more anxious to satisfy myself whether this mass of ruins, although still called by the inhabitants here, Kolzoum, was really the site of that settlement or not. My elevated situation enabled me to distinguish from its summit the smallest object for several miles to the northward, across the sandy plain, if any such objects existed. The wells of Suez and Adjerood were in sight to the north-west, and the sandy beach along which the arm of the sea, extending beyond Suez, flows, continued its course to the north, inclining easterly; but in all this range of view, neither mound, rubbish, or fragment of any kind, was to be seen, to indicate the situation of former buildings; and all whom I consulted, agreed that the spot on which I stood was the only one near Suez, containing ancient remains, distinguishable from the sands. Yet this mound has the sea flowing up to its very base, and, stretching beyond it to the northward, inclining easterly for three or four miles at least. To what settlement the granite and marble columns, lying scattered at Suez, could have belonged, whether to Arsinoë or Kolzoum, I am at a loss to determine. The known indolence of the Turks, and their indifference to the transportation of such fragments, more particularly as they lie broken and unused for any purpose, induce one to conclude, that they occupy the original place of their destruction, or their fall; and coupling this with Mr. Brown's opinion that Suez itself is a comparatively modern town, and probably built within the last three hundred years, of which it bears every appearance, as well as having been unknown to travellers of a more ancient date. I am disposed to think that Suez itself, including the mound without its northern gate, occupies the very site of Kolzoum, and that Arsinoë might then have been more to the northward, as Rennel describes it; the remains, from being more ancient, having disappeared, by the united agencies of an undermining sea, and the overwhelming sands by which it was surrounded, toward the land.

Returning from my evening walk, I supped at the governor's, and remained there late in a crowded divan, a rich merchant from Jedda having paid his personal respects to Hassan Aga. After evening prayers, performed with all possible solemnity, these bearded elders amused themselves in playing tricks upon an old Hadji, or Pilgrim, whom the governor retained among his dependants as a buffoon; among a number of other devices, the loading his pipe with gunpowder beneath the tobacco so as to explode, while smoking, and placing fire in the small outer cup in which they serve coffee, so as to burn his fingers, and make him forego his hold, were applauded by loud bursts of laughter, which, from the contrast of their general gravity, came from them with a very borrowed grace indeed.

Taking leave of this Turkish Aga, to whose kindness I had been much indebted, I retired to rest, and the differences with my guide, Phanoose, being amicably adjusted, the next sunrise was fixed for our departure on the Desert Journey of Investigation, already advertised to. The results of this will be given in the ensuing number of The Teetotaler.

REVIEWS.

Strictures upon the Rev. James Bromley's "Observations on Totalism." By the REV. F. BEARDSALL. pp. 24. Manchester: Lewis.

OUR readers will recollect that Mr. Bromley held a discussion some time ago with Mr. F. Lees, the Editor of the British Temperance Advocate. Mr. Bromley published a book entitled "Observations on Totalism" (meaning Teetotalism by this vulgar abbreviation); and Mr. Beardsall has now replied to the contents of that work, in the very able publication before us. Mr. Beardsall very justly observes that "it is greatly to be lamented that ministers of the gospel should lend themselves to a system, whose known influence has, for ages, produced the most awful prostration of human nature, and contributed more than any other evil to the destruction of the bodies and souls of many intelligent, and once pious members of the church of Christ, as well as involved multitudes in irretrievable ruin; such is the drinking system in all its gradations: for such a system, though not for its ultimate effects, Mr. James Bromley has contended."

That Mr. Bromley can be sincere in his attempts to defend the custom of drinking intoxicating liquors, we can only believe if we admit the supposition that he is as ignorant of the nature of alcohol as he is of the courtesies of language; but that he should hope to reconcile that custom with Scripture, is an endeavour as vain and as impious as the attempt to heap Ossa upon Pelion for the purpose of scaling the mansions of heaven. Let us quote a powerful passage in Mr. Beardsall's work:—

"Mr. Bromley says he 'cannot hear without feelings of horror,' the designation of intoxicating wine by terms—noxious—deleterious—vile—poison—liquid fire—the cup of devils! &c. And yet he can speak in very contemptuous terms of the rich blessings of Providence without being horrified. I believe that all the above terms are legitimately applied to intoxicating wine; Wesley, Fletcher, and others, would have united in bestowing the same epithets on such wine, had they lived to see the clear light now reflected upon the subject. The great Robert Hall gave a still more horrifying, yet a very significant name, to the spirit in wine when distilled, he called it 'DISTILLED DAMNATION!' Can Mr. B. inform me what is the difference in the ingredients which replenishes, what he calls, the cup of the Lord, and what the apostle calls the cup of devils? Could Mr. B. see the numerous communications which I have from Ministers and other on the subject of wine at the Lord's table, he might find it still more difficult to curb his 'irrepressible indignation.'"

In the course of his refutation of Mr. Bromley, Mr. Beardsall quotes from the Missionary Record, a passage which we shall transfer to our columns, as it relates especially to the Wine-Question, and to the truth of which we ourselves can bear testimony from personal observation:—

"In these countries, mantled with vineyards, one cannot help learning the true intent and use of the vine in the scheme of providence. In our land, wine has become so exclusively a mere luxury, or, what is worse, by a species of manufacture, an intoxicating beverage, that many have wondered why the bible speaks of wine in conjunction with corn, and other staple supports of animal life. Now, in passing through the region of vineyards in the east of France, one must at once perceive, that the vine greatly flourishes on slopes and heights, where the soil is too poor and gravelly to maintain either corn for food, or pasture for cattle. But what is the providential design in rendering this soil—favoured by a genial atmosphere—so productive of the vine, if its fruit become solely either an article of luxury or an instrument of vice? The answer is, that Providence had no such design. Look at the peasant, and his meals in vine-bearing districts! Instead of milk, he has a basin of pure unadulterated 'blood of the grape.' In this its native and... It is a plain, simple, and wholesome liquid; which at every repast, becomes to the husbandman what milk is to the shepherd—not a luxury, but a necessary—not an intoxicating, but a nutritive beverage. Hence, to the vine-dressing peasant of Auxerre, for example, an abundant vintage, as connected with his own immediate sustenance, is as important as an overflow of dairy to the pastoral peasant of Ayrshire. And hence, by such a view of the subject, are the language and the sense of Scripture vindicated from the very appearance of favouring what is merely luxurious or positively noxious, when it so constantly magnifies a well-replenished wine-press, in a rocky mountainous country, like that of Palestine, as one of the richest bounties of a generous Providence."

In taking leave of Mr. Beardsall's excellent little work, we consider it to be our duty to recommend it to the perusal of those who are liable to meet with opposition at the hands of Anti-Teetotal lecturers. These gentlemen are however most particularly cautious whom they challenge to discussion: they are aware that there are numerous medical, scientific, and well-read men, in the Teetotal phalanx, ready to meet opponents upon any ground, and to consider the subject in all its bearings. Many of the Anti-Teetotalers have publicly acknowledged their defeat, and have signed the pledge, after having levelled all their abuse against the principle with a zeal amounting at the time to absolute madness. Nor do we think that we shall be incurring any great risk of prophesying erroneously, when we record our conviction that the Rev. Mr. Bromley himself will sign the pledge within six months from the present period. He is merely creating all this stir in order that his entrance into the grand fraternity of Teetotalers may be marked with the more éclat and ceremony.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

FOREIGN NEWS.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

THE New South Wales Temperance Society reckons amongst its patrons his Excellency Sir GEORGE GIPPS, his Honour Judge STEPHEN, the Reverend Messrs. W. COWPER, CROOK, FULLERTON, SCHOFIELD, MANSFIELD, SWEETMAN, and ROSS, Captain INNES, Dr. NICHOLSON, and a number of other influential individuals. The Australian Temperance Magazine has now existed for three years and a half, and has effected immense good. On the 7th of October, 1840, appeared The Temperance Advocate, a general newspaper conducted upon and advocating Teetotal principles. It contains eight pages quarto, with three columns of matter in each page, presenting as great a likeness as possible to the Literary Gazette. In addition to Foreign, Colonial, Domestic, and Miscellaneous Intelligence, this journal republishes all the most interesting Teetotal narratives, essays, and speeches, which have been printed in Europe, Asia, and America. The circulation of The Australian Temperance Magazine is four thousand two hundred; and that of the newspaper upwards of a thousand. There are several excellent Temperance Hotels at Sydney: that kept by Vercoe is the best.

JAMAICA.

THE Scottish Temperance Herald for March favours us with the following very interesting extract from a letter from Mr. Chandler, of Chelmsford, who is now on a visit to Jamaica:—"The cause of temperance has numerous supporters; several ministers of different denominations have prevailed on their people entirely to abandon the use of rum: the ministers of the Jamaica Presbytery have distinguished themselves in the temperance reformation; all of them are temperance members, and three-fourths of the body Teetotalers. In the one Presbyterian congregation of Hampden, in Trelawny, consisting of 2300 persons, 1326 are temperance members, and 360 have joined the total abstinence society. The labourers on the large Orange Valley Estate in St. Ann's have all refused to assist in the making of Rum; the overseer is compelled to employ strangers to do the work. If the ministers of religion would everywhere do their duty, the vice of dram-drinking would vanish from the land; drunkenness, however, is far from a common vice among the black people."

The same excellent periodical contains the annexed letter from the Rev. W. H. WADDELL, a Presbyterian minister at Jamaica:—"The first temperance society in our body was formed by Mr. BLYTH, in his church, at Hampden, in 1834. It has gone on prosperously, and now numbers, I believe, about 1200 members, of whom a large proportion are Teetotalers. The next was instituted in the congregation under my care at this place in 1836. The same step was taken in several of our churches soon after. In January, 1839, the subject was under our consideration as a Presbytery; and, since that time, Temperance Societies have been formed in all our churches and stations, which are in a flourishing condition. In some of these the Total Abstinence principle is inculcated from the beginning; and in all, it is encouraged, under the conviction that the temperance pledge, conscientiously observed, will naturally lead to abstinence. An agreeable example of the truth of the statement furnished at our last meeting of Presbytery. Through all the brethren are not Teetotalers, the use of wine and malt, always most moderate, had gradually become less at each of our previous meetings, but on the last occasion they were not introduced at all, nor asked for by any of the ministers, elders, catechists, or teachers, who were assembled for part of two weeks together. The apprehension is the first meeting of the kind that has taken place in this island, but I hope will not be the last. The Temperance Society in the church here has taken a good root, and is spreading through sixteen estate-villages and among the scattered settlements. It comprehends a juvenile branch, and including the latter, numbers above 800 members. The prevailing sentiments among the members I find to be decidedly favourable to total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks."

COUNTRY NEWS.

IRELAND.

THE Scottish Temperance Herald for March contains the following communication from Bandon:—"The progress of the Temperance Societies is going on greater and greater, and its good effects are truly gratifying and astonishing; for, to see the previously confirmed drunkards, both men and women, that have been reclaimed by it, and who are now leading, and have continued to lead, the most sober lives, appears more like a miracle than anything else; and, had it taken place in darker ages, it would have been classed as such; and even in this steam-going and scientific age, I see no reason why it may not be so classed. The fact is, the whole power of the Temperance Societies rest with the Catholic priesthood, who all exert themselves to enforce it; and whatever may be said against the Catholic religion, that priesthood has done what no other clerical body could accomplish. They certainly have not made the dead alive, but they have done that which I cannot but think is the most difficult thing to do,—they have made the drunkard sober, industrious, peaceable, provident of the wants of his wife and children, and attentive to promote their comfort; and, what is more, the drunkard himself, that was, now appears well fed, well clothed, with happiness in his face, and about him. The Protestant clergymen, too, have been exerting themselves, particularly Mr. DUNSCOMB, of Cork. The Catholics very rarely break the pledge; indeed, I do not think one in ten thousand; and he or she is shunned and despised by the whole body of Catholics."

CUMBERLAND.

THAT active and intelligent advocate, Mr. R. GOWLAND, has lately completed a tour through Cumberland, of which he thus speaks in an excellent letter published in the Border Herald:—"In Cumberland I have met with so many pleasing instances of the great benefit resulting from the practical adoption of our salutary principles, that it would be impossible to give you more than a mere outline. To whatever quarter we turn, we find the leaven of Teetotalism spreading—in some places more, and in some less; and judging from the improved and improving organization of the societies on the one hand, and the general zeal and activity of the leading men on the other, we may confidently anticipate an abundant harvest of good, and ultimately an entire change in the cast-iron customs which yet prevail to a fearful extent in our highly-favoured country. I have reason to believe, that my humble exertions in Cumberland, have not been in vain."

GLASGOW.

THE fifth Annual Meeting of the Glasgow Total Abstinence Society was held at Spreull's Court Chapel, on Tuesday evening, the 16th of February. The Chairman was Mr. R. KITTLE, the President of the Society. The Report was read, and the following Resolutions were severally proposed, seconded, and passed without a single dissentient voice, by a very crowded audience:—

"I. That the Report now read be approved of, adopted as the Report of this Society, and printed and circulated under the direction of the Committee. II. That this Society feel called upon to express their sincere and heartfelt gratitude to God for the success with which he has been pleased to crown their exertions during the past. III. That this Society, encouraged by past success, beg leave to express their determination to continue and increase their present exertions, until the cause in which they are engaged shall be crowned with complete success."

BRADFORD.

ON Monday, February 22nd, a sermon was preached by the Rev. W. J. SHREWSBURY, in East Brook Chapel, for the benefit of the Temperance Society. On Shrove Tuesday, Feb. 23rd, the members and friends of the Teetotal Societies took tea together in the Temperance Hall. MESSIEURS BEAUMONT (the President), and BENBOW, and the Rev. MESSIEURS J. BARKER (of Gateshead), and T. MEYER (of Hull) were present on the occasion. On Wednesday, February 24th, the Anniversary of the Bradford Temperance Society was held, and the Report was read. The vice-president the Rev. WALTER SCOTT, was in the chair. The Rev. Mr. SHREWSBURY, in his sermon, inveighed against alcohol even as a medicine, stating that medical men frequently recommended it when it could be well dispensed with.

PAISLEY.

ON the 14th of February, the Rev. P. BREWSTER delivered a most admirable lecture upon Teetotalism at this place; and about the same time the Rev. Dr. RITCHIE (of Edinburgh) delivered a most effective address upon the same subject. The latter reverend gentleman exposed the unfeeling conduct of publicans towards those whom they plundered, and who begged themselves at their establishments. He moreover said that he could not give those ministers credit for sincerity, who were invariably crying out against the immorality of the age, and yet who did not exert themselves to extirpate one of the principal causes—intemperance. Altogether, the lectures of these gentlemen at Paisley have done much good.

BARNESLEY.

AN excellent meeting was held, on Friday evening, February 26th, at the Chapel, Worsborough Bridge, on which occasion MESSIEURS J. TAYLOR, B. HAGUE, S. LEDGER, and W. NEATLY, addressed the audience in so effective a manner that the miners and furnacemen, who attended, evidenced a strong tendency towards the principle of Teetotalism, and desired that another meeting might take place shortly.

TOWN NEWS.

TEMPERANCE ASSEMBLY-ROOM, KENT-STREET, BOROUGH.

A most interesting meeting took place at this point de réunion on the 23rd ultimo. Mr. LUCAS was called to the chair, and made a most impressive speech. He said that he had been addicted to habits of intemperance for eighteen years, and had endeavoured to reform himself upon the Moderation-principle; but nothing would prove effectual in his case, save Teetotalism; and by this doctrine was his salvation brought about.

Mr. KRASEY said that the experience of those operatives, who had embraced the principle of total abstinence, refuted the general belief that alcoholic liquors were necessary.

Mr. ROBERTS gave a sketch of his own life in order to show the happiness attendant upon Teetotalism, and the misery connected with habits of intemperance.

Mr. BROWN, a shipwright of Rotherhithe, closed the meeting by detailing the satisfactory results of his experience.

Meetings are held at the Assembly-Room, Kent-street, every Tuesday and Friday evening; and at the same place there is a Sunday School established upon Teetotal principles. Another meeting is held every Thursday evening by this Branch, at the School Room, George-street, Bermondsey. During the last twelve months, upwards of nine hundred signatures have been received by this excellent Society, the Reports of which we shall always be glad to receive and insert. Two Teetotal sermons will be preached, by the Rev. MESSIEURS MOORHOUSE and COGGINS, at the Kent-street Rooms, on Sunday, March 14th.

VIRGINIA STREET CATHOLIC ABSTINENCE SOCIETY.

ON Thursday, February 25th, the remains of the Rev. J. HUTCHINSON, President of this Society, were consigned to the tomb, in Saint George's Bloomsbury. The members of this Association, together with the Committee of the Saint George's (Southwark) Branch, followed their lamented pastor and president to the grave, with their scarfs and wands. The procession and ceremony were very imposing.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

ON Wednesday evening, March 3rd, the audience at the Aldersgate-street Chapel was addressed by MESSIEURS BIDDLE, CUZNER, DOWLING (of the Chelsea Auxiliary), BASSAGE (whom we incorrectly denominated HATHERINGTON in our Report of last week), and C. P. HOOD.

On Saturday evening, March 6th, the discussion was resumed by Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. BALLARD.

Mr. BALLARD repeated his arguments that alcohol existed in everything, and that it was therefore preposterous for Teetotalers to affect to abstain from that voluntarily, which they imbibed of necessity.

Mr. JOHNSON replied that alcohol did not exist in nature in a native state; but that its elements were alone found there. He then stated that God had given us discrimination to choose wholesome food in preference to unwholesome, and that the Teetotaler merely exercised this faculty in respect to his principles.

Mr. BALLARD replied, and Mr. JOHNSON rejoined, but the discussion was not terminated in favour of either party. It was accordingly postponed until the following Saturday (this day).

[We beg to refer our readers to the note which was appended to the Report of the discussion between Mr. CROMB and Mr. BALLARD in the Teetotaler of February 27th. We there explained the nature of alcohol, and proved the absurdity of asserting that it was to be found in a native state in the vegetable kingdom. A few more observations on this subject are however necessary to enlighten those whose opaque intellects cannot immediately be penetrated by the light of explanation. Alcohol is not a generic product of distillation. It is merely separated by distillation from the other matters with which it existed in a state of combination. It is the product of fermentation; and fermentation is the first result of decomposition in the vegetable kingdom. Take, for instance, the grape. Alcohol does not exist in the grape; the causes of fermentation in the grape must be amalgamated before the process begins which forms alcohol. These causes are ferment, water, and fermentable matter. When the grape is in its natural state, these causes are separated, and in different parts of the grape: when the juice is expressed, and mixed up, then the causes of fermentation are combined. Thus, fermentation can never take place, while the grape is possessed of vitality and is in a wholesome state; fermentation follows the decay or unwholesome condition of the grape. During fermentation the principles of the expressed juice are so far changed, that alcohol is produced. Thus it is that from certain chemical truths are deduced false conclusions by those who know but little of the subject. The principles of all the vegetable kingdom are the same; viz., carbon, oxygen, and hydrogen; but the combinations of these principles are everywhere different; and to this difference of combination can be alone attributed all the varieties of species, colour, &c. The air we breathe is composed of the same elements as nitric acid; but there is no nitric acid in the air, because those elements are in a different state of combination. Sugar may be extracted from rags; and alcohol from sugar;—but alcohol cannot be extracted from the rags; neither is it contained in the sugar. In order to eliminate the alcohol in this case, the sugar must undergo a change by means of being converted into a syrup and then subjected to fermentation. It is easy for a man to assert that he has extracted alcohol from the whites of eggs: but he must change the principles of those whites of eggs by subjecting them to fermentation, by means of yeast or harm, and then—and not till then does alcohol develop itself. When the whites of eggs are first beaten up,—when the juice is expressed from fruits,—or when a syrup is first made of sugar, no alcohol can be eliminated. It cannot be found in those substances; no chemical test can discover it. But subject those matters to fermentation, and their principles become changed, and then alcohol is produced. The pulp of the peach and the kernel of the stone are both formed of the same elements; but the pulp of the peach is wholesome and good, and the kernel contains prussic acid. Yet their elements are the same; namely, carbon, oxygen, and hydrogen; the reason why one is wholesome and the other poisonous, is because those elements are in a different state of combination in each. These arguments will convince the impartial reader that alcohol does not exist in Nature! and that Nature must undergo a process of decomposition, or be subjected to certain specific changes, in order to produce it.—EDITOR OF "THE TEETOTALER."]

CLERKENWELL AND PENTONVILLE YOUTHS' TEETOTAL SOCIETY.

THE concert of sacred vocal and instrumental music, which took place at Aldersgate-street Chapel on the 1st instant, for the purpose of establishing a system of musical instruction in connexion with this Society, was very fully attended. The band consisted of fifty performers; and their display of talent, particularly in the "Hallelujah Chorus," which was rapturously encored, highly gratified the very respectable audience. We have reason to believe another concert will shortly take place. Between the parts, the Secretary, Mr. R. P. BARTER, accompanied by various members of the Committee, appeared on the platform, and returned thanks for the gratifying attendance, and for the kind and gratuitous assistance of the various performers. He stated as a proof of the necessity of the establishment of such a society that amongst many other duties which had closely occupied the attention of the Committee during the past year they had taken particular statistics of their combined districts, and had discovered that in a population of 57,334 persons, there were but 260 bakers and butchers, 37 places of religious worship and 43 schools, whilst at the same time there were no less than 531 places for the sale of intoxicating drinks. Towards their Mutual Instruction Society various presents of books, &c., had already been made. This Society has held 62 public meetings, at which there have been 3572 auditors, to whom 286 addresses have been delivered; and received 1178 signatures. Of these 882 were those of consistent members.

We beg to call the attention of the Reader to the 8th Number of a second Series of Illustrations, which is given gratis with "THE TEETOTALER" of this day. The Series will be complete in Twelve Illustrations, and will be continued for as many consecutive weeks.

THE HISTORY OF A MAN OF THE WORLD. PART I.

REFLECTIONS UPON MEN OF THE WORLD.—THE VISIT TO THE ITALIAN OPERA IN PARIS.—THE DUCHESS OF CAVALCANTI.—THE BOIS DE BOULOGNE.—THE LETTER.

It is not my intention to weary you with details of my birth, parentage, and education. Suffice it to say that I was born twenty-five years ago, of wealthy parents, and that I imbibed all the useless part of the knowledge which I now possess, at Eton and at Cambridge University:—I say useless, because if any sensible person imagines that he can set up in business with a floating capital of a little Latin and Greek, he is wonderfully mistaken, and will speedily discover his error. The reason why gentlemen are seldom fit for any really useful occupation, should they meet with misfortunes in life, is because they can turn the education they have received to little or no advantage; whereas the son of a tradesman receives instruction in book-keeping and accounts, which acquirements he can make use of to obtain for him his bread, in case other means and prospects should fail.

My parents died early; and at the age of twenty-one I found myself entirely my own master, and the possessor of a few thousand pounds. I resolved to travel upon the continent, and thus help to make up by personal observation and experience for a defective education. I considered my classical acquirements to be entirely useless; and was anxious to gaze at the world with my naked eyes, and not see it only through the microscope of ancient prejudices and customs. I was already wise enough to know that the English "man of the world" takes a boast and swagger upon himself as a natural right, and believes that he alone has come into the world with an extra eye to read that volume of mysteries—the human heart, locked up, like the ark of old, from the vision of the vulgar. This species of the "man of the world" is the most bustling of bodies, and looks like Atlas with the globe incumbent on his shoulders. His contempt for inferior understandings is most supreme; and his humour, like a foaming cataract, flows and boils with sublime rage, if impertinence dare question his profundity, or contest his right to monopolise the gleams of knowledge which light up the human mind. He uses old sauces with a wink; and if he chooses to bless you with a squint, you are unpardonable if you do not cheer him with a smile. In a word, the English "man of the world" is a very great person and is to be respected (in his own opinion) whether he discourses of abstruse subjects at a horse-race, or flourishes political eloquence and the pewter-pot simultaneously, in the unquiet recesses of an ale-house.

With these impressions—and seeing that the "man of the world" in English estimation is anything but an adequate authority—I commenced my continental tour. I sought information in all places, and in all climes: I was not above borrowing ideas from the Paris cabman who drove me to the theatre, nor below the capacity of understanding the sentiments that emanated from the lips of peers, deputies, and officers in the army. I therefore soon became a man of the world in my own estimation, and conceived that I had supplied myself with a stock of information and knowledge which would prove as inexhaustible and as beneficial as the purse of Fortunatus.

One evening, while I was residing in Paris, I went to the Italian Opera to hear Grisi; and, on that occasion, I beheld in a private box the most lovely creature that had ever met my eyes. She was accompanied by an elderly female, who appeared to treat her with distinction and respect when she addressed her. The beautiful creature, to whom I am alluding, was of a fair complexion, with large soft blue eyes, delicately pencilled brows, dark brown hair parted over a forehead of the purest white, a swan-like neck, and a bust the symmetry of which was faultless. She was attired elegantly, but not in a manner to render her disagreeably conspicuous: the ornaments that she wore were few, but costly; and in her manners there appeared to be that absence of all pretension which usually characterises the lady of rank. She seemed to be properly conscious of the dignity of her own position, and appeared not to affect nor assume a demeanour or deportment to which she was not entitled by her grade in society.

I had visited the Opera for the purpose of hearing Grisi; but I beheld nothing save this fair stranger. Long did I gaze upon those charms which had suddenly made so deep an impression upon my heart; and it was only a few minutes before the close of the entertainments that I thought of enquiring of the box-keeper to whom the box, in which she and her companion were seated, belonged. The box-keeper glanced towards the spot which I indicated, and immediately replied, "That box, monsieur, belongs to the Duchess of Cavalcanti."

"The Duchess of Cavalcanti!" I exclaimed: "I have never heard of the title before."

"Oh! she is an Austrian Duchess," answered the box-keeper, who knew everything, and was ready to impart all she knew (the box-keepers in France are always women); "she is an Austrian Duchess, who frequently passes the winter in Paris. She is immensely rich, and eminently beautiful."

"Married, no doubt?" said I.

"No—she is single, and entirely her own mistress," said the box-keeper. "She retained the title of her parents, by virtue of the hereditary possession of the immense estates which confer the distinction."

"Rich—beautiful—a Duchess—and her own mistress!" said I, musing, as I slipped a five-franc piece into the hands of the box-keeper, as a reward for the information I had obtained.

At that moment the curtain fell; the box-keeper hastened to attend to those who had hired little foot-stools of her, and I was still standing in the corridor adjoining the boxes, when the sound of the foot-steps of the departing audience reminded me that I might obtain a closer view of the Duchess than I had yet enjoyed. I did not for a moment doubt that the fair stranger whom I had seen in the box was the Duchess of Cavalcanti; and I accordingly hurried to the staircase to gratify my curiosity. When the dense crowd of the departing visitors to the Opera had passed, two ladies came slowly up the corridor, and proceeded to descend the stairs. I was leaning over the balustrade; and obtained a full view of the countenance of the younger one. If I had admired her at a distance, I was absolutely enraptured with her beauty, when I thus beheld her close. She suddenly turned to make some observation to her companion, and perceived the attention with which I surveyed her. A deep blush overspread her countenance; and she instantly lowered her veil. I regretted that I had suffered my admiration thus to lead me to an act of rudeness; and I followed the ladies slowly out of the theatre.

When they reached the doors, the elder lady advanced a few paces, and looked around the square, and towards the streets on each side: and in another minute she returned to her companion, exclaiming in French (with which language I was by this time well acquainted)—"How provoking! the carriage is no where to be seen!"

A gendarme accosted the ladies at that moment, and enquired whether he could assist them to find a vehicle.

"Would you have the kindness to ascertain if the carriage of the Duchess de Cavalcanti be in the neighbourhood?" said the elder lady.

The gendarme, with that politeness which is met no where save in France, hastened to comply with this request; and at the expiration of a few minutes he returned, declaring that there was now no carriage at all in the vicinity of the Opera."

"How excessively annoying!" exclaimed the elder lady, addressing herself to her fair companion. "Really that coachman of yours must be discharged!"

At that instant I stepped forward, and, with a suitable apology offered to conduct the ladies to their abode, or to procure a hackney-coach for their accommodation. The latter proposition was immediately acceded to with thanks; and I hastened to fetch a vehicle from the nearest stand. When it arrived at the gates of the Opera, I handed the ladies into it, and enquired the address which I should communicate to the driver—for I, of course, affected to be entirely ignorant of any particulars connected with them.

"The Hotel of the Duchess of Cavalcanti, Rue de l'Université," said the elder lady; and she then thanked me for my attention. Her lovely companion inclined her head gracefully to convey to me a similar acknowledgment; and the coach drove rapidly away from the doors of the Italian Opera-house.

I returned to Meurice's Hotel, with my imagination full of the charms of the beautiful creature who had so suddenly made a deep impression upon my heart. I felt that I was in love with her—madly in love; and I slept not a wink the whole night, so completely was I the prey to this new passion. But I soon perceived the immeasurable distance that existed between me and the Duchess de Cavalcanti; and my passion appeared to be as hopeless as it was violent.

I awoke early, and hastened to the Rue de l'Université, to behold the mansion which contained the beautiful vision that had so much enchanted me. The Duchess de Cavalcanti occupied a superb dwelling; and in the court-yard I beheld servants in handsome liveries running to and fro in the performance of their various duties. I found that the box-keeper had not deceived me with regard to the wealth of the Duchess; for everything about her residence bore testimony to the truth of the information I had received on that head.

I returned to Meurice's, dispirited and unhappy. The more I thought of the Duchess, the wider seemed the interval that appeared to separate her from me. In this melancholy mood, I encountered a French gentleman, with whom I was upon tolerably intimate terms. He enquired the cause of my downcast looks, and I readily narrated to him the adventure of the preceding evening.

"The Duchess of Cavalcanti is both young and beautiful," said he; "and there are numerous aspirants to her hand. She is, however, eccentric and singular in her ideas, and will probably unite herself to the individual who may succeed in pleasing her, without reference to rank or wealth."

"And you would seriously counsel me to aspire to the hand of the Duchess?" said I.

"Why not you, as well as any one else?" cried the French gentleman.

"You have inspired me with hope," said I.

"and I will not resign that hope without an endeavour to obtain its fulfilment."

It was a fine day in the month of March—about a week after this conversation—that I rambled as far as the Bois de Boulogne, to enjoy the solitude of the groves which were then beginning to put forth their verdure, and to meditate upon some plan of becoming acquainted with the Duchess of Cavalcanti. While I was still in the vicinity of the main-road, a splendid equipage, drawn by four horses, passed along that way; and, to my sudden joy and delight, I caught a glimpse of the never-to-be-forgotten countenance that had captivated me at the Opera. There were four ladies in the carriage: and my lovely fairy was one of them.

The vehicle rolled onward, and I plunged into the depths of the wood, to ponder at my ease upon that passion the flame of which was now fanned anew. An hour passed away; and I rambled about—unconscious of the lapse of time—careless where I went—roving hither and thither—and with my mind occupied by only one subject. Suddenly, the sounds of footsteps fell upon my ears: I started—gazed around me—and beheld a female form threading a pathway at a short distance. Something urged me to fly in that direction; and to my joy and astonishment I found myself face to face with the being whose image had never left my imagination since I first saw her at the Opera.

She immediately recognised me, and blushed deeply. I bowed, and she returned the salutation.

"I believe I have the honour of introducing myself to the Duchess de Cavalcanti?"

The lady started—surveyed me with a singular expression of countenance for a few seconds—and then suffered a faint smile to wander upon her lips.

"Your Highness is probably annoyed at my rudeness in thus accosting you," I continued; "but according to the ideas of my nation, all who are of gentle blood are in the habit of associating, without reference to title or honorary distinction."

"You are an Englishman, I perceive?" said the fair one, now suffering the tones of her musical voice to fall upon my ears for the first time.

"I am," was the reply, delivered with a low bow.

"And of rank, probably?" added the fair querist, with a species of interest in her manner and accent.

I know not what induced me at that moment to venture upon an untruth; but I imagined that the assumption of a rank, to which I had no just claim, would serve my purposes.

"I am an English nobleman," was accordingly my answer; "but I am travelling incognito, by the denomination of Ferguson."

A gleam of satisfaction played upon the countenance of the lovely creature whom I thus fortunately encountered; and I immediately flattered myself that I was already far from displeasing, or even indifferent to the Duchess of Cavalcanti. I was emboldened by this idea; and I resolved not to lose the present opportunity of revealing myself more fully to one whom I loved so sincerely.

"Your Highness will pardon my boldness," I continued, hastily, "but I must either unbosom my real sentiments, or die of despair. I cannot exist another week in suspense—in anxiety—in alarm—and in a state of excitement caused by intervals of burning hope, and others of the deepest despair! Oh! madam—do not spurn me from your presence—do not consign me to misery, because your charms have captivated my heart!"

"Sir—my lord—sir—" said the object of my adoration; "we shall be observed! My companions are close by—we came to walk in the wood—and I merely missed them for a moment in one of the avenues—they may overhear your conversation."

"Oh! then you are not offended with me," I exclaimed; "and you will allow me to hope!"

"I can listen to you no longer—I am bewildered, embarrassed by this strange avowal," exclaimed my lovely companion; "I must moreover hasten to return home; for to-night again shall I visit the Opera."

As she uttered these words, the fair one disappeared amidst the avenues of the wood; and I rushed into its depths, in a contrary direction, animated with joy! No one could conceive the antipathies by which I testified my delight at this interview. I ran, like a wild man, through the labyrinths of the grove,—I sang—I danced as I sped onward—I was intoxicated with ineffable hopes. The last words which had fallen upon my ears, seemed to convey an intimation of an appointment to my comprehension; and you may readily conceive that I did not fail to proceed to the Italian Opera again that evening. Indeed—I arrived at the doors an hour before they were opened; and paraded up and down, opposite the entrance, during this interval.

At length the doors were opened; and I precipitated myself into the house. I secured a seat in the very next box to the private one which belonged to the Duchess of Cavalcanti; and anxiously did I await the arrival of her who had seemed to tell me to be there! A few minutes after the curtain rose, the door of the private box opened, and the object of my affections, accompanied by her elderly companion, made her appearance. She immediately recognised me: I bowed—and she acknowledged my respectful salutation with a condescending smile.

From time to time I addressed a few observations to her relative to the details of the entertainment, the merits of the actors or songstresses, and the beauty of the scenery. By degrees, I turned the topic of our discourse to the theme of love, and eulogised that passion with an ardour which she could not misunderstand. She blushed, hung down her head, and seemed agitated by deep emotions. Emboldened by the evident success which attended upon the siege I was laying to her heart, I commenced a long description of my own rank,—or rather my assumed titles, and my immense wealth. Indeed, I would have purchased her smiles at any sacrifice.

Ere the entertainments drew towards a close, I implored permission to pay my respects to the Duchess at her own residence.

"The English Ambassador doubtless knows that you are a nobleman, travelling incognito?" said she.

I immediately replied in the affirmative.

"In that case," she continued, "it would be imprudent for me to receive your visits, unless you would consent to pass under your proper name."

"I have before observed to your Highness," said I, "that many reasons induce me to preserve my incognito abroad. But, if you decline to receive my visits, in that case—might I be allowed to address a letter, explaining my motives?"

"The letters of the Duchess de Cavalcanti are received by the principal lady of her Highness's bed-chamber," answered the object of my attachment, somewhat abruptly.

The entertainments were now over; and the time for departure arrived. I hastened to the entrance, and enquired for the carriage of the Duchess de Cavalcanti. This time a plain vehicle, without arms upon the panels, and with only the coachman in attendance upon it, drove up to the doors of the theatre. I handed the ladies into the carriage, which immediately drove away.

Again did I return to Meurice's Hotel, to ponder upon the progress I had made in the prosecution of my plan. I found that I had every reason to hope, and to be pleased with the manner in which I was treated by her to whom I was so anxious to render myself agreeable. I did not retire to rest until a late hour; but I passed the time in penning an avowal of my sincere, my disinterested attachment. I sealed the letter, and placed it in an envelope addressed to the Duchess de Cavalcanti.

At an early hour on the ensuing morning, I despatched my letter by a messenger to the hotel inhabited by the Duchess in the Rue de l'Université. Anxiously—oh! how anxiously did I await a reply. At length—towards evening—that reply came; a letter was brought to Meurice's by the chasseur of her Highness. I received it—and pressed it to my lips. My hand trembled so, that I could scarcely open it. At length I succeeded in breaking the large seal upon which the arms of the Duchess were impressed,—and I opened the envelope. A letter fell to the ground: I hastily raised it—my heart sank within me,—it was my own letter that was returned to me!

Returned—and without a word of explanation! Did not the Duchess design a reply? and did she thus treat me with contempt? Oh! wherefore had she encouraged hopes within me, which she thus cruelly defeated in a moment?

These heart-rending ideas were interrupted by a knock at the door of my apartment. I hastened to open it, and to my astonishment found that the visitor was none other than the elderly lady whom I had twice seen at the Opera.

"You come from the Duchess?" said I, anxious to be relieved of suspense.

"I do," she answered; and, placing her finger upon her lip, to command silence, she entered my sitting-apartment.

I waited in the most breathless suspense for the explanation which I had no doubt was about to emanate from her lips.

"You wrote to her Highness this morning?" said she.

I nodded an affirmative.

"And she returned your letter ere now?"

"She did," said I laconically.

"Have you that letter still?"

"Here it is—I was about to destroy it," I replied.

She took the letter from my hands, tore it open, and hastened to peruse it.

"I am glad you have made no allusions in it to the various interviews which have taken place between your Lordship and her Highness," said the lady, when she had finished reading the letter. "It is merely one of attachment and affection—a usual declaration of love: I am glad it is no worse."

"Explain yourself," I exclaimed, somewhat impatiently.

"This letter was received by a lady in the establishment of her Highness, and who invariably opens all communications addressed to the Duchess. Your letter was never shown, nor even mentioned to the Duchess, it being supposed that it was one of those impertinent avowals of love to which all beautiful women, of rank and wealth, are subject. I will, however, take care that the letter shall now reach her Highness. In future, you must address them under cover to Julie Talman: the replies will also be signed Julie."

"Ah! now you have imparted renewed hope to my soul!" I exclaimed; "and the Duchess has given me real tokens of her love! I find that I am not quite indifferent to her—"

"Indifferent!" exclaimed the elderly lady; "she loves you tenderly!"

"And may I then venture to aspire to that hand which myriads doubtless solicit as the greatest of earthly boons?"

"Your lordship may not only aspire, but may also calculate upon eventual success," was the answer. "Should your lordship, however, allude to marriage in your letters, remember that such union must be solemnized in the strictest secrecy, and with the greatest precautions, to avoid immediate publicity. When the event has taken place, the Duchess would then communicate it by letter to the Emperor of Austria, and his imperial Majesty would doubtless confer the dukedom upon your lordship."

You may readily suppose that I was now absolutely unaware whether I stood upon my head or my heels. The possession of a lovely creature—the sudden acquisition of immense wealth—and a dukedom in perspective,—these were enough to dazzle the imagination of a young man of two and twenty! The elderly lady reiterated her promise that the Duchess should receive the letter which I had already intended for her; and then withdrew, leaving me in a state of hope and happiness which no words could describe.

Mr. Ferguson here paused for a short time, and Mr. Pickwick expressed his anxiety to hear the remainder of this singular narrative. Mr. Ferguson accordingly proceeded to gratify the curiosity of our hero in the following manner.

(To be continued in our next.)

THE PROGRESS OF INEBRIETY.

DEVELOPED IN THE LIFE OF A GENTLEMAN.

PLATE VI.—The scene now changes to the station-house. The clock proclaims the hour;—it is nearly half-past one in the morning. The police-inspector is seated in his arm-chair, and the officers who have arrested the three friends, are detailing the particulars of their delinquency. The broken knockers are produced in evidence; and the inspector, whose assiduous countenance in vain endeavours to assume an expression of importance, hears the charge, darting all the time glances, which are intended to be searching, at the culprit. The gentleman's head is bowed with a handkerchief; he has received a violent blow from one of the policemen's cudgels; and the pain arising from the concussion is increased by the natural aching of a head that now feels the effects of the deep potations imbibed a few hours previously. Still there is an air of jaunty impudence about the gentleman, which neither the prospect of a few hours' sojourn in one of the dens of the station-house, nor the anticipated reprimand from the magistrate afterwards, entirely subdues. Indeed, one of the gentleman's friends is whispering some joke at the Inspector's expense in his ears; and a partial smile plays upon our hero's lips. The gentleman invariably treats an adventure of this kind in a hectoring, bravado manner, that does not always correspond with the real state of his mind. If all feelings of delicacy and honour be not smothered in his bosom, he must feel the degradation of his present predicament,—subject to the impertinences of a vulgar, ignorant, and ostentatious police-inspector, and with the certainty of having his freak exposed in the public journals, before his eyes. It is most extraordinary that the thinking portion of the upper class of society will condescend to acknowledge as acquaintances and receive to their houses, men whose drunken amusements thus meet with well-merited exposure. But adventures of this kind are no bar to the return of the gentleman to those circles where his frolics will serve as the subject of a jest; and even prudent mothers and grey-headed fathers will content themselves with shaking their heads and smiling significantly at the "naughty man!" If a livery servant were to get drunk, break lamps, wrench off knockers, and pass the night in the station-house, he would be discharged by his master as "an incorrigible scamp;" and such a character would await him, upon reference to his last place, as would effectually prevent him from ever obtaining another. But the Gentleman may do all that—and much more; and instead of being termed "an incorrigible scamp," he will be the lion and the hero of all the fashionable resorts at the West End of London. The magistrates are far too lenient with regard to aristocratic offenders, to whom they invariably cringe and bow, as if they themselves were the accused, and the culprits were the adjudicators of the case. There is not at this moment a magistrate in London who would send a gentleman to the treadmill for anything short of absolute felony. Of a verity, the English police magistracy is the most corrupt that ever disgraced a nation. How strange is the contrast to this picture which is afforded by that of the French police magistracy. The commissaries, as they are termed, recognise no distinction of rank, but punish according to the nature of the crime in which their interference is required to adjudicate. A fashionably-dressed and elegant young gentleman was once taken before a Paris magistrate, charged with offences similar to those for which our hero is now brought to the station-house. The magistrate enquired what the accused had to say in his defence. The prisoner answered that he was the Viscount de ———, and that he was willing to make any pecuniary amends for his fault that the magistrate might deem necessary and adequate. "Since you are a nobleman, and have doubtless received an excellent education," answered the commissary, "you ought to know better; and your conduct is far more culpable on that account. Your wealth shall not screen you: I commit you to prison for fifteen days."—This is not an individual instance of justice in these cases: it is the invariable manner in which delinquencies of the kind are treated in France.

PLATE VII.—This plate represents the gambling booth on the race-course. Such an episode as the one now depicted, is always to be recognised in the career of dissipated gentlemen. The use of wine renders all means of unnatural excitement almost necessary to him who is a prey to that indulgence; and artificial stimulants of all kinds are greedily sought after by those whose career is incompatible with habits of sobriety and equanimity of disposition. The mind of the intemperate man is always unsettled—always craving for new means of excitement—always longing after some scene of turbulence and noise. Quiet, tranquillity, and peace are unknown to the miserable victims of the most demoralizing of all habits. An eastern monarch, who was one of the greatest voluptuaries that ever disgraced a throne, offered a reward to him who would invent him a new pleasure; and most readily would some of the fashionable routs at the West End of the town follow this example, and amply remunerate the person who should introduce to their vitiated tastes a new means of excitement. We admit that change is necessary to ensure human felicity; and that, as all happiness and misery are relative and conventional to a greater or lesser degree, some variation is required to develop the characteristics of each by means of contrast and comparison. A life all sugar is not a life of happiness; and a life all bitter is not so miserable as many would imagine. Thus certain changes are necessary to establish real felicity. But these changes should not consist of undue excitement. The man who is thirsty, and who requires a cupful of water to allay his unpleasant sensation, need not plunge headlong into a mighty torrent which will sweep him away in its turbid billows. Those excitements, especially, should be avoided which leave a corresponding amount of depression behind them. Parties of pleasure, country excursions, trips upon the ocean or river, and all rational means of diversion, produce a proper amount of excitement, and leave pleasing reminiscences, instead of depression and disgust, behind them. Hence the reader will comprehend the essential distinction which exists between rational and irrational excitement—legitimate and improper amusement—wholesome and prejudicial diversion. The gentleman is now in a booth on a race-course. We are no enemies to the mere amusement of racing; but we abhor the race-course, because it is the resort of all the villains, desperadoes, and immoral characters that can possibly congregate together. The race-course is, moreover, the scene of gambling, dissipation, and debauchery of all kinds. In the present plate the thimble-rig table is seen at a distance. It is highly ludicrous to hear the effusions which issue from the lips of the proprietors of those tables, in order to entrap the unwary:—"Here you have, ladies and gentlemen, the royal game of tidley-wink! One, two, three—the fairest game that ever you see! No one can tell me under which thimble is the little pea. Them as doesn't bet, can't win! and them as does bet, is sure to lose!" And yet we find hundreds gulled by this execrable cheat. But, to return to the booth, where the gentleman is playing at roulette. He has lost his money; and his countenance wears an expression of rage and indignation. He knows that he has been cheated; and that he cannot obtain either justice or redress. While he is yet deploring his loss, one of the frequenters of the booth picks his pocket; and, in another corner of the same den, a similar act of depredation is being committed upon another victim of the horrible vice of gambling. Oh! how can men be so wretchedly silly—so insane—so devoid of all common sense, as to risk their money upon a game at which they must know that they will not be suffered to win? All games have been calculated in a manner to place the certainties within the reach of the bank, or the keepers of the gambling-tables, and to leave the chances to the victims. The bank must invariably end by obtaining all the capital, because it is based upon those certainties. There are, moreover, certain points publicly allowed to tell in its favour; and, in addition to all this, it still has as much chance of winning as the opponent. Then, when the accessories of confederacy and cheating are thrown into the balance, the scale is soon weighed down in favour of the bank.

PLATE VIII.—This scene follows, very properly, immediately upon the loss at the race-course. We now find the hero of our pictorial narrative in a debtors' gaol. The gentleman is here subdued in spirit for the first time. He feels all the horrors of his present predicament, and deeply—deeply, but vainly deplores the errors of his late career. Oh! how gladly would he now recal all those mispent days which have conducted him to ruin and degradation! But he should have thought of the consequences of his vicious courses before! His countenance is now thoughtful; and the numbers of legal documents which peep out of his pocket, announce the extent of his embarrassments. Behind him are two of the older inmates of that prison; and with them the first hours of remorse and repentance have passed. They have acquired that brutal recklessness—that bluntness of all fine feeling, which can alone be found in a debtors' gaol. They are now hardened to all the circumstances of life, and are ripe for any crime, meanness, or deed of villany which may place them in the possession of funds to pursue their career of dissipation, even in the very gaol to which the commencement of that career has brought them. A little farther on is the debtor who has vegetated for years in that sorrowful abode. With haggard countenance, folded arms, and slow foot-steps, does he drag himself along towards that portal which he dares not pass, and which seems to stand as an eternal barrier between him and the light and happiness of life. And then, by his side, is the wretched wife of his bosom, with an infant in her arms; and poverty has stamped its mark upon their pale countenances, and hunger and want may be read in their glazing eyes. Misery has worn out their clothes, robbed them of the hues of health, and planted the seeds of premature death in their constitutions. And farther on still, two unfortunate men, whose hearts are inaccessible to hope, are endeavouring to lose an hour in the hurried diversion of rackets. Alas! is it not a mockery of human woe to build up prisons in which to incarcerate wretched men, and to provide the interior of those walls with a racket-ground? The visitor to the Queen's Bench prison may behold some strange samples of the inmates of debtors' gaols. Their countenances, as well as their garb, bespeak their true conditions, and bear testimony to the mingled recklessness and despair which fill their minds. There is a high building in the Bench called the State-House; and leaning against the walls of this edifice may those samples be seen at mid-day, basking in the sun. Their eyes are red with the debauch of the preceding night—their attire denotes their appalling poverty—and their raffianly appearance convinces the visitor that all honourable, delicate, and fine feelings have long been smothered in their breasts. They are, however, more to be pitied than blamed;—for if their vices originally conducted them thither, the system of imprisonment for debt has made them worse, instead of reclaiming them from a career of vice, immorality, and debauchery!

We shall in due time continue the adventures of the "Gentleman," whom for the present we leave in the Bench.

MATTER.

MATTER consists of atoms, the substance or essence of which, there is reason for concluding, is homogeneous universally. According as our nerves are affected by outward material things, we imagine the latter are similar to, and diversified as are our sensations or the mind's perceptions; but brute matter has nothing whatever in common with our mental sensibilities. Matter is essentially inert; therefore is possessed of nothing of cause; and although everything in nature is in an acting state, nothing of the whole acts, or can act, of itself. Hence there is nothing in the system to constitute cause but general pressure, the universal existence of which is evident; and it is equally evident that were the general pressure suspended, even for an instant, all vitality would be at an end, all motion cease, and nothing of physical change could possibly take place.

Inert unalterable matter can neither attract nor repel; it can neither act on its like nor suffer change by its like. The chemical properties imputed to its atoms are wholly assumed and untrue; being communicable and removable; such properties are not elementary; and as inert matter can originate nothing of the kind, the whole are most arbitrarily assumed. Matter is but mere atomic substance for the formation of bodies; its atoms possess no self-acting properties; its essence is inactive and indiscoverable; no atom is alterable by nature or art. Such as each was at the beginning, so it is now, and so it will remain, until subjected to different modifications by the hand of the Divinity; and this permanence of attribute is the characteristic of every atom in creation. As inert atoms cannot act on each other, neither can bodies, inert atoms being the whole of which bodies are composed. The most learned cannot define the word chemical otherwise than as a term of art. Nature knows nothing of chemical cause, chemical property, or chemical effect. From matter being perfectly inactive, and its essential nature not concerned in any instance of physical change, it may justly be inferred, that variety in essence would be useless; and, hence, that the whole of the substance of matter is essentially alike, or of homogeneous substance.

In all nature there is no inferable power or cause consistent with the inertia of matter, but the state of pressure under which the whole system exists. No other cause is analogous to the universal sound of physical mechanical effects. The atoms of matter can undergo no change but local; nor bodies, but accumulation, removal, and intermixture of their elementary atoms, together with change of location through space; for the whole of which there is no cause required but a medium-filling space to keep the planets in motion, and which has free access into the intestines of even the densest bodies. By means of the medium of space, it is that atoms are pressed together, and retained in the bodily state, and that bodies become expanded and ultimately decomposed. Neither attraction nor repulsion can belong to inert atoms, nor, of consequence, to bodies. Attraction would bring all things together, the planets on the sun, make bodies immovable upon the surface of the earth, and prevent the formation of clouds. Repulsion would destroy or be destroyed by attraction. There is nothing imputed to these imaginary powers, attraction and repulsion, but what may be referred to pressure, productive of motion, adhesion, and separation of atoms, which require but impulsive pressure for cause. In every instance of change, the formation and the dissolution of bodies; evaporation of fluids, and emission of galvanic currents; motion takes place, and pressure of the medium of space is the producing cause. To command the general pressure, galvanic media are means, but in themselves are devoid of physical force as the flame of a candle.

There can be no difference among the elements of homogeneous matter but in the size of their atoms, assuming at the same time that every atom is of the same shape, the spherical, which is the form best—and, perhaps, only adapted for every possible circumstance. Then, as one element is rarer than another, according as its atoms are smaller, so each is a minus-pressure medium to the element of larger atoms. And this diversity of elementary density it is which promotes the motion of the elements by the general pressure, and maintains the universal round of physical change against the equilibrium of pressure taking place, which would be productive of universal rest.

These opinions, which submit a new theory to the attention of the scientific philosopher, instead of the untenable system of Newton, tend to glorify the wisdom of an omnipotent Deity, by elucidating the wondrous minutiae of all his grand designs, and the unvarying rules which he has laid down to preserve the equilibrium of nature.

THE CONVICTS IN AUSTRALIA.

NEW SOUTH WALES is one of the finest countries in the world. Its climate seems to be especially well-suited to the constitution of Englishmen; and its natural resources are so plentiful, that a proper employment of them cannot fail to make it the most prosperous of all our colonies—supporting a happy and wealthy population—proud of its progress, and worthy of the parent country. Whether or not it was a fatal error on the part of England to make a penal settlement at all in a country blessed with the favouritism of nature, it is not needful here to discuss; nor are we more inclined to argue respecting the expediency or in expediency of transportation as a formidable and corrective punishment. If we were to coincide with the superficial views of Filangieri, we should trace the punishment of transportation to a high antiquity; but that single statement is sufficient to convict that celebrated politician of very gross ignorance; for banishment in Greece is known by every school-boy of modern times to have been a mulct for political offences—not a visitation for moral delinquency. Under the Roman law, first of all, was banishment first regarded as a moral punishment, although then it was used rather for political offences; but from that time even to a very late period the business of transportation and the choice of abode were left to the criminal. The Portuguese, in modern times, were the first to establish penal settlements in Western Africa and in the East Indies. The year 1596 is the earliest period in English history to which we can trace the establishment of transportation as a punishment for "rogues and vagabonds." Transportation to the American colonies continued from the reign of James I. to that of George III., when the settlers, seeing the disadvantages resulting to the free settlers from the convict population, refused to admit any farther increase of their numbers. This refusal obliged the home government to look for some new place of consignment for the criminals; and their accumulation during the war became so frightful, that an immediate remedy became absolutely necessary. The penitentiary plan of Buxton and Howard having been rejected, confinement in the hulks was first adopted; and subsequently a penal settlement was formed in 1788 at Port Jackson. Two years afterwards, the colony was peopled with 2,300 male and 120 female convicts—a very pretty proportion indeed in a settlement of such a nature!

The evils of which the American colonists complained of were mere trifles when compared with those which form the subject of Australian grievances. In the former, the convict population at the commencement of the American war, was only 50,000, the free settlers being 1,800,000; while in Australia the proportion of convicts to free settlers is about twenty-three to ten,—that is, in plain language, the profligate portion of the inhabitants were more than the double of the ostensibly respectable part of the population. This is bad enough, and not very encouraging to free emigrants; but this is not all. The government so badly manages matters, that transportation, so far from being formidable, acts as a premium upon crime, and Sydney is looked upon as a land of promise by the profligate members of the parent community. The disproportion between the emigrant population and the scum of the people and wicked condemned men, presents great prima facie difficulties to a proper arrangement of colonial affairs; but the facilities afforded to emancipated or ticket-of-leave convicts for evading penal discipline and acquiring wealth and importance, according to the present system, are, besides, so extraordinary and so discouraging to the better portion of the society, that we are not at all surprised at the loud complaints which are made against such a state of things. The plan of assigning convicts to the free colonists has altogether failed, and is now very generally regarded as the main cause of the evils that so much demand reform. The only discipline that individuals can exercise over such servants is quite insufficient to meet the rampant profligacy of Newgate; and the experience of forty years and upwards should have convinced the government that some reform was quite necessary in the method of employing convicts. It is quite absurd that a convict should, under the most favourable circumstances, be ever admitted to equal privileges with the honest settler;—yet such is the case. Transportation must be a bona fide punishment, if it is to be one at all: it must be a "terror to evil-doers," and not an encourager of crime. Continual labour should be an inviolable accompaniment of transportation; and every effort should be used to preserve the virtuous emigrants from the contamination of vice and felony.

The inequalities of the punishments which attend the sentence of transportation from this country, are not, as it would be reasonable to suppose, proportioned to the different degrees of turpitude in the crimes for which the same sentence has originally been passed, nor even according to the former characters of the culprits. Quite the contrary. A common labourer, or industrious mechanic, whom want of work and distress may have drawn into the temporary commission of crime, is as liable and as likely to be transported as the most expert thief and experienced depredator in London. Every convict ship takes out to the colony men of the above description, as well as desperate and practised burglars, habitual receivers of stolen goods, artful swindlers, skilful forgers, robbers of banks and mail coaches, and a sprinkling of all sorts of the villains denominated the noell mob.

On the arrival of this motley assemblage of criminals at the port of Sydney, lists of the convicts are made out,—applications for their assignment are put in by those of the settlers who are entitled to the convict servants,—and in the course of about eight days the new-comers are loaded and assigned. The simple labourers and ordinary mechanics, having nothing to recommend them but their former industry—the misfortunes which drove them to crime—and perhaps a remaining disposition still to behave well, are sure to undergo the full measure of their sentence. They are at once assigned to agricultural settlers or other suitable masters; and, in proportion as they are well-behaved and industrious, they have not unfrequently the less chance of obtaining either leave-tickets or conditional pardons. To labour they are immediately put; and, in proportion as they are laborious, it is not the interest of their assignee masters to facilitate their obtaining leave-tickets; nor are the convicts of this description likely themselves to obtain indulgences of that kind by stratagem and deceit.

On the other hand, those of the convicts who have something of the "look of gentlemen" about them, however heinous be the crimes for which they have been condemned, are treated uncommonly well, and are either removed to the Klysium of Port Macquarie, or assigned to masters whose employments for them and their accompanying treatment are redolent of ease and comfort instead of punishment. By some plausible tale they excite sympathy, and soon get recommended for leave-tickets or conditional pardons, which, if they do not serve as passports to employment in the government offices, are sure to be followed by their obtaining comfortable berths of some kind. Indeed the worst characters amongst the convicts seldom undergo any punishment at all. If they have secured a portion of the plunder they had acquired in England, they easily make themselves comfortable; for in that case they enter into co-partnership, under the rose, with some one or other of the emancipated felony, who, being enabled by the funds of their convict partners to take houses or enter into business, apply to have their partners assigned to them as servants, and the gentlemen convicts fall upon a bed of roses at once. If a wife have been left in England with the charge of the spoil, she follows her husband in the first ship:—on her arrival she takes a house, and then petitions the governor to have her husband assigned to her as a servant—in which petition her husband joins.

The assignment of the female convicts, like that of the males, usually takes place eight or ten days after their arrival in Sydney; and when the applicants have been supplied, the remaining females (if any) are forwarded to what is called the Factory, at Paramatta. The factory cannot properly be regarded as a place of punishment. The females are well fed, having, in addition to abundance of animal food, flour, bread, and vegetables, the indulgence of tea and sugar. They are not put to any labour; and though they are certainly and necessarily cut off from external intercourse, they have the range of an extensive garden, in which they are permitted to walk. So agreeable a retreat is the factory, that servants wilfully disobey their masters and mistresses, in order to be sent thither. In the factory, too, there is a good chance of being married; for the convict swains scattered amongst the settlers, usually proceed to the factory to select wives, when they obtain permission or are anxious to enter into the connubial state.

Each convict ship carries out a herd of females of all ages—from the lowest prostitute to the profligate woman who frequented the theatres. All, who can, carry with them the paraphernalia of the toilette, with trunks and boxes stuffed with every kind of female dress and decoration they could obtain previous to embarkation. In the ship, they have unlimited freedom of intercourse amongst themselves, both in the prison-room, and, during the day, on a prescribed portion of the deck,—a system which completes the corruption of the younger and least profligate. When the ship arrives at Sydney, all the women on board occupy the few days which elapse before their landing, in preparing to produce the most dazzling effect at their descent upon the Australian shore. With rich silk dresses—fashionable bonnets—gorgeous shawls—splendid veils—silk stockings—parasols—and kid-gloves, they disembark, and are distributed as above described. On the very road to their respective places of assignment, the women are told of the easy retirement of the factory, and advised to get themselves sent thither, where they will be allowed to marry without having to obtain the consent of an assignee-master. Offers of marriage are made to some on the waysides; and at their new habitations they are besieged by suitors.

As for the coarser portion of the sex, when equally depraved with their more showy companions, their language, manners, and conduct are infinitely too dreadful for public description. Their language, disgusting even when heard by profligate men, would pollute the eyes cast upon it in writing. Their open and shameless vices must not be told. Their fierce and untameable audacity would not be believed. They are the pest and gangrene of the colonial society—a reproach to human nature—and, lower than the brutes, a disgrace to all animal existence. But enough:—were the veil raised, and the appalling spectacle exhibited as it really is, the picture would be too horrible for affrighted humanity to look upon.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

CHURCH-BELLS.

A strange and mingled feeling
Is waken'd by your pealing,
Ye wild revolving bells!
While past years float before me,
The future shadows o'er me,
And solemn thought compels!
When life in youth was springing,
How blithe appear'd your ringing—
My heart leaped at the sound!
The future Hope was gilding,
And Fancy castle building,
Upon enchanted ground.
Those visions now are shrouded,—
With care my days are clouded,
And Truth, with sober mien,
Life's flatter'd face unveiling,
Proclaims such hopes are failing,
And changes all the scene.
How wise who take the warning,
Nor Mercy's angel scorning,
Look upwards to the skies;
There see bright prospects breaking,
And, heavenly joy partaking,
Above the world can rise!

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, MARCH 20th, 1841.

It has long been our intention to devote a leading article to the consideration of public discussions between those who advocate and those who are opposed to the doctrine of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors. There is no use in allowing a public discussion unless there be a means of deciding which side has obtained the victory. And how can such decision be arrived at, in respect to a discussion upon the merits of Teetotalism? There may be three umpires, for instance: the Teetotaler shall choose a referee—the Anti-Teetotaler shall choose his friend, and these two referees may select a third to give the casting vote. Now it is tolerably certain that the Anti-Teetotal referee will decide in favour of his friend; and the Teetotaler will, of course, give his vote for the advocate of the principle which he himself admires. It is evident, therefore, that the vote of the third umpire will be that suffrage which will virtually decide the question. How can the impartiality of this third referee be secured? Either he is a Teetotaler or an Anti-Teetotaler: if he be the former, he may naturally be expected to lean towards the disputant who defends the opinion which he himself entertains, and vice versa. It is impossible to constitute any tribunal which may be supposed to give a just, candid, and impartial decision in a matter where pre-conceived habit, prejudice, and interest are probably concerned. These observations apply to cases in which neither disputant acknowledges a defeat.

Although truth be on the side of the Teetotaler as evidently as it manifests itself in the doctrines of revealed religion, still there are a few who would never admit their conviction of that truth, because its principles interfere with their darling habits. Other opponents come forward, because their pride is gratified by the éclat attending a public discussion; and a third division of the enemies of Teetotalism is composed of those who are bribed by the publicans and brewers, or distillers, to advocate a cause which the new doctrine threatens with almost instantaneous ruin. Such opponents as these—whose views are essentially selfish—will not be easily induced to confess themselves vanquished; and therefore, when the Teetotal advocate finds himself opposed by one of either of those classes of foemen, he must make up his mind to have to contend with an enemy who will not admit the force of any argument, however convincing it may prove. In such a case, the point at issue cannot be referred to umpires; and where shall we find a tribunal of judges whose impartial decision may be confidently relied on?

Seeing that no such tribunal can be fairly constituted, and that the opponents of Teetotalism are generally obstinate and self-willed men, whose minds are inaccessible to all sound reasoning, the question naturally arises, whether it be prudent to allow public discussions to take place at all upon Teetotal platforms? We argue that no such public discussion should take place. Teetotalism is not a theory: it is an axiom; and any one who will systematically maintain that drinking is better than abstinence is an idiot, with whom it is unbecoming as well as unavailing to reason. We grant that before an individual knows precisely on what grounds Teetotalism is based, he may be inclined to question the propriety of so extreme a measure; but he surely would not court a discussion without first investigating the foundation of the subject to be disputed:—or, if he did, he would be disposed to yield to conviction. He would not, if he were honest and sensible, enter upon a discussion with the pre-determination of closing his mind against that conviction, should it be presented to him. But, as it is impossible to ascertain whether the individual who courts discussion as an Anti-Teetotaler, be honest or not—sensible or not, prudence would induce us to avoid discussion altogether.

We know the reply that thousands will be inclined to make to this observation on our part:—"The world will believe that the Teetotalers are afraid to submit their principles to the test of discussion!" Such a remark would be as unjust as it would be easily answered. If an individual offered to discuss the doctrines of religion with some dignitary of the Church, the reply would be an indignant negative; and no one would be insane enough to assert that he was afraid to argue the principles of the creed which he professed. Without for one moment placing Teetotalism, which is an earthly institution, upon the same level with the Christian religion, which is a heavenly one, we nevertheless do not hesitate to declare that the doctrine of Teetotalism is divine in nature, if not in essence, and that its truth is, therefore, beyond all dispute. The advocates of Teetotalism may decline a discussion with honour to themselves; and certainly it does not appear prudent to convert the platforms, which are erected for the advocacy of a doctrine, into a place where that doctrine may be disputed. To admit discussion is more or less to acknowledge that the principle to be discussed is a theory, and not a truth already demonstrated; and when a Society, or Association is based and formed upon a particular doctrine, for its members to discuss that doctrine with opponents on a public platform, is to lessen the dignity attached to the pre-existing conviction of the efficacy of the principle.

When millions of men unite themselves together, linked by a doctrine which has been tested by the experience of them all, their proper mode of procedure is evident. They should discuss the principle in private, and advocate it in public:—they may seek to obtain converts by discussion, in society, and within the range of their acquaintance; but they should simply preach the doctrine in those halls or assembly-rooms which they throw open to the public. Their numbers and their experience are a sufficient reply to all public cavils, and an honourable reason for a refusal of public discussion, which only leads to confusion, causes ill feeling, allows scope for turbulence and abuse, and very frequently tends to bring both sides into disrepute together.

The opponents of Teetotalism can be influenced only by one of three motives,—ignorance, wickedness, or interest. The ignorant are generally prejudiced, and will not admit the force of argument;—the wicked are more difficult to silence;—and the interested are the most enthusiastic of the three classes in their endeavours to render popular their demoralizing opinions. We here allude to the constant and lasting opponents of Teetotalism; and not to those who opposed only while unaware of the blessings held out by the principle, and who acknowledged their error when enlightened. There are, then, the ignorant, the wicked, and the interested to contend against; and these are bad enough, taken singly. But when the three characteristics are all united in one opponent, how hopeless is the case! How can such a mind be ever brought round to acknowledge conviction; and what honour is to be gained by a discussion with such an adversary? As well might a Newton expend all his learning upon a savage, or a Descartes endeavour to render a child familiar with his theory of whirlwinds!

We hope that our motives will not be misunderstood, in reference to public discussions. No one feels more anxious for the welfare and the honour of the cause than ourselves; and no one entertains a deeper conviction of the truths of Teetotalism than we do. For this reason—to rescue the honour of the principle from contamination with every low ruffian who may come forward to assail it; and to act upon the basis formed by the truths of Teetotalism, as upon an axiom and not upon a theory—have we recorded the preceding observations. We know the deep responsibility under which we lie, in offering our suggestions to the public: we know that the immense influence which The Teetotaler enjoys, has been acquired by its impartiality and rectitude of procedure: and we shall not willingly diminish that influence, or lose any portion of public confidence by any misdeed on our part. We therefore gave due consideration to the subject of public discussions before we penned this article; and the reader is now possessed of the impartial results of our calm and dispassionate deliberations.

In those cases where public discussions are resolved upon, especial care should be taken in the mode of conducting them. When an opponent steps forward at a public meeting, and offers a challenge to any advocate upon the platform, the chairman should enquire his name, address, profession, or occupation, and demand references for his character. The proposed debate should then be brought before the committee of the Society or Branch in whose assembly-room the challenge was given; and that committee, after having satisfied itself relative to the respectability of the opponent, should nominate a champion to meet the adversary. As committees are composed of individuals of all ranks, professions, and occupations, there will be found amongst their members eligible advocates to place in opposition against any opponents who may come forward. By attending to these suggestions, public discussions, when resolved upon, would be conducted with honour to the Teetotal cause, and in a manner which would convince opponents that the whole mechanism of our Societies is regulated in the most uniform and correct manner possible.

And now a few words more, relative to the adversaries of Teetotalism. When we reflect upon the thousands—nay, millions of individuals, who have been reclaimed from a state of misery and degradation by the beneficent effects of Teetotalism, what can we think of those persons who would plunge them back again into the vortex of ruin from which they have been dragged? We know that the heart becomes more hardened, and the vice more inveterate, after a relapse;—and yet the enemies of Teetotalism would fain preach that relapse—or at all events, proclaim the doctrine which would most effectually bring such relapse about. Does Teetotalism do any harm? In advocating the disuse of intoxicating liquors, do Teetotalers recommend a habit of a questionable nature to supply the place of a criminal and demoralizing indulgence? Do they not urge prevention as a better remedy for intemperance than cure? In what, then, do the Teetotalers sin? Where are they wrong? Or rather, how can they fail to be right? Some of the opponents of this glorious doctrine declaim against the pledge. Now the pledge has nothing to do with the principle of total abstinence. Teetotalism is the same, with or without the pledge; only, the pledge is an additional guarantee that the doctrine will be faithfully adhered to. The most honest man will not hesitate to break a mere verbal promise of abstinence, made probably to his family, or in answer to the appeals of friends;—but no good and really upright man will violate that promise which he has consecrated with his signature. And has not man a right to fence his virtues round with fortifications as strong as possible? He has not only the right to do so; but prudence recommends the measure. Away, then, with all cavils, against the pledge! The opponent who declaims against it as a degrading bond or shackle, forgets that if he himself walked into a merchant's counting-house and ordered a quantity of goods to be sent round to his own premises, the merchant would demand a bill of exchange in payment thereof, and would not trust much to his customer's verbal promise. And does it degrade a man to affix his signature to such a document? The only degradation in the case is to be found in the fact of an individual refusing to sign the pledge—a circumstance which demonstrates that he cannot repose the slightest confidence in his own honour and integrity.

THE COUSINS.

It was one of those rich autumnal evenings which, whatever poets and travellers may say of Italian skies and Campanian plains, nowhere looks more lovely, or glows with hues of such surpassing beauty, as in the green valleys of merry England. The golden rays of the last sunbeam still lingered on the side of the distant hill, crowning it as with a departing halo; and the tinkle of the sheep-bell came faintly on the passing breeze. All was still and serene: it was an hour to soothe the mind into a delicious repose; but the flushed cheek and eager eye of Helen Conway, as she gazed from her window upon the path which led from the adjacent village to her father's dwelling, told how little sympathy her feelings had with the quiet scenes by which she was surrounded.

"It is very strange," said she at length, half turning from the window towards her cousin Agnes, who was sitting also in the recess of the window,—"it is very strange that Cecil has not appeared before now: he was not wont to stay so late;—and this too the last evening he may see us for a long time," she added in a reproachful tone.

"His regiment does positively leave for Ireland tomorrow, then?" replied Agnes, without raising her eyes from her book.

"It does—and he promised—but, hush! 'tis Juba's bark: there—he bounds over the style; ah! Agnes, I knew he would not deceive us!"

"U!" echoed Agnes emphatically.

Helen coloured slightly; but the approach of Juba and his master put a period to any further remark. Meanwhile, while the expected youth is paying his respects to the fair cousins, we will give the reader a short sketch of each.

Helen Conway was the daughter of a gentleman whose fortune, if it did not enable him to launch into the fashionable extravagances of life, sufficed to afford him the enjoyment of most of its elegances. Left a widower when Helen was but ten years of age, his whole time had from that period been devoted to forming and improving her mind: nor was the task an unprofitable one. Helen, with all the quickness of woman, had much of the reflection of the other sex: it was thus as her dawning faculties became developed, and her mind stored with valuable knowledge, that the gaiety of the light-hearted girl prevented her from becoming a pedant in petticoats; and while one moment she would surprise with the extent of her information, at the next she would fascinate by her innocent and almost childish vivacity. In her temperament she was ardent and enthusiastic; but an innate pride seemed like a veil to conceal the warmth of those dangerous attributes of a female heart; and it was only to those who shared her utmost confidence that Helen Conway appeared as she really was—a very woman; and one, too, the gentlest and most confiding of her sex. Her cousin Agnes was almost the reverse of Helen in every point of character. Naturally selfish and designing, she disguised her real disposition under the mask of excessive candour and good nature. She was what is generally termed pretty—that is, without being a regular beauty. She had an animated cast of countenance, which was very much admired. Helen's was a beauty of a higher and more intellectual order;—a pale high brow, dark expressive eyes, delicately chiselled mouth and nose, and a form whose height was rendered more commanding by its exquisite symmetry and the graceful dignity of her motions.

A few months before the time we speak of, Helen had met Cecil (then a subaltern in an infantry regiment) at a neighbouring ball. Gifted with more intellectual acumen than many of his cloth, he was not long in discovering and selecting from the herd of country belles, who came armed for conquest to the revel, the gentle and retiring Helen.

After having danced a quadrille with her, he led her to a seat somewhat apart from the throng. There, in the increasing confidence of an animated conversation, Helen, by the lively sallies of her wit and the elevated dignity of her understanding, unconsciously threw a spell over her new acquaintance, of which he could scarcely believe the reality until the following morning, when he found himself leisurely walking towards her father's house, with as strong a predisposition to be irretrievably in love, as ever possessed a young gentleman of susceptible propensities. Had it happened that Helen was insensible to the tender whisperings of Cecil, our tale might have stopped here—or rather, it would never have begun;—but she listened with downcast eyes to his protestations of eternal fidelity; and when, after an acquaintance of about two months, and visits every day, he imprinted on her fair hand a kiss, she did not frown, nor withdrew it; but she looked as interestingly confused as young ladies under similar circumstances are wont to do.

The atmosphere of love will not long continue clear: sunshine is ever succeeded by clouds, and smiles by tears. Cecil's regiment, after a few months' sojourn in the village, received orders to embark for Ireland. This was a cruel blow to the lovers: they felt as if the first of destiny had disunited them for ever; and it was therefore with thoughtful looks and swelling hearts that they met previous to their separation in Helen's little parlour—the scene of many a blissful recollection now rendered bitter by the thoughts of their approaching misfortune.

Cecil had taken his seat by the side of Helen: one of her hands was pressed between both of his. They spoke but little; and their conversation was confined to low and indistinct whispers. Agnes had resumed her book in the window; but her eye glanced incessantly from the page towards the lovers. A restless movement of her lips betrayed some internal emotion which she could no longer suppress; and, flinging down the book with a pettish air, she suddenly rose. Helen, startled by the fall of the book, turned to discover the cause.

"It is nothing," said Agnes, laughing, "but an experiment of mine to see if anything can rouse you from your lethargy. Well—if I ever saw such a melancholy, moping pair! Do, Helen, try if a song will reanimate Cecil's pensive humour."

Helen, with a faint smile, complied, running on the keys of the piano-forte a few chords of a plaintive air, which she had learned from Cecil. She sang in a voice naturally sweet, but now rendered more touching by the emotions that struggled in her bosom, a few stanzas of Camoen's touching canzonets. The subject was that of a forsaken girl complaining of the falsehood of her absent lover.

"Shall I too be forgotten, Cecil?" whispered Helen to her lover, as he hung over the chair; "shall I too be forgotten, and left to sigh ditties of blighted love to the pale moon, when you are gone?"

"Helen, this is unkind—'tis cruel at such a moment! Oh! wherefore doubt my truth, my devotion?"

"Hush! I know that man's affections are the sport of chance. He goes into the world amongst the beautiful and gay—he sees around him bright eyes and warm hearts,—the temptation is too strong for his will;—he forgets the once loved cheek that grows pale, and the eye that becomes dim watching his return:—he returns not; or if he do, he is cold and changed, his vows are forgotten, he has learned to love another!"

"Helen, Helen! what a picture!"

"'Tis not yet filled up. What becomes of the forsaken one? does the world contain a balm for a broken heart? can the affections she has garnered up for one be bestowed upon another. No—the casket has been robbed of its gem: the light that shone upon her existence is quenched,—and what remains for her but to die?"

"Helen, think you that I could ever prove untrue?"

"I think better of your mind, Cecil, than to suppose that you could contemplate such an act; but you have the same feelings, the same passions, the same foibles as others of your sex. Would you be a phenomenon amongst men?"

Cecil replied not; and again the conversation struck into an indistinct murmur.

The following morning the young soldier quitted the village of D—, and Helen was left to her own meditation, unless when relieved by the lively sallies of her cousin, who, now become more animated than usual, rallied her incessantly on her love-sick reveries.

In a very short time after Cecil's departure, Helen's heart was gladdened by a letter from him, in which he informed her he had joined his regiment in Dublin, which he found extremely gay, but that he could experience no happiness while removed from her who was the sun of his earthly felicity.

Long and frequent were the consultations the cousins held upon the epistle. Helen saw only in it the same warm affectionate sentiments which had ever governed her lover's actions, while Agnes insisted that he had already entered the whirl of pleasure, and had begun to forget the quiet village of D— and all its rustic associations. Each damsel seemed satisfied that her own interpretation was the true one; until the lapse of autumn and the approach of winter brought no second letter from Cecil, and afforded strong grounds for suspecting that the unfavourable conjectures of Agnes were nearer the truth than those of her confiding cousin.

Helen now seldom spoke of Cecil; nor did his silence seem to affect her in any manner, save by an increasing love of solitary walks: in all other respects she was unaltered;—she played, sang, and entertained her father's friends with her usual ease and gaiety. Thus it frequently is with the human heart: to the casual observer it seems like the smooth and unruffled sea; but few eyes can discover the strong under-current that silently and secretly tends towards one point, fretting and chafing in its course the channel that itself has made. Helen's evenings' walks were often prolonged until the fading daylight had left the world in darkness, and the fast falling dew chilled her frame. Then she would return; and, without making any change in her dress, resume her usual household avocations.

It was after one of those protracted rambles that a slight cold, which confined her to her room for a few days, gave the first indications of the secret ravages which her constitution had sustained. When she next took her place at the family breakfast table, there was a frightful change visible in her appearance; her cheeks had become hollow and colourless; and her eyes, though they shone with their usual brilliancy, were sunk in their sockets. Yet she smiled with her accustomed cheerfulness; and when her friends expressed concern for the delicate state of her health, she laughed at their fears, and said that she intended to be the merriest of the village group at their Christmas sports. Christmas came; but the graceful form of Helen Conway was missing in the merry dance; and her light laugh and sweet voice were unheard in the festival. The cold hand of consumption, though arrested by the skill of medicine, still clutched its victim with tenacious grasp. Helen's constitution had been excellent; and it was only by slow degrees that the insidious enemy could sap its foundations; and when at Christmas she found she was still unable to quit her chamber, she looked forward to the fresh flowers of spring as the heralds of the return of the roses to her cheeks.

The dreary frowns of winter had passed away, and were succeeded by the changeful month of April—that fickle time when Nature's smiles and tears mingle as kindly as the parting kisses of a venerable matron and her gentle grandchild. But Helen Conway had not received that benefit from the return of spring which she had anticipated. Wasting, wearing almost imperceptibly away, the lamp of life now hardly flickered in its socket. Yet she still retained that strength of mind which sustained her spirit to the last. She had not for months mentioned the name of Cecil, until one morning, while reclining upon a sofa supported by cushions, no one being in the room but Agnes, she suddenly asked what day of the month it was.

"The twelfth of April, love," replied her cousin.

"The twelfth!" ejaculated Helen.

"What is there singular in this day?"

"Nay—little. Only I was just thinking that this very day, twelve months ago, did I first see Cecil in this room."

"Helen, dear, you must forget such subjects," said Agnes, hastily.

"Forget! alas, I shall soon be where all will be forgotten! Yes—'tis strange—twelve months ago precisely; and the morning was as bright and beautiful as this! Agnes, I should like once more to look upon the fair face of nature. I think with your assistance I could walk to the window. I feel quite strong to-day, and the sight of the green trees and opening flowers would cheer me."

Accordingly, aided by Agnes, the poor invalid reached the window: for a few moments she gazed in silent rapture upon the scene.

"How beautiful!" she exclaimed; "how beautiful to the exile seem the valleys of the land he is quitting for ever. What an earth were this, did not our wayward passions mar its fairest features. Look, Agnes, at those violets that nod their purple heads along yonder bank. I almost fancy that I breathe their rich perfume. They were planted by Cecil."

"Helen, I fear you will over-exert yourself by speaking too long," said Agnes.

"No, Agnes—it does me good: 'twas the silent worm that gnawed away my heart in secret."

As she spoke, a flush, deeper and more sudden than the hectic of her disease, flooded her cheek and brow.

"Agnes! Agnes!" she exclaimed, almost breathless,—see that dog that comes running along the path; is it not like—it is—it is—Juba! and, merciful heaven! Cecil!" and the agitated girl sank back in her chair, almost fainting.

"You positively must not see him, Helen," said her cousin eagerly.

"Not see him, Agnes!" replied the proud girl, rising to her full height without assistance. "Think you, now that the momentary weakness of my woman's heart is past, that I shall shrink from a meeting. No—you shall see how firmly I will act!"

Resuming her seat, she awaited with apparent calmness the approach of her faithless lover. The door opened, and Cecil hastily entered:—he had advanced a few steps, when, perceiving Helen, he stopped as if petrified! At length, rushing towards her, he flung himself at her feet; and grasping one of her thin wasted hands, he exclaimed in a voice almost inarticulate with emotion, "Helen, my beloved—is it thus we meet?"

Helen, by a strong effort, retained sufficient composure to withdraw her hand; and, pointing to a chair, said, in a cold tone, "Mr. Cecil, pray be seated; the time for this trifling has long past!"

"Past! and why is it past, Helen!" ejaculated the young man, in an agony of despair. "Was it thus we parted?"

"Mr. Cecil, we must change the subject! I have learned a lesson, sir—"

"But, one word, Helen, before I am condemned! Why did you not reply to my numerous letters?"

"Sir, do you mean to add duplicity to wrong?" demanded Helen.

"Helen, I speak the truth! Letter after letter I wrote to you without receiving a line in reply; till maddened at your neglect, I received leave of absence, and hurried over to learn from your own lips the cause of it!"

A visible tremor ran through Helen's frame; and, turning upon Cecil a look in which joy and agony were strangely blended, she laid her cold hand upon his, and, speaking slowly and earnestly, said, "Cecil, as you value the peace of a spirit which is even now hovering upon the threshold of eternity, deceive me not! Is this the truth you tell?"

"It is—it is!" cried Cecil; and he ratified his assertion by an appeal to heaven.

"I never received but one letter of yours; and though I told it not to the world, the thought of your faithlessness broke my heart. I am dying—dying, Cecil; but I shall die happy in the consciousness that I am still beloved by you!"

She leant her cheek upon her lover's shoulder, exhausted by her emotions, while her fast dropping tears fell like rain upon his bosom. Fearful of agitating her any farther, Cecil bore her gently to the window, where the bright beams of the mid-day sun were playing through the young green leaves of the vine that wreathed round it.

"I am better here," said Helen: "I will sit in this sunshine—I feel its warm beams cheering my chilled heart. Open the window, dear Cecil—the fresh air will revive me: how sweetly and freshly it comes! Cecil, your hand—let me feel you near me! Ah! the sweet song of those birds—their music will soon be lost to me: in the cold grave there is no sweet music. Ah! that pang—Cecil, don't go—I am happy—how happy—let me—"

The gentle girl's head sank—her bright eyes grew dim—a shadow came over her beautiful features,—it was DEATH!

We dare not profane the solemn scene by going farther with the picture. A plain white slab in the village church-yard marks the resting-place of all that is mortal of Helen Conway. Cecil, after her decease, rejoined his regiment, and in the field of glory won those laurels which may hide, but not heal, the wounds of his seared heart.

There is but one other circumstance connected with this true tale worth recording. Many years after the events here related, Colonel Cecil, now a retired veteran, received a packet containing all the letters which he had written to Helen Conway, but which the person who now returned them, and who was on the bed of death, acknowledged to have intercepted from motives of jealousy and envy. This wretched woman was Helen's cousin, Agnes!

REVIEWS.

History of the Total Abstinence Pledge Question: Explaining the True Position of the British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance. By H. FREEMAN. pp. 32. London: J. Pasco.

It is deeply to be deplored that the internal feuds and discords of the great Teetotal Societies of the metropolis should render necessary the publication of such pamphlets as the one under notice. Mr. Freeman himself deplores this necessity, because he appends to his work some very excellent arguments for a General Union, to which we shall presently refer. It appears, from this work, that the following gentlemen were the first who ever signed their names to a pledge of total abstinence in England:—Messieurs Greatrex, Dickenson, Broadbelt, Smith, J. Livesey, Anderton, and King. The pledge here subscribed to, ran thus:—"We agree to abstain from all liquors of an intoxicating quality, whether ale, porter, wine, or ardent spirits, except as medicine." At the first annual meeting of the Preston Temperance Society, on the 26th of March, 1833, the following pledge was also rendered admissible:—"We do further agree to abstain, for one year, from ale, porter, wine, ardent spirits, and all intoxicating liquor, except as medicines, or in a religious ordinance." This clause was abolished in the ensuing year; and a new and more comprehensive pledge was introduced. Mr. John Giles was one of the first, if not the first, of those philanthropists who introduced the principle of Total Abstinence, accompanied by a pledge, to public notice in London; and shortly afterwards the seeds of the Teetotal Society were sown at Mr. Grosjean's house in the Quadrant. The New British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance was established on the 29th of August. The following is an account of the entrance of the Earl of Stanhope into the sphere of Teetotalism:—

"Agreeable to his Lordship's suggestion, a deputation from the Committee waited upon him at the hour appointed, consisting of the Rev. J. Sherman, Mr. Blakely, the Treasurer, and the Secretary. They were received in the most courteous manner, and, upon being seated, his Lordship asked for the book, that he might sign the declaration, and become a member of the Society: after signing his name, he wrote underneath, £5, annually. The interview lasted nearly two hours, and was highly interesting. The committee would acknowledge with the deepest gratitude the band that has directed them to his Lordship at this very important juncture of the affairs of this Society, not only on account of the benefits that must necessarily result to the cause generally, from one manifesting such decision of character, but as an indication of the purifying principles of the Society shortly pervading the whole of that class of whom his Lordship is so distinguished a member. If success be any criterion of the blessing of the Most High resting upon an Institution, this Society has it in a most eminent degree. Not only in London, but from all parts of the country, is intelligence pouring in of the most encouraging nature, and calls for abundant thanksgiving from the friends of the Society, and of the human race."

The first general meeting of the Society was held in Exeter Hall, on the 23rd of May, 1837. The second anniversary took place in May, 1838. At the commencement of 1839, a Protest against the abolition of what is termed the short pledge, was published, signed by Messieurs Burt, Giles, Freeman, and Ball. This Protest contained the following article:—

"Because many, to whom total abstinence would be an incalculable blessing, are willing to sign the Short Pledge, while they entertain a conscientious objection to bind themselves to more restrictive measures than it proposes, and in the absence of what they deem a suitable Pledge, will sign no Pledge at all, thereby augmenting the danger of speedily relinquishing their intention to become total abstainers."

The following Protest was issued by Earl Stanhope, relative to the abolition of the short pledge:—

"1st.—Because it would prevent every Member from using intoxicating liquors as a beverage under medical prescription.

"2nd.—Because it would prevent every Member from providing for a guest any intoxicating liquors, and would thus lead to an unjustifiable interference in his conduct towards his friends or acquaintances.

"3rd.—Because it might oblige every Member to dismiss all his domestic servants, or labourers, to whom he had been accustomed to allow intoxicating liquors, and who could not altogether abstain from them; or might induce his servants, or labourers, to procure in public-houses those liquors which would be denied to them at home.

"4th.—Because the injustice of thus dismissing such servants, or labourers, whatever might be their length of service, their fidelity and attachment, their moral or intellectual qualities, or their merits in discharging their respective duties, would excite general indignation, and would be most injurious to the interests of the Society.

"5th.—Because the proposed Pledge, from its being in many cases quite inapplicable, would curtail the influence, and counteract the exertions of the Society.

"6th.—Because the substitution of the proposed Pledge, in lieu of those which the alternative is now offered to those who desire to become Members, would, in my opinion, be a total subversion of an established and fundamental principle of the Society."

The dismemberment of the Society is thus described:—

"After the Delegates had decided the 'Pledge question,' that body recommended not to introduce the Pledge controversy into the meeting of members, to which there was a general understanding of consent. Soon after six o'clock much excitement prevailed in the members' meeting which had then gathered. Mr. F. Grosjean moved, and Mr. J. Meredith seconded, 'That the American Pledge be henceforth the pledge of the Society.' After much discussion it was proposed that those who voted for the two pledges (as agreed in the Delegates' Meeting) should remove to another room, and those who voted for the American pledge alone should remain in the same room, each member having two cards for voting. When they had separated, tellers were appointed to take the cards, or votes, as the members passed a door. The result was—For the two pledges, 337—For the American pledge alone, 256. On the following morning, contrary to general agreement, it was again proposed to re-consider the decision of yesterday, on the ground that some might have arrived who were not then present, to which it was replied that several Delegates had left town, under an impression that the pledge question was entirely settled; it was, however, put to the vote, and the decision of the previous day confirmed; upon which, W. Janson, J. Meredith, and others, who had advocated the exclusive adoption of the American pledge, refused to take any further part in the proceedings, and signified their intention to form another Society. The Delegates then proceeded with the business, and appointed the Officers and Committee for the ensuing year."

The party, that formed the New British and Foreign Temperance Society, retained possession of the books, funds, &c., of the Society which was thus split into portions; and the followers of Earl Stanhope's view of the question organized themselves as the British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance. The following extract gives an idea of the progress of the latter Society during the years 1839 and 1840.

"The Committee of the British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance had but little funds, and supported the cause very much at their own expense. To the benevolent Treasurer much is due, for the liberal manner in which he answered the calls so repeatedly made. More than fifty Auxiliary Societies were united during the year; much new ground was broken up, many Societies established, and others assisted. The reader is referred to their Annual Report. The Society is now prosperous, having nearly 100 Auxiliaries, and in its employ twelve paid, besides several gratuitous agents."

Mr. Freeman has explained the origin of the disunion in the original Society in a candid and impartial manner; and every reliance is to be placed upon his assertions. We shall now quote a few of his arguments for a National Union; and with that extract close this notice of a work which is highly creditable to its author's impartiality and honesty:—

"The division of the Society causes a considerable expense, which otherwise might be saved. This is proved from the fact, that, in several districts, agents are employed, and rooms hired, by each Society, while one Society could more beneficially serve the cause in that district, and effect a saving of half the cost, to say nothing of the bad tendency of the spirit of rivalry in any work of true benevolence.

"The divided state of the Total Abstinence Society is a powerful excitement to bad feelings in forming an estimate of the motives and conduct of persons belonging to the other section. The division of the Parent Society has led to much discord in local societies, and has produced in them also, in many instances, the unhappy division into two parts, which has had the effect of injuring the general cause."

Sketches from Master Humphrey's Clock. Number I. 8vo. pp. 8. London: W. Brittain.

THE Sketches in this publication are admirable; but the letter-press, which is intended to explain each design, is beneath contempt. The artist is clever, and has hit off the characters of Master Humphrey, Quilp, and the Old Grandfather, in a way which enables us to recognise the originals, as designed by Phiz, in a moment. Indeed, Quilp is a most successful sketch: Little Nelly is the worst; her countenance wants that delicacy of expression with which Phiz has invested it. The letter-press is a disgrace to the work, and is full of grammatical errors, as the annexed extract will demonstrate:—

"Although not a prominent figure in the work, only used as a vehicle for introducing the other characters, yet, in point of beauty and originality of sentiment, there is none superior to it; and that while accompanying the old man and his grandchild in their wanderings, or laughing at the witticism of Swiveller, we revert to the commencement of the work, and long for another tête-à-tête with Master Humphrey."

We have marked some words to be printed in italics, to show how miserably and incorrectly the second portion of the passage is endeavoured to be united to the former. We however sincerely recommend this work for the sake of the designs, which are first-rate, and have evidently emanated from the pencil of a most talented artist.

The Mariners' Church Temperance Soldiers and Sailors' Magazine. Number for March. London: J. L. Meere's, Welclose Square; and W. Brittain, Paternoster Row.

THIS monthly magazine, which is sold at one shilling, contains an immense amount of most interesting matter relative to the Teetotal cause. One article in the current number is particularly interesting; and that relates to the condition of the Queen's Bench Prison. It appears that Mr. Chapman, the Marshal of that prison, is most remiss in his duties, and does not adopt any effectual measures for the prevention of the sale of spirits within the walls, although several statutes enjoin him to pay particular attention to this object. Spirits are sold almost openly in the Queen's Bench Prison; and the Marshal, instead of visiting the premises every day, never enters the prison at all save on the first day of every month. He scarcely ever resides on the spot, as required to do by law and by his oath, and entrusts the principal part of the management of the prison to a man of the name of Chester. M. G. C. Smith, a well-known Teetotaler, was confined in the Bench some time ago; and, during that period he exerted himself to spread the principles of Teetotalism amongst the unfortunate captives; but he experienced all kinds of opposition to his humane purposes, at the hands of Mr. Chapman. The following letter, addressed by Mr. Smith to Mr. Chapman, appears in the current Number of the magazine under notice:—

"You know, Mr. Chapman, I applied for permission to have a Tent or Marquee erected on vacant ground for a Temperance Festival, as a gentleman offered to provide the Tent and the Tea at a fixed price, and we should have had a moral and instructive meeting; but this you refused. I asked to rent at seven shillings a week the Brace public-house room for a Temperance Coffee-house and Temperance Hall, and Sergeant Bray offered to provide Tea and Coffee; but you said I must prepare a memorial. Mr. West was getting it signed, when some unhappy victims raged and established a drinking FARE ANN EASY every Thursday night, and you did not object or want a memorial here. A large bill was exhibited, with 'NO HUMBOG' and flash singers from without were promised, and 'the choir will be taken by one wot can chant,' closed the bill. I saw the sad effects of your neglect, and the intemperance and irreligion around me, and I established meetings every night, but it was at the imminent risk of my life; and while I saw that for months you could permit large figures of 'JACK-SHEPPARD,' firing off a pistol, to be chalked on the wall in front of all the rooms, I expected from the adjurations and swearing of some, that a pistol might, under the influence of drink, be fired into my room some night; as the knife and the pistol have been so much used without the prison by the victims of intemperance of late years. Your watchmen I generally found were asleep in the Tap, and there was no police constable in the prison.

"You know, Mr. Chapman, that at a great expense I fitted up a room as a Temperance Hall for Temperance Meetings—you saw it—I showed it to you and your turnkeys, and every visitor admired it. At length, Mr. Colville, your turnkey, sent to take it from me; I refused, and when he sent again, I wrote I would not give it up without the Marshal required it. You wrote on my letter 'I do.' I then yielded, and a friend afterwards came to our religious meeting, but mistook the room, opened that door, and found a jovial drinking party had succeeded us there. I complained loudly of you and your servant then, and I do still. It was for the good of the public, and you had no right to take it away, or Mr. Colville to demand it; but, thus encouraged, you know that Mr. Colville sent up to me on the last Lord's Day afternoon a turnkey to beg I would not go down to the racket-ground with the orphan children of our asylum to preach, as my life was in danger."

If these statements be true—and we see no reason for doubting them—Mr. Chapman was guilty of the most unjust and imprudent conduct in counteracting Mr. Smith's philanthropic designs. It appears that the Marshal, on his entrance upon office, takes an oath, by which he binds himself to obey the rules of the establishment. One of those regulations is that the Marshal shall constantly reside within the Rules of the prison, or within the prison itself;—and yet Mr. Chapman, in spite of this solemn oath, is seldom to be seen within five miles of the prison! It appears that the Marshal has a direct interest in encouraging the consumption of beer in the prison, as a portion of his large income of three thousand six hundred per annum arises from a per centage upon every butt of malt liquor which enters the premises. Altogether, the internal government of the Queen's Bench Prison cries loudly for reformation; and now that we have taken up the subject, we shall not readily lose sight of it.

THE DISSENTING MINISTER.

IT was on a beautiful autumn evening, as the sun poured its latest beams upon the placid river, that I entered a small chapel, wherein were collected about a hundred persons, listening to the discourse of an aged man, who stood upon an elevated platform, with the book of life in his hand. Mild and conciliating in his discourse, it was evident to me that his soul was imbued with no ordinary devotion; and that, though his words were addressed to mortals, his meek and devout mind was elevated to the throne of the Most High. I listened to his sermon with feelings which I can hardly analyse. I own that I entered the chapel without thought, or, at any rate, without feelings of a purely religious nature. It was curiosity alone, I fear, which induced me to enter the place of worship; for I had imbibed prejudices against the peculiar sect to which the Dissenting Minister belonged. These prejudices were only to be eradicated by experience. He concluded his discourse—so remarkable for its simplicity and its earnest eloquence—and dismissed his congregation with the accustomed blessing. I quitted the house of God with the rest; but a chord had been struck in my heart, which vibrated with unusual power. I sought a sequestered spot and gave up my soul to meditation.

The reverend old man, to whom I had been listening for the greater part of an hour, was the minister of a sect which I had been led to believe was characterised by its affectation of sanctity and superior holiness, but which was in reality rather remarkable for the viciousness of its members than for their virtues. "And is it possible," I said to myself, "that such a teacher can be a hypocrite? No, I cannot think it for an instant; and if he practises that which he teaches, surely his example must go far to meliorate his flock." As I thus thought, I saw the Dissenting Minister at a little distance, and was impelled by an irresistible impulse to accost him. "Good evening, sir," I said. He returned my salutation. "I have to thank you for an excellent discourse," I continued. The old man smiled gently—"You are not one of my followers, I think?" "No, sir; but were your disciples all like you, I really think that I should become one."

We continued our conversation until it was nearly dark, and never did I receive more satisfaction from the conversation of any person that I had ever before met with, however eminent for piety or talent. We parted, the old man inviting me to pay him a visit at his humble dwelling, which he indicated to me.

Some days after, I was walking in the direction of the old minister's cottage; and I took advantage of his invitation to inquire if he were at home. I was answered, in the affirmative, by a respectable old woman, whom I found to be his housekeeper, and, indeed, his sole domestic. I entered a neat room where the venerable man was seated drinking his chocolate. He welcomed me with kindness; and, ringing the bell, ordered another cup of chocolate, which I in vain attempted to refuse. His learning I found, to my surprise, to be great, and his knowledge extensive; but there was patriarchal simplicity about him which I never remember to have met with before. He made me acquainted with his history. It seemed that he was a widower, and had buried, several years before, a beloved wife and an only child. His parents had been poor, but in the highest degree respectable, and of the same persuasion as himself. The liberality of an uncle had enabled him to follow the profession to which his own inclinations led him; and, at an early age, he became the minister of the same chapel to which he now belonged.

"I am now seventy-three," he concluded, "and you see that I still retain my faculties."

He might have said, with Adam, in As you Like it—

"Though I look old, yet I am strong and lusty:
For in my youth I never did apply
Hot and rebellious liquors in my blood
Nor did I with unbashful forehead woo
The means of weakness and debility.
Therefore my age is as a lusty winter,
Fickly, but kindly."

I left the house of the minister convinced that I had formed a wrong opinion of his sect; and I hope that my tendency to prejudices has been removed by the discovery of my mistake. He is dead now—the wise and excellent old man! But he is unforgotten. Children are told of his virtues by their parents; and his grave has been bedewed with many a tear of affection and sorrow.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

WOOLWICH.

TEETOTALISM is making rapid advances at this place. We are happy to say that every hour is adding to the number of its disciples. The Royal Artillery will soon become altogether a Teetotal regiment. The soldiers of this corps are coming forward boldly in the good cause—not so much by the advice of those who are already emancipated, as by self-conviction, caused by witnessing its workings among those who have long ago adopted and benefited by the principle. There have been two meetings lately, which brought nearly one hundred signatures, amongst which were the names of many persons of great respectability and influence. There is likewise a Rechabite Tent formed at Woolwich; it is flourishing beyond all expectations.

WAKEFIELD.

We have received the following communication from Wakefield, which we hasten to publish, but on the contents of which we offer no comment for the present:—

"The Committee of the Teetotal Union having had charges of immorality and prevarication laid against Mr. L. H. Leigh, their Travelling Secretary and Agent, have (along with several friends to the cause from other towns) had an investigation on the 3rd instant, when the Meeting came to the following Resolution:—'That in the opinion of this Meeting, the charges against Mr. Leigh, of immorality and prevarication, (judging from the evidence produced,) have not been satisfactorily rebutted.' In consequence of this, the Committee feel it their duty to inform the friends of the Temperance Cause that they have retained Mr. Leigh's resignation of the above offices, which he had given in to them previous to the investigation, and they have no further responsibility respecting him or his proceedings, and are sorry that they had sanctioned a man whose character they had been led to believe was the reverse of what is now stated."

"G. H. HARRISON,
"JOSEPH COLE."

As impartial journalists, we shall afford Mr. LEIGH an opportunity of publishing an explanation, if he have any to offer, through the medium of our columns.

CROYDON.

THE following resolution was passed at a meeting of the Members of the Croydon Auxiliary to the British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, held in the Town Hall, Croydon, February 23rd, 1841:—"That this Meeting, feeling and deploring that the want of friendly co-operation among the Members of the different Societies advocating the cause of Total Abstinence from all intoxicating Liquors presents a serious obstacle to the spread of those principles which they all advocate, and believing that an UNION of the principal Societies having the same objects in view, would not fail to ensure an increased measure of success, begs respectfully to suggest to the several Committees and Members of those Societies the desirableness of such an union; and that the Secretary be requested, accordingly, to forward this Resolution to the Committees of the Parent Society with which they are connected, the New British and Foreign Temperance Society, and the United Temperance Association."

SHREWSBURY.

We have received a most intelligent and clever letter from our correspondent, J. W., of this place. He calls our attention to the Forty-Seventh Anniversary of the Licensed Victuallers' Society, which took place at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, on the 10th of February. He alludes to the numerous alms-houses, &c., established by this body, and invites Teetotalers to follow so good an example in this respect. He then felicitates the cause of Teetotalism upon another triumph, in the establishment of the Life Insurance Company, in Moorgate-street, and expresses a hope that the institution will be duly supported. He next congratulates the Teetotal world upon the immense success obtained by The Teetotaler journal, and expresses a hope that it will shortly become a stamped daily newspaper, to answer the demands of the myriads who now throng beneath the banners of Teetotalism.

TOWN NEWS.

EAST LONDON YOUTHS' TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

A VERY crowded meeting of this Society was held in the School-room, Hare-street, Bethnal Green, on Monday evening, March 8th. Mr. J. H. WOODLEY (the Treasurer) presided. The meeting was ably addressed by MESSIEURS J. CANNON, PARKER, MILLS, and BUTT (the Secretary). This admirable association has established the progress of knowledge on the principles of mutual instruction. Much good has been effected in the district to which the operations of this Society are confined.

THE "GOOD SAMARITAN" RECHABITE TENT.

THE members and friends of this Tent intend to give a grand Tea-Festival at the Temperance Hall, Adelaide Square, Islington, on the 23rd instant. Tickets may be obtained at the Aldersgate-street Chapel, on Wednesday and Saturday evenings.

FITZROY AND NORTH WEST LONDON AUXILIARY TO THE N. B. AND F. TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

ON Tuesday, March 2nd, a public meeting was held by this Auxiliary in the school-room, Grafton-street, Fitzroy Square. The Rev. J. H. HINTON, M.A., was called to the chair. Addresses were delivered by MESSIEURS W. CONWAY, WILD, KNIGHTON and BRENSMEAD.

On Wednesday, March 3rd, Mr. W. WILLIS, the President, occupied the chair at the same place, and made a most able speech.

Mr. W. DONALDSON explained the principles of Teetotalism in a very clear and intelligent manner, and exhibited its benefits in a most attractive light.

Mr. R. HICKS, surgeon, explained the evil results of the use of alcoholic liquors, morally and physically.

Mr. J. DRAPER announced the intention of the Auxiliary to present the Secretary with a silver medal as a token of respect for the services he had rendered the Society.

Mr. BOSS then presented the medal, on which was the following inscription:—A token of respect to Mr. W. Conway, from the Committee and friends of this Auxiliary for his indefatigable exertions in the cause of Total Abstinence.

Mr. CONWAY returned thanks for the honour conferred upon him in a very neat and appropriate speech.

HOXTON AND FINCHBURY YOUTHS' SOCIETY.

AN excellent meeting of this association took place at the Chapel, Old-street, St. Luke's, on the 9th instant. DA. OXLEY, M.D. took the chair, and made a very eloquent speech. The audience was then addressed by MESSIEURS CRUMP, WESTON, PHILLIPS (the Secretary), PALMER, and COCKRANE.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SOCIETY FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF INTEMPERANCE.

THE fifth great Annual Tea-Meeting of the City and North London Auxiliary is to be held on Good-Friday, at the White Conduit House. The chair is to be taken by Mr. J. S. BUCKINGHAM; and arrangements have been made to accommodate one thousand persons. The entertainment is to commence at 5 o'clock precisely; and a public meeting will be held afterwards. It is understood that this Festival will be one of the most splendid ever given by any Teetotal Society in the metropolis.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

THIS excellent Society has lately redoubled its exertions to extend the circumference of its beneficial influence; and its endeavours have been attended with success. The meetings at the Chapel, Aldersgate-street, are now always crowded to excess. On Wednesday evening, March 10th, Mr. CRUMP (the Registrar) took the chair, and spoke of the diminution of crime in Ireland.

Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS took the objections of Anti-Teetotalers seriatim, and exposed their fallacy.

Mr. BENSTEAD delivered the best speech that we ever heard issue from the lips of this gentleman. He observed that, as the human understanding was liable to error, we should be especially cautious how we present our opinions to the public, with the view of establishing them as the guides of conduct for the use of others. This remark would show (said Mr. Benstead) the caution with which Anti-Teetotalers should come forward to propagate their opinions; but the same observation did not apply to Teetotalism, because that principle was an incontrovertible truth, and its excellence was self-evident.

Mr. CURRAH (of Chelsea) made a most eloquent speech, in which he implored the working men to take example from him, and give the principle he advocated a fair trial.

Mr. JOHNSON wound up the business of the evening, by expatiating very ably upon the effects already produced by Teetotalism in the country, and the results which were still to be anticipated from the same doctrine.

On Saturday evening, March 13th, the discussion was renewed between Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. BALLARD at the Aldersgate-street Chapel. Of all the astounding nonsense it has ever been our misfortune to hear, we never were before sickened with the like of that which fell from the lips of Mr. BALLARD. He possesses neither judgment, nor common sense; and even to mention his name for the purpose of dismissing him with the most unmitigated contempt, is paying him a compliment of which he is utterly unworthy. Mr. JOHNSON exposed the absurdity of all he said in a very admirable speech; and, by mutual consent, the decision was referred to the audience, of which by far the larger portion consisted of anti-teetotalers. Upon a show of hands, however, only twenty appeared for Mr. BALLARD, and about three hundred for Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. JOHNSON offered to lay a sovereign that Mr. Ballard could not prove any one of his assertions relative to alcohol, by chemical test; but neither Mr. Ballard nor all his troop of admirers chose to accept the proposition. An attempt was made to get up a shout for Mr. Ballard, but the feeble effort only bore the more striking testimony to the disgust which was entertained for the anti-teetotal champion by even his own party.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE of the United Temperance Association have decided that a GRAND TEA FESTIVAL shall be held on Easter Monday, at Mr. H. W. WATSON'S Temperance Hotel, Hackney. The members will meet at the Chapel in Aldersgate-street, and repair in Procession to Hackney, with the Grand Banner and flags of the Association and the Auxiliaries. The entertainment will commence at five o'clock precisely. Tickets, one shilling each, may be procured of Mr. EMBERTON, the Treasurer, 31, Fore-street, City. Several of the most popular Teetotal advocates will be present.

CHELSEA AUXILIARY TO THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS lectured to a crowded audience, on Monday evening March 8, at the Hall, George-street, Chelsea. A Tea-Meeting was held by this Auxiliary, on the 17th instant, at Tomlins' United Coffee-House, George-street, Chelsea. Tickets, 16

MR. DOWLING, the Secretary to this Auxiliary, requests us to state that Mr. BALFOUR, who has proclaimed that he is a member of the Society, is in no way connected with it.

LOVE.—True and faithful love is a restless feeling, which cannot exist without proving its existence by constant attentions to the object of that love. The true lover prefers the company of his mistress to every other, and to him no amusement is agreeable in which she does not partake.

Love is not Love,

Which alters where it alteration finds—

Or bends with the remover to remove;

O no! it is an ever fixed mark,

That looks on tempests and is never shaken.

It is the star to every wandering bark.

Whose worth's unknown although his height be taken.

Love's no time's fool, though rosy lips and cheeks

Within his bending sickle's compass come;

Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks,

But bears it out even to the edge of doom.

If this be error and upon me proved,

I never writ and no man ever loved.

ADVANTAGE OF LITERARY EMPLOYMENT.—It is surely not the least advantage of literary employment, that it enables us to live in a state of blissful ignorance of our next-door neighbour's fortune, faith, and politics; that produces a state of society which admits of no invasion on domestic privacy, and furnishes us with arms against ennui, which supersede the necessity of a standing army of elderly female moralists and domestic politicians.

We beg to call the attention of the Reader to the 9th Number of a second Series of Illustrations, which is given gratis with "THE TEETOTALER" of this day. The Series will be complete in Twelve Illustrations, and will be continued for as many consecutive weeks.

CHAPTER X.

THE HISTORY OF A MAN OF THE WORLD.

PART II.

MORE REFLECTIONS UPON MEN OF THE WORLD.—
THE SUCCESSFUL PROGRESS OF MR. FERGUSON'S
LOVE-AFFAIRS.—THE FLIGHT FROM LONDON.—
MR. FERGUSON PROCEEDS TO TAKE POSSESSION OF THE DOMAINS OF CAVALCANTI.

I NOW began to think that I was indeed a thorough "man of the world," and that I had played my cards with a tact which justified the assumption. I despised the "man of the world" of the old school; and drew a comparison between him and myself. He is a stickler for antiquity, and hates smooth chins and black beards; for their greenness and folly:—he is the repository of all the fragments of wisdom that are left of shipwrecked ages, and which have floated down upon the stream of time:—he gathers together the bits and ends of sayings which go to make up the traditional lore of a country; and this unbooked knowledge renders him, in his own opinion, sager than a man of much learning. But what was I? A young man who had studied the world according to the rules which observation had laid down. The best test of knowledge of the world, thought I, was the use to which it could be turned; and certainly a person who had so well profited by his experience as to be on the high road to marriage with a Duchess, was entitled to the honourable distinction of a "man of the world."

Perhaps you may have seen a man of the world under the shadow of a tavern sign-post, discoursing wisdom to the simple-hearted villagers. He has the infallible marks (according to English notions) of a truly great man legible in his face,—bloated veins and an indented excrescence surmounting his nose, and flaming like a fiery beacon with the condensed heat of unnumbered barrels of all "proofs." His libations to Bacchus have given a remarkable obscurity to the emanations of his intellect, as is discernable in the astonished countenances of those who stand around him, but who cannot fathom the profundity of his arguments. A flippant attorney is, perhaps, at his side; and the worthy twain discuss national politics, while the unsophisticated lookers-on stand mute, admiring the prodigious display of genius, which they cannot comprehend. The village magistrate imbibes ideas which astonish his natural stock of well-behaved ones, that never strayed beyond the hill-top in the distance, or flew off on a wild-goose chase after the phantoms of knowledge. This man of the world lays down his positions and fortifies them with the maxims he learned from his predecessor, who sleeps in the church-yard. The pettifogger capitulates to his invincible adversary, and acknowledges in him one whose dogmas it were irreverent to doubt.

But cast this "man of the world" amid the storms, the conflicting circumstances, and the rapidly successive occurrences of the busy world, and he finds himself totally lost. He is not therefore the "true man of the world," I thought within myself: but I was!

Self-satisfaction is a considerable auxiliary to success in life; and it was under the influence of sentiments of this species that I prosecuted my love-affair with renewed energy. Profiting by the advice of the elderly lady, I filled whole foolscap sheets with the wise appeals of love, and duly forwarded them to Mademoiselle Julie Talman. The replies were received with all possible dispatch; and thus did several weeks pass away in the most blissful state of hope and anticipation.

I mixed with but few acquaintances, and to them I never breathed a word of the good fortune which awaited me. I, however, dropped from time to time sundry hints that I was not long destined to remain in a humble sphere, and that I was too well acquainted with the world not to know how to carve out my own fortunes with success. My friends accordingly entertained a high opinion of me and my abilities; and I was looked on as a man of an experience far beyond my years. It had often been argued that a person could not become a "man of the world" until the shadows of fifty years or so were upon him, when he had exhausted the fountains of his wild blood and turned out a sage and a philosopher. It had been supposed that a man must run a long and labyrinthine gauntlet under the scourge of vices, before he could aspire to the character; and that he might then usurp the throne of wisdom, as his shoulders would be then legitimately invested with the purple of sin. The right to rule was thus imagined to be alone predicated on a youth of prostitution, a manhood of degradation, and an old age of impenitence. It therefore seemed as if I were destined to controvert these opinions, and to establish a new school of philosophy relative to real experience in the world.

My honour was therefore concerned in working out this adventure to a successful issue; and boldly and fearlessly did I sit down one fine morning and indite a letter, imploring that my happiness might be sealed by an immediate decision. The reply was charming, and reciprocal in enthusiastic anticipation of the joyous moment that was to unite us. But grave obstacles seemed to oppose the consummation of our wishes. The Duchess was watched by the Austrian ambassador, and every opposition would be thrown in the way of solemnizing our union in Paris. We were both of the Protestant religion, and the marriage could be legally celebrated nowhere in France save at the hotel of the Austrian ambassador. My experience, however, suggested a remedy; and that was a visit to England, where we could be legally united at Dover, or anywhere else. This suggestion was conveyed to my fair one; and the proposition seemed to delight her. A few more interchanges of letters settled and digested the whole plan.

It was also high time, for another reason, that something decided should be done; for nearly all my pecuniary resources were exhausted, in consequence of the extravagance of my mode of living, the dear rate at which some of my knowledge of the world had been acquired, and the sumptuous presents of jewellery which I had made to my beloved one, and which she had most graciously condescended to accept. I had, however, still a few hundred pounds to receive in England;—but of course all pecuniary embarrassments would cease the moment I became a rightful and legal owner of the magnificent domains of Cavalcanti.

It was at nine o'clock in the evening of a beautiful summer's day that I handed my intended and the elderly lady into a post-chaise which was waiting at the Barrière Saint Denis, agreeably to previous arrangement. The ladies arrived at that spot in a hackney-coach,—their trunks and bandboxes were speedily shifted,—the postillions cracked their whips,—and away, away we went, on the joyous errand of love!

"I hope your Highness has adopted precautions to avert all unpleasant suspicions relative to your absence," said I, as the carriage rolled rapidly along.

"My dear Walter," said she, with a smile of the most condescending amiability, "pray drop all ceremonious terms with one who is soon to be your wife. I have done everything that prudence could suggest at home."

I seized her fair hand in mine, and pressed it to my lips. The elderly lady at that moment pretended to see something uncommonly interesting out of the window next to her; and I accordingly took advantage of the opportunity to imprint a tender kiss upon the ruby lips of the lovely woman who was so shortly to become my bride. We chatted most pleasantly; and to all her numerous enquiries relative to my estates and titles, I made the most satisfactory replies. I saw that she was deeply enamoured of me; and I did not despair of easily obtaining her forgiveness for the little cheat I was practising upon her. "Besides," I argued with myself, "in love and war everything is fair."

We tarried not longer upon the road than was necessary to obtain refreshments and change horses; and on the ensuing evening we reached Boulogne. Fortunately a steam packet was about to leave for London; and we availed ourselves of this opportunity to cross the channel. On our arrival in the metropolis, we proceeded to a hotel at the west-end of the town; and I repaired to Doctors' Commons, to obtain a licence. My fair one had desired me to have her name registered simply in respect to her family appellation, and without the addition of the title of Cavalcanti. This reasonable request was complied with; and to be brief—in as short a time as possible we were married!

My wife insisted upon remaining a short time in England, and, to oblige her, I took a magnificent residence, ready furnished, at the west-end of the town. She now urged me to assume my proper title, Lord Ferguson, declaring that she would rather pass as Lady Ferguson until she had communicated with the Emperor of Austria relative to her marriage. I invented a thousand excuses to avoid complying with her request: but I soon found that she visited the most fashionable shops and "magazines of novelties" at the west-end, and ordered home immense quantities of articles of the wardrobe, and jewellery, upon credit, and in the name of Lady Ferguson. I saw that an explanation was now necessary, unless I wished to be sooner or later punished as a swindler by those whom my wife was thus innocently defrauding; and I trusted to her affection to pardon me.

"My dearest creature," said I to her one day, "I have something of the utmost importance to reveal to you. But first let me ask—do you really love me?"

"Most tenderly," she exclaimed, flinging her exquisitely modelled arms around my neck, and embracing me with the most fervent affection.

"And you could forgive any little error of which I might be guilty?" I continued.

"Anything but infidelity to one who loves you so tenderly," was her immediate reply.

"I thought so—I was not deceived," I ejaculated, quite elate with joy at this assurance. "Your charms, beloved one, have induced me to practise a deceit which nothing but the most tender attachment on my part could extenuate: but, after all, you lose nothing—because your own title is far more dignified than the one which I had assumed; and as to my fortune—even supposing I had possessed the few paltry thousands I have mentioned, they are nothing in comparison with the revenues of the vast domains of Cavalcanti."

A deep pallor overspread the lovely countenance of my wife, as I thus suffered her to obtain a glimpse of the true position of my affairs; and had I not have rushed forward to catch her in my arms, she would have fainted. I threw nearly a jug full of water upon her face, and thus succeeded in recovering her.

"What was it that I heard?" she exclaimed, as her eyes opened once more: "have you really practised that deceit upon me, or was I labouring under the influence of a dreadful vision?"

"Alas! it is too true, my beloved—" I began.

"Your beloved, indeed!" ejaculated my wife, her lips quivering with rage: "Oh! vile man—how could you have thus found it in your heart to deceive me?" and, as she uttered these words, she buried her face in the cushion of the sofa, and gave vent to her grief.

My great experience in the world had taught me that a woman's wrath will subside when the first ebullition of accompanying grief has passed; and I therefore resolved to allow my wife a fair opportunity of tranquillizing herself. I hastened out of the room—repaired to the Park to take a walk—dined in the evening with a friend—and only returned home at a very late hour.

I hurried to the drawing-room, in the anticipation of meeting with a forgiving smile upon the lips of my amiable wife; but my amiable wife was not there. I sought for her in the other rooms, and found her not. The elderly lady was also missing. I rang for my valet, and learnt that my wife and her companion had left the house, with bag and baggage, about an hour after I had gone out in the morning. All the plate, jewellery, and valuables, which had been obtained upon credit, had departed with them; and I was left to speculate upon this extraordinary conduct on the part of the Duchess of Cavalcanti!

I then threw myself upon the sofa, and began to reflect upon the events that had lately occurred. All my grand dreams of ambition seemed annihilated by the departure of my wife. I remembered that she was my wife—that I had the certificate of our marriage in my pocket,—and that all civilised laws allowed the husband a certain authority over her who is only conventionally his "better half." My course was therefore plain: I collected together all the money I could find at my disposal, and departed for Dover—forgetting, in the hurry of my proceedings, to leave any message for the numerous tradesmen who were accustomed to present themselves every day at my house for settlement of their accounts. I had not the slightest doubt that my wife and her elderly companion had proceeded to Paris; and to that city did I accordingly repair.

The moment I arrived in Paris, I hurried to the Hotel inhabited by the Duchess de Cavalcanti in the Rue de l'Université. The house was shut up. I addressed myself to a neighbour, and ascertained that the Duchess and all her suite, occupying six carriages, had taken their departure at an early hour that very morning on their return to Germany. I was by no means disheartened by this announcement, but determined to follow my disobedient spouse without delay. I returned to Meurice's, ordered a post-chaise and four to be got ready immediately; and, in a short time, was on my way towards Lyons.

How I chuckled at this adventure as I rolled along the road at a rapid pace. I laughed at the idea of the Duchess endeavouring to cheat a "man of the world," such as I was; and, with the marriage certificate in my pocket, I determined to defy all the Duchesses of Cavalcanti and all the Emperors of Austria in the world to dissolve our union, or prevent me from exercising the rights and enjoying the privileges of a husband.

I found by enquiry that I was only about eight hours' ride behind the cavalcade of the illustrious Duchess; but although I remunerated the postillions most liberally, I could not succeed in diminishing this distance. At length, I was detained for upwards of six hours on the road, for want of post-horses; and on the following day an accident occurred to my vehicle, which placed the interval of upwards of twenty-four hours' journey between me and the carriages of the Duchess. On my arrival at Lyons, I found that the Duchess and her suite had passed a night at the Hotel Royal in that city; and I was so wearied and exhausted, that I was compelled to do the same.

To be brief, I entered the domains of the Duchess of Cavalcanti precisely twenty-four hours after her own cavalcade. I ascertained, by enquiry, that the ducal residence was in the neighbourhood of a considerable town bearing the name of the estate itself; and that preparations had been made at the palace for the reception of the Duchess, whose speedy arrival had been announced by an avant-courier, who had reached the place of destination two days previously. I accordingly proceeded to the town of Cavalcanti, and took up my abode at the principal hotel, where I recruited my strength with several hours of repose and rest.

I learned that the Duchess of Cavalcanti intended to give a grand entertainment, consisting of a banquet and masked ball, in the course of a day or two, to the nobility and gentry of the vicinity. An ingenious idea now struck me. I resolved to avail myself of that opportunity to present myself to the Duchess, and, under the guise of a mask, gradually reveal myself to her. By these means I hoped to avoid any unnecessary scandal or exposure. I accordingly remained within the precincts of the hotel during the day, and at night, I strolled about the vicinity of the ducal abode. The grounds were all laid out in a beautiful manner; but I saw room for several alterations and improvements after the French and English style, and I resolved to carry them into effect the moment I entered into possession of the property I thus surveyed.

Pleased with the prospects of speedily arriving at the acme of my ambition, I returned to the hotel, and dreamt all night long of the existence of peace, honour, and prosperity which I now imagined myself destined to lead in the domains of Cavalcanti: on the following day I made preparations for the masked ball; and at the proper hour, attired as a Spanish cavalier, with a black mask over my face, I presented myself at the gate of the palace.

"Your card?" said the porter.

"I have forgotten it," said I; but as I uttered these words, I dropped a couple of gold coins into the hand of the porter, and the bribe acted as a charm to procure admittance into the palace.

I passed through several noble halls, and at length arrived in a spacious saloon, opening upon a beautiful lawn, where a number of the guests had already dispersed into separate groupes. The lawn communicated with the most delicious gardens; and on every side were tables covered with the choicest fruits, the most fragrant flowers, and the most refreshing drinks. Domestic, in gorgeous liveries, were running about in all directions, to attend upon the guests; and a band of music was stationed beneath a colonnade that shaded the windows of the saloon. In a word, all around me bore testimony to the immense wealth and exquisite taste of the Duchess of Cavalcanti.

And then, when I surveyed that splendid palace built in the purest style of Corinthian architecture,—those Elysian grounds that surrounded it,—and the broad lands that lay beyond, far as the eye could reach, with the towers and spires of the neighbouring town varying the scene, my heart leapt within me, for I felt that I was the master—the proprietor—the legitimate owner of all I saw! Oh! then, how did I felicitate myself upon having devoted my time and money to obtain that knowledge of the world which had alone endowed me with a sufficiency of perseverance to arrive at this climax of earthly happiness!

It was rumoured that a trifling indisposition would prevent the Duchess from being present at the ball, but that she would preside at the banquet which was to take place afterwards. The dancing accordingly commenced in the saloon, and on the lawn; and a more charming spectacle I had never before and never since have seen. Costumes of all kinds—fancy-dresses—and garbs, either grotesque, gay, or remarkable for their simplicity—thronged around; and many a beautiful countenance was concealed by the invidious mask. The moment twilight commenced, the gardens were illuminated with myriads of lamps of all colours; and the dancing ceased, to enable the guests to wander in small parties, or pairs, amidst that fairy scenery. I had taken no share in the dance: my suspense was too acute, and my heart too elate with joy, to allow me to mingle with the crowd. I kept myself aloof, and wandered alone about the perfume-breathing gardens.

At length the band gave notice that the banquet was about to commence. An immense saloon had been erected and fitted up for the occasion at one extremity of the garden; and the Duchess, with her suite of ladies and attendants, was now about to issue from the palace, and proceed to the banquetting room. At this intimation, the guests all crowded upon the lawn, and formed themselves into two lines to welcome the Duchess as she passed between them. Every mask was then laid aside out of respect; and much amusement ensued by this revelation of countenances amongst those who had been previously acquainted. Suddenly I felt my arm touched, and a well-known voice asked me, in the French language, how I came there. I turned round, and recognised the French gentleman who, you will remember, urged me to prosecute my suit with the Duchess, and whom I had met at Meurice's in Paris.

I was about to reply to him, when at that moment the band struck up a lively air, and the procession of ladies advanced from the palace towards the lawn. In the midst of those who opened the cavalcade, was one remarkable for her extraordinary beauty and the richness of her attire.

"Who is the lady that wears the coronet glittering with diamonds?" said I to my French friend.

"What!" he exclaimed; "have you so soon forgotten the fair face of which you are enamoured? or does the blaze of light dazzle your eyes?"

"Neither," said I, hastily, while my heart beat with unusual violence: "but who is the lady—speak—I am deeply anxious to know at once!"

"That lady," returned my friend, "whose majesty of beauty attracts all eyes and captivates all hearts,—that lady is her Highness, the Duchess of Cavalcanti!"

"The Duchess of Cavalcanti!" I exclaimed: "impossible!"

"Nay—your eyes might convince you of the fact without my assurance," said the French gentleman; "and—see—she acknowledges the salutations of her guests."

For some minutes I was speechless, and knew not what to think. In the meantime the cavalcade passed on; and suddenly my eyes fell upon a countenance which was well impressed upon my mind. Not amongst the ladies of the Duchess's household, but amongst the attendants of those ladies, did I now suddenly recognise my wife.

"And she—who is she?" I demanded of my friend, a cold perspiration breaking out on my forehead.

"The lady's maid—the cameriste—the soubrette, or whatever you may choose to denominate her, of her Highness," was the immediate reply.

"And her name?" said I, hastily.

"Julie Talman," he answered.

I neither waited to hear, nor to see more. I immediately comprehended the cheat of which I had been the victim; and I cursed such knowledge of the world as I possessed. With precipitate steps did I quit the precincts of a scene whose joyousness was far from congenial with the state of my reflections; and when I arrived at the hotel in the neighbouring town, I threw myself upon my bed, and gave way to my infelicitous musings.

All was now revealed to me. Two of the servants of the Duchess had visited the Opera, and I must needs take the lady's maid for the mistress. She perceived my mistake, took advantage of it, and married me, because she fancied she was espousing a lord with an immense fortune. Probably she entertained the same idea as I had nourished—that my affection would induce me to pardon the cheat. No wonder that she fled from London, with her elderly confederate (how I abominate all elderly women!) when she found that she had married a pauper, a literal pauper; and she had evidently arrived in Paris again in time to set off with her mistress on the return to the domains of Cavalcanti!

I had no anxiety to meet my wife; and, abashed, humbled, and crest-fallen, I took my departure from the town on the ensuing morning. My pecuniary resources scarcely enabled me to reach England; and on my arrival in London, I was thrown into a debtors' gaol for the debts contracted by my wife. I obtained my release by means of the Insolvents' Court, and have been sadly knocked about ever since. One thing is, however, very certain,—I am now, but I was not then, entitled to the honourable distinction of a Man of the World!

Mr. Weller entered the room to lay the cloth, just as Mr. Ferguson brought his eventful history to a conclusion. Mr. Pickwick passed a very pleasant afternoon with his new acquaintance, and decided upon taking the house, in order that he might find an excuse for relieving Mr. Ferguson's pecuniary difficulties. He accordingly supplied this gentleman with the necessary means to satisfy the demand of the individuals who still lurked about the door; and then took leave of the "man of the world."

(To be continued in our next.)

DRINKING CUSTOMS.

No sooner does some evil indulgence become apparently consecrated by use than collateral habits and customs are introduced to render the first more strongly established. The evil habit of drinking is associated with a variety of observances and practices which sustain and foster it with a vigour that essentially increases the opposition against which Teetotalism has to contend. The practice of drinking healths is one to which we allude. Nothing can be more absurd than to drink to a person's health in that liquor which is the cause of all ill-health. "Good wine can do no one any harm," say the followers of the evil indulgence. Alas! they are ignorant that the alcohol or spirit is the same in good or bad wine, and that, when separated in the stomach by the process of digestion, from the other matters with which it is combined, its influence is invariably the same. The compounds mixed with the alcohol may vary as to quality; but the spirit itself is always the same—always hurtful!

"I drink to your health and long life," says a friend, meaning to pay another a compliment; and of course the imagined or intended compliment is returned in a similar manner. Is not this the same as saying, "I pledge you in a glass of poison; pledge me in that same poison in return." We admit that the wish is sincere; but the manner of conveying it constitutes a direct and fearful antithesis.

At all public dinners it would appear necessary to drink a variety of toasts, which might as well be drunk in water or coffee as in wine—and which, in most instances, had better be dispensed with altogether. A loyal subject cannot express his attachment to the Queen without burning away the coats of his stomach with fiery liquid, and placing himself in a position to break the laws of the kingdom governed by the very sovereign whom he so ardently admires. If two friends meet after a long separation, they must pledge each other in a glass; and so, by drinking to the memory of past times, they speedily forget all about the present. Probably these two same affectionate friends, who have been so loving over their cups, will terminate their conviviality by stripping off their coats and "pitching into each other;" or else, if they be in the upper walks of life, they will dispute about a trifle, and fight a duel on the following morning. When a bargain is to be concluded, the contracting parties must "wet it," as they express themselves; and the result is, that those who agreed very well when they were sober become dreadfully quarrelsome when intoxicated. If a man receive any sudden good tidings, he must drink to his own success; and if he experience as abrupt an accession of evil fortune, he then drinks to drive away his care. He drinks because he is happy; and he drinks because he is miserable; he blows hot and cold with the same mouth.

"I really feel so low and depressed," says another, "that I must take a glass of something;" and this one drinks to create a flow of artificial spirits. Does he not know that, when the effect of the liquor shall have passed away, his depression will be greater than ever? "And I feel myself so very happy and comfortable to-day," says another, "I shall indulge myself with a glass." What is the use of adding excitement to excitement? Is not the natural glow of happiness which attends upon health and competency, sufficient to ensure mortal felicity? Alas! for the excuses which your drinkers find in all the circumstances of life!

The individual who is addicted to the use of liquor, drinks because he is cold—drinks because he is warm—and drinks because the weather is so very temperate and mild. When in the enjoyment of the most robust health, he drinks to "do himself good." And yet he knows that strong drink "does all the harm" which he sees around him.

The drinking customs of the country are the most absurd that ever became established by an habitual use. They are a combination of contradictions, and are supposed to be as universal in their modes of application as those patent medicines which cure all diseases. On the wedding-day, the wine stands upon the table; and the health of the happy couple is pledged in bumpers of champagne. On the day when some beloved relative or dear friend is conveyed to the tomb, cake and wine meet the eyes upon the side-board in the house of mourning. Truly the use of wine in one of these cases, at least, must be a mockery—a blasphemy—a crime!

If a master meets an old servant, or an operative who was once in his service, he thinks he cannot do better than treat him with something to drink. If a gentleman sends his friend a present by his footman, the friend gives the footman a shilling, and then says, "You must have a drop of something to keep the cold out, or to cheer you on your way home; what shall it be?" When two acquaintances meet in the street, they stand chattering for a few minutes,—then one begins to get fidgety,—and at length the words, "Well—ain't we going to take a drop together?" fall from his lips. The other regards this question as a matter of course, walks mechanically into the next gin-palace, and contents himself by saying to his friend when they reach the bar, "Well, what shall it be?" If you only go a few miles out of town by a short stage-coach, the driver gets down at every public house he reaches, and comes out of the place again smacking his lips. Wet or dry—cold or hot—day or night,—a ready excuse can always be found for taking a little drop. Indeed, the countenances of many drinkers almost seem to have stamped upon them the question, "Well, what shall it be?"

England is a most extraordinary country for its drinking customs. No public meeting can be held to debate upon political matters, to establish a joint-stock company, to consider a parochial measure, or to vote an address, without strong drinks being more or less connected with it. The assembly is held at a tavern or public house; and no one departs without offering a libation to Bacchus. The churchwardens of a parish cannot concert measures to assist the starving poor, without meeting together to dine and drink first. A person is not even thought a "thorough gentleman" unless he can tell good port wine! As if any poison could be good!

On particular days, the paupers in workhouses and the children of national schools are regaled with roast beef and plum-pudding, to which is superadded an allowance of malt liquor. It would really seem as if the use of alcoholic liquors were an essential condition of human existence. Little children are permitted to visit the parlour on a Sunday, after dinner; and then they are regaled with a little wine. "Do give the poor child a drop," says the mistaken mother to the equally misguided father; and even in infancy a relish for strong liquor is thus imparted to the child. No wonder that it becomes wedded to a habit which has progressed with its growth, which has been strengthened with advancing years, and which has received no check to the insinuating powers of its influence.

If a beggar faints for want, upon the threshold of a charitable man's door, hot spirits and water or wine are given to him; and food becomes quite a secondary consideration with all save the starving wretch himself. In fine, strong liquor is given as a reward for a service, and as a medicine to the sick;—it is considered a remedy by the wretched, and a blessing by the happy;—it is used to expel the cold, and to moderate the heat;—it is imbibed to aid digestion, and to prevent food from rising upon the stomach;—it is considered necessary to the strong and to the weak, to the well-fed and the starving, to the healthy and the dying, the old man and the young; to the labourer, who toils all day, and to the rich man who does nothing. Is not the absurdity of a belief in the virtues of strong liquor, demonstrated by these contradictions? Will any sensible man believe that any quack medicine can be an universal remedy? And yet this property seems to be continually assigned to alcohol. But Teetotalism will effectually dissipate this delusion, will expose the absurdity of the drinking customs of the country, and will prove that alcohol is a virulent poison, which can only be used, even as a medicine, in a very few cases.

THE EMPRESS JOSEPHINE.

JOSEPHINE ROSE TASCHER DE LA PAGÈRIE was a native of Martinique; and, when very young, proceeded to France to marry the Viscount Beauharnais. Two children were the fruit of this union. The viscount was beheaded at the commencement of the revolution; but little did he dream that his scaffold was destined to be the first step to that throne on which his widow was fated to sit. Josephine possessed an elegant mind, and was endowed with great personal beauty. Her dancing is said to have been perfect; and her figure was modelled with the most faultless symmetry. A love of flowers, that truly feminine aspiration, was, with her, increased by a perfect knowledge of botany; and thus were her thoughts led to converse with heaven through the sweetest objects of earth.

A circumstance, trifling in itself but for after events, deserves to be recorded here—the prophetic intimation of Josephine, when little advanced beyond childhood, of her future high destinies. We need not express our utter rejection of the supposition that the propheticess believed her own prediction. We see, in the course of Josephine's history, that her remembrance of it aided to direct the course of events towards its fulfilment. Still its coincidence, with a course of events which could be so directed, remains a startling fact. An old woman, vulgarly called a fortune-teller, prophesied that Josephine would one day be queen of France.

Shortly before the execution of her husband, the Viscount Beauharnais, Josephine was herself arrested by order of the revolutionary tribunal, and conveyed to prison. One morning the gaoler entered the room, which served as a bed-room for herself, the Duchess d'Aiguillon, and two other ladies, saying that he came to take away her flock bed, in order to give it to another captive. "How give it?" cried the Duchess; "is Madame de Beauharnais to have a better?" "No, no," replied the wretch; "she will not need one; she is to be taken to a new lodging, and from thence to the guillotine." At these words all the ladies set up a loud lamentation. Josephine was, however, the first to recover her presence of mind: she laughed and declared that it was impossible that she could die, as it was destined that she should become the queen of France! Madame d'Aiguillon, feeling herself ill from the thoughts of her friend's approaching execution, drew towards the window, which Josephine opened in order to admit the air. At that moment, the ladies heard a great noise in the corridor; and the formidable voice of the turnkey, who was speaking to his dog, cried out, "Get away, you brute of a Robespierre!" This energetic phrase convinced the ladies that there was nothing then to fear—that Robespierre had fallen, and that France was saved. In a few minutes, they beheld their companions in misfortune burst into their apartment to give them the details of that grand event. It was the 9th of Thermidor! Josephine's flock bed was restored to her; and upon that couch she passed the most delightful night of her life. She fell asleep, after saying to her companions, "You see I am not guillotined—and I shall yet be queen of France!"

Josephine married General Bonaparte, who loved her with a species of delirium. Barras promised to give him the command of the army of Italy; and on that occasion Bonaparte observed, "Those who now patronise me will one day seek my smiles. My sword is by my side, and with it will I carve my own road to fortune." When Bonaparte wrote from Italy to inform his wife that he intended to raise himself one day to the throne of France, she hastened to address him a letter imploring him not to attempt "so rash an undertaking." She said—"Kings will despise you as an upstart; the people will hate you as a usurper; your equals will call you a tyrant; none will comprehend the utility of your elevation; but all will assign it to ambition or to pride."

In a short time the prediction made to Josephine in her youth was fulfilled. The hero of a thousand fights led his beautiful wife to be crowned Empress of France in the cathedral of Notre Dame. "The magnificent carriage in which he and Josephine were seated, advanced, attended by ten thousand horsemen, the flower of Gallic chivalry, who defiled between double lines of infantry selected from the bravest soldiers, and extending about a mile and a half, while more than five hundred thousand spectators filled up every space whence a glance could be obtained. Alas! how cold are hearts that then beat high with hope! How few—how very few survived of those upon whom the impulse wrought most stirring! and from the banks of the Tagus to the streams of the Volga, how varied the clime that settles on their graves! Yet not many years have passed—the story is contemporary history—the grand actor might have been amongst us not an aged man: be the moral, therefore, more impressively ours! When Napoleon had placed the imperial diadem upon his own brow, he took the crown which was destined for Josephine, and placed it upon her head. The appearance of Josephine was at this moment most touching. Even then she had not forgotten that she was once an "obscure woman;" tears of deep emotion fell from her eyes; she remained for a space kneeling, with hands crossed upon her bosom,—then slowly and gracefully rising, fixed upon her husband a look of gratitude and tenderness. Napoleon returned the glance. It was a silent but conscious interchange of the hopes, the promises, and the memories of years. Thus was the prophecy fulfilled,—and Josephine became the queen—nay, more, the empress of France!

On the 30th of November, 1809, the emperor and empress dined together as usual. Both were unhappy and pre-occupied. Josephine struggled with her tears, which, in spite of every effort, flowed from her eyes. She uttered not a word during that sorrowful meal; she saw that her sunshine had passed away! Directly after coffee, Napoleon dismissed every one, and he and Josephine remained alone together. Napoleon rose, took her hand, and placed it upon his heart. "Josephine, my excellent Josephine," said he, "thou knowest that I have loved thee! To thee—to thee alone do I owe the only moments of happiness which I have enjoyed in this world. Josephine, my destiny overmasters my will! My dearest affections must be sacrificed before the interests of France!"—"Say no more," cried Josephine; "I was prepared for this; I knew that the day of our separation was come; but the blow is not the less mortal!" Thus was it that Napoleon communicated to his beloved and loving wife—to whom he had been now wedded upwards of fourteen years—that project of divorce which was to make way for his union with an archduchess of Austria.

The divorce formally took place in the presence of Cambaceres, prince and arch-chancellor of the empire, and the family of the Bonapartes. When the emperor had signed the document on his part, Josephine spoke as follows:—"By the permission of my dear and august consort I declare that, not preserving any hope of having children, which hope would alone fulfil the objects of his policy and the interests of France, I am pleased to afford him the greatest proof of attachment and devotion which has ever been given on earth. I possess all from his bounty. It was his hand which crowned me, and which seated me on a throne; and I have received nothing but proof of affection and love from the French people. I think I prove myself grateful in consenting to the dissolution of a marriage which heretofore was an obstacle to the welfare of France, by depriving it of the happiness of being one day governed by the descendants of a great man, raised up by Providence to efface the evils of a terrible revolution, and to re-establish the altar, the throne, and social order. But the dissolution of my marriage will in no degree change the sentiments of my heart. The emperor will ever find in me his best friend. I know how much this act, demanded by policy, and by interests of a high ture, has affected my heart; but both of us exult in the sacrifice which we make for the good of the country."

Josephine withdrew from the palace of the Tuileries to Malmaison, where she died on the 29th of May, 1814, five years after the dissolution of her marriage with Napoleon.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Doft Tom's last poetic effusion is much too long for our columns: a shorter one would suit better.

We thank a Salford Teetotaler for his kindness in calling our attention to the observation of Mr. Justice Coleridge, during the present Assizes, "that no single case had ever been brought before him of persons charged with the commission of offences, but that the love of liquor had been in some way connected with it."

H. W. S. is assured that the Report never reached us. We never refuse insertion to such articles; but on the contrary, are glad to receive them. The immense circulation of The Teetotaler renders it a most eligible organ for the publication of the Reports of Teetotal Progress, Meetings, &c. THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, MARCH 27, 1841.

PATRIOTS are those who set a high example of particular virtues which are most needed for their age; and hence the different hues the character of a patriot wears at different times. Our idea of the patriot is a very exalted one; for when a great man becomes illustrious as a national benefactor, we gather about him all the virtues which are supposed to embellish human nature. We think of him as gentle and merciful, generous and devoted—as living for great ends—and as being endowed with enlarged powers of understanding. Nothing disturbs the calm thoughtfulness of his demeanour; and his eyes seem to be looking far around him, beyond all others' gaze, as if taking in the knowledge of that future which the present is for ever sealing for eternity. To be styled a patriot is a rare honour; and few men are permitted to enjoy this embalming. When governments were supported by arms, and war was the business of nations—when conquest of territory was the great object of kings, courage was glory; and the ready sacrifice of life for the public good was sung as the highest praise. History is full of remarkable deeds, which give to the patriotism of the ancients the appearance of an impulse rather than a principle—of a passionate love, rather than a holy regard. But to love one's country dearly is the first step to loving the world well; and as the heathen worship of false gods is the beginning of religion, so this blind and headlong passion for country is the commencement of an universal philanthropy.

Thus is it that the modern patriot is the philanthropist, who feels that no permanent good can be produced for the soil of his nativity which will not benefit mankind at large. He looks beyond the narrow circle of his own advantage to the large brotherhood of nations, and sees the bearing of every political and moral act—for moralists are the best patriots—upon the long chain of human interests around the globe.

It is this enlarged regard that renders the patriot now infinitely superior, in fact, though less remarkable in individual acts, to the patriot of the old world, who looked upon his country as the point of his benevolence, and upon the human race without his territory, as his natural enemies. If, then, there be this distinction between the shades of patriotism; and if patriotism be indeed philanthropy, who are more worthy of the appellation than the advocates of Teetotalism? Teetotalism is eminently patriotic in its views. Its object is the regeneration of society—the reformation of the moral world—the extermination of all the vices caused by intemperance. The Teetotaler is not selfish, because he has no evil passions to administer to in inculcating his doctrines. He is not envious, because he does not seek to raise his own glories on the ruins of a good system. He is not jealous, because his aim is something more than mere rivalry. He is not arbitrary, because his only weapons are sense and reason. He does not preach the theory of an eccentric imagination, because the practice of his principle has been embraced and continued by millions. He is not exclusive, because his temples are open to the rich and the poor, the Christian and the heathen, the upright man and the sinner. His doctrines are not calculated to produce evil results, because their grand and certain effect is the decrease of crime. Surely such a man possesses all the qualifications to deserve the appellation of patriot!

Every man who embraces and advocates the doctrines of Teetotalism is a patriot; for all, whatever be their rank or occupations, who regard the interests of their fellow creatures, are patriots. "To be a man is greater than to be a king," and occupation cannot take away this birthright. The poor man who toils to educate his children, and the poor widow who does mean offices that she may get money to clothe her fatherless little ones, and make them tidy enough to go to the Sunday-school, are patriots—both he and she. May every Englishman, whether a leader of armies, or a private soldier—whether a senator or a tradesman—whether an owner of the soil, or a breaker of the glebe—whether rich or poor, embrace the doctrine of moral reformation, and he will become a patriot. No splendid train of events is necessary to give him this title: no extensive butcheries of his kind are requisite to form this character. He may gain it in the honest discharge of a great social duty, by joining the phalanx of those whose serried ranks are arrayed against the cause of human crime and misery, and by bearing his testimony, by the light God has shed abroad in his heart, to that principle which he thinks to be right and expedient for his country.

We have, we trust, rightly defined true patriotism; and we have shown who are the true patriots of the present day. We must not be misled by the showy deeds and splendid achievements of a confined and circumscribed devotion. We must not measure our love, nor regulate our actions by models that are only admirable when viewed in their connexion with the time at which they occurred, and with the people of an illiterate generation. We must recognise only those to be patriots, whose good actions or influence emanate from the purest motives of philanthropy. It is when judged by this standard that NAPOLEON sinks in the scale of greatness as a patriot; for, whatever advantages may have resulted to Europe from the wars of NAPOLEON—from the breaking up of time-honoured abuses—from the overturning of thrones that had become incrustured and firm in the very miseries of the human race,—we must still view them as the accidental results of his ambition, rather than the design of his conduct. He was like the river that, swollen by the mountain streams, overflows its banks, and bears desolation in its progress, but which fattens the soil it desolates, covering the rocks with verdure, and making the barren fields glad in an unwonted harvest.

But the REV. THEOBALD MATHEW is a true patriot:—

From lowest place whence virtuous things proceed,
The place is dignified by the doer's deed:
Where great additions swell, and virtue none,
It is a dropt honour:—good alone
Is good without a name: vileness is so
The property by which it is should go,
Not by the title!

So said Shakspeare;—and here we are furnished with a correct definition of the time and place when virtuous deeds deserve the name. The men who fought for liberty, and gained it, possessed no new powers: they but exerted energies that had slumbered in the human mind for ages. And it is a set of cant phrases and meaningless forms that cause man to put himself low—not in humility, for he is generally wicked and grasping in his rags, but in an habitual and inherited abasement, before certain accidental circumstances of life, different from, but not morally better than his own. But the modern patriot—the Teetotaler—affects no humility, because true philanthropy is a stranger to affectations of all kinds. We ere now alluded to FATHER MATHEW, and we did so because he is deservedly eminent in the Temperance Reformation. We were about to say, that the deeds of this man flow from a pure philanthropy, and are based upon that patriotism which is not an accidental result, but which is the settled design of his conduct. The aims of FATHER MATHEW are directed towards the extirpation of that standing army of drunkards and moderate drinkers whose habits and whose example are a moral curse to the world. He is anxious to annihilate that fatal indulgence which fosters in the community a set of men who live upon excitement, who have almost nothing at stake in common with the rest of the inhabitants, who feel little interest in the moral movements of the time, but who rejoice in mischief, dissipation, debauchery, and crime. The advocates of Moderation defend a school which is now proved to be totally incompetent to prepare a man for the discharge of quiet duties, and for the performance of those every-day pursuits which ought to carry the world along in the way to perfection. The study of ancient customs has introduced false ideas into the minds of individuals, of what they are themselves, and what they owe the world; and the true patriotism of the present day endeavours to abrogate those absurd notions. Those who approach the advocate of Teetotal principles, may ask themselves, "What does he require of us? What does he say? Will he instruct or console us? or will he cast us down and corrupt us? Shall we be benefitted by his advice? or is his language like the perfidious lyre which the victorious Persians placed in the hands of the Lydians whom they were desirous of enervating?" To all this can Teetotalism give favourable and assuring replies.

The time will come when those journals which entered first into the world of Teetotal literature will be referred to as the oracles from which is to be obtained an acquaintance with those patriots who first embraced and propagated the great doctrine of Teetotalism; and the names which those journals record will be associated with the most honourable sentiments and reminiscences. With what feelings of delight will descendants of those whose patriotic views and deeds are there recorded, turn to the pages which describe the campaigns of their sires and grandsires against the army of the intemperate! It is a glorious spectacle to behold the working man laying aside the implements of his calling, and proceeding to the Temperance Halls to teach lessons of morality and virtue which senators and statesmen might be proud to inculcate; and it will be a fine subject for the reflection of posterity—this sudden and mighty reformation!

THE MISERIES OF FAT.

As I am the most unhappy man in the world, I conclude that I must be the most bilious, though no one would think so to look at me. Bile bestows upon its possessor a sentimentally yellow skin and thin hollow cheeks to match: mine is of a rosy red, and my cheeks—Boreas might borrow them when his own are fatigued by his trumpet-blowing; but my mind is bilious enough; my soul swims in a sea of sentiment. I am imaginative, plaintive, melancholy, moonish, and much given to love and poetry. To suit such a character a man should be tall and slender, have a long, or at least, an oval face, black hair, a long nose, and sadly pensive eyes. Alas! I have a face like a Dutch painter's angel; a nose, that, having no length, honestly makes up the deficiency in breadth, and literally stretches from ear to ear; straight sandy hair; and a pair of peering light grey eyes that would be a virtue in the head of a Chinese. Now, imagine this person joined to a mind like mine! Think of such a mind imprisoned in this enormous mass of fat, which I am compelled to drag about with me, a solid burthen! My person is worthy of my name, but not of my qualifications!

And that name! Oh! reader—if you happen to be particular in patronymics, you will certainly pity me—for it is not the least of my griefs! From my forefathers I derived the graceful name of Bullock, to which my godfathers and godmothers (heaven forgive them for it, for I never shall) had the cruelty to prefix the appellation of Nathaniel!

But let me recount my "bills," in order to get rid of it. I am a country-gentleman, born in Kent, and my education complete. As soon as I came, into my property, I began to look around me in search of a wife. My native village of Nutsby is not important enough to be marked upon the map; but it is a very consequential place for all that. And decidedly the ornament of that village was Mary Bacon, the daughter of the principal farmer. Her father was a tough, thick-headed, sententious old fellow, who knew everything better than anybody else, even to the spelling of your own name. His character was so well known and appreciated by young and old, in the village, that he was universally distinguished by the name of "Friar Bacon." The mother passed for a wit in her way; and when my attentions to the daughter began to be noticed, she observed that there was not much of a change from Bacon to Bullock. I leave any body, who takes into consideration my nervousness upon the subject of my name, to imagine what I must have suffered from these witticisms of this Rib of Bacon; but Mary looked encouragement, and I bore it all, even to be called (by anticipation) "son Bullock" by her precious mother.

Mary accepted my offer; and the marriage was to take place some months later, in the autumn, that, as Friar Bacon said, "we might have time to become acquainted during the summer," the delicious season of long walks and love-tales!

All went on smoothly, and, except in some instances, I had no reason to doubt the truth of Mary's assertion of reciprocal affection. Sometimes, indeed, a little serious thought would steal in to startle away my confidence; for I once or twice caught Mary's eyes fixed in earnest contemplation of my person, from whence they would wander to my face. There was a look of cunning in those otherwise mild eyes, while they were occupied in making this examination: then that cunning look grew into a smile, which travelled down to her mouth, curling it with an expression of derision which was but too apparent to me. I asked her as gently as I could whether it was my person that filled her imagination, and inspired her with contempt for me. "Oh! Mr. Bullock," said she, "how can you say anything so unkind?"—and she almost wept at the injustice of my suspicions.

Things were in this condition when a London projector—a speculator, a builder—came down to make "improvements" at Nutsby. He had calculated beforehand upon the support of the squire, the folly of the farmers, and the tender hearts of their daughters. He was a small, slender, sprightly, puppy-like looking fellow, possessing great volubility of language, dressed extravagantly fashionable, and in person and manners a downright caricature of London second-rates. He had projected such "improvements" at Nutsby as would have obliterated the village under the massive magnificence of his "new square," and its half dozen of branching streets. With the bundle of splendour for Nutsby, to which he had been kind enough to add a plan for pulling down my house to the ground, and building it up as a Grecian temple, he had the impudence to call upon me, demand my patronage, and, finding me dumb with astonishment, requested to have my commands. Yes—I did give him my commands:—I commanded him to clear my house of his person and his schemes.

I don't know how it happened; but this fellow—this Mr. Percival Pipkin—grew intimate in the family of Friar Bacon. It was spring; and he was of all our tea and walking parties. Mary had been taught to sing by the parish-clerk; and Mr. Pipkin grinned and screamed something, which he told us was singing Italian, but which made all the farmers' dogs howl, and frightened the parrot into silence. Mary always took Mr. Pipkin's arm, and walked on, when we went into the country, leaving me behind to laugh at her mamma's wit, or edify by her papa's wisdom, as the case might be. Pipkin, who hated me for yawning while he was singing an Italian scena, seemed to seek occasions to torment me; but in such a cautious manner that I did not know what I had to resent. Mary however did laugh sometimes: Percival Pipkin only smiled—he was afraid to do more; but I could have cut his scraggy throat for that!

The summer months wore away; and the time fixed for our marriage was fast approaching. Thinking that Mary would shortly be my wife, and that then I should be at liberty to send Pipkin to pour forth his Italian roulades elsewhere, I took care to betray no jealousy of his intimacy in the house, as I knew I should offend my intended bride. But I could not but remark that they were a great deal together: there was an intimacy between them which I did not share,—secrets which were always hidden from me. I grew fretful, nervous, peevish, unhappy. I did not know how to act, but I grew daily more melancholy. One evening, while walking out in the twilight, I arrived at the extremity of the village, and seated myself upon the edge of a dry well, which, being disused, had been more than half filled up to prevent accidents, and now served as a gossip rendezvous for the young and old of the parish. Looking for want of something better to do, into the well, I thought I saw something sparkle amongst the rubbish, which I immediately decided must be a ring that Mary had dropped near this spot some days before. I immediately sought and found a long pole, to assist me to recover my beloved's lost property, and set to work to hook it up; but, in straining too much, and depending on my pole, on which I leaned with all my weight, which it could not bear, I broke it in two; and instead of sending down the hook to fetch up the ring, went in myself, head foremost, to the bottom of the well. Had it been in its original state, I must have been killed; but, as it was, I arrived at the bottom with no other harm than some cruel bruises; though, when I recovered my senses, I believed, from the impossibility I found to get upon my legs, that every bone in my body was broken. "Heavens!" said I; "how will it be possible for any surgeon to set these bones through this mass of flesh? The thing is impossible! I shall be disfigured for life! Mary will refuse me, and Pipkin will rejoice. Oh! rather than live upon such terms, I will let myself die where I am!"

With this resolution, I placed myself as comfortably as I could, in order to die at my leisure; for, believing my limbs to be all dislocated, and feeling tired of life, I did not attempt to call for assistance. I was reposing in this state of morbid melancholy, waiting the arrival of my last moments, when two persons approached the well, and sat down upon the edge of it. Their backs were turned to me; but I could perceive that they were a man and a woman. Presently the man spoke! It was the voice of Pipkin!

"Well, well, Mary," said he, "I did not intend to vex you; but I was really afraid that you more than half liked that fellow Bullock. I wish he was at the bottom of this well, with all my heart."

Such was the observation of Mr. Percival Pipkin. But Mary's answer—what would that be? He went on talking, and gave me time to raise myself up, which I did not now find impossible, for I was no longer a dying man! Oh! no—I was living from head to foot—all strength! I made incredible efforts to get upon my feet, and climb a little up the side. The well was very wide, and I succeeded; and there I stood, my feet wedged in the broken bricks, my hands grasping them higher up, my soul in my ears, straining, stretching, striving, to catch the answer, of which I shuddered to think Mary's soft voice and timid manners might deprive me. Alas! I needed not to have taken so much trouble. I heard well enough; for, in a voice which, in my presence at least, had never passed her lips before, she said aloud, "Why, Percy, what a sop you must be, to think I could like such a monstrous mass of blubber as that. Pa and ma insist upon my marrying him—and so I must; but I hate him worse than poison!"

What, Mary! my Mary! with looks as soft as satin and her voice of velvet—could that be really she who spoke with that vulgar laugh, those coarse tones, and still coarser expressions? and of whom had she spoken? Of the man she had pretended to love! A man of blubber! Me—whom she had declared she thought handsome! Me—whose fat, she said, became me, because none but good-tempered men were fat! Oh! it was monstrous!

But the conversation was going on; and, although I had heard enough, I eagerly listened for more.

"Mary," said the Pipkin, "don't be angry; and, above all things, don't be unhappy; for I shall stick to you like pitch—as close as the blacking to my boot. You must manage to wheedle your hogshead out of a sum of money, somehow or another, and then we'll cut off to London, where we'll get married at once."

Here was a plot! My money was to pass into Pipkin's pocket, and I was to pass for an ass! O vengeance—I to be treated thus! The ungrateful girl! I—that had just hazarded my neck for her sake! I—truth itself,—and on that account wedged in the bottom of the well! It was not to be borne! I had no time to lose. I continued to mount the side of the well as I had begun, clinging cautiously to the bricks, not to make them fall, and thus give an alarm to the culprit. My body had become light from the furious energy of my soul; and, without a sound to betray my vicinity, I arrived at the top of the well, my head even with the edge of it; but here another difficulty occurred—I could not get over sufficiently quick not to be seen by the scoundrel, who would infallibly take to flight, and thus entirely escape me; and I dared not loose my hands to seize him for fear of falling back into the well. In the midst of this hesitation, I perceived they were about to separate, for Mary threw her arms about his neck and said "Good bye!" in a string of kisses that completed my frenzy. He was rising—he was going;—what was to be done? His coat-tails were within my immediate reach: I stretched one hand, clutched hold of the skirt of his garment—he fell back—I determined not to loose my hold—I could not however support my enormous weight with one hand—and so down we fell together, to the bottom of the well!

Oh! when I got Mr. Percival Pipkin down there, I pommelled him to my heart's content; I did not allow him the breathing space of a moment. He hit hard now and then too, but my ponderous fists soon settled his courage; and when the villagers, alarmed by Mary's screams and our horrible noise, came to draw us up, Mr. Percival Pipkin was as much a piece of "blubber" as myself. Oh! how I rejoiced—till I got home, and then the pains of my bruises began, and my fat flesh suffered a martyrdom: the agony was cruel,—but I had still consolation—I was avenged. I had frightened Mary out of her wits, and broken her Pipkin to pieces. This, however, was my only gleam of satisfaction. Mary—the gentle, timid Mary—went to Messieurs Screw, Chisel, and File, the lawyers, and had an action commenced against me for breach of promise of marriage. I resisted—I told the whole truth, and nothing but the truth—was disbelieved, and saw all the village rise in arms against me. I was pointed at, and pelted at: Friar Bacon shook his head and fist simultaneously; and Dame Bacon said I was a "gay deceiver." Mr. Pipkin talked of the deception of the world, and of fat men in particular. I was sinking into despair, when suddenly I found a friend and ally, where I least expected, in the person of the village butcher, whose daughter I had overlooked for Miss Mary Bacon. This worthy man declared that he had taken too much of my money not to think me an honest man, and that he would stand by me to the last. He then issued a proclamation that he was too much my friend to give credit, in any way, to my enemies, and that not one of those who were leagued against me should have so much as a pound of chops without the ready. This threat was most efficacious: it divided the chivalry of Nutsby, half of which ranged themselves beneath my banners. I felt very grateful to the butcher, and his wife soothed me into marriage with her daughter. Yes—I threw my sorrows at the feet of Miss Perkins; and this event fortified the case which Messieurs Screw and Co. had already concocted against me. I had to pay five hundred pounds damages to Mary Bacon, received all possible rhetorical ridicule from her counsel, and a severe admonition from the judge; and, when this case was ended, I had to appear again in court at the suit of Mr. Percival Pipkin, who sought damages for a "most brutal, inhuman, and murderous assault" upon his person. His counsel did his utmost for him. I was badgered and laughed at by every body, had three months' imprisonment, and a thousand pounds damages to pay into the bargain.

Nor was this the end of my troubles. With the money thus infamously acquired, Pipkin and Mary were married; and they set up housekeeping in a pretty little mansion, called "the Place," just under my nose, and laughed aloud every time that I happened to pass it. To this sum, Friar Bacon added another, which enabled Pipkin to turn 'quire and declare himself as great a man as myself, "barring fat." This allowed him to commence his murderous "improvements," which, more than all the rest, preyed upon my heart. To increase my anguish, my wife turned out to be a regular termagant, and was hated in the village; but, being "quire Bullock's lady of the Hall," she had a large party in her favour, when she declared open and interminable war against "Mrs. Pipkin of 'the Place.'" Nothing could be more unenviable than this civil war of the village; and weary of disputes, and dreading their consequences, I determined to escape them all by the only decisive means in my power—viz., suicide. The only difficulty in this resource, was the means—the mode. Hanging myself at the bed-post was quite out of the question;—what bed-post would have remained uncracked beneath the weight of my body? and, as for a rope, I must have had one spun for me on purpose. Drowning? Oh! no—it swells a man so horribly—and I am fat enough already. Poison! No—one is so black and blue after it, the nose spreads, and mine is wide enough already! A pistol! My skull is very thick—suppose I should miss and only disfigure myself! Upon second thoughts, I remembered that such an event as my suicide would please the Perkins's; and so I have resolved to live long to vex them.

But I never go to bed of a night without reflecting upon the miseries of human life in general, and my own in particular: I have been affronted, calumniated, and obliged to put my life in jeopardy; I have been forced to pay five hundred pounds for a breach of promise of marriage with one who loved another, and a thousand more for thrashing a scoundrel with great pain and difficulty at the bottom of a well. I have been obliged to marry a termagant wife, and have seen all my native place in arms against me,—and all this because I weigh four hundred weight, and have a sentimental turn of character! Fat men, let me have your sympathy; lean men, accord me your commiseration!

TATTERSALL'S

AT five P.M., on the first Monday that may suit the convenience of our reader, let him seek the western extremity of Piccadilly, and turning thence into Grosvenor Place, enter the first stable-lane which there occurs. This might be under more obligation to the scavenger, it is true; but it is nothing when you are accustomed to it,—or, as Scott sings in more rounded period, "use lessens marvel." Towards the termination of the lane, as aforesaid, will be described a pair of large gates, having a door cut in one of their folding pannels. Within is an extensive court-yard, having the centre occupied by an ornamental tank, surmounted by the sculptured effigy of a fox—no inappropriate guardian of the place! On the right hand of the entrance are the offices and a large range of stabling, of which, however, far the greater portion lies behind the principal court; and on the immediate left, is the temple itself. This is called the subscription room, and is about twenty feet by sixteen: it contains two tables, several chairs, pens, ink, sundry slips of paper, and that is all. Although we live in days when ultra-liberalism is the order of the age, none can find fault with the conditions of admission into this society, which simply consist of an annual payment of one guinea—and "no questions asked." And this is Tattersall's—once the scene of petty dabbings in horse-flesh and now the exchange, where, as dealers and chapmen, the aristocratic members of the West emulate in industry and artifice the turbaned Turks of the East.

It is early, perhaps, when the visitor arrives—and the scene is sombre to the death. Here is nothing that may prompt excitement in the shape of wine, feasting, or beauty—and so much the better: yet presently will the visitor behold thousands jeopardied as so much dross, and fortunes hazarded as if they were a reproach and an encumbrance. Can the thirst of gain—mere base, sheer, common profit—sordid concupiscence of pounds and pence—associate at a leprous and unholy shrine the proudest and the noblest born of our land with the scum and offal of its foulest, rascality—the very Cains of its social system?

The room is now crowded to suffocation. An individual, somewhat inclined to stoutness, is seated at the centre table, while lords and commons stand anxiously grouped around him. In costume he is a sloven; in appearance, he is sickly and unhealthy. And this is Crockford—the arch-priest of the fane, to whom men bring precious oblations, that he may make offerings to the golden calf.

The rise and progress of this extraordinary man's fortunes may be traced to one lucky hit, followed up by persevering industry and intuitive tact. Of his singular powers of calculation, his science in the algebra of betting and contrasting odds, we believe nothing. Constant practice and study, no doubt, have made him adroit at comprehending their combinations. Now, just as any buckster pronounces off-hand the value of an ounce of muscovado at so much per pound—this is the mystery of his arithmetic. While in a small way of business—as a second-hand fishmonger at Temple-bar, and dabbler in shilling English hazard at a low house in King's Place—it is generally understood that by some accident he was induced or persuaded to take very long odds against an outsider for one of the Great Stakes. The horse won; and this not only served to help his treasury, but to bring him before betting men as a fellow of some gumption. Shortly after this, he became the part proprietor of a gambling-house, No. 5, King-street, St. James's. In consequence of heavy losses at this house, the unhappy Captain Davies committed those extensive forgeries for which he was apprehended and lodged in the Giltspur-street Compter. It was mainly owing to the exertions of Crockford, that this wretched man was enabled to escape from his place of confinement, and, after a series of hair-breadth hazards, finally to evade an ignominious death. Whether policy or humanity dictated this step, it had the effect of bringing Crockford more prominently forward; and to be known is the one thing needful in the profession he had adopted. He was now on the high road to prosperity. Fortune, who, on the outset, began by throwing good luck into the scales, has stood to him unflinchingly ever since he became a gambler; and though we doubt his being the Cæsar that public report would make him, we are perfectly conscious that he has made a great deal.

At Tattersall's also was once seen John Gully, who, from being taken out of a prison to fight Gregson at Six Mile Bottom, became a Member of Parliament. Mr. Gully bears the best reputation in the neighbourhood in which he is known; and all who have dealings of honour with him speak to his observance of them. "Worth makes the man, and want of it the fellow." The lucky adventure that enabled him to fight Gregson, was the grain of mustard seed whence sprung his noble fortune. But, like Crockford, the Midas hand of luck seemed ever to point the path of profit—or how it for him. Soon after his battle, he became an agent for some individuals who were expelled the betting-rooms of the Turf. These individuals were the aiders and abettors of the unfortunate Dawson who was executed for poisoning several of Lord Foley's horses, by putting poison into the watering troughs on Newmarket Heath. The agency which Gully thus obtained placed within his reach many sources of information upon the principles of the Turf; and he became evidently a profitable investment as a commission. His progress towards fortune was now a flight. A sporting lodge and a racing establishment at Newmarket—thousands given, and tens of thousands offered, for horses, all followed like the incidents of a fairy tale. Thus, in some dozen or fifteen years, he who with his hand had floored the champion of one ring, in another by his hand won all before him, and, albeit no logician, upset the most rooted dogma of the schools; for what becomes of the maxim "nothing begets nothing" in presence of one who, from less than nothing, constructed something to the tune of one hundred and eighty thousand pounds sterling.

Bad as the proceedings sometimes are upon the Turf—and always immoral as is their tendency—we will admit that the Turf affords not such instances of a revolting nature as unhappily distinguished the Hells and Club-Houses of the West End of London. While the gaming-table has its dishonoured and polluted among the living nobles of the land; while memory chronicles the foul dealings of a dark conspiracy and an outraged hospitality, whose blasting exposure not even England's prime minister could silence or avert; while, but as yesterday, it has driven forth to a base and infamous exile one of the scions of the peerage; the Turf had witnessed, a few brief months before, one who, having jeopardised his good name, terminated, with the possibility of reproach, the capability of knowing its existence. Need we say that we here allude to Berkeley Craven?

Passing strange as truth has been declared by one who knew, better than most men, the scenes of party-coloured life, on no spot of civilised earth does it stand forth, out-heroding the wildest fictions, as at Tattersall's. Mankind has been exhibited as evincing stoical endurance under all the ills that flesh is heir to save one,—“Keep your hands out of its breeches' pockets.” But observe it at Tattersall's with its pouch unbuttoned, the precious freight ready to leap into the palm of the first hungry villain that will clutch it. Of the flood of chicanery, swindling, and scoundrelism, whereby, during the last ten years, the Turf has been so often devastated, the springs may be shown as readily as would be a cloudless noonday sun. A difference may exist as to the tributary streams, but of the fountain heads there is but one opinion. Let a stranger visit the emporium of sporting traffic upon any public day during the year, upon application to the first groom-boy he may accost, shall be pointed out to him the movers of every racing robbery for the last dozen years, meditated or perpetrated, without the least reluctance or emotion, except indeed at the ignorance which the enquiry would betray.

There is an unaccountable fatuity by which men of supposed common sense expose themselves to the certainty of being victimized by knaves, as well known to the sporting circles as ever was Jonathan Wild to the runners of Bow-street. That cheating at horse-racing has been practised by persons in a far different condition of life to the professional Leg, is too notorious to be insisted on here. But the anomaly is that the Leg can cheat, or try to cheat, as often as he pleases, and return to the charge again as if nothing had ever happened. He shall openly plunder nineteen men; and, while rifling them, the twentieth shall offer himself for a victim. If it be requisite, in the ordinary business of life, guarded as it is by legislative enactments, and entered upon and pursued with the mind collected and circumspect, that those, with whom we deal, should possess characters for probity and uprightness, how infinitely more essential is it that they, among whom the thoughtless are thrown, and in whose honour so much confidence is placed, should be of unequivocal faith and unsullied reputation. Yet the precise opposite of this is the every-day practice in sporting life. Of the great landowners, for instance, who assemble at Tattersall's, is there one who would accept a tenant (however he might show himself able to stock his land, and enter upon his farm like a man of substance) without a reference as to character and general repute? and of these, is there one who, if it suited his look, would hesitate to traffic with the blackest Leg that ever waddled into the subscription-room? How inexplicable is it that, while the very air of the stable has the reputation of making men more cunning and acute than their fellows, the Turf holds out advantages to the cheat, to be found in no other human occupation. Many men of straw turn at Tattersall's their tens of thousands without as much coined money in possession as would pay toll for walking over Waterloo Bridge. There the Legs never lack gold in their pockets, so long as they have brass in their faces.

More than half a century ago, some chance of fashion gave Hyde Park Corner the stamp current of a sporting place of meeting. While the whole economy of business and pleasure has since been revolutionized—while the conveniences and pleasures of life have advanced with every year, there they appear to have come to a “dead lock,” as Byron calls it. And what has been the consequence? That which always results in the social scheme—that where there is no progress, there is a retrogression. Fifty years ago the men now seen at Tattersall's would not have been tolerated among gentlemen, though the habits of society were infinitely more loose than they are now. But of all the various institutions founded in reference to particular tendencies none is more deserving the name of a Metropolitan Saturnalia than Tattersall's!

THE BIOGRAPHY OF A BELL.

HEarken to our neighbour with the iron tongue! While I sit musing over my sheet of foolscap, he emphatically tells the hour, in tones loud enough for all the town to hear, though doubtless intended only as a gentle hint to myself, that I may begin his biography before the evening shall be farther wasted. Unquestionably, a personage in such an elevated position, and making so great a noise in the world, has a fair claim to the services of a biographer. He is the representative and most illustrious member of that innumerable class, whose characteristic feature is the tongue, and whose sole business, to clamour for the public mind. And, for his history, let not the reader apprehend an empty repetition of ding-dong-bell. He has been the passive hero of wonderful vicissitudes, with which I have chance to become acquainted possibly from his own mouth; while the careless multitude supposed him to be talking merely of the time of day, or calling them to dinner or to church, or bidding drowsy people go bedward, or the dead to their graves. Many a revolution has it been his fate to go through, and invariably with a prodigious uproar. And whether or no he has told me his reminiscences, this at least is true, that the more I study his deep-toned language, the more sense, and sentiment, and soul, do I discover in it.

This bell—for we may well drop our quaint personification—is of antique French manufacture, and the symbol of the cross betokens that it was meant to be suspended in the belfry of a Romish place of worship. The old people hereabout have a tradition, that a considerable part of the metal was supplied by a brass cannon captured in one of the victories of Francis I. over the Spaniards, and that a Bourbon princess threw her golden crucifix into the molten mass. It is said, likewise, that a bishop baptized and blessed the bell, and prayed that a heavenly influence might mingle with its tones. When all due ceremonies had been performed, the French King bestowed the gift—than which none could resound his beneficence more loudly—on Henry VIII. of England. So the bell—our self-same bell, whose familiar voice we may hear at all hours, in the streets—this very bell sent forth its first-born accents from the tower of a village in a part of England which it would serve no purpose now to particularize. Suffice it to say that the village was situate near a deep swamp, or morass, which was surrounded by a dark and gloomy forest. Every echo of this forest was awakened when the bell vibrated in the village-steeple; and there it might have hung till now, performing the same duty and producing the same effects, had not the hand of the warrior been fated to turn the tide of its destinies. Loudly however rang that bell when the Spanish Armada was dispersed by England's small but gallant fleet, or when the streets of the distant capital echoed with rejoicings for the coronation of a new sovereign. And the solemn forest was saddened with a melancholy knell as often as the turf was disturbed in the churchyard to make way for the coffin of some village patriarch!

When the civil wars broke out in the time of Charles I., the village was garrisoned by a portion of the royalists. The followers of Cromwell sacked the place; and the assemblage of peaceful houses was swept from the face of the earth by the devastating flames which marked the passage of the conquerors. Master Lawson, one of the Puritan ministers, was anxious to have the bell for his church in the adjacent town. So Master Lawson and half a score of his townsmen took down the bell, suspended it on a pole, and bore it away on their sturdy shoulders. As they traversed the midnight forest, staggering under their heavy burden, the tongue of the bell gave many a tremendous stroke—clang, clang, clang!—a most doleful sound, as if it were tolling for the ruin of the village. Little dreamed Master Lawson and his townsmen that it was their own funeral knell. Another party of royalists had heard the report of musketry, and seen the blaze of the village, and now were on the track of the puritans, summoned to vengeance by the bell's dismal murmurs. In the midst of a deep swamp, they made a sudden onset on the retreating foe. Good Master Lawson battled stoutly, but had his skull cloven by a battle-axe, and sank into the depths of the morass, with the ponderous bell above him. And, for many a year thereafter, our hero's voice was heard no more on earth, neither at the hour of worship, nor at festivals nor funerals.

And is he still buried in that unknown grave? Scarcely so, dear reader. Hark! How plainly we hear him at this moment, the spokesman of Time, preclaiming that it is nine o'clock at night! We may therefore safely conclude, that some happy chance has restored him to upper air.

But there lay the bell, for many silent years; and the wonder is, that he did not lie silent there a century, or perhaps a dozen centuries, till the world should have forgotten not only his voice, but the voices of the whole brotherhood of bells. How would the first accent of his iron tongue have startled his resurrectionists! But he was not fated to be a subject of discussion among the antiquaries of far posterity. In the reign of William III., some men were employed to drain that identical swamp in which the bell was buried. Plunging down a stake, one of these drainers felt it graze against some hard, smooth substance. He called his comrades, and, by their united efforts, the top of the bell was raised to the surface, a rope made fast to it, and thence passed over the horizontal branch of a tree. Heave-oh! up they hoisted their prize, dripping with moisture, and festooned with verdant water-moss. As the base of the bell emerged from the swamp, the drainers perceived that a skeleton was clinging with its bony fingers to the clapper, but immediately relaxing its nerveless grasp, sank back into the stagnant water. The bell then gave forth a sullen clang. No wonder that he was in haste to speak, after holding his tongue for such a length of time! The drainers shoved the bell to-and-fro, thus ringing a loud and heavy peal, which echoed widely around, and reached the ears of a party of soldiers returning from Scotland, where they had been engaged in aiding Campbell of Glenlyon in the massacre of Glencoe. The soldiers paused on their march; a feeling of religion, mingled with home-tenderness, overpowered their rude hearts; each seemed to hear the clangour of the old church-bell, which had been familiar to him from infancy, and had tolled at the funerals of all his forefathers. By what magic had that holy sound strayed thither, and become audible amid the clash of arms, the loud crashing of the artillery over the rough path, and the melancholy roar of the wind among the boughs!

The drainers conveyed our friend to the nearest town, and put him up at auction. He was suspended, for the nonce, by a block and tackle, and being swung backward and forward, gave such loud and clear testimony to his own merits, that the auctioneer had no need to say a word. The highest bidder was a rich old gentleman, who piously bestowed the bell on the church where he had been a worshipper for half a century. The good man had his reward. By a strange coincidence, the very first duty of the sexton, after the bell had been hoisted into the belfry, was to toll the funeral knell of the donor. Soon, however, those doleful echoes were drowned by a triumphant peal for the victory of the Boyne.

Ever since that period, our hero has occupied the same elevated station, and has put in his word on all matters of public importance, civil, military, or religious. On the Sabbaths of olden time, the summons of the bell was obeyed by a picturesque and varied throng; stately gentlemen in purple velvet coats, embroidered waistcoats, white wigs, and gold-laced hats, stepping with grave courtesy beside ladies in flowered satin gowns, and hoop-petticoats of majestic circumference; while behind followed a liveried slave or bondsman, bearing the psalm-book and a stool for his mistress's feet. The commonalty, clad in homely garb, gave precedence to their betters at the door of the church, as if admitting that there were distinctions between them, even in the sight of God. Yet, as their coffins were borne one after another through the street, the bell has tolled a requiem for all alike. What mattered it, whether or no there was a silver scutcheon on the coffin-lid? "Open thy bosom, Mother Earth!" Thus spake the bell. "Another of thy children is coming to his long rest. Take him to thy bosom, and let him slumber in peace." Thus spake the bell, and Mother Earth received her child. With the self-same tones will the present generation be ushered to the embraces of their mother; and Mother Earth will still receive her children. Is not thy tongue a weary, mournful talker of three centuries? Oh, funeral bell! wilt thou never be shattered with thine own melancholy strokes? Yea; and a trumpet-call shall arouse the sleepers, whom thy heavy clang could awake no more!

Again—again, thy voice, reminding me that I am wasting the "midnight oil." In my lonely fantasy, I can scarce believe that other mortals have caught the sound, or that it vibrates elsewhere than in my secret soul. But to many hast thou spoken. Anxious men have heard thee on their sleepless pillows, and bethought themselves anew of to-morrow's care. In a brief interval of wakefulness, the sons of toil have heard thee, and say, "Is so much of our quiet slumber spent?—is the morning so near at hand?" Crime has heard thee, and mutters "Now is the very hour!" Despair answers thee, "Thus much of this weary life is gone!" The young mother, on her bed of pain and ecstasy, has counted thy echoing strokes, and dates from them her first-born's share of life and immortality. Thine accents have fallen faintly on the ear of the dying man, and warned him that, ere thou speakest again, his spirit shall have passed whither no voice of time can ever reach. Alas for the departing traveller, if thy voice—the voice of fleeting time—have taught him no lessons for Eternity!

NOTES ON HUMAN CHARACTER.

THERE are some persons who go through the world, and look with a jaundiced eye at everything around them. Regarding themselves as ill-used men, while in fact they have only ill-used themselves by their extraordinary self-esteem, they consider all men as united in conspiracy against them, and have scarcely a good word for any one but themselves. We believe that it was this extraordinary self-esteem that plunged Barry and Hlaydon into penury and want; and we know no other probable termination to the life of a literary man thus constituted.

Machiavel has a most detestable maxim,—"Slay your enemy, or caress him." Such artifice is, however, nothing more than the presumed strength of incapable men; for it is the surest way to be ourselves deceived, to fancy ourselves more cunning than all the rest of the world.

Men often affect to disdain when their own feeling is fear. Metellus ridiculed Sertorius, and called him "fugitive" and "outlaw;"—yet he offered for the head of this fugitive and outlaw no less than one hundred talents of silver, and twenty thousand acres of land.

Elizabeth threw the blame of the execution of the Duke of Norfolk on Lord Burleigh, and that of Mary, Queen of Scotland, on her Secretary Dawson. Nothing indeed is so convenient to a tyrant, whether male or female, as to have a scapegoat.

Some men are more courageous against tongues than they are against swords; others more so against swords than tongues. When Edward VI. was constrained, by the repeated importunities of his ministers, to consent to the martyrdom of Joan of Kent for entertaining some point of doctrine not esteemed orthodox, the king said to Cranmer, "I submit, my lord of Canterbury, to sign this warrant; but if there be any wrong, the blame must fall upon your Grace's head;"—and the tears rolled down his cheeks as he spoke. This was beautifully said, since Edward was a mere boy; but it would not have been beautifully said, if Edward had been a man. He would then have laid commands upon the Archbishop never to enter the council-chambers again.

When virtue flourishes and sails prosperously before the wind, most men are envious of it. The ship encounters a gale, which increases into a storm. It is blown from north to south, from east to west, at the caprice of the hurricane. It loses its pilot, and lastly its rudder: no one flies to its assistance. It is seen to sink deeper and deeper every minute. At last the waters rise over the deck, a whirlpool is beheld in the ocean, and a mast only remains, like a spire, to tell the tale of misfortune. All, then, bewail the severity of the storm, and blame their associates for not affording a hand to save the devoted vessel.

Walpole and Johnson are very severe upon Lord Chesterfield. The latter pronounced him a lord amongst wits, and insisted that his letters taught the morals of a strumpet, and the manners of a dancing-master. Walpole declares of his administration in Ireland, that it was so popular, that nothing was so much cried up as his integrity. Whereas, "he would have laughed at any one," says Walpole, "who really had any confidence in his morality." Thomson, however, adorns him with every virtue, and celebrates him as having been

"The gemman, ornament, and joy
Of polished life."

And yet, what was the extent of his policy and comprehension?—To guard himself, and to keep himself perpetually on the watch to profit by the passions and errors of others. He courted the mistress of his master, was ambitious of distinction, and yet acquired no advance in the peerage, nor any great accession to his private fortune. Chesterfield was specious, plausible, and penetrating: with conversation not only brilliant, but frequently solid. His action, we are told, was dignified, and his eloquence mellifluous—yet occasionally deficient in argument, at times indicating a plausible and empty elegance, like double-distilled lavender water—but he had not that pre-eminence of art that could prompt him to enlist manners and conduct on the true side of virtue.

Men may expect justice and liberality in the construction of an enemy, and they will find them—that is, in five persons out of fifty thousand. An evil occurs. It is caused by some one; or perhaps twenty persons have occasioned it. All these twenty will resemble each other in this,—that they will endeavour with the greatest industry to throw the blame off their own shoulders; and to get it off, they will hurl it upon any one, even on a man in no way concerned. "Come, unfortunate women," said Marie Antoinette, when at the convent of the Feuillants,—"come and see one still more miserable than yourselves, since she has been the cause of all your misfortunes. We are ruined; we have arrived at that point to which they have been leading us for these three years through all possible outrages. We shall fall in this dreadful revolution; and many others will perish after us. All have contributed to our downfall. The reformers have urged it like mad people; and others, through ambition, for their own interest; for the wildest Jacobin seeks wealth and distinction; and the mob is eager for plunder. There is not one lover of his country amongst this infamous horde;—the emigrant party have their intrigues and schemes;—foreigners seek to profit by the dissensions of France;—every one has had a share in our misfortunes!" This is all true—but not all that is true. Her majesty forgot the hand the king, and even herself had in the fatal work, by being unfaithful to the constitution his majesty had sworn to respect. Had he regarded his oath, all perhaps had been well.

When men fail in their attempts, every one is to blame rather than themselves. Fortune or friends are their general scapegoats; and on these are their ignorances, vices, and crimes universally laid.

Some men begin the world in distrust, and finish in confidence; others begin in confidence, and finish in distrust. These opposite results arise from the persons with whom the two parties have been fated to contend, to mingle with, and to live with. Necker admired the genius and eloquence of Mirabeau; but he refused to have anything to do with a man whose private character had made him conspicuously notorious. And yet in Mirabeau the king might have enjoyed a servant—the violent aristocrats have found a balance—the democrats a muffle—the limited monarchists a shield, a sword, and a truncheon; Marat would have died, perhaps, in exile; and Robespierre, Roland, Louis XVI., Marie Antoinette, and hundreds of others calmly in their beds! One day Marie Antoinette told Madame Campan that Droumouir had declared he had drawn the bonnet rouge over his head; but that he neither was nor could be a Jacobin; and that, while speaking, he seized her hand, exclaiming, or he saluted it with transport, "Suffer yourself to be saved!" Her majesty trusted him when he could have made no point of deceiving her, and distrusted him at a time when, of all others in his life, perhaps, he was most to be trusted.

REVIEWS.

Fermented Wine. By the REV. J. STARKE, Minister of Carlsdyke, Greenock. 12mo. pp. 12. Greenock: A. M'iver.

THIS work emanates from the pen of another preacher of the Gospel, who has entered upon the warfare against Teetotalism. It is intended as a reply to Mr. Gilmour's very clever work entitled "Sacramental Wines," of which we have lately spoke in high terms in the Review-department of The Teetotaler. Mr. Starke commences by observing "that the clergy had never hitherto imagined that there was any impropriety in employing fermented wines in the dispensation of the Lords' Supper." But now that Mr. Starke has that impropriety demonstrated to him, he must submit to be enlightened. Our ancestors for centuries believed that the earth was flat, and that the sun moved round it; but of late years the admission of the truths preached by Galileo has become a necessity. Mr. Starke labours to prove a fact which Mr. Gilmour admits—viz., that fermented wine was in use amongst the ancient Hebrews. We know that it was; or else drunkenness could not have existed. But Mr. Starke does not prove that unfermented wine was never used. After all, the question is thus easily settled with a word:—There were two kinds of wines then in use, the fermented and the unfermented: which did the Saviour choose for the Lord's Supper? Common sense dictates the reply—that of two kinds, one good and one evil (one unfermenting and the other intoxicating), Christ selected the former. Mr. Starke is a most illiberal writer: he makes the following statement:—"There is no wonder that Mr. G. denounces the use of wine. He has himself been forbidden by medical men to use it—his health requiring this; and it is but natural that he should have a prejudice against it. But he should not forget, that what is prejudicial to his health may not be so to the health of others."

This remark by Mr. Starke is unworthy a man—disgraceful to a Christian—and injurious to his character. What right has he to assume that Mr. Gilmour is a Teetotaler from compulsion? The assertion is illiberal in the extreme, and quite destroys all confidence in the integrity of Mr. Starke's views in putting forth the pamphlet under notice. Mr. Starke is also a very ignorant man: the notes of interrogation, which he has placed in the midst of his allusions to alcohol, in the last page of his book, prove that he is totally unacquainted with the nature of that spirit, and the means by which it is created and procured. In fact, the whole work is written with a bitterness, a malignity, and a spite which ill-become any one, but which are particularly revolting when allowed to peep forth from beneath the surplice. Mr. Gilmour will do well not to answer so scurrilous, illiberal, and un-Christian a production.

The Cure of Spinal Complaints, on the Plan of the late Dr. Harrison. By J. D. PARKS. 12mo. pp. 24. London: W. Brittain.

THE author of this work was himself cured by Dr. Harrison. He details the process in a manner which testifies to the truth of his statement, and adduces other instances of remarkable cures effected by the same physician with unexceptionable success. Dr. Harrison is at issue with all the faculty respecting the origin of the back giving way. The faculty, finding a defection in the muscles, consider the complaint commences here: Dr. Harrison considers that the complaint arises from the ligaments which hold the bones in their proper places, becoming weakened, sometimes constitutionally, and sometimes through an over-stretching by exertion of some kind greater than the body can bear. This is a most extraordinary publication, and should be perused by all who suffer from diseases of the spine:

Teetotal Sketches, Pro and Con. Part II. London: Ackermann and Co.

THESE xincographic sketches are good-natured delineations of Teetotalism and its opposite. There are four drawings in each Part. The first represents a man, in a most appalling state of intoxication, at the door of a gin-shop: the policemen are dragging him away to the station-house, and this is the hero "who wonders why policemen and Teetotalers won't let him be happy his own way." The other designs are of the same species—spirited and good-humoured.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

FOREIGN NEWS.

CANADA.

IN the district of Quebec the cause of Teetotalism has lately progressed with remarkable rapidity. The numbers of those, who have pledged themselves to total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, amount to upwards of eight thousand. The Catholic ministers of Quebec, and those of nine of the adjacent parishes, have succeeded in forming Teetotal Associations, to which all the communicants of those parishes belong. The Protestant Society of Quebec, which has now existed for some time, includes about two thousand staunch members.

FRANCE.

ON Sunday evening, March 14th, a number of French gentlemen assembled together at the Hotel Mirabeau, Rue de la Paix, Paris, to take into consideration the best means of founding in the French capital a Society to advocate the cause of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors. The MARQUIS DE SAINT CROIX stated that he had corresponded with Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, of London, upon the subject; and that this gentleman had supplied him with information sufficient to enable the design to be immediately entered upon. The gentlemen present then formed themselves into a Committee to carry the proposed plan into execution, and to found, without delay, a journal to aid the progress of the enterprise. It was unanimously resolved that all the best articles, which have appeared in The Teetotaler upon the Temperance question, should be translated into French and published in the projected journal. Three thousand four hundred francs (£136. sterling) were subscribed by the Committee upon the spot to defray immediate expenses.

COUNTRY NEWS.

IRELAND.

SAINT Patrick's Day was celebrated throughout Ireland by Teetotal processions, instead of bacchanalian exhibitions. In Dublin the Teetotal Societies marched through the streets in grand cavalcade, making a formidable display of their numbers, decked with scarfs, and favours, and accompanied by banners. The various officers of the Societies wore magnificent scarfs and silver medallions. Each Society, which joined in the procession, was preceded by a band. The shamrock was not the least becoming ornament in requisition: numerous Roman Catholic Priests were conspicuous in the cavalcade. The morning was wet and dark; but the day brightened up and proved more favourable to this grand national exhibition. From the nature of the articles used in the banners, rosettes, ribbons, and other decorations, it was evident that a preference was given to stuffs and silks of Irish manufacture. Very few spectators were induced to visit the Castle-yard on this occasion to see the guard relieved, the universal object of attraction and the scene of rendezvous being the Phoenix Park, where the Teetotalers assembled by thousands to commence the procession. SIR EDWARD BLAKENY rode, attended by his staff, at the head of the cavalcade, which proceeded to the Castle to compliment the Lord Lieutenant. Many of the shops were closed, and business was at a complete stand-still, every body being anxious to join in, or get a sight of the procession of Teetotalers. In the evening the streets of Dublin presented a widely different aspect from that of former years, cases of intoxication being very few and far-between. Indeed, the good faith of the Irish Teetotalers has now stood the most severe tests that can be applied to it; and long will Ireland rejoice at the regeneration of her sons through the medium of Teetotalism!

GREENOCK.

THERE are five thousand Teetotalers in this place; three male, and one female Rechabite Tent have also been some time established. The principle of Teetotalism seems to have produced the most happy results in Greenock, and is duly appreciated by those who have embraced it.

MARKET-HARBOROUGH.

ON Wednesday, March 24th, MR. HIGGINSBOTTOM, the eminent surgeon of Nottingham, delivered a lecture on the physiological effects of alcohol, and illustrated by experiments, diagrams, &c., in the Town Hall. Mr. Higginbottom described the nature of intoxicating drinks, the injury sustained by various organs of the body, when they are taken as a beverage, and the danger connected with their popular use as a medicine. The South Midland Temperance Society is doing a world of good, and, by confining its efforts to the spread of pure Teetotalism, unmixed with other opinions, is rapidly overcoming all obstacles. Its members are united in the bonds of friendship, and steer clear of all petty jealousies, intestine feuds, and domestic bickerings.

MANCHESTER.

ON Friday evening, March 12th, the Manchester District Temperance Society opened its twenty-ninth Branch in Gun-street. The meeting was most ably addressed by MR. SCOTT; and eighteen of the most intemperate characters in Manchester signed the pledge. The Catholic Association, to the number of three thousand and staunch Teetotalers, marched in procession through the principal streets of Manchester on the 12th ultimo. The Teetotal Sick Club also went in procession; and its members are very few. The Sick Club, which is connected with the public-houses, is however very numerous. This fact speaks volumes in favour of Teetotalism, and proves that the principle is intimately connected with health; whereas even the most moderate use of intoxicating liquor furnishes these Sick Clubs with numerous members. Teetotalism is making rapid strides in Manchester.

THE ARMY.

IN the few regiments to which Teetotalism has been introduced, the beneficial effects of the principle have become too apparent not to strike the attention of those officers who entertain the slightest attachment towards the service. We have received several very able and really clever letters from soldiers in the regiments above alluded to, those letters containing ample testimony to the advantages reaped by their respective corps from the new principle. One able correspondent, who signs himself A Soldier and a Staunch Teetotaler makes the following judicious observations:—"All order and discipline are set at defiance by those who indulge in intoxicating liquors. Is it not a disgrace to the English nation to know that its army cannot be entrusted with those side-arms which are at once the badge of the military profession, and the defence of the country on the day of danger? How is it that the armies of other nations are not thus disgraced? The answer is easy. Because the English army is a prey to the vice of intemperance; and the soldier, who, when sober, is formidable only to his enemies, becomes, when intoxicated, an infuriated monster. Flogging and imprisonment have in vain been practised, to endeavour to suppress the vice; and rewards have been held out to the sober. But all these efforts have as yet been unavailing; and Teetotalism has alone supplied a remedy for the evil. Oh! if we were only allowed to establish Total Abstinence Societies in all the regiments, and to extend the blessings of Teetotalism to the whole army, how satisfactory would be the results!" We cordially agree with these very admirable observations, and sincerely hope that those regiments which are as yet strangers to the practice of the new doctrine, will imitate those brave and philanthropic men who, in some corps, have advocated the principle with success, in spite of all opposition.

TOWN NEWS.

UNITED KINGDOM TOTAL ABSTINENCE LIFE ASSOCIATION.

ON Monday evening, March 15th, a meeting was held at the Cambrian Chapel, Rotherhithe, for the purpose of explaining the objects of this Association. MR. ROBERT WARNER took the chair.

MR. THEODORE COMPTON, the Secretary, detailed the principal features of the Institution in a most able manner. He enumerated the benefits to be secured to its members, and the advantages peculiar to itself—advantages which no other Life Assurance Company in London could exhibit. It is a Widows' and Orphans' fund, established upon the only possible safe and durable basis. Its advantages over other societies consist in the connection of its rules with the principles of Teetotalism. If Teetotalism be sound, it is evident that those who do not drink at all, will, on the average, live longer than the moderate drinkers or the intemperate. The Institution can therefore effect assurances upon more advantageous grounds than other societies, because the surplus, or profits (which belong exclusively to the members) will be so much the greater. Again, in other associations, an individual forfeits his policy, if he do not pay up the annual premium. But in the Total Abstinence Life Association this is not the case. Wherever no risk has been incurred, the whole of the money paid (and, in certain instances compound interest thereupon) will be returned to the member. Weekly payments will be moreover taken by the Society; and thus its benefits are within the reach of all who can spare three-pence or six-pence per week.

THE REV. W. R. BAKER, in a most able and interesting speech, enforced the claims of the Institution upon the notice of Teetotalers, and illustrated, by numerous examples, the benefits secured to its members.

MR. GRIGG, with his accustomed eloquence, contrasted the prospect of a comfortable and honourable independence with the fate of a destitute family, whose only perspective was the workhouse! He expatiated upon the duty incumbent on all real Christians to provide for the future welfare of their wives and children, and to avail themselves of such advantages as those presented by the Institution the objects of which the meeting had assembled to hear explained.

The following Resolution was then passed:—"That this meeting, approving of the principles and objects of the United Kingdom Total Abstinence Life Association, would earnestly recommend it to the attention and support of all Teetotalers."

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

ON Wednesday evening, March 17th, MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS took the chair at the Chapel, Aldersgate-street, which was most densely crowded.

MR. PALMER (of Hackney) stated that he had been addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors, for upwards of thirty years, and during that time he was invariably impoverished and wretched. Since he had embraced the Teetotal principle, his condition had experienced an extraordinary change for the better both in respect to pocket and to character.

MR. PECK made a most entertaining and instructive speech, and stated that in several gentlemen's and noblemen's houses at the West-end, the domestics had embraced the Teetotal principle, receiving, by solicitation, money instead of malt liquor.

MR. BENSTAD drew a forcible contrast between the moderate drinker and the Teetotaler, ascribing mental, moral, and pecuniary superiority to the latter. He said, that it was useless to refer to drunkards, because their condition told a tale the truth of which was too evident!

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS showed the national effects of dissipation (of which intemperance is a considerable ingredient), as evidenced by the ruins of the Greek and Roman empires, the decline of Ottoman dominion, and the downfall of many of those thrones which had ruled the universe.

MR. CRUMP closed the meeting with an earnest appeal to those present to sign the pledge, if they had not already done so.

ON Saturday evening, March 20th, the meeting at the Aldersgate-street Chapel was again well attended, in spite of the unfavourable state of the weather. MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS was called to the chair. After a very able prefatory address from MR. CAUMP, the audience was edified and amused by the speech of an Irish Teetotaler.

MR. ELLIS, who gave a most interesting account of the progress of the principle in his native island. When he alluded to the REV. MR. MATHEW, one grand and general burst of applause welcomed the name of that great man. MR. ELLIS detailed several interesting anecdotes relative to the enthusiasm with which FATHER MATHEW is greeted on his entrance into any city, town, or village of Ireland, and the anxiety of the multitudes to receive the pledge at his hands. Every Teetotal Society in Ireland has a reading room and library.

MR. J. H. DONALDSON gave an interesting account of the various attempts made in the metropolis by various philanthropic institutions to reclaim the daughters of crime; and he showed that in all cases, where fearful re-apses have taken place, the abhorrent system of compelling the unfortunate inmates of those institutions to drink malt liquors, when employed in the laundry, has been the cause of the evil. MR. DONALDSON mentioned a case in which a charitable Quakeress visited one of those asylums, and expounded the doctrines of Teetotalism to the inmates, who all expressed themselves desirous of embracing the principle. The lady accordingly applied to the matron upon the subject; but the matron declared that the regulations of the institution compelled her to supply malt liquors to the females under her charge. MR. DONALDSON observed that it was no wonder if those unfortunate girls became abandoned drunkards, and returned to their old habits of life, when they left those asylums. He concluded a most admirable speech by calling upon all present to aid in the grand aim of effecting an Union amongst the Teetotalers of the metropolis.

MR. POWELL expatiated upon the numerous enjoyments with which the Teetotaler was acquainted, and which were absolutely unknown to the moderate drinker or the drunkard. The meeting then separated.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE of the United Temperance Association has determined upon giving a BAIL on Easter Monday, after the Tea Festival, at the Temperance Hotel, Hackney. The publication of this announcement, by means of posting bills throughout the metropolis, has given delight to the majority of Teetotalers, who do not consider a little dancing to good music in any other light than as an innocent means of diversion. Early applications for tickets should be made to MR. EMBERTON, 31, Fore-street, City, as only a limited number have been issued, and none will be issued after the 8th of April. The procession will leave Aldersgate-street at three o'clock precisely.

ROYAL STANDARD TEMPERANCE HALL.

ON Monday evening last, this Hall was crowded to excess by the friends of MR. GAY, the unflinching advocate of Teetotalism, who has been discharged from a lucrative post in consequence of his adherence to that principle. The meeting was accordingly held for his benefit. On Tuesday evening, the Working Man's Teetotal Society occupied the Hall, and MR. SARVENT delivered an admirable lecture upon Natural History, in aid of the Clerkenwell and Pentonville Youths' Mutual Instruction Society.

WESTMINSTER AUXILIARY TO THE NEW BRITISH AND FOREIGN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

THIS Society has taken the Theatre, in the Broadway, Westminster, upon a lease for twenty-one years, and has fitted it up as a Temperance Hall, at considerable expense. On Monday evening, the 15th instant, a good meeting was held there, and MR. H. W. WESTON was unanimously called to the chair. MR. WESTON expatiated upon the great moral changes brought about by Teetotalism, and rejoiced that the theatres were being converted into places of temperance advocacy. He was followed, with considerable effect, by MESSRS. GOLALO, GAY, LEARY, and LARNER. We felicitate the enterprising individuals who have taken this theatre, upon their spirited and generous conduct; and shall always be glad to record their proceedings.

PICKWICK MARRIED.

CHAPTER XI.

BY THIS CHAPTER THE READER WILL FIND THAT WE ARE FULLY JUSTIFIED IN HAVING SELECTED THE TITLE OF "PICKWICK MARRIED" FOR THESE MEMOIRS.

THE happy day dawned! At an early hour the abode of Mr. Snodgrass in Halfmoon-street, Piccadilly, was a scene of bustle and confusion. Mr. Samuel Weller had risen very early, and had bestowed an extra polish upon his master's shoes; Mr. Snodgrass was in a highly poetic and sentimental humour—at least, so he said, although there was certainly nothing sentimental in the cuff upon the head which he bestowed upon his son for drawing a remarkable caricature of Mr. Pickwick upon a slate; and Mr. Pickwick himself was in a peculiar state of nervous excitement which left him in a pleasing condition of doubt whether he was most inclined to laugh or to cry. By the aid of Sam, he attired himself in a new suit of clothes, manufactured for the occasion; and he stuck a nosegay, about as large altogether as a moderate-sized cabbage, into his button-hole. At the moment when he descended the stairs, and reached the hall, old Mr. Weller was admitted at the front door, he having been invited by his amiable son to witness the ceremony. The old gentleman was embellished with all the glories of new tops and cords; and the left breast of his coat was adorned with an immense white favour.

"Vell," said old Mr. Weller, as he grasped Mr. Pickwick's hand, "here you are at last, on the high road to marriage;—you've past the last 'pike, and are just comin' into the town for vich you vos booked. I'm very glad o' von thing, that it isn't a vidder whose name is down in the vay-bill."

"I know that you are no friend to widows," said Mr. Pickwick, with a smile.

"I should rayther think not," returned old Weller, with a sly wink; "they're so exceedin' deep and artful—always a shyin' and kickin' and boltin'; there's no keepin' them vithin the traces; and as for the bit, they don't care a rap about that, howsomever that they have got plenty o' jaw."

Old Mr. Weller laughed at his own facetiousness until he nearly became black in the face; and Mr. Pickwick desired him to find his way into the kitchen, where Sam would welcome him to breakfast. In the course of a short time Mr. Tupman and Mr. and Mrs. Winkle made their appearance; and on all sides were happy faces and new clothes.

Just as the party were sitting down to partake of a slight refreshment before the arrival of the carriages, which were ordered for eight o'clock, a tremendous double knock was heard at the front door: and in a few minutes a voice in the passage thus expostulated with Mr. Samuel Weller:—

"No intrusion—old friend of Pickwick's—precaution quite necessary on your part though—sure of being welcome—saw the announcement—fashionable intelligence—Morning Post—came on purpose—wouldn't miss it—not for worlds!"

The door of the parlour was now thrown wide open, and in walked a tall thin man, about five-and-thirty years of age, tolerably well dressed, and whom Mr. Weller announced with a smile, as Mr. Alfred Jingle, of No-hall, Nowhere.

"Mr. Jingle, I declare!" ejaculated Mr. Pickwick; and these appellations were echoed by each of his friends; while shakes of the hand, and nods of the head became the order of the five ensuing minutes.

"Hope I don't intrude?" said Jingle, flinging himself into a chair and his hat on the sofa;

"but saw the news—fashionable paper—marriage in high life—Samuel Pickwick, Esquire—shortly lead—hymeneal altar—lovely daughter—wealthy merchant—day fixed—sixth of March—this is it!"

"And I am very happy to see you, too," said Mr. Pickwick, who perfectly well understood the meaning of all that was thus conveyed to his ears in the abrupt and jerking sentences which characterised the new visitor's conversation.

"Was sure of being welcome—said so—never forget Pickwick—great kindness—indelibly fixed—memory. You're looking well—uncommonly—so's Tupman—so's Snodgrass—so's Winkle. Delighted to meet you all again—glad of such occasion—happy to make one—very!"

"And pray what have you done with yourself since I saw you last?" asked Mr. Pickwick.

"Ah!" returned Jingle, with a shake of the head, "seen a great deal—tossed about—all over the world—America first—backwoods—taken prisoner—red Indians—tied to a stake—head nearly chopped off—scalping knife ready—horrible! Daughter of Indian chief—fell in love—tender passion—sighed heavily—so did I. Chief interfered—life saved—married the daughter—she hopped the twig—I cut my stick."

"Oh! so she died and you ran away from the red Indians?" said Mr. Pickwick: "I understand! And what did you do then?"

"Went to Boston—saw the famous nuisance—fat man—so fat, see nobody but him—if you want to see a friend, you must go out of the town. Went to Vermont—saw another strange man there—this man so thin only one person can see him at a time. Quite true—wouldn't deceive you—extraordinary—very!"

"America is a very singular country, is it not?" enquired Mr. Winkle, who was thoroughly amazed at these anecdotes.

"Right there—once in your life—friend Winkle. Splendid country—nature magnificent—all on grand scale! Mountains so high—get up to the top—attraction of the earth ceases—fly up to the moon if you didn't hold tight by the trees. Rivers very wide—once in the middle—think you're out at sea—can't see land—either side. All correct—would not exaggerate—not for worlds."

"And the seas and rivers of America are full of immense monsters, are they not?" asked Mr. Pickwick.

"Sea-serpents—miles long—twine round the ships—swallow the men—as you would pills. Tell you little anecdote—once walking on sea-shore—unfrequented place—saw something extending out to sea—thought it was a pier—began to walk upon it—proceeded for a mile—pier suddenly gave way—no more pier than you are—great sea-serpent. Was nearly drowned—serpent caught me by the tail—dashed me back to land again—upwards of a mile. Fell upon some moss—only a few bruises—polite serpent—kind act—very!"

It is impossible to say how many more of these anecdotes Mr. Jingle would have narrated to the party assembled, had not Mr. Weller made his appearance and announced the arrival of the vehicles at the door.

"Sam," said Mr. Pickwick.

"Sir," answered the functionary.

"You have got those nosegays of artificial flowers which I purchased yesterday?"

Mr. Weller nodded an affirmative.

"Have one placed between the ears of every horse," said Mr. Pickwick; "and, Sam?"

"Yes, sir," said Mr. Weller.

"If you have any left—"

"There will be just half left, sir."

"Well—tie a nosegay to every horse's tail," returned Mr. Pickwick, with that tone of decision which characterised him in all the difficult or important circumstances of life; "I am determined to create a sensation on this occasion."

"Very good, sir," said Sam, with a sly laugh, as he departed to execute these orders.

"Nosegays to tails—fine idea, that—charming novelty—get into papers—set a fashion—nothing like it," exclaimed Mr. Jingle. "Marriages in America—very singular—go by railroads—railroads movable—one end put at your door—other terminus at church door—parson comes in balloon—and bride and bridesmaids in sledges—imposing sight—grand cavalcade—brilliant procession—very."

Mr. Samuel Weller now returned to the room to state that he had ventured to transgress his master's commands relative to the adornment of the horses' tails, and that he had distributed the artificial flowers about the different parts of the harness of those animals whose docility would have been threatened by the other arrangement. There were two carriages; and in them did the whole party proceed to Wood-street, Cheapside, where they arrived just as Bow Church proclaimed the hour of nine.

We shall not dwell upon that portion of our narrative which refers to the union of Mr. Pickwick and Miss Teresina Sago. Suffice it to say, that the ceremony took place with all due solemnity; and that, on the return of the bridal party from the church, a most magnificent repast was served up at the house of Mr. Sago. All war-lence and gloom until the moment when the bride rose from the table to retire for the purpose of assuming her travelling garb; and the usual speechifying commenced.

Mr. Pickwick hemmed three times, and then suddenly started upon his legs with the velocity of one of those toys which children denominate Jack in the Box. Mr. Pickwick said that this was the happiest moment in his life, and that he could have wished that it had taken place some thirty years previously. Mrs. Sago here ventured to suggest to him, amid her sobs, that Teresina was not born at that distant date; and the worthy lady took that opportunity of assuring the company that she herself was only forty years of age, and that Teresina could not possibly have been born at the time alluded to. Mr. Pickwick in endeavouring to explain, involved himself in such a mystification, that every word he said, so far from being an explanation, required one; and he accordingly sat down, as his best resource.

Mr. Jingle now rose and addressed the assembled ladies and gentlemen as follows:—

"On my legs—purpose of congratulating—friend Pickwick—happy marriage—lovely girl—ornament to his household—companion of his domestic bliss—soothe his pillow—nurse children—if any. American wives—patterns of domestic simplicity—angels upon earth—tears for distress—smiles for joy—always affectionate—ready to please—make puddings—darn stockings. I myself was married—Indian chief's daughter—lovely creature—black eyes—white teeth—splendid ornaments—rings in her nose—shells tied to her toes. Poor creature—loved her tenderly—kicked the bucket—couldn't save her—wep't a bucket-full. But English wives—best of all—so domestic—not above any duty—will make the puddings and darn the stockings."

Mr. Jingle sat down amidst the most enthusiastic applause; and his affecting and truly impressive address drew tears from the eyes of all present. When he alluded, in those affectionate terms, to his Indian wife, whose death he metaphorically described by the simile of the bucket, Mrs. Sago could not contain the paroxysms of her grief. Altogether, it was a most touching display of eloquence.

A young gentleman about twelve years of age, and who was nephew to Mr. Sago, now requested permission to be allowed to make a few observations on so important an occasion. Permission was immediately accorded; and the young gentleman addressed himself to Mr. Pickwick, in the ensuing terms:—

"Thir, in rithing on the prethent oecathion, I feel my bothom thwelling with those peccoliar emothions which gwate men have all felt on gwate oecathions. Thir, when I look abroad into that animated nature tho beautifully desethwibed by the immortal Goldsmith, I behold all kweated beings endowed with various blethings. In kweation, both young and old have thir peccoliar joys. The fisheth—the therpenth—the rhinotheroth—the wabbit—all—all, I pwesume, have thir specific degwees of felicity. Hath not man, then, the wight to consult with his own feelingth in the motht delikwate awangement of exithtence? Thir, thothiety hath much to learn, ath well ath to imitate, before mankind can be rethtored to ith owiginal wights. I wepeat onth more, it ith time that all tathes be left unbiathed, and that all odieth awithtrocwatic obtherwances and thackles with rethpeth to the tenther pathion were abolithed."

This speaker, after enchaining his auditory for the space of twenty minutes with the soundest views, expressed in the most thrilling words, sate down amid a tremendous knocking of knives and knuckles upon the table. But silence was no sooner restored, than Mr. Jingle observed, with the peculiar ease of manner and freedom of style which so eminently characterised him, "Good speech—meaning plain—no ambiguity—well delivered—conned before hand;—great pity—little gentleman—suffers complaint—common in youth—called the dispth,—go away, though—little older."

All eyes were now turned towards Mr. Snodgrass, who, it was known, had prepared a poetic address for the occasion, and who had been sitting for some time in a very sidgitty manner upon his chair. With a countenance as red as a full-blown peony, and with his right hand impressively and impassionately placed upon his left breast, above the heart, did the poet-laureate of the Pickwickians rise gracefully from his chair, and commence the following beautiful oration:—

The happiest day of mortal's life

Is that on which, obedient

To nature's decrees, he takes a wife—

A measure quite expedient!

All nature obeys all nature's laws,

Because

Whatever is perfect, as all must see,

With its own perfections must agree,—

'Tis simple as simple rule of three!

Straws

Are borne on the breast of the terrible blast,

Which makes the world stand all aghast,

Which wakes the deep

From its quiet sleep,

And shivers the towering mast!

The castles are overthrown,

With churches hoary grown,

And all over the town

Houses come tumbling down;

The breaking, shaking, dashing, smaaah-ing blast

All things to earth will cast;

And all things brittle must be broken,

By the same token!

But hearts that are together twined

Outlive disaster's tempest-wind.

Ah! well-a-day! when I have done my do, and said my say,

Penned my last penning, and my last speech spoken,

I, too, shall be cast out, contemned, and broken!

And, like a pipe of clay,

Whose day is done,

(Poor blighted, banish'd, brittle broken one!)

My fire of life will be put out—the vapour,

Life's smoke, extinguished like a taper!

O soul, less palpable than air, th' ideal

Hath naught so slight as thou, nor yet as real:

The smallest mite that microscopic power

E'er gave a being, is a mighty tower,

O reason's wonder, when compared with thee,

And Egypt's pyramid the slightest flower

Blooming and dying all within an hour,

Enduring essence, when compared with thee!

Pickwick, my friend! to thee I turn—

What indescribable emotions burn,

What feelings in my bosom rattle—

As strange as those we might expect to find

Lurking within the poor dog's mind

When to his tail some boys have tied a kettle!

Just at this moment the bride returned to the room, accompanied by the ladies who had officiated as bridesmaids; and Mr. Snodgrass, to his great annoyance, was compelled to terminate thus abruptly the splendid irregular ode which he had composed for the solemn occasion, and of which he had as yet only recited about a tenth part. Indeed, he has subsequently declared, that he was just getting into the affecting and deeply pathetic part of it, when he was thus cruelly interrupted; and, if we may judge by the last stanza, there is every reason to believe that, like Mr. Jingle's speech, the ode would have shortly drawn tears from all present. We regard the simile drawn from the dog in a piteous situation, as one of the finest efforts of poetical conception; and regret that we are not able to transfer the remainder of the poem to our pages. And we have no doubt that the reader shares our regret, in this instance.

And now came tears, and kisses, and shaking of hands, and smiles, and congratulations, and an expression of a thousand conflicting feelings and passions. Miss Amelia Sago threw herself into her sister's arms, and declared that she would not part with her; and Mr. Jingle precipitated himself, when no one was looking, upon the cake and fruit, and vowed that he would not part with them. Mr. Snodgrass thought it absolutely necessary to display his poetic sentimentality by getting up a bit of a whimper on his own account; and his wife told him not to make a fool of himself in a manner quite shocking to true paths. Mr. Tupman rushed forward to extract Miss Amelia from her sister's arms, in order that he might have an opportunity of whispering a tender word in his own behalf in the ears of the former; and he was rewarded for his courtesy and trouble by having his coat slit up the back as far as the collar, by the young gentleman who hisped, and who fancied that Mr. Tupman meditated some assault upon Miss Amelia Sago. Mr. Winkle was engaged in wringing the hands of Mr. Pickwick, and old Mr. Sago was ringing the bell for the attendance of Sam. In fact, it was, as is usual in such cases, a scene of bustle and confusion. At length Mr. Pickwick succeeded in rescuing his bride from the hands of her relatives, and bore her off in triumph to the carriage that was waiting in the street. The happy couple entered the vehicle, Sam shut the door, and mounted the dicky; and the carriage rolled away from the door, followed by the nods and winks of old Weller and Mr. Benjamin Wottle, who were standing on the threshold of the warehouse-entrance to witness the departure.

As soon as the happy couple had left Woodstreet for the bridegroom's villa at Dulwich, the guests began to take their leave; and Mr. Jingle accepted an invitation from Mr. Snodgrass to dine with him in the evening, to meet Mr. and Mrs. Winkle and Mr. Tupman.

(To be continued in our next.)

THE WINE QUESTION.

So much has been said by Anti-Teetotalers of the authority afforded by the Bible for the use of moderate drinking, that in a work like The Teetotaler, which professes to be a complete Cyclopædia of all matters connected with the principle of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors, the reader will naturally expect to find our sentiments upon that head duly recorded. We must beg our readers to remember that a considerable portion of the Bible is historical, and that it never was the divine intention that the whole work should serve as the guide for the lives of nations and individuals, until the end of the world. For instance, the laws of Moses were only enacted for temporary purposes, and not with a view of perpetual preservation. The Mosaic principles of retaliation—"an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth"—would not bear application to civilised times; and the laws which permitted the Israelites to deal in slaves, would not find supporters in the nineteenth century of the Christian era. Laws of this description were doubtless eligible at the time they were made, and proper in respect to the people on whom their influence was to operate; but those laws would no more apply to the wants, interests, knowledge, acquirements, pursuits, refinements, and dispositions of the existing race of civilised beings than our own laws will suffice for those who may live two or three thousands years hence. Thus it is evident that a considerable portion of the Bible is simply historical; and that, while we preserve its divine portions, we are not compelled to follow those laws or dictates which belong to its narrative compartments. This reasoning would at once meet the arguments of the Anti-Teetotaler, even supposing that the Bible did afford any sanction of the moderate use of intoxicating liquors.

But we maintain that the Scripture nowhere gives such sanction. The Anti-Teetotaler may peruse the sacred writings from Genesis to Malachi, and from Matthew to the Revelations, and he will nowhere find a direct permission accorded to use, even in the most moderate degree, fermented liquors. Indeed, all the instances which are recorded of holy men and reverend patriarchs suffering themselves to be beguiled by the fascinating influence of wine, are evidently preserved in the sacred volume as examples to warn us against the adoption of a similar course. The failings of Noah and Lot in this respect are related with sorrow; and the evil results which attended upon their delinquency form the morals of the incidents, and establish the examples which we are to avoid.

When Adam and Eve were placed in the garden of Eden—a garden which teemed with every luxury in the shape of inviting fruits,—they were enjoined to eat of that wholesome food; but we are not informed that the pleasures of that terrestrial Eden were to be enhanced by perverting the purposes of a beneficent Providence, and subjecting those delicious fruits to processes which would supply a liquor that would impair the taste for the productions of the garden in their natural state. But through that garden there ran pure and limpid rivers; and the association of fruits and water was natural and in accordance with the amiable simplicity, health, and innocence in which our first parents were originally destined to exist. If ever the deity had intended man to avail himself of that change which is effected in the principles of fruits by the process of decomposition, in order to obtain alcoholic liquor, doubtless such intention would have been revealed to our first parents at a time when their food consisted of fruits and naught beside. The omnipotent architect of earth and heaven never intended man to use alcohol as a general beverage; and this assertion appears the more reasonable from the mere fact of the non-existence of the spirit in a natural and in an easily-accessible state. But the process of obtaining pure alcohol can only be known to the more civilised portion of the human race: because distillation is necessary to evoke the alcohol when it is formed by the process of fermentation. If, then, the deity had intended it to be used by mankind, his wisdom and power would have removed those difficulties with which its elimination is fenced around.

In Leviticus the priests were expressly commanded not to "drink wine, nor strong drink," when they went "into the tabernacle of the congregation," lest they should die. Now if an inspired writer forbade the use of wine on a particular occasion, we have indisputable authority that the moderate use of wine on that occasion was improper. Granting, then, that wine was an improper beverage in one instance, prudence would recommend abstinence from it on other occasions; and Moses would probably have recommended such abstinence had the habits of those for whom he legislated, required such an enactment.

The Scripture abounds with examples and injunctions against the use of intoxicating liquors. Solomon, the wise King of Israel, declared that "wine was a mocker," and that "strong drink is raging;" and he also knew that the liquor which he condemned, might be occasionally valued as a medicine; for he says also, "Give strong drink to him that his ready to perish." Solomon thus utters a denunciation against the use of strong liquor, which denunciation is universal save in respect to the application of the strong liquor to restore animation in certain cases, such as drowning, &c. Paul also recommends wine to Timothy as a medicine. But if alcoholic liquor were imbibed as an usual beverage, it would be useless as a medicine. The principal effects expected from medicine are the changes they produce in the system. If a man contracted the habit of drinking antimonial wine every day, it would cease to be valuable as a medicine in respect to him, because it would not produce the desirable change which would lead to renovated health. It is not therefore to persons whose health is unimpaired that strong drink should be given because they are "ready to perish."

It is to be presumed that the wine which Moses commanded to be offered up as a drink-offering was the unfermented juice of the grape, expressed at the moment, according to general usage; because Moses would not have recommended fermented wine to be offered to the Lord, since he had commanded the priests to abstain from it themselves. Such a contradiction would have been at variance, not only with common decency, but also with his sacred character. The wine which "Noah awoke from," and that which "Melchisedek brought forth" were evidently different. In the Psalms, the wine which "maketh mighty man to shout," and that "which maketh glad the heart of man," are also different kinds. The one which is spoken of in covert terms of disapprobation is fermented; and the other, which is reverentially alluded to, is the unfermented wine. In Isaiah, we find these sentences,—"Come, buy wine and milk;"—"Them that are overcome with wine." The first wine, which is mentioned, is evidently a wholesome, un-intoxicating, mild beverage, and is justly coupled with milk: the other is the fermented, or intoxicating wine. When Jeremiah speaks of "gathered wine and summer fruits," his meaning is obvious; but when he says, "I am like a drunken man, and like a man whom wine hath overcome," he alludes to a very different species of wine, and one which he would not connect with wholesome and refreshing fruits. Hundreds of similar instances might be quoted, to show that two kinds of wine are spoken of in the Bible, and that this fact will account for the different ways in which those allusions are made.

It being thus evident that the fermented and unfermented wines were both used by the Hebrews, no difficulty remains in deciding the point at issue relative to the Miracle at Cana; inasmuch as it would be rank blasphemy to imagine that the Saviour of Mankind would have formed the fermented, or intoxicating wine, against which the denunciations of inspired writers had been levelled. Those writers derived their inspirations from the same divine source as the Saviour did his being; and the Saviour came into the world to do the will of the same providence whose servants those inspired writers were. The Christian, who asserts that Christ made alcoholic wine at Cana, puts the Saviour in direct opposition to the moral maxims formerly inculcated by the deity through the medium of his servants; and places the morality of that same Saviour beneath the morality of Solomon, who denounced fermented wine. This is a blasphemy of which no Christian would wish to be guilty; and, as there is no reason to suppose that the water was converted into alcoholic wine, but a sufficient amount of evidence to demonstrate the contrary, we cannot imagine that any honourable reasoner will sacrifice his religious integrity for the sake of obstinately asserting an argument totally devoid of foundation.

It has been observed by many, "Why did not Christ himself preach against the use of intoxicating liquors?" The reply is ready. The Saviour came into the world to reform mankind generally, and not to preach against a few individual vices,—for we must recollect that intemperance was of rare occurrence amongst the Jews of that period. Christ preached an universal morality, in which abstinence was necessarily included, although probably not specifically mentioned; and no one will venture to contend that so fertile a cause of misery, crime, and poverty as intemperance has lately proved, would have been omitted from the grand and comprehensive design of the Christian reformation. The individual, who would urge against us that Christ did not specially denounce the use of intoxicating liquor, may as well suppose himself justified in committing any crime which the Saviour did not mention by name. Such a system of reasoning would be absurd; and therefore we are justified in asserting that a total abstinence from the most fruitful spring of crime and misery, fully enters into and forms a portion of that moral course of conduct which can alone entitle an individual to the denomination of a true Christian.

In a word, we do not hesitate to call in question the honesty and sincerity of those who would prevent and distort certain texts of the Bible into arguments to support a demoralizing and debasing habit,—a habit that has proved the greatest enemy with which human nature has had to contend,—a habit whose influence has destroyed both souls and bodies, and whose pestilential breath has withered up the flowers of youth and beauty on every side,—a habit, in a word, which has provoked wars, encouraged strife, spread disease, fostered crime, and associated itself with the most hideous poverty and nameless vices! Next to Christianity itself, Teetotalism is the most salutary doctrine that was ever introduced to mankind; and by means of the latter will the human race be enabled duly and fully to appreciate and adhere to the divine precepts of the former.

EDMUND KEAN.

THE biography of this talented actor forms an era in the histrionic art, and affords an example of an individual, who, from the moment that he became celebrated, was also the dupe of every low companion and the victim of every sensual passion. In a social point of view his very success destroyed his fitness for society; and his fine feelings and splendid talents were too often obscured by the hideous vice of intemperance.

He was born in 1787, and his father was a tailor in very humble circumstances. He was sent to a day-school in London by Miss Tidswell, a popular actress. A Miss Carey claimed him as soon as he was old enough to be of any use to her; and he accompanied her in her journeys from house to house, as a vendor of perfumery, by which occupation she filled up the intervals of time between one strolling engagement and another. The boy was remarkable for his beauty, and it would seem, too, for his readiness and mischief; and even at the tender age of eight, he was passionately addicted to wine and raw spirits—a predilection which was rather encouraged than checked by his mother and those into whose society he was thrown. He first played, when a mere child, as one of the spirits in Macbeth; and even at that time he was a favourite in the green-room, in consequence of the manner in which he recited passages of well-known tragedies. On these occasions he was rewarded by a glass of wine by the manager, or a sip out of the actors' porter-mug or gin-bottle; and thus, on all occasions, was the pernicious taste he had imbibed so early, fostered and strengthened.

For some time he became an incense-bearer in the choir of a Roman Catholic Chapel. When about ten years of age he is described as "a slim pale boy, very poorly clad, ragged, with dirty hands, face washed, delicate skin, brilliant eyes, superb head of curled and matted hair, and a piece of a hat in his hand." He now obtained the favour of a Mr. and Mrs. Clarke, before whom he used to perform scenes from Richard the Third, Hamlet, and Speed the Plough. He was provided with a little bell, which he rang when the imaginary music was to begin, a hat and feather, a sword, and white gloves. He however ran away from the dwelling of Mrs. Clarke in Guilford-street, in consequence of being alighted by some friends who visited the house, and proceeded to Bristol with the view of embarking for America; but no captain of a vessel would receive him on board, as he was so little and apparently so weak. He accordingly begged his way back again to London, sleeping in out-houses, and enduring all sorts of fatigue and distress by the way.

After having experienced vicissitudes of all descriptions, during a provincial career upon the stage which was characterised by dread intervals of appalling misery and want, Kean made his first appearance upon the metropolitan boards as a first-rate performer in February, 1814. From this time forth till the moment when the managers of Drury-Lane theatre, marvelling at the treasure which had fallen into their hands, "followed him up to his dressing-room with oranges and negus," the current of his fortunes turned. Success followed success, homage and gifts were showered upon him, more than he could gather. In his second character, Richard the Third, he confirmed the reputation to which he appeared to the astonished town to have leaped, as it were, with one single bound.

For nineteen years did Kean pursue his extraordinary career; and during that period, did the insidious habit he had contracted in his youth obtain a firmer hold upon him. He originally possessed an excellent constitution, which, had it not been impaired by excesses, would in all probability have enabled him to prop the drama in its decadence for years to come. But his dramatic career closed prematurely and unexpectedly under circumstances as unprecedented in the history of the drama as they were painfully affecting to all who witnessed the extraordinary scene. In person Kean was scarcely of the middle height, and was accordingly deficient in the dignity of deportment requisite for certain characters, as that of the noble Roman, Coriolanus. His features, though not sufficiently regular as to be termed handsome, were capable of almost illimitable expression: his eyes played as it were, with the passions in the very spirit of mastery; his voice, in the under-tones, "boomed with melancholy music," and in sudden transitions abounded with fine meteor-like effect; and although, as we have said, he was not of dignified stature, he walked the stage with ease and self-possession, attainable only by true genius.

Mr. Kean died at Richmond in 1833, and his end forms a strong moral lesson to those who step from comparative indigence to the highest pinnacle of popular fame and temporary prosperity. Although much of the heartless, reckless profligacy, which marred the better nature of Kean, may be fairly attributed to the evil influences of his unloved infancy and neglected boyhood; still we cannot on that account acquit him of all blame for having pursued a career of dissipation and vice which the philanthropist trembles to contemplate. When under the influence of liquor, he appeared to go out of himself, and to be possessed by a frenzied demon. Thus was it that his life becomes almost too morally degraded for warning, and seems to be unredeemed by one holy affection, one kindly feeling, one really generous act, or one single social duty fulfilled! Never, probably, was there so striking an illustration of the consequences of the neglect of moral culture, concurring with the destitution of domestic charities in childhood, and rendered ten fold more destructive in its effects by the evil habit which increased with his years, kept pace with his career, and became more deeply seated as he advanced towards his close.

When Kean was under the effects of liquor, he frequently behaved in a most brutal manner to his unhappy wife, during their provincial career; and on one occasion, after having performed the part of a monkey, he swore he would remain all night in his theatrical attire of skins, on purpose to vex his wife. He compelled the poor creature to sleep upon the floor, while he occupied the bed. He was invariably fond of low company, and frequently played pranks with his profligate associates that were eminently disgraceful to a married man. At every town at which he arrived, in his provincial journeys, he commenced a bill at the public-house; and, if his expectations were not realised in a pecuniary point of view at that town, he would rise very early some morning, and disappear without thinking of the debts he left behind. His wild way of life was a constant bar to his exertions;—difficulties constantly pressed upon him; and he encountered all the usual improvident players' difficulties. On one occasion, so extreme was the misery to which Kean and his family were reduced, that he actually offered at York to enlist for a soldier; but the officer, to whom he presented himself, would not admit him. More than a hundred times, when he returned home intoxicated from the theatre, after having expended all the money he had received with his riotous companions, did his wife kneel down by the side of her bed, in which her two half-famished children lay, and pray that they and herself might be released from their sufferings. On one occasion he proceeded to Guernsey, and desired his wife to follow him with the children. When she landed, she was accosted by him, with—"My dear Mary, what do you think? I can get brandy here for eighteenpence a bottle? I drink it instead of beer! Who would not live in Guernsey?" The cheap brandy produced its natural effects: while in the island, Kean committed a thousand extravagances and acts of profligacy which we should blush to record; and he and his family returned in a starving state to Exeter, he having squandered all the little savings his wife had collected during the interval of their temporary separation previous to her joining him in Guernsey. On all occasions—whether happy or miserable—did Kean drink furiously and deep; and thus was his mind injured to every act of profligacy, cruelty, and harshness, for which his biographer can discover no adequate means of extenuation.

POETRY.

ON a former occasion we devoted an article to the subject of Versification; and we then stated that all that was written in a certain measured or metrical style, was not Poetry. We shall therefore now endeavour to ascertain in what true Poetry really consists.

When man was banished from the garden of Eden, he received the dread sentence that the ground should be cursed for his sake, and that in sorrow should he eat of it all the days of his life. We are all aware that this language, however true in its general application, is not to be understood in a literal and exclusive sense. Man was told that the earth should bring forth thorns and thistles; but it also produces flowers to delight, and fruits to nourish him. The infinite Being has said that the days of our life shall be marked with sorrow, and they are; but the afflictions to which we are subject are attended with blessed antidotes: moral sources of enjoyment are given us, as fruits and flowers for the soul, and the teachings of interests, as well as the impulses of gratitude, should lead us to consider with attention those gifts which enlarge the capacities of the spirit, and call forth the affections of the heart. And such a gift is Poetry.

If it be asked, "What is poetry?" we must confess ourselves unable to afford a minute definition; for, like the unearthly visitants which the fears of superstition have occasionally summoned to the world, she fascinates the senses, but eludes the grasp of the beholder, and stands before him, visible, powerful, yet impalpable. The various occupations and pursuits of life may be explained with clearness and accuracy, for they have been created and divided by man; but poetry is above, and not of man, and he cannot, by any array of words, set forth its subtlety, its peculiarities, its perfection, its loveliness, and its universal power. Can the painter place the arched rainbow, or the glittering dew-drop on the canvass? Can the sculptor invest his image with a soul? Can the sympathies that mysteriously connect us, the unfledged thoughts that rush tumultuously through the brain, be subjected to the process of analysis, and the power of demonstration?

It seems equally impossible to define poetry. We may pile word upon word, and sentence upon sentence, to attain the object, but the result of our labours, like that of the builders of the tower of Babel, will be discomfiture and confusion; and poetry will still exist, defying the power of language, and soaring above the reach of description. It may naturally be inquired, then, "Cannot poetry be defined? Do we know of what we speak, when we allude to it?"

We do; for many of its definitions, to a certain extent, are correct: they tell us what poetry is, in a peculiar aspect, but fail to give us sufficiently comprehensive views. We may safely assume the position, that poetry always addresses itself either to the imagination, or the feelings, or to both.

The poet of nature is pre-eminent—not the one who "bodies forth the forms of things unknown," but he who takes known and familiar subjects, and presents them to the eye with such beauty, delicacy, and force, that we view them in a new light, and connect them with delightful associations. It is the province of poetry, by some beautiful thought, some apt comparison, some fine illustration, some well-woven fiction, or eloquent exclamation, to fix on the memory the subject of which she speaks; and if it be one connected with the cause of truth, if it be a correct sentiment, or a moral or religious precept, poetry makes it sink deeper into the heart, and take a stronger hold on the feelings. Thus we have often heard that it is right to love our enemies, but the bard adds, "like a sandal tree that sheds perfume on the axe that fells it."

The mechanical part of poetry is a useful subject for the poet himself, but it is only a medium, and not a necessary one, for the conveyance of ideas, since poetry may be expressed in what is called prose; and its peculiar eloquence need not of necessity be communicated to the world in accordance with the rules of versification.

But although poetry is not unavoidably dependent upon arbitrary rules, it is not to be denied, that it is never, in its general acceptation; and it is perfectly natural that it should be: the laws which govern poetry are evidently useful in their operation; they tend to preserve a general harmony of expression, which is itself a part of poetry; for those passages in prose works which are classed with the productions of the muse, certainly possess this melodious flow; and to the position assumed with regard to the meaning of poetry, we may add, that it is connected with harmony of expression. Here, then, we see the utility of the restrictions by which the poet chooses to be bound, and perceive that the laws of poetry facilitate its composition, and maintain its distinctiveness.

There is a mysterious relationship between poetry and music: there is melody in the reading of poetry; and the feelings aroused by the breathings of music, are kindred to those which poetry excites; and when they unite their peculiar attractions, the combined spell opens a new source of enchantment, entralling alike the senses and the soul. But poetry may well hold a higher place in our estimation than music. Unlike the latter, it can distinctly relate the facts of history, and the fancies of fiction, and can summon to our view figures and scenes, with a truth and vividness defying the skill of the limner. The faculty of composing poetry is a gift peculiar to a few; but the power of appreciating it, is open to all. We can all love and admire it, because it addresses the common feelings of humanity: it can affect, arouse, inspire, delight, and improve us all.

However powerful the influence of education, it can never make a poet: we may feel the want of one, and look anxiously for the appearance of some Homer, or Shakspeare, or Milton; but no means within the power of man can bring him forth, if the spirit is wanting: and perhaps, at the same time, independent of factitious aid, and ignorant of those who are willing to exert it, a poet may arise to "wake and warm the world," and exist in the sympathies and affections of its inhabitants, as long as that world shall last.

We know there are many who, influenced by some prejudice, or ignorant of their own capabilities of enjoyment, will think, and perhaps say, that poetry has no charms for them; and who, guided by the operation of an ill-formed opinion, studiously close their eyes to its fascinating and permanent attractions. We ask but of such, that before they finally abjure poetry, they place themselves in a situation to feel its influence: they would not fail soon to acknowledge that they had despised only because they had neglected it; they would exclaim, with a voice of exultation; "We have discovered an ever-living fountain of crystal waters, where angels might wash, and be purer."

The canvass fritters into shreds, and the column moulders into ruin; the voice of music is mute, and the beautiful expression of sculpture is a black and a gloomy void; the right hand of the mechanist forgets its cunning, and the arm of the warrior becomes powerless in the grave; but the lyre of the poet still vibrates. Ages listen to his song and honour it; and while the pencil of Appelles, and the chisel of Phidias, and the sword of Cæsar, and the engine of Archimedes, live only in the breath of tradition, or on the page of history, or in some perishable and imperfect fragment, the pen of Homer, of Virgil, or of Shakspeare, is an instrument of power as mighty and magical, as when first the gifted finger of the poet grasped it. Is poetry then—the sweet comforter of the mind diseased—the elastic chain wherewith ages past, present, and future are bound—the mighty and magical power swaying the hearts and moulding the actions of men—a "mere superfluity and ornament?" No, no: it is not: and the young poet who made the assertion, undervalued the gift of which he was a possessor; and we conceive that no full and correct exposition can be made of the benefits of poetry, without treating it as practical, in its final tendencies.

Poetry can adapt herself to all ages. She can weave a simple ballad for childhood, or a fervent song for the youth ripening into manhood: she has her pictures of fireside happiness, and domestic comfort, for the parent, and her voice has a tone for the ear of the aged. She can adapt herself to all conditions; she has her simple and affecting narratives, for the poor and the humble; she has a trumpet-voice for the soldier, and a most refined speech for the scholar. She will be our companion at all times, and in all seasons; she will give an additional zest to prosperity; and when the season of adversity shall arrive, she will comfort the wounded spirit, and bind up the broken heart.

Miriam and Moses, the first authors, were poets; and their song of thanksgiving, on passing the Red Sea, has been styled at once the most ancient monument, and a master-piece of poetic composition; and before the invention of letters, the religion, the laws, and the history of the different nations were handed down to posterity through the medium of poetry. Sculpture and painting are the fruits of long experience and unwearyed care; and they have been gradually improved from the rudest imitations of nature to their present state; but poetry dates her mortal existence with the birth of mankind; and although the poet may employ his gift for unworthy purposes, it is still an emanation from the Deity. And the most groundless and anomalous objections urged against poetry, are those which proceed from religious men. One great objection, on the part of such men, is the perversion of poetry to improper uses. As well might they tell the patriot not to draw the sword in behalf of his country, because it is the weapon of the oppressor; as well might they cast away the Book of Life, because its meaning is distorted by fools and fanatics. Poetry is most grand, when connected with religious subjects; and in her purest and most sublime personification, she does not, like Ajax, defy the lightning and the God who made it, but like the ethereal beings around the throne of heaven, she veils her burning eyes with her resplendent wings, when in the solemn presence of the Almighty. He who has no love for poetry, may lay to heart the precepts of the Bible; but there is a light upon the pages of that book which he sees not; there is a harmony in its language which he hears not; for there is a vein of poetry, pure, simple, and sublime, running through the whole sacred volume.

No Christian will pretend to doubt, that the language of the Bible is the very language best calculated to answer the purpose for which it is intended; neither will any Christian deny, that it is intended for the perusal of man, in all ages, countries, and conditions; and if the language of this book is poetry, it naturally follows that the most useful instructions and sublime truths should really exert the greatest influence on mankind, when communicated to the world through this fascinating medium.

Take from us the belief in a future existence, and Poetry is shorn of her beams; but let her discuss those subjects connected with our immortal destiny, and she assumes an appearance of inexpressible glory; she strips us for a time of our earthly garments, that we may follow her to the pure river of life, and like the repentant tear which the Peri conveyed to the angel, removes the crystal bar which binds the gates of paradise.

Are tenderness, or sublimity, or simplicity of expression, elements of poetry? They are all in the Bible. Does poetry imply the invention of fictions? Look at the parables. Must it embrace comparisons and figures? Behold them in the Book of books.

Poetry is the appropriate handmaid of Religion; and says Wolfe; "the homage of Voltaire to the muse's piety remains a bright memorial of her allegiance to Christianity." When the powers of hell seemed for a time to prevail, and his principles had given a shock to the faith of Europe, the daring blasphemer ventured to approach the dramatic muse; but no inspiration would she vouchsafe to dignify the sentiments of impiety. He found that no impassioned emotion could be roused—no tragic interest excited—no generous and lofty feeling called into action, where those dark and chilling feelings pervade. He complied with the only terms upon which the muse would impart her favours; and the tragedies of Voltaire displayed the loveliness of Christianity, below indeed what a Christian would feel, but almost beyond what unbelieving genius could conceive. Such was the victory of poetry, when she arrested the apostate, while marching onward to the desolation of mankind; when the champion of modern philosophy fell down before the altar she had raised, and breathed forth the incense of an infidel's adoration! When he came, like the disobedient prophet, that he might curse the people of God, and behold, "he blessed them altogether."

We are well assured that poetry, although sometimes seen in connection with error, even as the sons of God held companionship with the daughters of men, is one of the choicest blessings bequeathed to this imperfect world. She is not the offspring of human invention; for unlike those arts and sciences which were given to man in an elementary state, she sprang, Minerva-like, into existence, perfect in her proportions, mature in her strength, and gorgeous in her panoply. The Christian can trace her divine origin with the most certainty, and behold with an unclouded vision, that she is born of God, and baptized with inspiration. She invests all things with an extrinsic glory; she diffuses a new light upon the face of nature; she weans us from the rule of our passions, and the dominion of our lusts, and reveals the golden ladder that leads from earth to heaven.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We will take the very first opportunity to comply with our promise to our Barnsley Correspondent.

We deeply regret that several Reports of importance (especially those of the Working Man's Association and the Chelsea Auxiliary to the United Temperance Association) arrived too late last week for insertion. We cannot always guarantee the immediate insertion of Reports sent on Monday.

A gentleman has favoured us with some remarks upon the concluding observations in our late essay upon Socialism. We will embody our answer in an article to be entitled "HAPPINESS AND MISERY," and which we will very shortly publish.

We thank a Subscriber for his very clever and judicious letter relative to Sir Walter Scott. The suggestions are valuable, and the comparison between Scott and Victor Hugo is drawn. The writer is correct in his delineations of melodrama and tragedy. We must however beg so far to differ from him as to believe that "Notre Dame de Paris," is equal to anything Scott ever wrote.

Will R. B. favour the Editor with a call at his private residence, No. 9, Suffolk Place, Hackney Road, any Tuesday evening. We understand that the Star Temperance Day-Coach is to run between Hart's Hotel, Aldersgate Street, London, and Bath and Bristol. Every thing will be on the Teetotal system soon;—and so much the better!

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, APRIL 3rd, 1841.

WE understand that it is a matter of debate among the Committees of the metropolitan Teetotal Societies, whether the PROCESSION of the friends and votaries of the great principle through the thoroughfares of London is to take place on Whit-Monday, or not. We are surprised that this subject should exist as a matter of doubt in the minds of any sincere Teetotalers. If there be no PROCESSION this year, the enemies of the cause will declare that Teetotalism is upon the wane, and that its advocates dare not exhibit their numbers. The enemy is yet powerful, and we must be cautious how we allow him to recover any of the dominion we have wrested from his grasp. The PROCESSION is absolutely necessary to the well-being of the Teetotal cause; and we know that the great majority of the metropolitan Teetotalers are in favour of it. The Irish were not ashamed to display their numbers upon Saint Patrick's day; and, in spite of the false and infamous assertions of one or two grossly prejudiced political journals, the cavalcade in Dublin on that occasion was immense. The English Teetotalers have already been outstripped by the Irish in the zeal with which the cause is embraced and sustained: let not the latter manifest this superiority of enthusiasm in an instance where the very honour of Teetotalism is concerned.

We confidently hope that the Members of the United Temperance Association will insist upon the PROCESSION, so far as they are concerned; and we call upon the Committee of this influential and truly liberal Society to carry out a measure which, we repeat, is so intimately connected with the welfare of the cause. The moral effect of such a vast cavalcade of orderly, well-attired, and happy individuals, must be evidently beneficial. A cause invariably gains by the display of its numbers, inasmuch as the public is enabled to judge of the value of the principle by the myriads who give it the sanction of their example. The first expenses are moreover incurred;—the banners and flags are purchased; and the Committees may establish such regulations relative to the issue of tickets for seats in the vehicles, as will prevent the risk of too elaborate an expenditure. And, even if the PROCESSION were attended with a little loss (and it need not be), let the Associations, which might sustain it, console themselves with the consciousness of having produced most beneficial effects.

We will answer for it that the Metropolitan Roman Catholic Total Abstinence Association will be glad to follow the example of the Societies in Dublin, and exhibit its strength upon Whit-Monday. The Youths' Teetotal Societies would doubtless re-echo our cry of "THE PROCESSION! THE PROCESSION!"—and the suburban Auxiliaries and Branches will be pleased to avail themselves of an opportunity of personally communicating with the members of their parent Societies. Our friends in the country will regret that there should have occurred amongst their brethren in London the slightest doubt relative to this important measure; and again do we therefore call upon the members of the metropolitan Associations to insist upon their Committees organizing the PROCESSION for the ensuing Whit-Monday.

Last year the Procession was mentioned in most of the leading London journals, and hundreds and thousands were led to reflect upon the principle of Teetotalism from the simple fact of beholding the display of its votaries. It was observed that all the Teetotalers were well clad, and that their looks denoted contentment and happiness. As this appearance was the result of the salutary doctrine which they had embraced, the consciences of the moderate drinkers and the drunkards who surveyed the procession, must have experienced certain qualms which led to reflection, and reflection paved the way for reformation. Some of the Teetotalers last year were stated to present rather a sickly appearance:—this circumstance, if it were true, may have originated in the fact that they had only lately been reclaimed from a habit that was hurrying them to their graves. But the lives of those, who had so prudently stopped in the midst of that precipitate career towards premature destruction, were worth a far longer purchase than those of the bloated publicans who crowded at the doors of their iniquitous dens. At the celebrated battle of Saint Gothard, where the great Montecuculi defeated the Grand Vizier, Ahmed-Kemprilu-Pacha, the Austrians at first gave way; but a corps of French auxiliaries came to their assistance. The French troops were clad in the garb of the seventeenth century, with long laced coats, powdered hair, and frills around their necks. "What young girls are these?" exclaimed the Grand Vizier, who imagined that the victory was his own. But the young girls of whom he spoke, precipitated themselves with such irresistible fury upon the Moslem ranks, that the crescent soon grew pale beneath the glories of the cross, and the fortune of the day declared itself in favour of the warriors with the effeminate aspect. Thus may it happen that a few of the Teetotalers will wear a delicate appearance; but let them be placed in competition with the votaries of Bacchus, either in the harvest field or the manufactory, and we need not speculate who will perform the greater amount of work in the shortest time.

The assemblage of a vast concourse of healthy and happy individuals is one delightful to contemplate. We love the world and the things thereof. We love our fellow-creatures. We love, admire, reverence, and even adore them, according to the form in which they present themselves to us. We like to see them in their moments of leisure and recreation, in their hours of labour and business. There is instruction to be gained from the study of them when their passions are aroused and their peculiarities are developed—when deep emotions shake their frames, and their good or evil qualities are brought out—when pleasure lulls them, when suffering wrings them, when joy lights up and hope beams upon their faces, and when despair chills, and they are hand in hand with misery and want. One of the chief pleasures of the observing man is, at the close of day, to go forth into the street, and meet and mingle in the crowds that throng it, on their thousand various pursuits of business and pleasure; to be with them, and yet not of them—to see, and yet not be seen—to observe, and yet not be observed—to know and comprehend, and yet not be known or comprehended. It is thus that multitudes have their morals as they pass along: and surely no concourse can spread morals more edifying, afford an example more salutary, or excite a chain of ideas more beneficial, than the cavalcade of those who have achieved the greatest of conquests—a victory over their own inclinations! Let the Teetotal public be well assured that a grand opportunity of doing good will be neglected—wilfully neglected, if the PROCESSION do not take place on Whit-Monday; and that the cause will suffer in more ways than one. It will lose a favourable occasion of adding numbers to its rank; and it will afford scope to the enemy to rejoice at an apparent weakness which does not however really exist.

It is moreover necessary that the PROCESSION should take place, in order to bring the Teetotalers together. There has been so much disagreement brought about by contentions relative to pledges, and by a most improper spirit of rivalry, that it is time for the Teetotalers to meet in order to familiarize them with the idea of a general UNION! The provinces are anxiously watching the Metropolitan Societies, and would gladly establish London as the general centre of one grand UNION. In the country, those Associations are the most successful, which consist of an Union of several Districts, and which have one common interest supported in many places and directions. Some of the Teetotalers in the metropolis demonstrate a littleness and narrowness of mind relative to this subject, which surprises us. Such men are enemies to the cause, and effect an immensity of mischief. But the majority of the Teetotalers hail a prospect of Union with glee, as the only chance of divesting the principle of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors of the religious and political circumstances with which a few misguided, though probably well-meaning, but certainly prejudiced men have associated it. At all events, opportunities of discussing the topic of Union will be afforded on Whit-Monday, if the PROCESSION take place; and that it will take place we confidently hope, trusting, as we do, to the sterling good sense of those, whose intellects are now no longer clouded by the vapours and fumes of strong drink, to carry out a measure which is calculated to effect so much good. For our parts, we believe that the good cause, which is now progressing well, would suffer materially by the suppression of the Whit-Monday demonstration.

THE COWARD.

CHAPTER I.

Two ladies, seated at a table in a saloon of the Rue Laroche-foucauld, were surrounded by a number of gentlemen, and engaged in animated conversation. One of the ladies was named Madame de Neville, the other, her daughter, was named Marie. Marie was naturally pale; she had light hair; large, swimming blue eyes, shaded by long, dark lashes, and full, strongly-marked eyelids, indicated one of those elevated, thoughtful souls, which burn and glow in secret. Just then her usual paleness had left her, her eyes dilated and sparkled, and her voice was deep and broken, as though she was much moved.

"How, M. Lascour," said she, "did the man receive a blow?"

"Yes, miss, some time ago, at the Pavillon d'Ermenouville."

"And did not return it?"

"He did not."

"And has not demanded satisfaction of the aggressor?"

"He would be more likely to beg his pardon!"

"And what is the wretch's name, so that, in case I ever meet him, I may show him plainly that I despise him?"

"His name!—it will be difficult to ascertain it; for probably no one witnessed the circumstance but the friend who mentioned it to me, and you would do wrong in despising him—he may be a very fine man."

"What! he, the coward!"

"Coward! coward! that is your great argument. Is it the man's fault? Courage is a matter of nerve; we cannot command resolution any more than we can appetite. Thus Captain Dervière, with whom you are well acquainted, mentioned to me, the other day, the case of a young man who, having been grossly insulted, came on the ground three times and fainted away three times, when he came to lay hand on his sword. Would you despise this man? Can we controul our swooning? He is perhaps of very delicate sentiment, and very pure in soul, only his organs are weak; find fault with his limbs, therefore, not with his feelings."

"Very well," replied Marie, "I say, for my part, that where there is no courage there is no honour. Let a man be an assassin, a deserter, nay, even a traitor, love can pardon it all; an assassination is but a crime, treason perhaps no more than hatred, and hatred and crime may both proceed from a great soul. But a coward! oh, the very name sickens me—and were the man you saw insulted there at my feet, beautiful as an angel, noble as a king, with a revenue of a million, I would not marry him were I but the servant-maid of an inn."

As she was saying this, a young man who was leaning on a console at the other end of the room, and had taken no part in the discussion, let an album fall. Marie turned at the noise, and her eyes assumed an indescribably sweet and tender expression, as he rose and approached the young man.

"Savigny, my friend," said she, in a whisper, "come along—why do you remain alone in this distant corner? Do not you approve of what I have said?"

At these words, uttered with captivating grace and submission, Marie's betrothed turned toward her, disclosing mild and noble, but somewhat disturbed features.

"Excuse me, Marie," said he, "I was looking at this sketch of Roquellan in your album, and did not hear you."

"Ah! I am sorry for it," said she, "you are so pure and noble-minded, you would have been pleased with the sentiments I expressed."

"Marie," said Savigny, in an agitated voice, and showing her the album, "pray look at this head of an old woman—how expressive! how true to nature! It reminds me of my poor grandmother, who loved me so much."

"Ah! my friend," said Marie, "I see a tear standing in your eye—hide it, pray, or I must weep too. My Savigny, how tender-hearted you are!"

Meanwhile the discussion was going on at the table at which Madame de Neville was seated.

"No," said Lascour, "I don't set much value on courage, and yet if I have a son who is like myself, I will tell him, 'Never submit to an insult.'"

"Well, for my part," said Madame de Neville, "if I had the good fortune to have a son, and he had received what you call an insult, I would beseech him on my knees not to fight. What difference does it make to me whether my son is a coward or not? What I want is to have him live. I am no Spartan. I will not tell my son, 'Return with your shield, or upon it.' I would say to him, 'Do not go at all.'"

"Neither would I fight, madam," said Lascour, "if I were your son; for if I were your son, I would have twenty thousand a year—if I were your son, I should need no one's good offices—if I were your son, I would have horses, a good table, a thousand pleasures, and I would not be fool enough to risk my happy life against that of a wretch who has nothing else to lose."

"But, sir," rejoined Marie, quickly, "suppose that wretch should offer you an insult!"

"I would understand it as a compliment."

"And if he gave you a blow?"

"I would walk off to avoid a second."

"But the dishonour!"

"Which?"

"You love yourself very much, then?"

"Very much, miss. Besides, why do people fight except from self-love? Bullies fight because they value their reputation—I would not fight because I value my bones. Self-love against self-love—mine is the most reasonable of the two. For after all, where is this honour lodged? You say, his honour has received a fatal blow—yet people live a hundred years after such a mortal wound. But a blow with a cudgel—oh! that I should feel very deeply, and that's the reason why I am not anxious to get a shot with a pistol, inasmuch as that is still more painful."

"But, sir, what would your conscience say?"

"My conscience? it would be dumb if I were rich!"

"And then the men who would insult, the women who would despise you!"

"But, miss, nobody is despised now-a-days. You are a coward—who knows the fact?—two individuals out of a hundred, or ten in a thousand. And do you think that it would prevent those ten individuals from drinking my champagne, accepting my money, and calling me 'my dear friend'? They would abuse me in private, but what is that to me! I would know nothing of it, and even if I should, I repeat, what is that to me! I would rise—I would go and look in the glass—and when I found my complexion clear, my eye bright, my lip ruddy—when I felt in my writing-desk and found some bank-notes in it—when I looked around me, and saw splendid hangings and elegant furniture, I would say to myself, 'Upon my word, I did very wisely in retaining all this.' I would soon forget all they could say of me. I mount my bay, and take my Greek greyhound with me; when I reached the park, all the pretty women I knew would stretch their necks out of their carriages to salute me, and I would be happy, be envied and honoured. And yet, spite of all I have said, if I, Alfred Lascour, was insulted to-morrow, I would fight in a moment."

"How so, sir?"

"Oh, because with me, Lascour, the case is very different! I must be a man of honour; I need it for my support. I am the ostensible editor of a newspaper; I must be brave. Only consider that I am employed to be courageous for all my anonymous correspondents; I am the shield of their wit, or folly, as the case may be; courage, with me, means champagne, truffles, and a pheasant à la royale, and I am very fond of pheasants and champagne, therefore I must needs be very courageous. But could I find money any where else than in my pen, I would be willing to be a coward, and to let the whole world know I was one; I would have the word coward engraved on my cards as my title, and I would not be the less liked; and I would wear mustaches, and I would find people who would tell me it was a great pity I was not in the army; and I would make a gallery of the miniatures that the ladies would send me."

"No, sir," answered Marie; "no woman of honour would love such a man. A lover is a protector, as well as a husband. What, suppose I loved a man, took his arm, and went out with him, and he was to let the first puppy that choose insult me, and I must reflect that the man who pretended to love me would yield me up to the first threat made him! If I fall in the water, he will let me drown; if I am in a fire, he will let me burn up; if I fall into the hands of villains, he will let me be dishonoured. A coward, sir, is a man who knows neither love, pity, nor friendship; a coward can never be a husband, a son, or a father, for he could not protect his wife, his mother, or his daughter. And can a woman love such a man?—oh, never, never!"

"It is singular," said Madame de Neville, "Savigny has gone, without saying a word to us."

CHAPTER II.

THE next day, Savigny was seated at home, in a sad and melancholy mood, when he heard a voice, which he recognised at once, ask the servant if he was within; and in a few moments the door opened, and M. Lascour was announced. Lascour entered with an ease which bordered on familiarity; and after Savigny had, with ceremonious politeness, requested him to be seated, began as follows:—

"Sir, I have had the honour of meeting you at Madame Neville's, and I now come to do you a service."

"What, pray?"

"Sir, you are a coward."

"Sir, you shall make me atonement for this insult, and I will prove to you—"

"Don't get vexed, I entreat you; for you are not angry—only afraid, that's all. But I did not come to insult you; therefore, spare yourself a display of courage which does not deceive me. I resume then, and tell you, you are a coward."

"Sir!"

"Allow me to finish—"

"No, sir, nor will I suffer—"

"What a man! when I tell you that I did not come—"

"Such an insult in my own house!"

"Listen to me, do: I am as great a poltroon as you—a greater one—a thousand times greater. Be cool, and let us talk over our business quietly, and like men of sense. I will not repeat that you are a coward, since that word wounds your feelings, but will tell you that you are not a brave man. Neither am I, as I have already given you to understand—and that is what brings me here. You don't understand, I suppose?"

"Not in the least, sir."

"I presume so; but have patience a moment. Do you recollect that, a few days since, you were breakfasting at the Pavillon d'Ermenonville, in the Bois de Boulogne, and that a man with mustaches—"

At these words Savigny turned pale, and said in a hoarse voice, covering his face with his hands, "Pray, pray, spare me!"

"Be not alarmed, sir," replied Lascour, with his usual sang-froid, "I will not recal to your mind the degrading insult you have received, for I have come as a friend: all that I want you to understand is, that I saw you insulted, and saw you pocket the insult. You cannot conceive the object of my visit yet, I conclude?"

"No, sir."

"I will proceed. You are speaking with Madame de Neville about marrying her daughter. The young lady is beautiful, has a dowry of half a million, and everything is nearly arranged. But yesterday, after you went away, I told the family that you were the person insulted in the Pavillon d'Ermenonville; and the young lady declared openly that she would never marry a dishonoured man. The opportunity is a fine one, the fortune large, and it would be hard to lose it; it is therefore absolutely necessary for you to have a brilliant affair of honour, which may retrieve your reputation, but without exposing you to any danger—you understand—without exposing you to any danger—and I now arrive at the object of my visit."

Here Lascour paused for a moment. Monsieur Savigny listened, immovable, with his eyes nailed on the ground, as though choked with emotion, except that now and then a big tear rolled down his cheek. And Lascour, balancing himself carefully on his chair, watched his unfortunate patient with an ironical smile. He resumed:—

"I too need an act of courage which will make a noise, and for this reason:—I am an editor, as you know. To live by that business, we must be piquant: to be piquant, we must sink the truth, in a measure; we must use personalities and scandal; but I am afraid of those who will take offence at this. I want a brilliant duel as a shield, sheltered behind which, I can attack all my demi-courageous acquaintance, who, if I had never fought, would come to demand satisfaction from me; and when they know I have been out once, will pretend not to have seen the offensive article. When I saw you receive that insult at the Pavillon d'Ermenonville, it occurred to me, at first, to follow you everywhere, to seize the first opportunity to insult you publicly, and to build up a reputation for courage on your cowardice. But, I know not why, I esteem you, spite of that insult. I watched your conduct in that unfortunate dispute, and you are a man of honour: you were angry at yourself; you did all that you could to fight, and it was your nature only that refused. I am sure that you have wept many a night when you thought on that outrage; therefore, I at once gave up my plan of insulting you, and have discovered a means which reconciles everything, which retrieves your reputation, establishes mine, brings about your marriage, and assures my position in society; it is this:—"

Monsieur Savigny, who had not spoken for a quarter of an hour, and sat like a criminal before the inquisition, rallied his trembling limbs, and by a painful effort raised his head abruptly, approached Lascour, and said—

"Sir, I understand and despise you; leave the house!"

Lascour smiled, and answered, in no way disconcerted, "If it was not for my interest as well as for yours to remain, I would not stay a minute longer; but I have need of you as well as you of me, and I will do you a service in spite of yourself."

"Sir," said Savigny, with dignity, yet embarrassed, "you have heard."

"Listen to me," answered Lascour. "I ask your pardon for mentioning Madame de Neville's fortune to you just now. I know that you are above all interested views, but this is what binds you to me; you are in love, passionately in love with Mademoiselle de Neville—have you courage enough to resign her voluntarily?"

"Yes, it is better to resign her than win her by a trick."

"But reflect that you not only lose her, but remain dishonoured in her eyes; that she will always see the mark of insult on your cheek, and will never meet you without saying to herself, 'there is a man who has received a blow!'"

"Oh, 'tis the torture of hell!" said Savigny, and the sweat poured off his forehead.

"Say but a word, and that torture is at an end."

"But after all," said the young man in despair, "what do you intend to do?"

"Listen. Go to the opera this evening, place yourself in the front seat in the balcony, on the left; I will come a quarter of an hour after you, in the middle of the piece; I enter, you approach me, asking me by what right I presume to slander you; I answer you rudely, you call me an impertinent scoundrel; I grow angry, you lay hands on me, the spectators rise and surround us, and when a good many people are collected, I call you by name that all may know it is you, and we make an appointment for the next morning."

"Never, never!" said poor Savigny, panting for breath.

"You do not love Mademoiselle de Neville, then?"

"Not love her! heavens! not love her!" said he, striking his forehead.

"Well, let me go on, then. The next day, that is to-morrow, we go on the ground."

"I tell you I will not go," answered Savigny, with fury, "no, I will not go! Do you know that what you propose would be the eternal torment of my life! What! obtain the greatest blessing of the world; the esteem of my fellow-men, by fraud! Owe the respect I enjoy only to a stratagem, my friends to a trick! to reflect, in the midst of love's purest endearments, that I am stealing them—to see myself looked up to as a man of honour, and to feel that I am the most vile and degraded of created beings. No, sir, no! since I am a coward, I will pass for one, but I will not steal a character for courage; I will not go."

"Very well," said Lascour, coolly, "very well. I'll go and tell Mademoiselle de Neville."

"For mercy's sake, do not name that name," cried Savigny. "What shall I do—what agony—ah, you are my evil genius, Lascour. Marie—dishonour—the world—my conscience—my head is wandering—oh heavens! if I have thirty years more to live, take away five-and-twenty and give me courage!"

"I offer it to you without expense; why do you not except it?"

"Shall I have been the less insulted?"

"I alone saw the insult offered you, I alone make it known; you attack me as having slandered you, and all is blotted out. Listen to me, and let me finish. We go on the ground to-morrow morning; we place ourselves at twenty paces—no, at fifteen, it is more in form. The pistols are loaded; we fire, at the same time, six inches too high, you understand me? six inches too high. After the first fire, the seconds will declare that the laws of honour are satisfied. But you, for I yield up all the glory to you, you declare that the atonement is not sufficient, otherwise it would look like a duel between two deputies. They load; we fire, without touching either; they load a third time; we miss again; then the seconds interpose forcibly; you yield, at the same time declaring, that, if you were in my place, you would not be satisfied. However, we are reconciled, we shake hands, I am a brave man, you are a hero, your reputation is re-established, you marry Mademoiselle de Neville, and I announce it in my paper. What do you say to my plan?"

Savigny did not answer; his hand twisted convulsively in his hair, he seemed devoured by one of those internal conflicts which exhaust ten years of our life in an hour; his knees shook, and his contracted lips showed his teeth firmly set. He remained in this situation before Lascour five minutes, who alarmed himself at the sight of this silent, motionless agony, forgot his selfishness, was silent, and almost turned pale. All at once Savigny removed his hand, rose, said to Lascour in a hoarse voice, "This evening, at the opera!" and fled into his chamber.

CHAPTER III.

At eleven next morning the following scene was enacted in the Carrières Montmartre behind a wall; an open pistol-case lay on the ground, and two men, fifteen paces apart, had their weapons still in their hands. Then one of the seconds, stepping between them, said with a resolute air, "Gentlemen, six shots have been fired; it is enough for your honour, and too much, perhaps, for our consciences: the duel must cease, or I leave the ground." M. Lascour approached Savigny, and requested him to give him his hand.

"I have no right to refuse you, sir," said Savigny, and gave it to him.

"Now, gentlemen," said Lascour, addressing the seconds, "before we part, I will ask you to sign a declaration that M. Savigny and myself have acted like men of honour."

The seconds sat down on a grassy bank, and wrote hastily, in pencil:

"A meeting took place at Montmartre, this morning, between M. Savigny and M. Lascour, principal editor of the ——. Three shots were exchanged on each side, and we declare on our honour that the two combatants proved themselves men of courage."

[Signed] "DELAUNAY, DERCOURT, LENOIR, MORVAL."

This document being finished, M. de Launay, one of Lascour's seconds, drew near Savigny, and said,

"Sir, I earnestly desire that our acquaintance, begun under such unpleasant circumstances, will not end here; your honourable and spirited behaviour to-day ensures you my friendship for ever. If you will vouchsafe me yours in return, I shall be proud of it, as that of one of the most honourable men of my acquaintance."

Savigny bowed.

"Allow me, gentlemen," said Lascour, approaching and taking Savigny on one side, "allow me to say a single word to one who was, a moment since, my antagonist, and who I trust is now my friend. Well! what is the matter with you?—you seem quite anxious, and yet our plan has succeeded beyond my hopes. Do you know that I was afraid for a moment, at your first fire. If you had taken aim and shot me!"

Savigny made an indignant gesture.

"It would have been an original idea, at all events, my dear fellow. Luckily, everything went off as well as could be. Here is our seconds' declaration; I will take it to all the papers; it will be printed this evening, known by all parties to-morrow, at the end of a week we shall have two hundred friends more, and in a month's time we shall not be able to accept half the invitations that will pour in upon us at the Rocher de Cancale. Meantime, let us go to breakfast. What say you, gentlemen?—suppose we adjourn to the Pavillon d'Ermenonville—" but seeing Savigny turn pale at the name, he added, hastily, "no, I am wrong, to Gillet's."

"Gentlemen, excuse me for not joining you," said Savigny, "I feel somewhat unwell." And he got into his cabriolet alone, and drove off rapidly.

"What a strange fellow! how cool!" cried Delaunay, as he went away. "Do you know, my dear Lascour, you have had a lucky escape with such an antagonist!"

CHAPTER IV.

It is noon. A young girl in her morning-dress: her hair in disorder and her eyes swollen with weeping, goes incessantly from the door to the window of the saloon; leans as far as she can out of the balcony; stretches her neck out of the window, watching the entrance of the street with fixed gaze: removes the locks which shade her forehead to see the clearer, and then throws herself on a seat again, sobbing and concealing her face in her hands.

"He is dead! he is dead! I am sure he is dead!"

"My daughter; my dear daughter, do not give yourself up to despair in this way."

"And I, who suspected him of cowardice; I, who could think that he had tamely let himself be insulted, when at the same time—"

"He will return my daughter; he will return."

"Oh, if he returns! I will beg him to forgive me; I will throw myself at his feet: he will forgive me; I will repeat so often and so tenderly that I love him, that he will forgive me. But he will not return! and heaven punishes me for having dared to suspect the noblest of men. He is dead! I shall never see him again! Savigny, Savigny, oh, heavens!"

All at once, a slight noise was heard in the adjoining room. "'Tis he!" cried the young girl, and hurried to the door. Savigny entered in fact, very pale, and let himself drop on the first seat he could find. "You are not wounded, are you?" cried she: "no, no, you are not—oh, what happiness! It is he, mother, look, it is he; how I weep! but these are no painful tears; I would be glad to shed such always. Dear Savigny! how kind heaven has been to us. But pray, speak to me, say one word; one single word; I want to hear your voice; say only Marie, and I will understand it. What, still silent? Oh, I know you have heard of what I said, and are displeased with me. Oh, forgive me, my friend; I have been sufficiently punished for it: I have suffered so much. If you were told that your Marie had disgraced herself, you would die with grief; would you not? Well, then, judge of my sufferings, when a man assured me he had seen Savigny put up with an insult; my brave, my pure, my noble-minded Savigny; I ought not to have believed him, and yet he swore to me that he had seen it; and then it is your fault too if I am too nice on the point of honour. Why did you reveal to me all the treasures of your generous and lofty spirit? A drop of water stains the snow. Ah, forgive me; forgive me? What, you do not answer; you turn your head aside—this is cruel in you—I entreat you, look on Marie, who is stretching out her hands to you; you will not refuse me, and then, you know I am of the noble family of Neville; that family in which there never was a coward, and I thought I should have died when I reflected that he whom I loved had been insulted. But how could I believe it—it was a crime in me—an unpardonable crime. Tell me how I must ask your pardon, and I will do so. But look at me—look at your Marie, for if you do, you will not have the heart to be so angry. Oh, what happiness! your hand clasps in mine, your eyes melt with tenderness; I recognise Savigny's features, when he tells me 'I love you!' Oh, mother, mother, let me kiss him!"—and without waiting for her smiling mother's consent, she threw herself in her betrothed's arms, kissed him tenderly, and hid her face in his bosom. M. Savigny embraced her affectionately: kissed her fair locks; let a tear fall on her neck, and said "dear Marie;" then he disengaged himself from her arms, and went away, saying, "I shall return."

An hour afterwards, Madame de Neville received a letter from Savigny, stained with blood. He had just shot himself. Poor Marie!

CHAPTER V.

"JOSEPH, bring me my chocolate and the papers," said M. Lascour, from his alcove. "Ah, here is the paper. Let me read my own glory. Capital!"

"Yesterday a rencontre took place, etc."

"Very well, ah! Savigny's name again! what can that be?"

"Yesterday, about two o'clock, M. Savigny blew out his brains at his own residence. The motive of this horrid action is unknown. M. Savigny was on the point of connecting himself with one of the first families of the metropolis."

"Savigny! I must be dreaming—it is not possible—Savigny—yea, it is he, sure enough; he was on the point of connecting himself—there can be no doubt of it. What a riddle! such courage! This is a very meagre article. Something might have been made out of the close connexion between his duel and his suicide; something fine might have been said about the stern intrepidity of that man, who had risked his life three times that morning already, and yet dared to put an end to it an hour afterwards, not fearing death after having stood so near it! and this strangely brave man, fought with me; and I with him! It does me credit; I will touch the article up. But what could have been the reason? I cannot imagine. He must have been beside himself. With such a wild head he might have revealed our secret, if he had not destroyed himself. Joseph, bring me my chocolate!"

REVIEWS.

The Chinese as they Are. BY G. TRANSCANT LAY. 1 vol. 8vo. pp. 342. London: W. B. and Co.

THIS volume affords the reader an insight into the moral, social, and literary character of the Chinese: it moreover gives a new analysis of the language, and succinct views of the principal arts and sciences. It emanates from the pen of the Naturalist in Beechey's Expedition; and the author is moreover a man of a very religious turn of mind. We are therefore astonished to find him advocating the side of the English government, in its diabolical attempt to compel the Chinese to receive a poisonous and deleterious drug, to foster a demoralizing indulgence. The author advises the Chinese to allow the import of opium, and he says in the same breath that "Christianity, with the Bible in her hand, will come to her aid" at the same time. Yes—and Christianity would be received with suspicion when taught by the same lips which recommend the use of opium. What have the English done in other parts of the world? They have sent missionaries, with the Bible in their hands, to savages; and those missionaries introduced intoxicating draughts to those savages simultaneously with the waters from the fountain of eternal hope. Thus was it that the latter were received with suspicion, in consequence of the ravages committed by the former:—in other words, the savages looked with disgust upon men who taught them to be intemperate and the self-denying principle of Christianity at the same time. If the Chinese authorities consider that opium is injurious to the nation, England has no right to insist upon its free introduction into their country:—what should we think if France said to us, "You shall admit my wines, whether you like them or not?" But this author would inculcate a precious doctrine, when he coolly informs us that "when a legislator begins to make laws about morality, he encroaches upon the rights of the governed," and that he becomes a pest to society. What does this author mean? Are not all laws more or less intended to preserve morality? and must legislators think only of enacting statutes in order to see "that every subject has his own?" Of a verity, we are here favoured with a strange doctrine. We are however still more astonished a little farther on, where this lover of the gospel—this religious man writes as follows:—"Mother Church legislated against Heresy, and became herself the sink of everything that is filthy and abominable in false doctrine and practice." But let us leave the author to his own opinions, abandon the prejudiced portions of his work, and cull a few extracts from the narrative or discursive parts:—

"In China, the spendthrift, the man of lewd habits, the drunkard, and a large assortment of bad characters, slide into the opium-smoker: hence the drug seems to be chargeable with all the vices of the country. Opium, doubtless, has her victims in persons who, but for her fascinating lures, might have escaped their ruin; but in the great majority of instances she only adds one stain more to a character already polluted."

And if there be these occasional instances of ruin, effected through the medium of opium, there is sufficient reason to discourage its use. But this author would not banish a cause of misery or crime, unless its effects were universal! Let us hear him again:—

"Many use it in moderation, and are sufficiently masters of themselves to keep on the right side of slavery. But it is a subtle and traitorous inmate; and no one who has once felt the exhilarating effects of it, is sure that he will not one day fall a prey to its delusions. This great metropolis has a choice of degraded sights, but nothing that I ever see reminds me of an opium-eater."

The moderation-principle is here admitted to be as dangerous in respect to opium as it is in regard to drinking: if there were no opium used, there would be no moderate user thereof; and if there were no moderate user, there would be no intemperate one. The same may be said of drinking. But let us see the author's description of the opium-eater:—

"His lank and shrivelled limbs, tottering gait, sallow visage, feeble voice, and the death-boding glance of his eye, are so superlative in their degree, and so closely blended in their union, that they at once bespeak him to be the most forlorn creature that treads upon the ground."

The author abominates the use of opium, and yet he recommends the free admission of it into the country. Does he suppose that he would cure intemperance in England by taking off the duties on French brandy, and on all alcoholic liquors? Such reasoning is preposterous. He however recommends the establishment of Temperance Societies in China, and expresses himself favourable to the principle. The following extract is not very favourable to Chinese morality:—

"A Chinese is licentious in the general turn of his ideas, and makes a public display of those forbidden pleasures which in many countries are somewhat screened amidst the shades of retirement. The floating abodes for ladies of pleasure are generally of the gayest kind, and are consequently the first thing to attract the traveller's attention as he draws near the provincial city of Canton. These unfortunate women seldom parade the streets, except when they form a part of some public procession; so that here we have something like a regard to what is outwardly decent and fitting. It is a rare thing to see a man intoxicated abroad in the streets, as the time of jollity comes after the business of the day, as the sequel to the meal. By this means the outward graces of good order are preserved in the streets at night; and the evils of excess, when they occur, are not a little softened and subdued. If two men are seen walking hand-in-hand, it is ten to one that they are both flushed with drink:—as they draw near, the face dyed with a deep red, and the eyes gorged with blood in their superficial vessels and set fast in their sockets, demonstrate that the persons have taken more than their usual allowance of strong drink. Redness of eyes, as a sign of intoxication, is very conspicuous in the Chinese, as it was in the days of Solomon amongst the Jews."

The poor appear to be well off in China—much better off indeed in that heathen, barbarian land, than they are in civilised England—in England, the land of Bibles, of arts and sciences, and vaunted liberty! The author of the work under notice, says:—

"When the Corn-laws, and every enactment that has sprung out of the same stingy, short-sighted policy, shall be repealed, and foreigners allowed to sell us their produce freely, the welfare of our poor will increase with their numbers. They owe their present unfortunate predicament to legislation; and they will commence a new era in their happiness when the unstatesmanlike practice of taking from one part of the community and giving to another, shall be forgotten. In China, the lawyers make traps for the rich; but they leave the poor alone. If a man be poor, says the Shing Yu, he must not be proud and presuming on that account. Strange caution! yet not unreasonable in a country where the lower orders are permitted to fructify, thrive, and expand, free from all legislative impediment."

We shall conclude this notice with an extract which will recal to mind the case of Hoo Loo, who died in consequence of an operation, in this country, some years since:—

"Persons in the southern parts are subject to tumours of great size and variety. Many of these unsightly appendages, which had attained an enormous magnitude, were removed in the Ophthalmic Institution at Canton; and yet we seldom walk without meeting with some uncouth enlargement on the face, neck, or head of natives. One perhaps hangs pendulous from the ear: another forms a grotesque addition to the general physiognomy by shooting out laterally from under the chin: and a third springs up like a secondary head, as if in mockery of that which gave it birth. I have seen one about the size of a walnut sprouting from the gum, and overhanging the front teeth. From their frequency, I think we may say that they are in some measure endemic, or are occasioned by something in the way of diet, air, or water, that belongs to the spot. The air is wholesome and the watersweet and innocuous;—we are therefore led to seek the cause in their diet: this, though salutary and nutritious, is eaten with an abundance of moisture, and with but a very little salt, by the poorer sort, among whom these tumours chiefly abound. The rich, who can afford it, put salt to their dishes, to render them palatable; but not so the poor."

THE AIR.

THE air, or atmosphere in which we live and breathe, is a thin, invisible, and elastic fluid. It is material and as such must possess weight, and act with a certain determinate pressure on all those bodies which are immersed in it. Various conjectures have been formed with respect to the height of the atmosphere, and, as we know to a certainty the relative weight of a column of the atmosphere by the height to which its pressure will raise water or mercury in an empty tube, so different calculations have been founded on those data, to ascertain its extent as well as its density at different heights. If the air of our atmosphere were indeed everywhere of a uniform density, the problem would be very easily solved. We should in that case have nothing more to do than to find out the proportions between the height of a short pillar of air, and a small pillar of water, of equal weight; and having compared the proportion which the height these bear to each other in the small, the same proportion would be certain to hold good in the great, between a pillar of water thirty two feet high, and a pillar of air that reaches to the top of the atmosphere, the height of which we wish to know. Thus, for instance, we find a certain weight of water reaches one inch high, and a similar weight of air reaches seventy-two feet high:—this, then, is the proportion two such pillars bear to each other in the small scale. Now, if one inch of water be equal to seventy two feet of air, to how much air will thirty two feet of water be equal? By the common rule of proportion we readily find that thirty-two feet, or 384 inches, of water will be equal to 331,776 inches, which makes something more than five miles, which would be the height of the atmosphere, were its density everywhere the same as at the earth, where seventy-two feet of air are equal to one inch of water. But this is not really the case, for the air's density is not everywhere the same, but decreases as the pressure upon it decreases; so that the air becomes lighter and lighter, the higher we ascend; and, at the upper part of the atmosphere, where the pressure is scarcely anything at all, the air, dilating in proportion, must be expanded to a very great extent; and therefore the height of the atmosphere must be much greater than has appeared by the last calculation, in which its density was supposed to be everywhere as great as at the surface of the earth. In order, therefore, to determine the height of the atmosphere more exactly, geometericians have endeavoured to determine the density of the air at different distances from the earth.

In proof of the great diminution in the elasticity of the air as we ascend from the earth's surface, it may be enough to state that if the common balloon were filled on ascending from the earth, the gas would burst its silken envelop long ere it had attained the ordinary elevation of those flying vehicles. One of the modes of ascertaining by direct experiment the diminished density, consists in filling a flask with air at a given altitude, and then closing the aperture till the experimenter arrives at the earth's surface. The aperture is afterwards opened under water, and the difference between the air above and below is indicated by the quantity of water which enters. A cubic inch of such air as we breathe, would be so much rarefied at the altitude of 500 miles, that it would fill a sphere equal in diameter to the orbit of Saturn.

The light of the sun is visible before its body; and the sun itself appears some minutes sooner above the horizon than it apparently ought to do from astronomical calculations. Twilight is seen long before the sun appears, and that at a time when it is seen several degrees lower than the horizon. There is, then, in this case, something which deceives our sight; for we cannot suppose the sun to be so irregular in its motions as to vary every morning; for this would disturb the regularity of nature. The deception actually exists in the atmosphere: by looking through this dense transparent substance, every celestial object that lies beyond it is seemingly raised up, in a way similar to the appearance of a piece of money in a basin filled with water. Hence it is plain that, if the atmosphere were away, the sun's light would not be brought to view so long in the morning before the sun itself actually appears. The sun itself without the atmosphere would appear one entire blaze of light the instant it rose, and leave us in total darkness the moment of its setting. The length of the twilight, therefore, is in proportion to the height of the atmosphere; or let us invert this, and say that the height of the atmosphere is in proportion to the length of the twilight: it is generally found, by this means, to be about forty-five miles high, so that it was hence concluded either that that was the actual limit of the atmosphere, or that it must be of an extreme rarity at that height.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

DUNDEE.

ON Monday, March 22nd, the funeral rites were performed to the wife of CAPTAIN ROBERT MANN, of the Dundee and London trading schooner Courier, by the Rechabites of Dundee, of whose society she was a leading member. From the circumstance of its being the first funeral in Dundee at which females marched in procession to the resting-place, an extraordinary excitement prevailed; and one would have imagined that it was some great public meeting that was about to take place. The crowd was densely planted along the various streets leading to the cemetery. After depositing the remains in the grave, hymns were sung. About two hundred persons accompanied the funeral to the burying-ground, of whom a hundred and fifty were Rechabites, and the remainder were friends or relatives. They were arranged four deep, two females leaning between the arms of two men. The males had a white satin sash over their shoulders, and the females were attired in black, with black bonnets, sashes, and "weepers." Altogether the sight was most interesting and imposing.

SHREWSBURY.

On the 18th of March, a Teetotal Society was founded at Hopton, a place in the vicinity of Shrewsbury; on which occasion it was unanimously agreed that the Society be named the Hopton Total Abstinence Association, and that Mr. T. CORFIELD (of Berwick House) be the President, Mr. J. PRICE (of Ratt Bridge Ruyton) Treasurer, and Mr. J. C. CHAMBERS (of Holden Wood Cottage) Secretary. "This appointment," says our esteemed Shrewsbury Correspondent, "could not have fallen upon more active or zealous individuals in the cause of Teetotalism."

DEWSBURY.

On Saint Patrick's day, a meeting was held at the Temperance Hotel; and a most respectable audience of Teetotalers and Rechabites assembled, many of whom were natives of the sister island, which may now be truly denominated the "land of temperance." Mr. T. TODD presided over this meeting, which was also addressed by MESSIERS WARD, WORFOLK, CRADTREE, and SHELDRAKE. The Rechabite Tent, lately opened at Dewsbury, is flourishing in a most satisfactory manner, and contains numerous staunch members. We shall always be pleased to insert the notices forwarded to us by our correspondent of this place.

BARNSELY.

The cause of Teetotalism progresses so well in the vicinity of this place, that Societies have been formed at Burton, Silkstone, and Ardsley; and the members of these fraternities have determined to become Auxiliaries to the Wakefield Union. A new committee is to be formed for the Barnsley Association. Mr. WARD delivered a lecture at this place on Wednesday evening, March 24th, to a respectable audience.

SHEFFIELD.

The Teetotalers of Sheffield are active in the cause. Since Mr. JOHN HOCKINGS visited this important town, the principle has received a considerable impulse, and hundreds have been added to the Society. The meetings are all well attended. We wish our Sheffield correspondent would favour us with more frequent communications.

GREAT MARLOW.

On Wednesday evening, March 24th, Mr. MURPHY delivered an impressive lecture at this place. A Temperance Hotel is established in West Street. Mr. HENRY STALWOOD, lately of the United Temperance Association, is the Treasurer to the Marlow Society.

BRISTOL.

At the commencement of the month of January of this year, the "Good Samaritan" Tent, number 350 of the Independent order of Rechabites, was opened at Bristol, by MESSIERS TAIGGS, BAISTOW, NORTH, and WISDEN, the District Officers of Bath. On Wednesday, March 24th, another Tent was opened in the Bodminster district. The Teetotal Society of Bristol boasts of thirteen thousand members; and eight or nine meetings are held every week. It is however to be regretted that their meetings are not held in large and commodious buildings. Mr. WHITTAKER, the agent of the New British and Foreign Temperance Society, has lately been at Bristol; and so has Mr. PARSONS, the author of that excellent work Anti-Bacchus; these gentlemen have done much good. A Female Rechabites' Tent is about to be opened at Bristol. We hope that our correspondent, who favoured us with this information, will oblige us with communications as often as convenient.

TOWN NEWS.

WORKING-MAN'S TEETOTAL SOCIETY

On Monday, the 8th of March, a new meeting of this Society was opened at the Temperance Rooms, Black Horse Yard, Gray's Inn Lane. Mr. BOOTH, the Treasurer, presided; and most effective addresses were delivered by MESSIERS HOPKINSON, BETTS, BAYLIS, WOODWARD and BUTEUX. On the following Monday, Mr. SPARKS occupied the chair, and the meeting was addressed by MESSRS. ANDERSON, AARON BARNES, KIRCHIN, and various other able speakers. There appears every prospect of great success following the exertions of the advocates in the densely populated neighbourhood to which their labours are now directed. On the 19th of March, the meeting at Houduras Street was presided over by Mr. HOPKINSON; and amongst the various speakers were MESSRS. BOOTH, EAST, POWELL, CONNELL, CRUMP and BAYLIS. The eloquent and effective details given by Mr. Connell of the misery he had brought upon himself by intemperance, and the happiness he had subsequently experienced through Teetotalism, produced a powerful feeling on the minds of the audience; and the convincing and argumentative address delivered by Mr. Powell will doubtless be long remembered. The leading members of the Clerkenwell and Pentonville Youth's Teetotal Association have assisted at the above assemblies in chaunting the hymns at the opening and close of the meetings. At the last committee meeting of the Working Man's Society it was decided that the Eastern Railway and the Islington Societies should be received in connexion with it. Meetings are accordingly now held on Monday evening, in Black Horse Yard, Gray's Inn Lane; Tuesday at Denals's, Jerusalem Passage, Clerkenwell; Wednesday, South Street, New North Road, Islington; Thursday, Widegate Street, Bishopgate Street; Friday, Houduras Street, Old Street; and Saturday, at Denals's again. This is decidedly one of the most flourishing Societies in London; and we shall always be glad to report its proceedings.

CHELSEA AUXILIARY TO THE UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

EXCELLENT meetings are held by this Auxiliary every Tuesday and Friday night, at 56, George-street, Chelsea. On Friday, the 19th of March, the audience was most ably addressed by MESSIERS BROWN, FARMILLO, O'LEARY, TARNBY, BASSETT, ARNER, BLAIR, BARRINGTON, and KILPATRICK. There is a Youth's Society established in Chelsea, in connexion with this Auxiliary.

NORTH LONDON AUXILIARY TO THE NEW BRITISH AND FOREIGN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

A FESTIVAL and concert, with dissolving views, are to take place at the Milton Institution, Milton-street, Fore-street, on Good Friday, April 9th. The festival will commence at half past four, and the concert at seven.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

In consequence of the lease of the Aldersgate-street Chapel being a matter of dispute between several parties, the doors of this establishment are closed for the present. The executive committee of the United Temperance Association accordingly determined to take the Milton Institute, Milton-street, Fore-street, City, for weekly meetings, to be held every Monday evening, to commence at a quarter to eight o'clock precisely. This Association has now taken a stand which places it upon a level with any other Teetotal Society in the metropolis; and sincerely do we congratulate the spirited members of its committee upon the important step they have taken in this instance. The Milton Institute is twice as large as the Aldersgate-street Chapel, and will hold nearly two thousand persons: it is, moreover, in a neighbourhood where the chastening hand of Teetotalism is much required. The last meeting held by this Association at the Chapel took place on Wednesday, March 24th;—on Thursday morning, the Chapel was closed, in consequence of the litigation above alluded to; and on Friday evening the executive committee met and decided upon taking the Milton Institution. No time was thus lost; and we sincerely hope that this spirited proceeding will meet with adequate support. We are authorised to state that advocates of all Societies will be welcome at the Milton Institute on Monday evenings; and that a system of reciprocal interchange of advocates will be gladly adopted by the United Temperance Association. It is resolved by the committee of this Society that Teetotalism shall be advocated in its pure and abstract state on the Milton Institution platform, and on no pretence nor occasion connected with either sectarian principles of religion or party political doctrines. Members may sign any pledge, so long as the condition be one of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors. The committee solicits donations from the philanthropic, in aid of the cause, and will acknowledge them through the columns of The Teetotaler, and in its annual Reports. Such donations should be addressed to Mr. EMERSON, the Treasurer, 31, Fore-street.

The first meeting of the United Temperance Association at the Milton Institution was held on Monday evening, March 29th. The great banner was suspended above the chair, and the Union Jacks were hung around the spacious hall. At a quarter to eight the place was crowded to excess; and the audience was most respectable. Indeed, the whole scene was calculated to charm the hearts of all the friends of the cause, and especially those of the United Temperance Association. Had Dr. OXLEY and Mr. J. W. GREEN (of silver-spoon notoriety) been there, they would never have forgotten this triumph on the part of a Society whose interests they on all occasions go out of the way to declare publicly that they have especially at heart.

Mr. BENSTED, upon taking the chair, gave a concise history of the origin, progress, and plans of the United Temperance Association. He said it was formed to suit all classes, and to admit the votaries of all pledges. Its constitution had, moreover, an especial view to the union of all Teetotal Societies. The only test of membership is total abstinence; and of this rule the Society is rigid in the enforcement. It admits of no excuses—no pleas of ill health for deviating from the principle. He had also great pleasure in stating that this Association had no paid advocates; and that all who exerted themselves in its behalf, were disinterested. The audience would therefore have more confidence in what such advocates might say to those present. He concluded a most able oration with an energetic eulogium upon the principles of UNION!

Mr. CRUMP, the Registrar, said that the last time he was at this Institution was when it was a theatre; and he was then drinking gin with a dramatic author. That was, of course, before he became a Teetotaler; and he would take very good care that he would never drink any more of that soul-destroying poison. He regretted that the progress of Teetotalism was not so rapid in London as it was in the provinces; but the United Temperance Association was now determined to exert itself with renewed energy. He was himself happy in consequence of being a Teetotaler, and wished to impart that felicity by explaining the means of acquiring it. He would appeal to his wife whether he had not been a better husband since he had joined the Society—and to his eight children whether he had not been a better father. In course of time the Teetotalers will build almshouses for their poor and aged. He wound up his excellent speech with some able observations upon the necessity of UNION.

Mr. EDWIN P. HOOD was rejoiced to hear from the chairman that the advocates of this Society were not paid. This circumstance was alone calculated to enable the Society to take the highest stand in the metropolis. The principles of total abstinence were open to and within the reach of all. The greatest spirits of past ages had succumbed to the terrible influence of intoxicating drinks. Especially would he allude to Sheridan, who had once been connected with the present place of meeting, when it was a theatre. There is no danger like that associated with the fascinating powers of strong drink. Virtue and happiness withered beneath its pestilential breath; and all that is bright, beautiful, intellectual, and glorious, faded and drooped into the dust before its whirlwind-away. Mr. HOOD also wound up his eloquent speech with the praises of UNION.

THE REV. Mr. BABAGE said that the aim of the Teetotalers was to make the people happy. "Let them laugh who win,"—and surely the Teetotalers are the gainers by the system. The Publicans made men wretched and miserable; and their liquors destroyed health and undermined wealth. Teetotalism is the only salutary measure to reclaim the drunkard, and arrest the moderate drinker on his career to ruin. He related a most affecting anecdote of the miseries of a family, which was brought from a wealthy and exalted station to one of the most abject misery, by means of strong drink. Teetotalism had done immense good in Wales, where there were now upwards of 200,000 staunch Teetotalers. The Rev. gentleman also sang the praises of UNION!

THE REV. Mr. FAULKNER, of the British and Foreign Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, felt great pleasure in addressing the audience on that occasion. He had lately had an opportunity of witnessing the progress of the cause in Norfolk and its environs, and during his sojourn in that district had himself received 900 signatures. Of these 200 were those of reclaimed drunkards. Great obstacles were thrown in the way of the cause by the obstinacy of the sticklers for moderate drinking. But if by the moderate use of liquors, one individual had gradually been led on to become a drunkard, the fallacy and delusion of the Moderation system became apparent. There was a time when the advocates for the abolition of slavery were laughed at, and treated as visionary theorists; but now much had been done to effect their entire object, and all Britain raised a cry of execration against the system of slavery. The cry of the murdered African had gone up to heaven; and God had heard it. The cry of the dying drunkard echoed to the same eternal realms, and the same Almighty power had heard it. Teetotalism was now doing the same for the slave of strong drinks, as the abolitionists had done for the African.

Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS expatiated upon the benefits to be received from the Teetotal principle, and denounced the Moderation-doctrine as irrational and absurd.

The chairman then announced that the meetings would be held at that place every Monday evening at a quarter to eight o'clock, and that there would be no charge for admission.

CHAPTER XII.

IN WHICH MR. SNODGRASS AMUSES HIS FRIENDS WITH CERTAIN EXTRACTS FROM A HIGHLY INFLUENTIAL JOURNAL; AND THE READER WILL ALSO BE REGALED WITH AN EXTRAORDINARY ADVENTURE, IN WHICH MR. TUPMAN AND MR. ALFRED JINGLE WERE THE HEROES.

LORD BROUOHAM has very justly defined true greatness to consist in being in advance of one's time; and the poets and philosophers who have found most favour with the world, are those who have been mindful of this plain truth. We should all leave the things which are behind, and reach forward to those which are before. Perhaps the reason why Milton was so little appreciated in his time was to be found in the choice of his subject, as he very coolly went all the way back to the days of the antediluvians. With such a melancholy instance of misapplied genius before his eyes, Mr. Alfred Jingle imagined that it would have been little less than intellectual suicide to have adopted the views and followed the pursuits of the present day: he accordingly devoted himself to those gigantic proceedings which naturally furnished for his discourse an elevation of ideas that was often mistaken for exaggeration, and not unfrequently designated by certain envious and jealous individuals as "deliberate lies."

All this is preparatory to saying that Mr. Jingle astonished the folks, whom he met at the table of Mr. Snodgrass, with the very remarkable incidents he related, especially in connexion with his American travels.

"Well, that certainly is very extraordinary!" ejaculated Mr. Snodgrass, at the termination of one of the aforesaid anecdotes. "But are the Americans good poets?"

"Good poets!" cried Jingle,—"really wonder—man like you—great endowments—vast acquirements—ask the question. American poets—nothing like 'em—write by steam—railroad pace—out-and-outers. Go to New York—see manufactory—poems of all kinds—steam-engine—thousand horse-power—turns 'em out—sixty a day—all epics—ten cantos—each canto thousand lines. Poets starving—manufactory ruin 'em all—no exception—cruel—very!"

"Do you really mean to say that poems are now made by steam in the United States?" demanded the astonished Mr. Snodgrass.

"Honour bright—wouldn't humbug—not for thousands—ready cash."

"And pray are the American ladies very beautiful?" enquired Mr. Tupman.

"Philadelphia—finest girls—can't keep eyes off 'em," answered Mr. Jingle. "Splendid figures—waist so thin—high wind—cuts 'em in halves—right in the middle—bnst falls one way—legs another. Very modest too—no giggling—can't say—bo to goose."

"The Americans are very great sportsmen, I believe—are they not?" asked Mr. Winkle.

"Nothing like them—regular Nimrods—capital sporting too—not like ours—we shoot birds—they hunt Kangaroos. One day—American gentleman—friend of mine—fell in the midst—Kangaroo army—taken prisoner—King of the Kangaroos—very kind—gave him daughter—Miss Kangaroo—in marriage. Soon got tired—Kangaroo life—ran away—came back—told the story. One thing odd though—partner's money—thirty thousand dollars—in his pocket—when he first set out. When he came back—hadn't a doit—left it all—Kangaroos. Became bankrupt—got certificate—ever after rich man."

"Wonderful!" cried Mr. Snodgrass. "But I have a little boy, Mr. Jingle, who is himself a prodigy; and so I can very well believe all that you have told me."

"Ah! American boys—very forward—come into the world—A. B. C.—tip of their tongue;—read Latin—three years old—Greek, five—Hebrew, seven—Chinese, nine—Hottentot, eleven—unknown tongues at thirteen. Wonderful—very!"

"My boy is not so clever as all that," observed Mr. Snodgrass; "but he is very talented. You must know that at the Charter-House they have started a magazine called The Carthusian; and so Mr. Wackem, the master of the school to which my little Augustus goes, has started his magazine. It is edited by an association of infants, and manifests the most unflinching courage in contending for their rights. Here is the first number."

Mr. Snodgrass dragged a small pamphlet from his pocket, and requested Mr. Jingle to observe the beauty of the typography, the blackness of the ink, and the admirable texture of the paper.

"It is really very well got up," continued the enraptured Mr. Snodgrass, "and is highly creditable to Mr. Wackem and the editors. My son, Mr. Jingle," added Mr. Snodgrass, speaking as if that were one of the proudest moments of his life, "is the Chairman of the Editorial Board."

It is extremely distressing to be compelled to relate, at this period, that Mr. Jingle burst out into a very loud fit of laughter, as Mr. Snodgrass gravely and solemnly delivered himself of the preceding observations; and that even Mr. Tupman and Mr. Winkle joined in the mirth of the former gentleman.

"Well—you may laugh," cried Mr. Snodgrass; "but I will just enable you to judge for yourselves. Here are articles of all kinds—political—moral—social—commercial—scientific—and historical. The first paper is on the Treachery of the Whigs, and is written by Master Simcox, a youth of seven: the next is on Trade, and emanates from the pen of my son. Stay—I will read you a piece of that as a specimen."

Mr. Snodgrass accordingly commenced, in a tone of befitting solemnity and with due emphasis on the most interesting passages, the following article:—

"Trade, during the past week, has been unusually dull. Shop-keepers make great complaints of a falling off in the demand for some articles which are usually, at this season, in great request. A dealer in marbles states that since the last holidays, his sales have fallen off one third, and that the market is literally glutted with alley laws and commoneys. Ginger-bread nuts are, however, in some request, and we have heard of one house doing business with a new stock at the rate of twelve a penny. Hard-bake is freely offered in lots of half an ounce, and holders appear extremely desirous of sales. Hard-boiled eggs remain as they were; but ginger-beer is decidedly lively. Lollipops and bulls'-eyes are firm at quotations; but sugar-candy has experienced a still further decline. An ancient lady, who keeps a portable warehouse under an arch, effected a considerable sale yesterday afternoon of peppermint lozenges; but the terms have not yet transpired. The penny-pie market is brisk, and the dealers speak confidently. As the holidays are approaching, we may confidently look for a return of former prices; and as the quarterly allowance to boys under twelve years will then become due, a considerable amount of pennies will be thrown into circulation, which cannot but have a favourable influence on the dealers in tin-trumpets—a branch of industry which, we are sorry to learn, is labouring under deep depression."

"Admirable!" ejaculated Mr. Tupman, as Mr. Snodgrass terminated this comprehensive and liberal view of the condition of commerce and manufacture.

"Here is a piece of news headed Ancient Sports," continued Mr. Snodgrass; "and this also emanates from the pen of my son. I will read it to you:—

"We are always happy to remark anything like a return to the simple habits and tastes of our ancestors; for although we are strenuous advocates for improvement, it must be nevertheless allowed that our forefathers excelled in certain rural and innocent diversions, in which we of the present age are miserably deficient. Considerable excitement was yesterday occasioned in the play-ground (and no small amusement was the result) by a revival of the ancient custom and manly exercise of jumping in sacks. The performers were two dark gentlemen, vulgarly denominated sweeps; and they went through their task with peculiar gracefulness of evolution and agility of limb. We are however bound, as impartial journalists, to declare that the attempt of one to dance a fandango in his sack, was a failure. Taglioni would not have feared a rival in this instance. The two gentlemen were liberally rewarded by the spectators; and as soon as they had issued from their sacks, they explored Mr. Wackem's kitchen-chimney, and chanted an Italian scena on the top. Altogether the entertainments were of a character to make a lasting impression upon those present; and we hope that the good old games of our ancestors—such as climbing a greasy pole for a leg of mutton—running after a pig with a soaped tail—donkey-racing—and eating treacle-biscuits, will be revived."

"Better and better!" said Mr. Tupman, rubbing his hands together with ineffable delight. "Really, your boy is quite a prodigy, Snodgrass."

"Wonderful fellow—second Addison—quite a Steele—Johnson in jacket and trousers—giant-dwarf," exclaimed Mr. Jingle, who just woke up from a nap into which he had fallen as Mr. Snodgrass commenced the first article from Wackem's Infant's Miscellany.

"I must just read you one more paper," said the delighted Mr. Snodgrass: "it will show you with what unflinching courage and firmness the boys at Wackem's school insist upon the enjoyment of their just rights and privileges."

As no one offered any objection—(because Mr. Jingle composed himself to take another nap, and neither Mr. Tupman nor Mr. Winkle would have wished to annoy their friend)—Mr. Snodgrass read the following memorable article from the journal which he held in his hand, and which, the reader will admit, was an ornament to the press of this great and enlightened nation:—

"A deputation of boys waited upon the master last evening, to demand satisfaction for an affront put upon a child by the name of Tommy Biggins, by the under teacher, Mr. Sopht Soap. The facts of the case are these, as we gather from the chairman of the deputation:—as Master Tommy Biggins was making a scientific experiment in respect to a circle (or, in other words, trundling a hoop) in the play-ground, in the quiet enjoyment of his rights and privileges as a Briton, he chanced to run against the legs of Mr. Sopht Soap, doing, however, no other damage than spattering this gentleman all over with mud; and for this trifling offence, Mr. Sopht Soap had the unparalleled audacity to pull the boy's ears. As soon as the matter became known, a tremendous excitement was the consequence: a meeting was called; the most enthusiastic speeches were made; and several very severe resolutions were passed without a dissenting voice. A committee was immediately appointed, to wait upon Mr. Wackem, and demand the instant removal of the offender. One of the committee was Mr. Sopht Soap's youngest brother, and he was lead in his denunciations against his relation, although only four years old. We have not yet heard the nature of Mr. Wackem's reply; but as soon as it is received, a supplement will be issued from our office. We are glad to have this opportunity of recording our determination to support our privileges. This same Mr. Sopht Soap lately submitted a plan to Mr. Wackem for dividing the play-ground into two parts, for the big and the little boys; but we fearlessly set our face against the measure. The integrity of the play-ground must be preserved: its dismemberment would lead to the most disastrous results. We live in stormy times; and should guard against all improper innovations. The minds of the school-boys are very unsettled in consequence of these circumstances, and some survey their brethren with distrust. These are the times which try boys' souls. We shall keep a constant eye upon the affair of the play-ground; as, should such a measure be carried into effect, there is no saying where such despotic invasions of our rights will stop."

"Ah—well—that's all—thank heavens—boy's journal—precious stupid—makes one sleepy."

"What did you say, my dear sir?" enquired Mr. Snodgrass, with considerable hesitation.

"Oh! beg pardon—merely dreaming—that is—pleasant reverie—interesting subject—boys' articles—wide awake—uncommon."

And Mr. Jingle yawned fearfully half a dozen times, as he delivered himself of these observations.

"Come," said Mr. Snodgrass, "I will read you something which will really please you. This paragraph occurs in the Notices to Correspondents :—

"An opinion appears to be current in society, that the editor of a newspaper is bound to print all the communications that he may receive on any subject, whether the sentiments that they contain be congenial with his own, or not: but such is not the view that we take of the matter. Although we live in an age when a man has a right to do wrong, so free is human will, yet we are not so far advanced in freedom, that any one can be compelled to do wrong to himself, to oblige another. That day may arrive; but it has not yet. We wish that these remarks may be considered by the writers of poetry, of all kinds, as intended expressly for them; and, in an especial manner, for the translators of German doggrel. These latter writers seem to think that as the art of printing is of German origin, the whole force of the press should be devoted to villanous translations of incomprehensible verses out of that language. We have now on hand several large drawers full of Germanic verses, besides an innumerable number of essays on the genius of Goethe. The worst of it is that all these things are written by the youngest children, whose time and talents might be devoted to better purposes. From the above remark Philo Novalis; A. B. C., and a score of others, will learn the reason why their effusions have not been printed in our columns."

"A very manly notice!" said Mr. Tupman.

"Very—when we recollect that it was written by Augustus, who is not quite eight yet," cried Mr. Snodgrass.

In such a manner as this did the time pass away; and at half-past nine o'clock a coach came to fetch Mr. and Mrs. Winkle. Mr. Tupman then rose to depart, and Mr. Jingle followed his example.

"Where do you hang out?" demanded Jingle.

"Hatchet's, Piccadilly," was the reply.

"All in my way—walk with you—keep you company—see you safe—come along."

The two gentlemen bade adieu to Mr. and Mrs. Snodgrass, and commenced their walk.

"Lovely night—quite poetical—silvery moon—flickering stars—solemn silence—and all that. Smoke a cigar?"

"With pleasure," returned Mr. Tupman; "but where shall we get a light?"

"Dear fellow—man of the world—always provided—three things—necessary to existence—civilized country."

"And what are those three essentials to life?" demanded Mr. Tupman.

"Lucifer box—bill-stamp—card case. All the cards—different names—different addresses."

"And what is the bill-stamp for?" enquired Mr. Tupman, as he lighted his cigar by one of his companion's matches.

"Oh! always useful—meet friend—friend good fellow—would lend you money—hasn't any convenient—can give you acceptance though."

"And the cards with the various addresses?" asked Mr. Tupman.

"What—man like you—not wide awake—really thought—friend Tupman—up to snuff. Gay fellow—fond of the girls—make appointments—got cards—all sorts—ready at hand. Well—what's to be done—quite early—not ten yet—go to Adelphi—time for last piece?"

Mr. Tupman assented to this proposal; and Mr. Jingle hailed a cab, into which he and his companion stepped. They continued to smoke their cigars inside the vehicle, much to the annoyance of the driver, who however remonstrated in vain; for all the reply he obtained from Mr. Jingle was the following:—

"Ought to know—much better—interfere—gentlemen—cut along—say another word—punch your head. Touch him up—lame horse—got no raw—snail's pace. All cabmen—sad scoundrels—very."

In process of time the two gentlemen arrived at the Adelphi, and Mr. Jingle sauntered into the hall, leaving his friend (doubtless in a fit of absence of mind) to settle with the cabman. The same mental abstraction will also account for the fact of Jingle's not offering to pay for his admission, and assigning that task to the very accommodating Mr. Tupman. They obtained excellent seats in the stage-boxes, Mr. Jingle having declared that he never went anywhere else.

Both the gentlemen gazed first around the semicircle, which was adorned with all kinds of countenances and all manners of garbs. Youth and age—beauty and wrinkles—natural joy and forced mirth, were all apparent there. An old dowager, with her immense turban, her fan, and her low gown, displaying a disgusting exuberance of bosom,—and a modest girl, with her hair adorned only by a single rose, and with her frock concealing although describing the contours of her form, were seated in the box opposite to the two gentlemen. Alas! consumption, like a worm in the bud, feeds on the damask cheek of that beautiful girl. And yet she knows it not. Light-hearted she frequents the place of merriment, and enters enthusiastically into the spirit of the performance. But she will pass away as doth a leaf, in autumn, or with the milder breath of spring. Her companions will lament her; and they will pluck the garland of the May-queen to pieces, to scatter it upon the grave.

These thoughts are sadly out of place; but grim death will be thrusting his visage everywhere; and there are goblins in every theatre, masquerade, and ball. Close behind those two ladies stood a dandy, in the shape of a merchant's clerk—his legs apart, and forming an isosceles triangle with the ground. He wore straps half a yard long, his trousers being that much too short, and a very vulgar brooch in the false bosom over his shirt. His guard-chain dangled in festoons about his waistcoat. He really thought every body was looking at him; and he shook his head from time to time, and allowed certain expressions to escape his lips, as if involuntarily, in order to impress his neighbours with an idea that he was a good judge of theatricals, and found the present piece execrable.

Down in the pit, sat an old man, holding a beautiful little boy, about four years old, upon his knee, and kindly answering all his questions. Close by him was an unfortunate young man, as thin as grim death—the victim of a tape-worm; and yet he would laugh and shake his lean sides. Thus wise men and fools—the handsome and the ugly—the proud and the unassuming, were mingled in that epitome of the world. Amidst the brightest reminiscences of childhood are those when the theatre was visited for the first time; when the green curtain was down, and the tardy musicians crept one by one from some subterraneous place into the orchestra; and at last the overture was finished, and the bell rang, and the foot lights were raised up to burst upon the scene of enchantment! But the reminiscences of childhood remain, while its joyous realities disappear for ever; and those longing—lingering looks, which are thrown towards the past, are often all that poor suffering mortals possess to soothe the present!

When Mr. Tupman and Mr. Jingle had satisfied their curiosity by gazing around the crowded theatre, they condescended to cast a glance towards the stage.

"Well—upon my word—this is very odd—very odd!" ejaculated Mr. Tupman to his friend, as he examined the proceedings of the performers; "one would really think that the actor who stands by the table there, was our mutual friend Pickwick."

"By jingo—not far out—meant for him—there he is—walking likeness—gaiters—shorts—bald head—spectacles—admirable hit—very!"

"I really begin to imagine that the performance more or less relates to Pickwick," said Mr. Tupman; and his doubts were now speedily cleared up by the entrance upon the stage of an actor whose part was to personate Mr. Samuel Weller.

Mr. Tupman was perfectly astonished—Mr. Jingle was in an ecstasy of delight. The play proceeded: its plot related to a love affair in which Mr. Pickwick was supposed to have been involved by means of a letter; and in due time, Mr. Winkle, Mr. Snodgrass, and Mr. Weller senior were all introduced—or rather their representations were—into the business of the plot. Mr. Tupman was uncertain what to do—the boxes clapped, the pit roared—and the gallery stamped enough to pull the whole house down. The dilemmas, into which Mr. Pickwick was represented to have fallen, elicited universal applause; and the actors performed their parts, and hit off the characters assigned to them, to perfection. The flush of anger suffused itself upon the countenance of Mr. Tupman; and Jingle saw that it would require but little to induce him to interrupt the whole performance.

At this moment a person appeared at the door of the box and enquired if the gentlemen wanted a play-bill. Mr. Tupman greedily availed himself of this opportunity of clearing up all doubts; and he instantaneously purchased a bill. Passing over all the attractive announcements of the commencement, he looked towards the foot of the bill; and there he saw the words—"THE PICKWICKIANS: a Farce: to be supported by the whole strength of the company."

"I'll strength them," muttered Mr. Tupman between his teeth; and, hearing his own name mentioned upon the stage at this moment, he cast his eyes in that direction. There did he behold himself—his own counterpart—personified by a great, fat, stout, vulgar, red-cheeked fellow, who was dressed in the very fashion so long adopted by the original character!

This was quite enough for Mr. Tupman; or, if it had not been sufficient to provoke his wrath, the enthusiastic applause of pit, boxes, and gallery, would have supplied any deficiency of incitement to immediate vengeance. Mr. Tupman started from his seat, clambered upon the front of the box, lowered himself down with as much prudence as possible, and at length tumbled heavily upon the stage. He however fell in a sitting posture, and did not greatly hurt himself. To rise upon his legs—to rush forward—to seize the actor, who was personifying himself—and to commence pommelling him with all his might and main,—these were all the work of a minute with Mr. Tupman.

"My eyes, here's a go!" shouted a voice in the gallery.

"I wonder whether this here is any part o' the performances," cried another. "If so, that there new comer plays his part very nateral."

"Cut along—keep moving—at him again—brave fellow, Tupman—never say die—peg away—that's it!" ejaculated Mr. Jingle, who enjoyed the scene more than any one present. "Go it again—all fair play—got his head in Chancery—hit him hard—ain't got no friends—capital lark—famous!"

In the meantime the whole theatre was in confusion. Ladies shrieked—gentleman laughed—and blackguards shouted. The orange-peels and nuts showered in volleys upon the stage; and Mr. Tupman continued to inflict personal chastisement upon the offending actor, without relaxation, and without mercy. At first the other actors were too much astonished to interfere, or to know what course to adopt;—but, after the lapse of a few moments, they hastened to the assistance of their comrade. The battle now became general: perukes flew about in all directions—and the volleys of missiles from the galleries added greatly to the interest of the scene. At length Jingle perceived that his friend was likely to come off second best; he accordingly leapt nimbly upon the stage, and hurried to his assistance.

Mr. Jingle speedily forced a passage through the crowd of performers, and laid hold of Mr. Tupman by the coat-tails. In this way he pulled him from the stage, behind the scenes, himself stepping backwards the whole time, to facilitate the manoeuvre. Thus was Mr. Tupman effecting a retreat, and yet skirmishing with his enemies the whole time. Suddenly Jingle fell backwards down a narrow flight of stairs, against which he had retrograded; and Mr. Tupman fell upon him. They scrambled up in a moment, and found that they had forced open a little door, which afforded them a means of egress by the back of the theatre. Not an instant was to be lost: Jingle suspected that the police was already after them, for the disturbance thus created; and he accordingly urged his companion to escape at once. This advice was fortunately well received by Mr. Tupman, whose indignation had somewhat subsided beneath the weight of sundry huge fists; and he and Jingle succeeded in accomplishing a safe, though rapid retreat from the vicinity of the Adelphi-Theatre.

GLEANINGS FOR TEETOTALERS.

MR. BEAUMONT, the author of an Essay upon the Nature of Alcoholic Drinks, says that spirits act peculiarly "by injuring the digestive organs: it is maintained by an eminent physiologist, that they are always hurtful to the inner coat of the stomach, even though there may be no sensible indications experienced at the time. By their anti-septic and astringent properties, they retard and damage the digestive functions. Their stimulating quality is highly prejudicial to the brain and nervous system; and it is the spirit-drinker who is especially liable to the delirium tremens, or the drunkard's mania." The slightest quantity of strong drink is unnecessary and useless; and if people will not follow the directions of medical men to preserve health, how can they have any confidence in them when they are ill? The author just quoted says, "Wines are productive of a class of symptoms which, though similar in some respects, differ in others; and this may arise from their more compound character. Thus, if ardent spirits have the property of producing structural diseases of the stomach, as inflammation, thickening, ulceration, &c., the vinous drinks are more frequently productive of functional derangement in this organ." Sir Anthony Carlisle has declared that long continued and watchful observation has induced him to conclude that the acid qualities of fermented wines are decidedly hurtful. Wines injure also by their stimulating property, and like concentrated spirits, produce an undue excitement of the heart and circulating system. Mr. Beaumont says that "popular opinion is immensely in favour of home brewed beer; and it is a strange and startling heresy in the ears of John Bull to denounce and defame the character of John Barley-corn; and yet, notwithstanding the prevailing opinions and the general practices of all orders of society, it cannot be concealed that even the moderate use of malt liquor has proved injurious to many, whilst an inordinate indulgence in this beverage has brought thousands to an untimely grave!"

The consequences of the odious vice of intemperance are not only perceived in the domestic circle, but also in the felicity and prosperity of nations. Social and political order has no guarantees in a country whose inhabitants are a prey to habits which pervert all the sympathies of human nature, throw a cloud over all the charities and amenities of life, and change the naturally pacific disposition into that of the madman and reckless destroyer. Obstinate individuals may declaim against Teetotalism as a doctrine which requires the drunkard and moderate drinker to abandon the use of intoxicating liquors altogether and suddenly: but would those same reasoners assert that an individual who has long lain in the impure air of a noisome dungeon, must only be removed from it by degrees, or that a man who has fallen into the fire or water should lie there a little while on account of the danger of removing him suddenly? Is it possible to shake off a dangerous habit with too much abruptness, or with too little preparation? Mr. Robert Barker, the surgeon of Bedford, says,—"In the event of disease being induced by the sudden relinquishment of the stimulant, it will be much better for the individual that it should be combated by the medical practitioner, than that the use of the stimulus should be persevered in. It may be a source of some pleasure to the reclaimed drunkard to know that the fluid, water, to which he restricts himself, has been much extolled as a medicinal agent." Dr. Saunders also puts the following observations upon record:—"A more decidedly beneficial use of water as a medicine is in relieving those deranged functions of the stomach and bowels, and biliary organs, occasioned by the most frequent of all causes of disease, especially with men of middle age, and in easy circumstances, a long and habitual indulgence in high food, strong drink, and all luxuries of the table." Van Swieten, in his celebrated commentaries upon the aphorisms of Boerhaave, says:—"When plethoric persons eat and drink too plentifully, especially of spirituous liquors, they are exposed to very great danger. Thus we see after plentiful feasting, the guests have their faces become flushed, turgid, and their eyes red, nay very frequently they even become sleepy and stupid. This is the reason why so many persons who live intemperately fall down apoplectic, in the midst of their festivities." It is, moreover, well known that seven cases out of ten of the malt-liquor drunkards expire of apoplexy or palsy. The following remarkable account of the liver of Cook, the celebrated actor, will doubtless make an impression upon the reader who is in the habit of regarding such statements with either levity or incredulity:—Doctor Hosack opened his body and found that the liver hardly attained its usual dimensions, was astonishingly hard, and its texture so dense as to make considerable resistance to the knife. The blood-vessels, which in a healthy condition are extremely numerous and large, were in this case nearly obliterated, evincing that the natural circulation through the liver had long since ceased; and tubercles were found throughout the whole substance of the organ.

We cannot refrain from transferring to our columns the following hideous picture of the condition of the intemperate—a description which Mr. Barker, whose work we have before quoted, has drawn—and not over-drawn:—"By the habitual, excessive use of intoxicating liquors, the whole system shortly bears marks of debility and decay. The voluntary muscles lose some of their power, and cease to act so readily under the controul of the will; and hence all the movements become awkward. The body appears tottering and infirm, and the step loses its elasticity and vigour. The muscles, and especially those of the face and lips, are often affected with a convulsive twitching, which produces the involuntary winking of the eye, and quivering of the lip, so characteristic of the intemperate. The extremities are at length seized with a tremor, which is severer after a recovery from a fit of intoxication. The lips lose their significant expression, and become sensual; the complexion assumes a sallow, leaden hue, or is changed to an unhealthy fiery redness, and is covered with red streaks and blotches, which are frequently the surest indications of organic change within the abdomen. The eye becomes watery, tender and inflamed, lacks its intelligence and lustre, and its lids are frequently oedematous. These appearances, with a puffed and bloated appearance of the whole body, which is frequently observed, and a dry feverish skin, seldom fail to distinguish the habitual drunkard. These effects which are external, and obvious to every one, are only the signals which nature holds out, and waves in token of internal distress. At the time the drunkard has been pouring down his oft-repeated draughts, and making merry over his cup, diseases have been making insidious progress within."

The habit of indulging in intoxicating liquors is an acquired practice and not a natural propensity. The first time children taste wine or spirits, they do not like them, but request to be allowed to have the sweet wine and the spirits and water with sugar. This fact proves that the taste does not naturally relish alcoholic liquors; and the most unreasonable will be compelled to admit, that, if nature's habits be good, it is absurd—nay wicked to change or pervert them into evil ones. "Were we to continue to increase the use of these poisons," says the Rev. Mr. Parsons, in Anti-Bacchus; "for another century at the rate that we have done for the last hundred years, the chief shops amongst us would be gin-shops and apothecaries' shops; and the chief employments those of the doctor, the undertaker, and the sexton; and poor-houses, hospitals, lunatic asylums, prisons, hulks, and grave-yards would be multiplied and enlarged beyond any present calculation. Thank God total abstinence has already checked the destroying fiend, and is about to step between the living and the dead, that the plague may be stayed!" Sir John Floyer says, that water drinkers are temperate in their actions, prudent and ingenious. They live safe from the diseases which affect the head, such as apoplexies, palsies, pains, blindness, deafness, convulsions, and madness; water resists putrefaction, and cools burning heat. Dr. Mainwaring, in his Method and Means of Enjoying Health, says,—"Water is the most wholesome drink, the most suitable for human nature, answering all the purposes of common drinks: it is a drink that is a rule to itself, and requires little caution in the use of it, since none will be tempted to drink more of it than he needs. In the primitive ages of the world, water-drinkers were the longest lived by hundreds of years, and were not so often sick and complaining as we are."

The Rev. W. R. Baker, in his Curse of Britain, observes,—"It is well known that the habits of drunken parents have a powerful influence on the physical nature of their children, causing them to be brought into existence with an unhealthy brain, and consequently, with a defective intellect. To attempt, then, the conversion of drunkards themselves, while they are allowed the use of intoxicating liquors, is, in most cases, as irrational as it would be for a physician to endeavour to correct the hallucinations of a madman by the employment of logic, rather than by the use of medicines calculated to restore health to the disordered brain. * * * Intemperance is a civil evil: it is an offence against the good order of society. It undermines the foundation of national prosperity, and may therefore be remedied by measures which, if lawful in themselves, bear no immediate relationship to the moral precepts nor to the sanctifying doctrines of the gospel." In another part of this excellent Essay, Mr. Baker says,—"About half a million sterling may be regarded as the sum actually expended in the support of those benevolent institutions which have won for Britain laurels infinitely more precious than her Nelsons and Wellingtons ever gained; but in contrast with this exhibition of her charity stands the sad memorial of her folly and guilt—the yet uncontradicted statement that she devotes fifty millions per annum to the purpose of perpetuating poverty, disease, and crime; and fifty millions more that the temperate portion of her population may be indulged in the gratification of an unnatural and dangerous appetite." Surely the reader will acknowledge the superiority of Teetotalism, even as a safe and precautionary measure, over the habit of using intoxicating liquors,—surely he will admit that the testimonies here brought forward are not to be regarded with indifference or levity!

PASSAGE FROM A MILITARY JOURNAL.

ON a reference to my journal of the 21st of September, 1812, I find a passage which details an attack upon a Spanish convent; and as the circumstances under which we were enabled to drive the French out of the position may doubtless prove entertaining, I place them at the disposal of the editor of The Teetotaler.

At day-break our trumpets broke upon our slumbers, if slumbers, indeed, we were enjoying, with the accustomed "boot and saddle." A few minutes served us all, I make no doubt, for donning our garments, accoutrements, and arms; and, in two more, each man was at his horse's side, ready at the word to spring into the saddle.

"Mount!" was the word; and, at the order, with scabbards and sabres clattering; we placed foot in stirrup, and were instantly on horseback.

"Captain J—," said our Major, "follow up Captain E—: yours is the second troop."

The requisite order was immediately given to the men, who, wheeling round, cantered after the leading troop.

"Do we wait for our supporters, major?" said I, as I reined in my curvetting Bucephalus. "Where are the light bobs and artillery?"

"Ahead—some distance now upon their way; but we shall soon overtake them. You are aware the forcing of this building will fall principally to their account. We are to cover their flanks, protect their advance, and if necessary, cover their retreat. If requisite, we shall also assist in storming all defences we may meet with, cut off all stragglers, and, if taken, spread ourselves around the building. We must part: the last troop is now wheeling into marching order."

"Very good," said I, freeing the reins, and letting my courser prance over the ground.

Our way, for some time, lay through a straggling woody ground, sloping off sometimes, and sometimes rising abruptly. The morning promised to be fine; and the sweet fresh air, impregnated with the clear and sparkling dew of the very early hour, was both invigorating and exhilarating. Just as we emerged from some groups of cork trees, the sun shot redly up over a line of distant mountains, and began to shed a pale lustre through the trunks of the trees over the verdant surface of the ground.

We had ridden two or three miles, when we discovered, some distance before us, the four companies of infantry, with the two pieces of artillery in their flank, halting for us to come up. They were drawn up in open column, and carried their knapsacks. The artillery-men were quietly seated on the gun carriages and tumbrils, and were patiently awaiting the approaching addition to their not very formidable force. In a few minutes we had effected a junction, and our major cantered forward to receive the next commands of the officer entrusted with the direction of the service.

"Major, well met!" said he. "The convent is not more than a league before us. We must now commence our dispositions for attack. Do you advance with your three troops, and clear the ground of advanced parties and stragglers, if you should meet any. The infantry shall, in the meantime, advance in column, headed by the artillery. When we get near the object of our attack, the artillery shall file off to the right, and commence a fire on the building, while our bayoneted men push boldly forward and endeavour to carry the place by storm. When you have beat the ground before us, gather your skirmishers together, and close into our rear. For further movements I will give further orders."

Our commanding officer came back without an answer, and gave the word, "Form into open order! Forward—march!" The clatter of our hoofs was the immediate answer to the mandate. The three gallant hussar troops whisked swiftly by the square of infantry, and were, in a few minutes, a hundred yards in advance of the whole body.

We continued, at a rapid pace, to sweep on for some time. At length, taking the word from the officer in command, the leading troop pranced off in skirmishing order, and, dispersing themselves over the ground, galloped hither and thither, though still in a forward direction. Major B— galloped up to my side. "Did you observe," said he, "a decent looking old man, in the peasant's usual garb, by the side of Colonel ———, when I joined him to ask further directions."

"I did not," returned I. "I was in the rear of the first company of infantry. Besides, my men stood so close before me that I could only see those on horse-back; and this man that you are speaking of, I presume, was on foot."

"He was," said B——. "Poor fellow! he has lost his daughter. She has been carried off by a villain of a French officer, and is now with him in the convent we are going to attack. Four days since, the village to which the old man belongs was entered by a regiment of French infantry: they plundered the inhabitants of all they thought worthy of carrying away; and, among the rest, marched off with the old man's daughter—an only child—not more than sixteen—and, as her father says, a miracle of beauty. Do you feel knight-errant enough to attempt the rescue of this damsel in distress? I confess I feel inclined myself to lend a helping hand. The old man is inconsolable, as may naturally be expected. He left his village, and betook himself to head quarters, hearing that an attack was meditated upon the building to which his daughter had been conveyed. The colonel has promised to do all he can towards the recovery of his daughter."

"I am glad to hear it," said I.

"Disperse your troops, captain, and beat the ground as if you expected to meet a power of game. Here comes the infantry!"

He galloped off, and I followed his example, together with my troop of hussars.

On a near approach, the nature of the building became apparent. It was disposed in the form of a square, with old Gothic turrets at the angles, rising in several stories, with battlemented parapets, partitions, and little watch-towers. Each tower and turret was crowned with a cone-shaped tiled roof, and adorned with brass crosses. Slips of windows studded these roofs; and the ancient grey walls were variegated with loop-holes. The walls were high, and supported by a number of buttresses of various sizes and appearances. In the centre was an advanced tower, furnished with as many oddly constructed appurtenances as other parts of the erection. A pair of huge gates led under this tower, strongly defended with iron work, and now blocked up with gabions. We could see that the walls were profusely pierced for musketry, and that several light pieces of artillery were mounted on them. How many were planted on other parts of the position we had no means of ascertaining.

But what tended to render the building a stronger situation, was a deep—though not sudden descent on one side of the ground, and a proportionable rise upon that of the enemy. This ditch had undoubtedly once been supplied with water: but, to judge from appearances, it had been dry for some time. Under any circumstances it was an awkward feature, since the enemy could have all the advantage of firing upon us with impunity, while we were descending one side and mounting the other. One consolation was, that the edge of a wood drew so close to the convent on the right that some shelter could be offered from their fire.

The skirmishers had now bent nearly up to the edge of this declivity, but had met no obstacle save those presented by the ground. But we were not permitted to career with impunity much longer before the bristling walls. Some musket-shots were fired, which were the prelude to a more regular discharge. All we could do was to return the defiance with our pistols.

The infantry was now coming up at a quick step, in column. I saw the two pieces of artillery rattled up to the wood on the right, and the artillery-men leap from the guns and tumbrils. The words to "draw up," "halt," and "unlimber," sent the horses and drivers cantering to the rear; and in a moment the sponges were unfastened and handed over, and the company of each gun in their appropriate places. The order was now quickly given for our three troops to close together, and betake themselves, for the present, to the rear of the infantry. So said, so done. All the hussars dispersed about, cantered their chargers once more in rank, and drew up behind the infantry, who were now filing off into a line. While this last operation was being performed, the first report of our artillery broke on the noise of the hoofs and the tramp of the soldiers' feet. It was responded to by the dropping fire of the first company, which was just opening.

Nor were they silent on the other side. A simultaneous discharge of musketry rattled along the face of the building, and the cloud of smoke, which was its consequence, came driving and rolling full in our faces. Directly after, I heard the reports of some pieces of cannon boom out of the smoke; and these were quickly succeeded by the vivacious rattle of successive fire,—now swelling—now sinking,—now ringing with impetuosity, and then dropping into separated shots. I looked out to see the effects of this discharge. Some branches were flying from their stems,—leaves were scattering,—and, in one or two instances, full in the rolling smoke, I could see the figures of our infantry tumbling heavily to the ground. So much for our reception.

The smoke cleared a little away; and the eddies began to course swiftly through the wood on our right. The artillery were still busily employed. I could see the running up with the charges, thrusting them into the pieces, brelling the sponges, ramming in the loadings, momentarily withdrawing from before the guns, bringing down the fatal port-fire, firing, sponging again in a second, and reloading. Our two six-pounders were certainly doing full execution; and I was surprised at the manner in which they were able to keep up their fire. The greater part of the infantry was now ordered to repair to the cover of the trees; and in obedience to this command the soldiers forming that detachment soon wheeled off, and began a desultory fire on the windows, loopholes, and parapets; and wherever they could see a chance of their shots taking effect.

A strong fire of musketry now commenced upon our left. We soon found that the ground on the right of the convent was occupied with a strong body of grenadiers, who, if their fire was successful, plainly intended to charge our left and drive it from the cover of the trees. Our course was plain, and quickly adopted. According to order, all our hussars threw themselves into a column, and, wheeling rapidly round the infantry, dashed into the smoke that was rolling between our line of musketeers and that of the enemy. The rattle of the small arms kept gloriously on, varied at intervals with the bangs of the artillery. Sabres were flashing around me, feathers streaming, accoutrements clattering, and hoofs ringing. Oh! the excitement of a charge! Horse and horsemen sweeping on either side in all the pomp of military pride; plumes, pelisses, sabretashes, scabbards, embroidery, shakoes flitting through the smoke, glittering of steel, snorting of plunging chargers, the roll of the distant conflict, the thunder of distant cannon, clouds of snowy smoke, whiz of shot, and tumble of tough and splintered branch. There is a fierce and intense delight in such a scene as this that carries away all its horror, and stirs up the soul till it transforms us into heroes. The French retreated in good order towards the rear of the convent.

In twenty minutes more we were close upon the building. I looked back, but could see nothing of the declivity, and only a file of grim faces black with the smoke, and darting hasty glances on the walls above, the arrowy track of the balls and the falling forms of their dying comrades. Our musketeers were pressing through with the most glorious alacrity. The fusillade was still kept hard up upon the walls, and many bodies were tumbling down, pierced with balls, or struck with the flying bricks and tiles. The British artillery now ceased their fire, through the fear of injuring their own men under the walls, and storming through the breach. The engineers came up and assailed the gates; and ended by blowing them up. The infantry swept through, bayonets fixed, and in full cry. The hussars were now up both with the breach and gates, and, dispersing themselves about, so as to secure the entrances, cut down a few stragglers who were under the walls, and firing now and then upon the storming party.

The moment we forced the building, the first line of defences was abandoned by the enemy, who betook themselves to the rear of the convent, in hopes by keeping up a fire on us to effect a safe retreat; and, to do them justice, the brave fellows fought like heroes. But they could not prevent the position falling into our hands.

After an interval of half an hour, the firing dropped off into scattered and retiring shots.

"Where is the poor peasant's daughter?" demanded Major B——. "Have you rescued the poor girl and given her up to her father?"

"The first is done; but the second is to do," said I. "I have brought the damsel along with me."

The old man came up at this instant, having heard of our success. The moment his daughter descried him, she ran forwards and fell on her knees, weeping: the tears of sire and daughter mingled together; and the scene, with the stern soldiery looking on in silence, made up a picture which would not have been unworthy the perpetration of an artist. The scene was certainly affecting.

My expectations had been greatly surpassed: she was really and truly beautiful. Her complexion was brilliantly fair; her hair long, silken, and dark as a raven; her eyes large, brilliant, and as black as jet, shaded by long lashes of the same hue; and her figure that of a sylph or fairy. After having for some time given way to the impulses of affection, father and daughter prepared to depart. A bow to the circle of officers from the sire, and a general courtesy with downcast eyes from the daughter, were the signals that they were upon the move. It was with considerable regret that we followed them with our eyes as they slowly retired from the vicinity of the convent.

After mustering the men, we found that there were terrible blanks in the ranks. We returned to the convent, where quarters had been assigned us; and during the remainder of the day I devoted many a thought to the Spanish damsel.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NOTICE.—With the next Number (43) will be concluded VOLUME I. of "The Teetotaler." With Number 43 will be given away a beautiful Plate, containing two Steel Engravings, illustrating "The Drunkard's Progress," and to serve as FRONTISPIECE to Volume I. In the course of a few days will be published, Price Two-Pence, the Title-Page, Table of Contents, and Preface, to Volume I. All who intend to bind their Volume should procure this Supplement.

Number 44 will commence Volume II.; and with the new Volume will begin a Series of Plates, entirely in a new style, and far more costly and attractive than the lithographic designs previously given. The new Volume will also contain several new literary features of attraction.

We have received a very angry letter from Argus, calling us to an account for our article upon Edmund Kean. We can only refer him to Barry Cornwall's "Life of Kean" for corroboration of all we stated. We have no idea of sparing a man on account of his talents; and we think that Argus, after a reference to Barry Cornwall, will agree with us relative to the character of Kean.

"To the Christian" is a very well written, but is not suited to our columns. We shall be however glad to receive other contributions from its author.

The Editor would be glad to see the writer of the letter which was delivered at the Milton Institution on Monday week, and which is signed A Working Man.

The letter from Kendal shall be attended to.

The description of the concluding Plates of the present series of pictorial illustrations will be given in our next.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1841.

ALL great reformations and useful changes, either in politics or morals, emanate from the poorer classes. William Tell, the hero of Switzerland, was of humble origin, and tilled his own land in the canton of Uri. Hofer, the patriot of the Tyrol, was a peasant; and a statue is now erected to his memory amid the beloved mountains in which he was born, and which he defended with his gallant arm. The father of Martin Luther was a poor miner; and the son, who was destined to spread the tenets of the Reformation by attacking a church that had successfully opposed the encroachments of the mightiest sovereigns in Europe, and ultimately to work a change next in importance to the introduction of Christianity itself, commenced his career as a humble mendicant. The founders of Teetotalism were also of humble origin: the working classes of the British Islands are the architects who have raised a colossus to which all eyes are turned either in admiration or in wonder. The Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, endowed though they be with vast wealth in order to encourage all useful and profitable study, conceived not so salutary a principle. The legislature, from which should flow those springs that are calculated to wash away the vices and miseries of the nation, propagated not so efficient a doctrine. The Learned Societies and Institutions of the Kingdom imagined not so admirable a principle. The evils of Intemperance were admitted on all sides: the members of the Universities lamented the degraded condition of the country in their sermons;—the Legislature established fines and correctional penalties to repress the vice;—and the Learned Societies amused themselves with calculating the statistics of crime, poverty, and misery, brought about by the same cause. But neither of these adopted or conceived a measure which was alone calculated to meet the evil universally admitted.

Whence then did the reformation proceed? If it did not emanate from the holy, the rich, the learned, and the powerful, from whom did it come? From those who pretended not to possess the refinements of an elegant education, but who were contented with the simple manifestation of the plain, sound sense which the conception of the system of Teetotalism evinced. This reformation originated with the working classes; and, in order to make the triumph complete, it was self-reformation that set so high and glorious an example. The founders of Teetotalism did not preach a doctrine which they did not embrace: they reformed themselves, and then, strengthened in their opinions by their own experience, they began to reform their fellow-creatures. They thought of Teetotalism, and they tried it; they perceived its excellence, and they adhered to it; they were not selfish, and they imparted it. They have set an example which peers, sages, and divines may be proud to imitate. They have successfully combated against prejudice and habit: they have cast down time-honoured customs; they have trampled under foot usages which their ancestors had handed down to them. They found that the excellence of the cause made them eloquent; and the artisan, the mechanic, and the labourer were suddenly vested with capacities to overcome the sophism of the learned, the mystification of the practised speaker, and the plausible assertions of the educated. Boldly did they grapple with all difficulties: the good cause made them strong; and all opposition gave way before them. Such was the origin of Teetotalism!

And now let us glance around us. Theatres are converted into Temperance Halls;—the wretched are made happy—the naked are clothed—the hungry are fed—the diseased are cured—the insane are restored to the use of their intellects;—society is changed—useful institutions are springing up on every side—the working man is an ornament to society, as well as an important member of it;—the causes of crime, distress, premature death, and a thousand ills, are rapidly disappearing from the face of the country;—the temples of the ALMIGHTY are well attended—the streets are comparatively purged of sickening, revolting, and demoralizing sights;—and all these grand effects have sprung from that glorious moral reformation which the working classes have alone effected. Should not a nation's thanks—a country's gratitude be bestowed upon those who have accomplished such mighty results, and introduced so beneficial a change in our moral atmosphere? Teetotalism has raised myriads from the rags and filth to which Intemperance had conducted them,—has placed many a bright intellect and naturally good genius on the road to honour and to fortune,—has conquered the turbulent passions of many a misdirected mind,—and has made the hearts of wives and children leap for joy, by restoring to them husbands and fathers. It has taught thousands to peruse that volume whose contents soothed even Bacon, the great confidant of nature, fraught with all the leaning of the past, and almost prescient of the future, yet too wise not to know his weakness, and too philosophic not to feel his ignorance,—it has enabled hundreds to comprehend the speculations of Newton, whose star-like spirit shot athwart the darkness of the sphere, too soon to re-ascend to the home of his nativity,—and it has prepared the intellects of all to follow the reasoning of Locke, whose pure philosophy only taught him to adore its source, whose warm love of genuine liberty was never chilled into rebellion with its author. Yes—Teetotalism improves alike the moral and the intellectual condition of its votaries, and evokes into action those powers of thought which the humbly-born possess in unison with the proudly-descended. Virtus est sola nobilitas—"virtue is the only nobility;" and they are Nature's superior offspring who adhere the most faithfully to Nature's wholesome laws!

History records many noble instances of devotion to country. What sublimer spectacle can be pointed out than the self-immolation of the Roman senate, at the irruption of the Gauls into their city? All brave means had been tried, and had failed; seated in their ivory chairs, each one a throne, clothed in their robes of state, adorned with the badges of honourable deeds, they awaited their fate with unshrinking fortitude. Their beards swept their breasts, and majesty sat upon their brows. In them Rome perished; and when the impious Gaul plucked one of them by the beard, an indignity was offered which could not be atoned for by the death of the barbarian. Contentment would have been disgrace: they themselves atoned for all indignities, and consecrated the ruin of their country by the devotion of their sacrifice. What pillaging of temples, what mutilating of shrines, what desecrating of altars, can compare with this sacrifice towards such estimable patriots? In early times it was deemed "good for a man to die fighting for his country, and falling in the front of the battle." Incited by their poets, urged by the examples of their fathers and the lessons of their mothers, death on the battle-field was embraced as a privilege. Decius, arrayed in his pontifical robes, rode into the midst of the enemy, and fell, fighting, a sacrifice for his country. The tide of battle was turned in favour of the Roman arms; this was esteemed an offering to the gods; and, like prayer, the offering begat the blessing. The act was a patriotic one—why call it a superstition? Brutus "slew his best lover for the good of Rome." This act would honour any time!

Thousands of other examples of ancient patriotism may be quoted: we have however alluded to sufficient for our present purpose. We are anxious to remind our readers of the disinterested conduct of those who loved their country in days of yore, and to ask whether in modern times we shall suffer the same noble feelings to slumber in inactivity. Will none now sacrifice his friend to Rome? Yes—the true patriot of these days—he, who seeks to reform his fellow-countrymen by means of his own example of self-denial—is worthy of occupying a niche in the temple dedicated to Patriotism. The working classes have manifested a true and sincere love for their country, and have embraced and taught a principle which alone can regenerate the inhabitants of these islands.

Those, who cannot help the Teetotalers with their oral advocacy, may aid them with their purse; and those, whose pecuniary means are circumscribed, can afford the cause the assistance of their example. There is scarcely an individual who has not some relative or friend that will be materially benefited by the doctrines of Teetotalism. The vice of intemperance is so general, that every family exhibits at least one instance of its demoralizing and degrading tendency. Hence is it the bounden duty of all to patronise a doctrine which will serve to reclaim a brother, a relative, or a friend. Or, if there be an individual who is so isolated in the world that he has neither relatives nor friends, at least he cannot close his eyes to the condition of his neighbours. If he glance around him, he will behold thousands beggared, cast down, and ruined by the influence of strong liquor. Surely his sympathies—all isolated though he be—must extend to that human family of which no one will dispute his membership. There is, consequently, no living creature in the British empire whom the principles of Teetotalism will not benefit either in a direct or in a remote degree. It is a doctrine in which all are really interested, however they may close their eyes to their immediate or distant connexion with it. It therefore deserves the support of the wise, the rich, the learned, and the powerful, as well as the countenance of the humble, the poor, the simple-hearted, and the unpretending.

Behold the condition of those families into whose bosom the principle has been received, and where it is now nourished with enthusiastic attachment. Teetotalism is the poor man's treasure—the philosopher's stone, which supplies him with a competency—the elixir of life, which retains him in health—the alchemical discovery, which constitutes happiness as perfect as men in this world can know. The humble cottage is the scene of joy and contentment: happy children play around the door, to welcome their father home from his daily toils; and the thrifty housewife prepares the substantial meal within. That cottage—which once was dark, gloomy, and almost denuded of the necessities of life—is now the peasant's palace, and possesses charms which regal splendour cannot comprehend. Oh! that the deluded drunkard would but take notice of the results of the great moral movement that agitates around him,—oh! that he would cast off the chains which link him, like a galley-slave, with Misery—a companion from whom he can only separate by means of the Temperance reformation! Are the pangs of an evil conscience, the aspect of a wife's tears, and the cries of children clamouring for bread,—are these to be preferred to a contented mind, the smiling countenance of an affectionate help-mate, and the healthy looks of amiable little beings, who receive their adequate supply of wholesome food? Can hours of noisy dissipation at the public-house compensate for all the hideous and appalling misery which exists at home? Does man prefer the fawning landlord's smile to that of his tender wife? and will he rob his innocent offspring of their bread in order to secure the fulsome applause of pot-house companions? The drunkard is a fool to himself and a ruffian to his family; the Teetotaler is the being calculated to justify the maxim of Pope—"An honest man's the noblest work of God!" The drunkard feels his shame, and knows that he is pointed at even by those who affect to be his admirers and friend: the very landlord himself abuses him behind his back. But the Teetotaler goes forth, with head erect, to his daily avocations, looks all whom he meets in the face, and walks with the satisfaction of a man who knows that he is a good husband, a good father, and a worthy and useful member of society. The drunkard is a blot in the sphere of human existence: the Teetotaler is a proof of the high state of intellectual and moral superiority to which rational man may aspire. The drunkard is a loathsome object—either emaciated or bloated—presenting a living spectacle of accumulated disease and corruption to the eye—pestilential in breath and in moral example—idiotic in discourse, and liable to terrible ebullitions of passion—and shuddering each time he passes the workhouse, the hospital, or the spot where the gibbet is usually erected on the occasions of public executions, because in one of these he beholds the termination of his own infamous career. But the Teetotaler is endowed with the glow and hues of health consistent with the wholesome principle he adopts; he is even and placid in his temper, and free from sudden bursts of furious emotions; he trembles not, when he beholds the dwellings of misery and crime, because they point at no moral in his own perspective history; and he performs all his avocations with ease and profit to himself, and to the satisfaction of those with whom he is connected.

ELLEN MAXWELL.

A TALE.

"I say Jem, do you see that queer light to windward?" asked the boatswain's mate of the Thunderer of a brother seaman.

"Yes, I spied it out a minute ago; I can't make it out, t'aint the flying Dutchman, is it, d'ye think?"

"It's just as like the flying Dutchman as them yon fore haulyards is to that capstan bar, I've a notion."

"Jem Harris, lend a hand to cut these ropes," sung out the officer of the watch.

"Ay, ay," and away went Jem.

The night had closed in, calm, quiet, and cool; the sailor's friend, the young bright moon, was smiling on the still ocean, as if she loved to look upon her beauty in the splendid mirror; and the soft mild refreshing breeze played with the sails like a happy child: the vessel was gliding through the waters as gently and as steadily as if some invisible power towed her beneath, and the song of the helmsman floated through the clear elements and seemed to cheer her on her way. Close up to the side stood Jack Bennet looking at the strange light which appeared to windward; sometimes the glow was high and of a bright colour, then it sank and changed to a deep-livid red, but it was so far distant on the horizon's extremest verge, that he could not determine what it was. Just as he turned to seek some officer and tell him of the appearance, the look-out man sang out—

"Ship on fire to windward!"

The words echoed through and through the vessel; up from his cabin came the captain followed by his officers, and in an instant every glass was pointed in the direction of the light.

"I don't think it's a ship," said Captain Leslie; "here, Morton, take my glass, and run up to the mast-head and see what it is."

Fast up the ropes, as if gifted with wings, went the young seaman.

"It is a ship, sir," and as he spoke, the boom of a gun came faintly to their ears.

"Answer the signal! all hands to set the sails! Quick, quick, my lads!"

The Thunderer, although a merchant-ship, was a fast sailer, and in an incredibly short time, she was rushing through the waves on her errand of mercy; still rapid as was her course, it was not swift enough for her crew's wishes; guns came quicker and quicker from the blazing vessel, and they longed to be with her.

"Shorten sail now, and lower the boats."

"Ay, ay, sir," and the men cheered their order.

"Mr. Howard, take the command of the long boat, and let Morton go with you; he'll be of service if there is anything to do."

"Thank your honour," said Morton, touching his hat.

"Now, lads, bear a-hand," and following the officer, the men jumped into the boat.

"Give way, give way, my men," shouted Howard, who stood a-head; almost flat to their oars laid the men, and the boat seemed to fly, but as the shrieks and guns came to their ears, the men pulled like furies; a groan, but not of pain, from one of the rowers immediately behind him startled Howard; he turned, it was from Morton.

"Gently, gently, Morton; you'll do yourself a mischief."

"No, no, sir, but those screams! shall we ever reach them? The boat seems to stand still! there! there, again!" and as the wild shrieks passed them, he bent lower to the oar.

"Lord have mercy upon us! look at the flames, look Morton, look," said the man next him.

"I dare not; in the sea lead that we make no way!"

They were nearing the vessel fast, and the sea was red with the intense glow. The Thunderer was making easy sail to receive those whom the boats should save, but the freshening wind now blew the flames so far and wide, and the danger of her blowing up was so great, that Captain Leslie dared not risk his ship too near.

"Shout, shout, my lads, that they may know we are coming!"

A loud buzza that shook the boat the men gave, and it was answered by a cheer from the burning ship.

"One more pull and altogether."

Morton dashed past his officer, climbed up the fore-chains, and in an instant was upon the quarter-deck; the sight was awful: sailors, killed by the fall of the burning masts, lay everywhere around; embers, ashes, blazing wood mingled with the senseless forms that covered the deck. The boats were quickly filled with those whom wounds, smoke, and terror had not bereft of their senses, and with their living freight the boats put off. When they returned, the flames burnt (if possible) more intensely, and the heat was suffocating. Morton, like one gifted with supernatural power was everywhere. At last the officer called out, "Quick, my men, to the boats, we must stay no longer; the vessel will blow up directly, we have saved all those who are sensible!"

"Morton, where's Morton?" shouted one of the boat's crew, as they put off.

"Morton, Morton, Morton!"—the calls were unanswered.

"He must have fallen overboard!"

The crackling timber warned the lieutenant of impending danger.

"Heavens forbid! give way, my lads, or we shall not get out of the way before she blows up!"

Harry Morton had forced and crept his way through the burning masts and fragments of rigging down again to the cabins. All were deserted, and he was returning when a sound of low sighs stopped him; they evidently came from one of the ladies' cabins. He darted to the spot, forced open the door, and entered. On the bed lay an elderly female, dead; and kneeling by her, was a young lady, whose hair was hanging dishevelled; her dress was burnt and torn; and her tearless eyes were fixed upon the body with an agonizing expression. Morton went gently up to her.

"Come with me, pray come," he said in a subdued voice.

"Will you take her too?" she murmured; "I know she is dead, but I will not leave her."

"I cannot; but I will save you?"

"No, no, I cannot leave her, dear, dear aunt!" and she rose and wept passionately upon the corpse. Morton let her do so as long as he dared, and then whispered,

"Your aunt is dead, you cannot recal her by staying here; if she were alive, her first wish would be that you should save yourself!"

"You are right," she sobbed, raising herself; "I will go!" She went half way to the door, then turned and flung herself upon the body, crying, "I cannot leave her—go, go, save yourself. I will stay here; God bless you, sir, go, go!"

"And leave you here? Never! If you remain, so will I."

"No, no; wherefore should you perish? Go!—"

"While you stay here, I will not stir, though I well know five minutes longer is certain death."

"Are you so firm?" she asked, as she slowly rose and gazed upon his face; "then I will not be a murderer! Come, come," and she caught his hand saying, "take me now, now."

He wound his arm around her, and crawled and crept through the smoke and timber back to the deck. He laid her against the capstan and rushed to the side to see if the boats were gone—they met not his eyes! His heart stood still—he turned to look at the fainting girl, and shuddered for her fate: no thought was wasted upon himself!

"What's to be done?" he involuntarily exclaimed.

"What more has happened?" she asked, rising from the deck.

"Nothing, nothing—do not be frightened."

"I see—I am not frightened—the boats are gone—well, all chance is over!" and she smiled and laid her hand upon his arm.

"No, no—I can swim; come, dear lady, come!"

"Brave, generous man, no; singly you may save your life; I have perilled it enough already. Go, if you would give me peace!"

He seized her hand; "Off—off! It is in vain, I will not go with you—go, go, do you not hear the flames crackling, they will reach the powder room—do not make me a murderer!"

"Dare you hold this rope steady for me to slide down by?" said he, pointing to one which he had just fastened to the capstan and thrown over the bow of the ship.

"Yes, yes, make haste!" and she bent to it.

"Forgive me!" and he caught her round the waist, and holding her tightly, grasped the rope and slid down. Once in the water he bore her up with one arm and swam with the other. "Hold fast for your life," he said as he struggled through the waves.

"I will, I will, but it is vain; you cannot support my weight much longer, and you will die too!"

"Don't be so downhearted, my lass—ma'am—I beg your pardon—I meant no offence."

"I have taken none; you are brave, I am helpless; you have saved me, and we are more than equal."

"God bless you," said Morton, fervently; and as the words had left his lips, a crash, an explosion, that seemed to rend the very sky and sea, told that the devoted ship had blown up—huge fragments of timber swept through the air, and clove the waters to a fearful depth. Morton grasped the shrinking girl closer, as if that could save her, and she wound her arm round him, and tried to pray.

"God protect us!" he exclaimed, as a blackened mass of wood groaned in the darkened sky, and opened the sea in a frightful abyss about ten yards to their right. Splash, splash, all round came pieces of the wreck; and in spite of his gallant heart, Morton cowered as they fell before and behind him. At a distance he saw his own dear ship and the guiding light that were hung out as beacons to any who might have been roused from stupor by the concussion, and thrown upon the ocean. "Cheerly, cheerly," cried Morton, as the destructive shower ceased, "the worst is over now!"

She did not reply: she was stupified with fear; and her long, full dress, now thoroughly wetted, clung a dead weight to him, and terribly impeded his action. They had been now upwards of a quarter of an hour in the water, the arm that bore her up was perfectly benumbed, they were still at a tremendous distance from the ship, and he was already wearied and exhausted.

"You are sinking, fainting, and I am the cause of it! for God's sake let me go, you cannot save me, it is impossible!"

"Never, while I have life! God will not desert so innocent a being as you are; you will be my protector, not my hindrance," and again the gallant fellow struggled with the waves; the wind had freshened—the sea, though it did not run high, yet weakened and retarded poor Morton still more. His nerveless arm fell slower and slower, and she who hitherto required consolation, now strove to give it.

"How very far you have brought me; we shall be saved; see how much nearer we are; do not despair."

"I do not," he gasped; "but I can swim no more;" and he vainly tried.

"My brave, kind, kind friend! and I have killed you!"

"No, no," he exclaimed with a desperate effort, "you have not, dear lady. The ship! the ship—comrades!—forgive me. I can't go on;" in another moment his senseless body floated on the ocean.

The middle watch had just begun; and the sea, far and wide, looked as still and quiet as if unconscious of the fearful gulf it had been to many a wretched being; but the moon no longer shone as brightly as before: thick white fleecy clouds scudded faster and faster across her disk; and the wind had become cold.

"What a bad job this has been to-night; how's ever it's a blessed mercy as there's so many of the poor things saved; my dear eyes, what a sight the blowing up of that 'ere ship was, I never seed anything so terrible like in my life."

"Ay, it was a tarnation fire to be sure, but they might all ha' gone to Davy Jones's locker if it hadn't ha' been for poor Harry Morton. How he did pull at them oars; 'twasnt like a man's grip, poor fellow, I'd no fancy it was his last tug!"

"He was the boldest hand, and merriest heart in this here craft, though he was so larned spoken sometimes. What a rare favourite he was with the officers, surely! Hark! what's that?"

Both the men bent eagerly over the vessel's side, and every now and then, a faint, struggling cry, seemed to rise from the waters close by, but the moon's light was so dim and irregular that they could see nothing.

"What's the matter, my men?" asked the officer of the watch.

"Something like a signal of distress overboard, your honour; but the light's so confounded skulking, I can't see."

"There! there! don't you hear it?" cried the other as the wail was repeated.

"Ay, ay, lights out directly, lower a boat, somebody from the wreck," sang out Mr. Forrest.

As is always the case in a well-disciplined ship, the orders were scarcely given than executed, and with lanterns fixed to poles the boat was out and searching all round; but the cry was still, and the men had no guide.

"It must have been fancy," said Mr. Howard, as the boat swept round for the fourth time. Just then a shout from the ship reached their ears; a sailor standing aft had heard something grate by the ship's side; he looked down; it was an immense piece of timber, and something white clinging to it.

"Body alongside!"

In a moment three men jumped overboard, and lights were let down to assist them; as they disengaged the body, a cry burst simultaneously from all—

"It's Morton and a woman!"

"Alive?" asked Captain Leslie, anxiously.

"Can't say!—gently, lift him gently!" and Morton and the lady were hauled on deck as tenderly as if the rough hands were women's, and the tarred ropes, silk;

his arm was round her still, and it was difficult to release it. As Morton was raised to be carried below, the surgeon exclaimed, "Good heaven, he's wounded; and terribly; look here!" and he pointed to his back.

The jacket and shirt were cut completely through, and the flesh beneath frightfully opened from shoulder to waist, and jagged pieces of wood were sticking in the wound. It appeared that when he jumped from the wreck with the lady, that a piece of the mast, splintered lengthwise caught him below the arm, and tearing upwards, left this dreadful wound. The agony was intense; but the brave heart never gave a groan to tell it, but struggled and buffeted on, though every movement of the arm, for it was the one he swam with, gave a pang of suffering so excessive, that as the waves dashed, though gently, on his back, the splinters swayed to and fro in the gash, till he fainted with the pain, but not before, with a last effort, he had caught hold of a rope hanging to a monstrous piece of wood that floated by, and, twining it round his body and that of the lady, trusted to Providence to guide it to his ship.

After two hours incessant exertion he was recovered; his first words were, "Where is the lady?"

"Safe below."

"God be thanked, and thank you all."

In a week he was allowed to come upon deck for a short time, and every officer from the captain to the middies vied with each other in paying him attention. He was a singularly handsome young man, with sunburnt cheek and splendid hazel eyes. His appearance was that of extreme muscular power, but there was blended with it more than a common grace and elegance, and even the dark ringlets, that sailor-fashion hung at the side of his face, were beautiful. Not a stranger crossed the white decks of the Thunderer, without gazing long and earnestly at Harry Morton. His was the quickest hand to reef the sails, the nimblest foot to mount the rigging, the boldest heart, and dauntless spirit at the guns, the cheeriest voice to echo orders in the storm, the gentlest touch to tend the sick, and the best disciplined seaman to his officer. Twice at his life's hazard he had saved his captain's, and when he made his first appearance upon deck, Leslie went forward and greeted him with a father's welcome to his son.

"I ought to have been the first, Captain Leslie," said a young lady coming forward: "my brave preserver!" she would have taken his hand, but his glazed hat was off; and as she met the full glance of those magnificent eyes, her extended arm fell nervelessly by her side, and a deep quick blush rushed to her face.

"It was one of the proudest days of my life, madam, and not the first time I've thanked God he made me a sailor."

She looked up, there was something in the words and manner beyond a common seaman; yet, there he was clad in the checked shirt and coarse blue jacket of the crew. Could there be a mystery?—no, for he gloried in his calling, and Captain Leslie had told her that Harry had been with him from boyhood, and always the same bold, frank creature; he was then superior in words and deeds to all around him.

In two months the Thunderer arrived at Madras; and Ellen Maxwell (who had been proceeding thither to join her father, who was the commander of the British forces there) was set ashore.

(To be Concluded in our next.)

RICHARD BRINSLEY SHERIDAN.

THE fatal effects of the terrible vice of intemperance cannot be better developed to the public, than by recording the biographies of those who have principally suffered from so fertile a cause of degradation and misery. The subject of this memoir was one of those whose prospects were ultimately blighted by the course of dissipation which was too greedily and systematically pursued; and no speculation can determine to what eminence Sheridan might have risen, had he not lent too ready an ear to the fascinating whisper of dissipation, and extended too eager a hand to the genius of intemperance.

Richard Brinsley Sheridan was born in Dublin, in the year 1751. He was the son of Thomas Sheridan, who was well known as an actor and as a lecturer upon oratory. His mother was distinguished for her beauty and literary acquirements, and was the authoress of several popular works. Richard was sent to Harrow, at the age of eleven; and even at that early period did he exhibit that wildness of disposition and attachment to wine which paved the way for his eventual downfall. At that age, Richard was careless about his own interests—always witty, facetious, and entertaining—and often so indolent that he seemed actually to have lost, rather than to have suspended, his powers of action. He frequented the principal taverns at Harrow, and expended nearly all his pocket-money in gratifying his favourite passion—an indulgence in wine. When he arrived at a proper age, he entered himself as a student of the Middle Temple, and supported himself by his literary occupations, still, however, frequenting taverns and scenes of dissipation, and indulging largely and frequently in all the excesses of London dissipation and intemperance.

At an early age, he had manifested a peculiar affection for the stage, and was a constant visitor of the theatres, at which resorts he encountered individuals and formed acquaintances that were far from being calculated to lead him into a correct sober path of life. It was on the stage he first saw and heard Eliza Lindley, at an oratorio; and he immediately fell in love with her. About the same period his drunken brawls led him to fight two duels with a Mr. Mathews—one at a tavern, in Henrietta-street, Covent Garden; and the other at Kingsdown, near Bath. Shortly after these occurrences he espoused the object of his affections, without having the means of ensuring a meal from one day to another. He obstinately refused to allow his wife to return to the stage; and he still maintained an expensive establishment in Orchard-street, Portman Square.

He determined to exert his literary acquirements to obtain a livelihood for himself and his young wife; and he aspired to the dramatic art of composition. He accordingly produced The Rivals, which laid the foundation of his future eminence in this line of literature. Saint Patrick's Day followed this piece, and gratified the galleries amazingly. The Comic Opera of The Duenna was produced in 1776; and his reputation reached the summit of dramatic fame;—still his fortune had experienced but little increase. Gay, dissipated, and hospitable to excess, his table was open to all who were ready—and those were many—to sponge upon him. His intemperate habits were a considerable drawback to his pecuniary progress; inasmuch as his literary labours were only pursued at long intervals, and for short periods at a time. He however contrived to obtain a share in Drury-lane theatre, and The Trip to Scarborough and The School for Scandal filled the house and the treasury.

In the year 1780, Sheridan was returned for Stafford; and he contrived with much difficulty to borrow the money to cover his electioneering expenses. All the proceeds of his plays had been wasted in dissipation and riotous living. In 1782 he became Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, under his friend Mr. Fox; and in the following year he was appointed Secretary to the Treasury. It is not however our intention to follow Mr. Sheridan in his political career: suffice it to say, that he was the warm and staunch friend of liberty—that, as to his political conduct, no man in England was ever less impeachable than he—that he defended the French Revolution against Edmund Burke—that he aided in bringing the infamous Warren Hastings to an account—and that he put on record this memorable opinion,—“It is in the nature of Kings to love despotism, and in the constitution of standing armies to obey Kings.”

The charms of Sheridan's conversation were accompanied with a sort of witchery that enchanted all his companions, and generally prolonged the debauchery of the festive board until broad day-light. He was a constant companion of the voluptuary the Prince Regent, and not only visited Carlton House, but also entertained his Royal Highness on several occasions at his own residence. He indulged in all the dissipation to which that prince was himself so deeply attached; and involved himself in pecuniary difficulties to return the hospitality (so called) that he received from others. His intemperate habits now became almost proverbial; and it was generally supposed that his most celebrated witticisms emanated from his lips at those times when his brain was influenced by strong liquor. For instance,—when he suddenly received the news that Drury-lane theatre was on fire, he proceeded to the spot; but before he began to take thought of the plans to be adopted to arrest the progress of the devouring element, he entered a public-house opposite the theatre and ordered a glass of brandy and water. A friend reproached him for his apparent apathy. “Well,” exclaimed, Sheridan, “it is a devilish hard thing that a man can't drink a glass in peace by his own fire-side!”

On another occasion, Sheridan was returning home from a party, in a dreadful state of intoxication, and he fell down the area of a house near his own residence. A watchman appeared, and asked him who he was, accompanying the demand by an endeavour to raise him from his unpleasant and disgraceful posture. “What am I?” stammered Sheridan.—“Yes,” said the watchman; “what are you?”—“Why, a member of Parliament, to be sure,” was the answer.—“And pray who are you then?” asked the watchman, now using very rough means to drive Sheridan up the steps of the area.—“Oh! you will by force, will you?” drawled Sheridan, in the drunkard's half unintelligible language, and alluding to the violence with which the watchman endeavoured to drag him up the steps.—“What, Wilberforce in this state!” shouted the watchman; and on the following day all London rang with the rumour that the famous advocate for the abolition of the slave-trade had been picked up drunk in an area. Sheridan enjoyed the joke, and did not clear up the mystery until it had been well circulated.

It is however painful to record this prostration of a fine intellect, as a sacrifice to the altars of the God of Wine. The splendid genius of Sheridan was calculated to place him in a situation in which he would have conferred real and permanent good upon his fellow-countrymen; but the weakness of the man, in respect to one dread failing, proved his ruin. Let not those, who are opposed to the reforming doctrines of Teetotalism, declare that these pictures are overdrawn; and that intemperance alone never works such a complication of evil results. Does not dissipation ruin individuals and empires—persons and nations—single people, and myriads of men? And of what does dissipation consist? is not intemperance its principal ingredient? and does not the love of wine lead its votary on to all kinds of excess, and all species of debauchery? Intemperance prepares the way for gambling—and gambling leads to meanness—and meanness is followed by dishonesty—and the next step is crime!

Intemperance was the ruin of Sheridan—both mentally and bodily. To such an extent did he become the prey of strong liquors, that when he was thrown out of Westminster and returned for Ilchester, his intellects were already more or less impaired. He no longer distinguished himself by the ardour of his attacks, the brilliancy of his replies, the pertinacity and promptness of his questions. In short, he now seldom attended the House, and was usually found in the haunts of dissipation and debauchery.

The first Mrs. Sheridan having died of a decline in the year 1792, the subject of this memoir espoused a Miss Ogle two or three years afterwards; and by this second marriage he acquired some property. Dissipation, however, soon undermined this regeneration of his fortunes; debts and difficulties pressed upon him in all directions; and the greater portion of his property was seized by his creditors. At length as had been long expected by all around him, disease began to threaten his life. Intemperance had completely sapped the foundation of a strong constitution, and paralysed all his physical powers and energies. At this critical and alarming period, he was attended by Dr. Baillie and Dr. Baines; and it is said to be attributed to their firmness alone that the myrmidons of the law did not seize upon his body, as they had done upon his effects. The dissipation of forty winters had alone spared his memory; and this was powerful almost to the very last. Sheridan was interred in Westminster Abbey; and his funeral obsequies were attended by many persons of senatorial rank, headed by one of the royal dukes.

Had Richard Brinsley Sheridan pursued a sober and prudent course of life, he might have risen to the highest offices of the state, and acquired an immense fortune: but he followed the wrong path—he pursued a career of debauchery and dissipation which terminated in utter ruin; and the overwhelming torrent of intemperance swept away all the mighty fabrics of glory, renown, and wealth which his talents built up.

REVIEWS.

The Rechabites. A Sermon. By the Rev. W. Morgan, B. D. Incumbent of Christ Church, Bradford. Bradford: Priestly and Co.

THIS admirable discourse, which is now printed, was preached in Christ Church, in Bradford, Yorkshire, on Christmas Day, 1846. The reverend author is himself a member of the Independent Order of Rechabites, and belongs to the “Good Intent” Tent, Number 30. The following extract is taken from the notice prefixed to the sermon:—

“The Author of this Sermon, in the early part of his Ministry, upwards of thirty years ago, witnessed with great pain the effects of Benefit Clubs holding their meetings in Public Houses. The advantages of these excellent Institutions were frustrated by the habits of Intemperance to which such practices naturally, and almost inevitably, led them. To remove these evils, he, in connexion with the other Clergy, formed, in 1809, a ‘Friendly Society,’ holding its Meetings in the Vestry of the Parish Church of Wellington, Salop, in none of which were any intoxicating drinks allowed. This Society was lately, and no doubt is still, in a flourishing condition. But it is a lamentable fact that such sober societies did not become general until the happy system of Teetotalism was so generally adopted. The members therefore of Entire Abstinence Societies very justly considered it their duty to form themselves into a Society for the support of each other in distress and sickness, without running into the danger of being entangled again with the galling yoke of the Drunkard's bondage, and with a view of saving their hard-wrought earnings from being spent on useless and pernicious Drinks.”

The ensuing extract gives an account of the Rechabites of ancient time, whose doctrines are revived with so much benefit and effect in modern days:—

“They were descended from the Kenites, that is, from Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, who was a Midianite, and so not naturally, but spiritually, of the seed of Abraham, being of the same faith as Proselytes.

“Herein they were emblems and types of the Gentile Church, even of all Believers in Christ, the adopted children of Abraham, whom therefore St. Paul calls ‘the wild olive tree, grafted into the true.’ Rom. ii. 17. Of the Kenites we read in Judges i. II: that ‘they went up out of the city of Palm Trees, with the children of Judah, into the wilderness of Judah.’ We find them separated from the Amalekites in the time of Saul. 1. Sam. xiii. 6. One family of these Kenites had their denomination from Rechab, whose son was Jonadab, remarkable for his wisdom and piety. He flourished in the days of Jehu, nearly 900 years before the birth of Christ, and 300 years before the time of Jeremiah. These Rechabites were preserved in all the confusion and judgments of the Jewish Nation, from age to age, according to the promise of God in this chapter. Great numbers of them lived in the time of our Saviour; they were the chief hearers and followers of Christ; and they were the first and readiest embracers of his gospel. They were then called by way of distinction the poor, and also the good. The Rev. Dr. Wolff, a converted Jew, a Clergyman of the church of England, now living in this county, found their descendants near Mecca, and they gave this account of themselves to him:—‘we drink no wine, and plant no vineyard, and sow no seed, and live in tents, as Jonadab our father commanded us. Hobab was our father too. Come to us and you will find 600,000 in number, and you will thus see the prophecy fulfilled, therefore thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel, Jonadab, the son of Rechab, shall not want a man to stand before me for ever.’”

The following passage is a powerful appeal from a staunch observer of the doctrines of total abstinence to the drunkards and the drunkard-makers:—

“How invaluable is such an example! How strongly and irresistibly does it prove that for the sake of a greater good even a lawful gratification may be denied! We are continually told by our opponents, that entire abstinence from all intoxicating drinks is not commanded us, and that we may drink them in moderation. Why should Jonadab say, ‘Drink no wine?’ Did he not see that the prohibition was wise and good? Did they not consider it so? Did not God approve of it? Why, then, do many among us condemn total abstinence from such drinks? One should suppose that the Scripture had commanded their use, by such repeated attacks on our principles. Our Parents, or our Superiors have happily and providentially discovered that the Total Abstinence pledge has produced a glorious Reformation among us, which Moderation could never produce; we therefore, like these Rechabites, say, ‘Thus have we obeyed the voice of Jonadab the son of Rechab our Father, in all that he hath charged us, to drink no wine, all our days, we, our wives, our sons, nor our daughters.’ We follow their good example; and by our example, we are determined, by the help of God, to recommend the same practice to others. Is not this effort, at least, blameless? Is it not highly useful for preserving the young and unwary from drunkenness, and in reclaiming the miserable drunkard from the error of his ways?”

We shall conclude this notice of a most excellent discourse with an extract calculated to explain the utility of the Society of Rechabites, whose principle is the same as that of the ancient Rechabites:—

“The members of this Institution propose to themselves all the advantages of other benevolent and friendly Societies, and avoiding the dangers to which such Societies are exposed by the use of intoxicating drinks. It is not necessary for us to repeat the many evils of Intemperance. Remove these evils, and also the temptations to them, and you are in a fit condition for improvement in health, in resources, in good of every kind. The ‘Laws and Regulations’ of this order are founded on the sound Basis of Reason, Religion, and Experience. And it is pleasing to observe that the plan, during the last five years, has so far commended itself to the judgment of the public, that there are at this time probably no less than 300 different Tents, in the several districts of the kingdom. Supposing each tent to contain fifty members, we shall then have a total amount of fifteen thousand persons who are sober, industrious, kind, and friendly; engaged to support themselves, their families, and each other ‘in sorrow, need, sickness, or any other adversity.’ In proportion as such members increase, crime, poverty, and degradation decrease. Poor rates will be lessened; education will advance; honesty will prevail; industry will be rewarded; religion will flourish. In short, as Intemperance is the source of so many evils, so such Institutions as these will be of incalculable good, by laying the axe to the root of those evils, and by fostering the growth of what adorns the human character and enlarges the boundaries and efficiency of the Christian Church.”

We are delighted with this opportunity of recording our sentiments relative to the Society of Rechabites: we believe that there are several fraternities or unions of this order; but we do not hesitate to pronounce them all excellent, in respect to the principle upon which they are based. We shall always be delighted to record the progress of the Rechabite Societies in all parts of the kingdom; and, as we consider that an organ of Teetotalism should be also the vehicle of Rechabitism, we shall henceforth pay more attention to the latter subject than we have hitherto done. The sermon, which we have just noticed, is a credit to its author, and a valuable acquisition to sacred literature.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

THE PROCESSION.

Our Leading Article of last week, relative to the Procession, has been responded to by a host of letters from town and country correspondents, all strenuously up-

ing the necessity of the measure. Our Manchester Correspondent, MR. WILLIAMS, the Secretary of the District Society, writes to us as follows:—

"If I can spare time from business, I shall be with you in London, for your Annual Procession. I suppose you will insert the time of its taking place in your valuable periodical."

MR. DRAPER, the Secretary of the Fitzroy and North West London Auxiliary to the N. B. and F. Temperance Society, addresses us in the following manner:—

"In reading your valuable journal of the 3rd instant, I was greatly pleased to find that the Leading Article was devoted to the necessity of the Procession on Whit-Monday; as I had just before been reading with some surprise the objections raised against it in two other Temperance publications. If there be no Procession, we give our opponents an opportunity of stating that our cause is on the decline, and that we dare not show our numbers. I trust that the proper demonstration will take place on the usual day; and we shall shake the soul-destroying traffic to its foundation. For this purpose, let every sincere Teetotaler echo the cry of the 'Procession!' that we may convince our opponents that the little spark has now kindled into a great flame!"

A most influential member of the Teetotal world, who does not wish his name now to appear, has written to us a long letter on the subject, and from which we quote the following:—

"The Teetotalers of London and the suburbs are most anxious for the Procession; and it is preposterous to think of disappointing them. I should not object to a Gala, as elsewhere suggested, at some Park; but it would be shameful to allow one or two Societies to profit by the pecuniary returns thereof, as on the occasion of the Dyham expedition. Neither should a few men in power pretend to controul the wishes of the great majority of Teetotalers. I am delighted to see that there is some chance of the United Temperance Association taking up this affair in a spirited manner. Be assured that if any one Society will set the example, the masses of the Teetotalers will gladly follow it. It is ridiculous to talk of the expense of a Procession, and recommend a Gala as a substitute. Will not the same expenditure be incurred by the latter, as by the former? But if the London Teetotalers have neither, they will be far behind their Irish brethren in Ireland and in all the great towns, where Processions took place on Saint Patrick's Day. The publicans will moreover rejoice, and declare that the cause is nearly extinguished. Surely, matters can be so arranged as to prevent the Committees of the various Societies from being involved in debt. Tickets for the carriages can be issued a sufficient length of time before to ascertain how many vehicles are to be provided; and I do not see why any more expenses should be incurred by a Procession than by a Tea-Meeting. Former experience, which, I admit, has been dearly purchased by the Committees, will enable them to 'order these things better' in future. At all events, do not let us give the publicans an opportunity of triumphing over us; and if the Teetotalers cannot afford to ride in procession, then let them walk; but let them display their numbers some how or another on the ensuing Whit-Monday!"

Another letter contains the following remarks, which we also submit to our readers:—

"In the name of common sense, what are the London Teetotalers about? Will they be in all things behind the Teetotalers of Ireland and of the English provinces? Where is the enthusiasm—where is the ardour which ought to characterize them? If they abandon the idea of the Procession, they will manifest a lukewarmness in the cause which will be really distressing!"

THE CHARTIST TEETOTAL ASSOCIATIONS.

THE friends of Teetotalism generally will be pleased to bear of the progress of the cause in any direction; and under the influence of any sect or party. It appears that the Chartist Teetotal Associations are flourishing in London, and in many of the great provincial cities and manufacturing towns. Several Christian ministers have joined their ranks; and many very influential persons at Hull, Sheffield, Oldham, Chester, Bolton, Manchester, Birmingham, Northampton, Preston, Ashton-under-Lyne, Kettering, Leicester, &c., have followed the example. MR. HENRY VINCENT has lately been lecturing, with considerable success at Northampton, Kettering, and Leicester, and has enrolled numerous converts beneath the banners of Teetotalism. The following is the pledge of these Associations:—

"I, A. B., voluntarily pledge myself to abstain from the use of all intoxicating drinks: that I will neither use them myself, nor offer them to others; and that I will do all in my power to discourage their use. And I further pledge myself to use all lawful and constitutional means to cause the People's Charter to become the law of the land."

Without at all interfering with, or even alluding to the political tenets of these Societies, we consider it to be our duty to record the progress of Teetotalism in all places and under all influences, without reference to particular friendships.

COUNTRY NEWS.

IRELAND.

THE cause of Teetotalism is progressing with astonishing rapidity in Ireland. The REV. MR. MATHEW is unwearied in his exertions to regenerate his fellow-countrymen. There are now but few cases of relapse; and those instances are followed by a return to the principle, with deep and bitter regret for the backsliding. Numerous Tea-Festivals followed Saint Patrick's Day in Dublin, Cork, &c.; and several are still in contemplation, especially with a view of encouraging Irish manufactures. Crime has diminished in a most extraordinary degree in Ireland; and there are now many large and populous towns without a single public-house in them.

BARNARD CASTLE.

THAT admirable Temperance periodical, the Border Herald, published by Mr. Hudson Scott at Carlisle, contains the following paragraph, which has been communicated to the columns of that journal by the Secretary of the Barnard Castle Teetotal Society:—

"We have been favoured with a visit from MR. F. R. LEES, of Burmoodtop Hall, Leeds. Our object in bringing Mr. Lees was to discuss the subject of Total Abstinence with the REV. W. S. L. PRATMAN, independent Minister, who has lately advanced topics from his pulpit, and in a printed circular, inimical to our cause, to the effect that wine and strong drinks are commanded and recommended by God for the use of man. The reverend gentleman having been waited on, declined a discussion; MR. LEES, however, delivered three lectures in the Union Hall, to prove that teetotalism is in accordance with divine revelation, and is well calculated to benefit mankind physically, morally, and spiritually, which he did in a manner highly creditable to himself, and satisfactorily to crowded audiences. The cause is steadily advancing in this town and neighbourhood. We number upwards of 500 members, amongst whom are fifty-one reclaimed characters, many of whom are joined to Christian churches."

CARLISLE.

TEETOTALISM is progressing favourably in Carlisle and its environs. A grand festival lately took place at the Rechabite Tent Room, Castle-street, for the purpose of affording the friends of MR. RICHARD DUNCAN, a staunch Teetotaler of Carlisle, an opportunity of expressing their admiration of his conduct in the cause, previous to his departure for America. MR. H. LOWES, publisher and bookseller, presided; and several effective and animated speeches were delivered. "After a neat speech from the chairman," says the Border Herald, "the meeting separated, both delighted and deeply affected at parting with 'so worthy' a member of the Teetotal Society." Would such scenes as these take place in the sphere of the drinking world?

MANCHESTER.

THE Secretary of the Manchester District Temperance Society requests us to correct an error or two which crept into our Report, under the head of Manchester, in our Number of March 27th. The Procession took place upon the 17th of March (Saint Patrick's Day), and not on the 12th. We should also have stated that "the sick Clubs were not so numerous as they used to be, and that the Procession of Teetotalers was larger than on any previous Saint Patrick's Day."

On Friday evening, April 26th, MR. RALPH HOLKER delivered a lecture in the Temperance Meeting Room of the Peter-street Branch, which was well filled. Many signatures were received. MR. GEORGE LOMAX continued his lectures upon his "twenty-one reasons for becoming a Teetotaler," at the meeting-room of the Tabernacle Branch. The Independent Order of Rechabites is weekly adding to its members. In the Rules of the Manchester District Temperance Society, we find the following paragraph:—

"That while a distinct and unequivocal avowal be made of the establishment of this Society on Christian principles, sectarian theology and party politics shall be strictly avoided in all its meetings and discussions."

TOWN NEWS.

FITZROY AUXILIARY TO THE NEW BRITISH AND FOREIGN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

THIS spirited Society is now actively employed in raising subscriptions for a new banner and union-jacks, and for the purpose of hiring a band for the Procession on Whit-Monday.

UNITED KINGDOM TOTAL ABSTINENCE LIFE ASSOCIATION.

ON Monday evening last, a meeting was held at the Temperance Hall (late the Theatre), Broadway, Westminster, for the purpose of explaining the object and principles of this Insurance Company. On Tuesday, the 13th instant, a meeting, for a similar purpose, will be held at the School-room, Stratford.

KENT WARD BURMOODTOP BRANCH.

A MEETING was held on Sunday morning, March 28th, at the Working Man's Chapel, Dockhead, MR. LUCAS in the chair. The meeting was most ably addressed by this gentleman, and by MESSIEURS SNEAD, GLOVER, M'CARTHY, &c. These assemblies will take place every Sunday morning, at the same place; and MR. DAVIS, the Secretary, informs us that Teetotal advocates of all Societies will be welcome. When MR. DAVIS last communicated with us, this Branch only consisted of 900 members: at that period the Branch was divided;—it is now however united, and consists of two thousand members, who are all staunch to the principle, and active in its interests.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE of this Society has been compelled to alter its arrangements with regard to the TEA-FESTIVAL on Easter Monday. This Festival will take place at the MILTON-STREET INSTITUTION, at five o'clock precisely, on Easter Monday. Cards of Admission, one shilling each, may be obtained of MR. EMBERTSON, the Treasurer, 31, Fore-street, City.

The Executive Committee of the United Temperance Association meets ever alternate Friday evening, at eight o'clock, at Hart's Temperance Hotel, Aldersgate-street. The members of this Committee are Messieurs Embertson, Pocknell, Crump, Benstead, Kalmier, Johnson, Clark, G. W. M. Reynolds, Baylis, Trounce, Kulpe, Sims, Glennie, Grimsshaw, Parkins, Betts, Farmilo, and Dowling. On Monday evening last, the meeting of this Society took place at the Milton-street Institution.

MR. G. W. M. REYNOLDS took the chair, and detailed the adulterations practised by the brewers and publicans in respect to their beer.

MR. BENSTED said that strong drink was absolutely unnecessary for man, as it neither gave him vigour to perform his manual labour, nor energy in the pursuit of his intellectual avocations. The Pledge is a voluntary obligation, which Teetotalers impose upon themselves in the same manner as the vows of marriage or baptism are taken; and it is no more a symbol or condition of slavery than either of those religious ordinances. The Pledge is a crutch by which the frail in resolution may support themselves; and if it be really an emblem of slavery, then (said Mr. Benstead) is such slavery the most enviable condition of existence.

MR. MEE observed that he had not much pity for the drunkard; but he decidedly pitied the poor wife and famished children, who were the principal sufferers by his depravity. The degradation of the working classes had been effected by strong drink; and Teetotalism could alone elevate them again to their proper level. The "double stout" makes the brewer stout, and the publican stout, and their wives and children stout; but it makes the deluded drunkard very—very thin! In most great moral reformations, some sacrifices are required;—but could total abstinence from certain poisons be deemed a sacrifice?

MR. W. DONALDSON said that he had been six years a Teetotaler, had tried both sides of the question, and was enabled to give his experience in favour of the principle of total abstinence. The testimony of all who have tried it, is favourable to the principle; and even those who relapse acknowledge its efficacy.

MR. HART said that the previous speakers had given strong drink such a bad character, he hoped that if the said strong drink were a friend of any one then present, the acquaintance would be cut as speedily as possible. One of the principal excuses for not becoming a Teetotaler, was because one's companions would ridicule the act. But will not a man consent to a little ridicule when he knows that he is performing a good action?

MR. POWELL said that he was indebted to Mr. Hart for the enjoyment of the blessings he had derived from the principle of Teetotalism.

MR. BAYLIS said that he had beheld the advantages of Teetotalism in public and in private, and especially in the home of the poor man.

MR. PACE observed that Teetotalism was now looked upon with a more attentive and favourable glance in the higher circles than it was wont to be.

MR. BIDDLE detailed the personal benefits he had derived from the principle of Teetotalism.

MR. CRUMP said that much as he wished to see the upper classes teetotalized, his sympathies were more especially enlisted in favour of the working men, who had so long been degraded and debased by the use of intoxicating liquors. Mr. Crump then expatiated upon the advantages which would accrue to the cause of Teetotalism by a general Union, and said that there were several great Societies now in the metropolis, of which one of the principal was the United Temperance Association.

METROPOLITAN ROMAN CATHOLIC TOTAL ABSTINENCE ASSOCIATION.

THIS flourishing society will hold a grand meeting at Stratford on Tuesday next to form an Auxiliary at that place. We shall give further details next week.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE AWE-INSPIRING NARRATIVE OF A TRIAL FOR MURDER IS COMMENCED BY MR. WELLER IN THIS CHAPTER.—SINGULAR INTERRUPTION OF THE TALE.—THE USE OF FIGURES IN POETRY IS NOW FAMILIARLY EXPLAINED FOR THE FIRST TIME.

MR. SAMUEL WELLER was seated alone, in the kitchen of his master's villa at Dulwich. It was ten o'clock in the evening—or at night (whichever the gentle reader may please to denominate the hour);—Mr. and Mrs. Pickwick had retired to rest; Mrs. Samuel Weller and the little ones had also ascended to their boudoir; and old Mr. Weller, who was at that moment his son's guest at the villa, was snoring manfully in a test-bed which had been fitted up for him in the back kitchen.

It was, then, ten o'clock at night. Sam had about an hour previously commenced the perusal of a volume containing many marvellous tales of ghosts, extraordinary occurrences, remarkable coincidences, &c.; and so intent was he upon these soul-stirring narratives, that he heard not the clock strike; neither did the nasal melody created by his father in the back kitchen make any impression upon him. The narrative which at the hour of ten was especially occupying Mr. Weller's attention, was so very absorbing in its interest, that we shall not hesitate to lay it before our readers. It is supposed to be related by an individual who was present at the scene which he describes:—

"The day of the trial dawned. The evidence relative to the murder was altogether of a circumstantial character; but the prejudice against the prisoner was extremely strong; and no one doubted that a conviction would be the inevitable result of the trial. I arrived in the court just as the proceedings had commenced. It was a dark and tempestuous day; and the height of the buildings which surrounded the court-house added to the gloominess of the scene. The prisoner was ushered in, and placed in the dock. There was a serenity in the expression of his countenance that at once prepossessed me in his favour. I had learned from my experience that the countenance was indeed the mirror of the heart; and that it is hard for the face to assume a virtue, if the soul hath it not; and I saw at once, from the calmness of the accused, the cool and collected gaze with which he returned the scowls and frowns of the multitude, that there was a consciousness of innocence. The accused was arraigned; and the trial proceeded.

"The evidence disclosed that the deceased and the prisoner had been drinking together, and had quarrelled; that the prisoner had struck the deceased; that he had sworn he would be the death of him; that, through the intercession of the bystanders, a patched-up reconciliation had taken place, willingly on the part of the deceased, doggedly on that of the accused; that the deceased had started to go home by his usual route, and that the prisoner had immediately followed him, although his home was in a contrary direction; that sounds of strife were heard very shortly after; that the deceased had never again been heard of; that suspicion having fallen upon the prisoner, his steps on the night in question had been traced; that marks of a struggle had been found upon the earth, and drops of coagulated blood; and that the accused, having been asked to account for the deceased, denied that he had ever seen him after the moment that he left, on the night alluded to. The previous quarrel—the threat—the evident unwillingness of the accused to become reconciled to the deceased; the fact that he followed him—the noise of the conflict supposed to have subsequently taken place—and the indications of strife and blood-shed that the path afforded, joined to the sudden disappearance of the deceased, all combined to fix the crime of murder upon the prisoner. No importance was given to the fact that the body had not been found, as a deep and rapid river flowed immediately by the spot, and wended its way to the ocean;—and into the river the body was supposed to have been thrown.

"Such was the case for the prosecution; and it increased the excitement against the unfortunate individual at the bar. But he still retained the appearance of perfect calmness; and his counsel proceeded to address the jury in his defence. He said that all the matters that had been testified to, were doubtless true, but that they gave no evidence of the prisoner's guilt; that it was true he had quarrelled with John Grimes, the individual whom he was alleged to have murdered, and that he had struck him; that the threat he made was but the idle declaration of a man who was excited by liquor; that he had become reconciled to him unwillingly, because he had no faith in his overtures; that he had followed Grimes that night, because he had business with a neighbour in the direction of Grimes's house; but that Grimes having walked faster than himself, he had lost sight of him immediately, and had not seen him again that night.

"While the counsel for the defence was speaking, it was evident to me that, although his arguments had their weight upon the judge, they had none upon the jurors or by-standers. The jury had especially made up their mind to the prisoner's guilt, and were determined that his life should be taken. The counsel for the prisoner called witnesses to character, and the neighbour to prove that he had business with him on the night in question; and then the counsel for the prosecution rose to deliver the rejoinder. He dwelt with bitter and burning eloquence upon the crime of murder;—he spoke of the cool and deliberate manner of the prisoner, and reproached him as one who, like a cannibal, could glut over the mangled remains of his victim: he dwelt with great minuteness, clearness, and ingenuity, upon the train of circumstances 'which could not lie'; and he threw a web of guilt around the prisoner that no one doubted would involve him in destruction. But still the prisoner quailed not. The judge summed up the case to the jury, narrating the circumstances, and unfolding the law: he admitted that the facts were very strong against the accused, but that one material link was wanting;—it had not been proved that Grimes was dead! He concluded by admonishing them that they should not convict unless they had sufficient evidence of that fact. But the caution was thrown away upon the excited feelings of the jury. The counsel for the prosecution had so worked upon them by his clamour for a conviction—his anxiety to prove the prisoner guilty—his torturings, his writhings, his almost prayers to accomplish that end,—that a prejudice was excited against the unhappy individual in the dock, and neither reason nor justice could crush it. The jury, without retiring, delivered a verdict of Guilty; and the judge was about to put on the black cap, when the prisoner spoke as follows:—'I ask permission of the court to call a witness who, I think, will relieve me of this diabolical charge; who will prove that my hands are not red with blood; who will shew the impropriety and danger of a conviction upon circumstantial evidence; in short, who will satisfactorily convince the malignant and demon-like heart of the counsel for the prosecution, that I am innocent of this crime.'

"The judge asked the counsel for the prosecution if he had any objection to the production of this witness. 'None,' replied the counsel with a bitter sneer; 'but if he wishes to convince me, and to save his neck from the gallows, he had better produce John Grimes himself!'—'That is precisely the witness I intend to introduce,' said the prisoner very coolly; and, elevating his voice, he cried, 'JOHN GRIMES!'

"This proceeding created great excitement. Some of the by-standers laughed aloud: others heaped bitter execrations upon the prisoner; and the counsel for the prosecution sneeringly asked him 'if he would have John Grimes called again?' The judge was now evidently fast changing his favourable opinion of the prisoner, who, he thought, was using an unpardonable frivolity with the court. I turned towards the prisoner, and was amazed at the terrific change which had taken place in his countenance. Its placidity and composure were gone: it was covered with livid spots, and immense drops of perspiration were rolling rapidly from his brow;—the eyes gleamed with an unnatural brightness, and the hair stood up with that unerring indication of great bodily fear or mental horror.

"'Call him again—in God's name!' shouted he, at the top of his voice.

"The crier of the court repeated the call. At that moment the storm, which had been slumbering for a short time, burst forth with tenfold violence. The rain beat furiously upon the skylights;—the wind howled and moaned like a damned spirit; and several of the tiles fell from the roofs of the adjacent buildings into the street, with a tremendous crash, startling the already excited inmates of the tribunal. It was an awful scene without; it was a still more awful one within. The unearthly appearance of the prisoner—the sudden and awful change that had taken place in him—his solemn adjuration—and his earnest manner,—all had deeply affected the spectators; and many looked as if they really expected to see the murdered man rise at the invocation. All were agitated—save the implacable counsel for the prosecution, who sat scowling at the accused, with a look of triumph and fiendish exultation upon his countenance. The judge rallied himself, and put on the black cap, preparatory to pronouncing the awful sentence of death upon the prisoner; and already had he begun his solemn address, when suddenly an individual rose, no one knew from precisely which spot, and striding to the witness' box, and throwing off a huge cloak which enveloped his form, disclosed to the horror-stricken and amazed crowd, the pale and wasted features of JOHN GRIMES!

"The effect was electrical. The judge turned ghastly pale; and several of the by-standers rushed out into the storm. The counsel for the prosecution fainted. At last order was in some measure restored. Grimes proceeded to say that, on the night of the supposed murder, he had gone but a short distance when he was accosted by an individual; and just at that moment—

And just at this moment—just as Mr. Samuel Weller was arriving at the most pithy part of this narrative of death, blood-ahed, and torture—he happened to raise his head—a strange noise had aroused him from his application to the book—and, to his horror and alarm, a dreadful form stalked slowly and majestically into the kitchen!

Mr. Samuel Weller started from his chair—and at that moment the clock struck eleven. The candle had not been snuffed for some time, and the light it threw around was most gloomy and dull. It was really an awful moment—and still the strange figure drew nearer and nearer. It is impossible to say how Mr. Samuel Weller would have acted, had not a closer inspection of the mysterious figure somewhat allayed his fears.

"Vell, I'm blowed if this here midnight visitor isn't come to call upon me in a blanket!" ejaculated Sam. "But venders never cease—"

"That was the observation, Samivel, which was made by the overseer's wife when her husband came home sober after a wasty dinner."

"And wot are you a-doin' at this here time o'night, gettin' up and v'alkin' about like a somnambulist?" cried Sam, with a smile, as he surveyed the jolly red countenance of his respected father developing itself amidst the ample folds of an immense blanket.

"I tell 'ee wot it is, Samivel," said the old gentleman, seating himself upon a chair near the kitchen-fire, which was burning cheerfully; "I've bin a-dreamin' of a tidy young 'ooman, of about forty-two year o'age, as I've fell in with lately, and as is wery likely, Sammy, to make your old father change his intentions with respect to perpetual silly-busy."

"Silly-busy! wot's that?" demanded Sam.

"Avoidance o' the marriage state, Samivel," replied his father.

"Ah—calibacy!" cried Sam: "I understand now! But why should that there hidea make you get out o' your bed, and go prowlin' about the house like a old ghost?"

"I don't know how it was, Sammy," answered the old gentleman; "but I awoke up wery sudden, and belhought me o' doin' as a great many of them fellers that are called poets does, sich is committin' my reflectshuns to paper. I sees a light in the kitchen, I gets up, I throws this here flannel horse-cloth about my old carcase, and I've just brought a bit o' paper along with me to draw up a sort o' poetic valentine."

"Wot a old goblin it is!" cried Sam.

"Now, don't talk nonsense, Samivel," said the old gentleman: "but just take and write down wot I shall tell 'ee. The later the hour, the more sentimental the business, as the house-breaker said ven he got in at the old lady's Beavinder."

"And who is this here flame o' your'n?" demanded Sam, eyeing his father with a comical expression of countenance, while the old gentleman himself sat solemnly wrapped up in the blanket.

"Never do you mind, Samivel," was the reply: "she ain't a viddy—that's von thing!"

As he uttered these words, old Mr. Weller produced a piece of paper which he had hitherto held beneath his blanket; and requested his son to enact the part of his secretary. Sam was willing to oblige the old gentleman and to divert himself, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour; and he accordingly procured pen and ink to commence his task. On close inspection, he found that the paper was ruled as if for accounts, viz., across with blue lines, and rectangularly near the outer edge with red for the pounds, shillings, and pence.

"Wery good!" cried Sam, as he noticed this circumstance to his father; "I've often heard it said that figures is allowed in poetry; and now I'm blowed if I don't understand how to introduce 'em. It never struck me afore."

So, instead of being in bed by twelve, Mr. Samuel Weller sat down to court the Vine: his father fell into the idea of using figures in the projected effusion; but as he shortly fell into a nap also, and then nearly into the fire-place, Sam was left, almost undisturbed to compose the following verses, which we have rescued from the ambiguous condition of orthography and meaning in which they were left by their author; and which we are now enabled to present to our readers in an intelligible form:—

Thou canst not hope, O nymph divine,
That I should ever court the
Or that when passion's glow is done,
My heart can ever love but
When from hope's flower exhales the dew,
Then Love's false smile retreats to
Then Fancy's light begins to flee,
And life is robbed of all the
And Sorrow, sad, hot tears must pour
O'er cheeks where roses bloomed so

Yes—life's a scene all dim as Styx;
Its joys are dear at these and
Its sorrows fly so quickly hence,
They scarcely cheap at
Oh! for the dreams that may arrive
When we shall come to
The breast no more is filled with heaven
When years it numbers
And yielded unto manhood's
About the age of
Then the world's end, and the end of days

The above lines were followed by others which detailed, in a similar strain, the attachment of the sender to the receiver, and, as soon as Mr. Samuel Weller had brought the composition to a finish, he awoke his father, and read it to him. The old gentleman was however so drowsy, that he could not be induced to comprehend the meaning of the effusion; and the second reading was accordingly postponed until the following day.

(To be continued in our next.)

THE PROGRESS OF INEBRIETY.

DEVELOPED IN THE LIFE OF A GENTLEMAN.

PLATE IX.—Behold our hero enlisted in the Spanish Legion! He is not to be recognised in that dashing officer who, sword in hand, is leading on his squadron to the conflict: but he is to be seen on the left flank, in a line with the other privates of the corps. Strange vicissitudes has this young man seen! Released from the Debtors' Prison by means of the Insolvents' Court, he found himself penniless. He turned to the right and to the left—he looked before and behind him—and he saw no avenue of escape from the pinching poverty which had overtaken him. He applied to his friends who had sworn to "stick by him till death;" and so far from coming even close enough to him to stand the remotest chance of there being any sticking in the matter, they eluded him as if he were a peripatetic pestilence. Like the associates of Nonreddin, in the story of the "Fair Persia" in the "Arabian Tales," he found himself avoided by all those whom he had once made welcome to the abode of his wealth. The same blast which hurled down the fabric of mortal fortunes, chilled also the heart of friendship. Reduced to despair—unable to dig, and to beg ashamed—he seized the first opportunity of obtaining bread that presented itself. He enlisted in the Spanish Legion, and embarked for a foreign land, to fight the battles of a sovereign whom he cared nothing about, against a Pretender the merits of whose case he did not understand. He was now exposed to the most dreadful hardships,—compelled to endure the most fatiguing marches, and to eat provisions which hunger alone on many occasions urged him to touch,—and glad when, bivouacking in the midst of some desert place, or deep forest, he could obtain a ration of some meat cut from some miserable bullock not half an hour killed, and yet warm and quivering. The Chapelgorris, or Guerrillas, employed in the Queen's service, invariably obtained the best quarters and the choice of provisions; and the miserable foreigners, who gave their experience, their discipline, and their energies to the Queen's cause, were treated with every indignity by their Spanish comrades. At times our hero was exposed to all the dangers of the battle-field; and on many occasions did he dare peril more alarming than even the aspect of the enemy, to obtain a supply of that liquor, the taste for which still pertinaciously controlled all his actions. At length he was compelled from a severe wound in his left arm to retire from the active business of the Legion; and he shortly afterwards embraced an opportunity of returning to England. He arrived in the metropolis without a farthing in his pocket, and without a friend to apply to in the hour of his deep distress.

PLATE X.—Still does the fatal propensity, which has brought about his ruin, pursue him. On his arrival in London, he sought the office where the arrears of pay were to be settled, and he was told that no instructions had yet been received. Although famishing with hunger, he made away with some article of apparel to procure drink. He did not as yet know that this same strong drink had ruined him, as it ruined and still ruins millions of others. It would be impossible to say how he subsisted for some weeks. Penury and want were his constant companions: misery and distress haunted him like spectres; he saw everything through the medium of his own misfortunes. He looked with a jaundiced eye upon the prosperity of the wealthy, and did not reflect upon the probable origin and cause of the fortune which he envied. He sought to drown his cares in strong drink; and so long as he could obtain a sufficient supply of that, he abandoned all ideas of exerting himself to obtain a livelihood. And now behold him—a mendicant in the streets; not knowing when he rose in the morning, where he was to sleep at night; and as often slumbering beneath the dry arches of Waterloo Bridge as elsewhere—always starving; and yet always contriving to obtain his fill of strong liquor. It is really astonishing how the intemperate can find means to pander to their depraved taste, at times when they cannot procure bread: but it is nevertheless a fact that they do so contrive. Each day did our hero repair to the office where the arrears were to be paid; and each day did he depart without having his just claims satisfied. And, on each occasion, was there a crowd of miserable, wounded, starving wretches, like himself—collected round the doors of the same office—and compelled to gaze the same anguish of disappointment. And in the central remnants of their uniforms, they seemed not to be Christians in a Christian land; they rather resembled the remnants of wretched beings in some degrading garb which their misery had closely worn to rags. But they had supported all the fury, and had fought foremost in the ranks of the army; and yet they were even denied the price of limbs which they had lost in the service of the ungrateful foreigners. At length our hero is driven to desperation; for once he has failed to obtain his usual supply of intoxicating liquor;—he visits the office—no satisfactory tidings yet,—and, in a moment of despair, he dashes to the ground the bottle which he had repaired to that place, as a last hope, to seek the means to fill.

PLATE XI.—The fragments of the bottle lying upon the ground, opened a new current of ideas in his mind. He suddenly began to think that all his miseries had originated in his attachment to that bottle. He cast a retrospective glance over his life, and he readily traced all the various episodes of misfortune, which characterized it, to his habits of dissipation and intemperance. He had heard something about Teetotalism; and he remembered that he had often laughed at and ridiculed the idea. He now began to give it his sober and serious consideration. He reflected that so long as he drank moderately he was in danger; but that were he to abstain altogether, he should be safe. All good feelings were not destroyed in his mind; and he resolved that evening to repair to some place of Teetotal meeting, and hear the arguments advanced in favour of the system. He felt satisfied with this resolution: and as he walked along the streets, he met a friend who advanced him a small loan. It seemed that Providence absolutely smiled upon his good design; and he procured a wholesome meal—at which he drank water! He now returned a blessing to Heaven for that meal; and this was the first time he had ever done so. A sensation of contentment and happiness cheered him; and he felt that his long drooping courage was reviving within him. In the evening he proceeded to an assembly-room where a popular Teetotal advocate was lecturing. The arguments he heard confirmed him in his good resolutions: wisdom seemed to dictate every word which fell upon the ears of our hero—a film fell from his eyes—he saw, and he believed. One circumstance particularly struck him:—he could easily recognise the Teetotalers who were present, because he had only to separate the cleanly, respectable, and well-dressed portion of the audience from the miserable, dirty, and ragged beings who thronged near the door. Many of those Teetotalers had once been equally dirty and ragged as the idlers at the entrance; but when they abandoned the ways of intemperance, they soon found themselves well-dressed and anxious to appear respectable. Our hero no longer hesitated;—he seized the pen, and gladly appended his name to the pledge, which lay upon the table.

PLATE XII.—And he was not deceived, nor disappointed;—for Providence indeed smiled upon him; and, as if to afford him another chance of doing well in this world, that same all-wise and merciful Providence again placed a fortune at his command. He received a legacy from some rich relative; and, guided by his former bitter experience, was enabled to turn this sum to good account. He persisted in his career of total abstinence from the fertile cause of evil, and found that sobriety was the architect of fortunes, as intemperance was their demolisher:—he espoused a lovely girl, whose love he won by his exemplary conduct;—and we now behold him and his beautiful bride sitting contentedly in each other's society, perusing The Teetotaler journal.

OF WORDS AND LANGUAGE.

A word is a sound, of which no part of itself is significant; but a sentence has all its parts significant. Brutes do not possess speech in so high a degree as man, and yet they seem to possess it in some degree, but that only in respect to their passions: for instance, a hen has a particular note to call her chickens together; a dog has a particular sound to express his anger by, as barking, and another and different one to express pain by, as yelping. The cause why brutes do not possess speech in so high a degree as man is owing in some measure to man's having the power of making articulate sounds. But it is not altogether owing to that, for there are many birds that may be taught to make articulate sounds distinct enough. Now, language consists chiefly of general names; the ideas of which are got by abstraction, which faculty brutes do not possess, and therefore cannot use general names with propriety; and this is seen by experiment; for instance—if you get a parrot, you may teach it proper names, such as Tom, William, &c., but can never get it to use general names, such as man, horse, cow, &c. properly, which is the chief reason why brutes do not possess language in so high a degree as man.

Words are not the names of things, but the signs of our ideas. The word gold, when written or when uttered, does not, as some people imagine, denote the substance itself, but the idea in the speaker's mind, which differs in different persons, though the substance itself remains the same. A person shows you a piece of money, which you call a sovereign; but sovereign is not the name of the piece of money; it is the name you give to the idea you have of that piece of money. Thus, if two persons were to see that piece of money, they would both call it a sovereign. But suppose you would

ing the necessity of the measure. Our Manchester Correspondent, Mr. WILLIAMS, the Secretary of the District Society, writes to us as follows:—

"If I can spare time from business, I shall be with you in London, for your Annual Procession. I suppose you will insert the time of its taking place in your valuable periodical."

Mr. DRAPER, the Secretary of the Fitzroy and North West London Auxiliary to the N. B. and F. Temperance Society, addresses us in the following manner:—

"In reading your valuable journal of the 3rd instant, I was greatly pleased to find that the Leading Article was devoted to the necessity of the Procession on Whit-Monday; as I had just before been reading with some surprise the objections raised against it in two other Temperance publications. If there be no Procession, we give our opponents an opportunity of stating that our cause is on the decline, and that we dare not show our numbers. I trust that the proper demonstration will take place on the usual day; and we shall shake the soul-destroying traffic to its foundation. For this purpose, let every sincere Teetotaler echo the cry of the 'PROCESSION!' that we may convince our opponents that the little spark has now kindled into a great flame!"

A most influential member of the Teetotal world, who does not wish his name now to appear, has written to us a long letter on the subject, and from which we quote the following:—

"The Teetotalers of London and the suburbs are most anxious for the Procession; and it is preposterous to think of disappointing them. I should not object to a Gala, as elsewhere suggested, at some Park; but it would be shameful to allow one or two Societies to profit by the pecuniary returns thereof, as on the occasion of the Dyrham expedition. Neither should a few men in power pretend to controul the wishes of the great majority of Teetotalers. I am delighted to see that there is some chance of the United Temperance Association taking up this affair in a spirited manner. Be assured that if any one Society will set the example, the masses of the Teetotalers will gladly follow it. It is ridiculous to talk of the expense of a Procession, and recommend a Gala as a substitute. Will not the same expenditure be incurred by the latter, as by the former? But if the London Teetotalers have neither, they will be far behind their Irish brethren in Ireland and in all the great towns, where Processions took place on Saint Patrick's Day. The publicans will moreover rejoice, and declare that the cause is nearly extinguished. Surely, matters can be so arranged as to prevent the Committees of the various Societies from being involved in debt. Tickets for the carriages can be issued a sufficient length of time before to ascertain how many vehicles are to be provided; and I do not see why any more expenses should be incurred by a Procession than by a Tea-Meeting. Former experience, which, I admit, has been dearly purchased by the Committees, will enable them to 'order these things better' in future. At all events, do not let us give the publicans an opportunity of triumphing over us; and if the Teetotalers cannot afford to ride in procession, then let them walk; but let them display their numbers some how or another on the ensuing Whit-Monday!"

Another letter contains the following remarks, which we also submit to our readers:—

"In the name of common sense, what are the London Teetotalers about? Will they be in all things behind the Teetotalers of Ireland and of the English provinces? Where is the enthusiasm—where is the ardour which ought to characterise them? If they abandon the idea of the Procession, they will manifest a luke-warmness in the cause which will be really distressing!"

THE CHARTIST TEETOTAL ASSOCIATIONS.

THE friends of Teetotalism generally will be pleased to hear of the progress of the cause in any direction; and under the influence of any sect or party. It appears that the Chartist Teetotal Associations are flourishing in London, and in many of the great provincial cities and manufacturing towns. Several Christian ministers have joined their ranks; and many very influential persons at Hull, Sheffield, Oldham, Chesterfield, Manchester, Manningham, Northampton, Preston, Ashton-under-Lyne, Kettering, Leicester, &c., have followed the example. Mr. HENRY VINCENT has lately been lecturing, with considerable success at Northampton, Kettering, and Leicester, and has enrolled numerous converts beneath the banners of Teetotalism. The following is the pledge of these Associations:—

"I, A. B., voluntarily pledge myself to abstain from the use of all intoxicating drinks; that I will neither use them myself, nor offer them to others; and that I will do all in my power to discourage their use. And I further pledge myself to use all lawful and constitutional means to cause the People's Charter to become the law of the land."

Without at all interfering with, or even alluding to the political tenets of these Societies, we consider it to be our duty to record the progress of Teetotalism in all places and under all influences, without reference to parties or fraternities.

COUNTRY NEWS.

IRELAND.

THE cause of Teetotalism is progressing with astonishing rapidity in Ireland. The REV. MR. MATHEW is unwearied in his exertions to regenerate his fellow-countrymen. There are now but few cases of relapse; and those instances are followed by a return to the principle, with deep and bitter regret for the backsliding. Numerous Tea-Festivals followed Saint Patrick's Day in Dublin, Cork, &c.; and several are still in contemplation, especially with a view of encouraging Irish manufactures. Crime has diminished in a most extraordinary degree in Ireland; and there are now many large and populous towns without a single public-house in them.

BARNARD CASTLE.

THAT admirable Temperance periodical, the Border Herald, published by Mr. Hudson Scott at Carlisle, contains the following paragraph, which has been communicated to the columns of that journal by the Secretary of the Barnard Castle Teetotal Society:—

"We have been favoured with a visit from Mr. F. R. LEES, of Burmoodtop Hall, Leeds. Our object in bringing Mr. Lees was to discuss the subject of Total Abstinence with the REV. W. S. L. PRATMAN, independent Minister, who has lately advanced topics from his pulpit, and in a printed circular, inimical to our cause, to the effect that wine and strong drinks are commanded and recommended by God for the use of man. The reverend gentleman having been waited on, declined a discussion; Mr. LEES, however, delivered three lectures in the Union Hall, to prove that teetotalism is in accordance with divine revelation, and is well calculated to benefit mankind physically, morally, and spiritually, which he did in a manner highly creditable to himself, and satisfactorily to crowded audiences. The cause is steadily advancing in this town and neighbourhood. We number upwards of 500 members, amongst whom are fifty-one reclaimed characters, many of whom are joined to Christian churches."

CARLISLE.

TEETOTALISM is progressing favourably in Carlisle and its environs. A grand festival lately took place at the Rechabite Tent Room, Castle-street, for the purpose of affording the friends of Mr. RICHARD DUNCAN, a staunch Teetotaler of Carlisle, an opportunity of expressing their admiration of his conduct in the cause, previous to his departure for America. Mr. H. LOWES, publisher and bookseller, presided; and several effective and animated speeches were delivered. "After a neat speech from the chairman," says the Border Herald, "the meeting separated, both delighted and deeply affected at parting with so worthy a member of the Teetotal Society." Would such scenes as these take place in the sphere of the drinking world?

MANCHESTER.

THE Secretary of the Manchester District Temperance Society requests us to correct an error or two which crept into our Report, under the head of Manchester, in our Number of March 27th. The Procession took place upon the 17th of March (Saint Patrick's Day), and not on the 12th. We should also have stated that "the sick Clubs were not so numerous as they used to be, and that the Procession of Teetotalers was larger than on any previous Saint Patrick's Day."

On Friday evening, April 26th, Mr. RALPH HOLKER delivered a lecture in the Temperance Meeting Room of the Peter-street Branch, which was well filled. Many signatures were received. Mr. GEORGE LOMAX continued his lectures upon his "twenty-one reasons for becoming a Teetotaler," at the meeting-room of the Tabernacle Branch. The Independent Order of Rechabites is weekly adding to its members. In the Rules of the Manchester District Temperance Society, we find the following paragraph:—

"That while a distinct and unequivocal avowal be made of the establishment of this Society on Christian principles, sectarian theology and party politics shall be strictly avoided in all its meetings and discussions."

TOWN NEWS.

FITZROY AUXILIARY TO THE NEW BRITISH AND FOREIGN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

THIS spirited Society is now actively employed in raising subscriptions for a new banner and union-jacks, and for the purpose of hiring a band for the Procession on Whit-Monday.

UNITED KINGDOM TOTAL ABSTINENCE LIFE ASSOCIATION.

ON Monday evening last, a meeting was held at the Temperance Hall (late the Theatre), Broadway, Westminster, for the purpose of explaining the object and principles of this Insurance Company. On Tuesday, the 13th instant, a meeting, for a similar purpose, will be held at the School-room, Stratford.

KENT WARD BERMUDSEY BRANCH.

A MEETING was held on Sunday morning, March 28th, at the Working Man's Chapel, Dockhead, Mr. LUCAS in the chair. The meeting was most ably addressed by this gentleman, and by MESSIEURS SNEAD, GLOVER, M'CARTHY, &c. These assemblies will take place every Sunday morning, at the same place; and Mr. DAVIS, the Secretary, informs us that Teetotal advocates of all Societies will be welcome. When Mr. Davis last communicated with us, this Branch only consisted of 900 members: at that period the Branch was divided;—it is now however united, and consists of two thousand members, who are all staunch to the principle, and active in its interests.

UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE of this Society has been compelled to alter its arrangements with regard to the TEA-FESTIVAL on Easter Monday. This Festival will take place at the MILTON-STREET INSTITUTION, at five o'clock precisely, on Easter Monday. Cards of Admission, one shilling each, may be obtained of Mr. EMERSON, the Treasurer, 31, Fore-street, City.

The Executive Committee of the United Temperance Association meets ever alternate Friday evening, at eight o'clock, at Hart's Temperance Hotel, Aldersgate-street. The members of this Committee are Messieurs Emberson, Pocknell, Crump, Benstead, Kalmier, Johnson, Clark, G. W. M. Reynolds, Baylis, Trounce, Knipe, Sims, Glennie, Grimshaw, Parkins, Betts, Farmilo, and Dawling. On Monday evening last, the meeting of this Society took place at the Milton-street Institution.

Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS took the chair, and detailed the adulterations practised by the brewers and publicans in respect to their beer.

Mr. BENSTED said that strong drink was absolutely unnecessary for man, as it neither gave him vigour to perform his manual labour, nor energy in the pursuit of his intellectual avocations. The Pledge is a voluntary obligation, which Teetotalers impose upon themselves in the same manner as the vows of marriage or baptism are taken; and it is no more a symbol or condition of slavery than either of those religious ordinances. The Pledge is a crutch by which the frail in resolution may support themselves; and if it be really an emblem of slavery, then (said Mr. Benstead) is such slavery the most enviable condition of existence.

Mr. MEE observed that he had not much pity for the drunkard; but he decidedly pitied the poor wife and famished children, who were the principal sufferers by his depravity. The degradation of the working classes had been effected by strong drink; and Teetotalism could alone elevate them again to their proper level. The "double stout" makes the brewer stout, and the publican stout, and their wives and children stout; but it makes the deluded drunkard very—very thin! In most great moral reformations, some sacrifices are required;—but could total abstinence from certain poisons be deemed a sacrifice!

Mr. W. DONALDSON said that he had been six years a Teetotaler, had tried both sides of the question, and was enabled to give his experience in favour of the principle of total abstinence. The testimony of all who have tried it, is favourable to the principle; and even those who relapse acknowledge its efficacy.

Mr. HART said that the previous speakers had given strong drink such a bad character, he hoped that if the said strong drink were a friend of any one then present, the acquaintance would be cut as speedily as possible. One of the principal excuses for not becoming a Teetotaler, was because one's companions would ridicule the act. But will not a man consent to a little ridicule when he knows that he is performing a good action?

Mr. POWELL said that he was indebted to Mr. Hart for the enjoyment of the blessings he had derived from the principle of Teetotalism.

Mr. BAYLIS said that he had beheld the advantages of Teetotalism in public and in private, and especially in the home of the poor man.

Mr. PECK observed that Teetotalism was now looked upon with a more attentive and favourable glance in the higher circles than it was wont to be.

Mr. BIDDLE detailed the personal benefits he had derived from the principle of Teetotalism.

Mr. CRUMP said that much as he wished to see the upper classes teetotalized, his sympathies were more especially enlisted in favour of the working-men, who had so long been degraded and debased by the use of intoxicating liquors. Mr. Crump then expatiated upon the advantages which would accrue to the cause of Teetotalism by a general Union, and said that there were several great Societies now in the metropolis, of which one of the principal was the United Temperance Association.

METROPOLITAN ROMAN CATHOLIC TOTAL ABSTINENCE ASSOCIATION.

THIS flourishing society will hold a grand meeting at Stratford on Tuesday next to form an Auxiliary at that place. We shall give further details next week.

PICKWICK MARRIED.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE AWE-INSPIRING NARRATIVE OF A TRIAL FOR MURDER IS COMMENCED BY MR. WELLER IN THIS CHAPTER.—SINGULAR INTERRUPTION OF THE TALE.—THE USE OF FIGURES IN POETRY IS NOW FAMILIARLY EXPLAINED FOR THE FIRST TIME.

MR. SAMUEL WELLER was seated, alone, in the kitchen of his master's villa at Dulwich. It was ten o'clock in the evening,—or at night (whichever the gentle reader may please to denominate the hour);—Mr. and Mrs. Pickwick had retired to rest; Mrs. Samuel Weller and the little ones had also ascended to their boudoir; and old Mr. Weller, who was at that moment his son's guest at the villa, was snoring manfully in a tent-bed which had been fitted up for him in the back kitchen.

It was, then, ten o'clock at night. Sam had about an hour previously commenced the perusal of a volume containing many marvellous tales of ghosts, extraordinary occurrences, remarkable coincidences, &c.; and so intent was he upon these soul-stirring narratives, that he heard not the clock strike: neither did the nasal melody created by his father in the back kitchen make any impression upon him. The narrative which at the hour of ten was especially occupying Mr. Weller's attention, was so very absorbing in its interest, that we shall not hesitate to lay it before our readers. It is supposed to be related by an individual who was present at the scene which he describes:—

"The day of the trial dawned. The evidence relative to the murder was altogether of a circumstantial character; but the prejudice against the prisoner was extremely strong; and no one doubted that a conviction would be the inevitable result of the trial. I arrived in the court just as the proceedings had commenced. It was a dark and tempestuous day; and the height of the buildings which surrounded the court-house added to the gloominess of the scene. The prisoner was ushered in, and placed in the dock. There was a serenity in the expression of his countenance that at once prepossessed me in his favour. I had learned from my experience that the countenance was indeed the mirror of the heart; and that it is hard for the face to assume a virtue, if the soul hath it not; and I saw at once, from the calmness of the accused, the cool and collected gaze with which he returned the scowls and frowns of the multitude, that there was a consciousness of innocence. The accused was arraigned; and the trial proceeded.

"The evidence disclosed that the deceased and the prisoner had been drinking together, and had quarrelled; that the prisoner had struck the deceased; that he had sworn he would be the death of him; that, through the intercession of the by-standers, a patched-up reconciliation had taken place, willingly on the part of the deceased, doggedly on that of the accused; that the deceased had started to go home by his usual route, and that the prisoner had immediately followed him, although his home was in a contrary direction; that sounds of strife were heard very shortly after; that the deceased had never again been heard of; that suspicion having fallen upon the prisoner, his steps on the night in question had been traced; that marks of a struggle had been found upon the earth, and drops of coagulated blood; and that the accused, having been asked to account for the deceased, denied that he had ever seen him after the moment that he left, on the night alluded to. The previous quarrel—the threat—the evident unwillingness of the accused to become reconciled to the deceased; the fact that he followed him—the noise of the conflict supposed to have subsequently taken place—and the indications of strife and blood-shed that the path afforded, joined to the sudden disappearance of the deceased, all combined to fix the crime of murder upon the prisoner. No importance was given to the fact that the body had not been found, as a deep and rapid river flowed immediately by the spot, and wended its way to the ocean;—and into the river the body was supposed to have been thrown.

"Such was the case for the prosecution; and it increased the excitement against the unfortunate individual at the bar. But he still retained the appearance of perfect calmness; and his counsel proceeded to address the jury in his defence. He said that all the matters that had been testified to, were doubtless true, but that they gave no evidence of the prisoner's guilt; that it was true he had quarrelled with John Grimes, the individual whom he was alleged to have murdered, and that he had struck him; that the threat he made was but the idle declaration of a man who was excited by liquor; that he had become reconciled to him unwillingly, because he had no faith in his overtures; that he had followed Grimes that night, because he had business with a neighbour in the direction of Grimes's house; but that Grimes having walked faster than himself, he had lost sight of him immediately, and had not seen him again that night.

"While the counsel for the defence was speaking, it was evident to me that, although his arguments had their weight upon the judge, they had none upon the jurors or by-standers. The jury had especially made up their mind to the prisoner's guilt, and were determined that his life should be taken. The counsel for the prisoner called witnesses to character, and the neighbour to prove that he had business with him on the night in question; and then the counsel for the prosecution rose to deliver the rejoinder. He dwelt with bitter and burning eloquence upon the crime of murder;—he spoke of the cool and deliberate manner of the prisoner, and reproached him as one who, like a cannibal, could glut over the mangled remains of his victim: he dwelt with great minuteness, clearness, and ingenuity, upon the train of circumstances 'which could not lie,' and he threw a web of guilt around the prisoner that no one doubted would involve him in destruction. But still the prisoner quailed not. The judge summed up the case to the jury, narrating the circumstances, and unfolding the law: he admitted that the facts were very strong against the accused, but that one material link was wanting,—it had not been proved that Grimes was dead! He concluded by admonishing them that they should not convict unless they had sufficient evidence of that fact. But the caution was thrown away upon the excited feelings of the jury. The counsel for the prosecution had so worked upon them by his clamour for a conviction—his anxiety to prove the prisoner guilty—his torturings, his writhings, his almost prayers to accomplish that end,—that a prejudice was excited against the unhappy individual in the dock, and neither reason nor justice could hush it. The jury, without retiring, delivered a verdict of Guilty; and the judge was about to put on the black cap, when the prisoner spoke as follows:—'I ask permission of the court to call a witness who, I think, will relieve me of this diabolical charge; who will prove that my hands are not red with blood; who will shew the impropriety and danger of a conviction upon circumstantial evidence; in short, who will satisfactorily convince the malignant and demon-like heart of the counsel for the prosecution, that I am innocent of this crime.'

"The judge asked the counsel for the prosecution if he had any objection to the production of this witness. 'None,' replied the counsel with a bitter sneer; 'but if he wishes to convince me, and to save his neck from the gallows, he had better produce John Grimes himself!'—'That is precisely the witness I intend to introduce,' said the prisoner very coolly; and, elevating his voice, he cried, 'JOHN GRIMES!'

"This proceeding created great excitement. Some of the by-standers laughed aloud: others heaped bitter execrations upon the prisoner; and the counsel for the prosecution sneeringly asked him 'if he would have John Grimes called again?' The judge was now evidently fast changing his favourable opinion of the prisoner, who, he thought, was using an unpardonable frivolity with the court. I turned towards the prisoner, and was amazed at the terrific change which had taken place in his countenance. Its placidity and composure were gone: it was covered with livid spots, and immense drops of perspiration were rolling rapidly from his brow;—the eyes gleamed with an unnatural brightness, and the hair stood up with that unerring indication of great bodily fear or mental horror.

"'Call him again—in God's name!' shouted he, at the top of his voice.

"The crier of the court repeated the call. At that moment the storm, which had been slumbering for a short time, burst forth with tenfold violence. The rain beat furiously upon the skylights;—the wind howled and moaned like a damned spirit; and several of the tiles fell from the roofs of the adjacent buildings into the street, with a tremendous crash, startling the already excited inmates of the tribunal. It was an awful scene without; it was a still more awful one within. The unearthly appearance of the prisoner—the sudden and awful change that had taken place in him—his solemn adjuration—and his earnest manner,—all had deeply affected the spectators; and many looked as if they really expected to see the murdered man rise at the invocation. All were agitated—save the implacable counsel for the prosecution, who sat scowling at the accused, with a look of triumph and fiendish exultation upon his countenance. The judge rallied himself, and put on the black cap, preparatory to pronouncing the awful sentence of death upon the prisoner; and already had he begun his solemn address, when suddenly an individual rose, no one knew from precisely which spot, and striding to the witness-box, and throwing off a huge cloak which enveloped his form, disclosed to the horror-stricken and amazed crowd, the pale and wasted features of JOHN GRIMES!

"The effect was electrical. The judge turned ghastly pale; and several of the by-standers rushed out into the storm. The counsel for the prosecution fainted. At last order was in some measure restored. Grimes proceeded to say that, on the night of the supposed murder, he had gone but a short distance when he was accosted by an individual; and just at that moment—"

And just at this moment—just as Mr. Samuel Weller was arriving at the most pithy part of this narrative of death, blood-shed, and torture—he happened to raise his head—a strange noise had aroused him from his application to the book—and, to his horror and alarm, a dreadful form stalked slowly and majestically into the kitchen!

Mr. Samuel Weller started from his chair—and at that moment the clock struck eleven. The candle had not been snuffed for some time, and the light it threw around was most gloomy and dull. It was really an awful moment—and still the strange figure drew nearer and nearer. It is impossible to say how Mr. Samuel Weller would have acted, had not a closer inspection of the mysterious figure somewhat allayed his fears.

"Vell, I'm blowed if this here midnight visitor isn't come to call upon me in a blenkit!" ejaculated Sam. "But vonders 'll never cease—"

"That was the observation, Samivel, vich was made by the overseer's wife ven her husband come home sober arter a westry dinner."

"And wot are you a-doin' at this here time o'night, gettin' up and valkin' about like a somnambulisk?" cried Sam, with a smile, as he surveyed the jolly red countenance of his respected father developing itself amidst the ample folds of an immense blanket.

"I tell 'ee wot it is, Samivel," said the old gentleman, seating himself upon a chair near the kitchen-fire, which was burning cheerfully; "I've bin a-dreamin' of a tidy young 'ooman, of about forty-two year o'age, as I've fell in with lately, and as is very likely, Sammy, to make your old father change his intentions with respect to perpetuall silly-busy."

"Silly-busy! wot's that?" demanded Sam.

"Aavoidance o' the marriage state, Samivel," replied his father.

"Ab—celibacy!" cried Sam: "I understand now! But why should that there hidea make you get out o' your bed, and go prowlin' about the house like a old ghost?"

"I don't know how it was, Sammy," answered the old gentleman; "but I avoke up wery sudden, and bethought me o' doin' as a great many of them fellers that are called poets does, sich is committin' my reflekshuns to paper. I sees a light in the kitchen, I gets up, I throws this here flannel horse-cloth about my old carcase, and I've jist brought a bit o' paper along with me to draw up a sort o' poetic valentine."

"Wot a old goblin it is!" cried Sam.

"Now, don't talk nonsense, Samivel," said the old gentleman: "but jist take and write down wot I shall tell 'ee. The later the hour, the more sentimental the business, as the house-breaker said ven he got in at the old lady's vinder."

"And who is this here flame o' your'n?" demanded Sam, eyeing his father with a comical expression of countenance, while the old gentleman himself sate solemnly wrapped up in the blanket.

"Never do you mind, Samivel," was the reply: "she ain't a vidder—that's von thing!"

As he uttered these words, old Mr. Weller produced a piece of paper which he had hitherto held beneath his blanket; and requested his son to enact the part of his secretary. Sam was willing to oblige the old gentleman and to divert himself, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour; and he accordingly procured pen and ink to commence his task. On close inspection, he found that the paper was ruled as if for accounts, viz., across with blue lines, and rectangularly near the outer edge with red for the pounds, shillings, and pence.

"Wery good!" cried Sam, as he noticed this circumstance to his father; "I've often heard it said that figures is allowed in poetry; and now I'm blowed if I don't understand how to introduce 'em. It never struck me afore."

So, instead of being in bed by twelve, Mr. Samuel Weller sate down to court the Nine: his father fell into the idea of using figures in the projected effusion; but as he shortly fell into a nap also, and then nearly into the fire-place, Sam was left almost undisturbed to compose the following verses, which we have rescued from the ambiguous condition of orthography and meaning in which they were left by their author; and which we are now enabled to present to our readers in an intelligible form:—

Thou canst not hope, O nymph divine,
That I should ever court the	9
Or that when passion's glow is done,
My heart can ever love but	1
When from hope's flower exhales the dew,
Then Love's false smile deserts us	2
Then Fancy's light begins to flee,
And life is robbed of all the	3
And Sorrow, sad, her tears must pour
O'er cheeks where roses bloomed be	4

Yes—life's a scene all dim as Styx;
Its joys are dear at three and	6
Its raptures fly so quickly hence,
They're scarcely cheap at	18
Oh! for the dreams that may survive
When we shall come to	25
The breast no more is filled with heaven
When years it numbers	27
And yields it up to manhood's fate
About the age of	28
Finds the world cold, and dim, and dirty
Ere the heart's annual count is	30

The above lines were followed by others which detailed, in a similar strain, the attachment of the sender to the receiver; and, as soon as Mr. Samuel Weller had brought the composition to a finish, he awoke his father, and read it to him. The old gentleman was however so drowsy, that he could not be induced to comprehend the meaning of the effusion; and the second reading was accordingly postponed until the following day.

(To be continued in our next.)

THE PROGRESS OF INEBRIETY.

DEVELOPED IN THE LIFE OF A GENTLEMAN.

PLATE IX.—Behold our hero enlisted in the Spanish Legion! He is not to be recognised in that dashing officer who, sword in hand, is leading on his squadron to the conflict: but he is to be seen on the left flank, in a line with the other privates of the corps. Strange vicissitudes has this young man seen! Released from the Debtors' Prison by means of the Insolvents' Court, he found himself penniless. He turned to the right and to the left—he looked before and behind him—and he saw no avenue of escape from the pinching poverty which had overtaken him. He applied to his friends who had sworn to "stick by him till death;" and so far from coming even close enough to him to stand the remotest chance of there being any sticking in the matter, they eluded him as if he were a peripatetic pestilence. Like the associates of Nonreddin, in the story of the "Fair Persian" in the "Arabian Tales," he found himself avoided by all those whom he had once made welcome to the shade of his wealth. The same blast which hurls down the fabric of mortal fortunes, chills also the heart of friendship. Reduced to despair—unable to dig, and to beg ashamed—he seized the first opportunity of obtaining bread that presented itself. He enlisted in the Spanish Legion; and embarked for a foreign land, to fight the battles of a sovereign whom he cared nothing about, against a Pretender the merits of whose cause he did not understand. He was now exposed to the most dreadful hardships,—compelled to endure the most fatiguing marches, and to eat provisions which hunger alone on many occasions urged him to touch;—and glad when, bivouacking in the midst of some desert place, or deep forest, he could obtain a ration of some meat cut from some miserable bullock not half an hour killed, and yet warm and quivering. The Chapeigorris, or Guerillas, employed in the Queen's service, invariably obtained the best quarters and the choice of provisions; and the miserable foreigners, who gave their experience, their discipline, and their energies to the Queen's cause, were treated with every indignity by their Spanish comrades. At times our hero was exposed to all the dangers of the battle-field; and on many occasions did he dare peril more alarming than even the aspect of the enemy, to obtain a supply of that liquor, the taste for which still pertinaciously controlled all his actions. At length he was compelled from a severe wound in his left arm to retire from the active business of the Legion; and he shortly afterwards embraced an opportunity of returning to England. He arrived in the metropolis without a farthing in his pocket, and without a friend to apply to in the hour of his deep distress.

PLATE X.—Still does the fatal propensity, which has brought about his ruin, pursue him. On his arrival in London, he sought the office where the arrears of pay were to be settled, and he was told that no instructions had yet been received. Although furnishing with hunger, he made away with some article of apparel to procure drink. He did not as yet know that this same strong drink had ruined him, as it ruined and still ruins millions of others. It would be impossible to say how he subsisted for some weeks. Penury and want were his constant companions; misery and distress haunted him like spectres; he saw everything through the medium of his own misfortunes. He looked with a jaundiced eye upon the prosperity of the wealthy, and did not reflect upon the probable origin and cause of the fortune which he envied. He sought to drown his cares in strong drink; and so long as he could obtain a sufficient supply of that, he abandoned all ideas of exerting himself to obtain a livelihood. And now behold him—a mendicant in the streets; not knowing when he rose in the morning, where he was to sleep at night; and as often slumbering beneath the dry arches of Waterloo Bridge as elsewhere,—always starving; and yet always contriving to obtain his fill of strong liquor. It is really astonishing how the intemperate can find means to pander to their depraved taste, at times when they cannot procure bread: but it is nevertheless a fact that they do so contrive. Each day did our hero repair to the office where the arrears were to be paid; and each day did he depart, without having his just claims satisfied. And, on each occasion, was there a crowd of miserable, wounded, starving wretches, like himself—collected round the doors of the same office—and compelled to endure the same anguish of disappointment. And in the tattered remnants of their uniforms, they seemed not to be Christians in a Christian land: they rather resembled the outcasts of earth, dressed in some degrading garb which their misery had already worn to rags. But they had supported all the fury of the Pretender's forces, and had fought foremost in the ranks of the Queen's army; and yet they were even decried the price of the limbs which they had lost in the service of the ungrateful foreigners. At length our hero is driven to desperation; for once he has failed to obtain his usual supply of intoxicating liquor;—he visits the office—no satisfactory tidings yet,—and, in a moment of despair, he dashes to the ground the bottle which he had repaired to that place, as a last hope, to seek the means to fill.

PLATE XI.—The fragments of the bottle lying upon the ground, opened a new current of ideas in his mind. He suddenly began to think that all his miseries had originated in his attachment to that bottle. He cast a retrospective glance over his life, and he readily traced all the various episodes of misfortune, which characterized it, to his habits of dissipation and intemperance. He had heard something about Teetotalism; and he remembered that he had often laughed at and ridiculed the idea. He now began to give it his sober and serious consideration. He reflected that so long as he drank moderately he was in danger; but that were he to abstain altogether, he should be safe. All good feelings were not destroyed in his mind; and he resolved that evening to repair to some place of Teetotal meeting, and hear the arguments advanced in favour of the system. He felt satisfied with this resolution: and as he walked along the streets, he met a friend who advanced him a small loan. It seemed that Providence absolutely smiled upon his good design; and he procured a wholesome meal—at which he drank water! He now returned a blessing to Heaven for that meal; and this was the first time he had ever done so. A sensation of contentment and happiness cheered him; and he felt that his long drooping courage was reviving within him. In the evening he proceeded to an assembly-room where a popular Teetotal advocate was lecturing. The arguments he heard confirmed him in his good resolutions: wisdom seemed to dictate every word which fell upon the ears of our hero—a film fell from his eyes—he saw, and he believed. One circumstance particularly struck him:—he could easily recognise the Teetotalers who were present, because he had only to separate the cleanly, respectable, and well-clad portion of the audience from the miserable, dirty, and ragged beings who thronged near the door. Many of those Teetotalers had once been equally dirty and ragged as the idlers at the entrance; but, when they abandoned the ways of intemperance, they soon found themselves well-dressed and anxious to appear respectable. Our hero no longer hesitated:—he seized the pen, and gladly appended his name to the pledge-book which lay upon the table.

PLATE XII.—And he was not deceived, nor disappointed;—for Providence indeed smiled upon him; and, as if to afford him another chance of doing well in this world, that same all-wise and merciful Providence again placed a fortune at his command. He received a legacy from some rich relative; and, guided by his former bitter experience, was enabled to turn this sum to a good account. He persisted in his career of total abstinence from the fertile cause of evil, and found that sobriety was the architect of fortunes, as intemperance was their demolisher:—he espoused a lovely girl, whose love he won by his exemplary conduct;—and we now behold him and his beautiful bride sitting contentedly in each other's society, persuing The Teetotaler journal.

OF WORDS AND LANGUAGE.

A word is a sound, of which no part of itself is significant; but a sentence has all its parts significant. Brutes do not possess speech in so high a degree as man, and yet they seem to possess it in some degree, but that only in respect to their passions: for instance, a hen has a particular note to call her chickens together; a dog has a particular sound to express his anger by, as barking, and another and different one to express pain by, as yelping. The cause why brutes do not possess speech in so high a degree as man is owing in some measure to man's having the power of making articulate sounds. But it is not altogether owing to that, for there are many birds that may be taught to make articulate sounds distinct enough. Now, language consists chiefly of general names, the ideas of which are got by abstraction, which faculty brutes do not possess, and therefore cannot use general names with propriety; and this is seen by experiment; for instance—if you get a parrot, you may teach it proper names, such as Tom, William, &c., but can never get it to use general names, such as man, horse, cow, &c. properly, which is the chief reason why brutes do not possess language in so high a degree as man.

Words are not the names of things, but the signs of our ideas. The word gold, when written or when uttered, does not, as some people imagine, denote the substance itself, but the idea in the speaker's mind, which differs in different persons, though the substance itself remains the same. A person shows you a piece of money, which you call a sovereign; but sovereign is not the name of the piece of money; it is the name you give to the idea you have of that piece of money. Thus, if two persons were to see that piece of money, they would both call it a sovereign. But one person would leave out of his idea some property really existing in the object, such as malleability, solubility in nitromuriatic acid, &c.; and another would take into his idea some properties not existing in the object, as, for instance, its power of attraction by the magnet. For which collection of ideas, then, would the word sovereign stand? Certainly for neither of them; but for the different ideas of the two persons.

In order to prove still further that words are the explanations of our ideas, and not the names of things, and that the same word often stands for different ideas in the minds of the different speakers, we may observe the three following definitions of gold:—I. A child's idea of gold is something bright and yellow; II. The peasant's idea, a bright yellow metal; and III. The chemist's, a bright, yellow, malleable, soluble, ponderous metal, &c.

People, in their disputes, often seem to agree, when in reality they differ as much as possible. For instance, a Papist and a Protestant may dispute about the Church. The Papist says that the Church has the power of ordaining rites and ceremonies. The Protestant assents to it. Here they seem to agree; but in fact they differ; for by Church, the Papist means the church at Rome with the Pope at the head of it; and the Protestant means that each church, or religious sect of people, has the power to ordain rites and ceremonies for itself.

People seem to differ, when in fact they agree. For instance, a Methodist and a sober Protestant may dispute about their religion. The Methodist says that faith alone is sufficient to salvation: the Protestant denies the assertion, declaring that we are saved by faith and works. Here they seem to differ, when they in reality agree; for the Methodist means by Faith the practical persuasion of a thing, which produces a corresponding behaviour in our actions, and consequently means by Faith what the Protestant means by Faith and Works. The Protestant understood by faith the bare simple assent to the truth of the Christian Religion, which alone is not sufficient.

From the above examples we may infer that things may be expressed by different names, and yet have the same meaning. Thus, the same kind of behaviour is by one called frugality, and by another covetousness, which are different names, and yet express the same behaviour. Again, things may be expressed by the same name, and yet be essentially different; for instance, Post means a piece of wood in the ground, a letter-carrier, a situation, &c. People frequently reckon things the same, merely because they go by the same name; or consider them different, because they go by different names; whereas there is no more reason for calling cold lead and hot lead the same thing, and ice and water different things, but only in the one instance they go by the same name, and in the other by different names.

The knowledge of names is frequently taken for the knowledge of things. Thus, if a person asks a botanist the name of a plant, and he tells him, then the person says he knows it; and when he sees a plant of the same kind again, he says he shall know it. Yet he knows not more of its properties than he did before; he only knows its name: and yet he says and thinks he knows the plant. Again, a person asks another, why there are no venomous animals in some countries? The other tells him because there are some anti-venomous qualities in the earth. He goes away satisfied, and says that he now knows why there are no venomous animals in some countries; yet he only knows a certain property in the soil.

Names, in process of time, lose or change their primitive signification. Thus Knave signified once "an industrious servant;" and Saint Paul, in old translations of the New Testament, is called "the Knave of Jesus Christ." Villain signified "a copyhold tenant;" dame, a "woman of distinction;" ballad, an "epic poem," &c.

Abstract terms are not predicable one of another, because they are each distinct:—a man is an animal; but it would be nonsense to say humanity is animality. In the English language, contrary expressions sometimes excite the same ideas;—for instance, a shameful and a shameless fellow; a famous and an infamous rascal, &c.

The imperfection of language is owing to several causes. For instance, when people are discoursing about honour, faith, sacrilege, grace, church, charity, &c., mistakes may occur, because the meaning of these words may not be held the same in the mind of each person. The mode of speech is made up of several simple ideas; and it is probable that the hearer will insert some property or properties which the speaker does not take into his idea, or leave out some which the speaker does take in his meaning. When a person wants to convey an idea to another, the word he makes use of should excite exactly the same idea in the mind of the hearer, which it stands for in his own mind. But in such words as those quoted above, it frequently happens otherwise, and frequent mistakes and misconceptions are the consequences. In some cases there are visible standards to adjust the meaning of words by: thus, if two persons were disputing about the metals bismuth and zinc, should one say he does not know what bismuth and zinc are, the other directly pulls some out of his pocket, which action immediately settles the dispute. But when persons are disputing about glory, charity, &c., the argument could not be settled by pulling either glory or charity out of the pocket: therefore it is evident that there is no visible standard always to adjust the meaning of words.

Many words are used without any ideas at all. Thus, if you ask a man the reason of his unexpected promotion in his profession, he will perhaps say that it was good luck; or if a person be asked why the trees bud in spring-time, he will probably reply that it is their nature. But if we were to ask either of those persons what they mean by luck and nature, they would not be able to explain themselves, for they have no settled meaning in their minds annexed to these ideas. The reason of this abuse of language is because we learn words like parrots, without ideas. If we were to learn ideas before we learned their names, it would then be impossible we should have words without ideas to them, which would be a prevention to one species of abuse of language.

Another imperfection in language arises from the unsteady application of words, by persons using them sometimes in one sense, and sometimes in another;—for instance, a clergyman in his sermon uses the word Repentance in two distinct ways,—I. As "a concern for past offences;" and II. as "an amendment of future life." There is another reason for the abuse of language, and this is the supposition that words have evident meanings, and therefore not defining them. This very often causes mistakes; for, though a word be very common, and a person would think it a rudeness to be asked for a definition of it, it sometimes happens that the word, never being sufficiently understood, stands for different ideas in the estimation of different persons. Two physicians were once disputing whether there was any liquor in the nerves. The dispute ran high, till a third person asked one of the disputants what he meant by liquor in that instance? The physician was surprised, and thought there was no need of a definition of so common a word. The other physician, who was a cool deliberate man, explained what he meant by it; and when they had both defined it, it appeared that they had very different ideas of it, and that the whole of their dispute had been about the word Liquor, which they thought not worth while disputing about. Again, two persons may dispute whether a plant has life, or not; but they do not think that the word Life needs any explanation; and so they go on wrangling and disputing without coming any nearer to the point. Amongst naturalists it is a dispute whether a caterpillar in its state of insensibility, when it is changing from a caterpillar to a butterfly, is alive or dead; but the argument entirely depends upon the definition given to the word Life, concerning which they never trouble themselves.

Another dangerous abuse of language exists in taking words for things; that is, supposing the things actually exist merely because we hear their names. In Hydrostatics everything is accounted for by Nature's abhorrence of a vacuum; in Electricity we hear of the electric effluvia; in Magnetism, of the magnetic medium, &c.; and so, by frequently hearing of these things, some people are apt to imagine that they really exist, when they have no other reason for thinking so but merely hearing the names. Thus, again, in Botany everything is accounted for by the vegetative soul. In medical etiology, diseases are accounted for by the words irritation, spasm, contagion, metastasis, &c.; and for all these we have no clear ideas; in the same way as thousands read Higgaion and Selah in the Psalms, without having any ideas in their minds annexed to those words.

When people are talking in a language we do not understand, they always seem to speak quick, although the language be very slow in reality, such as German or High Dutch. The reason of this is because, in a language which we understand, every word, or at least every cluster of words, excites an idea in our mind; and thus, the better we understand a language, the faster our ideas are excited. Therefore, in a language we understand, we have more ideas excited than in one we do not. And time appears long or short according as there are more or less ideas remembered to succeed in our minds. Therefore time appears short, when a person speaks an unknown language; but a person seeming to speak quickly, is only his seeming a short time in speaking. Where the channels of our ideas are worn quite smooth by constant use and rapid excitement, the current is often too impetuous for the mind to follow it:—there are English persons who understand what they read in Latin or French better than in English (their mother tongue), because it requires some degree of thought and time merely to construe the language.

To those who are accustomed to public speaking, especially upon argumentative subjects, and those in which a great deal depends upon correct definitions, we recommend the study of the preceding observations, which we have endeavoured to convey in the most simple and intelligible manner possible.

THE AIR.

In every part of the earth there is a certain elevation in the atmosphere, different according to the proximity to the equator, at which the thermometer never rises above the freezing point,—and this limit is called the level of perpetual congelation. It appears, therefore that the same low temperature may be met with at the equator as at the poles, by rising to find it; and we see why the snow-capped mountains are not the tenants only of high northern and southern latitudes. It is this truth which renders many parts of the tropical regions of the earth not only tolerable abodes, but as suitable as any on earth.

No surprise need be expressed that the wind, or air, blowing down from a snow-capped mountain should be warm or temperate. The truth is, there is just as much heat combined with an ounce of air on the mountain top, as in the valley; but above, the heat is diffused through a space perhaps twice as great as when below, and therefore is less sensible. It may be the same air which sweeps over a warm plain at the side of a mountain, which then rises and freezes water on the summit, and which in an hour after, or less, is again found among the flowers of another valley, as a gentle and warm breeze.

The animal body is made up of solids and fluids, and the atmospheric pressure affects it accordingly. One has difficulty at first in believing that a man's body should be bearing a pressure of fifteen pounds on every square inch of its surface, while he remains altogether insensible to the influence: but such is the fact. Reflection discovers that his not feeling the fluid pressure, is owing to its being perfectly uniform all around. If a pressure of the same kind be even many times greater, such, for instance, as fishes bear in deep water, or as a man supports in a diving-bell, it must equally pass unnoticed. Fishes are at their ease in a depth of water where the pressure around will instantly break or burst inwards almost the strongest empty vessel that can be sent down; and men walk on earth without discovering a heavy atmosphere about them, which, however, will instantly crush together the sides of a thick iron boiler, left for a moment without the counteracting internal support of steam or air.

The fluid pressure on animal bodies, thus unperceived under ordinary circumstances, may be rendered instantly sensible by a little artificial arrangement. In water, for instance, an open tube partially immersed, becomes full to the level of the water around it, and the water contained in it is supported by what is immediately below its mouth: now, a flat fish resting closely against the mouth of the tube, would evidently be bearing on its back the whole of this weight—perhaps 100 pounds; but the fish would not thereby be pushed away, nor would it even feel its burthen, because the upward pressure of the water immediately under it would just counterbalance, while the lateral pressure around would prevent any crushing effect of the mere upward and downward forces. But if, while the fish continued in the supposed situation, the 100 pounds of water were lifted from off its back by a piston in the tube, the opposite upward pressure of 100 pounds would at once crush its body into the tube, and destroy it. At a less depth, or with a smaller tube, the effect might not be fatal; but there would be a bulging or swelling of the substance of the fish into the mouth of the tube. In air, and in the human body, a perfectly analogous case is exhibited. A man, without pain or peculiar sensation, lays his hand closely on the mouth of a vessel containing air; but the instant that the air is withdrawn from within the vessel, the then unresisted pressure of the air on the outside fixes the hand upon the vessel's mouth, causes the flesh to swell or bulge into it, and makes the blood ooze from every crack or puncture in the skin.

These last lines closely describe the surgical operation of cupping, the essential circumstances of which are the application of a cup or glass with the smooth blunt lip to the skin of any part, and the extraction, by a syringe or other means, of a portion of the air from within the cup. The human mouth applied upon a part becomes a small cupping machine, and formerly, in cases of poisoned wounds, was used as such. It may be proper to add that the timely application of a cupping-glass prevents the spread of contagion either in cases of poison or hydrophobia.

The power of flies and other insects to walk on ceilings and surfaces presented downwards, or upon smooth panes of glass in an upright position, is said to depend on the formation of their feet. This is such that they act as suckers, excluding the air between them and the ceiling on which they are walking, and the atmospheric pressure keeps the animal in its position. In the same manner the hydrostatic pressure attaches fishes to rocks; and that giant of the vasty deep, the walrus, supports itself by a sort of air-pump apparatus on its feet.

The atmosphere may be considered an universal solvent; and, though itself inodorous, it is the medium of all smells, and, dissolving the different odours of fluvia, is charged with all the emanations of the various substances it sweeps. Amongst the principal causes of some of the phenomena of the atmosphere is electricity, to which may be principally attributed the lightning, the aurora-borealis, and the other igneous meteors. Heat is another cause of the phenomena of the air, and raises and suspends evaporated waters invisibly in the atmosphere, until some more powerful attraction dissolves the union, and the deserted moisture, exposed to view, falls again to the earth in the various forms of clouds, mist, dew, snow, hail, sleet, and hoar-frost. Heat is also the cause of those aerial currents familiarly termed winds, and which are caused by the dilation or contraction of the air.

The air is not an element: it is merely an exhalation. It does not exist of itself, but springs from the earth and water:—consequently it cannot be denominated an element.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Harnsley Teetotal Society should establish a Visiting Committee, to call upon the Members, and collect one penny from each.

The wish of R. L. (Bristol) shall be complied with.

The Anonymous Letter (from the Queen's Bench Prison to a Minister) is not suitable to our columns, or it should be inserted.

We have heard of the conduct of a Temperance Coffee-house keeper relative to Mr. Gay, and shall enquire farther into the matter.

Mr. Mingay Syder will commence his Spring tour in a few days. He proceeds first to Hull, where all letters should be addressed to him by provincial Secretaries, at the Temperance Coffee-house.

It is the intention of the EDITOR of "THE TEETOTALER" to visit in the course of this spring and summer, the principal cities and towns of England in which large Teetotal Societies are established. He will visit one city or town every week, returning after each visit to London, to conduct the Journal. Private answers have already been returned to the Secretaries of the several provincial societies, who have invited the EDITOR to the scene of their labours.

The next Number commences Volume II: and with that Volume will begin a Series of Steel Engravings, executed in the first style of the art, and calculated to please all classes. Give your orders early.

The Supplementary Number, containing the Index, Title and Preface to Volume I, may be procured, Price 2d.

THE TEETOTALER.

SATURDAY, APRIL 17th, 1841.

A REFERENCE to the proceedings in the Court of Excise will convince our readers that the adulteration of spirits, wine, and beer, is practised by all the venders of those liquors, without any exception. Several publicans have admitted not only that adulteration is a general rule, but that it is also a necessity to which even the honest landlord must submit, in consequence of the extent of competition and rivalry which exists in the trade, and in order to derive an adequate amount of profit from the retail of articles which are originally charged by the wholesale seller at a heavy price. It is therefore hopeless to expect that throughout the United Kingdom there will be found one public-house which does not deal in adulterated liquors. The existence of such an establishment is an impossibility, in respect to the present order of things; and the most honest publican, as well as the most rascally, is compelled to adopt the usual processes to substitute an artificial compound for the genuine liquor, at a reduced price.

If it be urged that beer can be made without such deleterious admixtures as coccus indicus, headings, lime, opium, Bohemian rosemary, &c., we do not hesitate to reply that the absence of these articles would produce an entirely different beverage—different in flavour, different in appearance, and different in its effects. The liquor would then cease to be that which is denominated beer; and the more really wholesome it was made (if alcoholic liquor could ever be entitled to the epithet) the less palatable would it become. The intoxicating qualities of beer are to be ascribed as much to the drugs used in its manufacture, as to the alcohol which it contains; and the cause of some beer being more "heady" than another species, is to be accounted for in the amount of such drugs used in the brewing of each. Alcohol, in its essence, is the same in beer as in wine, or ardent spirits; and yet beer stupifies, whereas wine and spirits produce a maddening species of intoxication. The influence of beer is somniferous; that of wine and spirits exhilarating and active. This difference arises from the fact, that the beer is elaborately adulterated with poisonous drugs and mineral substances, which produce those stupifying and brutalizing effects upon the frame; and in wine and spirits the true and usual influence of alcohol is recognised. Were nothing of an intoxicating quality but malt used in the manufacture of beer, the brewer would be compelled to treble the price of the liquor; and thus is it shown that the work of adulteration is one to which the most honest venders, whether wholesale or retail, of the beverage are obliged to submit.

Were the art of brewing one of simplicity, where would exist the necessity for the multitudes of Brewers' Guides, and other publications which teach the infernal scheme of adulteration. Human ingenuity seems to have been racked to its utmost extent to discover the means of lessening the expenses attendant upon brewing, by substituting all the noxious drugs and substances which can be thought of for those ingredients that are usually supposed to form the essence of malt liquors. Even those Guides which are intended for the domestic economy of private families, and which set many a housewife brewing instead of mending her husbands' and children's clothes, recommend the use of capsicum, coccus indicus, salt of Tartar, slaked lime, copperas, alum, ginger, Leghorn juice, and other deleterious, if not poisonous, ingredients. When these receipts for brewing are coolly and quietly recommended to private families, the reader will feel convinced that our former assertion is correct, and that "beer would not be beer" unless those schemes and plans were adhered to.

The necessity of the artifices of adulteration in respect to malt liquors may be explained in a few words. The alcohol is produced by the sugar obtained from the malt: but the brewer, as before stated, cannot afford to use malt in a sufficient quantity to produce enough alcohol to strengthen his beer;—he accordingly supplies the deficiency by means of pungent or powerful ingredients, such as cassia-buds, capsicum, ginger, vitriol, and Bohemian rosemary. The two last mentioned articles are deadly poisons. Then, again, the brewer cannot afford an adequate supply of hops to produce the bitter taste which is deemed one of the essential qualifications of malt liquor: but he finds a substitute for hops in wormwood, aloes, gentian, bitter oranges, and other articles calculated to afford an artificial bitter to the liquor. These articles, which are only used medicinally by prudent persons, operate in a most destructive manner upon the membranes of the stomach, and ruin the digestive powers. The liquor, at this stage, is thin and poor, in consequence of the absence of malt sugar; and the brewer now uses treacle, liquorice, and decoction of flax-seed, to thicken it. The liquor is however light in colour, and requires to be made dark and almost black. Tobacco-juice or other poisonous colouring-matter is now introduced. It is thus thickened and tinged according to the wishes of the brewer: but it is still in an imperfect condition;—it must be made almost transparent. The object is effected by means of oil of vitriol—a deadly and quick poison. The liquor is now nearly prepared for barrelling; but the brewer still adds a few articles to complete the peculiarity of taste which the beverage must possess to suit the consumer. When poured into the barrel, it is dull and vapid; and headings, compounded of copperas and alum, must be employed to infuse into this infernal concoction the slightest sign of vitality. Such is the process adopted by every brewer, whether honest or otherwise; and habit has rendered the manufacturers of malt liquors and the writers of the Guides so accustomed to the process, that the infamy of the system ceases to be recognised or thought of. Familiarity with any particular plan or mode of procedure, will speedily lessen the admiration of the excellence or abhorrence of the turpitude attached to it; and thus is it that the brewers now adopt the scheme of adulteration as "a matter of course," without ever taking the trouble to examine the principles of that adulteration.

So much for the manufacture of beer! We fancy that we already hear our readers exclaiming that they will never drink another drop of such a diabolical compound, and expressing their regret that a drop of it should have ever passed their lips at all. And surely enough has been already done with the malt liquor in the brewery, without subjecting it to any farther inflictions. Stay—gentle reader: there is much more yet to explain; and the worst is probably yet untold! We have hitherto only described the adulteration effected by the brewers: we now come to the period when the malt liquor is delivered in the cellars of the publicans.

The brewer sells his beer to the publican at a price which would leave the latter no profit at all, and, on the contrary, entail upon him a considerable loss, were he to retail it in an honest manner,—that is, at the current prices, and without adulteration. The publican must however live—must support his family—must pay his rent—and must sustain all the rivalry of competition. It is also necessary, to suit the present order of things, that he should embellish his establishment in a most costly and expensive style, and conduct its domestic arrangements upon a scale of considerable liberality. To enable him to do all this, he must necessarily derive immense profits from the sale of his liquors. He is therefore imperatively urged to adopt some method to increase the quantity of his beer, and to change its quality by artificial means. If he would lose by retailing a butt of beer honestly,—and if he would only obtain a small profit by converting that butt into two,—he must devise a scheme to make it fulfil the duties of three. And he does so. In the first place he deluges the beer with a requisite quantity of coloured water; and the result is, that the compound is vapid and flat, and in a state of "disease," rendering it totally unfit to drink. Its pungency—its thickness—its taste must be restored; and artificial means must be employed to render it palatable, and to give it, as much as possible, the appearance it had when it first came from the brewers. The want of alcohol must be supplied—the want of sugar must be supplied—the want of bitterness must be supplied—the want of alum must be supplied: then, the muddiness must yield to transparency—the vapid condition must be remedied—an appearance of age must be given to it—it must be made astringent—and a froth must be raised. Here is a catalogue of remedies to be effected, and wants to be supplied; and yet all these aims are accomplished by the skilful adulterator. The same means adopted by the brewer, are had recourse to by the publican;—the same poisons are again called into use;—the same drugs are administered to the liquor with an unsparing hand. Oil of vitriol, henbane, Bohemian rosemary, alum, liquorice juice, coccus indicus, salt, salt of tartar, extract of poppies, black extract, and other diabolical concoctions, decoctions, or natural products are liberally dispensed in this second and more complete adulteration of the malt liquor. The coccus indicus is a substitute for the malt and hops, and arrests the progress of fermentation, which, if not thus checked, would run into the acetous and then into the putrefactive state. Coccus indicus is a berry; and so extraordinary is its intoxicating power, that in India it is used by fishermen and anglers, who cast it upon the water to intoxicate the finny inhabitants of the river, and render them an easy prey to those who seek them. The Bohemian Rosemary, to which we have ere now alluded, is a herb which, in the smallest quantity, will produce a delirious and maddening species of intoxication, calculated to overthrow the empire of reason for ever, and produce an excitement which would prove more fatal to the constitution than years of uninterrupted debauchery and intemperance. Black extract is the concentrated essence of the coccus indicus; the juice of tobacco is as fatal as the poison of a viper; the powerful narcotic and emaciating effects of opium and henbane are well known; copperas is also a poison; and yet all these are the principal ingredients used by both brewer and publican in the manufacture and adulteration of their malt liquors!

The profession of "beer-doctor" and "brewers' druggist" is practised, said Cobbett, as of only as that of "bug-man" and "rat-killer;" and when we consider that these individuals are employed by the whole fraternity of beer-manufacturers and beer-sellers, we are justified in entertaining a suspicion that numerous other and probably far more poisonous and deleterious drugs than those which we have enumerated, are used in the processes which require such agency. It is terrible to contemplate a picture, which, so far from being over-drawn, is not, probably, sufficiently highly coloured. Let our readers only exercise their common sense, and judge for themselves the amount of injury that must be sustained by the frames of those who partake of such detestable poisons.

It is customary to denominate that beer the best, which is the strongest. Now the strongest beer contains the greatest amount of poisons; and many publicans have been vile enough to superadd to the ingredients already detailed, that fiery liquid called "spirit of Maranta," in order to produce an extra "strong beer." It by no means follows, either, that the strongest beer contains the greatest quantity of nutriment:—no beer contains one hundredth part as much nutriment as vulgar error and deliberate misrepresentation have asserted; and, as the amount of spirit in the beer is totally unconnected with the quantity of nutriment, it is evident that those malt liquors, which are called "strong," are by no means the most nourishing. The amount of nutriment in any fluid is to be decided by the proportion of solid substance to which that fluid can be reduced, since it is only this solid substance which can supply the waste perpetually going on in the human frame, and minister to the cravings of nature. A gallon of beer is therefore only nutritious to the amount of the solid substance to which it can be reduced, or to which it is equivalent; and experience has proved, that there is more sustenance in a penny loaf than in a gallon of any malt liquor ever manufactured.

It is preposterous to imagine that beer may be drunk with comparative impunity, and that wine and ardent spirits should be rejected. Many advocates of the Moderation principle acknowledge the efficacy of abstinence from wine and spirits, but declaim against "depriving the poor man of his beer." Now, if we must drink something in the shape of intoxicating liquor, beer should be the very last which we ought to choose. When intoxicating liquor arrives in the stomach, the process of digestion separates the alcohol from the other fluids or compounds; and the alcohol of one intoxicating liquor is precisely the same as the alcohol in another. The spirit is the same—it is only the compounds or admixtures which were different. The alcohol, then, of beer effects the same injury and produces the same effects as the alcohol of wine or spirits; and in addition to its alcohol, beer possesses a dozen other poisonous and destructive qualities which we have previously described. It is therefore useless to suppose that because the alcohol of beer goes into the stomach shrouded and enveloped in so many other compounds, it is robbed of any portion of its pernicious effects: the moment that combination of ingredients, which is denominated beer, is subjected to the powerful influence of the gastric juices, the alcohol is separated; and that alcohol produces the same results as if it had been drunk in a pure, or raw state!

If an individual wish to take a wine-glass full of brandy, for instance, diluted with water, it matters not whether he drink that quantity of brandy in a tumbler full or only half-full of water: the shape or the guise in which he takes the spirit, does not alter the effects produced by that amount of spirit when it arrives in the stomach;—that amount is still the same, whether in a large or a small quantity of water; and that spirit is speedily separated from the water by the operation of the gastric juices. This explanation will convince our readers that no disguise—no admixture—no modification will succeed in combatting or diminishing the pernicious effects of alcohol. It is therefore ridiculous to delude one's self with the idea that there are ways and means of drinking alcoholic liquor without prejudice; and that a compromise may be beneficially effected by deluging the alcohol, or spirit, with water. The stomach knows no such compromise—recognises no such means of evasion: its laws are immutable—its operations ever the same;—its use is to separate the ingredients of compounds, and dispose of each in various parts of the human frame, according to the plan laid down by the Great First Cause; and thus is it, that the smallest drop of alcohol, however inhibited, will be seized upon by the gastric juice—drawn from its concealment, even though it be enveloped in the folds of a gallon of water—and placed in a separate and distinct division of the human frame, there to work out its destroying aims with as much success and facility as if it had been taken in a pure and unmixed state into the stomach!

Beer will not nourish a healthy man, because there is little or no nourishment in it; it will not quench the thirst of a thirsty man, because it will create fresh thirst in a very short time—and this is a peculiar characteristic of all alcoholic beverages, as common experience has shown and still shows beyond all possibility of contradiction; and beer will not sustain the strength of the invalid, because it is devoid of nutritious powers, is exciting, and thus accelerates the waste of the human frame, and is a poison which will undermine the constitutions of the most robust, much more the shattered health of the sickly. Beer is not useful to mothers suckling, because it creates an unnatural abundance of milk; and this milk is not only poor and thin, but is also impregnated with alcohol and with poisons, which are thus transfused into the system of the frail and delicate babe. Beer is not a necessary concomitant to our meals, because hunger is the best sauce, and thirst can be quenched by water: no one, moreover, thinks of taking beer with his breakfast, but contents himself with tea or coffee, and yet makes a hearty meal; and thus is it shown that beer is not necessary for dinner or supper.

Medical men have recommended malt liquors to their patients, in many cases, under the impression that they are nourishing and strengthening. Those medical men, who have given themselves the trouble to investigate the nature of malt liquors, or who have had that nature explained to them, have been shocked at the delusion under which they were labouring, and have immediately abandoned the system of recommending compounds which are calculated rather to cause or provoke a continuation of ill-health than to act as a remedy. It is only necessary to destroy the delusion, in order to promote abstinence from malt liquors. Our opponents may ask how it is possible that medical men could have so long clung to such an egregious error? We will reply, that medical men are fallible as well as other mortals, and that no system undergoes such important and frequent changes, as the course of medical practice. One single case will illustrate this fact. When Lady Montague introduced the plan of inoculation for the small-pox into England, all the medical men denounced it as something much worse than an absurdity:—they pronounced it a crime. In process of time opinions changed; and inoculation was almost universally adopted. The system, however, again changed. Vaccination was introduced; and now medical men again denounce inoculation as dangerous and impracticable as a general system. Within the last few years, a law has been enacted to forbid inoculation, and establish the system of vaccination;—and all this in consequence of the changes which took place in medical opinion! We therefore see that medical men are as liable to delusion and to erroneous notions as other individuals; and one of those delusions was the idea that malt liquors were useful or beneficial to the human frame. That delusion is now rapidly dissipating; and medical testimony turns in favour of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors.

ELLEN MAXWELL.

A TALE.

Ellen Maxwell had not seen either her parents or her brother since she was six years old; she had been left in England under the charge of her maternal aunts, who thought the shy, beautiful child was not likely to find much care and attention from her haughty parents, who lavished all the little feeling pride and fashion had left upon their heir. The eldest of these aunts was dead, and Sir Robert and Lady Maxwell having heard much from English arrivals of the beauty and grace of their half-forgotten child, wrote to beg she might come to them, accompanied by her protectress. With a heavy heart Lady Mowbray had consented to leave her country; but she was a widow; had no ties, save local ones to keep her there, and she dreaded to send her beautiful Ellen undefended to her heartless family. She accordingly determined to accept their formal invitation and accompany her niece. Her fate was awful; alarm had killed her before the ship blew up, but her body found its grave in the blue ocean.

Once before the Thunderer left the port, Ellen saw young Morton. Many and earnest had been the entreaties she had made to see her brave preserver, and after a long time her haughty father consented.

Morton came, accompanied by Captain Leslie. Ellen was alone when they were announced, and both thought as she advanced to meet them, that her exquisite beauty had never been equalled.

"I am so glad to see you," she said. "Captain Leslie, this is very kind of you," and she shook the veteran's hand. After some time she said, "I shall not be able to see you again before you sail: may I," and she turned to Morton, "venture to ask you to take charge of this packet of letters for me to be put into the post when you reach dear, dear happy England; they are to old friends, and I dare not—I mean I—" she stopped: Leslie looked at her; he knew enough by report of Sir Robert Maxwell's stern pride to guess that the gentle girl was wretched; and he was right. She dared not write openly to her childhood's friends; she had been forbidden to hold intercourse with them.

"Thank you for the trust: depend upon their being safely delivered, Miss Maxwell; and if you can think of any other thing I can do, pray, pray give me your commands."

"Thank you, thank you a thousand times; but I have nothing else to do, except this;" and she brought a parcel from an inner room: "it is a present to the crew of your noble vessel; it is the English flag! I have worked at it day and night to finish it, and now I beg you to present it to them with my gratitude and respect; tell them I have not forgotten their kindness and gentleness to me when I was ill, and a burthen on their provisions and accommodation; bid them remember Ellen Maxwell, and if ever money or her aid can serve them, let them command her utmost power. To you, Morton, I dare offer no reward: you saved my life in fearful peril, and no offering that I can tender can pay the debt:—I only ask one thing. When your ship sails, may these colours be flying over her stern; and let all know that your hand has placed them there."

They parted; and back to his ship in moody silence went Harry Morton. Two days after, as Lady Maxwell and Ellen, with a large party, were on the shore; they saw the Thunderer setting sail and getting under weigh. All hands were busy on board.

"What a splendid ship!" said one of the party. As he spoke, the vessel moved majestically from her moorings.

"Good heaven," cried another; "look at that man! what has he got?"

Ellen looked, and saw Harry Morton climbing up the mizen shrouds, with her flag in his hand; he fastened it to its place and waved his hat. The whole ship's crew and officers were on deck; and as he gave the signal, three distinct cheers came upon the air, and the name of Ellen Maxwell echoed in each.

"How is this, miss?" asked her ladyship; "how dare those low wretches presume to name you?"

"I gave them that flag, madam; and it is hoisted to-day for the first time; their parting cheer I did not expect, nor deserve; but I am very grateful to them for it. There is not a man on board that gallant vessel to whom I am not indebted; and most of all to him who has placed those colours in their proud elevation."

Ellen spoke firmly; and, enraged as Lady Maxwell was, she was too politic to produce a scene.

Sir Robert and Lady Maxwell had two idols which they devoutly worshipped—rank and wealth; and to the possessor of these advantages, though a man of brutal mind and displeasing person, they wished to sacrifice their child. Lord Marshcroft was five and forty, loose in principle, and excessively proud. He was the colonel of a cavalry regiment, and his harsh, relentless nature, found ample scope in torturing and oppressing the wretched natives. Such was the man poor Ellen was to wed, to the last she held out, but she had no friends near her, no support, and at last she consented, but not without a desperate hope that something might occur to save her.

Ellen had now been three years in India, and her affianced husband became more fervent than ever for their marriage; but more than ever the poor girl shrank from the union; for tales of his brutality were rife at Madras. At last the day was fixed. They were to be married at Lord Marshcroft's splendid bungalow, where Ellen, her parents and friends, arrived two days previous to the one appointed.

Ellen was frightened at the sullen looks and significant smiles of all around. That there was some project in agitation she was convinced; and that the household servants were concerned in the plot she was also certain. Even Sir Robert, stern and proud as he was, noticed it to his lordship.

"Oh!" he cried, "if they mean mischief, I'll hang up a few of them on hooks, for the musketos to play with!"

"Great God!" said poor Ellen, as she rushed from the room; "is this monster to be my husband? Oh, never, never!"

Shrieks and screams the next day proclaimed that his threat had been executed. Ellen hid her head in the cushions of the sofa, and tried, with convulsive efforts, to shut out the horrid cries. Still with demon force they pierced the down, and she heard them more piteously. At last she started up, and was rushing out of the room, when a slave entered with a letter just arrived by express from Madras. She had not half perused it when in rushed a poor aged woman and her daughter.

"Save us, save us!" they cried, as they threw themselves on their knees and clung wildly round her.

"I will, I will," said Ellen. "What is the matter? Do not fear."

"Oh, save us, save us!" they shrieked again, clinging closer to her as the doors opened, and two slave drivers entered.

"I will," said Ellen, advancing with dignity to the men. "What is your business here?"

"We want those two natives who have escaped; but, by Heaven, they shall smart for this;" and coming forward to seize them, they flourished their whips, while the poor wretches crouched on the ground.

"Back, ruffians!" exclaimed Ellen; "these are my apartments, these women have taken refuge here, and they are safe! touch them at your peril. If your master has authorised this presumption, tell him, from me, it will not be suffered: if he has not, you shall bitterly repent it; this brutality and intrusion shall be amply punished. No reply—but instantly quit the room."

Confused and alarmed, the men withdrew.

"Thank God!" exclaimed Ellen. "Now, my poor people, what can I do for you?" Long was the conference between them, and when it was over, Ellen wrote a long letter and sent it off by express to Madras—then leaving the women locked up in her room, she went to her father, who was with Lord Marshcroft.

"My lord," she said, "since I have been here I have been made wretched by the misery of all around me; my very apartments have not been sacred from your brutal followers. I have been maddened by the screams of agony, frightened by your own language, and in-sulted by your own ferocity. You have been twice refused by me, and only now accepted to free myself from cruel persecution. Hear me, my lord, if these tortured slaves are not instantly released, I will suffer death before my hand takes yours at God's altar. I have already taken means effectually to protect the wretched natives you so recklessly murder, by apprizing the English government of the savage rule you hold. I am a weak woman, my lord, but a firm one;" and, bowing with lofty dignity, she quitted the astonished pair.

The chapel was brilliantly lighted: the clergyman was there, and he waited for Lord Marshcroft and Ellen. At last they came. Ellen cast an almost frenzied look around as the ceremony went on, and once she murmured, "They will not come!" Just as Lord Marshcroft was about to place the ring on her finger, the slaves without the building gave a loud shout, and rushing in with gleaming knives fell upon the bridegroom.

"Oh, do not kill him, for mercy's sake—for my sake!" shrieked Ellen, as she threw herself in her pity before him,—and they fell back.

As she knelt there in her spotless bridal robes before that dark and ferocious man, she looked like a pleading angel.

"Hurrah, hurrah!" shouted a multitude of voices. Ellen's head turned giddily round. "Hurrah, hurrah!" and with these words, in rushed a body of English seamen, and Ellen saw but one. She rose and staggered, and faintly said, "Morton!"

"Miss Maxwell—Ellen!—my Ellen!"—and she fell into his arms.

Sir Robert came angrily forward, and aimed a blow at Harry Morton. Ellen caught it.

"Shame, shame," my father; "would you strike your daughter's preserver?"

"Base-born wretch!" he exclaimed.

"Father—no, Sir Robert Maxwell, hear me! When a child you left me to the care of others, neglected and forgotten. After long, long years of absence, during which you never even wrote to know whether I were alive or dead, you called me home. I came—you forbade all intercourse with those who loved and cherished your deserted child; and, against my will—my prayers, you tried to force me to a marriage with a ruffian. Only that my life is stubborn, you had long since deprived me of it by misery. You have neither loved, nor reared, nor protected me. What duty do I owe you? None. I am free—I am of age—thus I use my liberty. Morton then, there is my hand—we have loved each other long. I am not portionless—I shall be no burthen to you—for I have ample means."

"Hold, or my curse—" "Give it—it will not injure me," returned Ellen, calmly.

"Vile girl!" ejaculated Sir Robert.

"Proudly I confess, I am no child of yours! I learned yesterday, for the first time, that I am an orphan. Your child has long been dead, and I am the only child of Lady Mowbray's deceased husband. Ah! dear, dear aunt, I little knew she was my mother-in-law. Sir Robert Maxwell, your rule over me is past. If you doubt my assertion, I have papers that will amply satisfy you that I am the heiress of a prouder house and fortune than yours."

"And will you bestow this peerless hand on me? Dearest Ellen, I am far beneath you, although now the captain of the ship in which I was but lately a common sailor."

"But a brave one." "Our ship sails to-morrow, dearest Ellen. Shall she bear you back to England?"

Ellen glanced round, and placed her hand in that of Harry Morton. He pressed it passionately to his lips, and led her up to the altar; then while his comrades circled round them, she knelt, and in a few minutes rose the bride of the sea-captain.

MERRY ENGLAND!

"MERRY England!" Such is the denomination given to this country by old poets; and even modern writers frequently adopt the phrase. But—heavens! what a mockery is it! Can England be merry while the most hideous poverty is the lot of half her population; while her workhouses are crowded with miserable beings, who must for ever resign all hope or idea of again enjoying the comforts of "home;" while the streets are filled with loathsome wretches, clad in filthy rags, which nevertheless barely cover them—shivering with the cold, or fainting beneath the intolerable heat—and spurned from the doors not only of the rich, but also of the very officers appointed to relieve distress; while the poor mother, maddened with the idea of her own destitution and houseless condition, presses her famishing child to her breast, which yields no milk, and then rushes in desperation to consign the innocent being to the waters of the nearest stream; while the wretched father stifles his children that he may hush for ever in their throats the cry of "Bread! Bread! Bread!"—that vain and useless cry, to which he cannot respond; while hundreds of thousands know not when they rise in the morning, how they shall obtain food throughout the day; while young children, innocent babes, and prattling infants bear upon their countenances and exhibit in their attenuated frames all the traces of the dread and agonizing pangs of a constant gnawing—craving—never satisfied hunger; and while hundreds are literally dying around us of starvation and absolute want.

"Merry England!" Who re-echoes the cry. Not the individual who surveys the dread effects of crime in this guilty and blood-stained land; not the unhappy youth who is dragged from family, kindred, parents, and home, and sent to the distant colonies, there to toil in chains for the remainder of his existence, or during the brightest and best portion of that little span; not the shoeless urchin who, never having had aught save an evil example in his parents before him, was taught to steal from the moment of his birth, and who is now serving a portion of his criminal apprenticeship at the tread-mill; not the fashionable gentleman, upon his trial on a charge of forgery; not the tradesman whose long-honoured name must at length figure in the Gazette; not the clerk, detected in plundering the employer who placed illimitable confidence in him; and not the wretched malefactor who lies in the condemned cell, while the din of the hammers preparing his scaffold are ringing in his ears, and while the gory spectre of a murdered victim stands by his side, and reminds him of the eternal tortures of which his earthly pangs are but a foretaste!

"Merry England!" What a hideous blasphemy is it to exalt the voice in such a strain, so long as the howlings of the maniacs echo through the vast asylums of the insane; so long as the brightest ornament which God has bestowed upon man—intellect—is disfigured and misused; so long as the groanings, the imprecations, the anathemas, the curses, and the ravings of the mad disturb the silence of the night, and mingle with the hum of the busy day; so long as the symmetry of the human form is distorted in horrible writhings and convulsions; and so long as the human eye glares fearfully with maniac and unearthly expression!

"Merry England!" Oh! it must be in derision that this phrase is circulated from lip to lip, or that it remains upon the written page! Why—it is drowned in sighs as it issues from the mouth, and is moistened with tears as the ink traces it upon the paper! Its falsehood is proclaimed by the funeral processions of those who are hurried to premature graves; by the horrible diseases that carry multitudes to the hospital and the charitable asylums for the invalid; by the emaciated frames of men, women, and children; by the leaden eyes—the tottering steps—the shaking limbs—the haggard countenances—the feverish brows—the parched lips—the dry and furred tongue—the hot and pestilential breath—and the tremulous voice of myriads of human beings; by the apoplexy—the palsy—the delirium tremens—the enlarged liver—the ossified heart—the impaired digestion—the yellow jaundice—the cancerous stomach—and the dropsy; by the broken limbs—the fearful accidents—and the gushing wounds; and by the hereditary maladies, which are handed down from father to son.

"Merry England!" What! is England joyous, then, when the shops of the pawnbrokers thrive royally upon the immense interest wrung from the very vitals of the poor; when the gaols, the hospitals, and workhouses are more numerous than the churches; when the hulks are swarming with convicts pent up in frightful floating dungeons, amidst a fœtid atmosphere; when the streets throng with unfortunate girls, who ask to be redeemed from an appalling traffic, but who see no avenue of escape from their loathsome calling; when the voice of starvation, the voice of crime, the voice of madness, and the voice of disease, echo up to Heaven, and form a chorus such as could scarcely be expected to meet the ears beyond the precincts of hell; when strife, agitation, danger, violence, and alarm prevail; and when the tears of the fatherless, the widow, and the outcast, moisten the earth!

"Merry England!" Oh! no—no—the phrase is a mockery—a derision—a blasphemy—an absurdity—a delusion! While all the dread scourges are now enumerated afflict the land, it is the conduct of a madman or of a wicked one to say that the country is happy. Is it not making himself "merry" at a prostrate nation's expense, to apply the epithet to her? Rather let us say "wretched—oppressed—enslaved—miserable—degraded—demoralized—criminal—blood-stained—hapless England!"

But what is the cause of those dread and awe-inspiring results? what is it that has rendered a joyous epithet an absurdity—a crime, when applied to England? The answer is ready! STRONG DRINK! It is strong drink that has filled those gaols—those hulks—those asylums for the wretched, the diseased, and the insane, of which we have spoken. It is strong drink that has called forth sighs and tears—shortened existence—perpetuated family diseases—and fostered maladies of all species and kinds. It is strong drink that has placed the criminal in the condemned cell, and reduced the hapless girl to barter her charms for bread. It is strong drink that has robbed the church of its votaries, and prepared them for present misery and eternal torment. It is strong drink, in a word, which has strewed the land with old rags and bleaching bones!

And yet the poets and the novelists write of "Merry England!" Oh! it is merry—it is merry, indeed, to witness the malefactor expiring upon the gibbet—to catch the dying cry of the wretch who expires through want—to behold the loveliest of England's daughters degraded to the dust—to see nothing but misery, misery, misery, around, above, and below! If these be joyous scenes, then, of a surety, is England merry indeed; if man can dance to the music of that dying cry, he may dance long and heartily—for the wail never ceases, being constantly taken up by a new victim; if poverty excite felicitous sensations within him, heaven knows he need never be sad; if crime bring smiles to his lips, his countenance need never wear a melancholy aspect; and if he can slake his thirst in the heart-wrung tears of human agony, he need never step out of his way to look for a fountain or a spring. In this light, England is indeed merry; for the observer of human nature, as he walks through the crowded streets, is jostled and hemmed in by all the gaunt and hideous forms that bear the denominations and wear the characteristics of Crime—Poverty—Disease—Madness—and Sorrow!

"Merry England!" These words may alone be inscribed upon the banners of Teetotalism, and can alone be uttered when the task of the Teetotalers is completed. Even to the happiness of the Teetotalers is the misery of their fellow-countrymen a drawback. But the time shall come—and that time is not now far distant—when the aspect of the country shall be changed, when the countenances of Albion's sons shall wear a smiling expression, and when, through the philanthropic and generous agency of Teetotalism, it will not be either absurd or improper to speak of this regenerated nation by the name of "Merry England!"

REVIEWS.

The Grammar of the English Language truly made Easy and Amusing by the Invention of Three Hundred Moveable Parts of Speech. By GEORGE MURIE. London: J. Cleave.

THE work before us develops an entirely novel and delightful mode of teaching grammar. It is adapted for the use of schools or private families, and of adults whose knowledge of grammar may be defective: these may speedily become self-instructed, with the aid of this admirable work, which is alike creditable to author and publisher. We may moreover observe that the author was formerly Editor of the Sun newspaper, and therefore presents additional guarantees for his competency to undertake the task of instruction, besides the reputation he has acquired by his "Illuminated Temple of Letters." Mr. Cleave, the publisher, whose aims are universally devoted to forward the happiness and prosperity of his fellow-countrymen, has brought out this work in a liberal manner, and therefore may expect a large sale. In the Preface to the "Grammar," the author says:—

"In developing my method, I have aimed, in the first place, at enabling my pupils to acquire, by the shortest road possible, a clear, intelligible, and distinct perception of the nature and uses of the different parts of speech. * * In smoothing and making plain the course for my youthful followers, I have aimed at leaving not a single cart-load of the rubbish which I found upon the ground. In carrying out my purpose, I not only employ the plainest and most familiar language (discarding all thought of displaying my own knowledge of technicalities and subtleties which are unintelligible to the pupils, and the very mention of which, therefore, could have no tendency but that of filling them with discouragement and dismay); but I avail myself of the use of Sensible Signs and Representations, and of moveable pieces of the Parts of Speech and even of Colours, in order to facilitate or rather to form the illustrations."

It is here necessary to observe, that joined with the volume itself, is a box, or recess, containing a number of small cards, with the "sensible signs and representations" printed upon them. This compartment is so fixed in the volume itself, that, when closed with the clasps, the existence of such a recess is not perceived. The whole is very neatly arranged. By means of these cards, the author, "instead of abstract rules respecting the words and the laws by which the words are governed, shows his Pupils the Parts of Speech themselves, and the grammatical laws actually working upon and amongst the parts of speech, sensibly moving, and changing, and controlling the latter, in the most simple and intelligible manner, before the eyes of the delighted, the attentive, and the rapidly improving learners, who thus rapidly obtain the very substance of the grammatical knowledge with which it is sought to imbue them." The system is really excessively ingenious, and will doubtless be almost universally adopted in primary schools, as soon as the existence of the work which teaches it shall be duly made known. The invention is calculated to upset the ancient and laborious method of teaching, and to substitute a new, simple, easy, and amusing plan in its place. The great success of the scheme will be realized by the circumstance of the author having combined amusement with instruction:—the method is itself as diverting as a puzzle or a moveable map; and thus the great art of enlisting the interest of the pupil in the object of his study, is here fully worked out. We will endeavour to explain the mode of procedure. The master places before him cards expressing the words An Apple; a little farther off he places other cards expressing A Pear. He then tells his pupils that he will join those phrases—or rather the apple and the pear together. A card, with the word And upon it, is now placed between those phrases; and the use of the conjunction is thus practically explained,—it being “a grammatical joint or hinge used for joining or connecting different sentences or parts of sentences.” All this explanation is given and worked out in an easy and familiar style, which puts to shame the old grammars that are so over-laden with technicalities which the masters themselves do not always comprehend.

Mr. Mudie has devoted particular attention to grammar, and has considered the subject in all its lights and bearings. He places upon record the following observations, which, as he remarks, will startle many, but the truth of which we immediately recognised:—

“All the words in a Dictionary are in reality Nouns while they remain in the Dictionary. It is only when they come to be employed in the structure of sentences, that, by what we may call a sort of grammatical alchemy or transmutation, they become imbued with and acquire one or other of the different properties and powers of the various parts of speech. Even then they never lose their essential character and quality of Nouns, as becomes evident at the moment that they are separately named and considered, or that they are employed as nouns in the construction of a sentence.”

This fact simplifies the teaching of language, inasmuch, as the author observes, “the science of Grammar is thus ascertained to regard a single element, subject to only a small number of modifications.” The theory thus advanced is worthy the attention of all grammarians.

We are aware that The Teetotaler enjoys a considerable circulation among schoolmasters and others who are connected with the education of youth. This patronage it has acquired in consequence of the vast amount of useful information its columns always contain, the pure morality its pages inculcate, and its attention to subjects and books relating to domestic and national education. We therefore feel that we should be particularly cautious how we recommend to this portion of our patrons any work connected with the all-important subject of education—especially elementary instruction: but so convinced are we of the excellence of the volume now before us, that we do not hesitate to advise all tutors, school-masters, and parents to avail themselves of so unexceptionable and so successful a means of familiarising children with the rudiments of grammar—that is, of language. A clown in a few weeks may be taught to speak correctly by the aid of Mr. Mudie's Grammar, and to comprehend the precise meaning and utility of the words which he uses.

Those fathers of families, who have succeeded in weaning themselves away from the use of alcoholic liquors, and who have embraced the salutary doctrine of Teetotalism, will now begin to think of bestowing upon their children that education which probably they themselves received not at their outset in life. Education is the fertile parent of many virtues, as ignorance is the origin of many crimes. Education is moreover essentially connected with human happiness; and the only way of glorifying God through his works, is to learn how to comprehend them. But in early youth, much valuable time has hitherto been lost in poring over the mystifications of Grammars long in use; and truly indebted should society consider itself to him who simplifies those first steps to education. It is with these impressions in our mind, that we can conscientiously recommend the work which Mr. Mudie has now issued to the public.

ORIENTAL FRAGMENTS. No. VII.

[BY JAMES SILK BUCKINGHAM.]

To resume the journal of our route. After having travelled all the morning in the bed of the ancient canal, but without being able to discover a vestige of anything like masonry, or indication of the sluices by which its waters were said to have been regulated, we had lost at noon, all traces of its course, though we continued our direction still northerly, inclining two or three points to the west, until we gained the site of the Bitter Lakes, as they were called by the ancients, and named the Salt Marshes, in more modern maps. We traversed in every direction, the desert, for a diameter of ten miles, having fleet trotting dromedaries beneath us, without finding the least portion of water, although it had evidently been the receptacle of an extensive lake, and has its bed at this moment below the level of the sea at Suez. The soil here differs from all around it. On leaving the last traces of the canal, we had entered upon a loose shifting sand; here we found a firm clay mixed with gravel, and though perfectly dry, its surface was incrustated over with a strong salt.

On leaving the site of these now evaporated lakes, we entered upon a loose and shifting sand again, like that which Pliny describes when speaking of the roads from Pelusium across the sands of the desert, in which he says, unless there be reeds stuck in the ground, to point out the line of direction, the way could not be found, because the wind blows up the sand and covers the footsteps.

The morning was delightful, on our setting out, and promised us a fine day; but the light air from the south had increased to a gale. The sun became obscure; and getting every hour into a looser sand, it flew around us in such whirlwinds, with the sudden gusts that blew, that it was impossible to proceed. We halted, therefore, for an hour, and sheltered ourselves under the lee of our camels, who were themselves so terrified as to need fastening by the knees, and uttered, in their moanings, but a melancholy symphony.

I know not whether it was the novelty of the situation that gave it additional horror, or whether the habit of magnifying evils to which we are unaccustomed had increased its effects; but certain it is, that fifty gales of wind at sea appeared to me more easy to be encountered than one among those sands. It is impossible to imagine desolation more complete. We could see neither earth, nor sun, nor sky. The plain at ten paces distant was absolutely imperceptible: our animals, as well as ourselves, were so covered with the sand as to render breathing difficult. They hid their faces in the ground, and we could only uncover our own for a moment, to behold this chaos of mid-day darkness, and wait impatiently for its abatement. Alexander's journey to the Temple of Jupiter Ammon, and the destruction of the Persian armies of Cambyses in the Lybiau Desert, rose to my recollection, with new impressions made by the horror of the scene before me; while Addison's admirable lines, which I also remembered with peculiar force on this occasion, seemed to possess as much truth as beauty:

“So where our wide Numidian wastes extend,
Sudden the impetuous hurricanes descend;
Wheel through the air, in circling eddies play,
Tear up the sands, and sweep whole plains away:
The helpless traveller, with wild surprise,
Sees the dry desert all around him rise,
And smothered in the dusty whirlwind dies.”

The few hours we remained in this situation were passed in unbroken silence. Every one was occupied in his own reflections, as if the reign of terror forbade communication.

The fury of the desert gale spent itself, like the storms of ocean, in sudden lulls and squalls; but it was not until the third or fourth interval, that our fears were sufficiently conquered to address each other; nor shall I soon lose the recollection of the impressive manner in which that was done. “Allah kereem!” “God is merciful!” exclaimed the poor Bedouin, although habit had familiarized him with these resistless blasts. “Allah kereem!” repeated the Egyptians, with terrified solemnity; and both my servant and myself, as if by instinct, joined in the general exclamation. The bold imagery of the eastern poets, describing the Deity as avenging in his anger, and terrible in his wrath, riding upon the wings of the whirlwind, and breathing his fury in the storm, must have been inspired by scenes like these.

It was now past sun-set, and neither of us had yet broken our fast for the day. Even the consoling pipe could not be lighted in the hurricane, and it was in vain to think of remaining in our present station, while the hope of finding some bush for shelter remained. We remounted our camels, therefore, and departed. The young moon afforded us only a faint light, and all traces of the common road were completely obliterated. The stars were not even visible through so disturbed an atmosphere, and my compass was our only guide. The Arabs knew a spot, near Sheick Amedid, where banks and trees were to be found; and confiding in my direction for the course thither, we resumed our journey.

After a silent ride of five tedious hours, this garden of repose appeared in sight; and, bleak and barren as it was, in truth, fatigue and apprehension gave it the charms of Eden. Here we alighted, fed our weary animals, and like sailors escaped from shipwreck, rejoiced in that delightful consciousness of security, which is known only in the safety that succeeds danger.

REPORT OF TEETOTAL NEWS, PROGRESS, AND MEETINGS.

COUNTRY NEWS.

IRELAND.

THE REV. MR. MATHEW has addressed a letter to a gentleman in the county of Galway, expressing his deep regret that “the illustrious Archbishop of Tuam, who is so anxious to promote the prosperity of his country, should suffer himself to be prejudiced against the Total Abstinence Society.” It appears that during the late Temperance tour, the Archbishop forbade the administration of the pledge in the archdiocese of Tuam. The Archbishop is urged by most unworthy motives thus to interfere with the patriot who has regenerated his country, his Grace being desirous of establishing a Temperance system of his own and driving a handsome trade by the sale of medals, &c. FATH R MATHEW had moreover very properly refused to subscribe to the monastic schools set up by Dr. M'HALE in opposition to those established by the National Board of Education.

SCOTLAND.

THE Scottish Temperance Herald, an excellent provincial periodical, contains the following information:—

“MR. JOHN A. COLLINS, the talented anti-slavery delegate from America, has been residing in the neighbourhood of Glasgow for the last few weeks, during which time he has delivered several most eloquent and heart-stirring addresses on total abstinence in Glasgow, which could not fail of doing good. MR. WM. CRUTCHSHANK, late of Dundee, and who, ten years ago, was so popular while an advocate of the old temperance (moderation) society, has been labouring for the last six or seven weeks as an agent of the Western Scottish Temperance Union, in Glasgow and the surrounding country. The first soiree of the Glasgow Highland Total Abstinence Society was held in Spruell's Court Chapel, on the evening of Monday, 22nd March, MR. DONALD MACINTYRE in the chair. After tea a portion of that delightful sacred song, the 23rd Psalm, was sung in Gaelic by the whole company standing. Several excellent addresses, both in Gaelic and English, illustrative of the evils of intemperance, were delivered in the course of the evening, and at intervals an abundant supply of fruits, &c. were handed round by the active stewards. After prayer, the large assembly broke up about 12 o'clock, all seemingly well pleased with the entertainment of the evening. Our friends in Aberdeen are prosecuting the work with much zeal, and considerable success. They appear to be well-supported by several influential men. At Castle Douglas the chieftain of teetotalism, which, we are disposed to conceive, is, under Heaven's sanction, destined to be of essential service in crushing to inanition, in its magnificent career, the demon of intemperance, is rolling modestly, steadily, yet with beautiful rapidity, towards the goal of our wishes.” The Teetotal Society of Castle Douglas now consists of eight hundred staunch members. At Maxwellton-of-Kilbride a publican offered to give up his license upon receiving a sum of money from the Teetotal Society of that place.

LEICESTER.

Our esteemed friend, the Temperance Messenger, reports favourably of the South Midland Association. Two hundred and fifty persons have signed the pledge at Leicester during the past three months; and amongst these are many respectable tradesmen. The Leicester meetings are held on Monday and Saturday evenings. On Saturday evening, select pieces upon philosophy, history, chemistry, &c. are read, and questions proposed and answered, and practical experiments made in chemistry, &c., interspersed with singing and music.

NOTTINGHAM.

THE Temperance Messenger for April informs us that a splendid Festival was to take place at Nottingham at Easter, and a Bazaar was to be opened in aid of the funds of the Society.

HUDDERSFIELD.

THE Annual Conference of the British Association is to be held at Huddersfield, in July, when a Bazaar will be opened.

LOURBOROUGH.

THE Temperance Messenger for April contains the following paragraph:—

“The cause at this important town is on the advance. Our friends are active and persevering; and their numbers increase. There are three societies in the town:—the one established on general principles, the Catholic, and the Chartist. The Independent Minister is a teetotaler of long standing, and has recently come out to the aid of our friends.”

BARNSELY.

On Tuesday evening, April 6th, the meeting at this place was addressed by two commercial travellers, one of whom stated that there were now about thirty Teetotal travellers “on the road” within his own knowledge. MR. LISTER gave a phrenological lecture towards the close of the business of the evening.

SHREWSBURY.

IN our last Report under this head, several grievous errors crept into our statements, which we will now correct. MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERS EDWARDS is the Secretary to the Hopton Teetotal Society; and Ratt Bridge should have been printed Platt Bridge. We are happy to state that Teetotalism still makes its way successfully at Shrewsbury.

BURY (LANCASHIRE.)

SEVERAL popular advocates have lately visited this place,—such as MR. LIVESLEY (of Preston), MR. ROSS (of Manchester), MR. BIRCH, the REV. W. ROAF (of Wigan), &c. We regret to state that the richer classes do not demonstrate any favour towards the cause at Bury; but they will speedily be compelled to yield to the moral agitation which must eventually crown the principle of Teetotalism with success. There are a thousand staunch members at Bury. We hope to hear more frequently from our Bury correspondent.

ALRESFORD.

MR. J. S. CUNZNER has lately delivered a lecture at Northampton, in Hampshire. He writes from Alresford to state that the cause is progressing well in that town and its vicinity, and that the subject of pledges alone impedes the more rapid career of Teetotalism towards the goal of perfect success. Mr. CUZNER'S lectures are illustrated by diagrams, &c.

WINDSOR.

On Thursday evening there was a grand meeting of the Teetotalers of Windsor at the Town Hall. Nearly four hundred guests sat down to an excellent Tea, Mr. WALKDEN, of Pinner Park, in the chair. Numerous addresses were delivered by London advocates, in the evening.

TOWN NEWS.

NORTH LONDON AUXILIARY TO THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN SOCIETY FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF INTEMPERANCE.

The great annual Tea Meeting of this Auxiliary took place on Good Friday at White Conduit House, Mr. J. S. BUCKINGHAM in the chair. Eight hundred persons sat down to an excellent repast, after which the meeting was most effectually addressed by the Chairman and by MESSIEURS SPENCH (of Southampton), MAC-CURDY, &c., DR. TOWNSEND (of Ohio), the REV. DR. ANDREWS, the REV. C. STOVEL, DR. ONLEY, &c. MR. GREEN read the Annual Report, from which it appears that this powerful Auxiliary consists of three thousand members.

NORTH LONDON AUXILIARY TO THE NEW BRITISH AND FOREIGN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

A TEA-FESTIVAL and Concert were held by this Society at the Milton Institution on Good Friday. The Festival was well attended; and the Concert attracted a large audience afterwards.

FITZROY AND NORTH WEST LONDON AUXILIARY TO THE NEW BRITISH AND FOREIGN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

A FESTIVAL and meeting were held by this Auxiliary on Good Friday, at Lawson's Assembly Rooms, Gower-street, New Road. Two hundred and thirty persons sat down to Tea. The meeting was most ably addressed by MESSIEURS MILLER, CURRIE (of Chelsea), R. HICKS (the surgeon), REV. J. H. HINTON, MRS. GROSJEAN, KNIGHTON, DAVIS, DRAPER, MANN, WILD, and CONWAY.

WORKING MAN'S TEETOTAL SOCIETY.

At a meeting of the Committee of this admirable Society, April 12th, Mr. HOPKINSON in the chair, it was moved by Mr. THOMPSON, seconded by Mr. BATEUX, and carried unanimously, that "the most sincere thanks of the Society are due and be hereby given to the Editor of The Teetotaler for his kindness in frequently inserting notices of the Society's progress in his columns, and for the great interest he invariably exhibits in its welfare." Resolved also, that "a copy of the foregoing resolution be forwarded to the Editor of The Teetotaler, signed by the Secretary, in the name of the Committee." These Resolutions were signed by Mr. R. P. BATGER, and duly forwarded to Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, who takes this opportunity of acknowledging his gratitude to the Working Man's Teetotal Society for the honour it has done him, and of assuring its members that the columns of The Teetotaler are always open to the Reports of the progress of so excellent and influential an Association.

CLERKENWELL AND PENTONVILLE YOUTHS' TEETOTAL SOCIETY.

MR. W. SARVENT, Director and Lecturer of the Teetotal Instructive Institute, will deliver a lecture on Thursday evening, April 22nd, at Eagle Court Chapel, St. John's Lane, West Smithfield, on Natural History, for the benefit of the Clerkenwell Youth's Society. On Thursday, April 29th, a member's meeting of this Society will take place at the same Chapel.

CHELSEA AUXILIARY TO THE NATIONAL UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION

On Tuesday, April 6th, an excellent meeting was held by this Auxiliary at its Hall, 56, George-street, Chelsea, Mr. FARNILO in the chair. This gentleman was followed, in able addresses, by MESSIEURS DOWLING, HUNT, ROGERS, &c. On Good Friday, the Chelsea Auxiliary had a grand Breakfast, which was well attended.

EAST LONDON AUXILIARY TO THE B. AND F. SOCIETY FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF INTEMPERANCE.

The Second Anniversary Festival and Tea-Meeting of this Auxiliary took place at the Mariners' Church, Well-Close Square, on Easter Monday. MR. DUNN presided; MR. CURRIE (of Chelsea) and several other popular advocates addressed the meeting.

NATIONAL UNITED TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

IMPRESSED with the necessity of forming a Grand National Union of the Teetotalers, the Executive Committee of the United Temperance Association has prefixed the proper and expressive epithet, connected with this view, to the name of the Society. It is to be hoped that country Associations will respond to this first step towards a National Union, and that those Committees, that approve of the design, will communicate their ideas upon the subject to the Secretary, Mr. POCKNELL, Corsitor-street, Chancery Lane. Those Teetotalers in London, who have courage and spirit enough to think and act for themselves, are sincerely requested to enrol themselves beneath the banners of the National United Temperance Association. All pledges are allowed by this Society, so long as the principle be that of entire abstinence from all intoxicating liquors; and the most influential of those individuals, who may come forward to aid in the design of establishing a National Union, will be proposed members of the Executive Committee. We may again observe that the Milton-street Institution, the largest and most important place of meeting in the metropolis, is thrown open every Monday evening by the National United Temperance Association, for public advocacy of the principles of Teetotalism, admission free. This place of assembly is beautifully fitted up: the chair is elevated to a considerable height upon the platform; and the speakers ascend a tribune or pulpit, in front of the platform. The house forms a complete semicircle, and is disposed in pit, boxes, and gallery, like a theatre. Advocates from the country, visiting London, will be welcomed upon the platform of this Institution.

The Grand Annual Tea-Festival of this Association took place at the Milton Institution, on Monday evening last. The pit of the Institution was fitted up for the purpose; and at half-past five o'clock a numerous and most respectable company sat down to an excellent repast, supplied by the United Temperance Coffee-house in the same street. MR. EMERSON (the Treasurer), MR. POCKNELL (the Secretary), and MR. CRUMP (the Registrar), superintended the arrangements of the Festival; and great credit is due to these gentlemen for the manner in which those arrangements were conducted.

After the Festival, the doors were thrown open, and a public meeting was held. In the absence of Mr. G. W. M. REYNOLDS, MR. CRUMP took the chair, and explained the objects of the National United Temperance Association in a manner which carried conviction to all of the necessity of Union amongst the Teetotalers.

MR. JOHNSON said that no principle, which had ever yet been disseminated, had done so much good as Teetotalism. It was the duty of all to live not for themselves only, but for each other, and to leave the world better than they found it.

MR. SMITH (of Stratford) recommended the perusal of the Temperance publications to those who were not as yet acquainted with the nature and benefits of the principle.

MR. MINGAY SYDER said that the efficacy of total abstinence was no longer a matter of doubt or theory, as experience had tested the doctrine in all conditions and all climes, and found that alcoholic liquors were both injurious and unnecessary. Mr. Syder said that he had been requested by many Teetotal Societies to join them; but he now preferred publicly connecting himself with the National United Temperance Association, whose pledge-books he should sign that evening. He then expatiated upon the necessity of Union.

MR. BARRAGE said that the advocates of this Society were remunerated for their services in the cause by the beneficial effects which they succeeded in producing amongst their fellow-countrymen.

MR. GINNS (the Editor of the Aylesbury News) stated that he was a Teetotaler for two reasons—firstly, to benefit himself; and, secondly, to give the aid of his example to the progress of so good a cause.

On Monday evening, April 19th, the MEMBERS' MEETING of the National United Temperance Association will take place at the Milton Institution, at seven o'clock precisely, for the purpose of renewing cards, &c. It is particularly requested that all members will attend. The public meeting will commence at eight precisely, as usual.

FABLES.

THE DROP OF WATER, THE BROOK, THE RIVER, AND THE OCEAN.—A drop of water, that sparkled like a jewel in the sun, once fell from the clouds, into a little mountain-stream, and, ere it lost its identity, exclaimed, in all the anguish of dissolution, "Alas! what a catastrophe—I am swallowed up in immensity." The little stream laughed, as it leaped down the mountain side, at the lamentation of such an insignificant thing as a drop of water, and, vain of its consequence, continued brawling its crystal way, in all the pride of conscious superiority, until, at length, with a sudden plunge, it fell headlong into a mighty river, and, like the drop of water, was lost in a moment, crying out, in its last agonies, "Oh, fate! who would have thought a brook of my size could be swallowed so easily?" The river murmured its contempt for the little foolish stream, and continued its course, gathering strength and pride, breaking through mountains, tearing the rocks from their seats, and coursing, in a thousand graceful meanders, through flowery meadows, until it found its way to the vast and melancholy ocean, in whose boundless waste it lost its being, like the drop of water, and the little mountain-stream. "Is it possible?" exclaimed the mighty river, "that I have been thus collecting tribute from half a world, only to become nothing at last?"

'Tis thus with thee, oh man! Thou beginnest in insignificance, like the drop of water; thou becomest a laughing, leaping, brawling thing, like the brook; thou waxest proud and great, like the mighty river; and ere thou canst say, in the vanity of thy heart, "What an illustrious mortal am I," thou art lost in eternity.

THE MOLE-HILL AND THE MOUNTAIN.—A towering mountain reared its head to the skies, on one side of a wide and deep valley; on the other a little mole-hill lay basking in the sun. As it contemplated the distant mountain, shooting its snow-capped brow into the regions of boundless space, far above the clouds, and beheld the gilded glories of its distant summit, the mole-hill became discontented and unhappy. It contrasted its own insignificance with the awful and majestic outlines of its mighty neighbour; it wished a thousand times it could raise its head above the clouds; it sighed at the thought that it could never become a mountain, and impeached the justice of the gods, for having made it only a mole-hill, to be trodden upon by man, and crawled over by the most contemptible insects. In short, it pined itself into wretchedness, and sacrificed all the comforts of its own littleness to the desire of becoming great.

As it one day lay gazing upward at the distant object of its envy, a storm suddenly gathered around the summit of the mountain; the lightnings leaped with forked tongues, the thunder rolled, the tempest lashed its lofty sides, and the torrents poured down, tearing their way, and ploughing deep ravines in their course, while all beneath remained perfectly quiet, and the little mole-hill lay basking in the sunbeams of a summer morning. Scarcely had the storm passed away, when the earth began to rock and tremble, as with an ague; a rumbling and appalling noise raged in the bowels of the mountain, which suddenly burst, throwing volumes of smoke, and showers of fire into the peaceful skies, that turned from blue to glowing red. Rivers of burning lava gushed out from its sides, coursing their way towards the valley, and scathing the verdure and the woods into black smoking ruins. In a few hours the majestic mountain seemed as it were disembowelled, and, having nothing to sustain it, fell in, with a crash that shook the surrounding world, and hid the ambient skies in a chaos of dust and ashes. The mole-hill had all this time remained quiet and safe in its lowly retreat, and when the obscurity had become dissipated, and it beheld the great object of its envy crumbled into a mass of smoking ruins, it became all of a sudden the happiest of mole-hills. "Body o' me!" it cried, "but it is a great blessing to be little. Oh, terra! I thank thee that thou didst not make me a mountain!"

THE REVENGE OF THE BEASTS.—One day a number of animals that had been highly aggrieved by the tyranny and injustice of man, resolved to petition Jupiter for satisfaction. "Oh, Jupiter!" exclaimed the camel, "revenge me on this indolent tyrant, who, instead of carrying his own burthens, claps them on my back, and drives me into the desert, where I travel whole days without a drop of water." "Oh, Jupiter!" cried a great fat green turtle, "revenge me on this glutton, who kidnaps me while I am sleeping in the sun—starves me for weeks on board of a ship, and eats me afterward, though he gives me nothing to eat." "Oh, Jupiter!" squeaked the pig, "he stuffs me first, and then stuffs himself with me afterward;" and, "Oh, Jupiter!" brayed the ass, "he loads me with panniers of liquor and delicious fruits, and gives me nothing but water and thistles; I beseech thee to revenge us!" "Behold," answered Jupiter, "thou art revenged already! Dost thou see that turbaned wretch yonder, chewing opium, and dozing away a miserable existence? And dost thou see yonder christian, in his nightgown and slippers, taking doses of physic and making wry faces! And dost thou see that wretch, reeling along, with his blood-red face and carbuncled nose? The one is a martyr to indolence; he is thy victim, oh, humpbacked camel; he is reaping the fruits of making thee bear his burthens, instead of carrying them himself. The physic-taking mortal is paying the forfeit of your wrongs, oh, pig, and turtle! And the reeling wretch is securing to himself a life of guilt, misery and disgrace, by means of the liquor thou carriest on thy back, oh, most unreasonable donkey! Go thy ways in quiet, for again I say thou art amply revenged." The petitioners departed, but the camel, being a quadruped of great gravity, and somewhat of a philosopher, could not help thinking to himself, neither he nor the rest of the beasts were much the better for this species of vengeance. It is thus with man. He persuades himself that revenge will redress his wrongs and assuage his sorrows, and when he hugs it to his heart, finds only the fangs of the serpent distilling venom into his wounds.

TEMPERANCE.—The delights of temperance are so very obvious, that men are often puzzled to discover the cause of that fearful infatuation by which many are tempted into its opposite. The vigour, the elasticity, the sweet tranquillity of soul, which the temperate alone know and feel, cannot surely be equalled by any enjoyments that excess affords.
